From an ethnographic point of view, this paper considers the issues of mobility and spatial identities as a central part of the youth social identity construction (De Singly 2002). These issues are illustrated by drawing on recent fieldwork with young people (13-17 years old) living in suburban areas (Dombes) east of the city of Lyon, France. Through in-depth interview narratives, it attempts to understand young people lifestyles, which evolve as a process of moving in and out of the "field" / the "town", with and without parent's help. A part of the work consists in interrogating space representational practices, like for example "here" and "elsewhere", "public" and "private" space (Breviglieri & Cicchelli 2007) as compare to those of urban adolescents. These questions can be analysed by following daily travel patterns, the socialization to space, the building of their own social networks with/without the parents (Weller 2009) and the definition of identity they can provide, focusing on the multidimensional notion of territory. This perspective especially allows us to discuss the construction of a gendered mobility as hypothetically concomitant to gender identity, regarding to the differences observed between boys and girls (Buffet 2005).

Finally, those field examples can provide concrete elements for thinking the process of constructing "European society or European societies". Indeed, it can be questioned through the building of youth identity(-ties), framed by the interactions between larger processes (the global) and local territorial conceptions (the local).

Modern Youth and Working out Social Policy of the Municipal Administration in Russia

Urzha, Olga

*INSTITUTION SOCIAL MANAGEMENT, RUSSIAN STATE SOCIAL UNIVERSITY
Moscow, Russia*

Keywords

municipal, social, administration, Youth, policy

Nowadays the question under consideration and investigation is the state of modern Russian youth, the dynamics of its development, forming of its interests and elaborating the adequate social policy.

The real basis for working out the adequate social policy is the knowledge of the real state of social structure of Russian youth, the dynamics and tendencies of its changes.

Social structure of Russian youth and of Russian society is a phenomenon which needs detailed rethinking according to its previous and its contemporary state. The lack of reliable knowledge of social structure of the society and the dynamics of its development is a cause of numerous failures in social policy.

Political and economical changing in Russia during the last 20 years influenced the attitude of the young people to politics and taking part in administration. Absolute refusal of the old values and standards they had been grown with, and absence of new ones, together with the circumstances of transition to market economy in our country caused the situation when for many young people wealth became the only value and purpose. Human values shifted to the background or even lost their importance at all. It's considered non-prestigious to take part in political activities or elections, government or municipal administration.

This situation leads to the number of serious consequences, such as aging of people in the government, having no possibility to share the experience with the young successors, the lack of adequate youth policy in the country and its regions.

Several sociological researches have studied this problem. It enabled us to estimate political activity of Russian young people and their readiness to take part in local municipal administration, according to their place of living, the level of education, the sphere of occupation and etc. These and other data will be presented in the report by the author.

Besides, the author is going to present some technologies for improving the situation and increasing the activity of young people in local municipal administration. These suggestions are based on the analysis of historical and modern experience in Russia.

Negotiating Tensions and Contradictions in Youth Crime Prevention Initiatives in Ireland

Swirak, Katharina

*Applied Social Studies, University College Cork
Cork, Ireland*

Geoghegan, Martin

*Applied Social Studies, University College Cork
Cork, Ireland*

Powell, Fred

*Applied Social Studies, University College Cork
Cork, Ireland*

Scanlon, Margaret

*Applied Social Studies, University College Cork
Cork, Ireland*

Keywords

Ireland, social control, Youth Crime Prevention, Youth Work

Youth work in Ireland is, and historically has been delivered almost exclusively by voluntary, third sector civil society organisations. Over the last thirty years, the sector has traditionally advocated an ethos based on the voluntary participation of young people; a focus on group learning; an informal relationship between participants and organisers, and a concern with the informal social and personal education of the young person (Smith, J. 2001). Social and personal development outside of the formal education system remains the purportedly official focus of youth work (Irish Youth Work Act, 2001). However, increasingly, some youth work organisations have become involved in implementing "Youth Diversion Projects". These multi-agency initiatives were established in 1991 as part of the Government's effort to enhance a community-based approach to diverting young people from the criminal justice system. The National Youth Justice Strategy (2008-2010) aims to establish 168 of these projects by the end of 2012. Currently 100 projects are in operation and have been positively evaluated with regard to diverting young people from criminal or anti-social behaviour (Bowden and Higgins, 2000). However, the involvement of "voluntary" youth work organisations in these projects which are arguably located within a social control discourse opens up a number of tensions and contradictions with the traditional framework of Youth Work in Ireland. This paper seeks to understand how the youth work community negotiates these contradictory ideologies and discourses. Through the analysis of major policy documents and key stakeholder interviews, the two discourses will be juxtaposed and their negotiated cooperation analysed. It will be argued that several commonalities exist, which allow for the alliance to function: the overarching notion of new public management; pressures for resource mobilisation; an increasing shift to targeted work with "disadvantaged" young people and the earnest motivation to find the most appropriate intervention for young people "at risk" of offending. The paper concludes that "Diversion Projects" may become loci for the practice of "disciplinary networks" (Foucault, 1975) around the young person, which may assume quasi-judicial powers of assessment and programme delivery (Smith, R. 2007), possibly reinforcing "exclusionary" criminology which it claims to be opposed to.

Networked Youth: generational representation and User Generated Contents in Italy

Boccia Artieri, Giovanni

*Sociology of communication, University of Urbino "Carlo Bo"
Urbino, Italy*

Gemini, Laura

*Sociology of communication, University of Urbino "Carlo Bo"
Urbino, Italy*

Keywords

generation Y, Reflexivity, social media, social representations

The aim of this paper is to present results of an ongoing research project about how teenagers generate generational narratives starting from mass media culture on the networked space (Edmunds and Turner 2005, Kazys 2008, Boyd 2009).

Weblogs, and the whole web 2.0, seems to be a viable place where to observe if and how generational discourses emerge, and if they may arise around specific media-contents or media-topic able to trigger the reflexive process.

Twenty first century youth cannot be represented as a passive media audience anymore but rather native active audience. Today media products seem to be a common element of everyday experience and youth are able to reshape media to communicate their own personal meanings (Jenkins 2008).

Using digital media widely available over the Internet youth are today remix, create and share a huge amount of digital narratives that are for the first time persistent, searchable, replicable and addressed to an invisible audience. By doing that generation Y give to researchers an enormous amount of data that can be analyzed with standard content analysis qualitative or quantitative techniques.

The research team developed software aimed to scan and retrieve user generated content from some of the major services that allows users to upload and share their own content. Using as starting keywords several media products that have been identified as "generational" from the teenagers, the research group investigated how those media products have been introduced in personal narrations, what's their role and how personal perception is shaped by media representation.

The main goal of the research project we are discussing here is to understand if and how media products (e.g. novels, movies, TV shows) affect the wide process leading to the creation of a shared set of meanings and sense of belonging, what called generational "we sense". The research will observe not only how youth perceive their media representation but at the same time will observe of youth are able to use those representation as elements for their own personal narration.

New and old forms of transitions to adulthood: facts from the Catalan Youth Survey

Serracant, Pau

-, Catalan Youth Observatory

Barcelona, Spain

Soler, Roger

-, Catalan Youth Observatory

Barcelona, Spain

Keywords

Youth, Transitions, diversification, linearity, reversibility

This paper presents the main results of the Catalan Youth Survey of the year 2007. This official periodical survey has a sample of 2.4000 individuals aged from 15 to 34 and includes four batteries of retrospective questions about education, work, housing and family formation. The analysis studies the main characteristics of the four partial transitions considered (end of education, labour market integration, leaving home and family formation) and it also builds up, through a cluster analysis, an integral typology of the trajectories of transition into adulthood of Catalan young people. The results partially question some of the assumptions on youth research literature concerning youth transitions, i.e. the non-linearity of transitions, the diversification of trajectories or its increased reversibility. Thus, the youth phase enlargement seems to have reached its peak; linear and quick transitions seem to be the most common; and reversibility, although frequent, is not dominant. The results also highlight the fact that the extent to which precariousness and unemployment are temporary life phases or a permanent situation depends mostly in the level of instruction.

Opinions and Attitudes of Modern Russian Youth

Pronina, Elena

*Sociology of education and youth, Institute of sociology RAS
Moscow, Russia*

Keywords

sociation, values, civil culture

Today in the higher educational institutions of Russia the emphasis has been again placed on the educational work with students, the great value is given to patriotism education as an important component of civil culture. However, here it is necessary to consider that corresponding value structures are formed in so-called primary socialization of an individual, by 18-20 years, and then remain stable enough. In this connection it is a pressing question with what "luggage" of values, valuable views and behavioral attitudes in relation to the Native Land the tomorrow's students will come to the Russian high schools.

In March-May 2007 we had spent a poll of 500 senior pupils on inter-regional sample (Belgorod, Magadan, Nizhnevartovsk, Moscow suburbs, Tver). The conducted research has shown that the major symbol feeding the patriotic views and attitudes of young people till now is to be the Great Patriotic War and the Victory of 1945. So, 83.9 % of respondents consider the Victory Day on May 9 "as holidays personally for themselves", and 55.8 % ? the Day of the defender of the Fatherland on February 23. It underlines an exclusive urgency of the given subjects and the cultural layer connected with it for education of effective love and respect for the Native Land, but also causes the known alarm as the ideology of patriotism practically does not develop in Russia and does not integrate new senses into it. The indirect but the significant indicators of the vacuum of actual patriotic senses is to be the uncertainty of the criteria of patriotic behavior: so, almost half (47.9 %) of the asked on a projective question "what they would make, if they had a boundless possibility to prove themselves as patriots of Russia", have answered I "do not know". Before us there is very difficult task of connection of a traditional "military" kernel of patriotic education with essentially new semantic codes displaying perspective postindustrial values and attitudes.

Parental and Scholl Related Protective Factors for Substance use among Hungarian Adolescents

Piko, Bettina

*Department of Behavioral Sciences, University of Szeged
Szeged, Hungary*

Kovacs, Eszter

*Department of Behavioral Sciences, University of Szeged
Szeged, Hungary*

Keywords

substance use, parental monitoring, social support, protective factors

Substance use among adolescents remains a matter of worldwide concern, therefore, a growing number of investigations aim to search for potentially protective factors. Among the influencing factors for adolescent substance use, social influences, such as social support and network variables have been found to be in the focal point of research. Peer influences often serve as a risk factor since sharing substance use often assures conformity with peers. While adolescents tend to spend more time with peers and less with parents during this developmental period, many researchers emphasize that parent-adolescent relations continue to serve as an adaptive and protective function by providing a secure base for adolescents. The role of parents, however, is more latent and more controversial as compared to the role of peers. This paper is focused on possible protective factors of adolescent substance in a sample of high school students (N = 881) in Szeged, Hungary. Data were collected in 2008. Self-administered questionnaires were applied that measured smoking, binge drinking, marijuana use and parental and school-related protective factors. Multiple regression analysis revealed that parental monitoring was a universal protective factor for adolescents. In comparison with parental monitoring, social support variables did not remain significant in the final model. Among school-related factors, high academic achievement was a predictor of smoking and binge drinking, talking about problems with teachers and being happy with school were predictors of marijuana use. Our findings draw attention to the importance of searching for protective factors against adolescent substance use. Particularly we need to have a better understanding of the altered role of parent-child relationship in adolescents' health-related behaviors.

Personal, political and emotional: Subjective experiences of "the political" in the lives of young people

Edwards, Kathy

Youth Work, School of Global Studies, Social Science and Planning, Royal Melbourne Institute of Technology Melbourne, Victoria, Australia

Keywords

personal as political, subjective realm, sociology of emotion, political participation

The perceived declining participation of (particularly) young citizens from many nations in multiple realms of political life has received much attention from the media, policy-makers and researchers. Academic literature addressing this issue has on the one hand focused on young people's alleged political apathy, cynicism and lack of civic knowledge, effectively considering declining participation as a "deficit". On the other hand it has explored the possibility that young people are engaging in multiple different ways from those that are traditionally measured, it has identified possible barriers to their participation and it has challenged that they are losing interest in politics and political life. However, despite politics being both a very personal and "emotive" topic, explorations of declining participation generally, and particularly in the case of young people, usually overlook the place of politics in citizens' subjective, personal and emotional lives. This paper explores the place of politics in young people's personal lives, particularly the links between their personal experiences of politics, their emotional responses to politics and their political engagement and behaviour. It asks what research in these domains could potentially contribute to an understanding of young people's political participation. In particular it discusses power, powerlessness, inclusion, exclusion and connectedness; feelings and emotional reactions frequently reported by young people when asked about politics and participation. In doing so it engages not only with original feminist precepts regarding the linking of the political with the personal, but also with emerging and growing bodies of literature on politics and emotions, and the sociology of emotions, as well as with a range of empirical studies (both quantitative and qualitatively based) of young people's political participation in Europe and Australia.

Political Socialisation and Participation through Youth Branches of Political Party Organisations in Turkey

Boyraz, Cemil

*International Relations, Istanbul Bilgi University
ISTANBUL, TURKEY*

Keywords

participation, electoral system, party politics, youth branches, political socialization

Youth branches under the political parties' structure have been one of the most important mechanisms of political socialization and participation in Turkey. This paper is based on the results derived from a field study which is conducted between 2008 June-2009 January through focus group interviews (10 interviews with 68 participants, between 18 and 24 ageS) with the members of the youth branches of ten political parties (inside and outside the parliament) in Turkey. During interviews it is firstly investigated that which factors and mechanisms have been influential on political socialization and participation of youth in Turkey; secondly, how belated establishment of youth branches of political parties in Turkey contributed to these processes; thirdly, how structural and institutional processes such as party system and electoral system shaped the youth participation in Turkish politics. Moreover, approaches of youth representatives of political parties in Turkey to national and global politics issues as well as the conception of political, democracy (intra-party democracy in particular and parliamentary democracy in general), participation mechanisms in decision-making processes are elaborately presented. A particular attention will also be given to their stories of engagement in politics-political parties and personal experiences influential on their political views and identification. In the last part, critical reflections will be presented to understand factors constraining wider political participation of youth population with reference to the formal character of representative democracy rather than participatory and deliberative, centralized and highly hierarchic party system and ineffective functioning of electoral systems to support youth branches of political parties. Within these considerations, a panorama of youth political socialization, mobilization and participation through youth branches of political parties in Turkey is figured out and structural constrains on youth involvement in politics as a key feature of democratic life are discussed.

Postponement of parenthood in the Balkan countries

Kuhar, Metka

*Faculty of Social Sciences, University of Ljubljana
Ljubljana, Slovenia*

Keywords

parenthood, values, family formation, Balkans, Transitions

Low fertility and the postponement of child-bearing are widespread phenomena in Europe, but especially in the Balkan (southeastern European) societies (former Yugoslavia, Albania, Romania, Bulgaria). This paper contributes to explicating the factors influencing family formation and child-bearing patterns in the Balkan countries. This is done with the help of a multi-layer and interdisciplinary approach using data from the World Values Survey and the European Values Survey. In particular, the paper addresses: 1) selected structural and institutional trends (e.g. education and employment patterns etc.); 2) partnership and reproductive behaviours; 3) value orientations and attitudes connected with family and gender (e.g. attitudes on gender equality, attitudes on division of household labour etc.). The Balkan countries are compared with the EU 15 and the remaining post-socialist EU member states on these three levels. Besides, the intraregional similarities and differences will be exposed.

On the basis of the analyses, the paper builds upon the second demographic transition concept. The data show a gap between the changed family formation and childbearing patterns (mostly showing the characteristics of second demographic transition, i.e. destandardization of transitions to adulthood, pluralisation of family forms, delayed childbearing, decreasing fertility) and value orientations which are still traditional in most of the Balkan countries. The paper investigates the impact of socio-economic characteristics (such as gender, education level, employment, income, housing, marital status) and family value orientations on childbearing. The reasons behind the trends for low fertility and delayed childbearing are explicated: transitional changes, such as economic decline, decreasing social security, wars etc.

Recreation and Re-creation: Portuguese young people and their leisure activities in Macao

Pessoa, Inês

Sociology, ISCTE

Lisbon, Portugal

Keywords

Young Portuguese people, Migration, Macao, leisure, friendships

There is a widespread consensus on the relevance peer groups and leisure activities have in structuring young people's identities during the life stage we call youth.

There is also a general agreement about a set of transversal leisure activities which tended to be globally held by young people, at least in developed and developing countries (such as watching TV, listening to music, going out with their friends, playing with electronic games and gadgets), as well as the recognition of the diversity of different ways they invest in these and other leisure practices, according to some variables: gender, economic, cultural and social capital together with their cultural backgrounds.

Taking this into account, we are going to study how Portuguese young migrants who lived in Macao in the 80's and 90's of the XX century used to occupy their free time and which kind of leisure activities they developed, relating their practices with their personal dispositions and social positions; their social networks and primary cultural references; their migrant status and no less important the context of action, that is, the geographical and cultural characteristics of Macao.

Recurrent Poverty: understanding young adults transitions into and out of poverty

Shildrick, Tracy

*Sociology, University of Teesside
Middlesbrough, UK*

Garthwaite, Kayleigh

*SSSL, University of Teesside
Middlesbrough, UK*

MacDonald, Robert

*SSSL, University of Teesside
Middlesbrough, UK*

Webster, Colin

Criminology, Leeds Metropolitan University Leeds, UK

Keywords

biography, Poverty, transition

This paper is based on longitudinal data which is being collected as part of a Joseph Rowntree funded project on recurrent poverty. "Two Steps Forward, Two Back: Understanding recurrent poverty" is a qualitative project which investigates experiences of recurrent poverty - how people move in and out of poverty over the life course - holistically and within a wider consideration of experiences of multiple and cumulative hardships. As part of the project we have re-interviewed thirty young adults who were previously included in a series of UK, Teesside based youth transitions studies. These young adults are now aged over thirty and have been interviewed several times over a ten year period. This data gives us a relatively unusual and fascinating qualitative, longer term picture of young adult's transitions as they move beyond the traditional period associated with youth. In our previous studies, in general, young adults' biographies were characterised by economic marginalisation and multiple hardships. This paper explores similarities and differences across these young people's lives and biographies over time. For some, their lives continue to be characterised by poverty and multiple hardships, whilst others have managed to move up and away from these experiences.

Researching youth and culture in contemporary Europe: Exploring young people's drinking cultures beyond the "Birmingham School"

Griffin, Christine

Department of Psychology, University of Bath Bath, United Kingdom

Keywords

class, culture, neo-liberalism, Drinking, Youth

The distinctive focus on youth cultures and sub-cultures that emerged at Birmingham's Centre for Contemporary Cultural Studies (CCCS) during the 1970s has had a substantial impact on academic understanding of the constitution of "youth" and the lives of young people. However, the legacy of this approach remains an arena of heated debate and contestation. In this paper I will trace some of the main contributions and limitations of youth sub/cultural theory, locating it in the historical, political and conceptual context from which it emerged. I also consider some of the directions taken by youth sub/cultural research over the past thirty years, engaging with a number of recent critiques of the "CCCS approach". The paper ends with an exploration of the relevance and potential value of the concept of "youth culture" in the globalised neo-liberal social order that characterises contemporary "late modern" society, with a particular focus on the "European" arena. In this context, autonomous individuality manifested through consumption is viewed as the cornerstone of contemporary identity and social life. I will interrogate these issues with reference to recent research involving cultures of drinking to intoxication amongst young people in a range of European contexts and in relation to the practices of the global drinks industry. I end by arguing that the CCCS focus on mediated cultural practices that are collective and creative, and through which young people constitute themselves and their (gendered, classed, national and racialised) positions in the world, remains of potential value for current research on youth and culture.

Return to Sender: Exploring Return Migration among European Youth

Cairns, David

CIES, ISCTE

Lisbon, Portugal

Keywords

Northern Ireland, Portugal, Youth, return migration

This paper examines an increasingly important research theme within migration studies, namely return migration, focusing upon the back and forward trans-national movements of young people. Also known as reverse migration, return migration refers to the process of migrants returning from host countries and regions to live once more in their places of origin. Following a brief review of theoretical and empirical studies of return migration (for example, Gill 2005, Williams and Balá? 2005, Ni Laoire 2007 and Tannenbaum, 2007), this paper first examines possible factors which are precipitating return migration among youth in Europe, making use of existing national and European level statistical evidence. This assessment includes discussion of the salience of economic factors and the significance of the family in youth return migration decision-making. Secondly, this analysis is complemented by exploring a specific return youth migration case study, namely return migration from Northern Ireland to Portugal. In recent decades, thousands of young Portuguese migrants have found work in the factories of the small market towns of Northern Ireland, typically at minimum wage levels and for short durations. This paper looks at reasons for their choice of Northern Ireland and also the social, economic, political, cultural and other factors which may have led to a return. The concluding section of this paper moves towards a conceptualisation of return migration among youth, taking into account not only the current economic downturn, but also personal influences upon return migration decision-making, most prominently, the role of the family.

Risk of social exclusion after leaving institutional care

Trapenciere, Ilze

*Sociology, Institute of Philosophy and Sociology, University of Latvia
Riga, Latvia*

Keywords

young care leavers, risk of social exclusion, integration policy

The paper is based on a comparative study on Risk of social exclusion of youth leaving institutional care when turning 18. Study employs Allardt's theory (Having, Loving, and Being) and analyses the possible risks of social exclusion of youth who have spent majority of their lives in institutions. Methods used - focus group discussions with care leavers, interviews with mothers who have been deprived from parental rights and experts in child protection system. Main conclusions show the material deprivation, psychological isolation and poor social integration policy for care leavers. One of the main recommendations demonstrates the need of skills training for integration into adult life and state support policy strategy.

Risks of social exclusion among Youth in Latvia

Karklina, Ieva

*Institute of Philosophy and Sociology, Agency of the University of Latvia
Riga, Latvia*

Senkane, Silva

*Faculty of Social Sciences, University of Latvia
Riga, Latvia*

Keywords

Youth, social integration, life path

Traditionally, integration of youth into society is imagined as consecutive transition - school, training or studies, which prepares for definite professional positions, and the beginning of employment. This view is closely associated with standard model of life path and it emphasizes that adult status is based on paid work and family. Thus, the border between status of young and adult man is clearly defined: this is the end of the studies and the start of the working life. However integration and inclusion can't pass mechanically, this process depends on individual decision and choice; and unfortunately, there are groups within youth which drops out of requirements of "standard" model.

Within contemporary society, which is success-oriented and therefore, educational achievement is an indicator of success and key to an individual's future prospects, insufficient education becomes a factor for stigmatization, which contributes to social exclusion.

The aim of this research is, firstly, to identify groups within youth who are neither in education, employment nor in training (NEET); and secondly, to define the protective factors and risks that effect the level of integration into society for youth.

The research is based on secondary analysis of data from one of the major longitudinal comparative educational research in the world TIMSS (Trends in International Mathematic and Science Study) and data collected by researchers of Agency of the University of Latvia - Institute of Philosophy and Sociology:

- 1) Qualitative methods: in-depth interviews with target groups and experts - municipal principals ,educational experts and social workers ;
- 2) Quantitative methods: data from international comparative educational research, several surveys of youth with low educational achievement level, and data from Latvian youth survey enable the author to analyze the employment opportunities for youth. .

Research data has shown that low educational achievement and the insufficient working experience are ones of the most significant risks, what affects social exclusion among youth.

Sanctions against Young Welfare Recipients in Germany - Perspectives of Job Placement Officers. Results of a Qualitative Research Project

Götz, Susanne

Research Department E1 (Education and Employment over the Life Course), Institute for Employment Research (IAB) of the German Federal Employment Agency (BA) Nuremberg, Germany

Keywords

Youth, unemployment, Sanctions, Social exclusion, qualitative research

The study explores the sanctioning practice against young welfare recipients of job placement officers in Germany. With the establishment of the law "Social Code II" in 2005, Germany, following other European countries, has changed from an active to an activating welfare state by strengthening the paradigm of "promoting and demanding". Benefit recipients younger than 25 years are defined as a special target group to counteract the increasing youth unemployment. As a consequence better assistance conditions exist for them, but in return they are subject to tougher financial sanctions. Contrary to older clients, benefits already are reduced by 100 % for three months after the first neglect of duty. In case of repeated failure, the payment for housing and heating is cancelled. Previous investigations showed distinctive varieties of the sanctioning practice by different job placement officers, not only regarding the frequency, but also the duration and type of sanction, even though there are clear legal requirements. Therefore we analyse the sanctioning practice of job placement officers and their estimation of and experiences with sanctions. 24 semi-structured interviews give evidence that, aside from varying regional labour market situations, other variables also influence the sanctioning practice, like expert's pedagogical concepts, education, attitude towards young people and sanctions. Furthermore the experts know scarcely anything about the youth's life during a sanction. Sometimes sanctions are the reason why young persons break all the ties to the placement officers and drop out of the system. Sanctions aim to raise the incentives taking up an employment by financial pressure. But such strict sanctions can increase the risk of social exclusion as the benefit cuts decrease the living standard. Deprived living conditions in turn could hinder youth's education and employment chances. Finally, emphasising the necessity of tough sanctions, especially for unmotivated and reluctant persons, unemployment is ascribed to individual characteristics or rather to attributive characteristics of the youth, running the risk to separate society. The question is how youth's integration into society is possible, although integration into employment didn't succeed.

Second-Generation Immigrants: Prejudice and Relationships with Institutions

Daher, Liana Maria

Educational Process, University of Catania Catania, Italy

Keywords

Juridical Institutions, Schools, Immigration

The presence of second-generation immigrants in a country is an indication of lasting immigration and of an irreversible process of cultural change. Immigration is often perceived as a resource, and the fact that whole families remain in our country is seen by the local community as a possibility for growth and cultural exchange. However, immigration is sometimes seen as a threat, a condition that involves unrest and dissatisfaction for which local people and immigrants are both responsible.

In fact, it is possible to note a strain of prejudice that persists in native-immigrant relationships. This feeling precludes the way for a multicultural society and arises from cultural and linguistic misunderstandings.

Second-Generation immigrants form an unintentional generation, suspended between a sense of belonging and extraneity. Differently than adults, their first request is not a house or a job but to be accepted by society.

Finally the most relevant problem, in our analysis, is that second-generation children and young people often suffer troubles due to attitudes of prejudice feelings or the exaggerated indulgence of citizens and social workers.

In order to investigate this aspect of immigration, we aim to produce an ermeneutic reading of 25 life-stories of young second-generation immigrants that live in the town of Catania. The dimensions explored will be prejudice and relationships in educational and juridical institutions.

Second/third generation British-born young (diasporic) Tamils: Discourses of cultural identity and change

Antony, Richard

*Sociology, University of Surrey
Sutton(Surrey), England*

Keywords

identity, Migration, youth culture, Diaspora, second generation

The notion of diaspora explains how a particular movement of people are scattered over regions over a phase of time. Sri Lankan Tamil diaspora describes how the ethnic turmoil in Sri Lanka led to the movement of Sri Lankans from their original homeland to Western Europe and other foreign countries. The phenomenon of Sri Lankan Tamil migration to Britain can be divided into three phases. These have emerged as a result of different circumstances and include professionals, students and political asylum seekers (Daniel and Thangarajah, 1995). A number of Sri Lankan Tamils fled to Britain in this way. In this context, second/third generation Tamils in Britain may experience challenges in terms of identity and change in a new socio-cultural and political space. Existing literature elucidates the perspectives of migration, diaspora, transnational networks, media, cultural identity and minority youth sub-culture. This paper examines the discourses relating to life 'between two cultures', identity crisis, culture conflict and intergenerational relations concerning Tamil identity and patterns of change. The main focus highlights the existing issues in relation to internal differences of the Tamil diaspora in Britain, parent-youth relationships, differences between Tamil youth culture and non-Tamil youth culture.

The pilot study has been conducted with ethnographic and photographic evidence based on empirical observation in selected Tamil settlements in south and south west London. In-depth interviews and overt-observations are employed with young Tamils. The interviews mainly focus on how young Tamils negotiate their identities and experiences of being between two cultures or making the best of both worlds. The preliminary findings of the interviews show that the majority of young Tamil Londoners maintain their Tamil identity. Some negotiate integration with the mainstream culture while a few struggle between two cultures.

This study contributes to the much neglected phenomenon of the diasporic Tamil youth culture and develops a paradigm among minorities in Europe, which helps the Tamil diaspora around the world. The study hopes to create an awareness concerning the current issues on young Tamils among the Tamil diasporic community, and to establish a policy with Tamil youth for uplifting future Tamil generations.

Sexual activity and school deviant behavior among adolescents: peer influence and homophily interactions with sex and ethnicity

Berten, Hans

department of sociology, Ghent University Ghent, Belgium

Keywords

adolescence, Network Analysis, social influence, risk behavior

Criminologist and sociologists have since long recognized the importance of peer influence in adolescence, but only rarely are peer influence interactions studied with regard to important salient status characteristics. This study examines whether homophily status characteristics condition the influence between best friends and the individual's behaviour. The focus of the study is on school deviant behaviour as well as sexual activity. More specifically, we address the question to what extent peer influence differs for friends of the same sex or ethnicity (i.e. homophilic relationships), compared to friends who differ on sex and ethnicity (i.e. heterophilic relationships). Data from the Flemish Educational Assessment Study are used, which collected complete network data, from a representative sample of Flemish adolescents in secondary schools (N=11,837), clustered in 160 networks. Results indicate that peers best friend relationships are indeed strongly homophilic on both of these status dimensions and that homophilic friendships are significantly more influential than heterophilic ones. Further results show that native Belgian adolescents (majority teens) are significantly more influenced by homophilic relationships than adolescents belonging to a ethno-cultural minority group (minority teens). For sexual activity, girls are influenced stronger by homophilic relationships than boys, while for school deviant behavior the opposite is true. Cross-ethnic influence of majority teens on minority teens is substantially smaller than for minority teens on majority teens, especially for sexual activity. Implications of these findings for theory development and prevention programs are discussed.

Sexuality and religion in transition: A longitudinal study of Croatian college students and sexual risks, 1998-2008

Bacak, Valerio

*Department of Sociology, Faculty of Humanities and Social Sciences, University of Zagreb
Zagreb, Croatia*

Stulhofer, Aleksandar

*Department of Sociology, Faculty of Humanities and Social Sciences, University of Zagreb
Zagreb, Croatia*

Soh, Damir

Department of Sociology, Center for Croatian Studies, University of Zagreb Zagreb, Croatia

Jelaska, Nika

*Department of Psychology, Faculty of Humanities and Social Sciences, University of Zagreb
Zagreb, Croatia*

Landripet, Ivan

*Department of Sociology, Faculty of Humanities and Social Sciences, University of Zagreb
Zagreb, Croatia*

Keywords

religion, Sexuality, Youth, transition, Croatia

Personal importance and political influence of religion increased substantially during the war-affected democratic transition in Croatia. Young people were particularly vulnerable in this process in regard to sexual behavior. Their sexual socialization was surrounded with mixed messages. On the one hand, Church promoted sexual abstinence as the only appropriate way toward sexual health; while on the other hand, media were increasingly portraying images of sexual permissiveness. This paper examines one part of Croatian youth sexuality in transition: the impact of religiosity on sexual risk taking among young people using data from a longitudinal study conducted in 1998, 2003, and 2008 on probability samples of the University of Zagreb freshmen students. In particular, we looked at three hypotheses exploring both the risk-reducing role of religiosity, and the role it possibly has on risk-amplification. First, we hypothesized that religiosity is associated with lesser knowledge of human sexuality and more negative attitudes toward condom use; second, that religiosity delays sexual debut; and third, that religiosity decreases the odds of condom use.

Students who scored high in religiosity had less favorable attitudes towards condoms and were less sexually literate than those who scored low in religiosity. In addition, religiosity was associated with a slight but significant postponement of sexual debut for both women and men. Two mechanisms are proposed as potential explanations for the somewhat surprising lack of significant association between religiosity and condom use. The first is the specific nature of religious identification among young people in Croatia. As recent studies suggested, religiosity is more often a confirmation of young people's national identity than a matter of faith and moral guidance. The second mechanism emphasizes the influence of sexual permissiveness discourse, promoted in popular media, on young people's framing and understanding of sexuality.

Finally, considering that the observed increase in the proportion of sexually active students during the period between 1998 and 2008 was not matched by a parallel increase in consistent condom use, the introduction of a comprehensive school-based sexuality education seems essential for addressing this heightened vulnerability of young Croats to sexually transmitted infections.

Skateboard girls: on power, senses and affective embodiment

Bäckström, Åsa

*Dept. of Child and Youth Studies, Stockholm University
Stockholm, Sweden*

Keywords

embodiment, affect, girlhood, senses, skateboarding

As one of the many claimed turns in social sciences lately, we experience (sic!) a corporeal one and as consequence we now know of a sensual revolution. Within that framework this paper discusses female skateboarding and its sensuous appearance. Female skateboarders in Sweden are using their bodies to negotiate power. In so doing their performing bodies are sensing subjects but also sensational objects. Bodies are where senses and affect meet with cultural and social assumptions. Bodies express and perform, bodies fail and succeed, bodies beam in pride and are put in place. Theoretical inspiration comes from various areas such as girlhood studies, the anthropological research on the senses in culture, and the psychology of affect.

Social and historical generations - how to draw a line?

Nugin, Raili

*Center for Contemporary Cultural Studies, Tallinn University
Tallinn, Estonia*

Keywords

post-communist change, Generation, Youth

The presentation concentrates on the emergence of new generation(s) after the collapse of Soviet Union. It has been widely accepted in generational research that generational identity forms during the socialization (or, during the transition from youth to adulthood) and usually harsh social changes bring forth the new generational identity. After or during the change, young people face new contexts of socialization and thus develop a different identity. In post-socialist research, there is almost no debate about the fact that a new generation(s) emerged. But that is where the consensus ends. There is no mutual understanding about the character of this generation (it has been labeled "generation of change", "transition youth", "generation of winners", "generation of losers" etc.) since in different countries its transition to adulthood or prospects of life path vary a lot. In addition, even bigger confusion prevails as to where are the borders of this "generation of change" - which cohorts belong to it. In the presentation, two cohorts, which have come of age during post-communist era, are under scope: those born in the beginning of the 1970ies, and those in middle of 1980ies. By following the social contexts of their early socialization it will be shown that their transition to adulthood has taken place in very different social conditions. Thus, it will be asked: is there a reason to consider them as two different generations of change? How much can a generation be socially shared experience and how much a construction of sociologists? In addition to social context, some qualitative data (interviews, essays) will be used in order to have a look how the representatives of these cohorts see their generational identity and generational borders. The data suggests that the older cohort seems to distinguish themselves from the younger. Interestingly enough, they often seem to see their generation in a timespan of only ten years.

Social markers and norms on transitions to adulthood: comparing 23 European countries

Ferreira, Vitor Sérgio

*Sociology, Institute of Social Sciences - University of Lisbon
Lisboa, Portugal*

Nunes, Catia

*Sociology, Institute of Social Sciences - University of Lisbon
Lisboa, Portugal*

Keywords

Adulthood., Transitions, norms, Social Markers, life course

Do individuals perceive transitions to adulthood as being associated to proper timings of specific life events? Are these supposed to follow a particular sequence? Do different social markers and norms have more or less importance in the definition of becoming an "adult"? And do these vary according to country, gender, age or level of education?

Using data from the European Social Survey - Round 3, we analysed several indicators regarding social markers and norms on transitions to adulthood in 23 European countries.

Differences between and within countries were found. These do not reproduce only geographically based clusters of countries, but a more diversified patterning of attitudes on transitions to adulthood across European societies. Specifically, results show that some countries give more importance to residential autonomy and having a full-time job in becoming an adult, while others seem to emphasise family related events, such as living with a partner or having children. However, at the individual level, we were able to identify four different and distinct clusters of individuals regarding these social markers and norms on transitions to adulthood: 1) those who clearly express a more "destandardised" attitude regarding transitions to adulthood, i.e., individuals who do not attribute much importance to any of the social markers; 2) those who express a more "standardised" attitude, as they consider all social markers important; 3) those who give more importance to family related social markers (get married; have children) and less importance to more "individualistic" social markers (residential and financial autonomy); 4) those who, in contrast, consider social markers regarding residential and financial autonomy as more important in becoming an adult. We were able to compare countries in terms of these different clusters, where for example Nordic countries present higher percentages of individuals with "destandardised" and "individualistic" attitudes, in contrast to the situation of Portugal, where there is a high percentage of individuals with a more "standardised" attitude regarding transitions to adulthood. We also extended our analysis by gender, age group, level of education and religious attendance, to get a better insight into the characteristics of the individuals composing these four clusters.

Social representations at crossroads: generations and social division of labour

Rapetti, Elisa

Department of labour and welfare studies, Universi of Milan - Statale Milan, Itali

Keywords

social representation, social cohesion, Network Analysis, social division of labour, life projects

The aim of the paper is to analyse social representations of young adults about the gender division of social labour and the role of work as one of the dimensions in the individual life.

Starting from the concept of generation and changing of social cohesion processes in contemporary society, it will be studied the overlap among the different life dimensions for individual and coordination processes of social organization. The role of labour and the types of network construction of each person are crucial to understand the mechanisms of social identity definition.

In today's society, the changing of representations of the individual life equilibria, regarding the organization of the relation system with society, works and culture in the literature are usually related to the dichotomy of public and private spheres.

Hypothesis of the paper is that this dichotomy cannot explain the complexity of the new axes of opposition between public and private and individual life. It should be useful to reconsider theoretically the mechanism of social representation construction.

The paper contains also a proposal for an empirical design to investigate these issues, specifically for young people (in the range from 25 and 35 years), using different techniques: narrative interviews and semantic/relational map. In this way it is possible to focus the attention not only on the meaning of social representation but also on the mechanisms and on the practises of their construction.

Social settings for drug use: from clubbing to house parties

Ravn, Signe

Centre for Alcohol and Drug Research, Copenhagen Division, University of Aarhus Copenhagen S, Denmark

Keywords

club studies, qualitative methods, recreational drug use, Youth

The aim of this paper is to understand the settings in which youth recreational drug use takes place, and how these settings facilitate various kinds of drug use among youth. International research has described the nightclub as a central social space for youth recreational drug use. However, provisional analyses from a Danish study suggest that other social arenas might be of equal importance in understanding youth drug use.

The paper draws upon data from a Danish club study conducted during autumn 2008 and winter 2009. In this study, ethnographic observations were carried out at a range of different clubs in Denmark. In addition to this, focus group interviews as well as individual and duo interviews were conducted with drug-experienced youths. The focus groups made use of a moderation technique in which the participants were asked to describe a night out step by step. In the individual interviews, this was combined with an exercise involving drawing a map of the night out. Thus, the empirical material covers various nightlife settings from what could be termed a socionautic perspective as well as from the researcher's own perspective.

Applying a phenomenological approach to this data material, the logic inherent in the different kinds of nightlife settings will be shown. Furthermore, the relation between drug use and setting will be discussed.

Specificity of Legal Culture of Young Russians

Lidia M., Kurakina

Head of Department of Humanity Sciences, Syzran branch of Samara Technical University Syzran, Samara Region, Russia

Keywords

legal socialization, legal culture, political socialization

Forming legal culture is the important part of the political socialization of a person. Study of legal culture of modern Russian youth was conducted on the basis of sociological poll in Syzran (n=504, November 2008). We used estimative and behavioral exponents as the basic indicators of the state of legal socialization, among them: attitude to the work of militia; degree of readiness to assist militiamen.

As our research has shown, 50.0 % of young citizens estimate the work of divisional militiamen positively; the level of trust makes 46.3 %. On average, young people estimate the work of militia lower in comparison with older respondents.

Degree of readiness to assist militiamen is a more significant parameter of legal socialization of the youth. On average, 14.9 % of young respondents (27.6 % throughout the community) expressed readiness to assist militia in case of need, 59.7 % (51.3 % of the whole number of the respondents) are not ready to render assistance. The above-mentioned correlation looks even more depressing regarding students: 9.0 % are ready to assist; 63.6 % are not ready.

Legal nihilism of modern Russian youth cannot be perceived only as an informative-cognitive fact of the modern reality. It is necessary to search for more effective forms of interaction between militia and youth. In fact, young people may represent not only the potential of positive changes, but also a possible factor of social and political instability.

Subcultures in Estonia: perception of borders inside and outside subculture

Allaste, Airi-Alina

*Centre for Lifestyles Studies, Insitute for international and Social Studies, Tallinn University
Tallinn, Estonia*

Keywords

subcultural identities, mainstream and underground, borders of culture

Estonia is a small transition society that has experienced a lot of changes over the past decades. Being young in contemporary Estonia differs fundamentally from the "being young" of the previous generation, both in terms of living conditions and common values. Younger generations have integrated into international youth cultures and subcultures which exert increasing influence onto their lives and identity formation. Distinctive subcultures have different positions in Estonia (Eastern Europe) as compared to Western Europe, since they have mostly spread and expanded only after the restoration of Estonia's independence and are not an inherent and accepted part of the society. Subcultures, their internal structure and relationship to wider society are also influenced by the small size and lack of historically formed classes in Estonia. This paper gives an overview of the changes regarding to subcultures last decades and focuses on the following issues: How are subcultures and subcultural identities constructed through the perspective of active participants - what is the meaning of belonging to subcultures? How are the borders between "us" and "them" perceived? How is mainstream and underground defined? What is considered authentic or commercial?

The empirical part is based on open-ended interviews with representatives of respective subcultures in the hip-hop, metal, and club culture.

Teaching Youth Research in the Web - Experiences from Finland

Aapola-Kari, Sinikka

Sociology, University of Helsinki

Helsinki, Finland

Keywords

youth studies, students, teaching, internet, Finland

Youth research is a relatively new subject in Finnish universities, but at the moment it is offered as a minor subject in several universities around Finland. In 2008, a national university network of youth research YUNET started organizing youth studies courses nationally. So far more than 50 students around Finland and from different disciplines have taken courses offered by YUNET. The current situation concerning youth studies around Finland will be briefly described.

Meanwhile, the focus in this paper is on experiences of creating and teaching youth studies courses in the Internet. Among the questions that will be explored, are:

- how can youth research be taught as a multidisciplinary university subject?
- what kind of limitations and possibilities are offered by web-teaching-platforms such as BSCW and Moodle?
- what kind of pedagogical solutions have (not) been successful in the courses?
- how to address differences among the students depending on their discipline and their experience as students, among other things?
- what kind of unexpected problems have emerged?
- how have the students experienced the courses?
- suggestions as to how to develop the courses in the future

I will draw mainly from my own experiences as a university teacher and coordinator for YUNET, but will also give some examples from other teachers' courses. I will also use feedback that has been given by the students. I'm hoping to start a discussion with other people in the RN Youth and Generation who are teaching multidisciplinary youth studies in different universities around Europe.

The "degree of political" in youth political consumerism in 4 European countries

Taru, Marti

*Institute of International and Social Studies, Tallinn University
Tallinn, Estonia*

Keywords

Europe, Youth, active citizenship, comparative study

The "degree of political" in youth political consumerism in 4 European countries

Research goal

The article looks into socio-political activism of young people in Europe with an aim to estimate the degree to which their political consumerist activity carries political character.

Theoretical background and research question

Political consumerism refers to peoples' deliberate decisions to buy or refrain from buying consumer goods and/or services (boycott and buycott). It is aimed at changing institutional or marketing practices through altering peoples' consumer attitudes and purchase behavior.

For young people, political consumerism constitutes a route to social and political emancipation. Through value preferences and political attitudes, political consumerism is closely linked to issues of war and peace, environmental care, social justice and solidarity with working people in remote corners of the World. It is attractive to young people as it provides an arena where youth can express their values and preferences.

The main research question of the presentation is "To what degree are political consumerist activities indeed socio-politically motivated?"

Data

Analysis is based on opinion survey data collected in December 2004 in 4 countries: Finland, France, Germany, UK. In each country, weighted sample size was 1&nbsp;000 individuals. Samples were representative of national populations of youth aged 15-25 years.

Findings

All correlations between political consumerism and other socio-political activism were positive and statistically significant. The finding holds for both boycotting and buycotting involvement separately.

One observes differences across types of activities with civic activism being most strongly related to political consumerism.

Amongst countries, Finland stands out of the countries as it displayed the highest values of correlation coefficient and the UK the lowest with Germany and France between them. The finding allows interpretation that young Finns' acts of political consumerism are most motivated by political and social concerns. In the UK, political consumerist activities were carried out by people who were politically inactive otherwise.

Conclusion

The hypothesis that political consumerist activities tend to be politically motivated was confirmed. There were two dimensions which caused variation: across countries and across modes of participation.

The Amateur Football Players of Turkish Origin in Berlin and Reconstruction of their Professional Football Career Plans

Aktan, Oktay

*Sociology, University of Potsdam
Berlin, Germany*

Keywords

Career in Turkey as an alternative path, socialization differences among the football players, problems of social integration into the "homeland", reconstruction of "homeland" by third generation immigrants of Turkish origin in Berlin

This abstract includes a part of a qualitative PhD research project conducted in Berlin, which offers a phenomenological analysis of everyday life-world - alltägliche Lebenswelt of amateur football players of Turkish origin. Many qualitative and quantitative research were conducted -both at macro and micro level- to study the social impacts of migration. However, very few of them investigate into the future plans of the third generation of immigrants of Turkish origin.

Group discussion was used as the method for data collection in order to encourage the participants to tell more and to openly discuss their everyday football life with each other. This paper includes a hermeneutic interpretation of selected group discussions.

The collected empirical data show that most of the football players plan their professional football career in Turkey rather than in Germany. Professional football life in Germany is often represented as being more challenging than in Turkey. Additionally, a football career in Turkish leagues has been interpreted as an alternative career path to amateur players in Berlin. The participant group in this paper is composed of players who were born in Berlin and have played football there for a long time. Having been transferred to football clubs in Turkey at a certain age, they played football in Turkey for some time, but returned to Berlin mainly due to a lack of social integration. This paper analyses their problems which mostly originate from socialization differences between the players in Berlin and in Turkey. Additionally, the common perception of "Turkey as homeland" among third generation immigrants will be reconstructed as a social phenomenon that has undergone significant transitions compared to previous immigrant generations.

The causes of the gender gap in political interest among Flemish youth

Elchardus, Mark

*Sociology, Vrije Universiteit Brussel
Brussels, Belgium*

Herbots, Sarah

*Sociology, Vrije Universiteit Brussel
Brussels, Belgium*

Keywords

political participation, Gender, adolescence

Abstract

Earlier research has identified a wide gap between the political interest of men and women (Bennet & Bennet, 1996; Delli Carpini, 1996; Verba, Burns & Schlozman, 1997). Research among Flemish youth has revealed that such a gap does not exist at the age of 14, but gradually grows and at the age of 25 is quite sizable, with women's average political interest being about two thirds of the men's (Vanhoutte, 2007). The proposed paper has three goals. (1) To verify whether that observation can be replicated on the basis of new research material. (2) To map the gender difference in political interest between the ages of 12 and 30 (instead of 14 and 25). (3) To propose and test an explanation for the gender gap in political interest that emerges during adolescence and young adulthood. The replication is based on a purely random sample of 3710 respondents, aged 12 to 30, and living in the Flemish region of Belgium, that were surveyed in 2008.

The proposed explanation of the growing gap in political interest is based on the theory of doing gender (West & Zimmerman, 1987) and the application of the theory of symbolic boundaries, as applied to attitude formation (Elchardus & Siongers, 2007). It views a low political interest as part of a gender identity and expects it to grow as this identity takes shape and crystallizes. The crystallization of gender identity will be measured on the basis of discriminant analysis. The thesis that the crystallization of the gender role explains the growing difference in political interest will be tested by verifying whether the degree of femininity as expressed by the discriminant function does indeed explain the gender difference in political interest.

References

Elchardus, M. & Siongers, J. (2007). Ethnocentrism, taste and symbolic boundaries. Poetics, 35, pp.215-238.

Verba, S., Burns, N. & Schlozman, K.L. (1997). Knowing and caring about politics: gender and political engagement. Journal of Politics, 59, pp.1051-1072.

West, C. & Zimmerman, D.H. (1987). Doing gender. Gender and society, 1(2), pp. 125-151.

The consumerism of the street boys in the poor parisian suburb

Thomas, Sauvadet

sociology, CESAMES laboratory (CNRS - University of Paris 5 - INSERM) bry/marne, france

Keywords

life-style, Poverty, consumerism, delinquency, violence

« Le capital guerrier » (Armand Colin, 2006) is a socio-ethnographical investigation of an impoverished area from the south parisian suburb between 2000 and 2003. My presentation at this conference aims to study the link between the violence of the « street boys » and the violence of the consumer society.

I will analyze various forms of violence during my presentation :

- the violence of non-consumption and limited consumption (relative poverty, brand culture?),
- the access to the consumption by illegal means (theft, deal?),
- the violence by the consumption (drugs, guns?),
- and the violence of cultural consumption (action movies, war video games, gangsta rap?).

The presentation will also show two means used by the « street boys » to protect themselves from frustrations generated by the consumer society :

- the religion (Islamic in this case),
- the acceptance of an eccentric status close to tramp status,

Finally, I propose to discuss how these observations and analyses can apply to the « street girls ».

The democratic generation: political and ideological changes in portuguese youth

Augusto, Nuno

*Sociologia, Universidade da Beira Interior
Covilhã, Portugal*

Keywords

ideology, Generation, Youth, individualization, political change

The first generation of electors fully socialized in a democratic context is quit recent in Portugal. This new generation is sociologically different from former generations in many aspects: education, access to information, consumption, life-styles or social values. All these changes contributed to an adjustment in youth's political behaviour and ideological orientation. Their relationship with the political system and their ideological orientations along a left-right continuum is altering in many aspects, with visible consequences on the reorganization of the portuguese political and partisan scenario. Along this paper we emphasise two main aspects of these changes - left-right political orientations and partisanship, which are, in fact, deeply related. We believe that these changes in political behaviour and ideological orientation are the result of the confluence of three processes - individualization, post-modernization and generational change. We start our paper with a theoretical analysis of the relation between these three processes and its contribution to a better understanding of the relationship between youth, politics and ideologies. Secondly, we'll find some empirical evidences that, in a large number of aspects, corroborate the theoretical framework proposed. To do so, we use the Portuguese data from two indirect sources - European Social Studies (ESS 2004) and European Values Study (EVS 1999), as well as a questionnaire designed specifically to answer to our main questions. Using mostly covariance analysis we'll focus on the intergenerational differences, as well as on the socialization process, trying to understand the main differences between generations and, specially, the motives behind those differences. The conclusions reveal not only the impact of the political deinstitutionalization, associated with the individualization process, but also the influence of the values change, related with the post-modernization process. Finally, they show the political impact of two of the main differences between pre and post democracy cohorts - educational level and democratic socialization - reinforcing the importance of generational effects on the Portuguese political, partisan and ideological changes.

The development of the concept of European Identity in European Youth Research

Yndigejn, Carsten

Department of Border Region Studies, University of Southern Denmark Sønderborg, Denmark

Keywords

spatial identity, methodology, european identity, Cosmopolitanism, Youth

The concept of European identity has had a humble position, but none the less a long-term viability in the youth research. It has on one side been set aside by more strong-lived research agendas from the national oriented sociological and cultural research or on the other by the study of the development of the reception of globalised culture and global trends among youth.

The research in the development of European identity among young people has been tracing the development of mental territorial conceptions that correspond with the trans-national mobilities of young people. A strong interplay with the effort of EU to further European integration and unification may not be neglected, but the research shows a wide variability.

The paper will critical examine the efforts to research European identity among young people within the reflexive frame of critical sociological theory of space and identity. It will evaluate both theoretical concepts and empirical research strategies. Finally, the discussion will be contrasted by reflections upon the possibility of developing a true cosmopolitan approach to young people's spatial identities.

The Doughnut in the Nordic Army. Inner and outer compulsion in the health sense and eating practices of conscripts in Finland

Hoikkala, Tommi

the first, Finnish Youth Research Network

Helsinki, Finland

Keywords

totalitarian institutions, young masculinities, health sense, Ethnography

The Defence Forces have been called Finland's biggest training centre according to the official discourse of the Finnish army. The period of service - compulsory for Finnish young men, which is very rare in Europe, comparatively - offers a unique opportunity to explore the health sense and eating practices of young men. In addition, the army can be seen also as a social field on which boys are socialised into a certain kind of masculinity.

The experience of the conscripts in a total institution will be studied. Even if the conscript's life is rather controlled by the power system of army, there is a space for the freedom of choice, which is often materialized in the form of pizzas, hamburgers and doughnuts.

In this project, the methods of multi-disciplinary youth research have been applied in the Kainuu Brigade. One aim is to define what the conscript's responsibility is on his own eating practices and health behaviour. Secondly, we ask to what extent life in general and eating practices in the army are defined by outer compulsion (official food supply in the army) and to what extent the conscript bears the consequences of his choices on eating practices? Thirdly, we ask what the significance of the social group context is - including group norms and group control - in the army and in these choices, and what kind of health sense all this reflects? The choice of the Kainuu Brigade as study setting was justified by the garrison's northern location which allows the study of the northern young masculinities as well.

Ethnographic data (field work of several months and 52 thematic interviews) was collected by research team Tommi Hoikkala & Mikko Salasuo (Finnish Youth Research Network) in the Kainuu Brigade during 2008 in order to answer the research questions.

The Eastern European model of transition into adulthood - myth or fact

Krzaklewska, Ewa

Institute of Sociology, Jagiellonian University

Kraków, Poland

Keywords

Eastern Europe, transition into adulthood, Youth

The regional models of youth transitions have been referred to since the beginning of the studies on the topic. 'Mediterranean' and 'Nordic' models of transitions were described by Galland already in the 90s. Recently, Walther has written about universalistic, liberal, sub-protective and employment-centered transition regimes within the 'old' European Community. Significantly enough, none of those typologies included Eastern European countries.

As youth in Eastern European countries has encountered quite similar political and economical changes, as well as all has been under the influence of the Western values, we might suspect that the transitions patterns among those countries could be similar (and often it is taken for granted, even in academic literature). Still, there are many traits that differentiate those countries (e.g. size, religion, percentage of urbanised areas). Therefore, the aim of my article will be to analyse if the 'Eastern European model of transition' does exist and, if so, what are its distinctive characteristics.

In my analysis, I will use the quantitative data from the European Social Survey (round 3) and include countries that have taken part in the project. This dataset will allow me to compare Eastern European countries with one another, as well as to compare them to the rest of Europe.

What has to be taken most care of, and what is often a mistake in the transnational/European analyses, is the usage of theoretical background, concepts and rationale created on the basis of data and contexts from the Western European countries.

The education and socialization sites of youth: Experiences and representations in a non-school context

Palhares, José

*Sociology of Education and Educational Administration, University of Minho
Braga, Portugal*

Keywords

youth movements, Non-school education (non-formal and informal education), juvenile experiences, meaningful contexts and learning, scouting

There are many studies inspired by multiple theoretical models strictly related to schooling, with sociology [of education] having almost exclusively centred its attention on the formal teaching system, on school and schooling processes. However, as far as the non-school sub-field and its relation with school are concerned, there is a certain scientific underdevelopment, despite the consensus on the need to redirect the sociological look to other educational objects of relevant heuristic potential.

Our proposal, here, is guided by shifting the debate to other less saturated spheres of educational knowledge, mainly to those that allow for other angles of analysis to understand the educational process globally, namely the search for answers to some issues raised when we cross the social condition of young people of today with the multiplicity of sites and experiences that the city offers them. As everyday life is so fertile in learning possibilities, which conditions drive young people to give them distinct meanings and values? How are the different experiences summed up and translated into the construction of youth identities and subjectivity? What is the underlying logic to investment and participation in the different non-school activities and how does this articulate with wider projects for education and citizenship?

The empirical information that we use in the second part of this paper emphasizes a non-school youth movement - Portuguese boy-scouts -, in as far as it is represented as a context where the issues structuring our thought intersect: school and non-school education, young people and their social condition, social experience and action. This centenary youth movement developed on the whole planet, supported by an educational project, which holds young people responsible for their own education. The scout is invited to be active in the discovery of life's personal and collective meanings in a logic of collective citizenship and democracy, which, in our opinion, is indicative of a process of meaningful education emerging from action and by action. The data reveal expressively young people's look on the diversity of the worlds they live in, from a non-school educational context, which provides them with a detailed map of benchmarks for action.

The female presence in the juvenile delinquency: invisible trajectories

Duarte, Vera

Faculdade de Ciências Sociais, Universidade Católica Portuguesa Portugal,

Keywords

trajectories of life, Gender, Female juvenile delinquency, social (in)visibility

This poster results from a survey that is being developed as part of my PhD in sociology on female juvenile delinquency. The poster presents the intercross of two major purposes. First, it brings into relief some preliminary data from this study that has sought to understand the meanings that young girls, in compliance with protective education measures, build and attach to transgressive practice in their paths of life, and reveal, from their experiences and views, the interactive contexts where these practices are developed. These objectives have underpinned the methodological choices of operating reports and the construction of biographical stories of life.

Secondly, intends to give visibility to a phenomenon that has been referred to a footnote. Media, public discourse and policy, statistics and scientific studies, sharing the conviction that female juvenile deviance is less represented, minor and do not constitute a social problem, has produced a gender-blindness (Dougherty, 1993 in Shaw & Dubois, 1995) little watchful to the possibility of boys and girls experience and use violence for different reasons, under different circumstances and as a result of different histories and contexts of belonging to gender.

The gender gap in educational success - Results of a quantitative study in Switzerland

Hadjar, Andreas

Department of Sociology of Education, University of Bern Bern, Switzerland

Lupatsch, Judith

Project "Faule Jungs", School of Teacher Education, University of Applied Sciences Bern, Bern

Keywords

gender differences, school achievement, gender concepts

The gender gap in school performance and educational attainment is highly considered in the public discourse. Before the educational expansion that began in the 1960s, girls achieved lower educational levels than boys. Girls benefited much from the educational expansion in Europe. In some countries (e.g. Germany, Switzerland), girls are now more likely than boys to transit to upper secondary schools and show better performances than boys in some subjects and overall results.

Attempting to explain this gender gap, we employ a theoretical framework that consists of elements of general theories on motivation and school achievement, as well as approaches on gender role stereotypes and social integration. Following Cornelissen et al. (2003), only boys who inherit traditional gender roles and who devalue gender neutral or female attitudes and behaviours will have problems in school. The traditional image of male identity which includes roles of the dominant, the go-getter or even the deviant is least compatible to the contemporary school. Other pedagogic approaches highlight the different learning behaviour: Weinert and Helmke (1997) diagnose a "lazybones syndrom" regarding boys. Boys more often show lower effort and have a lower sense of duty than girls.

Our analyses will be based on quantitative data that was gathered in the project on "Lazy boys and ambitious girls" (University of Berne/School of Teacher Education Bern). 800 Swiss school students at the age of 14 have been interviewed using a standardised questionnaire.

Preliminary results indicate that girls and boys differ in their school marks less than expected. However, educational success is influenced by gender role orientations of boys and girls. Another expected finding is that boys have more traditional gender role attitudes than girls. This applies in particular to boys from a low-education-background. Girls rather prefer values of prosociality which also support their integration into school and therefore lead to a higher educational success. Girls are also more future-oriented than boys which seems to be an additional reason for their motivation to perform well at school.

The Impact of Local in Two Global Subcultures: Hip-Hop and Metal in Estonia

Kobin, Maarja

*Centre for Lifestyle Studies, Tallinn University, Institute of International and Social Studies
Tallinn, Estonia*

Araste, Lii

*Centre for Lifestyle Studies, Tallinn University, Institute of International and Social Studies
Tallinn, Estonia*

Keywords

metal, information technology., glocalization, hip-hop, subculture

The impact of local in two global subcultures: hip-hop and metal in Estonia

Lii Araste and Maarja Kobin araste@tlu.ee

maarja.kobin@gmail.com

Tallinn University

Institute of International and Social Studies

Centre for Lifestyle Studies

Subcultures play an important role in today's youth cultures. Local scenes (whether national or regional) are part of international subcultures. In the other hand, the local determinations play an important role in shaping the global subcultures which have been imported. In the time of information technology the global subcultures have expanded its grasp so that small marginal groups have an opportunity to present themselves internationally and that peripheral youth can participate in international subcultures.

The focus of this paper is the global impact to the locality and local identities and vice versa - the impact of local determinations, social and cultural needs, to the imported global subcultures (the process of glocalization). The paper investigates two local music scenes and subcultures: hip-hop culture in a small province town named Rakvere in Estonia and Estonian metal subculture. The aim is to investigate how the youth in these two subcultures evaluate the local scene in relation to the international subculture level and how they evaluate the impact of international subculture to their local subculture.

The paper draws on empirical research, altogether 26 open-ended interviews and participant observation, conducted in Rakvere hip-hop scene and Estonian metal scene.

Keywords: subculture, glocalization, hip-hop, metal, information technology.

The Importance of Demographic Markers in the Transition to Adulthood in Europe

Murinko, Livia

-, HCSO Demographic Research Institute
Budapest, Hungary

Speder, Zsolt

-, HCSO Demographic Research Institute
Budapest, Hungary

Keywords

young adulthood, transition markers, life-course, European Social Survey

Transition to adulthood is usually regarded as a complex, multi-dimensional, "demographically dense" phase of the life-course. Successive life periods can be differentiated from one another on the basis of various criteria: biological or psychological development, chronological age, demographic markers, individualistic criteria or idiosyncratic events. All approaches acknowledge the relevance of life-course markers in this process, even if they doubt their relative importance. The traditional, event-based definition of the transition to adulthood examines such events as completion of schooling, entering employment, becoming financially independent, leaving the parental home, getting married and having children as the demographic markers of reaching adult status.

Many studies have investigated the timing of these markers in Europe to find an answer to the dilemma of convergence or divergence of behavior. However, the subjective importance of markers in the transition process has not been systematically examined and compared. The third wave of European Social Survey (ESS; 2006), containing data on 25 European countries, could help understand the similarities and differences in the conception of the transition to adulthood from an international perspective. ESS included questions on the importance of the following life-course events for a man or a woman to be considered adult: leaving the parental home, having a full-time job, living with a spouse or a partner and becoming parent. Our main question relates to the relative importance of these factors in the subjective construction of becoming adult: whether spatial and financial independence from parents or the establishment of one's own family is the most salient landmark of adulthood in different regions of Europe?

Both the national and individual levels are important if we want to understand the similarities and differences in the subjective construction of adulthood. We use multi-level analysis to estimate the effect of country-level institutional characteristics (e.g. educational system, housing and labor market), welfare regimes, values and attitudes (e.g. religion, the importance of work, family or children in life, the ideal age for different life transitions), as well as the actual occurrence and timing of events in the transition to adulthood of European men and women.

The labour market, the welfare state and the family: Has the focus of the welfare triangle as supporter of young adults changed?

Majamaa, Karoliina

*Department of Social Policy, University of Helsinki
Helsinki, Finland*

Keywords

parents, young adults, support, welfare triangle

Young adults live in the society where improved technology and communication together with globalization have changed the structure of the labour market. Shift to this knowledge-based society has influenced on young adults' labour market transitions and situation. First of all, transition to labour force has postponed because of increasing importance of education. Secondly, despite of increasing skill levels, the education does not guarantee the job. Thirdly, the number of atypical employment, for example, part-time, temporary and shift work has become more common. More widely reviewed, these changes in the circumstances together with changes in family structure are related to the concept of new social risks.

Increasing insecurity in the labour markets and retrenchments in welfare state programs are raising the question if the focus of the welfare triangle as supporters of young adults has changed, also in the Nordic countries. In the article is examined the ways in which Finnish welfare state supports young adults in their needs that stem from changes in the labour market and its functions, and how certain social benefits and services, which are related to these needs, have changed in Finland after 1990s regression. The main research question is: Has the focus of the welfare triangle as supporter of young adults changed?

The paper concentrates on two needs of young adults; economic security while young adults are partly or wholly out of labour market and child care services. According to results, it seems that especially those young adults who live on basic security, e.g. labour market subsidy, basic unemployment or student financial aid, are in a vulnerable economic position because these benefits and allowances have substantially fallen behind the earned-income after 1990s regression. Finnish parents have an extensive, under school age, children's day-care-system which helps them to combine work and family life perhaps easier than in many other European countries. However, there is still need for more flexible child-care arrangements among parents with atypical employment and for school-age children. It can be argued that the Finnish welfare state has tried to move the focus of welfare producer more to the family or the labour market.

The Learning System and Young People's Transition from School to the Labour World. The Relation with Knowledge: forms and identity temporalities

Almeida, Maria Sidalina

Social Work, Instituto Superior de Serviço Social do Porto

Senhora da Hora, Portugal

Keywords

youngster's transition, subjective pathways, relationship with knowledge, identifying processes

Poster

Summary: Emphasizing the transition paths dynamics of youngsters belonging to a more popular social environment and considering youth as a unique phase in the course of life concerning socialization and identifying construction processes, we consider the subjective pathways as a fundamental dimension for the building up of their own paths. We consider that operations of sense production by the youngsters send for a transitory order that overcomes chronological time as much as this transitory order articulates simultaneously a present time, a time of new significance of the past and a time of future projection. The transition experiences into the labour world are for us understood as subjective practices, being our analysis focused upon the recurring build up of the relationship with knowledge and upon an identifying recurring build up operated during the transition period through the frequency of a transition device - the apprenticeship system. What concerns the youngster's recurrent enrolment for training activities as a system based on apprenticeship to integrate labour world, that is, to the knowledge and to the professional activities of occupation were considered, not only, the anticipation capacity of professional projects as, it became the condition itself so that youngster were also able to "recurrently enrol" themselves in a school and for studies, allowing them to have access to a high level school certificate. Regarding the value labour, this "recurrent enrolment" in a school and for studies starting from training experiences was strongly anchored upon these young ones popular ethos. If this value labour enhanced a continuity with "essence" in its biographical transaction sending for a stable cultural inheritance, also the appropriate school clauses, that took place during regular school period, allowed continuities "of form and essence" crucial to training participation. Therefore if transition time offers a space of "possible opportunities areas" to these young ones it is impossible not to recognize that "the modern is partly made with the old", that the relationship with knowledge is a process and that the identifying construction is permanent.

The living conditions of youth in Germany and the risk of relative deprivation

Popp, Sandra

Joblessness and Social Inclusion, Institute of Employment Research Germany,

Keywords

relative deprivation, Poverty, Youth

Poverty can reduce the opportunities for participation in social and economic life. For young people in particular, poor finances can constrain their development and socialisation opportunities. But there currently exists a consensus that being poor does not only mean a lack of financial resources. It means, more generally, a lack of resources enabling a basic standard of living and social participation. Therefore being poor is not only a question of low income but also of access to living conditions that are common in a given society. The deprivation approach focuses directly on living conditions and is widely accepted as an indicator of poverty. People are identified as poor if they cannot afford goods or social activities which are perceived as social necessities, for example a warm meal a day. In Germany there exist rare information about the relative deprivation of youth and young adults, despite the fact that they are a special risk group. One aim of the study is therefore to explore in more detail the access of youth and young adults to a commonly accepted standard of living. In a next step the study analyses risk factors of relative deprivation. Especially the household constellation and the employment status of the youth and young adults could play an important role for their living conditions. The analysis is based on the household panel 'Labour Market and Social Security' of the Institute for Employment Research (IAB) which provides detailed informations about the living conditions of the youth. The analysis refers to a subsample of about 4000 youth and young adults between 15 and 29 years.

The long and winding road - exploring transitions of young people 'at risk'

Aaltonen, Sanna

*Department of Sociology, University of Helsinki
Helsinki, Finland*

Keywords

Transitions, multiprofessional services, 'at risk'

In this paper I discuss transitions of young women and men considered to be at risk to be marginalized from the educational system or from their peer groups. I understand transitions here in a broad sense to include different kinds of, sometimes discontinuous paths, processes and chances related to education and work but also to housing, family and leisure time. The paper is based on my research for which I have interviewed 32 ninth graders participating in Helsinki-based multiprofessional services offering support for young people in order to complete comprehensive school and to prevent marginalization. Many of these 15-17-year old young people have a history of poor school achievement, truanting, delinquent behavior and/or abuse of intoxicants and they may have already gone through more interventions and transitions in terms of their education, leisure or even housing than most of their peers. In the paper I will examine the classed and gendered nature of their lived and imagined transitions. Further, I will ask what kind of significance young women and men give to their past experiences and how do they understand and draw upon the resources available to them in planning their futures.

The Long Transition to Adulthood in Italy: Parental Help and Youth Autonomy

Santoro, Monica

*Department of Social and Political Studies, University of Milan
Milan, Italy*

Keywords

young people, family relations, transition to adulthood, leaving parental home, parental support

Italy is one of the European countries with the highest percentage of young people living in the family of origin. Several pieces of research tried to explain this "syndrome of delay" of Italian young people by advancing the influences of structural factors or the specificity of family relations. Certainly, the lack of social policies, the spread of temporary job contracts and an unfavourable housing market are among the greatest obstacles to attain housing independence. In these conditions, the support of the family of origin is essential to overcome the steps of transition to adulthood. Housing independence is achieved with the economic support of parents who are usually ready to help their children when they get married. That is why in Italy marriage is the legitimate event which still today decrees the attainment of housing autonomy and alternative family forms (such as cohabitation) are not widespread. Parents continue to support their children even after they form an independent family by offering them financial help and grandchildren care. Based on the results of a qualitative research carried out among parents and young people living in the family of origin, we tried to reconstruct the exchange patterns between parents and children and the existing reciprocity forms, also considering mutual expectations in terms of family support network on which both generations suppose to rely in the future. Then the research tried to verify how the continuous support by parents could delay the acknowledgement of adult responsibilities and prevent young people's final separation from the family of origin.

The New Political Culture: Common Characteristics of Political Participation of Youth in Turkey

Ozen, H. Ege

*Political Science, Istanbul Bilgi University
Istanbul, Turkey*

Keywords

political culture, Civil Society, Youth, politics, participation

The field of political culture is often generalized and universalized in terms of earliest works in the field and is ignored outside certain areas of Western political behavior. However, political culture as a field has potential to deal with many critical issues across comparative analysis of different societies. Political participation of youth is one of these most important issues and it holds the capability to understand new patterns of changing political culture in developing countries. The reconstruction and reinstitutionalization of the authoritarian Turkish state after the military intervention of September 12, 1980 started to melt by the end of the 1980s and continued during the 1990s in harmony with the fall of one authoritarian regime after another in the aftermath of the Cold-War paradigm. But democracy is not something that can be exported like any commodity in the capitalist world system. Rather, it is a common understanding and a social contract to live together by recognizing ethnic, cultural, and religious differences within the society and active participation of citizens is one of the most crucial steps of making democracy. This paper argues that political participation of youth, who are defined as key actors shaping the change in political culture, is a fundamental constituent makes democracy achievable. It is based on a qualitative research conducted between June 2008 and January 2009 through focus groups (6 sessions with 35 participants, who are members of five NGOs and also a labor union, aged between 18 and 26) and it discusses three themes by analyzing the research inferences related with common characteristics of political participation of youth in Turkey: the shared position towards the political autonomy of the military in Turkey, the consensus about social class differences and poverty as one of the most important problems in Turkey and a common understanding of democracy as an absent principle of Turkish politics.

The relationship of self-esteem to body image evaluation in adolescent girls

Cunha Silvestre, Maria João

*CAPP, Superior Institute of Social and Political Sciences-Technical University of Lisbon
Lisbon, Portugal*

Keywords

adolescent girls, body image evaluation, self-esteem

Over last years, body image has become a major issue in our consumption society and has thus developed into an important theoretical and empirical subject. By living in a "visual" society, we build our body image in a reflexive way, through socialization and observation of others.

The concept of body image has evolved from psychological and sociological theories and comes to comprehend a mix of self-perceptions, ideas and feelings on the individual's physical attributes, thus connected to self-esteem and emotional stability. It may then be defined as the way in which the individual perceives his own body, as a unique object, dynamically constructed by social interactions, according to cultural patterns.

In adolescence, as a special stage of identity construction, body image plays a nuclear role. It is a stage of surprise and insecurity towards body transformations and one of the most difficult tasks for the teenager is to accept his physical self within an emergent identity. As such, it is at this moment that society's stereotypes and pressures can most influence the teenager's self-acceptance and self-evaluation, which is particularly true for girls. When social expectations contradict the adolescent's self-perception, problems in self-esteem may arise - and self-esteem is the feeling about the self that will provide a coherent psychological basis to deal with social reality requests.

Bearing these questions in mind, the aim of our paper is to understand the relationship between self-esteem and body image evaluation in adolescent girls. Although some studies consider a relation between self-esteem and physical appearance, it is still not clear how and at what levels.

In order to explore this relationship, we make use of Rosenberg's self-esteem scale, self-ideal discrepancy model and body satisfaction subscale from Eating Disorders Inventory (EDI) to assess body image evaluation. We applied a self-administration survey by questionnaire to a sample of 625 adolescent girls in Sintra's public secondary schools.

The results point to medium and low levels of self-esteem and to related high levels of body dissatisfaction. In this relationship we also consider socio-demographic, BMI and social comparison factors.

The Social Forge - Cooperation and individual performance among young male climbers

Nilsen, Ake

*School of Health and Social Sciences, University of Halmstad
Halmstad, Sweden*

Keywords

Masculinity, experience, Performativity, subculture, Bouldering

Based on an ethnographic fieldwork on climbers this paper explores the relation between the group and the individual in the context of risk-performance. In the subculture of Bouldering (a kind of climbing) the performance of the single climber is dependent on the creativity and cooperation of the group with an ongoing negotiation between the participants. The paper focuses changing gender identities among young male climbers and challenges mainly the concept of "hegemonic masculinity" (Connell) with the help of "performativity" (Butler) and "experience-oriented" actions (Schulze).

The stratification of literacy European space using youth performances in PISA scales: reading, mathematics and science

Carvalho, Helena

*Department of Quantitative Methods, Lisbon University Institute ? ISCTE
Lisboa, Portugal*

Ávila, Patrícia

*Department of Quantitative Methods, Lisbon University Institute ? ISCTE
Lisboa, Portugal*

Pacheco, Pedro

*Department of Quantitative Methods, Lisbon University Institute ? ISCTE
Lisboa, Portugal*

Keywords

PISA scales, space of literacy, profile-types, Principal Components Analysis for Categorical Data (CatPca)

Since 2000, PISA (Programme for International Student Assessment) has been focused on assessing the acquisition of knowledge and skills 15 year olds need in future life rather than the mastery of the school curriculum. This study covers three core domains of student literacy - reading, mathematics and science - with an in-depth study of each in a three year cycle. These major domains were reading literacy in 2000, mathematical literacy in 2003 and, finally, scientific literacy in 2006.

Our main goal is to map European space in terms of these skills using as our starting point the fact that the countries' profiles are simultaneously structured by these assessed domains.

It is therefore essential to explore the profile configurations of the countries, handling the interrelationships between the three assessed domains using a multivariate method of data analysis: Principal Components Analysis for Categorical Data (CatPca). This non-linear analysis of principal components allows quantitative variables - performance averages on PISA scales using plausible values - to be combined with qualitative variables, in this case, the country (Gifi 1996; Meulman et al., 2004). By applying CATPCA, from 2000 until 2006, profile-types were identified and because we overlapped the country position in the structure defined by those variables, we distinguish groups of European countries with similar profiles.

Besides the strong association among the three domains and the heterogeneity observed in groups of countries, we find a stratified European space in reading, mathematics and science literacy.

In order to evaluate if gender and socio-economic status (using HISEI - Highest International Socio-Economic Index) could be seen as moderating variables in that stratified space of literacy we performed two other analyses. In what concerns gender, the data was split and we explored the performance of young male and female European students. Finally another CATPCA was implemented to graphically show the contours between reading, mathematics and science literacy and socio-economic status.

Thirty-Somethings: The First European Generation? A comparison of family and gender attitudes and practices

Laaksonen, Helena

Finnish Social Science Data Archive, University of Tampere Finland,

Oinonen, Eriikka

Department of Social Reserach, University of Tampere Tampere University, Finalnd

Keywords

Europeanization, age, time period, comparative reserach, Generation

We hypothesise that the cohort born in 1965-1974 could form a generation in the Mannheimian sense. We compare them with two earlier ten-year cohorts in France, Poland, and Spain trying to find generation, age, and period effects. Using World Values Survey (years 1990 and 1999) and International Social Survey Programme (2002) and statistical data, we find evidence on generation and period effects: The younger cohort's permissiveness towards alternative forms of couple formation, women's participation in working life and its effect on children (generation effect). Similar trends are revealed in all three cohorts (period effect) and case countries. In most issues, the country specific differences remained.

Total Capital of the Youth in Latvia

Menshikov, Vladimir

Institute of Social Investigations, University of Daugavpils
<http://sociovm.dau.lv/>,

Ms. Boronenko, Vera

Institute of Social Investigations, University of Daugavpils
Daugavpils, Latvia

Keywords

living strategy, Youth, total capital, capital

At the end of the 20th century - in the beginning of the 21st century, the theory of capital, an enormous contribution to the development of which belongs to P.Bourdieu, has been being used more often. In the given article the necessity and possibility of the bolder use of the theory of capital for the analysis and estimation of the situation in different spheres of public life are substantiated. In particular, in the project "Paradigms of Education: Sociological approach", carried out in 2008 by the sociologists of the Institute of Social Investigations at Daugavpils University, a significant part was assigned to the theory of capital. It was supposed to find out how different factors of capital influenced the living strategies of the young and which paradigm of education met the challenges of the 21st century. The aim of the investigation was to overcome the fragmentariness of the use of the theory of capital. In order to achieve the aim an extensive classification of the types of capital was worked out, the indicators of their measuring were introduced. The determination of the volume of total capital and of its separate types, the age specificity of real and desirable resources and their use realizing living strategies, the basic factors that determine the total capital of a personality and the dynamics of its structure in different age groups of the young present the novelty of the given investigation.

On the whole, the empirical data have proved the hypothesis: the volume of capital of a personality depends on the level of education, the level of income and the chosen living strategy. The increase of total capital may be found in all three age groups of the youth aimed at the strategy of success.

Traditional and post-traditional life course

Elchardus, Mark

*Sociology - Research group TOR, Vrije Universiteit Brussel
Brussels, Belgium*

Roggemans, Lilith

*Sociology / Research group TOR, Vrije Universiteit Brussel
Brussels, Belgium*

Keywords

life perspective, self realization, adolescents

The paper looks at life course perspectives, i.e. the expectations of young adults with regard to their further life. The analysis is based on a purely random sample of 2832 inhabitants of Flanders (Belgium), aged 18 to 36. The identification of life course perspectives is based on information concerning the importance people want to attach to their primary and secondary social networks in the future, on the way in which they plan to spend their leisure time, the importance they want to give to partner, children and household, compared to other pursuits. On the basis of a principle component analysis 2 dimensions or desired life paths are distinguished. The first (family path) is characterized by a priority of the primary network, a desire to have children and spent time with them, as well with the partner and in the household, a home centered leisure time. The second path (ego path) attaches more importance to the secondary network, envisions active leisure outside the home, high levels of cultural participation and frequent (world)travel. Cluster analysis reveal 4 clusters of which the first (43% of sample) comprises people with an exclusive preference of the family path and the second (26%) an exclusive preference for the ego path.

Preference for the family path is higher among religious people and women. Preference for the ego path is influenced by the desire for self realization. The paths do also appear as rationalizations of the life stages of the respondents: the more life course transitions they have completed, the stronger the preference for the family path. Preference for the ego path strongly declines with age. On the basis of cross sectional analysis it is not possible to determine whether this should be interpreted as an age or a cohort effect, but since the model controls for completed life course stages, it seems plausible to interpret it as a cohort effect: the ego path is a life course perspective induced by a shift in conceptions of self realization, but that is difficult to square with the existing family patterns and social meanings of the life stages.

Transition to Adulthood and Young's Labour Precarity

Tejerina, Benjamín

*Sociología 2, Universidad del País Vasco
Leioa, Spain*

Santamaría, Elsa

*Sociología 2, Universidad del País Vasco
Leioa, Spain*

Keywords

labour precarity, youth transitions, biography, Emancipation

This communication takes into account the new forms of biographical models for young people in a context of labour precarity. Transitions to adulthood are becoming increasingly destandardised, diverse and individualized due to profound processes of change in the labour market which has produced important variations in the way previous transitions from education to employment used to happen.

In the modern European context, transitions from education to work have become much more complex, and the transitions from the parental home to an independent household happen later. As a result young people remain dependent on their families for much longer periods than previously.

We claim that the change in this biographical model is reflected not only in demographical, structural and economical changes but also in subjective and cultural ones.

Several issues are proposed as guides to understand these biographical changes: the increase in the educational level, the restructuring of labour markets, the change of family patterns, the national and European public policies, the expectative created by the educational system, the meaning of adulthood and the attitudes towards education and employment.

The information that we analyse comes from a research that was carried out with 1200 young people about the changes in the meaning of work and its centrality in their lives. Apart from that we also worked with several focus groups in which the participants talked about their biographies and their trajectory towards the independence from the family's house.

Trapped in poverty - Labour market mobility of young social benefit recipients in Germany

Schels, Brigitte

Joblessness and Social Inclusion, Institute for Employment Research (IAB)

Nuremberg, Germany

Keywords

young adults, benefit dependency, labour market

The study explores the labour market mobility of young social benefit recipients in Germany and their chances to quit benefit dependency by integration into employment or training. The political and public discourse in Germany mostly perceives long-term poverty and benefit receipt of youth and young adults as a consequence of welfarization processes. This thesis can be discussed by three different theoretical perspectives. The first refers to rational-choice arguments: The young benefit recipients' incentives to take up employment are reduced if benefits are relative high and if they live in an adequate financial situation despite benefit dependency. Second, the concept of learned helplessness argues that permanent benefit dependency is the result of a line of disappointments on the labour market. People arrange with a living on benefits if they experience no or low employment perspectives. Third, the approach of a 'culture of poverty' states that the poor are detached from the values and norms of society. It is assumed that children growing up in welfare families adopt a low work motivation. The study assesses these three hypotheses. It takes a look at following questions: Are low employment perspectives and ongoing benefit dependency of young welfare clients affected by the individuals' financial situation, repeated unemployment or a low work motivation? Does the labour market mobility of young benefit recipients depend on social origin?

To answer these questions the study explores the employment mobility and chances to leave benefit dependency of 650 18- to 24-year-olds that have started to receive benefits in January 2005. The analysis is based on the survey 'Life Circumstances and Social Security 2005' of the Institute for Employment Research (IAB), Germany and longitudinal register data of the Federal Employment Agency. Data cover a period of three years, 2005 to 2007.

Understanding Poverty From Poor Young People's Experiences: Thinking Over the Reproduction Processes of Poverty in Turkey

Aktas Yamanoglu, Melike

*Faculty of Communication, Ankara University
Ankara, Turkey*

Keywords

Poverty, Social exclusion, poor youth, disadvantaged youth, reproduction of social hierarchy

The aim of this study is to unfold the meaning of poverty from the poor young people's narratives. The field research based on semi-structured interviews with 65 poor young people living in Ankara's poor sub-urban areas, manifested that these young people experience poverty as a multi-dimensional problem. From these young people's accounts, poverty being experienced is beyond the material deprivation and includes different types of social exclusion processes. According to their expressions the meaning of being "poor young" adds different connotations to both "poverty" and also being "young", which makes their experiences unique.

The life conditions of these young people prevent them to reach better life standards in the future, reproduces social hierarchy and class based distinctions. In this study, Turkish poor youth's life conditions contributing the reproduction of poverty will be analysed through education, labour market relationships and physical and social environment subheadings. While relationships with educational processes defeat and eliminate these young people at the beginning of the game, inadequate educational levels lead them to get vulnerable positions in the labour market and physical and social settings contribute to the "stigmatization" of these young people. Following to inequalities in opportunities and conditions, their life chances to enhance their capabilities and life qualities are restricted, besides building secure future for themselves is difficult to accomplish. By being subject to these life conditions from the early childhood, poor young people internalize poverty and their subaltern positions. As Pierre Bourdieu expresses with the term "habitus", mutual relationships between the mental structures and social structures assign the limits of what is possible and not possible in these young people's lives, their life chances and their dispositions in various subjects.

This study aims to discuss different conceptualisations and dimensions of poverty in different contexts by putting forward the poor youth's expressions and highlight how disadvantaged life conditions transform into poverty reproduction mechanisms by focusing on the consistency between social structures and cognitive structures

Understanding Trust and Confidence among Young Adults - what can a Life Course Perspective Contribute?

Grosse, Julia

Institute for Civil Society Studies, Ersta Sköndal University College Stockholm, Sweden

Keywords

young adults, life course, trust

The European debate on life course has often focused on transitions, in particular when discussing teenagers and young adults. Contemporary life course theorists argue that not only chronological age limits are obsolete but also the idea of fixed rites or experiences that signify growing up can be questioned, if used exclusively, in understanding their view of life.

Research on trust, particularly within sociology and political science, frequently uses empirical sources such as the so called generalized trust question. Critiques of this approach concern questions of uncertain validity, but also the vagueness of the concept of trust. Furthermore, trust has not been studied from a life course perspective.

Thus, the comprehensive objective of this paper is to explore to what extent and how chronological age and the passing of transition markers may be important for the experience of trust. Furthermore, I will attempt to characterize what is meant by trust and confidence among young adults and what kind of expressions trust takes among them.

Data used for this study is twofold. Starting by giving a setting of descriptive statistical figures from the fifth wave of the World Values Surveys I will answer questions of age structure concerning trust in Sweden and selected European countries. If data gathering has been completed I will also present some descriptive results from a unique survey on trust, confidence and risk among Swedish citizens (n= 12 000). The main empirical material, however, comes from qualitative exploratory interviews with young adults with different backgrounds at different stages of experiencing these transitions.

The preliminary results show that age itself is significantly distinguishing people's experience of trust, with widely varying levels within Europe, both generally and concerning particular forms of trust. Nevertheless, do traditional transitions not play a decisive role concerning trust. I will further elaborate on the characteristics of trust that seem to be important for young adults, topics such as dependence-independence, identity and different forms of trust, but also different objects of trust such as persons, institutions or abstract phenomena and figure out in what way a life course perspective can contribute to a deeper understanding of social trust.

Unemployment and the transformation of uncertainty in youth transitions in the New West

Reiter, Herwig

*Institute of Sociology, University of Bremen
Bremen, Germany*

Keywords

uncertainty, post-communism, unemployment, youth transitions

Uncertainty is one of the key features of social change in Eastern Europe after the collapse of communism. Many normality and continuity expectations that had been available for decades became questionable and problematic. The transition of young people to working life constitutes such an area of uncertainty. Here, the introduction of unemployment as a new optional outcome of the transition replaced the previously available certainty of getting a job of any kind. Unemployment became a critical and probable option in people's lives. At the same time, the freedom to choose and opt out of certain pathways redefined the landscape of life chances in which post-communist youth identities evolve. Against this background the paper reflects the ambivalence of uncertainties in youth transitions first empirically, and then conceptually. The empirical discussion introduces a young school drop out from Lithuania. It describes how he establishes an alternative way of life by challenging conventional ways of growing up and by utilising and reproducing uncertainty in a constructive way. In a second step the paper reflects the case conceptually as a representative of the youth transition pattern of liberation, one of three patterns identified in the underlying project. All of these patterns are associated with distinct ways of dealing with the uncertainties related to post-communist unemployment. Finally, the findings are assessed against the background of ongoing debates of social change and uncertainty both within and without youth research.

Urban transformation due to the urbanization of a peripheral region in Switzerland - an European example

Hoemke, Maik

DARCH-gta, ETH Zuerich Switzerland,

Keywords

identity, mobility, local, global, young

A unique process is currently evident in Switzerland that is accelerating and magnifying urban development and expansion at an extreme and unprecedented pace. The building of a new railway tunnels is providing Berne with vastly enlarged commuter belts - representing an extreme convergence between previously peripheral, quite unspoilt regions and the centres.

This development involves the opening of the Lötschberg base tunnel in 2007 - a railway tunnel that closely connects the area known as Oberwallis with the commuting area of the canton of Berne. This has reduced the journey time between Visp and Berne, for example, from two hours to less than one hour.

The metropolis of Berne is now extending out into natural and recreational regions that were previously inaccessible within a practicable time. It will now be possible to commute from these areas to the city very quickly. City-dwellers will be able to live in the green areas and in unorganized nature. The local identity becomes global.

Questionnaire surveys conducted during the present study have shown that there is already a tremendous increase in the demand for accommodation in the peripheral region concerned, especially by young people. Figures for numbers of inhabitants, which have been stagnating for years in the areas affected, have recently increased tremendously. The peripheral area behind the Swiss mountains is becoming continuous with the urban region in front of the mountains. At the same time, it can already be expected that the periphery, untouched nature, will lose its status. The pressure on the local authorities to build new residential accommodation and business premises is too great. More land is being made available and more natural areas are being spoilt.

The peripheral region is having urbanization as a result of people's increasing mobility - while at the same time, however, the development of the centre is left unaffected by the periphery. The peripheral region is becoming urban, but still remain merely a satellite of the metropolis, so that they are losing all of their special qualities. All that is left is urban transformation - the total urbanization of the whole of Switzerland in the middle of Europe.

Value change at youths in Eastern Europe - a longitudinal and cross-national analysis

Rusu, Horatiu

*Sociology, Lucian Blaga University of Sibiu
Sibiu, Romania*

Comsa, Mircea

*Sociology, Babes Bolyai University of Cluj Napoca
Cluj Napoca, Romania*

Keywords

longitudinal and crossnational analyses, Eastern Europe, values

Large-scale studies that developed the last three decades, offered the opportunity for more and more longitudinal and cross-national analyses. European Values Study Series (among other like WVS, ISSP, ESS, and EES) is one of them. Many comparative studies using EVS data were published, a lot of them, mainly dedicated to Western European countries, searching for value change and value similarities / dissimilarities (Arts, Hagenaars & Halman, 2003; Arts & Halman, 2004; Ester, Braun & Vinken, 2006; etc).

Although starting with the beginning of 90's EVS extended to East, there are not as many comparative studies dedicated to the Eastern European countries. In our paper, we employ both a longitudinal and cross national analysis, dedicated to value change at youths (people between 18 to 35 in our samples) in Eastern Europe. "What are the trends in youth's values orientations?" and "How do they vary between countries and generations?" are the main research questions in our study.

We move beyond a particularist view of values, that is focused on a specific value domain (i.e. religious values, family values, work values, political values, etc.), and employ a dimensionalist perspective, focusing on a value system. We will use EVS / WVS 1990-2006 data sets from Belarus, Bulgaria, Czech Republic, Estonia, Germany East, Hungary, Latvia, Lithuania, Moldova, Poland, Russian Federation, Serbia, Slovakia, Slovenia, Ukraine, Romania. A special attention is given to Romania, where 2008 data will also be included in the analyses. The main method employed is multi-group confirmatory factor analysis (MG-CFA); we are testing for measurement invariance (configural, metric and scalar) and then compare the means of the latent variables (values).

Work, family and post-graduation: a complex triangle

Reis Jorge, Ana

*Centro de Investigação em Ciências Sociais, Universidade do Minho
Braga, Portugal*

Araújo, Emília

*Centro de Investigação em Ciências Sociais, Universidade do Minho
Braga, Portugal*

Keywords

work, Youth, Family, post-graduation

This paper presents results from a research project made in Portugal about master students through the use of interviews and a survey involving 100 between 20 and 35 years old. Based on the discourse and practices of masters' students as well as their socio-demographic characteristics, this paper underlines the most salient features of their temporal experience when accomplishing this degree. The central question is therefore, the following: How can we conceptualize the modes of living that young people adopt when faced with the need to simultaneously manage work, family and educational demands? . The paper starts from the premise that there is a strong element of ambiguity around this mega-social project to create a society of knowledge: people study and stay in education their whole lives while simultaneously they are assuming and conforming to a life project which is not necessarily desirable insofar as they have no certainty or solid guidelines.

Concretely, the central assumption is that the individual times of young people doing Masters degrees are strongly shaped by the need they feel to develop their degree of employability, evidencing their openness to a permanent availability to the labour market by becoming more competitive and demanding from the point of view of familial and personal time paths. In that line of thought, it is also assumed that Masters becomes a life "phase" in which people deposit their hopes and expectations for increased possibilities of regular formal labor, even though having to simultaneously coping with demands coming from family and personal times as well as from professional activities, even being these precarious.

Young men in the borderlines of virtual and material worlds

Pohjola, Kirsi

Socioal Work and Social Pedagogy, University of Kuopio Kuopio, Finland

Jokinen, Kimmo

*Dep. of Philosophy and Social Sciences, University of Jyväskylä
Jyväskylä, Finland*

Keywords

alcohol and drugs, (informal) education, embodiment and sexuality, internet, identity

The presentation is based on a study of about 20 young men and two kinds of data from the very same group. They are on their twenties. One of them as a key person has recorded all their discussions in the closed chatting-channel. The others gave a permission to print all the discussions from three months, altogether about 140 pages in print. Besides that five of them are interviewed. The questions to be considered from the data are as following: What is the relationship between the "real" life, or should we say material world, and the life in the Net. What kind of (informal) learning experiences can be found in the recordings? The main question behind these very questions is simply: what is it to be a young man in these days? Classified in quantitatively the vast amount of data is dealing with playing war games and using alcohol. What is surprising is the absence of the opposite sex and sexual issues as a whole. The existence of embodiment is remarkable. The boys spent most of their leisure time in the net, playing and communicating with each other. Their bodies and minds, dreams and routines, perhaps whole identities, are deeply influenced by the Net and the channel. In other words, our study gives us new information about the late-modern learning environments and ways of life, and, in a broader sense, what it is like to live in a contemporary society. The new media can be seen as an elementary part of modern growing environments. The question about the virtual media and its relationship to education, life worlds, and learning processes of the adolescents is, it goes without saying, of present interest and scientifically challenge. The new media can be seen as a leading aspect in the formation of communities of the young, and it can also be seen as a field that competes even against the school and working life.

Young people with immigrant background, family life and social positioning

Peltola, Marja

*Sociology, The Finnish Youth Research Network / University of Helsinki
Helsinki, Finland*

Keywords

Family, resources, young people with immigrant background, social positions

My paper discusses young people with immigrant background, the support and resources their immediate social network, especially family, is able to provide them and the ways these intertwine with their life course outside their homes (leisure time, social networks, education) and the social positions they see available for themselves.

Young immigrants' family networks question on multiple levels both the stereotypical images of immigrant families and the very notion of family as traditionally understood in Western societies. Their family networks extend over national borders, as they maintain social ties with family members and other relatives living in their (parents') countries of origin and elsewhere, providing them with an important source of material and emotional support. Contrary to what is sometimes thought, young people with immigrant background do not seem to be willing in great extent to turn their backs to their (parents') culture of origin, but instead value it highly and even use it as a means to distinct themselves positively from their Finnish peers. Especially the close family ties and respect for parents are brought as positive elements.

Social positions and identities are also constructed through different social, (sub)cultural and moral divisions and differences. Access to different resources and capitals, the definitions reserved for young people and their families by the wider society and their self-identifications and disidentifications all contribute to the ways the young people see their position and its possibilities.

Examining the transnational ties and identities on one hand and local environment that constrains, enables and encourages certain positions and identifications on the other hand helps to question the traditional way of seeing membership in a nation state a central foundation of identities. Resources for identity construction are multiple and sometimes even conflicting, and they can be drawn from local, global or transnational levels.

My paper draws from preliminary thoughts of my doctoral thesis project. Its data consists of interviews with young people with immigrant background and their parents.

Young University graduates: between materialist and post-materialist values

Alves, Natália

*Ciências da Educação, Universidade de Lisboa
Lisboa, Portugal*

Keywords

Youth, Work values, university graduates

The work plays a central role in peoples' lives. Work values reveal the importance and the individual convictions about what happens in the working life. They influence the attitudes towards work and the meanings of the work. Researchers as George and Jones (1999) and Vala (2000) conceptualised the work values according to two types: intrinsic and extrinsic values. The first ones correspond to the rewards each one obtains from his/her professional activity (respect, self fulfilment, initiative, autonomy?) and the work is conceived as an end by itself. The second ones are related with the working rewards and conditions (wage, stability, working hours, career opportunities?).

According to Inglehart (1990, 2000) the cultural changes in the advanced industrial societies had an impact on the people's values, behaviours, attitudes and opinions, which replaced the materialists references by the post-materialists ones. In what concerns work these changes can produce the weakness of the work ethic and the reinforcement of attitudes and behaviours towards leisure. Another consequence of these changes can be the decrease of the centrality of work in individuals' lives. The concept of centrality of work is defined by Paullay et al. (1994) as the believes about the importance of work on each one life when compared with others life domains such as: family, friends, leisure, politics and religion.

In this paper we analyse the work satisfaction by reference to the intrinsic and extrinsic values, the attitudes about work and the centrality of work of the university graduates.

From a methodological point of view we use a questionnaire applied to all graduates of the University of Lisbon between 1999 and 2003. The results show that this particular group of young people is less satisfied with the extrinsic dimension of work than with the intrinsic one. They also show that if only a small minority admits the possibility of working less and receiving less the majority reveals a divided attitude about work: they work a lot but they don't let the work to interfere in their family life. At least, for this group more important than the work are the family and the friends.

Youth & Gambling in Denmark

Wittendorff, Nina

*The Danish Centre for Youth Research, University of Aarhus
Copenhagen, Denmark*

Nielsen, Jens Christian

*The Danish Centre for Youth Research, University of Aarhus
Copenhagen, Denmark*

Keywords

Experience-oriented lifestyle, social identity, risk behaviour, Gambling

Youth & Gambling in Denmark

Ph.D. fellow Nina Wittendorff & Ph.D. Research Manager Jens Christian Nielsen

The Danish Centre for Youth Research, Aarhus University, Denmark

In November 2008, the first scientific report on the extent of gambling among young Danes was published. The research was carried out by The Danish Centre for Youth Research in collaboration with The Danish National Centre for Social Research. The report forms a part of the 3-year project Youth & Gambling (2006-2009) by The Danish Centre for Youth Research. In this presentation, we will discuss the most significant results from the project, which comprised a qualitative research part with focus on the youths' fascination and experiences of gambling as well as a prevalence survey.

The prevalence survey concerned youths aged 12 to 17 and their gambling behaviour as measured by scope, time, stakes and types of games. In addition, the connection to other forms of risk behaviour was examined. Thus, the aim of the study was to determine the extent of gambling behaviour among Danish youths, but at the same time also to find out how their gambling behaviour correlates to general youth culture in Denmark. Furthermore, the study demonstrates the correlation between the youths' wellbeing and risk behaviour on the one hand, and their gambling habits on the other.

These topics are further put into perspective by the qualitative research part of the project, in which the experience of the game is in focus, and where the age bracket is increased to include young adults between 15 and 25. It is shown in several different ways how the youths interpret concepts like risk and addiction, and also how they explore social communities, self-identity and sense of the world by help of the games. What, for instance, does the globalization of the gambling market mean for their ways of interacting and the emergence of new social norms?

In closing, the ramifications of these findings are discussed in light of the absence of a common European approach to age requirements, accessibility and legislation that may limit the increase in adolescents with gambling problems.

Youth and Their Political Tendencies in Turkey

Çelik, Kezban

Social Policy, Middle East technical University Ankara, Turkiye

Keywords

political tendencies of youth, unemployment, Youth

In this study, I searched whether there is any relationship between youth unemployment on the one hand and political tendencies on the other. Questions forwarded in other similar studies are used in this study. For this aim, 3 questions were asked for understanding unemployed youth's political action, attitudes and views. The first question is about participation in political actions. The second question is "what kind of society do you think we should be working for?" Seven different types of societies were listed and respondents marked on a three-point scale how strongly they agreed or disagreed. The third question is "where would you put your own political opinion?". Holding political views and political participation is very rare especially among those living with the support of their families. Although the rate of unemployment and youth unemployment in particular is high, this is seen merely as one of the problems related to the economy and addressed within the confines of pure economic considerations. Where unemployment as a problem is conceived merely as a matter of economic development isolated from its political and social dimensions, the likelihood of political marginalisation is scant. Instead of political orientations, unemployment in the context of poverty is associated more with delinquency (theft, etc.) in the case of males and prostitution in the case of females. In other words, there is no "worry" about extreme political tendencies. One of the main assertions of this study is that almost full dependence of the unemployed to their families brings along passive attitudes: seeing their paths to full citizenship closed, unemployed young people find comfort in remaining as members of their families. It is a dependency that limits the political consciousness and orientation of young people.

Youth at Risk: on Results of sociological Study in Regions of Russian Federation

Trofimova, Irina

Center for Comprehensive Social Studies, Institute of Sociology of Russian Academy of Sciences Moscow, Russian Federation

Keywords

youth at risk, risk factors, juvenile delinquency, unfavorable family

This study is a part of "Improving Services for Youth at Risk in the Russian Federation" Project, which in six pilot regions of Russia from October 2006 is being realized. The goal of this study was to identify risk factors for youth.

In each of studied regions were identified purposive samplings of young people aged 12 to 18 years who experience difficult life situation. A standard sample of teenagers (n = 588) was formed in the two subgroups: "having custodial experience of getting a sentence for made offences (including a conditional sentence, conditional early relief, etc.)" and "with no custodial sentences for criminal offences".

Within this study it was very important to identify main reasons for teenagers getting in the risk group and committing crimes. The study showed that the most serious reasons are related with a crisis in family relations due to poverty growth, downfall in living conditions, deterioration of moral values and educative potential of families. Importance of the so-called "exterior" reasons, namely, ineffective youth offence prevention, general crime growth, TV and advertising influence, influence by a child's mates or "bad street children", is valued by respondents as serious enough, although their influence is less intensive as compared to existing problems of an individual family.

As for unfavorable family situations, results of YAR inquiry survey witness significant influence of the factors, namely, incomplete families, family problems like relatives suffering from alcohol abuse, relatives with a police record, low income, permanent scandals, low cultural and educational level of parents.

The analysis showed that except general trends, each of the pilot regions has its certain specifics. In separate regions the most common are drug addiction, youth employment, child neglect and homelessness, juvenile delinquency. For example, Stavropol Region may be called the most "problem territory". Stavropol Region may be called the most "problem" territory. Here, beside most common problems of family (alcoholism and low incomes) are there such negative phenomena as physical violence and family scandals.

Thus, the negative general trends and regional characteristics necessitate the creation of multi-level system of support for young people at risk.

Youth Leisure Careers during Post-Communist Transitions in the South Caucasus

Pollock, Gary

*Sociology, Manchester Metropolitan University
Manchester, UK*

Roberts, Ken

*Sociology, University of Liverpool
Liverpool, UK*

Tholen, Jochen

*Institute Labour and Economy, University of Bremen
Bremen, Germany*

Keywords

Youth, Transitions, post-communism, leisure, south caucasus

This paper reports findings from interview surveys with 1215 respondents, split between the capital cities (Yerevan, Baku and Tbilisi) and one non-capital region (Kotayk, Aran-Mugan and Shida Kartli) in each of the three South Caucasus countries - Armenia, Azerbaijan and Georgia. The respondents, who were drawn from households in larger representative household social surveys, were all born between 1970 and 1976 and were aged 31-37 at the time of the fieldwork in 2007. Their life stage transitions from childhood to adulthood had roughly coincided with their countries' transitions from communism to post-communism. Data was collected on the samples' participation in selected leisure activities from age 16 to 30. Similar data was collected on the samples' careers in education, the labour market, housing and family relationships. This information enables us to identify typical leisure careers and how their development was affected by events in other life domains, all in the context of the macro-changes that were in process in each of the research locations. The evidence enables both personal leisure careers and aggregate leisure trends in different socio-demographic groups to be identified. This shows that changes in leisure behaviour between age 16 and 30 were neither widening nor narrowing the differences between the leisure of males and females, or those who married and became parents on the one hand, then, on the other, those who were still single and childless at age 30. In contrast, differences by place, and by social class, grew progressively wider, thus raising the social costs of geographical and social mobility. Changes in leisure behaviour between age 16 and 30 were separating young adults into those who participated in little, if any, structured out-of-home leisure, whose main leisure spending, if any, was on alcohol and tobacco (typically consumed in homes and neighbourhoods), and those whose leisure was characterised by relatively high and sustained participation in sport, consumption of high culture, and going out to bars, cafes, cinema, discos etc.

Youth life in secure care

Torbenfeldt Bengtsson, Tea

Child and Family, SFI (The Danish National Center of Social Research) Copenhagen K, Denmark

Keywords

vulnerable and threatened youth, Social exclusion, delinquency, Crime

In this paper I will explore the creation of youth life in secure care for children between 12 and 18 years of age. Although a wealth of literature has already investigated secure care the main focus has been placed on the treatment of the youngsters and the risk factors for recidivism. Little is known about the youngster's creation of youth life within the secure setting.

Through an ethnographic field study in two secure units in Denmark, I will provide a rich description of how youth life is created by the youngsters and the role of the almost total exclusion from the outside world - not only in form of locked doors and restrictions of visitors, but also through the deprivation of mobile phones and access to the internet. The aim is to show what is at stake for the youngsters in their creation of a meaningful youth life within the extreme setting of secure care.

With outset in more general theories of youth sociology, I will discuss the proposition that youngsters placed in secure care are not only met with negative sides of the secure residential institutions, they are also met with the negative sides of the individualised modern youth life. Hereby their creation of a positive youth life and trough it meaningful adult identities becomes impossible - not just within the secure setting but also in general.

RN31

Ethnic Relations, Racism and Antisemitism

"I hope I'm not a racist." Racism, antiracism and ethnic absolutism in Britain

Martin, Peter

*Sociology, City University
London, United Kingdom*

Keywords

racism, ethnic absolutism, mixed methods, discourse, attitudes

What happens to racist ideology in times when almost everyone claims that they oppose racism, including representatives of far-right parties whose policies and practices suggest otherwise? Blatant expression of biological racism, racial insults, and open discrimination based on skin colour or ethnicity occur in Britain today, but are ostracized in public discourse and mainstream social life. Nonetheless, racializing distinctions based on allegedly insurmountable cultural differences are widespread, as is the vague or eloquent desire for a culturally homogenous nation. Such cultural racism and ethnic absolutism are contested in public discourse, but not universally condemned. The complex controversies over what constitutes racism presents methodological problems to the social scientist, as few people would like to see themselves as racially prejudiced, and many are wary of the accusation of racism. This paper reports on a mixed methods study of everyday racism in North East London. Data from a postal survey and semi-structured interviews are combined to investigate the relationship between official antiracism, racism, and prejudice in everyday thinking. On the substantial level, the results indicate that racist and antiracist convictions can coexist in people's minds. The denial of racism is not necessarily made in bad faith, but draws on simplistic notions of racism as something that is at all times irrational, hate-driven or violent. On the methodological level, I argue that the contributions of surveys to the study of everyday ideology are underrated by much current sociology. The methodological and theoretical chasm between survey investigations into "attitudes" and textual analysis of "discourse" has no scientific justification and is harmful to the project of understanding contemporary racism.

'As a jew...' Identity claims and the critique of Israel

Wollman, Howard

Health and Social Sciences, Edinburgh Napier University Edinburgh, Scotland

Keywords

identity, Jews, Israel, Antizionism, antisemitism

A feature of public writing in the letters pages of the 'liberal' newspapers in the UK and elsewhere has been the invocation of Jewish identity as a legitimising force in offering critical opinions of Israel before, during and after the war in Gaza. The invocation of this identity has played an important role in the formation of a number of organisations and campaigns critical of Israel. Jews for Justice for Palestinians and Independent Jewish Voices are two prominent examples from the UK. Other supporters and campaigners for Palestinian rights have also made specific and explicit use of Jewish speakers as part of their campaigns. This paper will explore the uses made of these statements of Jewish identity and their place in arguments about anti-Semitism and anti-zionism. Potential tensions exist between criticisms of Israel made from standpoints of universalistic values and those made from a particularistic position. The question is posed as to whether Jewish critiques of Israel are coherently grounded in notions of "universal human emancipation" from jews who have transcended the limitations of a jewish identity (or "gone beyond jewry" as Isaac Deutscher put it) or whether these are cases of a jewish identity that is defined mainly (and negatively) by opposition to Israeli policies or to Zionism in general.

African immigrants and autochthones in the Northwest of Portugal: interethnic relations of accommodation and resistance

Silva, Manuel Carlos

Sociology, University of Minho

Braga, Portugal

Keywords

Immigration, Integration, resistance, interethnic relations, accomodation

The relations between autochthon majorities and immigrant-ethnic minorities are important challenges to democracy and demand a new political management, given that certain historical and current situations have been demonstrating that ethnic identity does not translate an inalterable reality but is relational and has been constituting, according to the Weberian assumption, a source of social divide as important (or even more) as social class identity. The positions of relative social and economical handicap occupied by the members of ethnic and immigrant minorities, aggravated by the external definitions and categorizations by the members of the alleged majority, hold tensions and contradictions that reflect those of the indigenous community or society itself. As theoretical models of intermediate reach we highlight, for example, regarding the question of the cultural and ethnic identity, the fourfold model of acculturation outlined, among others, by the social psychologist J. W. Berry, in which the acculturation, the assimilation, the separation and the marginalization constitute strategic modalities used by social actors in the management of their trajectories between the culture of origin and the culture of the welcoming society, where the concept of "integration" is used as a referential for the different ways of interethnic relationship.

Using evidence from a research made among African immigrants in the Northwest of Portugal, the author questions the functionalist presuppositions of J. W. Berry when it is assumed in an uncritical way the concept of acculturation, seen as a genre regarding the various specific differences. In fact, based on the different levels of analysis advanced by V. Bader, J. W. Berry concentrates on the acculturation and the assimilation but removes from the analysis the manifold constraints, particularly the core question of the economic and political power at the socio-structural, organizational and institutional levels in the welcoming society, and at the level of the daily interactions between the alleged majority and the ethnic minorities. Then, Berry seems to ignore the "hidden records", in J. Scott's words, the forms of passive avoidance and distancing, the instrumental accommodation or the silent resistance, indeed symptomatic of contained ethnic identities like those of the African black immigrants in Portugal.

Anti-Semitism as a religious, social and racial phenomenon - comparative perspective

Budil, Ivo

Department of Anthropology and History, University of West Bohemia Pilsen, Czech republic

Keywords

ideology, race, anti-Semitism

In my contribution I will focus my attention on the various forms of manifestations of the anti-Semitism in the modern Western history in the comparative perspective. I will try to analyze and describe the process of transformation of the traditional forms of anti-Semitism into the new racial form in the second half of the nineteenth century. The intellectual, social and cultural roots of this transformation in the context of the rise of eugenic movement and social darwinism will be analyzed and the reason for the successful integration and resilience of this ideological and very aggressive "bricolage" into the modern Western political culture will be discussed.

Anti-Semitism as an Instrument of the Last Election Campaign in the Czech Republic

Tydlitátová, Vera

Faculty of Philosophy and Arts, The Centre of Middle Eastern Studies,, University of West Bohemia Pilsen, Czech Republic

Keywords

anti-Semitism, populism, elections, democracy. Czech Republic

The great problem of young Czech democracy is its relation between liberty and civic responsibility. A new and difficult question is populism in our political life. This could be seen in the last election campaign in October. Many local politicians and political parties have used arguments from the field of xenophobia, racism and intolerance.

While the members of the major parliament party KDU-SL (the Christian Democratic Party) ODS (the Civic Democratic Party) and small radical parties as for example NS - the National Party used vulgar anti-Gypsy rhetoric with the support of a great deal of the Czech citizenry, and the DS - the Workers' Party used open anti-Semitism.

We may evaluate the election results today. The Workers party got cca 1% votes, which is about 29 000 voters. The National Party was totally marginalized. It is a quite favorable result for democracy but the influence of the Workers Party increases and next time they could be more successful.

The criminalization of anti-Semitic propaganda is needed but it is not efficient enough. More efficient is enlightenment and patient education from an early age. This is also the main idea of the LPA (the League against Anti-Semitism). The League should take legal action against these displays, against the offenders, and against xenophobic publications and texts. The League should write articles and petitions against these displays, should combat the threat in the field of education, and should work with youth.

The tragic situation in our country is caused by the absence of a social culture and historical memory during the Communist era and after the "Velvet Revolution" when nobody required the reflection of history and the society was oriented towards building "wild capitalism". Many people were frustrated by the harshness of the competition in their lives and by personal failure. This frustration sometimes leads people to search for its cause - and this is, for many simple and uncultured people, immigrants, Gypsies and Jews. It is very sad and dangerous that also political parties use this barbarism for their momentary profit.

Antisemitism and Islamophobia in Italy: some reflections on survey data

Padovan, Dario

Department of Social Sciences, University of Turin Turin, Italy

Alietti, Alfredo

Department of Human Sciences, University of Ferrara Ferrara, Italy

Keywords

Islamophobia, antisemitism, racism, Prejudice

Recent survey carried on among Italian people show that antisemitism is a feeling shared by the 30% of population. These data are remarkable but they don't confirm more recent surveys led at European level where antisemitism has been estimated between Italian citizens. Moreover, these surveys are not based on structural hypothesis because they only chronicle attitudes. This paper presents the outcomes coming from a CATI survey led among a representative sample of 1800 Italian national people. Our purposes is to show the main results about Anti-Semitism and Islamophobia in Italy, in particular we should focalize on these following issues:

- ~ The distribution of anti-Semitism among people and the spread of old and new Anti-Semitism.
- ~ The distribution of anti-Semitism among left wing people to understand connections with Anti-Sionistic attitudes.
- ~ The distribution of Anti-Islamism among people and its link with broad form of prejudice.
- ~ The significance of variables such as anomie, ethnocentrism, authoritarian values as causes of anti-Semitism and Islamophobia.
- ~ The connections between Anti-Semitism and Islamophobia
- ~ The definition of a structural model able to explain and predict the diffusion of prejudice feelings between people.

Some of reflections will come from a qualitative study among young targeted people such as Arab/Muslim migrants, young Jews and university students.

Antisemitism in Europe: discourses of denial

Fine, Robert

*Sociology, University of Warwick
Coventry, UK*

Keywords

europe, Critical Theory, antisemitism

One of the difficulties of studying antisemitism today is disagreement over what it is. This difficulty stems, I suggest, from the changing nature of antisemitism itself. In the past antisemites wore their antisemitism on their sleeve. They announced their antisemitism. Today, at least in Europe, there are not many who proclaim an adherence to an overtly antisemitic ideology or declare hatred for Jews. If this contrast between past and present has any resonance, it leaves us with two principal possibilities: either antisemitism has radically declined in Europe or it persists but in a more hidden form than in the past. If it is the former, then to speak of antisemitism when there is no antisemitism can only be the language of delusion or deceit. If it is the latter, then work is required to recognise antisemitism - the work of understanding and judgment. The division, between those who "see" antisemitism as a phenomenon of the past and those who "see" it alive and well in the present, structures much of the literature on contemporary antisemitism. It underlies the opposition between new antisemitism theory and its critics - dubbed by Matti Bunzl "alarmists" and "deniers". Between these polar positions there is much that is in-between but one of the characteristics of the current period is the extent to which these ways of thinking have crystallised into opposing discourses and the more integrated tradition of critical theory has retreated. It is in the context of this dualism that I explore the challenges facing the regeneration of critical theories of antisemitism in our own time.

Antisemitism, Islamophobia and European Identities

Letzmann, Doerte

*History, Royal Holloway University of London
Egham, Surrey, United Kingdom*

Keywords

Germany, antisemitism, Islamophobia, Britain

In this paper, the comparability of Antisemitism and Islamophobia will be explored.

While Antisemitism in Europe often appears in extremist fringes, there is also a quantitative rise of anti-Jewish resentment in liberal and intellectual circles that is mainly articulated through hostility against Israel. At the same time, anti-Muslim attitudes appear relatively open in mainstream European discourses and Muslims face individual and institutional discrimination. The appearance of Antisemitism and Islamophobia beyond extremist circles makes it necessary to analyse to what extent these phenomena are possibly part of deeply culturally entrenched and traditionalised social patterns. How do they relate to racism? How are they similar and different to each other? To what extent do they act in combination with each other or in competition with each other?

Drawing on preliminary findings using an interdisciplinary methodological approach, this paper will look at the roles anti-Jewish and anti-Muslim resentments play within national or European identity formation, if and how these roles differ and how they vary between different European nations, specifically between Britain and Germany. For this purpose, the history and appearance of Antisemitism and Islamophobia in Britain and Germany will be compared, general national and European discourse trends regarding these forms of social hostility will be explored and specific representations of Jews and Muslims in both countries will be analysed and contrasted.

Antisemitism, multiculturalism and European diversity: The British case

Sicher, Efraim

*Foreign Litewratures, Ben-Gurion-University of the Negev
Beer-Sheva, Israel*

Keywords

nation, Multiculturalism, European diversity, antisemitism

Sociologists and cultural theorists in Britain have recently engaged in a discourse that eliminates Jews as a nation, while diaspora has been redefined as a heterogenous bonding of multiethnic hybridity. This paper relates these developments to the perception of Jews in the debate over the nation and nationalism, in the context of race discourse. Comparison is made with responses to European unification in Italy and Poland.

Assessing Antisemitism - Theoretical Reflections on Criteria

Jikeli, Gunther

, IBSA

London, UK

Keywords

antisemitism, evaluation, criteria, impact

Research on antisemitism is often focused on identifying and describing specific aspects of its phenomena in history and present. Some researchers make efforts to understand the sources and the generation of antisemitism, including its psychological and social functions. Another question, however, is largely neglected: what is the impact of antisemitic thinking? How dangerous are the forms and attitudes of antisemitism we observe and poll today? This question is usually dealt with in a "non-scientific" way of morality; the point of reference is Auschwitz, often for both racism and antisemitism. And indeed, Auschwitz shows us where an ideology of racist antisemitism can lead a modern society under specific circumstances. However, not all forms of racism and antisemitism point to strict racial segregation and annihilation, at least not in the near future.

This paper discusses criteria of evaluating antisemitic attitudes drawing on reflections on the issue by Helen Fein, Theodor W. Adorno, Gavin I. Langmuir, Daniel Goldhagen, Werner Bergmann, Lars Rensmann and Jonathan Judaken. Furthermore, it uses recent findings in social psychology regarding the relation between attitude and behaviour leading to an evaluative framework for antisemitic attitudes and phenomena in three dimensions: A) on the field of impact: discourses, individual behaviours and organised behaviours; B) the size and influence of different groups holding antisemitic, anti-antisemitic and indifferent views; C) the "quality" of antisemitic attitudes. Relevant questions are: What kind of antisemitic behaviour is accepted or endorsed? Is there a social function attached? How strong (latent/manifest) are the antisemitic attitudes? What are the imagined threats? How chimeric are the assertions? How is "Jewishness" defined? What are the alleged negative/evil characteristic traits? To which extend are Jews seen as inhuman (demonisation)? To which extend are Jews seen as a unity and what are "exceptions" (what are "good Jews")?

This evaluative framework is discussed in its genesis and in its usefulness to assess the impact, possible dynamics and the meaning of current observations on antisemitism. A discussion about criteria for evaluating antisemitism may bring the debate about a "new antisemitism" onto a more objective level.

Attitudes towards Interracial Marriage

Osanami, Sayaka

International Migration and Ethnic Relations, Malmö University/Malmö Research Institute for Studies of Migration, Diversity and Welfare Malmö, Sweden

Keywords

Interracial Marriage, attitudes, Prejudice, Ethnic Relations

This paper will present the preliminary findings of my ongoing research on attitudes towards interracial marriage. The results presented in this paper are based on a postal survey conducted in Malmö, Sweden's third largest city; a city with a high concentration of residents with foreign backgrounds. The aim of the research is to examine the attitudes Swedes living in Malmö have towards interracial marriage.

Whether interracial marriage occurs or not depend on two aspects: Opportunity and preference. Opportunity of interracial marriage depends on different factors such as the amount of contacts. Preference is influenced by prevailing stereotypes and prejudices about different racial groups. Marriage between people of the same race (racial homogamy) sustains the rules about race and racial boundaries, while racial exogamy questions the stability of racial groups. Racial endogamy becomes especially important when a membership in a racial group limits access to resources and power in the society. Interracial marriage challenges people's idea and boundary of "us and them". Therefore studying attitudes towards interracial marriage reveals much about racial and ethnic relations.

This paper explores Swedes' preferences and attitudes towards interracial dating and marriage. Departing from the assumption that interracial marriage depends on opportunity and preference, I will examine how previous contacts and the context in which people of different racial background meet have an effect on the attitudes towards interracial dating and marriage. This paper also aims to disclose how racial prejudices and attitudes towards immigrants in general are related to attitudes towards interracial marriage.

Attitudes towards Jews in Polish society, 1967-2007: multifaceted continuity and change

Sulek, Antoni

Institute of Sociology, The University of Warsaw Poland,

Keywords

antisemitism, attitudes towards jews, Poland

The paper is based on a meta-analysis of public-opinions polls and scholarly inquiry conducted in Poland since 1967, when the first survey of ethnic attitudes was carried out. The paper covers the last twenty years of Communism and the first twenty years of democracy in Poland - it permits to show the effect of these historical changes on attitudes towards Jews. Also covered are multinational surveys carried out in Poland and other countries for the AJC and ADL - it permits to compare Poland with some other European countries.

1. The attitude towards Jews in Poland is multifaceted - from factual knowledge about Jews, through sympathetic/unsympathetic feelings and social distance, stereotypes, prejudices and thinking schemas, to views on Polish-Jewish history. Some of the facets, particularly unsympathetic feelings and prejudices, are not unique to the relationship with Jews. They are also present in relations with other ethnic groups and result more from a general non-acceptance of strangers than from a specific anti-Semitism. Other facets, however, are uniquely related to Jews.

2. Polish society is diversified and divided in its attitudes towards Jews. In that sense, as a society, the Poles are neither anti- nor philo-Semitic, and quite often just indifferent.

3. Stereotypes of Jews, thinking schemas ("Jews have too much influence") and views on Polish-Jewish history are of a societal as well as individual background. Created and carried over by the society they become parts of its tradition and collective consciousness. Individual members accept them and pass them over, endured in the process.

4. Many surveys indicate that those attitudes take strong roots in and encompass a wide range of Polish society. In this regard Poland and some other East European countries are much alike and distinguish themselves negatively in comparison with Western Europe.

5. The changes in Poles' attitudes towards Jew are looming. Sympathy and feelings of closeness arise, although very slowly. Those changes are part of a general change in attitude towards others but the change of attitude towards Jews has its own dynamics and depends on the public debates about Polish-Jewish relations.

Aversion to multi-ethnic schools in the Netherlands: Examining the aversion among lower and higher educated by means of closed and open ended questions

Coenders, Marcel

General Social Sciences, Utrecht University Utrecht, The Netherlands

Keywords

education, school segregation, tolerance

Processes of ethnic segregation are becoming more apparent in schools in the Netherlands. In this contribution we focus on the aversion of native Dutch to multi-ethnic schools. We investigate to what extent this aversion varies with different concentrations of ethnic minority pupils. In particular, we focus on the differences between lower and higher educated Dutch in their level of aversion and the determinants thereof. We set out to answer the following questions: (1) To what extent is there variation in highly and poorly educated people's aversion to schools with different concentrations of ethnic minority children? (2) To what extent can we explain these relationships between educational level and aversion to schools with ethnic minority children, i.e. relationships that vary with the degrees of concentration of ethnic minority children? These questions will be answered with data from a large-scale survey among a representative sample of the Dutch population, gathered in 2005. We found that aversion to schools with ethnic minority children is more widespread in cases of high concentrations of ethnic minority children. However, as concentrations of ethnic minority children increase, this aversion becomes particularly more widespread among highly educated people. We investigate to what extent this aversion to multi-ethnic schools is driven by prejudice, perceived ethnic threat, ethnic stereotypes, perceived class differences and political attitudes. We compare the varying effects of these determinants of aversion to multi-ethnic schools across situations where respectively about a tenth, a quarter, half, or more than half of the pupils have an ethnic minority background. These quantitative results are combined with an analysis of open ended questions in which respondents were asked to express in their own words why they object (or not) to a school where half of the pupils have an ethnic minority background. The combined quantitative and qualitative data shed more light on the causes and underlying motives of school preferences that affect the ongoing process of school segregation.

Beyond the new racism: the reconfiguration of whiteness in 21st century Britain

Gidley, Ben

*Centre for Urban and Community Research, Goldsmiths, University of London
London, UK*

Keywords

racism, Britishness, Whiteness, xeno-racism

In this paper, I will argue that UK in the last decade, and particularly since the accession of the A8 states to the EU, has faced a crisis of whiteness, which has resulted in a shift in the nature of racist mobilisation in the UK. The elements of this crisis, I will argue, are: the emergence of "xeno-racism" - the racialisation of foreigners as such, regardless of physical "race" or culture, so that "racially" white Europeans are the targets of racism; the conditional or contingent inclusion of formerly non-white Britons, particularly those of British Commonwealth origin; the intensification of racism against Gypsy/Traveller people; and the racialisation of sections of the white working class through discourses around figures such as the "pikey" and "chav". These shifts have been reflected in the changing public politics of the main far right party in the UK, the BNP. Finally, the paper will suggest that Jews occupy an ambivalent position in relation to this reconfiguration of whiteness.

Challenges for research of ethnicity in Central Europe

Vasecka, Michal

Department of Sociology, Faculty of Social Studies, Masaryk University Brno, Czech republic

Keywords

methodology, ethnicity, Research, de-construction, incompetence

The paper analyses specific features of the current research on ethnicity in Central Europe. Author argues that research on ethnicity, identity, inter-ethnic relations and cultural determinants of ethnic interactions in Central Europe is from the methodological point of view insufficient and problematic due to various structural factors. Author identifies factors influencing quality of the research on ethnicity - ethnic and primordial perception of a nation; lack of data on ethnicity; low abilities to foster specific methods of ethnicity research; over-representation of quantification of inter-ethnic relations qualities and not focus on phenomenological research of perception of ethnicity; paradigmatic chaos; lack of research ethic of researchers researching an ethnicity; lack of abilities to interconnect academic basic research and public policy analysis; and incompetence of research recipients as a specific problem. Author suggest that researchers in Central Europe often tend to be "victims" of the methodological nationalism - they ignore national framing of modernity and take national discourses, agendas, loyalties, and histories for granted, without problematizing them, cultures are perceived even by researchers as unitary and organically related to territories, and researchers often reduce the analytical focus to the boundaries of the national state. Author attempts to document his arguments by bringing various examples of the research on ethnicity since 1989 in V4 countries. Author suggests that research of ethnicity should be understood as a specific type of a research that ought to be contextual, multi-paradigmatic, methodologically non-conventional, de-constructivist and reflecting sensitivity.

Changing youth identity at two formerly all-white South African High schools

Boersema, Jacob

development studies, university of amsterdam leiden, netherlands

Keywords

change, Youth, identity, Whiteness, South Africa

This paper compares changing conceptions of white youth identity at two formerly all-white South African high schools. One elite school has seen limited change since the abolishment of apartheid in 1994, while the other middle-class school has in the last few years rapidly diversified. Given these different circumstances, white Afrikaans speaking youth have responded very differently to the challenge of their white-Afrikaner identity brings in the new post-apartheid political order.

Contrary to most studies on former-white schools in South Africa, this study does not take a discourse approach or focuses on racism or processes of exclusion. It also does not take an institutional perspective. Instead, it looks at the interaction of institutional change with experiences of ethnic identity from the inside out. It does so through an cultural/emotional lens on identity change: how does the white youth negotiate the loss of meaning in a changing school context? How do they respond to the new social norm of non-racism? Do they feel guilt and shame for the apartheid past?

The paper concludes that (institutional) exposure to change, but also to other races, is fundamental to the experience of ones own identity. But also class and gender have important intermediary influence. At the elite school the youth has adapted a liberal stance to ethnic difference and the new multicultural South Africa which is not based on daily experience. The experience for white youth in the changing middle-class school is very different. There, the difference between boys and girls is striking. The emotional dynamic of change for boys plays out very differently with different consequences for their white-Afrikaner identity. Their loss of status at the school leads to a new assertion of their ethnic identity, solidified by strong moral boundaries and unacknowledged shame for the past of their ethnic group.

Community Organisations as Spaces for Negotiation: A British Case Study

Akhtar, Parveen

*Sociology, University of Bristol
Bristol, UK*

Keywords

British Muslims, discrimination, identity

In this paper I examine community organisations as a "space for negotiations" among young British Pakistani Muslims in the UK. Community organisations are an important arena in which political identities within the Pakistani community are being negotiated. Two such organisations - Saheli, a women's organisation and Unityfm, a Muslim radio-station - are the focus of this paper. My argument is that amongst young Pakistani Muslims engaged in local organisations and local politics there is a desire to combat the negative stereotyping of their identity, which they feel exists in mainstream media. Furthermore, there is also evidence of a desire to also change how they see themselves and their position in society: a move towards changing their own self-perceptions and their aspirations in life. What unites both Unityfm and Saheli is that they are both trying, in their different ways, to make, or affect, their own history, even if, to paraphrase Marx's famous phrase, this history is not in circumstances of their own choosing. In social science literature, the term which appears to capture these ideas best is Bourdeau's concept of cultural capital. Both organisations are important arenas in which cultural capital is learned and transmitted.

Competing memories and moral claims for recognition: an attempt to build a typology of psycho-political strategies

Eckmann, Monique

School for Social Work, University of Applied Sciences of Western Switzerland, Geneva Geneva 4, Switzerland

Keywords

genocides, holocaust, identity, Recognition, memory

Memory in general, and the memories of crimes against humanity of the 20th century in particular mark until today European identities and have an impact on intra-national and inter-national relationships. The recognition of past sufferings and memories in the public sphere form an important element for the cohesion of European societies.

The Memory of the Shoah/ Holocaust is in a process of globalization - or universalization -, turning from communicative memory to cultural memory, through the creation of museums and memorial sites, the establishment of memorial days Europe-wide and even world-wide (Stockholm Declaration, decisions of the Council of Europe and the UN), and the establishment of an International task force. At the same time, other memorial claims emerge, such as the demand for recognition of victims of soviet domination in post-soviet societies, for victims of dictatorships in post-dictatorial societies, and for victims of slavery and colonization. Also the Israeli-Palestinian conflict contains a dimension of confronting claims for recognition and competition for victim status.

"Crossed" memory-claims have become visible in various social areas, such as the media, schoolrooms, especially when studying the Holocaust, during memorial days or in memorials and museums; they are often presented by directly involved groups or persons, but may also be claimed by third parties. They seem to be based on psychosocial needs and resentment rather than on historical evidence. What are the psycho-political meanings of these constellations which are involved in claiming, comparing, equating, establishing hierarchies of victims and parallels of genocides?

The proposed contribution aims to discuss possibilities and limits of a typology of competing memories related to moral claims. This typology, based on a psycho-political rather than a legal or a historical approach, attempts to situate the different constellations along two dimensions: the way they refer to same or different historical periods and the way they are located in (same or different) territorial contexts. The resulting differentiation will be useful in finding ways to deal with these strategies, and in addressing them in public debate, educational contexts or memorial events, in a perspective of recognition which avoids equating or banalizing crimes against humanity.

Conspiracy Theories as Worldviews: the Cognitive Appeal of Biased Constructions

Schönemann, Sebastian

*Institut für Soziologie, Universität Leipzig
Leipzig, Germany*

Keywords

anti-Semitism, cognition, Conspiracy Theories, Explanatory-modell analysis

Since 9/11 conspiracy theories are on the rise. Despite isolated attempts to explain this phenomenon, social science has treated conspiracy theories as an orphan. Research on this topic is fragmented and spread across several disciplines. Just a few authors offer theories to explain the presence and structuring of conspiracy theories, and, when they do, they offer partial perspectives or reify their own comparative categories. The generic term "conspiracy theory" is misunderstood as a subject. Instead of addressing prejudice which conspiracy theories express, the focus is on the causes and functions of conspiracy theories.

In my presentation I will show that conspiracy theories have to be understood as systematizations of prejudice. In particular, I will highlight conspiracy theories with anti-Semitic and anti-American contents. The data was collected from a conspiracy-theoretical internet forum. Out of three threads with over 1.000 comments that I observed, I pick out twelve users. My goal is to explain the "temptation of conspiracy theories" with respect to the special role of anti-Semitic conspiracy theories.

I will analyze conspiracy theories at a generic level paying attention to their argumentative structure to show that their appeal consists not only in the freedom they grant to expressing felt prejudice but also their seeming cognitive or explanatory "capacity" - their ability to offer insight into a complex world. My findings suggest that a sense of deeply felt relief arises from identifying the conspirers and setting oneself apart from them - asserting a categorical difference between "them who are not I". Distantiating oneself from those involved in the conspiracy corresponds to the enactment of one's own victimhood or heroism - both of which open the door to further, more differentiated, definition of one's own identity.

For the twelve users whose contributions were analyzed in depth, four types of identity could be identified: the rebel, the renegade, the prophet, and the sceptic. The seven anti-Semitic Users stand out because their self-dramatisation is embedded in a much more dualistic worldview: their assertions that they have discovered the 'truth' is more aggressive. Moreover, their theories dehumanize the 'conspirators' who, in their view, struggle for world supremacy.

Cultural Genocide and its Antidote: The Case of the "Jewish Cultural Reconstruction"

Sznaider, Natan

*School of Behavioral Sciences, Academic College of Tel-Aviv
Tel-Aviv, ISRAEL*

Keywords

restitution, genocide, holocaust, Hannah Arendt

This paper deals with "cultural genocide" but with cultural reconstruction efforts as a response to genocide. I will read this reconstruction efforts as self-conscious attempts by members of the same collective to not let this happen again.

Specifically, this essay will be a contribution to Jewish politics and the politics of Jewish identity. It will show that the realization of the genocide which was perpetrated on the Jews granted them a peculiar form of collective recognition. This was true for ways in which formerly private property was transformed into collective one. I will show how Jewish intellectuals (like Hannah Arendt, Rafael Lemkin, Salo Baron and others) re-defined these issues in theory and practice during a formative period of history that created the categories of thought that after further development now frame the post-cold war world and its struggle to mold a new future. Jewish identity and universalist, human rights identity were born together, developed together, and are still axially connected.

I pay especially close attention to Hannah Arendt's work as research director and executive director of "Jewish Cultural Reconstruction" (JCR). Not very much has been written about this organization, which was founded 1944 in order to re-define the notion of "Jewish Cultural Property", and to deal on a practical level with heirless Jewish cultural property stolen by the Nazis and liberated by the Allies. I will show Arendt's role in this process: Within JCR, Arendt directed a research project called the "Tentative List of Jewish Cultural Treasures in Axis Occupied Countries" (published in 1946-48). It is a list of the now destroyed Jewish cultural institutions all around Europe. This list - one of the central documents of a lost and destroyed Jewish culture in Europe has to my knowledge never be analyzed and used as an analytical point of departure. The list served the "Jewish Cultural Reconstruction" as a baseline reference in its negotiations with the American administration to get itself appointed the chief trustee of the heirless property of the European Jews. It also served as an antidote to cultural genocide.

Czech Republic: anti-Semitism vs. "anti-Gypsism"

Tarant, Zbynek

The Centre of Middle Eastern Studies, The University of West Bohemia Pilsen, Czech Republic

Keywords

anti-Semitism, Gypsies, neonazism, Czech Republic, Riots

Since the Czech society appears to be indifferent towards Jews, some radical movements and anti-Semitic political parties are trying to abuse the issue of social excluded minority (i.e. the Gypsies) to gain public support. What is the difference between the attitudes towards Jews and Gypsies in the Czech society? Are there any differences in the way of how and where is the hate manifested? Does the hate against Gypsies pose any threat to Jews as well? Why should be the issue of Eastern-European Gypsies included into framework of anti-Semitism combating movements? What led to the November 17th riots in Janov neighborhood, which are considered to be the most violent in the post-communist Czech Republic? We will analyze and compare recent anti-Semitic and anti-Gypsy events in order to illustrate the dangerous schism in the way of how is the term "racism" comprehended in Czech society. By combining the data from monitoring of "cyberspace" and the field observations, this paper seeks to analyze the recent development in attitude towards two different ethnic minorities.

Thematic areas covered by the paper: - European racism and antisemitism: common trends and variations - Global and local aspects of racism and anti-Semitism - Racism against ethnic and religious minorities - Transformations of racism and anti-Semitism

Discourses about Islam and Muslims in Spain: dimensions, frames and logics of exclusion

Desrués, Thierry

Instituto de Estudios Sociales Avanzados, Consejo Superior de Investigaciones Científicas Córdoba, Spain

Keywords

Immigration, Interculturality, xenophobia, islamofobia, racism

The main objective of this paper is to present some results of an investigation about Perceptions and Attitudes towards Islam and Muslims in Spain. 11 focus-groups among the Spanish population were held. Through the analysis of the discourses produced, we have identified the next five dimensions of opinions towards this religion and its believers: 1) association with fanaticism; 2) ?moro? bias; 3) misunderstanding of Muslim religiosity; 4) integration of future generations; 5) subordination of women. Firstly, we present these dimensions and then we show if and how they are related to some topics (and frames) such as, political citizenship (nation-state), social rights (welfare state), economic utilitarianism (capitalist state) and cultural values (ethic state). Secondly, on the basis of these connections we built three Ideal-types (pre-modern, modern and post-modern discourses) and six subtypes of discourses. Finally, we try to see if these dimensions and Ideal-types can be intertwined with logics such as, racism, xenophobia, cultural racism and islamophobia.

Displacement and Reiteration: Europe's Othello, The Merchant of Venice and Gaza

Orkin, Martin

Theatre and English, University of Haifa Haifa, Israel

Keywords

cultural reiteration, displacement, racism, Shakespeare

Displacement and Reiteration: Europe's Othello, The Merchant of Venice and Gaza

Using Shakespeare's Othello and The Merchant of Venice, I want to register the cultural reiteration of racism of various kinds that ongoing performance of these texts ensures. To do this I want first to register what the presentation of outsider figures in Venice precipitates in both texts. Unease in Othello, about the unruliness of (English) masculinity is partly contained by the play's use of the Moor, particularly at its end. The Merchant of Venice is racist in more complex ways throughout. The extent to which anxieties about economic intercourse are in the play displaced onto the figure of the Jew has been much acknowledged. But I want to note as well the extent to which evidence of Christian exegetical readings of the Bible and of Judaism in the play, in turn, contribute to construction of a phantasmagoric figure of evil. Secondly, I want to register the extent to which both plays have continued to be performed in Europe, particularly in the case of the Merchant, Britain and Germany, as well as elsewhere. Finally I want to initiate an examination of the kinds of displacement and reiteration that might be found in cultural representations of recent events in Gaza. In what ways might what we know about these plays and their reception, intersect with European, Palestinian or Israeli cultural representations of these recent events?

Ethnic Segregation in Flemish High Schools: Structure, Homophily, Ethnic Subcultures or Interethnic Conflict

Van Rossem, Ronan

*Sociology, Ghent University
Ghent, Belgium*

Vlegels, Jef

*Sociology, Ghent University
Ghent, Belgium*

Keywords

Ethnic Segregation, Exponential Random Graph Models (ERGM), Homophily, Network Analysis

In this paper, we investigate the integration of ethnic minorities, mainly from North-African, Turkish or Eastern-European descent, into the Flemish high school system. We focus on within-school ethnic segregation, which can be studied at the interdependent levels of the organization of education (tracking, etc.) and at the micro level (the relations among students). Because the social structure of a school is multiplex, we consider both positive (friendship) and negative relations (avoidance).

We test whether the observed ethnic segregation can be explained by (1) a structural model which focuses on the opportunities for contact, (2) a homophily model which states individuals prefer similar others for positive relations, (3) a subculture model based on group identification and (4) an ethnic conflict model.

We use network and attribute data collected as part of the large-scale Flemish Education Assessment survey during the 2004-2005 school year. This sample exists of 11219 students, spread over 123 9th and 11th grades in 68 schools.

A multilevel approach is used to test the different hypothesizes. We first model the network data for each grade separately using exponential random graph models (ERGM's), and combine these estimates using meta-analysis techniques.

The results of this two-step analysis show that there is a strong tendency for ethnic homophily regarding friendships among Flemish high school students, even after controlling for structural factors. But there is no significant ethnic homophily for negative avoidance relations. These findings are consistent with the homophily model: students prefer friends from the same ethnicity, even after controlling for structural factors, but they do not have an ethnic preference for negative relations.

Ethnic, Religious and Economic Diversity in the Neighbourhood: Explaining Quality of Contact with Neighbours, Trust in the Neighbourhood and Inter-ethnic Trust for Immigrant and Native Residents

Lancee, Bram

*Political and Social Sciences, European University Institute
San Domenico di Fiesole, Italy*

Dronkers, Jaap

*Political and Social Sciences, European University Institute
San Domenico di Fiesole, Italy*

Keywords

trust, Neighborhood, ethnic diversity, religious diversity, economic diversity

Several studies conclude that ethnic diversity tends to reduce social capital. As Putnam (2007) claims: in ethnically diverse neighbourhoods, residents of all ethnicities tend to "hunker down". There may however be other forms of diversity that affect social capital as well. Besides ethnic diversity, we identify economic and religious diversity, as well as language proficiency in the neighbourhood. This study explores with data from the Netherlands to what extent these dimensions of diversity in the neighbourhood affect the quality of contact with neighbours, trust in neighbourhood and inter-ethnic trust for immigrant and native residents.

Using multi-level regression models, we find that ethnic diversity in the neighbourhood lowers the quality of contact with the neighbours. However, for natives, ethnic diversity is positively associated with inter-ethnic trust, whereas for immigrants there is no effect. Furthermore, for natives, religious diversity negatively affects the quality of contact with the neighbours and interethnic trust, whereas for immigrants this effect is positive. Economic diversity positively impacts trust in the neighbourhood and inter-ethnic trust. We do not find an effect of language proficiency.

We conclude that besides ethnic diversity, other forms of diversity in the neighbourhood affect trust as well. Furthermore, diversity undermines, but also builds trust. Last, diversity in the neighbourhood does not mean the same for immigrant and native residents.

Exploring Eurocentrism in Portuguese History Textbooks

Araújo, Marta

*Centre for Social Studies, University of Coimbra
Coimbra, Portugal*

Meneses, Paula

*Centre for Social Studies, University of Coimbra
Coimbra, Portugal*

Maeso, Silvia

*Centre for Social Studies, University of Coimbra
Coimbra, Portugal*

Lucas, José João

*Centre for Social Studies, University of Coimbra,
Coimbra, Portugal*

Santos, Hélia

*Centre for Social Studies, University of Coimbra
Coimbra, Portugal*

Barradas, Carlos

*Centre for Social Studies, University of Coimbra
Coimbra, Portugal*

Keywords

Portugal, Africa, race, textbooks, Eurocentrism

In recent decades, history textbooks have undergone significant transformations resulting from collective struggles for recognition. In many Western countries, a central aspect deserving attention is that of Eurocentric representations of national/European history, particularly the processes through which certain versions of history position "we" as central and its "others" as peripheral. In Portugal, the task of analysing such processes is particularly relevant. Its colonial legacy has, across the years, influenced the conception of Portuguese national identity and reproduced unequal relations, particularly evident in representations of "race" and "Africa".

In this communication, we will present an ongoing project entitled "Race" and Africa in Portugal: a study on history textbooks, which explores how "race" and Africa figure and are made use of in textbooks. Key research questions include: Which history of Africa gets told up until the "Discoveries" period of the 15th century? Does a stereotyped view of the Black and/or African "other" circulate? Are "race" and racism accounted for? How are the colonial war and the history of African resistance to colonialism addressed? We are using critical content analysis, focusing not only on contents (both textual and iconographic) but also on absences, being aware of the multiplicity of readings that texts and images can have. So far, a preliminary analysis of textbooks points to the construction of "Africa" as "a land without society" (not having the status of "territory" until the arrival of colonisers) and to the use of the notion of "civilisation" as a category that discriminates between "territories with society" and "empty land" (e.g. in contrast to the absence of "society" in Africa, Inca, Maya or Aztec "civilisations" in "the Americas" deserve some consideration, being "equated" to the Eurocentric idea of "civilisation").

To uncover how contents are negotiated by actors involved in textbook production and circulation, empirical work will be carried out with policy-makers, editors, authors, teachers, students, NGOs representatives and other relevant stakeholders and associations. We are thus interested in discussing both our preliminary results on the content analysis of textbooks and subsequent methodological strategies to construct critical and fruitful dialogues with all actors participating in the study.

From conceptualizations (and measures) of racism to strategies of socio-political action for combating its old and new forms, in nowadays Spain (DRAFT 2009-03-08 20:42:53)

Cea D´Ancona, M<sup>a</sup> Ángeles

*Sociología IV (Metodología de la Investigación), Universidad Complutense de Madrid
Pozuelo de Alarcón (Madrid), Spain*

Valles Martínez, Miguel S.

*Sociología IV (Metodología de la Investigación), Universidad Complutense de Madrid
Pozuelo de Alarcón (Madrid), Spain*

Keywords

Immigration, xenophobia, ethnic-national discrimination, social discourses, socio-political action

In the interval of a generation (last 25 years approximately) Spanish society has become an immigration country, a new collective experience that merges with a past (known directly or indirectly) of emigration to the Americas and Europe. This migration transition has occurred parallel to other transitional and contextual processes, of a socioeconomic, political and cultural nature (modernization, democratization, secularization). In this social context, we have approached the explanation and understanding of forms of racism, xenophobia and their complementary opposites (tolerance, xenophilia).

Our paper is intended as an opportunity to share ideas, research experiences and findings related to a line of study on public opinion and migration focused on the various faces of racism and xenophobia. At present we have finished a project (SEJ2005-00568/SOCI) that aimed at improving the conceptualization and measurement of xenophobia by the combined use of qualitative and quantitative methods. We obtained biographical and discourse materials gathered around the migration experience of both autochthonous and foreign people that have been analyzed. At present, we are collaborating in a new project (JLS/2007/FRC-1/36) LIVING TOGETHER: European Citizenship against Racism and Xenophobia, in which the aim is not only to analyze discriminatory discourses, but also to combat them identifying best practices and discourses of tolerance.

Glamorous Jewishness: Reflections on the Kabbalah Centre and Anti-Semitism

Altglas, Veronique

Sociology, University of Cambridge Cambridge, UK

Keywords

religion, Judaism, identity, anti-Semitism

This paper will draw on empirical data collected for research on the Kabbalah Centre, a fast-growing religious movement created in the 1970s in Israel, by a New Yorker of Jewish origin. Combining Jewish mysticism with modern tools for well-being, this religious organization nevertheless refuses to present itself as a branch of Judaism. It attracts Jewish and non-Jewish students, which the Kabbalah Centre familiarize with Jewish concepts and rituals that they learn to perform. Unsurprisingly, this popularization of Kabbalah and its partial detachment from a Jewish audience, have stirred hostility from the representatives of Jewish orthodoxy. Using participant observation and semi-structured interviews, this paper analyses as discourses on Jewishness the Kabbalah Centre's conflicted relationships with its religious roots, the ambiguous identities constructed by Jewish and non-Jewish students, and the discourses of the Kabbalah Centre's critics. This paper will explore the extent to which these various discourses on Jewish identity reflect social actors' difficulties of "being Jewish", responses to stereotypes about Jews, and fear of anti-Semitism. Ultimately, the Kabbalah Centre and reactions to it could be explained as an indirect response to anti-Semitism.

Hegemonic Discourse in the Chilean Media: Constructing Narratives on the Mapuches

Valle, Trinidad

Sociology, Fordham University

Bronx, USA

Keywords

Politics of recognition, Framing strategies, Media discourse, ethnic minorities

Latin American indigenous social movements have attracted world-wide attention in the last decades. From bilingual education to battles over land rights, these new social movements are contesting the definition of citizenship and national identity in many countries in Latin America. In the Chilean case, the indigenous movement challenges the mythical view of a homogeneous society, and situates the politics of recognition at the core of the public debate. This paper analyzes the role of the Chilean mass media in this debate, emphasizing their role in selecting and framing news on ethnic minorities. One of the main arguments of the paper is that the Chilean media propose contradictory images of the Mapuches. On the one hand, the Mapuches are presented as a symbol of our past, as a symbol of "nature", of our "origins", particularly in media segments related to arts and culture. But on the other hand, Mapuches are also portrayed as aggressive, conflictive and deviant in today's political news. The idealized historical Mapuche is constructed as the symbol of the mestizo origins of the nation, while the living Mapuche is depicted as a deviant actor who is threatening the social order. This is an interesting point of entry for a discussion on the media narratives on the Mapuche: while the historic figure is revered, the present figure is demonized. Independent media outlets supported by Mapuche organizations will contest these mainstream representations. As a result, an extended universe of discourse is conformed, where symbolic struggles over the power of naming are constantly being reenacted.

Holocaust Denial and Media Discourse in Moldova

Sineaeva-Pankowska, Natalia

*-, Graduate School for Social Research, Polish Academy of Sciences
Warsaw, Poland*

Keywords

nationalism, Media, identity, intellectuals, Holocaust denial

The paper attempts to examine the phenomenon of Holocaust denial in Moldova as an element of ethno-nationalistic identity construction in Moldova and how it is presented by Moldovan media discourse. The paper will try to answer the question: how important is the media role in the construction of ethno-nationalistic identity by using Holocaust denial in Moldova.

Moldova has officially declared itself a multicultural multiethnic state and it has followed a pro-democratic pro-European political course. Paradoxically, on a different level the phenomenon of Holocaust denial has grown and occupies an influential position in the discourse of academic history and among a certain part of national socio-political elites. Holocaust 'revisionism' has become a tacitly accepted 'mainstream' view within a section of intelligentsia, including the history department of the main state university. The study of the Holocaust itself has been discouraged in some institutions. In particular, the facts of the genocide against Jews during the Romanian occupation of Moldova (1941-1944) are questioned and distorted in Moldova today. Holocaust denial serves as a political project of reunification with Romania on the basis of ethnic linguistic ties. Holocaust denial is a part of the pan-Romanian identity and ideology and it can be considered as rather an "imported" phenomenon in Moldova.

A significant section of the media plays an important role in promoting ethno-nationalism by employing argumentative strategies of Holocaust denial.

Deniers appearing in the media may use different strategies such as accusation of others or transfer of the charge to others (eg. stressing exclusive German responsibility for the Holocaust).

Immigrants and the new "Reserve Army of Labour": Segregation in the Construction Sector. A comparison between France and Italy

Lendaro, Annalisa

University of Provence, Department of Sociology, Laboratoire d'Economie et Sociologie du Travail (LEST-CNRS) Aix en Provence, France

Keywords

immigrants, construction sector, segregation, discrimination, selection processes

Modern society became a wage earning society; to be integrated into the labour market means to have a paid job and the rights attached to it to benefit from the social security system (Castel, 1995). However these benefits are frequently proportional to the status of the employee, and therefore the matrix of integration in society (Schnapper, 1989; Demazière, 1998).

The French republican model of integration functioned so long as employment and social protection were controlled by the Keynesian convention of full employment (Tripiier, 1991). The irruption of mass unemployment completely put out of order the ?integration machine?.

The role and intervention capacity of local public actors, on the labour market, is increasingly confronted with new issues that are questioning their effectiveness and legitimacy, both on the level of their capability to promote new models of professional inclusion and on the level of social integration of the immigrant workforce. What are the relevant categories of the public action? Are there specific categories such as first generation immigrants or do policies address other general groups on the labour market such as seniors, women, people with low job skills? Do these categories fit with the real functioning of the construction labour market, where private actors are supposed to solve pragmatically the problems related to the workforce supply?

At the methodological level, this research will refer to a "revisited" (Verdier, 2000) societal analysis (Maurice, Sellier, Silvestre 1982), useful to compare the societal coherences of the two national cases.

We propose to explore the negotiation mechanisms between actors, concerning the conventions (Eymard-Duverney, 2002 and 2008; Boltanski and Thévenot, 1991) that regulate the access of the immigrant workforce to the labour market in the construction sector.

One of the comparison dimension focus on the role of networks and of qualification standards as instruments that can at the same time weaken and accentuate the segmentation of the local labour market.

Instrumentalising history: on some aspects of the re-nationalisation of Germany's political culture in 2006

Doerfler, Thomas

Social Geography, University of Bayreuth Bayreuth, Germany

Keywords

patriotism, nationalism, Germany, anti-Semitism, 1968

During the summer of 2006 the world witnessed an event in the heart of Europe that revealed an unknown phenomenon: the pictures of a happy, colourful and non-aggressive German nationalism in the wake of the Soccer World Championship celebrations. The people were also praised for presenting themselves and the country in a nice and hospitable manner, giving way to a new image of Germany. The consensus in political and cultural commentary was that nobody had ever dared to think about the possibility of using German national symbols in a peaceful and uncomplicated way. Although there was nothing new in showing flags, e.g. after a soccer victory, the commentators were unanimous that this is the manifestation of something »new«: the birth of »happy patriotism« in Germany.

Soon, politics became aware how favourable these tendencies can be used for agenda setting and cultural discourse. Especially the conservative and right wing parts of the country were excited about the fact that the youth acted so »uncomplicated«, showing a »positive« and »innocent« patriotism. At least since the fall of the Berlin wall in 1989, they believe that their time has come to establish a bourgeois and nationalist counter-narration of German post-war history and to overcome the - in their eyes - »anti-German« thinking of the generation of the Achtundsechziger (»68ers«), mainly in the fields of culture and politics. As the »68ers« are the most popular political enemy for the Conservatives, they claim that they represent a »false«, »multi-cultural« Germany. 2006 could have been the year in which the discourse on national identity in Germany changed, and the usage of national symbols as a kind of pop phenomena could turn out to be only the surface of a decisive shifting point in contemporary cultural and political practices. The implications of a new essentialist German agenda would have great impact not only on the politics of the country but also in all realms of life on the country's attitude. I would like to give some empirical data of this process to discuss at the conference.

Integration and Community Cohesion: a critique of the dominant discourse in the UK

Ratcliffe, Peter

*Sociology, University of Warwick
Coventry, UK*

Keywords

Integration, racism, neo-liberalism, cohesion

Since the summer of 2001, when serious unrest and conflict broke out in a number of multi-ethnic towns and cities, UK social policy has been dominated by the idea that such divisions can, and should, be addressed within a new paradigm. Under the banner of "community cohesion", the stated aim is to generate an "integrated and cohesive" society.

This paper aims to interrogate both the substance and the political and policy discourse underpinning this approach. In this context, it seeks to do two things. First, it contextualises the core debates within a (New) Labour agenda that has chosen to eschew a clear ideological break from neo-liberalism. Secondly, it interrogates the commonly held view that policies driven by the idea of "cohesion" not only address the immediate problems of urban and social unrest but also undermine racism and associated exclusionary practices, in particular discrimination (both of an individual and institutional nature) on grounds of "race", ethnicity and faith.

Intersections of antisemitism and sexism in socio-economic relations

Stoegner, Karin

Institute of Sociology; Institute of Conflict Research, University of Vienna Austria, http://www.ikf.ac.at/english/m\_stoegner.htm

Keywords

Intersectionality, sexism, antisemitism, economy

The aim of this presentation is to shed light on the multilayered structural and functional intersections of antisemitism and sexism. Thereby, a major focus will be laid onto the role both antisemitism and sexism play in the ideology of commodity fetish being central also to Late Capitalism. The connections of antisemitism and sexism can be seen in specific debates on economic issues, where the figure of the "greedy Jew" intermingles with specifically gendered and sexualised images, e.g. the "prostitute"; both can be read as specific expressions of the sensuality assigned to money. In 19th century, materialism was widely seen as "female and "Jewish" weakness. Antisemitism and sexism both function as media for a concretist framing of an abstract capitalist world, both can be seen as distorted and abbreviated depictions of objective processes of society. Both work with strategies of personalisation and simplification and aim at reducing the complexity of the modern capitalist world. Particularly noticeable, images of the "Jewish" and the "female" are equally racialised and gendered/sexualised, whereby an (alleged) transgression of traditional social, political, economic, sexual and gender borders is central to these images. As configurations of an overall anti-emancipatory impetus, these images are performative acts of antisemitism and sexism at the same time. Accordingly, they are not only manifestations of discriminatory and oppressive practices or structures of society, but have the power to (re-)produce these discriminatory structures. In this presentation, major intersections of antisemitism and sexism with regard to dealing with the socio-economic relations of advanced capitalist society shall be analysed.

Intervention approaches of Civil Society for repelling right-wing extremism in Swiss Municipalities

Eser Davolio, Miryam

*School for Social Work, Institute for Social Planning and Urban Development, University of Applied Sciences of Northwestern Switzerland
Basel, Switzerland*

Keywords

violence, Civil Society, racism, right-wing extremism

In the framework of the Swiss National Research Program (NRP 40+), Right-Wing Extremism - Causes and Countermeasures, we conducted a study on the viability of social work and community development in dealing with right-wing extremism. As the study focused particularly on community work projects, we first conducted a pilot study in nine municipalities that had experienced and responded to problems of right-wing extremism. In the main part of our study, we evaluated seven interventions conducted in conjunction with expert consultants. The results revealed a picture of the situation in a total of sixteen municipalities in the German and French-speaking parts of Switzerland and provided insights into the causes of and possible countermeasures to right-wing extremism. The networking among community actors and the coordinated implementation of measures in surveyed municipalities as a rule resulted in a decrease in right-wing extremist incidents. The three main strategies: repression, intervention, and prevention. At the level of prevention and intervention, the surveyed municipalities selected very different forms of activities to demonstrate their common commitment against right-wing extremism. The creation of better communication channels significantly improved monitoring, which in turn fostered repression and the early recognition of new manifestations of the right-wing extremist scene. In connection with our current studies the role and influence of context (population, parties, politics) on right-wing extremism will be analyzed and exposed, especially regarding political campaigns.

Is the question of racism in the Zionist state so black and white? The case of the Ethiopian Jews

Weil, Shalva

Research Institute for Innovation in Education, Hebrew University of Jerusalem Jerusalem, Israel

Keywords

racism, Ethiopian Jews, colour, affirmative action

There are 120,000 Ethiopian immigrants and their children in Israel today, who were brought to their new host society in a series of airlift from the 1980's on. These Jews originate in poor, rural areas of Ethiopia, and were once known by the stigmatic connotation "Falashas" (lit: "outsiders"). In Israel, they were welcomed upon arrival and were incorporated as a Jewish ethnic group ("eda") in society. However, Ethiopian Jews are generally found in the lower socio-economic strata of society, with disproportionate rates of unemployed persons, suicide, wife-murder, AIDS and other negative social phenomena. Nevertheless, the community sports Members of Parliament, doctors and lawyers, and businessmen, who negotiate transnational ties with Ethiopia.

This paper will discuss the case of the Ethiopian Jews in Israel within the context of local manifestations of racism. It will also analyse governmental policies of affirmative action in the fields of health, education, religion and employment. Questions will be asked as to whether there is discrimination in the Zionist state against Jewish minorities, whether racism is confined to questions of colour alone, and whether affirmative action is itself rooted in a form of inverse racism. These questions are usually raised with reference to Israeli Arabs or Palestinians, and to a lesser extent have been raised in the past in a sociological context with respect to the Ashkenazi (European)-Sefardi (Oriental) Jewish divide.

Finally, a more general sociological discussion will examine the connection of migration and racism, and the forms of racism experienced in Israel, which may be common to other European societies.

Islamophobia and Anti-Semitism in present-day Austria

Hödl, Klaus

*Center for Jewish Studies, University of Graz
Graz, Austria*

Keywords

racism, anti-Semitism, Islamophobia

In November 2005 the German weekly Die Zeit published a lengthy article on Vienna, depicting it as a modern city where quality of life is extraordinary high. The most conspicuous aspect of Austria's capital, however, that clearly distinguishes it from other major European cities, seems to be the exemplary way it tackles the issue of integrating its Muslim population. At a time when French banlieues were feared for their Muslim youth gangs, Vienna could boast of being a safe capital, lacking neighbourhoods in which Muslims are penned up, segregated from the non-Muslim population, and doomed to lead a socially marginal life.

In the meantime, conditions have changed. The paper traces the development from sporadic anti-Muslim statements to full-fledged Islamophobia in the sense of an hostile attitude towards Islam and Muslims that influences public discourses and affects political decision-making processes. It also points out that anti-Semitism has come along with anti-Muslim hostility, thus finding a new - and seemingly widely accepted - way to be articulated again in public.

Mosque Debates in Germany: Media Presentations and Right-Wing Propaganda

Stoop, David

Politics, University Cologne Köln, Germany

Keywords

Germany, Media, right-wing extremism, Islamophobia, mosques

For a long period mosques have been located predominantly in industrial areas and "backyard-districts" of German cities; But in recent years, an increasing number of Muslim associations attempted to step out of the hidden backyards and initiated representative mosque-projects. These projects are highly contested in German public and in almost every case the wish to build a visible mosque ignited fierce debates. Most often the central question is not whether a mosque should be built at all but it is rather the mode of the building that is contested. High minarets and domes are frequently interpreted as visual signs of Islam and its alleged claim to power. Understandable provisos of local residents against a mosque in their neighbourhood and expected traffic problems thereby intertwine with islamophobic prejudices against a supposedly atavistic Islam. In the course of these discussions, Islam is often presented as a monolithic, hostile entity and mosques are depicted as architectural symbols of power in a "clash of civilizations". Drawing from the example of the recent mosque debate in Cologne and its media coverage, it will be shown how mosque-conflicts are overloaded with cultural and religious interpretations and closely linked to common pictures of "the Muslims", providing an ideal ground for populist forms of right-wing extremism. The example of 'Pro Köln' ('Pro Cologne') shows how right-wing populists try to intervene into mosque-debates by presenting themselves as legitimate representatives of all citizens who are opposed to a mosque in their neighbourhood. Experience has shown that this 'populist threat' can be successfully countered if local media refrain from dramatizing the conflict. Moreover, if residents are successfully included into a transparent planning process, mosque projects may contribute to the integration of Muslim minorities by providing opportunities for intensive dialogue between local residents, Muslim Associations and county officials.

Multicultural Laicity and the Coexistence of Religious Identities: An Educational Experience

De Botton, Lena

*Teoria Sociologica, filosofia del dret i metodologia de les CCSS, University of Barcelona
Barcelona, Spain*

Burgués de Freitas, Ana

*Sociología y análisis de las organizaciones, University of Barcelona
Barcelona, Spain*

Serradell, Olga

Sociología, Autonomus University of Barcelona- GEDIME Bellaterra, Spain

Keywords

laicity, coexistence, equality of differences

One of the consequences of the societal change which our societies have been undergoing is an increase in identity vindications. This requires spaces for daily interaction to be organised differently. Regarding to religious plurality in our countries we aim to go more in depth in the spaces which people share. This notion demands a complex intertwining of loyalties in which practices and dynamics are searched for which ensure that through dialogue and the recognition of the other person, shared rules of coexistence can be agreed upon. Even in Europe (where the process of modernisation has been linked to the process of secularisation) the existence and the boom of religious diversity, as Berger indicates, is already a reality. Actually, there is an extensive debate on the management of the plurality of identities in public spaces. However, according to religious diversity there is huge debate. The concept of multicultural laicity wants to contribute to the analysis and comprehension of the strategies and elements through which spaces are constructed supported by rules which are highly consensual, based on the freedom of individual choice and on the recognition of collective rights. In this sense, Schools are important spaces in which these challenges take shape. Is a space where is possible to conciliate equality with difference that it shows the educational experiences like Learning Communities.

National Identity and Antisemitism in Germany: Shoa, Antizionism and Antiamericanism

Stoller, Robin

*-, International Institute for Education and Research on Antisemitism
Berlin, Germany*

Keywords

Antiamericanism, antisemitism, Germany, national identity, Shoa

Based on a qualitative research in Germany and considering current developments related to the Gaza-War, the paper will give an overview about the different forms of articulations of Antisemitism in Germany. It will focus on the relationship between the construction of a German national identity and Antisemitism. The paper will point out that for the construction of a national identity in Germany the Shoa and WW II play a central role. Only specific forms of articulations of Antisemitism are "allowed" in the public and private discourse. The Shoa and WW II are either positively included in the national identity ("we learned from the history - the US, Israel and others didn't"), refused or rejected ("I don't want to hear it anymore") or projected to the Jews or Israel ("Israel is doing the same as the Nazis did to the Jews"). The paper analyzes this relationship among national identity, Antisemitism, Antizionism and Antiamericanism, and will thereby consider the role a "European identity" plays in Germany.

Polish Collective Memory of the Holocaust: Social and Education Discourse after 1989

Boron, Aleksandra

Department of Educational Studies, Adam Mickiewicz University Poznan, Poland

Keywords

Jews, Poland, holocaust, post-communism, collective memory

Aleksandra Boro

Adam Mickiewicz University

Pozna, Poland

The purpose of this paper is to describe the phenomenon of social including and excluding of the Jews as a process of transformation of collective memory in Poland.

The process may be divided into three periods:

1. Communist ideology versus social memory of World War Two. in postwar Poland
2. Political transformation of the memory in Poland during the 80's and after 1989
3. Introducing the term "Holocaust" in postcommunist Poland (both in social and educational discourses)

The construction of the past raises the question of how collective representation is shaped by ideologies together with social and political changes in the context of Polish post-Holocaust and post-communist society. For understanding of Polish collective memory (or understanding why Polish memory is not necessarily "collective") it is important to distinguish between the communist and post-communist eras. Each of these periods produced commemorative narratives about events that deeply divided Polish society after World War Two. The formation of the new Polish state by armed force and Soviet intervention affected patterns of commemoration and the Party recognized as heroes only those who were communist fighters, while the ethnicity of heroes and victims was (almost totally) repressed or marginalized.

Political transformation during the 80's returned to social memory the traces of erased collective memory, among these the Jewish presence in Poland before and after World War Two. In consequence, the Poles had to face in public debate the facts of annihilation of the Jews of Europe both during World War Two and persecution after the war (Kielce and the anti-Semitic campaign of 1968). In this context we can adopt the term "cultural trauma" and see how it affected the changes in Polish society, for example following Jan B?o?ski's essay or the revelations about Jedwabne.

Racialization: openings and constraints in sociological research

Zakharov, Nikolay

*Sociology, Uppsala University
Uppsala, Sweden*

Keywords

social theory, racism, race, racialization

The paper emphasizes that a more nuanced evaluation and analysis of the widely-used concept of racialization is possible only when one also takes into account special features of the scientific discourse within which it is used by sociologists.

First I will outline why the concept of racialization has appeared and become popular in sociological theory. I argue that an analysis of the insufficiency of previous notions and the advantages of introducing the concept of racialization will hold the key to solving the problem posed in my paper. In this analysis I draw attention both to internal tendencies in the logic of the development of sociological theory as well as to external circumstances which inevitably affect the logic of its development, but are often left out of consideration.

Second, I will critically examine the Marxist and poststructuralist-influenced postcolonial approach which is predominant among scholars in the study of racialization processes. While arguing that these approaches still provide the most appropriate theoretical frame for interpreting certain aspects of racialization processes, my paper shows the need to broaden the racialization scholar's theoretical foundations. I argue that the concept of racialization is irreplaceable, in particular for scholars of the phenomenon who are adherents of theoretical programs inspired by phenomenology, pragmatism and functionalism.

Depending on the tasks facing the scholar, on the particular characteristics of the society they are studying and the accessibility of material, the scholar may prioritize either institutionally formalized categorization practices in their historical perspective or microinteractionist studies of the informal, "everyday" classification and categorization practices of ordinary people. I argue that the issue of calling groups into being cannot be resolved solely on the discursive macro level, as is stressed by many structure-oriented Foucauldians and Marxists.

Locating the concept within the theoretical context will achieve a more conscious use of it and contribute to a better understanding of the processes of racialization. The main aim of my work is, then, to propose some assumptions that may sensitize a scholar to the kind of factors which are relevant to explaining the racialization process.

Racism and the Representation of "the racist" in Sweden

Schmauch, ULrika

Department of Social Sciences, Mid Sweden University Sundsvall, Sweden

Keywords

mystifying racism, migrants of African descent, "the racist", everyday racism, critical race theory

There is a widespread consensus in Sweden that racism in all its forms is wrong and should be fought. Even though xenophobic political parties are gaining momentum most Swedes still would consider their country more tolerant than others. A growing body of research shows, however, that experiences of everyday racism are common among racialized minorities, ranging from experiences of open racist name calling and harassment in public places to more subtle racist assumptions from colleagues, teachers and friends. This kind of experiences do not seem to have become less over time. This paper argues, drawing on Postcolonial and Critical Race Theory, that racism in many ways is mystified and that this limits the possibilities of resisting racism. The paper looks specifically at the construction of 'the Racist', a monstrous individual driven by overwhelming hatred towards immigrants, as a way of giving absolution to the average Swede from the responsibility of reproducing racism. In discussing narratives of young adults of African descent it is shown how the construction of 'the Racist' is used as a way of dismissing my informants' experiences of everyday racism as a result of hypersensitivity or misunderstandings, and by that token contributing to the mystification and normalization of everyday racism.

Right-wing extremism among immigrant adolescents from the FSU in Israel and Germany

Schmidt, Anja

Institute of Interdisciplinary Research on Conflict and Violence, University of Bielefeld Bielefeld, Germany

Keywords

1.5 generation, right-wing extremism, immigrants

Enquiry after political attitudes and activities of immigrant adolescents from the FSU, and particularly after sympathies for right-wing extremist ideologies, is still below par. But one can find hints that

1. a small number of young Russian speaking immigrants both in Israel and Germany (the two countries under examination) develop right-wing extremist attitudes and join more or less organized openly extremist groups or political parties (i.e. Israel Beitenu or the NDPG),
2. these attitudes root at least partly in the early socialization of the adolescents back in the FSU,
3. the sympathizers in some cases draw their ideological foundations from their countries of origin or from their own migrant community i.e. via mass media or the Internet,
4. the extremist groups are in some cases influenced by current developments of nationalism and right-wing extremism in the Russian Federation and collaborate with groups located in Russia.

The situation at hand describes a new phenomenon insofar as to date pronounced right-wing extremism has been heard from the local majority and self-speaking excluded the migrating minority. Therefore, the paper aims at answering the following main questions: - What is the character of the "right-wing extremism" as it is portrayed by the interviewees? - How can the sympathy for right-wing extremist groups of those immigrant adolescents be explained by their biographies? - If they do exist, of which nature are the (ideological) connections with right-wing extremist organisations in other countries, with particular attention to the developments in the RF? - What are the experiences or relationships of those immigrants with local German neo-Nazis or Israeli right-wing extremists? - Which role does the presence or absence of other (minority) groups play in the process of pronunciation of right-wing extremism by the individuals under examination?

The paper presents first results of a comparative qualitative study.

Schooling the "other": creating European citizens in a multi-ethnic Transylvanian town

Szakacs, Simona

Sociology, University of Essex Colchester, United Kingdom

Keywords

citizenship, schooling, multi-ethnic education, conversation-analysis, Southeastern Europe

In the advent of further South-Eastern expansion of the predominantly Western EU, two more states historically associated with "the (Balkan) other" rather than with (the "core" of) Europe - i.e. Romania and Bulgaria - have jumped, at the beginning of 2007, in the "pool of civilization". As the shifting identities of the post-communist multi-ethnic South-Eastern European states are called into question, Europe has to continue redefining its cultural boundaries with evermore increased vigilance. As a result, education has, once again, been called in to fill the void of culture and transform the future citizens of the EU polity, their identities and allegiances notwithstanding, into true, full-grown Europeans - an aim that is apparent in virtually all of the members' states national educational policies.

In this context, the purpose of this paper is to trace an ethnographically rich portrait of the schooled constructions of "otherness" through the teaching of citizenship in one multiethnic Transylvanian town in Romania where Romanian, Hungarian and Roma communities co-reside. The interplay between the transmission of European values as set within a national educational system and the construction(s) of the local ethnic minority identities will be explored.

The school level of interest encompasses the first four years of the recently extended last part of compulsory education in Romania, also known as lower-secondary education (i.e. gimnaziu). This is because the last compulsory teaching of the civics discipline occurs at this educational stage.

While drawing from a larger research project which includes analyses of policy documents, curricula and textbooks, this particular paper will focus on school-level mechanisms of ethnic identity construction. These will be probed through participant observation and conversation analysis methodology, and particularly through the use of "membership categorization devices" analysis in classroom interaction - a previously unexplored method for Romanian educational studies.

Symbolic Boundaries and Status Transformation: Explaining the Decline of Post-Civil War Civic Opportunities among African Americans, 1865-1905

Smith, Christi

*Sociology, Indiana University
Mannheim, Germany*

Keywords

culture, race, symbolic boundaries, transformations

Once a group succeeds to attain full legal rights and equality and obtains political power through office-holding, what mechanisms allow for the retrenchment of status attainment? After the end of bond slavery in the United States, African American political representation reached a pinnacle during the Reconstruction Era (1865-1877). The number of African Americans in the U.S. House and Senate was not again repeated until 1970, and the number of African Americans represented in certain state legislatures has never been repeated. Yet within a few short years African Americans were once again denied the vote, experienced profound status displacement, and decline in economic conditions. Using independently collected archival data, I construct a field of possibilities and suggest that three possible models of racial organization existed in American society after the civil war. I compare media data, political representation records from the State and Federal levels (e.g. State Legislatures and the U.S. Congress) for support and attitudes towards the various models of race-relations. Finally, I look to three environments in which these models (Preference to Whites, Race-Neutral Equality, and Preference to African Americans) were tested. I find that a confluence of cultural factors ? Northern ambivalence, African American migration to the North and West, and the rise of new immigrant groups to the Northeast and California - produced a challenge to the postbellum status politics and resulted in a revival of Anglo-Saxon heritage movements which triumphed over legal-political rights. Finally, I follow in Roger Brubakers' suggestion that we challenge notions of groups as a "putative thing in the world" and look to organizational actors who benefit from ethnic splintering. To this end, I show that ethnic entrepreneurs in the South were able to successfully lobby for a division of "the South" into a typology of Southern groups (the Southern oligarchy, "poor white trash" and redeemable "Appalachia") which ultimately enabled the redemption of the white South. The case of Southern whites and African Americans provides an important portal through which to understand the ways in which the production of cultural meanings of groups, racial or ethnic, can usurp legal and political designations.

The conflict between autonomy and adjustment - a source of intolerance?

Schmid, Veronika

department of sociology, Philipps-University Marburg Marburg, Germany

Keywords

xenophobia, racism, Prejudice, derogation of outgroups, vignettes

Recent empirical analyses show that people who hold prejudices against one outgroup are likely to be prejudiced against other outgroups, too. But why do persons who discriminate against homosexuals also hold negative attitudes against Muslims, migrants, homeless, and disabled people? In the present contribution, one possible explanation for the phenomenon of "group-focused enmity" is suggested.

The core idea of group-focused enmity is that different types of prejudice (e.g. racism, xenophobia, islamophobia, anti-Semitism, sexism, homophobia) are interrelated and constitute a personality syndrome. The tendency towards hostile attitudes against several outgroups stems from the perennial conflict between the individual's very own needs for autonomy and society's demands to adjust oneself. Facing minorities or nonconformist groups one becomes aware that the conflict between the individual's and the society's needs is not that irrevocably fixed as it seems to be. Dropouts, homosexuals, migrants (who want to immigrate in order to start a new life), Muslims or Jews (who indicate with their clothing a nonconformist way of life) suggest that the conflict between individual and society can be dealt with differently. This insight might lead to an aggressive reaction towards members of nonconformist groups.

Results from a vignette based online-study and a hitherto unfinished qualitative follow-up study designed to analyze the phenomenon of "group-focused enmity" will be presented. In the vignettes employed in both studies a protagonist is involved in a conflict between his/her own need for self-realization and the demands to adjust himself/herself. The story is interrupted and the respondents are asked to rate the sympathy of the protagonist and to give an advice how to behave. Then, the story goes on and the respondent is informed about the protagonist's decision and its consequences. The following factors are systematically varied: the protagonists group membership (majority/minority), his or her decision (for or against/adjustment), and the consequences of the decision (positive/negative).

The paper depicts the idea of "group-focused enmity", presents first empirical results and sketches the model's potential for the analysis of contemporary forms of discrimination across countries of the European Union.

The Dutch Paradox: antisemitism in a globalising context

Gans, Evelien

History, Netherlands Institute for War Documentation (NIOD) & University of Amsterdam Amsterdam, The Netherlands

Keywords

secondary antisemitism, goyish envy, Jewish narcissism, fatal triangle of antisemitism, antizionism and criticism of Israel

In this paper I will explore The Netherlands as a case-study of contemporary antisemitism in a (Western)European, globalising context. The contrast between the image of Dutch tolerance and the high number of Jewish deportees (75 % of 140.000) during World War II has created the notion of the Dutch paradox. In 1945, antisemitism burst into the open. Apart from the German propaganda, main causes were the mechanism of blaming the victim and the economic and social competition regarding reclaimed houses, jobs and properties. Then antisemitism became taboo, finding a counter pole in feelings of guilt and shame. From the sixties, the Shoah became the key element of the Dutch commemoration of World War II.

In the eighties, however, voices started to rise against the dominant narrative of World War II, and the central position of the Shoah. Jews were accused of monopolising suffering, a form of "secondary antisemitism". In 1984, the filmmaker and columnist Theo van Gogh started his crusade against the "commemoration day-industry". In (popular) academics, the historian Chris van der Heijden initiated, in Grijs verleden (Grey past; 2001), an equalising historiography of World War II of which the quintessence is that "the story of the war made the war worse than the war has been". With regard to the Holocaust commemoration and to Israel (and its repressive policies towards the Palestinians), goyish envy and Jewish narcissism clashed. A declining identification with Israel was countered by a growing identification with the Palestinians on the part of the (radical) Left and the immigrant - mainly Muslim - communities. The fatal triangle of antisemitism, antizionism and criticism of Israel shook. At schools for lower secondary professional education Shoah-education became problematic because mainly migrant pupils had learned at home that "Jews" were "perpetrators", not "victims". In 2003 a local commemoration committee refused to pay special attention to the Holocaust, out of fear for protests from the immigrant community. In his letter to Hirsi Ali, Mohammed Bouyeri, the Moroccan-Dutch Muslim extremist who murdered Theo van Gogh, applied anti-Jewish Islamite texts to (Jewish) Dutch politicians and administrators, an aspect which got little attention.

The Financial Crisis, Anti-Semitism and Racism

Globisch, Claudia

*Department of Sociology, University of Leipzig
Leipzig, Germany*

Keywords

Interpretation of the financial crisis, economic crisis, racism, anti-Semitism

The question of whether the current "financial crisis" has effects on anti-Semitism and racism is related to several dimensions of research: Either it has to do with the frequency, i.e. is there an increase or decrease in the number of anti-Semitic and racist statements, positions or crimes? Or it has to do with the quality, i.e. have anti-Semitism and racism changed since the financial crisis began? How do they refer to the financial crisis and is the crisis interpreted in an anti-Semitic or racist way?

In order to analyze the connection between the financial crisis and anti-Semitism or racism, it seems prudent to start with an examination of the different ways of interpreting the crisis currently being expressed. This leads to the questions of whether - and by which actors - the crisis is being interpreted in an anti-Semitic or racist way, and which interpretations of the crisis can be tied into an anti-Semitic position.

I will first analyze the current definition of the crisis in different political spectrums in Germany and then examine them in terms of their possible anti-Semitic and/or racist argumentation in comparison to their arguments before the financial crisis in order to make a statement about a shift or change.

My first hypothesis is that the current financial crisis brings anti-Semitic interpretations of crises up to date, but these do not differ from the anti-Semitic interpretations of crises from before the financial crisis. The second thesis - and also the explanation for hypothesis 1 - is that anti-Semitism can always be understood as a way to interpret crises in the sense that it "calls for community" (Vobruha) and attributes all negative effects of society to particular representatives that can be identified with the abstract side of capitalism. The basis for this is a particular kind of "critique" of capitalism. Anti-Semitic argumentations are more suited for the affirmation of a specific national construction of community than racist argumentations are due to the specificities of the anti-Semitic Weltdeutung (interpretation of the world).

The Impact of the Arab/Islamic Discourse on Antisemitism on the International Perceptions of Islamophobia and Racism

Webman, Esther

*Stephen Roth Institute for the Study of Antisemitism and Racism and the Dayan Center, Tel Aviv University
Tel Aviv, Israel*

Keywords

racism, antisemitism, Islamophobia

The heated public debate which erupted in the wake of the one-day conference on "The Concept of the Muslim Enemy - The Concept of the Jewish Enemy," held in December 2008 by Berlin's Center for Research on Antisemitism, brought to the fore the controversial issue of the equation between Islamophobia and Antisemitism. The equation is false, giving legitimacy to a bogus term and ignoring the rising tide of antisemitism in Europe and particularly in the Arab/Muslim world, which poses a threat to the Jewish communities as well as to the existence of Israel, it had been claimed.

Whereas the term "antisemitism" is an old term, "Islamophobia" is a relatively new one, although Christian-European fear of Islam existed since its inception. The term denoting "hostility toward Islam and Muslims that tends to dehumanize an entire faith, portraying it as fundamentally alien and attributing to it an inherent, essential set of negative traits," was coined in the West in the 1990s in view of the growing Muslim communities that seemed to resist integration and to suffer from discrimination. But, only after 9/11 and subsequent terrorist attacks and events, such as the riots in France and the Danish cartoon affair, it assumed its full meaning.

This paper intends to explore the relationship between the two terms as seen from the Arab/Muslim point of view. It will throw light on the Arab/Muslim discourse on antisemitism and examine major UN and EU resolutions for combating racism, Islamophobia and antisemitism, to establish that this discourse had a strong impact on shaping the term "Islamophobia" and filling it with content, while attempting to deflate "antisemitism" from its meaning and narrow the definition of racism.

The Left, the Holocaust and Genocide - on some Problems with no taking Anti-Semitism Seriously (enough)

Spencer, Philip

*Faculty of Arts and Social Science, Kingston University
London, Uk*

Keywords

genocide, anti-Semitism, Israel, holocaust

Before and during the Holocaust, no serious effort was made by left-wing theorists or organisations to focus centrally on the radical character of Nazi anti-Semitism. Part of this failure was due to a reluctance to take seriously the overtly genocidal element of this ideology and the accompanying expressions by the Nazi elite of genocidal intentions. After the Holocaust, this failure has been hidden and perhaps compounded by an insistence on the solely universalist lessons of the Holocaust which has produced an arguably distorted collective memory on the left of that catastrophe. This has had consequences for developing coherent and effective strategies both for confronting anti-Semitism after the Holocaust and, paradoxically, for responding to the recurring threat of genocide since that most radical case (to date). If anti-Semitism is not seen as central to the Holocaust, then it becomes hard to explain why it was Jews who were the over-riding target, other than reductively and instrumentally as "scapegoats" (an argument sharply criticised by Hannah Arendt many years ago). Equally, what was particular about the Jewish experience may then become "lost" in a more general narrative of destruction, in which what was actually genocidal is no longer clear. The reluctance to focus centrally on what was radical about Nazi anti-Semitism can make it hard to understand the legacy it bequeathed (in ideology and discourse), how later anti-Semites are able to draw effectively upon this legacy, and to combat them as they do so. But this may be related to an inability to see what was actually genocidal in the Holocaust, and what is specific to genocide as such (as opposed to other very serious forms of human suffering). This can result in deeply misleading parallels being drawn (as in recent debates over Israel's action in Gaza) which appear to simultaneously underestimate what genocide really means and to allow for the resurgence of particular anti-Semitic projections in which Jews become blamed for committing the very crime which they themselves (previously) suffered.

The Livingstone Formulation: the defensive counter-accusation that a charge of antisemitism is made dishonestly by the "Israel Lobby" in order to de-legitimize criticism of Israel

Hirsh, David

*Sociology, Goldsmiths, University of London
London, UK*

Keywords

anti-Semitism, antisemitism, Livingstone Formulation, conspiracy, criticism of Israel

Ken Livingstone wrote: "for far too long the accusation of antisemitism has been used against anyone who is critical of the policies of the Israeli government". [1]

The Livingstone Formulation is a common and ad hominem response to an accusation of antisemitism. A substitute for an attempt to consider or to rebut the substance of an accusation of antisemitism, it functions instead to neutralize it by ascribing malicious motivation to the person who raises the issue of antisemitism. It is a rhetorical device which treats disproportional, irrational or phobic hostility to Israel as though they were criticism of Israeli policy. It can also conflate antisemitism, variants of the blood libel and/or variants of conspiracy theory into criticism of Israeli policy.

While antisemitism is often not produced self-consciously, the Livingstone Formulation accuses the person who raises the issue of antisemitism of doing so dishonestly and self-consciously rather than mistakenly. It claims that the accuser knows that their accusation is false but makes it anyway. Since many apparently unconnected people are accused of this same dishonesty, the charge is a charge of Jewish or "Zionist" conspiracy.

This paper will present and analyse a large number of instances of the Livingstone Formulation, demonstrating that its key elements, (a) conflation of all kinds of hostility into "criticism" and (b) collective 'Zionist' dishonesty in the malicious use of the charge of antisemitism, are often present in public discourse around that proportion of antisemitism which is related to disproportional hostility to Israel.

[1] Ken Livingstone, "An attack on voters' rights", The Guardian, Wednesday 1 March 2006, London, <http://www.guardian.co.uk/politics/2006/mar/01/society.london>, downloaded 4 March 2009

The persistence of racial and ethnic taxonomies: pragmatism and risk

Machado, Nora

*CIES/ISCTE Center for Research and Studies in Sociology, ISCTE Lisbon University Institute
Lisboa, Portugal*

Barros, Vitor

Department of Portuguese and Brazilian Studies, King's College London London, United Kingdom

Keywords

race, ethnicity, racial indicators, taxonomies

Why does the widespread use of racial categories persist? How to explain their resilience? Even when essentialist definitions of race have long been scientifically and -- most often -- politically discredited, racial classifications are still commonplace in much scientific research and policy analysis - sometimes in the guise of ethnicity --, and in everyday private vocabularies.

The paper argues that there are at least three major factors that help explain the persistence and use of racial/ethnic categories:

(1) The institutionalization of racialized taxonomies systems in biomedicine especially epidemiology, demography, sociology (e.g., survey research), forensics, public administration -- with substantial variation and inconsistency in the different domains -- extends to professional associations, journals, funding agencies which operate "as if" the dimension(s) of race/ethnicity is real "naturalized." And the institutionalization is backed up by the authority of science, often through quantification and statistical analysis.

(2) Cognitive order and the reduction of complexity. Part of the "calculative rationality" in modern society works with racial/ethnic categories as "independent variables" in models for explaining behavioral patterns and deviance as well as disease patterns. Also, such categories are used as policy variables (to be dealt with, managed), that is, they become "dependent variables" in legal, policy, and administrative systems.

(3) Related to the previous point (2) is the use of racial/ethnic categories as flawed proxies or surrogates for what cannot be readily observed or measured, whether biological or genetic variation or complex psychological or sociological background variables.

In helping to establish and maintain cognitive and social orders, racial/ethnicity category systems -- like other systems such as age, weight, gender, educational level, etc -- address and reduce risks (whether such risks as exclusion, disease, deviant behavior). At the same time, the systems are risky themselves in that they reify and naturalize -- and help maintain -- racial categorization and provide stuff for pernicious mills to grind.

The Role of the Media in Spreading Prejudice

Comini Cesar, Maria Eugenia

Sociology, Universita degli Studi di Urbino Carlo Bo Pesaro, Italy

Wanderley Junior, Bruno

Law, Universidade Catolica de Minas Gerais Belo Horizonte, Brazil

Keywords

Brazilians, Prejudice, Stereotypes

The European Union, established by the Treaty of Maastricht, represents an economical and political union of 27 member states. Through the creation of the single market almost 500 million people got to know the freedom of movement and the possibility to reach higher life standards. Most countries adopted the same currency in order to facilitate the commercial activities and this relocation of its population.

Even though Europeans citizens have the legal right to move anywhere they want within the European borders, the phantom is not illegal immigration anymore, but the prejudice they are exposed to, sometimes even stimulated by the governments and the media. The notion of the nation state has not been overcome yet, even though it contradicts the idea of the European Union in its essence. Home should be the whole continent and not only a persons' national state.

Nowadays Italy has been living a drastic moment in what concerns immigration and the prejudice that it involves. Crimes happen at all times in big cities, but the repercussion media gives about the nationalities of the criminals, especially when the crime is committed by a Rumanian, is so evident in certain circumstances that it leads to the sad phenomena of xenophobia.

Thus, the media has been promoting a lot on damage to the Rumanians' image and creating the stereotype that leads to urban violence and exclusion.

This article is focused on identifying the role of the media in the spread of prejudice and the creation of stereotypes that damage the European "dream" to create a single citizenship and the real mobility of people.

The United Nations, Israel and the Jews

Doell, Peter

Behavioral Science, Ambrose University College Calgary, Canada

Keywords

antisemitism, United Nations, Jews, Justice

The Jewish people have suffered centuries of persecution wherever they have taken up residence. In spite of the lessons presumably learned from the Nazi holocaust, and the commitment made by both individual nation-states and by international bodies such as the League of Nations and its successor, the United Nations, Jewish people individually and collectively have been victimized by antisemitism and systemic racism. In this paper a case will be made that people of Jewish ethnicity have been scorned and vilified for no other apparent reason than that they are Jews. It will be demonstrated that, not only have international legal and corporate bodies that have the moral obligation to ensure justice for all peoples not protected Jews, they have abetted racism and antisemitism through resolutions that have had the effect of encouraging racism against Jews as a racial and religious minority. It will be argued that the United Nations has been co-opted by nation-states with a history of opposing the state of Israel, and that it has drafted resolutions that are de facto instruments promoting racism and antisemitism. That is, U.N. policies that favor nation-states opposed to Israeli statehood confuse and conflate Israeli government actions and foreign policy with Jewish people more broadly. It will be argued further that governments that were instrumental in partitioning Palestine at the end of World War II set the tone for geopolitical disdain for Jews by not honoring commitments made to Israel, and thus have contributed to that international disdain. The paper will draw attention to the continuation of antisemitic acts in Europe and question whether governments take seriously their obligation to protect their citizens of Jewish descent. It will call on the United Nations to stop its abetting of governments antagonistic to Israel in their efforts to demonize Jews through U.N. resolutions that have the effect of encouraging antisemitism via resolutions that conflate Israeli foreign policy with Jews as a religious and ethnic group.

Theorising Race, Ethnicity and Racialisation: Changing Research Agendas

Solomos, John

*Sociology, City University London
London, England*

Keywords

race, ethnicity, racialisation, racism

This paper will explore current theoretical debates about how we can analyse processes of racial and ethnic formation and the implications of these debates for how we research contemporary societies. In particular the paper will develop a critical engagement with which the concept of racialisation has been utilised to analyse these processes, drawing on research about the development of new migration processes and political debates about the position of minority communities in contemporary European societies. In particular the focus of the paper will be on the debates that we have seen around these issues during the current decade. The paper will suggest that we need to engage in a process of critical rethinking about what it is that we research, combined with empirically focused research on how questions about race and ethnicity are experienced in specific situations and locations. It will be argued that such research will need to focus on both national and global processes in order to engage with the transformations that we are going through at the present time in this field.

Tolerance is not enough: Why Ethnic Relations Theory needs a sociological concept of respect

Schirmer, Werner

*Department of Sociology, Uppsala University
Uppsala, Sweden*

Hamann, Linda

*Department of Sociology, Uppsala University
Uppsala, Sweden*

Reich, Wendelin

*Department of Sociology, Uppsala University
Uppsala, Sweden*

Keywords

racism, tolerance, Ethnic Relations, respect

Many immigrants in European societies experience that their cultural habits or their physical appearance are tolerated but not respected. Policy programmes try to improve this situation by enacting laws against discrimination and racism as well as by campaigning for more respect. We argue that many of these attempts are likely to fail, as they build upon a semantic confusion of respect and tolerance. Even in academic debates on racism and ethnic relations, these concepts are often defined in a circular manner.

In this paper, we present a sociological theory of respect that does justice to the inherent differences in the concepts of respect and tolerance. Our empirical data, taken from survey experiments, interviews and focus groups, reveal two dimensions regarding the relation between respect and tolerance. The first dimension refers to a semantic and hierarchical difference. Whereas tolerance means passively putting up with a person even if one actually dislikes her, respect implies an active submission to the other's agency. To respect someone means treating her as an agent worthy of consideration. Thus, tolerance is a prerequisite for respect, but the converse does not hold.

The second dimension is characterised by the opposing poles of (social) communication and (psychological) attitudes. The two are logically ? but not necessarily empirically ? independent. Although one can have a disrespectful attitude towards a person, one still can show respect towards her in concrete social interactions. Whether disrespectful behaviour relies on corresponding underlying racist attitudes or not can, therefore, not be inferred from the behaviour alone.

In sum, we believe that research on ethnic relations and racism can gain from a sociological theory of respect. It can explain why people are not satisfied with being merely tolerated. The insight that someone who demands respect wants to be considered as an agent can direct policy-making, including policy oriented at decreasing paternalism and increasing empowerment. Furthermore, our distinction between attitudes and communication suggests that it might be an effective first step in the fight against racism to make people change their disrespectful behaviour, even if this change is initially not accompanied by a corresponding change in attitudes.

Towards a Sociology of Racist Humour

Weaver, Simon

*Sociology, University of Bristol
UK,*

Keywords

comedy, Humour, Rhetoric, Racist Humour

Sacha Baron Cohen's performance characters Ali G and Borat, and the satirical cartoons of the Prophet Muhammad in the Danish newspaper Jylland-Posten, highlight how the debate on humorous and satirical "race" and ethnic representation is increasingly relevant in the European public sphere. Such examples often have very serious consequences that require sociological attention. Thus racist humour has become the focus of argument and debate in recent times, with issues of acceptability, offense and censorship very much at the fore. Despite this, there has been little research into racist humour or the issues surrounding it. This paper will provide a discussion of the theory and method of studying "race" humour sociologically, drawing on the particular examples of Sacha Baron Cohen's characters and the Jylland-Posten cartoons. I argue that racist, "race" and ethnic humour and comedy, far from being an insignificant or harmless form of communication, can act as a rhetorical device for any number of discursive positions, and thus often forms a significant communicative tool for these positions.

Understanding expressions of anti-immigration, xenophobia and racism in observing the changes in the work field.

Mileti, Francesca Poglia

*Département des Sciences des Sociétés, des cultures et des religions, Université de Fribourg
Fribourg, Switzerland*

Keywords

xenophobia, racism, anti-immigration

This presentation is related to a European research project which involved 8 European countries aimed to explore the link between socio economic changes and right wing populism and extremism (SIREN, Socio Economic Change, Individual Reactions and the Appeal of the Extreme-Right, FP6). The results are based on the analysis of empirical data provided by close to 300 in-depth qualitative interviews and a phone survey (5,800 people). We will show how experiences in the employment system and working life, the threat of social decline and precarious living conditions have made people receptive to xenophobia, nationalism and racism. In trying to give sense to their every day life the European we interviewed depicted the immigrants (labelled with negative items like "scroungers" "bogus refugees") as the main figures of the negative socio-economic change. These exclusive attitudes which aim to mark the distinction between the national group and the immigrants are not specific to people from the lower class (the so-called "losers of the modernity") but also present in individuals belonging to the upper class who try to understand the changing society. Differences between countries result from different aspects of socioeconomic change experienced, but also from the agendas of the various right-wing populist or extremist parties. The consequences of the reunification played a role in Germany, religion were a central theme in France and refugees from the Balkans dominate the debates in Austria. While in Denmark and Belgium the deterioration of welfare provisions was strongly linked with the issue of immigration, the major issue in Italy seems to be the combination of high levels of insecurity and a distrust and disenchantment with politics. The case of Switzerland will be taken as an empirical case to show how xenophobia and racism (historically supported by extreme right parties and movements) have been institutionalised and are now present - more or less explicitly - in the program of the SVP party. Having stated a lack of empirical researches addressing the link between socio-economic changes and anti-immigration ideas, we will propose a few concepts that allow understanding the process between the structural level and the psycho-sociological one.

Understanding the expressions of xenophobia and racism in observing the changes in the work field (European countries and Switzerland).

Poglia Mileti, Francesca

*Dept. Sciences des sociétés des cultures et des religions, University of Fribourg
Fribourg, Switzerland*

Keywords

xenophobia, neoracism, socio-economic changes, right wing populism, individual expressions

This presentation is related to a European research project which involved 8 European countries aimed to explore the link between socio economic changes and right wing populism and extremism (SIREN, Socio Economic Change, Individual Reactions and the Appeal of the Extreme-Right, FP6). The results are based on the analysis of empirical data provided by close too 300 in-depth qualitative interviews and a phone survey (5,800 people).

We will show how experiences in the employment system and working life, the threat of social decline and precarious living conditions have made people receptive to xenophobia, nationalism and racism. In trying to give sense to their every day life the European we interviewed depicted the immigrants (labelled with negative items like scroungers, bogus refugees) as the main figures of the negative socio-economic change. These exclusive attitudes which aim to mark the distinction between the national group and the immigrants are not specific to people from the lower class (the so-called losers of the modernity) but also present in individuals belonging to the upper class who try to understand the changing society.

Differences between countries result from different aspects of socio-economic change experienced, but also from the agendas of the various right-wing populist or extremist parties. The consequences of the reunification played a role in Germany, religion were a central theme in France and refugees from the Balkans dominate the debates in Austria. While in Denmark and Belgium the deterioration of welfare provisions was strongly linked with the issue of immigration, the major issue in Italy seems to be the combination of high levels of insecurity and a distrust and disenchantment with politics. The case of Switzerland will be taken as an empirical case to show how xenophobia and racism (historically supported by extreme right parties and movements) have been institutionalised and are now present - more or less explicitly - in the program of the SVP party.

Having stated a lack of empirical researches addressing the link between socio-economic changes and anti-immigration ideas, we will propose a few concepts that allow understanding the process between the structural level and the psycho-sociological one.

Universities, Anti-Semitism, and "Reasonable" Perceptions of Hostility

Klaff, Lesley

*Law, Sheffield Hallam University
Sheffield, United Kingdom*

Keywords

anti-Semitism, University, Hostile Environment

The paper begins with an exploration of the right to freedom of expression and the right to political protest in post-Holocaust European society. The paper then considers to what extent S3A (1) The Race Relations Act 1976 (Amendment) Regulations 2003 imposes on Britain's universities the duty to ensure a work-place that is free of hostility towards Jewish academics, thereby imposing limits on these classic liberal freedoms of expression and protest. To explore this, the paper examines the statutory test for the creation of a "hostile environment" and the meaning of "reasonable" for the purposes of the statutory section, and considers whether anti-Zionist rhetoric and discourse on campus "reasonably" creates a "hostile environment" for Jewish academics in the context of university life. The paper asks whose responsibility it is to define "hostile environment" and asks what constitutes "reasonable" in terms of perceiving an environment as hostile? The paper answers the question by presenting three possible structures for deconstructing / reconstructing "hostile environment" and "reasonable": a legal structure which considers the place and effect of electronic media and blogs in the working environment; a structure based on narrative and phenomenology which offers personal testimony and experience; and a hybrid structure which demonstrates that the experience of Jews in Europe is inexorably shaped by both holocaust legacy and resurgent anti-Semitism and that, therefore, "reasonable" and "hostile environment" has a specific meaning with respect to Jewish perceptions.

RN32

Political Sociology

"The Evil Other": European democracies and the challenge of radical right-wing populism - The Swedish example

Fryklund, Björn

Department of IMER, International migration and Ethnic Relations, MIM, Malmö Institute for Studies of Migration, Diversity and Welfare Malmö, Sweden

Keywords

Challenge to liberal democracies, Swedish Democrats, Europe and Sweden, Mistrust of foreigners, Radical right-wing populism

Liberal democracies in Europe are facing a new challenge. Parties belonging to the radical right-wing party family have gained more political influence. Sweden is, in this context, no exception. Sverigedemokraterna (Swedish Democrats), the Swedish version of radical right-wing populism, is at the moment the largest political party outside the Swedish parliament. The success of Sverigedemokraterna implies a discussion on how the Swedish political system handles the presence of radical right-wing populism. The purpose of this paper is to discuss the relationship between radical right-wing populism and the democratic institutions in Europe generally and in Sweden particular. The paper shows how Sverigedemokraterna is used as a marker by the Swedish political establishment; the party has become associated as something other parties do not want to be connected to. Sverigedemokraterna is being perceived as "the Evil Other", the pariah and is used as an instrument for the other political parties in order to distance themselves from each other. The existence of radical right-wing populism within the European political systems implies a thorough discussion on how to handle this existence in relation to the basis and values of the modern European democratic institutions. Regardless of whether Sverigedemokraterna are represented at the national level in Sweden or not, the fact remains that right-wing populist parties constitute a constant and definite part of today's European political scene - something that also either directly or indirectly affects Sweden's political agenda. As Sweden is a part of Europe, the European debate can also have repercussions for the Swedish political climate ? as a member of the EU Sweden can be compelled to align with issues discussed and debates undertaken in connection with European collaborations. The question is therefore how European democracies ought to react and act when right-wing populist parties not only make their appearance but also firmly establish themselves on the political stage. Should these parties be invited to actively participate in the democratic system so that their arguments can thereby be addressed and challenged? Or is it better to marginalize and isolate them and in this way exclude them from participation in the democratic process?

A civil society in an uncivil territory? The participation of French suburban NGOs to local policymaking

Blatrix, Cécile

*Political Science - CERAL, AgroParisTech - University of Paris 13
Paris, France*

Beauzamy, Brigitte

Law and Political Science - CERAL, University of Paris 13 Villetaneuse, France

Keywords

suburbs, local government, policymaking, NGOs

The French "banlieues" have acquired long before the unmatched riots of 2005 a reputation of a place outside regular politics. Ever since the first major riots at the beginning of the 1980s, the interpretation of such outbursts of violent protest as social movements in the making has faded to leave way to interpretations reading them as signs of a prevalent criminality or of ethno-religious tensions. Yet empirical evidence shows that the suburban civil society is rich and dense, and that far from being excluded from politics, it participates actively in the design and implementation of local policies, particularly in the fields of education, culture and the management of cultural diversity. The paper will examine how local NGOs frequently display a critical position vis-à-vis the ways suburban issues are framed in public discourses. Yet they are at the same moment obliged to cooperate with local authorities in a context in which the latter have gained considerable power in policymaking, which places the suburban civil society under tension.

A Marriage of Reason and Passion? The Co-operativeness of the Representative-Leading Official -Relationship in the Decision-making Work of the Finnish Local Government Committees

Klemelä, Juha

*Department of Sociology, Faculty of Social Sciences, University of Turku
TURKU, FINLAND*

Keywords

negotiated order, municipal selves, elected representatives, co-operation, appointed officials

The study is a micro sociological investigation into the relationship between the politically elected representatives and the leading office-holders in the committees in the Finnish local government. The aim is to deepen the comprehension of the interaction between the groups' members and to assess the quality of their co-operation.

The two actor types or groups are supposed to work in concert for the good of the municipality. Their interaction is not trouble-free, however. The office-holders seem to have a disproportionate amount of say. The representatives' significance and the municipal democracy in general have been questioned.

The two actor-categories are structurally differentiated. There is a set division of labor between them and the representatives are the formal leaders. The actors may also be, on the average, different in relation to their frames of reference, attitudes, language, and behavior.

The symbolic interactionist notion of role-identity is used to create a novel concept of municipal self for the actors and to fix their differentiation. Three identities are fitted to both organizational positions: the political, the professional, and the administrative. Also a set of role-focuses are used. The municipal actors' efforts to and success in maintaining prominent and situationally salient (sets of) identities (and focuses) guide their perceptions, emotions, action and interaction, including intergroup co-operation.

A model of co-operation applicable to the studied relationship is developed in the work. Co-operation is not just about consensus, but there can be beneficial dissentient elements in successful interaction also. Co-operation is studied as negotiated order and including the elements of task(s), agency, contact, and co-ordination, and the motivating forces of complementarity and supportiveness. The municipal government constitutes the arena for this co-operation as an amalgam of the bureaucratic, political and professional fields and frameworks of action.

An empirical tasks is to find out, how the perceived relationship fulfils the theoretical criteria of co-operation, and to establish, if the representatives and the leading officials experience their interaction as functional and beneficial for the municipality as a whole and for the actors themselves. The data comes from municipal committees and offices and consist of documents, observations, and interviews.

A model for failure and success for organising civic actors

Lappalainen, Pertti

*Department of Philosophy and Social Sciences, University of Jyväskylä
Jyväskylä, Finland*

Keywords

public involvement, organizing, internet, deliberative organizing

A model for failure and success for organising civic actors

The paper concentrates on the failure and success of civic actors from the viewpoint of organizing as well as on the role of the Internet in organizing and mobilisation. Two ideal types of organizing will be at the core of the paper.

The first one is called making organic, that is, civic actors are made organic parts of a harmonic whole. A certain kind of a functional role is given to civic actors in this model. An example of the model of making organic is public involvement which refers to listening of the actors of the civil society in public decision making. In this case the actors are invited to co-operate with public authorities. However, participating in this kind of organisational structures is often a kiss of death for civic actors because they are demanded restrained behaviour by the political institutions instead of spontaneous action typical to social movements.

The second one emphasises experience as a starting point of action of civic actors. Here ideas of John Dewey are utilized. My point is that civic activity is 'organised' around the problems the participants experience. The concepts of behaviour and action as well as empowerment and self empowerment/empowerment-as-enablement are essential for the failure and success of civic actors. In this second part of the paper an attention is paid to the meaning of the Internet as a means enabling new options for organizing. I call my proposal of successful organising the deliberative organizing to which active politicizing is included and which the Internet may contribute.

After the Industrial. Élite and the Governance of Change in the Northern Milan

Tosi, Simone

*Dipartimento di Sociologia e ricerca sociale, Università degli Studi di Milano Bicocca
Milano, Italy*

Vitale, Tommaso

*Dipartimento di Sociologia e ricerca sociale, Università degli Studi di Milano Bicocca
Milano, Italy*

Keywords

élite, industrial restructuring, community studies, growth machine, urban regime

Aim of this paper is the analysis of the local governance of the transformations occurred in the last two decades in an area - the Alto Milanese, in Lombardy - characterized by a strong industrial history, and currently experimenting a deep crisis phase.

Starting by the three focuses of "urbanization", "élite" and "industrialization" we will analyze how mutual influences between those factors contribute to the definition of governance and government of the area. Particular attention will be given to the role played by political, industrial and other "land based" élite in the social and economic development processes of the Alto Milanese area.

The definition and the role of (local) élite is a classical focus of many "traditions", both in political science and sociology, since the classical community studies and works about local political class.

Interest around the role of élites in economic and social development has re-emerged on the new impulse given by "growth machine" theories (Molotch 1976; Logan e Molotch 1987 e 1996). According to/with this theoretical frame business community is (one of) the main actor(s) working at promoting a development pattern, centred on intense land consumption.

Focusing on the case study of one of the earliest and celebrated textile factories of the area - the ?Manifattura Borletti?, actually closed after long declining years - we will discuss the decision making processes about the new destiny of the factory, and the destination for the buildings and for the area.

Through interviews, documents analysis and the examination of the public debate on the case study the paper will give accounts of how local political system has governed the area and which has been the role of local or external élites in this processes. We will also reflect on what "growth machine" and "urban regimes" theories - born in Anglo-Saxon cities - can say about Italian context and which differences should eventually be underlined.

Between European dress and national shirt - EU-correspondents as trailblazers of a European Public Sphere?

Offerhaus, Dr. des., Anke

*Communication studies, Institute of Media, Communication and Information (IMKI), University of Bremen
Bremen, Germany*

Keywords

European public sphere, EU-correspondents, EU-institutions, working conditions of journalists, structures of EU-newscoverage

Every day in Brussels hundreds of journalists gather at the "Rendez-vous de midi", the European Commission's press briefing. In the pressroom of the Berlaymont building, press officers and in many cases Commissioners themselves inform the international press corps of upcoming political plans and decisions. For the correspondents this event is not only an important source of information, it is a social event where they meet and discuss current political issues with their colleagues from other member states. It can therefore be considered the first instance of a European public sphere.

Yet the results of numerous content analyses show us that this European public sphere is not mirrored in national mass media. These national public spheres indicate processes of Europeanization, i.e. a growing interest in the European Union and its political actors. But transnational links between political actors of different European nations as well as between national media discourses are rare and a truly European perspective is unusual.

In this context the research question arises, what the preconditions of building a European public sphere are. Hence I analysed working conditions and working routines of Brussels' EU-correspondents in the area of conflict between European information access and national editorial offices. As the gatekeepers of EU-news and producers of EU-media coverage they have great influence and fulfil an important role in shaping national public spheres.

In my presentation I will focus especially on the information access and the assessment of the EU-institutions from the correspondents' perspective. Furthermore I will exemplify the structure of news production in relation with the national home offices. Based on results of an analysis of journalistic organisations and documents as well as on qualitative interviews this case study of German EU-correspondents and EU-journalism contributes to a deeper understanding of the emergence of Europeanizing trends in the political news coverage of national mass media.

Building the State through the Nation: Dual Citizenship Policies in Central and Eastern Europe

Culic, Irina

*Sociology and Anthropology, University of Windsor
Windsor, Canada*

Keywords

Central and Eastern Europe, dual citizenship, state building

Panel 1: Citizenship and Governance (Chair: Professor Virginie Guiraudon)

My paper provides a historical-sociological investigation of post-communist dual citizenship policies and practices in Central and Eastern Europe, proposing to conceive of citizenship as a means of state building. While dual citizenship policies in Western Europe generally took an inclusionary form, generated by the stringent need to incorporate and assimilate foreign immigrants, and to come to terms with their colonial and world expanding capitalist past, in Central and Eastern Europe they have essentially been differentialist, putting emphasis on ethno-cultural distinctions and privileged historical relationship with a state.

In an attempt to synthesize the dominant motives governing the strategies chosen by these states, in the second part of the paper dual citizenship practices are inventoried according to a typology that reveals important historically built and practically shaped variation and significance of the state rationalities involved.

Finally, an examination of asymmetries in dual citizenship, relating both to the eased and privileged access to citizenship to co-ethnics abroad or expatriates wishing to return, and to the degree to which states accept their emigrated citizens to become dual nationals, as compared to their reluctance to accept dual citizenship at naturalized citizens, aims to further the state building argument, and to point to the tensions inherent in dual citizenship legislation.

Can you afford to stay aside? Socioeconomic status, network position and structure in community involvement in a Romanian city

Hatos, Adrian

*Sociology and Social Work, University of Oradea
Oradea, Romania*

Keywords

Urban Governance, Community involvement, Social Networks, Social exclusion

Local policies can benefit greatly from various forms of informal governance that require citizen participation. The paper investigates the avenues of community involvement in the context of urban neighborhoods of blocks of flats built in Oradea (Romania) before 1990. Community involvement of families from 20 such neighborhoods (N=412 families) was modeled using multilevel regression techniques and including network measures. The analyzes confirm results of previous studies which have shown that, contrary to processes of mobilization in Western collectivities, where participation is positively correlated with degrees of social integration and measures of SES (the integration model), forms of involvement investigated in my paper should be understood as adaptations to situations of exclusion from delocalized networks of those with higher social status (the need model). We record thus, in post-socialist societies, the persistence of relevance of similarity networks, of bonding type, a situation that has been promoted also through the policies aimed at controlling social participation during the totalitarian communist regimes. The consequences of our results for understanding urban governance in Eastern Europe as well as recommendations for citizenship activation at local level are discussed in the final section of the paper.

Changes in euro-scepticism in the Netherlands between 1990 and 2007

Lubbers, Marcel

ERCOMER / ASW, Utrecht University Utrecht, The Netherlands

Jaspers, Eva

Sociology, Radboud University Nijmegen, The Netherlands

Keywords

attitude change, longitudinal design, euro-scepticism

Since the Maastricht Treaty of 1992, the host society of this treaty, the Netherlands, has witnessed largest change into more euro-scepticism among its inhabitants. Eventually, this has led to the Dutch no to the European constitution in the 2005 referendum. In this contribution we answer which social categories changed strongest in their euro-sceptic attitude. We test hypotheses from utilitarian, political and identity theories. We derive that in particular the lower educated became more euro-sceptic, which can be explained by either of the three theories. We test which of these approaches can interpret a larger change in euro-scepticism for the lower educated. For studying dynamics of euro-scepticism, most researchers have to rely on the repeated cross sections of the Eurobarometer. However, we re-approached in 2007 respondents that cooperated in a survey in 1990, creating a longitudinal design (n=420). In both panel waves respondents were questioned on their attitudes towards the European Union. We tested measurement equivalence over time, and assess to what extent the changes vary by educational levels, and whether the educational differences in the change in euro-scepticism are interpreted by the proposed explanations.

Citizens Participation: Practices, Powers, Subjects

Bifulco, Lavinia

*Sociology and Social Research, University of Milano-Bicocca
Milano, Italy*

Keywords

participation, citizenship, capabilities

In many European countries, citizens participation has become a central issue of institutional agenda. In public discourse it shows a high attractive capacity which is proportional to the wideness of its promises of change, regarding both the improvement of democratic process and the development of conditions of well-being of inhabitant, citizens and communities. In a number of European cities practices of participation are promoted by public authorities in different domains: social inclusion, urban regeneration, local development, environment, health, etc.. There also (urban) experiences of participation that are activated "from below", thanks to self-organisation resources of local society and the way those resources are stimulated, reshaped and bounded.

Yet participation is a vague, polysemous concept. It deals with the heterogeneity of the modes which characterise national and local contexts and with the variety of procedures that differ from each other as for the actors they address, the forms of representativeness and the relationship with public authority.

The controversial issues raised in the debate tend to concentrate on several points. An important one concerns the relationship between the issue of participation and the objectives of social and redistributive justice. The scholars who work on the metamorphoses of the European welfare states focus their attention on changing patterns of social citizenship. Furthermore, significant problem derive from the gap between the attempts to improve democratic processes and the dynamics of the so-called "post-democracy".

From a more general point of view, some crucial questions are to be considered with regard to the capabilities for participation. Who are the subjects of participation? What are their powers and freedoms? How are these powers and freedoms developed?

The paper deals with these themes on the basis of some research carried out on practices of participation in European urban contexts.

It aims at putting and answering three main questions:

- a) What factors can explain different practices of participation?
- b) What relationship between political and social aspects of participation?
- c) What agency to participate in what?

Citizens, Migrants and Welfare Public Services in Spain: Researching the Daily Practice of Social and Economic Citizenship

Martín Pérez, Alberto

Institute for Policies and Public Goods, Spanish National Research Council (CSIC) SPAIN,

Keywords

Governance, citizenship, public services, Migration, Welfare State

This paper will show the first results of a research project on the daily practice of social and economic citizenship in welfare public services in Spain. It aims at analyzing the influence exerted over welfare public services by the settlement in Spain, in the last few years, of many foreign migrant workers who, once recognized their legal status within the country, have also been officially allowed social and economic citizenship.

The project aims at observing the daily functioning of these public services, specially taking into account the cross-relationship between Public Administration and its institutional organization, civil servants and the heterogeneous categories of users within these services. It focus on the differences in terms of treatment and social relations specially between citizens and foreigners. Likewise, the project aims at understanding the daily practice of welfare polices enacted in public services as a set of practices revealing the main features of the daily practice of social and economic citizenship in Spain.

The paper will explore the influence of individual experiences of the daily practice of policies and citizenship over social policy and immigration policy analysis and evaluation. Thus, current research focuses on the possibilities for immigrant and citizen participation in the transformation of public services, by valuing immigrants' and citizens' daily practices and experiences of their interaction with public services and civil servants. So that, the paper will picture the characteristics of immigrant and citizen participation in policy implementation and evaluation as a means of studying current participation in democracy framed by social and economic citizenship.

The project is based on a set of case studies of welfare public services in Spain: an office of the Social Security, an unemployment office and an office of the local social services. In each case, research develops ethnographic fieldwork which would provide evidence on the daily practice of social and economic citizenship continuously enacted by civil servants and users of public services.

Citizenship and nondiscrimination law in Europe: The limits of equality

Guiraudon, Virginie

*ceraps, cnrs
Paris, France*

Keywords

Migration, citizenship, mobility, Rights, equality

This paper addresses the issue of citizenship in both its vertical and horizontal dimensions id est its societal and legal/political dimensions The question of the border of the citizenry and who belongs to the community of citizens is of course at the heart of many debates as individuals such as international migrants live in several polities and add to the diversity of the body politic. As citizens should possess an equal status, issues of equality and fairness dominate. Yet the vertical dimension of citizenship the question of the source of authority that grants and guarantees rights and imposes duties is also important. These sources are changing today with devolution, the development of citizenship rights and non-discrimination law in the European Union. This leads in fact to a fragmentation of statuses as each level of government may dispense a different set of rights that individuals may or may not cumulate. The paper examines three major European developments in comparative perspective: the regime of free movers, EU equality law and the development of citizenship contracts, courses or tests for foreigners at the national level. Each corresponds to a different vision of citizenship and involve a different level of governance. I will focus on their consequences for debates about equality. In fine current EU developments have adopted a rights approach to equality while national governments' citizenship tests involve administrative discretion.

Citizenship Attribution in Western Europe: A Comparative Configurational Analysis (1985-2005)

Vink, Maarten

Political Science, Maastricht University Maastricht, The Netherlands

Keywords

comparative analysis, Immigration, citizenship

For panel on Citizenship and Governance (Guiraudon)

Abstract: Citizenship is an important organizing principle of political life. For individuals it is a status that creates a legal bond with a state and endows them with certain rights and obligations. For states, citizenship is an institution through which these associations of citizens perpetually reconstitute themselves. Within the European Union the competence to regulate the acquisition and loss of national citizenship, and thereby the access to Union citizenship, is still strictly tied to the national level. This paper studies how countries attribute citizenship and why they have done so in different ways. It uses data on citizenship legislation in fifteen European states that have recently become available from a large scale comparative study for the period from 1985 to 2005. The paper applies an innovative 'crisp-set' or Boolean comparative configurational approach to determine the causal influence of such factors as colonial history, size of immigrant populations, and the strength of rightwing populism.

Citizenship today: new challenges in a world of intensified migrations

Procacci, Giovanna

*Dept. of Social and Political Studies, University of Milan
MILANO, Italy*

Keywords

citizenship, migrations, policies

Citizenship today: new challenges in a world of intensified migrations.

Giovanna Procacci

ABSTRACT

Citizenship has been the main narrative describing the construction of political and social arrangements in modern societies, particularly in Europe. And yet it is nowadays criticized, described only as a new cleavage between citizens and non citizens, as such unable to sustain a tension towards community building. Other narratives have been proposed as more accurate to account for current socio-political transformations, particularly given the reduced role of national states. This paper aims at evaluating current critiques of citizenship by focussing on challenges raised by the growing impact of migration policies. A crossed analysis of the two sets of policies and their relations opens new insights over citizenship transformations. Citizenship is no longer viewed as an expansion of rights facilitating integration, rather as a pull factor contrasting with migration policies' restrictive orientation; symmetrically, citizenship seems to be less urgent in migrants' demands than other statuses, such as residence or permit of stay, in so far they give access to crucial rights. Against a prevailing trend to stress exclusive instead of inclusive features of citizenship, citizenship's and particularly social citizenship's capacity of social integration could help finding a different approach to migrations, less focused on control and more on actual integration of migrants in host societies.

Civil Society, migration and health: successful partnerships

Padilla, Beatriz

*-, CIES-ISCTE
Lisbon, Portugal*

Keywords

Civil Society, health & migration, successful partnership

The health of migrants seems to be a paradoxical case in Portugal. As most other fields go unnoticed for people to react and get organized, in the case of migration health many different types of organizations (NGOs, associations, foundations, etc.) have organized themselves to reach and provide services to migrants. Their strategies vary depending on the types of organizations, but on the overall, many partnerships among them and in articulation with the state, have been successful in providing services and serving migrants. What are the factors that influence the active role play by all these actors? What have been the flaws?

Complexity and governance in local partnerships: a case study of mutual observations of state and civil society

Ferreira, Silvia

*Sociologia, Faculdade de Economia da Universidade de Coimbra
Coimbra, Portugal*

Keywords

Civil Society, Governance, welfare, complexity, partnerships

As the borders between state, market and community as modes of coordination are being discursively and materially renegotiated, a new mode of governance is gaining prominence as a way to articulate relationships that are being restructured in the fields of welfare. This new governance mode is constructed as negotiation between autonomous interdependent agents from the state, market and civil society and has as one of its expressions local partnerships. Multiplying across European localities they are the focus of a new articulation between actors involved in the regulation, production, delivery and take up of welfare policies.

My presentation is based on a case study in England, drawn from my doctoral research on the relationship between multi-sectoral strategic partnerships and the third sector. From the analytical framework provided by theories of complexity, cybernetics and governance and focusing on the concepts of observation, second order observation, governance and governance failure, I explore the challenges brought by the new governance mechanisms, often described as network governance.

Observing the observations from which sectors' semantics strategically emerge and focusing on mutual observations between actors of the third sector and of the local partnership, I analyse the ways through which partnerships emerge as mechanisms for governing civil society while at the same time are particularly able to remain unobservable to civil society through displacement of observations of failure of the systems and organisations in it. However, similar strategies of are also identified in third sector networks and organisations when these strategically chose to remain invisible to any governor, both in the third sector and in the partnerships.

This paper, as the research from which it is drawn, aims to investigate the implications of the use of network governance in welfare in terms of the usual self descriptions of state and civil society and their relationship, while at the same time exploring a framework for observation of a world that increasingly describes itself as complex.

Convergences and divergences in the new local social policies: comparing Brussels and Montréal

Sacco, Muriel

Metices-Cena, Université libre de Bruxelles (ULB)

Bruxelles, Belgium

Keywords

Governance, networks, comparison, policy process, urban policies

The territorialization of the public intervention is transforming the decision making all around the world in several aspects. Since the end of the eighties, an increasing number of social and urban public policies in Western countries have targeted poor neighbourhoods of the inner cities. Smaller scales of intervention and concentration of resources are considered to be better tools to maintain social coherence of cities and improve social conditions of the inhabitants of these areas. Bottom up processes are promoted instead of top down decision. A better cooperation between institutional levels of governance and between private and public actors is another condition to improve the treatment of poor areas. These new social policies are oriented by a new paradigm which integrates the principles of governance and mean a transformation of most Welfare State.

The analysis of the implementation of these new social policies in several neighbourhoods of Brussels and Montreal can be very helpful to determine the effective changes in the decision processes. These two cities have very similar social, economical and demographical profiles, but have very different political systems. Both cities have been implementing these new social policies based on a territorialized action since the middle of the nineties. Brussels has a strong consociative tradition which gives a very little space to individual participation. While Montreal has experimented governance and citizenship participation since the sixties. The aim of the comparison is to highlight the differences and the similarities in the composition of the policy networks orientating these public policies and to determine the persistence of policy styles in the two cities and the adaptations that the implementation of these public processes has required. The presentation is based on a qualitative enquiry. Directed interviews and documentary sources are the main data sources used for this presentation.

Cultural and Political Identity of Europe and the Problem of Multiculturalism

Szahaj, Andrzej

Philosophy, Nicolaus Copernicus University Toru?, Poland

Keywords

politics, Multiculturalism, ethics, social practice, europe

The main thesis of the of the paper is that Europe is always a question of a will and imagination and not simply identification of features which just wait to be revealed. To put it in another way, Europe is always a certain construct which is built to fulfill some ethical and political interests. Such a construct is especially needed when a crisis concerning the relation between Europe (European culture) and some other regions (cultures) occurs. Author of the paper first tries to build such a construct of European culture, in order to confront it with the ideology and social practice of multiculturalism next. He presents some ethical and political dilemmas linked with the problem of alleged axiological equity of all cultures. (Such an equity lies at the bottom of ideology of multiculturalism). The main question which he puts is: how to make European culture and social practice as inclusive as possible without resignation of its ethical and political identity? He shows that making European culture maximally inclusive should not be identified with resignation of its ethical and political principles. In that sense he argues in favor of modest and ethically decent Eurocentrism.

Cultural Others in European Integration. A Sociological Perspective on New Modes of Governance, the European Commission, and European Civil Society

Bernhard, Stefan

Labour Market Policy, Institute for Employment Research Nürnberg, Germany

Keywords

New Modes of Governance, Social Policy, Civil Society, political sociology, European Integration

This paper contributes to the development of a political sociology of European Integration. It starts from the assumption that amidst the great variety of political science research sociology can make a genuine contribution if it draws on its rich theoretical traditions. In this spirit I analyse the activities of European Commission and European-level civil society actors in the area of social inclusion policy with a theoretical framework that combines Pierre Bourdieu's field analysis and John W. Meyer's World Polity approach (section 1). This perspective unveils new facets of the voluntary learning process between Member States called Open Method of Coordination (OMC). Instead of focussing on learning incentives and on problems of sanctions (as in orthodoxy of political analysis) the sociological approach puts the coordination procedure in a global context. It holds that the OMC transmits and amplifies World Polity content for EU Member States. The general principles of "equity" and "progress" are translated into concrete expectations triggering in particular the expansion of normative individual entitlements (section 2). Moreover, the OMC gives rise to a policy field, which attracts a great variety of actors from the European Commission to specialised civil society organisations such as the Federation of Homelessness in Europe (FEANTSA), the Anti-Poverty Network (EAPN) or Eurochild. As these actors engage in the policy field they show different (discursive and network) patterns of activity that can be grouped into five different strategies: conceptual entrepreneurship, knowledge production, fundamental criticism, detached observation and robust action (section 3). The sociological point here is that - to a greater or lesser degree - all strategies are eligible to symbolic effects as they interpret and spread World Polity ideas. Hence, civil society and European Commission can and do use the OMC as a means to appear as disinterested counsellors of Member States instead of as interested lobbyists in the multi-tiered system. In John W. Meyer terms we can say that these actors display features of Cultural Others (section 4).

The paper builds upon a qualitative network analysis and a qualitative content analysis. It presents results from my Ph.D., which I completed in December 2008.

Decent Democracy

Misztal, Barbara A.

*Sociology, University of Leicester
Leicester, UK*

Keywords

Recognition, DEMOCRACY, Justice, decent society, participation

The aim of the paper is to bring together the idea of decent society (Margalit 1996), the theory of recognition (Honneth 1995, 2003, 2007) in order to discuss whether a decent society is a necessary step on the way to a participatory democratic society. A decent society, according to Margalit (1996: 159) is a society that does not exclude any group of citizens from symbolic citizenship. "Citizenship in a decent society must be egalitarian in order not to be humiliating" (Margalit 1996:154). A decent society, that is, a society whose institutions do not humiliate people, is not necessarily a welfare society and it is unclear if a just (Rawlsian) society is necessarily also a decent society (Margalit 1996:246, 281). Honneth's theory of recognition, which stresses the universal aspiration for recognition, claims that understanding of justice must encompass two sets of concerns: a struggle over distribution and a struggle for recognition. It locates the core of all experiences of injustice in the phenomena of humiliation and disrespect: "the experience of a withdrawal of social recognition ought to be at the centre of meaningful concept of socially caused suffering and injustice" (Honneth 2003:132). Bringing together Margalit's (1996:157) idea that "humiliation is the rejection of legitimate encompassing groups" and Honneth's identification of a good society as a society in which individual has a real opportunity for full-self realization, allows us to see social participation through forms of mutual recognition as a goal for whose sake we should want to establish social justice. Thus, following Tocqueville's (1969:517) assertion that if "men are to remain civilized, the art of association must develop and improve among them" (1969:517), it can be argued that a decent society needs to be a participatory democracy.

Discourses of Society and the Politics of Cohesion

Dobbernack, Jan

Department of International Politics, Aberystwyth University Aberystwyth, Wales

Keywords

cohesion, Governance, liberalism, discourse

Over the last 15 years, a wide range of policy problems have emerged that are considered to be causally connected to processes of social fragmentation and to a lack of social cohesion. Crime, political disengagement and unrest, or the alleged breakdown of multiculturalism are brought into focus through the lens of social cohesion and addressed as a consequence of the failure of modern social arrangements to sufficiently hang together. This new problematisation of society can be witnessed across the OECD world and has prompted calls for new types of governance. More fine-tuned and more far-ranging measures are called for that are supposed to impact on societies' fabric and the moral outlook of a citizenry whilst, paradoxically, remaining committed to the liberal tenets of 'government at a distance'.

This paper will investigate the process in which social cohesion becomes a problem amenable to governmental intervention. With reference to policy agendas that accompany the British 'community cohesion', the French 'cohésion sociale' and the German 'Bürgergesellschaft' it explores how discursive struggles over society precede the discovery of new types of social governance. Thus, its overall aim is to point out how changing discourses on society provide knowledge-base and relevant expertise for, and are thus intimately linked to, new technologies of governance.

Ethnography of an Italian Self Managed Social Center: Everyday Forms of Mobilization and Resistance

barnao, charlie

*DOPES (DIPARTIMENTO DI DIRITTO DELL'ORGANIZZAZIONE PUBBLICA, ECONOMIA E SOCIETÀ), University of Magna Graecia, Catanzaro, Italy
catanzaro, italy*

Keywords

Ethnography, youth culture, resistance, mobilization

Ethnography of an Italian Self Managed Social Center: Everyday Forms of Mobilization and Resistance

This paper examines the Social Centers in Italy. These are groups or self managed communities (about 200 all over Italy) formed by non-institutional political activists coming from the no-global area (or rather new global, mostly students, unemployed young people). They occupy abandoned buildings where they organize political, social, and cultural activities.

The Self Managed Social Centers (CSOA) is a privileged place in which one can study the global/local interaction within a social, cultural, political environment where actors live and act: a) locally contextualising global conflicts/injustices b) globalising experiences and strategies for cultural action and political mobilization.

The data were collected as part of an ethnographic research (from April 2007 to now), still in progress, within the CSOA Bruno of Trento (Italian city of the northeast).

The picture that emerges is complex and varied. The CSOA appears to be of considerable strategic capabilities of adaptation and mobilization, large production capability and cultural innovation. The group of actors who manage the center is particularly heterogeneous and characterized by strong social differences (age, status, education, etc.). The group creates, owns, develops social capital which is quickly activated in times of high political conflict (local, national and global). The CSOA itself becomes a non-institutional place of cultural, social, political production. These initiatives create culture, as a result of a continuous interaction between tradition (mostly ideological elements) and innovation (mostly countercultural elements), and claim to represent new norms and values of reference

European Integration, Europeanized Equality Rights, and the People's Beliefs: Evidence from Germany

Lengfeld, Holger

Department of Sociology, University of Hagen Hagen, Germany

Gerhards, Jürgen

*Department of Sociology, Freie Universität Berlin
Berlin, Germany*

Keywords

citizenship, European Integration, Europeanized Equality Rights, Survey Research

We analyze how the EU has replaced the nationally-bounded concept of equality by a Europeanized idea of equality, and to what degree this concept is supported by the citizen's. Firstly, we use theoretical insights from T.H. Marshall who defines (national) citizenship as consisting of civil, political, and social rights. We show that the EU has gradually replaced this nation-state equality concept by a European citizenship status which consists of the right to free access to the national labor markets. This "freedom of movement"-rule includes additional rights connected to social security, and it guarantees a number of political rights, among others the right to vote and to stand as a candidate for municipal elections in the member state of residence.

We then analyze to what extent the people support the idea of Europeanized equality rights. Using data from two German surveys (2006, each N=1000) we ask to what extent respondents agree with a generalized rule that allows all EU-citizens, regardless of national origin, to have access to Germany's national labor market and social security system, and the right to vote and to stand as a candidate at municipal elections. On average, we find high support rates (from 52 to 82 per cent), varying on the type of right. Further one, we ask for differences in the respondent's acceptance of equality for the specific group of countries to which a foreign citizen belongs. The respondents are much more in favor of equal treatment of French than of Poles, followed by people from the EU's candidate Turkey. Nevertheless, we find high support for the three national groups to participate on scarce resources in Germany.

At least we analyze the social causes that influence attitudes towards the notion of a European-wide concept of equality. Regression analysis shows that attitudes towards Europeanized equality do not strongly depend on the respondent's socio-economic position or on his or her generalized values, e.g. political orientation and post-material values. In addition, the explained variance is consistently low.

Results show that social conflicts about migration processes within the EU are not very likely, given that migration rates will continue to remain low.

Europeanization of the Radical Right?

Globisch, Claudia

*Department of Sociology, University of Leipzig
Leipzig, Germany*

Keywords

right-wing EU-faction, right-wing radicalism, Europeanization

There are two events that are representative of the current political situation of the extreme right in Europe: the founding of the first radical right European parliamentary group "Identity, Tradition, Sovereignty" (ITS) in the European Parliament in September, 2007 and its breakup just two months later. The project, in which all major ultra-nationalist parties were involved, shows their common desire to cooperate on the European level. The breakup of the ITS so shortly after its establishment, due to tension between the Romanian and Italian representatives relating to assaults on Romanians in Italy, illustrates the fragile base of such a cooperation. Several aspects culminated in this event and deserve to be examined more closely: the nationally diverse organizational and ideological traditions of the radical right and their ability (as well as the limits) to network on a transnational level. Above all, the radical right really took shape on a European level in its manifestation as the ITS.

Especially in the context of a globalization of a radical right-wing discourse, the question is whether this also leads to an alignment or harmonization of previously nationally diverse right-wing ideologies. The analysis of the central semantics of right-wing "definitions of the enemy" and their respective self-images can shed light into these developments. Which majority society semantics - and also semantics from other radical groups - does the radical right pick up on and refer to? Where are the overlapping points and where can clear lines of differentiation be drawn?

Starting with the right-wing European party debates and their common EU-faction, this paper works out the commonalities and differences among the different (parliamentary) right-wing groups in Europe. The basis of this analysis is the programs of the parties involved in the EU-faction as well as the members of the EU parliamentary faction "independence and democracy" (2004-2009).

Euroscepticism in the Digital Public Sphere

Trenz, Hans-Joerg

*ARENA, Centre for European Studies, University of Oslo
Oslo, Norway*

Keywords

Media, internet, Public Sphere, political contestation, European Integration

Euroscepticism in the Digital Public Sphere

This paper relies on a comparative survey of media and public debates in which critical issues related to European integration are raised during European Parliamentary elections in spring 2009. Going beyond attitudinal and actor related studies of political parties, it proposes that research on Euro-scepticism can be advanced in two directions: First, it is proposed that Euro-scepticism should be understood foremost as a quality of a discursive formation on European integration and/or the European Union and its component policies, politics and institutions. This implies the need to reconstruct its narrative contents and to understand variances in the "scripts" of Euro-scepticism (ideological, national, etc.). Second, we propose to shed light on the competitive field, in which Euro-scepticism is "performed". This implies the need to relate the "players" of Euro-scepticism (the proponents of Euro-sceptic discourse and their opponents) to the potential audiences that pay attention and that applaud or boo the Euro-sceptic performance.

Framing vs. Deliberation: an Overlooked Challenge for Political Sociology?

Barisione, Mauro

*Department of Social and political Studies, University of Milan
Milan, Italy*

Keywords

consensus building, framing processes, perceived legitimacy, deliberative politics, Public Sphere

One of the most critical - and possibly overlooked - problems in contemporary political sociology lies in the junction between framing processes and deliberative politics. Both "framing" and "deliberation" appear as key concepts in the scholarly subfield combining political communication, democratic citizenship, and public opinion processes. In communicational terms, framing can be considered as the process by which an information source defines and constructs a social or political issue. The theory of deliberative politics posits that when participants in deliberative practices are provided with a balanced informational setting, the process will generate more informed opinions and policy outcomes. In relation to this critical junction between framing and deliberation, two opposite hypotheses can be sketched: 1) Deliberation affects framing. A deliberative context including cross-cutting discussion and heterogeneous perspectives is expected to moderate framing effects, rendering the participants' responses less vulnerable to elite-driven issue framings; 2) Framing affects deliberation. Deliberation organizers tacitly construct the discussion frame - and potentially influence the outcome - by selecting the legitimate viewpoints, defining the alternatives, emphasizing the relevant elements, and suggesting interpretive sets of connections among them. Among the unresolved questions emerging from this twofold relationship, the following can be mentioned: do competing frames affect polarization vs. consensus-building processes? How do different types of frames affect identity-based disputes? How do framing effects apply to individuals involved in group discussions, according to their social, political, and educational attributes? This theoretical paper aims to outline new conceptual and methodological tools for future research on the relationship between framing processes and deliberative politics in the contemporary public sphere.

From boom to bust: the impact of the economy on migration, and consequently integration, into Ireland

Schuppers, Nanette

School of Sociology, University College Dublin

Dublin, Ireland

Keywords

labour market, integration policy, migration control

Since the mid 1990s "Celtic Tiger" Ireland has received a considerable number of migrants, which was remarkable after a history of seeing Irish people leave the country in search of work. Although every study of migration in Ireland is hampered by the lack of trustworthy figures about migration, it is estimated that in 2006 migrants formed about 10% of the Irish population. In that year's census, the Central Statistics Office counted 420,000 non-Irish nationals in the Republic, of which 63,090 were from Poland. However, social researchers, community organisations and journalists refute the figures from the CSO and estimate that there were between 100,000 and 150,000 Poles in Ireland. The governmental figures differ from the commonly accepted figures as well. However, they seem to overestimate the number.

This paper will commence by explaining how the discrepancies in immigration figures could have emerged. Next, it will present a case study of Polish and Indian immigrants and discuss the reasons for migration. The majority of Indians are labour migrants, residing in Ireland on a work visa or work permit. A small percentage is in Ireland on a student visa or a dependent visa. Polish immigrants do not need a visa. As Ireland allowed free migration from the accession states from May 2004, they could travel to and work in Ireland freely since then. In addition, the paper will elaborate on the social and employment situation of these nationalities. Indian immigrants are mainly found in the IT sector and the healthcare sector and have often been recruited by Irish employers, whereas Polish migrants are mainly represented in building, manufacturing and sales and moved to Ireland without a specific job offer. All Indian migrants are proficient in the English language, whereas a considerable percentage of Poles have limited or no knowledge of the English language. Concluding, the paper will turn to the policies that the Irish government has put in place to control migration and facilitate integration. It will take into consideration the suddenly changed economic situation and the changing employment chances in Ireland and the consequences that has had for immigrants.

Gendering Community Elite Structures

Edling, Christofer

*Sociology, Stockholm University
Stockholm, Sweden*

Farkas, Gergei

*Department of Sociology, Stockholm University
Stockholm, Sweden*

Rydgren, Jens

*Department of Sociology, Stockholm University
Stockholm, Sweden*

Keywords

women, Social Networks, community elites

The research presented here studies gender differences within community elite structures, in a social network analytic framework. In any contemporary society women occupy merely a small minority of elite positions available, and female elites have often been found in a limited circle of institutional sectors. Furthermore, even the minority women who actually do successfully gain access to influential elite-positions are often assumed to have their factual influence circumscribed by mechanisms that render them marginalized and peripheral in male-dominated networks of informal influence-structures. Systematic evidence to support the latter view is however relatively scarce. The aim of the present study is to investigate the gender-dimension of community elite structures; from a perspective that juxtaposes female representation within the elite, with women's formal and informal structural positions in community decision-making networks. The study is empirically located in Sweden, a country characterized by a comparatively high proportion of elite positions in all major institutional sectors being held by women. The location therefore offers an optimal setting for empirical illumination of the relationship between women's formal representation and their informal access to decision making networks. The research draws upon data collected from a positional sample of community elites (n=298) in four strategically chosen Swedish municipalities. A wide variety of relational data on both formal and informal relations among the elites were solicited through personal interviews (83% response rate). The data was subsequently analysed with a broad selection of social network analytic tools. Results suggest that elite women in Sweden are not necessarily excluded from, or less central in the formal and informal networks of community decision-making than their male counterparts, although clearly gendered differences regarding male and female elite's positions within these networks are detectable.

Globalization and Populist Radical Right Parties in Europe: Austria, Denmark, Germany

Loch, Dietmar

*Département de Sociologie, Université Grenoble II
Grenoble, France*

Keywords

case studies, Globalization, new cleavages, populist radical right parties

Most studies on globalization or "denationalization" have analysed the new forms of national sovereignty and global governance. Research concerning the impact of globalization on political representation has not really developed as yet, and the impact on the changing party systems in European nation states even less so. Thus, most studies on populism and radical right parties in Europe remain within the framework of "national societies" and national cleavage structures. The main hypothesis of this paper is that the electoral success of populist radical right parties in Europe is linked to the process of globalization/denationalization. Against this background, we will first open a theoretical perspective based on cleavage theory. We suppose that globalization has created within national party systems both a new economic and cultural cleavage, each opposing the positions of trans- and supranational "integration" to those of national "demarcation". In this new cleavage structure, populist radical right parties defend positions of "demarcation" through economic and cultural protectionism. Secondly, we will show that empirical comparative research in this new context can help to explain convergence in ideology and form of these parties and their success in mobilizing "globalization losers" in many European societies. But empirical work also shows that the degree of globalization and the salience of the new cleavages vary between (West and East) European societies and that divergence in populist radical right parties' ideology, form and success can be explained above all by differences in historical legacy, political cultures, institutional frames and political opportunity structures. Lastly, in order to highlight this, we will focus on three case studies: Austria, Denmark and Germany. Austria and Denmark are examples of highly globalized countries with successful populist radical right parties. On the other hand, the case of Germany, also a highly globalized country, will demonstrate why the radical right remains weak and why national particularities continue to be important within European societies.

How About Taking Gender in the Theorizing of Populism?

Norocel, Cristian

*Department of Political Science, University of Helsinki
Sweden, <http://blogs.helsinki.fi/norocel/introduction/>*

Keywords

feminism, nationalism, radical right populism, thin ideology

The article involves in a constructive criticism with the theorizing of radical right populism and argues for the inclusion of a gendered perspective in the field. With the Italian political scene as a backdrop, the article departs from the substantive ambiguity of the defining concept of populism and its noteworthy closeness to that of nationalism. The constitutive elements of populism as a thin ideology and their imagined property are scrutinized, and juxtaposed to a feminist theorizing of nationalism. The conceptual homogeneity of 'the people', the dichotomous relationship between 'the people' and 'the elites', and the concept of popular sovereignty and subsequently that of charismatic leadership, are scrutinized. A feminist take on nationalism is employed to suggest possible entry points for a gendered analysis of radical right populism.

How sport helps to understand the modern system of nation states and modern nationalism. The "sportization" of international relationships and domestic politics

Reicher, Dieter

*Sociology, Karl-Franzens-Universität Graz
Graz, Austria*

Keywords

sportization, nationalism, politics, Sport, international relationships

Although modern sport is a global phenomenon, it does not overcome the concept of nationality. On the contrary, the sport-system supports and generates a variety of nationalisms because of its division into national Olympic committees, national sport associations, and nation based audience loyalty. Since the end of World War II for many decolonized and young countries sport became a main vehicle for legitimizing and defining both the state and the nation. In Western countries, too, sport has immense importance for the political-system. Public sport-funding, the organization of sport mega-events, and the fate of being successful makes sport important for political elites but also unpredictable. Furthermore, sport transforms the meaning international relationships in creating a sport-based system of international stratification. In this sense, sport is the continuation of politics by other means. However, sport also transforms the meaning of nationalism by shaping a kind of "sport-nationalism" that no longer stresses uniqueness, military virtues, or the image of others as total different cultures (i.e. the barbarian, the uncivilized). Sport-nationalism is more related to global shared norms, emotions and images of what nations should be and of what nations should become. Therefore, world sport becomes an important frame for both international relationships and domestic politics.

Intelligentsia in Politics. A Case Study of a Polish Political Party the Freedom Union (panel 5: Governance Structures and political Institutions)

Winclawska, Maria

Political Science, Universitas Nicolai Copernici Torun, Poland

Keywords

political party, political elite, Intelligentsia

Intelligentsia as a social category, an elite, emerged in Eastern and Central Europe in the middle of the 19th century. It was the time when many nations did not have their own states (as Poland, Hungary, Czech), so intelligentsia conducted the roles, in other countries, preformed by the state institutions, i.e. development of national culture, modernization, education, etc. Under the communism a substantial number of its representatives engaged in building the "new society", but soon discovered the shortcomings of the new system and began to organize democratic opposition. For that whole period intelligentsia felt it has an obligation towards society and a mission to fulfill. And the society seemed to appreciate the mission and to recognize the members of intelligentsia as (missing) authorities.

The year 1989 was a turning point in the history of intelligentsia. The group got a chance to engage in legal politics and to shape the transformation from communism to democracy in Eastern and Central Europe. First ideas of how it should be done were not conventional. In Czechoslovakia Vaclav Havel proposed "nonpolitical politics" and some of the "Solidarity" leaders in Poland, eg. Bronisaw Geremek, tried not to let the movement split into political parties. The ideas were not fulfilled - the politics became "political" and was made by emerging political parties. Among them there were also parties created by intelligentsia: such as the Freedom Union in Poland. Unfortunately for its creators, it was present on the Polish political scene for 15 years before its' support declined so dramatically that it did not get into the parliament. One of the main causes of the Freedom Union's collapse was the change of intelligentsia's social role and status after 1989. To understand these phenomena we need to study (1) what are the internal changes in this social category, (2) how the social image of intelligentsia has changed after 1989. Finally we should tackle the problem of relations between intelligentsia and politics in Weberian categories of ethics of responsibility and ethics of conviction.

Jobless and Toothless - The protest of the unemployed and precarious in Europe: Forms, conditions and dilemma

Lahusen, Christian Lahusen

Faculty of Humanities and Social Sciences / Dept. of Sociology, University of Siegen Siegen, Germany

Keywords

europe, social movements, political participation, precarity, unemployment

Jobless and Toothless - The protest of the unemployed and precarious in Europe: Forms, conditions and dilemma

Collective protest actions by the unemployed and precarious spread throughout European countries during the late 1990s and early 2000s. This mobilization incited research by social movement scholars, because it challenged the assumption that poor people and weak interests hardly engage in protest action. This paper will deal with these challenges by summarizing and discussing latest research on the mobilization of deprived people's movements in order to present available findings from various European countries, unveil conducive conditions and draw lessons for the advancement of theoretical explanations. The paper will argue that ongoing changes at a societal level - here mainly related to grievances, constituencies, and organizational infrastructures - provide a beneficial background for increasing the probability of collective action by the jobless. While local protests were much more common, attempts to stabilize and widen political mobilization across time and space proved to be much more dependant on available organizational infrastructures and political opportunities at the national level. Here, apparent differences between European countries become evident. The fact that the European Union has been increasingly involved in the recalibration of national debates, policies and institutions allows us to understand that the European Union itself has become an additional opportunity and target for the mobilization of the jobless, yet, contributing in this way to the dilemma of collective action by the deprived.

Justifying in the Local Public Sphere: Newspaper Representations of Encounters between Citizens and Cities in Finland and in France

Luhtakallio, Eeva

*Sociology, University of Helsinki
Helsinki, Finland*

Keywords

Justification, newspapers, Finland, France, Public Sphere

Participatory democracy being the fashionable remedy for the shortcomings of current governing systems, plenty of media attention is directed to processes of deliberation between citizens and government. In the framework of a comparative research on local democracy and the public sphere in Finland and France, I examine newspaper articles concerning local disputes and deliberation between citizens, and officials and politicians, in Helsinki and Lyon. What kinds of disagreements attract attention and how do the local media treat them? What kinds of arguments are in use to justify differing views in local conflicts? What convergences and differences occur in the two contexts and how to explain them?

I tackle these questions by analyzing newspaper articles of local conflict issues in one newspaper in each context, during a period of six months. I carry out the comparative analysis with a scheme adapted from Luc Boltanski's and Laurent Thévenot's (1991) theory on orders of worth and justification. I have adjusted this theoretical scheme to empirical analysis basing on the method of political claims analysis (Koopmans & Statham 1999). This combination enables a political claims analysis that results with detailed understanding on the nature of local disputes: What is at stake, and what do different actors judge as legitimate arguments to solve a local controversy? From the part of the citizens, is it bare NIMBY, or a more complicated set of argumentation? How do officials and politicians justify their arguments to the citizens?

The local coverage of citizen-city interaction in the newspapers was, however, not all about conflicts; it was often about avoiding a conflict. Participatory democracy, as represented in newspapers, seems to need plenty of eulogies: How well events of deliberation came off, how satisfied citizens were of information they were dutifully given. I argue that there are issues specific to both contexts that almost never were treated as conflicts in the media, but that the reports functioned as implicit conflict dilution. I reflect upon the themes that seemed to form issues of deliberate non-conflict in the two contexts, juxtaposing them with my ethnographic and interview data on the same contexts.

Legislative Social Networks - The Case of the Swedish Parliament

Farkas, Gergei

*Department of Sociology, Stockholm University
Stockholm, Sweden*

Keywords

Social Networks, Legislative behavior, parliamentarian collaboration

The structures of legislative networks have mostly been studied with regard to the American, biparty case. The ongoing-research reported here studies the structural features of a multi-party legislature, through the collaboration-networks among Swedish parliamentarians. Members of the Swedish "Riksdag" are linked by their collaboration on several types of legislative proposals, with a certain emphasis on cross-party, and cross-block initiatives. Furthermore, differences regarding the networks of legislative initiatives between the current (2006-) institutional conditions, characterized by a right wing-liberal majority-government, are contrasted with a long string of previous periods dominated by social democratic minority-governments. The significance of institutional circumstances for establishing parliamentary collaboration networks is thus explored. Exponential random graph ( $p^*$ ) models are used, and the properties of collaboration networks are explored on multiple network levels. The results have implications for our understanding of the roles of collaborative networks in multi-party political assemblies.

Legitimacy and representation in the EU. From representative to participative democracy?

Marchetti, Maria Cristina

Political Studies, University of Rome La Sapienza

Italy, <http://www.dsp.uniroma1.it>

Keywords

Civil Society, Legitimacy, European Union

Legitimacy and representation in the EU. From representative to participative democracy?

The EU has always been characterized by a legitimacy deficit due to the weakness of political representation respect to the role played by interest groups. The Parliament, the only institution which derives its legitimacy from popular elections, has a lower power respect to the Council and above all respect to the Commission.

This gap has been in part filled up with the participation of civil society to the decision making processes. This implies the passage from a representative democracy to a participative democracy, widely supported by the Commission.

The paper will focus on the following aspects:

1. Political representation in the EU. Classical theories of representation focus on the role of elections and on the relationship existing between citizens and their representatives. In this framework the Parliament has the monopoly of representing the general interest in public deliberation.
2. The participation of civil society to the decision making process poses some questions about its legitimacy. The several associations, interest groups, NGO, lobbies working in Brussels represent only a part of the European society. Is civil society equally widespread all over the territory of the European Union? Are all the interests represented in it? What's the border between traditional lobbying and civil dialogue?
3. The Treaties and the official document talk about organized civil society (Treaty of Nice; EESC). Can we organize civil society? Is civil society a democratic one? How can we legitimize civil society?

Local eGovernment in District of Évora (Portugal) 2015: Perspectives from local Actors

Silva, Carlos

*Department of Sociology, University of Évora
7000 Évora, Portugal*

Saragoça, José

*Department of Sociology, University of Évora
Évora, Portugal*

Fialho, Joaquim

Center for Research in Sociology and Anthropology - Augusto da Silva (CISA-AS), Universidade de Évora Évora, Portugal

Keywords

Social Network Analysis.?, Local eGovernment, eDemocracy, eParticipation

Today, governments everywhere in the world have to face the requirements that the information society imposes. Boosted by the need to implement a new public administration paradigm with new ICT technologies, it is believed that the local eGovernment can both guide the local government for greater efficiency and transparency in service to "clients" that interact with it (eAdministration) and contribute to the expansion of existing mechanisms for participation of citizens in contemporary democracies that cross several problems, including those relating to the relationship between citizens and their representatives in policy power (eDemocracy).

Despite this enormous potential impact on citizen's and enterprises life, research in this area, although growing, is still insufficient, especially in prospective studies with a sociological perspective. This is a limitation that this paper proposes to partially fill.

Based on data collected in an ongoing PhD research that seeks to contribute to a better comprehension of this subject, essentially developing a set of scenarios for local eGovernment in district of Évora (Portugal) 2015, this paper discuss the main findings on the impact of the dynamics of some territory's actors in the conception and implementation of a collective strategy for the development of local eGovernment.

Data were collected through a survey by questionnaire and are presented according to the methodology of Social Network Analysis(ARS), which provide some elements for understanding the social structure as a collective action of individuals and organizations involved in development of local eGovernment projects.

Making Participatory Governance Work: the case of Radzionkow community in Upper Silesia Region in Poland

Klekotko, Marta

*Department of Social Structures, Institute of Sociology, Jagiellonian University in Krakow
Krakow, Poland*

Keywords

civic participation, civil society organizations, Local civil society, participatory governance

The paper examines role of civil society organizations and their impact on local decision making as well as on local development policy. It provides extended case study of Radzionkow in Upper Silesia in Poland presenting processes and factors of community empowerment, local governance structures and civil society. Radzionkow is a well-known case of participatory governance, it represents a success story and something of exception in Poland.

The paper characterizes institutional settings in which public and civil society actors interact, as well as the role of civic sector in local policy-making. It attempts to analyse processes and factors of community empowerment, local civil society, civic participation and local governance structures, as well as their local manifestations. It analyses actions undertaken in the community, verifying the idea of participatory decision-making in the local ground.

It provides as well some explanations of driving forces of the participatory community development, which lay mainly in the history of the Upper Silesia region and the Radzionkow community (historical sociology perspective), assessing the levels of cultural, social, and human capital. All of them decided upon the success in the fight for the municipality independence and upon the rapid development of the social space of the town. Today, historically shaped social networks, social ties, ability to co-operation, social trust, local identity and traditional values compose fundamental resources, based on which development in the municipality is created and public sphere is built.

Nationalism in National Identity: How Strong Identity Remains Nationalistic and Takes Patriotism Down a Peg or Two

Pichler, Florian

*Department of Sociology, University of Surrey
Guildford, United Kingdom*

Keywords

International Social Survey Programme, nationalism, Cosmopolitanism, national identity, cross-national survey data analysis

The current global economic crisis could bring a comeback of the nation-state and nationalism could gain a critical moment. National identity and how it is employed in everyday practices therefore remains of crucial important for studies in social research - if history is not supposed to repeat itself. Recent theory illustrates the possibility of national identity opposing discriminatory and exclusionary orientations in contrast to more ethnocentric viewpoints. Thus, whilst "non-nationalistic" national identity is likely to exist, this paper argues that the character of national identity is heavily intertwined with strength of identification - the more exclusive identities are the stronger people identify with their country. Drawing on cross-national survey data from the ISSP 2003 on national identity, a persisting superior and anti-global character of very strong national identities is found. National self-criticism plays a clearly subordinate role in shaping strength of identification with one's country. This challenges the notion of more reflective and open-minded national identity and bears heavily on contemporary politics and society which widely sympathize with national identity whilst uncritically upholding its benevolent character.

New Dilemmas for Civil Society?

Simitis, Marilena

*European and International Studies, University of Piraeus
Athens, Greece*

Keywords

Civil Society, accountability, institutional politics, civil-military cooperation

New Dilemmas for Civil Society?

The literature on civil society's organizations focuses mainly on the impact of Non-Governmental Organizations on institutional actors and policy-making. The aim of this paper is to explore the interaction between civil society's organizations and official politics the other way round, meaning the intrusion of institutional actors into civil society's domain. During the 70's and the 80's social movements' powerful pressure on institutional politics led to the gradual inclusion of some of their demands into official policies. However, since the 90's policy-making has ceased to be merely responsive to the pressures of civil society and has instead started to engage proactively civil society in official policies. Two areas, which are representative of this progressive encroachment upon civil society's domain, are: 1) the increasing pressure of donors and international institutions on Non-Governmental Organizations to adopt "accountability tools" (e.g. mechanisms regarding operational capacity, management structure, performance measurements and accounting practices with an emphasis on legal obligations (e.g. performance assessments) as a prerequisite for their participation in official politics. This pressure has increased significantly the recent years. The paper will examine the impact on civil society's organizations and their ability to react in order to provide an alternative civil society's perspective on Accountability and Transparency, 2) the military army's cooperation with civil society's organizations in developmental/humanitarian assistance (civil-military cooperation (CIMIC)). This co-operation has provided NGOs with access to conflict zones. However, NGOs have become increasingly involved in the political processes of stabilization and reconstruction in the post-conflict era and often provide an exit strategy for the army, whenever it wants to disentangle from long term operations. These new tendencies favor the institutionalization and professionalization of civil society's organization, but on the other hand encourage civil society's participation in the implementation of official policies. The paper aims to explore the new context for civil society's organizations, the conflicts and divisions it has generated between civil society's organizations and finally the question of civil society's autonomy in this changing environment.

NGOisation of Civil Society Sphere in Turkey- An Indication of the Establishment of Global Governance as the New Governing Technique?

Al-Rebholz, Anil

*Sociology, FGS (Frankfurt Graduate School for the Humanities and Social Sciences)
Frankfurt am Main, Germany*

Keywords

Gender, Turkey, Global Governance, NGOisation of Civil Society

Two important aspects characterise very much the dynamic and nature of women activism in Turkey. The first aspect relates to the extensive NGOisation of Sphere of civil society in general and in particular the NGOisation of women's movements since 1990s and the further acceleration of this process in 2000s during the Process of Turkey's Accession to EU. The second aspect which is very much related to this first one, is the striking international character of women's movements in Turkey which means that the political engagement of women activists in NGOs in Turkish civil society, take place in an environment of extensive organisational, ideological and financial exchange with other International NGOs and supra-national Organisations such as EU and UN.

At another level, in the larger context of globalisation and the implications of this process on the structures of nation-states world wide, a re-configuration of state-society relations is to be observed. Together with the appearance of national and international NGOs in the world political scene an internationalisation of political decision making processes take place which also means an increasing demand for intensive participation on the side of civil society actors in governmental processes. Thus the Turkish state feels also obliged to seek for more co-operation and participation on the side of social movements in general and women's movements and NGOs in particular as the basis of its legitimacy (Stienstra 1999).

Accordingly this paper will concentrate on the following questions: - What are the consequences of the NGOisation of civil society for knowledge production and political process? How is the relationship between civil society actors and state influenced by this transformation? What are the implications of this changed relationship between Turkish State and civil society actors for the parameters of politics in Turkey? Does it require new understanding, a redefinition of democracy?

? Do new structures of governance offer new possibilities for the integration of larger parts of civil society actors in governmental decision making processes or do they denote to the re-organisation of Turkish statehood and co-optation of non-state actors by state institutions?

Organized civil society and its activities of political representation in the EU arena

Ruzza, Carlo

*Dept of Sociology, University of Leicester
Leicester, UK*

Keywords

Civil Society, political representation, EU

With specific reference to the EU level, this paper discusses the implications of the concept of political representation when applied to the advocacy activities of non-state actors. Political representation, as the activity of (re) presenting opinions and interests to the policy making process, can take place by representatives holding elected office or by others. Representation can take place in several arenas. Whilst democratic theorists often focus on the activities of office holders in democratic arenas, representation activities of interest groups of different kinds are increasingly the focus of analysis. Their activities are examined in a broad set of arenas - including EU institutions. They present some of the same organisational and political dynamics studied by theorists of democratic representation. The literature on representation in such more varied contexts has grown in recent years and has often focused on the representative activities of associations, social movements and other informal groups. These social formations experience the same tensions that occur in elected institutions, such as the tensions between acting as delegates or as trustees. The often examined multiple meanings of the concept of representation, and the related internal tensions apply to all of the various arenas and agencies engaged in representative activities. However, as Pitkin and others have pointed out, the contexts in which the concept of representation is deployed colours which dimensions are more salient. Prevalent political practices make different usages of the concept of representation more or less relevant and specify its analytical and normative context. In this sense, processes such as the growing relevance of supranational integration and the prevalence of governance structures have broadened what is topical in relation to issues of representation. This paper will identify and discuss issues connected to representation - particularly issues of transparency, openness, accountability and representativeness. It will discuss issues of cooptation by public authorities, and the related attempts of using civil society to facilitate government-sanctioned goals of social change.

Participation and Environment. The Local Dimension of Governance

Petrella, Andrea

*Department of Sociology and Social Research, University of Trento
Trento, Italy*

Keywords

Local policy-making, sustainability, Governance

Panel preferences: Citizenship and Governance / Governance Structures and Political Institutions

The paper tends to explore the multidimensional concept of governance through a theoretical and an empirical perspective. The former is based on recent literature and contemporary debates stressing the importance of linking governance with issues like political participation, role of civil society organizations, subsidiarity and territorial policies. The latter focuses on empirical evidences emerging from a research on Italian extra-urban contexts characterized by different way of putting governance into action.

New social actors, interest groups and local communities are broadening the traditional political arena in several western contexts and they participate in facing the challenges of economic globalization and the crisis of political systems. However, new forms of participation consist of lights and shadows: the text briefly summarizes the main themes related to this dual nature of governance, trying to emphasize its real impacts on local policy-making and on citizenship involvement. Participation is a key concept in governance studies and one of the main issues is about the capacity of local political context to actively involve not only stakeholders but all traditionally excluded actors. The article argues that the introduction of governance practices constitutes a radical change especially in local context with small demographic and administrative dimensions. Particular attention must be paid on the implicit connection between local communities and high level of political and social participation. Moreover, in local context the involvement of civil society and citizenship in policy-making is often linked to the concept of social and environmental sustainability. Indeed, inhabitants' participation at local level is often seen as a fundamental tool for new policies of local self-sustainable development based on endogenous resources and know-how.

For these reasons the article investigates the different outcomes of governance strategies in some small Italian municipalities that have implemented some good practices both on environmental sustainability and on participative aspects. Starting from the analysis of interviews, the paper tends to evaluate the determining factors that could generate successes and failures of policy making.

Picturing Power: Politics, aesthetics and gender in France and Norway

Krogstad, Anne

*Department of Sociology and Human Geography, University of Oslo
Oslo, Norway*

Storvik, Aagoth

*Department for labour market research, Institute for Social Research
Oslo, Norway*

Keywords

aesthetics, Gender, politics

Anne Krogstad, professor, Department of Sociology and Human Geography, University of Oslo

Aagoth Storvik, senior researcher

Institute for Social Research, Oslo

Abstract:

Picturing power:

Politics, aesthetics and gender in France and Norway

The paper argues that the aesthetic of politics is different in Norway from that in France, and that this difference can be related to differences in national cultural repertoires. It also shows a change in political aesthetics in these two countries in the last decade, especially regarding women in top office in national politics. The most radical break is seen in the way Norwegian female politicians portray themselves. They have to a certain degree replaced the Norwegian leadership ethos of piety, moderation and inward orientation with glamour and irony. Women in French politics have, on the contrary, had difficulties living up to a heroic leadership ideal marked by effortless superiority and seduction. To explain the differences in self-presentation we argue that cultural repertoires are not only national constructions, they are also gendered constructions. This implies that they are not equally suitable or effective for men and women. This insight is not captured in the in the initial theory about cultural repertoires. In addition the study also shows that it is possible for female politicians to avoid the stereotyping which so often has been described in earlier research.

Two main sources of data are used; pictures of politicians and written characterisations of politicians' personal appearance. More specifically it compares public photographs of high-level politicians - from Charles de Gaulle to Nicolas Sarkozy in France and from Einar Gerhardsen to Jens Stoltenberg in Norway - to see how they present themselves and their governments and how they are presented by photographers. The article also compares how these aesthetic performances are commented upon by journalists and other writers. The aim is to identify forms of aesthetic presentations, how they are evaluated and how they have changed from 1945 to 2008.

Plataforma per Catalunya, the emergence of a successful populist radical right party in the Spanish autonomous region of Catalonia

Hernández Carr, Aitor

*IGOP-Institut de Govern i Polítiques Públiques, Autonomous University of Barcelona
Barcelona, Spain*

Keywords

Legitimacy, populism, cultural racism

Spain is one of the few European countries that over the last decades haven't had an electorally successful populist radical right-wing party. The reasons pointed out to explain this have been several (extreme right party's nostalgia towards Franco's regime, lack of a relevant number of foreign migrants, etc.). However, in recent years the growing concern around the immigration issue and the increasing criticism of citizens towards mainstream political parties have led to the fear that a radical right party could emerge and capitalize the anxieties and resentments of certain sectors of the population. Despite this situation, traditional extreme right parties have not been able to escape from political marginality. The only exception has been the newly created party Plataforma per Catalunya (PxC), which has achieved increasing electoral gains in the autonomous region of Catalonia.

Plataforma per Catalunya has obtained its best results in local elections and its electoral support is concentrated in certain areas and municipalities of this autonomous region. Its political discourse and strategy are much closer to those of the European populist radical right parties than to those of the Spanish extreme right parties. It has adopted an anti-establishment (not anti-democratic) discourse and its opposition to immigration is presented in terms of cultural incompatibility and of material threats for autochthonous people (not in biological/hierarchical terms). At the same time its political strategy is clearly focused towards the electoral/institutional arena, trying to present itself as a "legitimate" actor and dissociate its image from that of right-winged extremist and violent parties. In this sense, the first objective of the paper will be to present the features and political trajectory of this party and compare them with that of the European populist radical right party family. Once this is done, the paper will try to explain the process through which this party has achieved a strong electoral support in certain municipalities. Finally, taking into account the overall features of Plataforma per Catalunya and our analysis of its success in certain municipalities, we will try to assess its possibilities of achieving an electoral breakthrough in other municipalities and at the national level.

Policies Evaluation and Accountability in the European Union. Repercussions in the domain of education and training in Portugal

Afonso, Almerindo

*Sociology of Education and Educational Administration, Universidade of Minho
Braga, Portugal*

Keywords

education, accountability, policies evaluation

The European Union, mainly through the European Commission, had a rather premature role in the development of policies evaluation and accountability. However, in the last years, especially after the Lisbon Strategy in 2000 and after the adoption of the Open Method of Coordination, this role has been widened showing new patterns. This paper is intended at contextualizing the increasing tendency and at discussing some of the eventual repercussions in the reconfiguration of policies, decision-making and discourses in the field of education and training in Portugal. Therefore, the period analysed will be the one in which the Socialist government supported by an absolute majority ruled (2005 to 2009). Several government decisions that directly or indirectly are related to the evaluation accountability issues in the national context will be discussed.

Policy-making without competences: EU actions in education and training

Souto Otero, Manuel

Education, University of Bath Bath, UK

Keywords

education, Open Method of Coordination, EU

Most current analyses of EU integration have as their start-point 'rational' Member States, which try to preserve as much as possible of their sovereignty, in particular in symbolic policy areas for national constituencies, such as social policy. They assume that national policies are in place in the policy areas upon which the EU takes action. They also assume the existence of rather fixed 'national interests' and constant preferences over policy issues. But what happens when these assumptions do not hold? This question, normally overlooked, will be analysed through a case study of EU education and training policies, an area where several of the assumptions outlined above do, indeed, not hold. The first part of the paper will explain the relevance of the concept of 'lifelong learning' for the European Commission and will analyse the mechanisms by which the Commission has advanced policy in education, an area in which it has very limited legal competences and is entrenched in deeply rooted national traditions. We will explore in particular how the Commission purposefully worked with the European Parliament and the European Court of Justice to create a policy space for action to later focus on the definition and occupation of this space through the creation of a range of epistemic communities and the strategic selection of sub-policy areas for action. The second part of the paper will review the alleged lack of effectiveness of the Open Method of Coordination (OMC) with a reference to the area of education -based on the results of a consultation with Member States- and the notion that the EU advances 'slowly and persistently' in its acquisition of competences in this area. I argue that whereas in many policy areas the OMC has been perceived by scholars as a 'step back' for the EU from law-making, in education it can be conceptualised as a 'step forward' which creates new opportunities for policy development from previous phases in which the EU tended to rely on pilot projects and a relatively loose exchange of good practice.

Political involvement and civic participation

Viegas, José Manuel Leite

*Sociology, ISCTE
Lisboa, Portugal*

Faria, Sérgio

*CIES, CIES - ISCTE
Lisboa, Portugal*

Keywords

civic participation, DEMOCRACY, political involvement

Several scholars and researchers note a cross-national pattern of political change within democratic institutions and in the relationship between citizens and such institutions. On the one hand, a significant political discontentment and an increasing feeling that the performance of political institutions, maxime government, does not serve the citizens' wishes and expectations, are noticed. On the other hand, there is empirical evidence that western democracies are facing changes in political attitudes and citizens' participation, towards a more transparent and participated decision making process.

Are the same changes occurring in Portugal? We endeavoured to answer this question in two steps.

To start with, we proposed an approach to the political involvement concept, by considering two dimensions: political interest and party attachment. In doing so, we defined four types of political involvement: the disaffected position (of those who do not have any interest in politics and do not feel attached to any political party), the supporter position (of those who do not have any interest in politics but feel attached to a political party), the critical position (of those who are interested in politics but do not feel attached to any political party), and the integrated position (of those who are interested in politics and feel attached to a political party).

Then, we described these four types of political involvement. In Portugal, as suggested by international research and literature, those in the disaffected position are less educated, young and elderly people who do not follow politics and rarely use the different kinds of political action. Those in the supporter position are similar to these but show a high level of electoral participation. Those in the critical position are the youngest and most educated, with high exposure to politics through media, who use the new kinds of political action - such as internet communication or product boycott for ethical or ideological reasons - more than any other group. Those in the integrated position tend to follow politics in the media and use conventional and protest action more than anyone else.

Political Representation across Europe

Belchior, Ana Maria

CIES, CIES-ISCTE (Centre of Sociological Studies and Research of the Higher Institute of Social Sciences and Business Studies, Lisbon).

Lisbon, Portugal

Keywords

Representatives, Congruence, europe, Voters, representation

This paper aims to explore two main goals. Firstly, although it is known that political democratic representation requires more than the measure of similarities between citizens and representatives, it is also established that representation studied through measures of political congruence is a legitimate option. So, it is intended to assess the levels of political congruence generated for a set of structural and non-structural issues. In the first ones we include the ideological self-positioning, State intervention in economy, redistribution policies, and fight against crime. On the other side, we consider as non-structural issues: attitudes towards democracy, and attitudes towards democratic representation (closeness to electors, public participation in political decisions, or institution of alternative mechanisms for public political intervention). How representatives are European political parties in respect to their electors? Are structural issues best represented than non-structural ones?

Secondly, we would like to understand what explains party representation, measured through congruence. In order to do so, we plan to assess the importance of constituency attitudes and positions in the political parties and MPs' attitudes and positions. It is also essential to assess the importance of ideological positions in the explanation of representation. Are European political parties representation significantly conditioned by their constituencies? Or, despite constituency's positions, it is the ideological party position that best determines the levels of representation?

Quantitative data (mostly from the European Representation Studies and from studies conducted in Portugal and Spain) and statistical procedures will be used to answer those goals.

Public sphere, political field or governmentality? Mapping the new political sociology of European Union

Zimmermann, Ann

*Department for European Studies, Aarhus University, Institute for History and Area Studies
Aarhus C, Denmark*

Favell, Adrian

*Department for European Studies, Aarhus University, Institute for History and Area Studies
Aarhus c, Denmark*

Keywords

political sociology of European Union, Governmentality, political field, Public Sphere

The call for a new political sociology of European Union, reflected here at this conference and several other initiatives around Europe, offers exciting new prospects for rethinking the empirical terrain of "Europeanised" politics beyond the nation state, whether in terms of governance, policy making, parliamentary and legal politics, mobilisation, or political communication. However, efforts to specify this agenda have been conceptually and empirically broadly split between three camps working with the distinctive legacies of "Habermasian", "Bourdieuian" and "Foucauldian" thinking, each with their own terminology, logics and political attitudes, and each a mostly separate field of debate and empirical enquiry. Using a number of exemplary studies, this paper will offer a preliminary attempt to map the existing contributions, agendas and blindspots of these approaches, with a view to identifying commonalities and streamlining a more coherent agenda for the political sociology of European Union. The goal should be to build towards a more sociologically rich alternative to "mainstream" EU studies where political sociology has been weak, despite the recent doubtful "sociological" turn amongst some "social constructivists" and "institutionalists". The most promising line would appear to be one that moves away from purely theoretical/conceptual debates towards particular empirical issues in EU studies, and looks for "meso" level operationalisations that can help overcome familiar theoretical antinomies of national/post-national, discourse/behaviour, symbolic/material power, and domination/emancipation.

The paper would appear to be best placed in the section on Political Communication, with a second choice being the section on Citizenship and Governance.

Radicalisation and the Discourse of Race and Religion

Caiani, Manuela

SPS, European University Institute

Firenze, Italy

Keywords

right-wing extremism, radicalisation and religion, frame analysis

Both radicalisation of ethnic/religious cleavages and the extreme right are significant phenomena in European politics of the 21st century. While "Equality, justice and social inclusion" are words frequently used in discussions on the development of the European Union, as we move into the new millennium there are growing signs of revitalization of the extreme right.

In this paper, we will focus on how the extreme right reacts to the wide variety of ethno-cultural and national affiliations and identities of our societies, by looking at frames (or "interpretative schemata") as an intervening variable between organizational choices and context characteristics. The basic assumption is that structural effects are mediated by the militants' perception of reality through which their political involvement develops. Thus, the analysis of perceptions, shared by individuals and groups, is one of the main tools for determining the link between individual motivations (at the micro level) and environmental conditions (at the macro level) (della Porta 1992). In order to understand radical politics it is therefore important to investigate the individual and group understanding of the external reality, as well as the positions of the activists within it (della Porta 2005).

We shall address these issues by investigating how "religious/ethnic" diversity is framed in extremist right wing discourses, comparing different countries (Italy and Germany) and different types of right wing organizations (political parties, violent subcultural/young right wing groups, and political movements). The study will be based on a frames analysis conducted on several types of organizational documents (newspapers, websites, online guest books and forums, and other forms of publications), covering a period from 2000-2005, for a total of 4000 frames. Protest event analysis will be also used with a focus on the main targets of radical rights attacks.

Restoring Democracy from Below: Study of Ethnic Activism in Poland

Jasiewicz, Joanna

*Dept. of Sociological Theory, Philosophy of Law, and Social Science Methodology, University of Barcelona
Barcelona, Spain*

Keywords

ethnic organizations, political mobilization, political opportunity structure

Civil society actors from Eastern and Central-Eastern Europe have been deprived of the opportunity to legally voice their demands in the public sphere for long decades of communist rule. The fall of the Iron Curtain resulted in an institutional change whose profound consequences were experienced immediately by the society as a whole and the non-governmental sector in particular. Among the civil society actors that instantly began to set up organizations and establish wide networks with similar associations abroad were ethnic and national minorities.

In this paper I focus on the political mobilization of minorities' organizations in Poland. My objectives are twofold. First and on the descriptive level, I aim at exploring the patterns of minority associations' activism in a situation of political opportunity that emerged as a consequence of the process of Poland's adaptation to the norms on minority rights protection. Specifically, I will exploit the nature, type and tactics that are embedded in protest events, the frequencies of distinct minorities' demands, cleavages between state and minority actors on ethnic issues, and the scope and direction of minority actors' claims. Secondly, and moving now to the explanatory level, I will investigate the possible reasons why certain ethnic groups were more conspicuous than others, and test the hypothesis that participation in transnational networks has an impact on minorities' activism in the domestic arena. Moreover, I will study ethnic actors' discourse examining whether they use the opportunity to frame their demands in the language of minority rights defined in the confines of supranational institutions. This would allow me to look at European dynamics from a bottom-up perspective that focuses on the interaction between civil society organizations and supranational institutions. My investigation will thus contribute to the literature on democracy and the deliberation process, stressing the role of dialogue between state, supranational institutions and society, here represented by lobbying minority associations.

Strained Constitutionalism in New Member States

Blokker, Paul

*Sociology, University of Trento
Trento, Italy*

Keywords

New Member States, constitutionalism, subsidiarity

Strained Constitutionalism in New Member States

New EU member states seem to face a dual problématique: the crisis of the state-centred, constitutional democratic model in its West-European, Westphalian guise as well as the distinct political problems resulting from the political transformation to some form of democracy. So far, the analysis of democratisation processes in ECE has for an important part centred on the establishment of the rule in law and constitutional states in the post-communist societies. In this, however, insufficient attention is paid to the delegitimising trends that affect conventional forms of constitutionalism, in particular regarding the integrative function of constitutions, i.e., the extent to which constitutions are actually reflecting widely shared values, and contribute to (the legitimation of) democracy and popular sovereignty. In particular, national and subnational solutions in the form of democratic participation and self-governance are insufficiently considered.

The paper seeks to address this lacuna by developing an alternative approach to the "democratic deficit" of the ECE countries, pointing to an alternative form of societal integration and constitutional legitimation of politics that potentially emerges from below, in the form of local and regional forms of democracy. It focusses on the integrative, democratic implications that decentralisation and distinct interpretations of the subsidiarity principle might have in constitutional terms, and the way such phenomena might counter the lack of integrative and symbolic potential of modern constitutional regimes.

The paper theorises the relations between democratisation and constitutionalism in the context of European integration, and identifies the main problematic areas of national constitutions in the context of the changed nature of the nation-state in terms of sovereignty and socio-cultural pluralism. It further elaborates on alternative forms of symbolic rationality based on innovative forms of democratic participation, deliberation, and self-governance. In this, the paper proposes an original theoretical and analytical understanding of changing constitutionalism in the European context in general, and in New Member States, in particular.

Structural determinants of civic attitudes- a cross-country perspective on the measurement of bridging social capital

Neumann, Robert

Chair of Macrosociology, Dresden University of Technology Dresden, Germany

Keywords

Stratification, networks, civic attitudes, social capital, organizations

The present article elaborates sources and effects of social capital that is generated by individuals through organizational affiliation by examining different measurement approaches applied so far in distinct empirical studies. Whether associational membership generates bridging or bonding types of social capital is analyzed in a comparative analysis by a large data set (n=39990) for 21 countries. By modeling the distinct determinants within a Structural Equation Modeling, the approach infers both multiple indicators and multiple causes for a latent construct such as social capital. Comparing network connectedness, social stratification of groups and intensity of civic involvement of individual members, the potential micro and meso level characteristics are linked to different outcomes captured by indicators for attitudes towards government (diffuse support), political interest, trust in strangers and attitudes towards immigrants. Results suggest that network interconnectedness and individual investments of time and resources for a common purpose complement each other in accounting for bonding and bridging aspects of organizations. That is, the study confirms recent claims that the concept of social capital remains a useful and non tautological concept when it is embedded in theories of collective actions.

The Changing Face of Intra-EU Migration after the Union's 2004 and 2007 Enlargements

Triandafyllidou, Anna

*Hellenic Foundation for European and Foreign Policy, ELIAMEP
Athens, Greece*

Recchi, Ettore

*Political Science and Sociology, University of Florence
Firenze, Italy*

Keywords

European citizenship, free movement, intra-EU migration, migration policies

Westbound: The Changing Face of Intra-EU Migration after the Union's 2004 and 2007 Enlargements

Ettore Recchi and Anna Triandafyllidou

A question looms large in EU studies dealing with migration: does the EU have a migration policy at all? Most scholars argue that the answer is, basically, "no". In fact, while we acknowledge that the EU has not inspired consistent regulations of migration flows and integration measures in member states, there is a EU policy (and a related discourse) that has shaped the ways population movements are managed in the Union: European citizenship and its underlying distinction between "migration" (for TCNs) and "mobility" (for EU citizens). This is a meta-policy with long-standing factual outcomes, ultimately creating a priority access to immigrant labor markets for workers originating from the East of the continent over those coming from the Southern borders (or further away). Even if at times the public opinion seemed reluctant about this migration policy (e.g., the Polish-plumberfobia in France in 2004-2005, the anti-Romanians sentiment in Italy in 2007-2008), overall this solution turned to be the least conflictive compromise between employers' demand for immigrant work and voters' hostility towards ethnic minorities. Given this policy framework, the paper illustrates the volume and directions of migration flows within the enlarged EU in the 2000s, profiling Eastern European immigrants on the basis of qualitative evidence on their experiences of East-West mobility.

The Feeling of National and European Identity in the Globalization Era

Elena, Nedelcu

*The Faculty of Social Sciences and Administration, The Nicolae Titulescu University of Bucharest
Bucharest, Romania*

Keywords

Social Trust, National Identity Feeling, Globalization, European Identity Feeling

In our days, the explanation of the social consequences and forms of manifestation of the globalization require a multidimensional and interdisciplinary analysis.

The present work only aims at looking into one aspect of the problem: revealing the way globalization influences national identity. The questions which this problem raises are: does the more and more intense globalization process lead to diminishing the feeling of attachment towards one's nationality and country of origin? Does the feeling of attachment towards one's nationality and country of origin become less consistent, significant and perennial in time? And, if they do, what are the consequences of this process?

Sociological research accomplished in Europe has proven that, although most of the people -especially young people - perceive globalization in a positive way, they feel basically attached to their country of origin.

However, this is not the same in Romania, where national pride reaches low quotas, since the citizens' feeling of attachment to their nation is an emotional manifestation, and not a social practice. In Romania social trust and cooperation reach lower quotas than in the EU countries and the US.

The Globalization Debate: A Public Justifications Analysis

Ylä-Anttila, Tuomas

*Department of Sociology, University of Helsinki
Helsinki, Finland*

Keywords

Globalization, Justification, Public Sphere

How has economic globalization been criticized and defended in public debate during the past ten years? Which actors have justified their arguments referring to the market, who has referred to tradition and who has argued for ecology? How are these different justifications pitted one against the other, and how are compromises forged between them? How do international organizations (WTO, G8, EU) figure as claims makers and objects of claims in a debate on global issues in one national public sphere? I aim at answering these questions through Public Justifications Analysis of the globalization debate in the Finnish media. The method of Public Justifications Analysis combines Political Claims Analysis with the theory of justification put forward by Luc Boltanski and Laurent Thévenot. Justifications are classified in seven different worlds, based on seven different conceptions of the common good. These are the world of inspiration, the domestic world, the world of fame, the civic world, the market world, the industrial world and the world of ecology. It is shown, in line with other studies, that the public arena is mostly occupied by national elected representatives rather than international organizations or citizen's groups. Globalization is mostly justified in market terms, but interestingly, market justifications are often tied in compromise with civic arguments referring to distributive justice and democracy. Globalization is most often denounced by civic and ecological arguments, but here as well, compromises (civic-industrial; civic-fame; ecological-industrial) merit particular attention.

Preferred panel: Political Communication

The nation-building process in the West Balkans

Stadler, Sabine

*none, free-lance social-scientist for the EC; Austrian ministry of foreign affairs and lower Austria
1010 VIENNA, AUSTRIA*

Keywords

independence, nation-building, minority problems

In south eastern Europe the new nations have found their independence with a huge effort of nation-building instruments and civil society assistance of the European Union, NATO and OSCE ( Montenegro, Macedonia and Kosovo )

I will describe with empirical data the independence of the three states and the European programmes implemented to make the road to Europe in order to become an assistance or associated state to the EU. The piece plan of Mahti Attissari of the Nobel prize winner and the political interventions of the EU will be the next step. Macedonia gained its independence in with many corruption and American money and under consideration of the Albanian language and the Albanian minority. For Albanian speaking people the agreement of OHRID and the use of the language politics are part of a large importance and is implemented in the 2 states. The NATO and the EU stopped the wishes to enter the

EU. The Kosovo declared its independence in February 2009 and are now under recognition in the whole world in order to get rid of Serbia. This is no state of consideration in the next 10 years.

I will describe the EULEX group implementation the European military forces in peace work there and the administration building going on.

the main question is on how far the administration are civilized after the military forces there, in duty of civil tasks even doing social sciences work. The Maritime culture of the Montenegro makes it like the Kosovo being linked to Italy , in comparison Macedonia refers to its common past to Greece.

The policy of scale: social capital and local development in Portugal

Carmo, Renato

ISCTE, CIES Portugal,

Melo, Daniel

University of Lisbon, ICS Portugal,

Keywords

local development, public policies, social capital, third sector

This paper, which is a primary output of our research project, will focus the relationship between social capital, the third sector and the local development policies that are being carried out in the context of the European Union regional planning. It will look with particular emphasis the situation of Portugal, specially, the recent evolution of the third sector whose main activity is related with the development of local and communitarian projects. In the first part of the paper, we will build up a theoretical assessment involving these three dimensions, by using the most recent conceptual framework. Secondly, the paper will present a brief historical study about this kind of voluntary associations regarding its relationship with the public institutions and agencies. Thirdly, we will examine the impact of some regional and local policy programs by analysing its consequences in the national territory. In this section we will analyse different findings that are being collected by our research team. We also expect to present some statements collected throughout the interviews that are being conducted in our fieldwork. Finally, we intend to propose a multi-scalar perspective indispensable to understand the necessary articulation linking these three dimensions.

The political participation of immigrants at institutional level in Italy

Ivan, Pedrazzini

*European Centre J.Monnet, University of Trento
trento, Italy*

Keywords

active citizenship, Migration, political participation

PANEL 1. CITIZENSHIP AND GOVERNANCE

The immigration of non-communitarian citizens in the European union increases the necessity to implement public policies to integrate the foreigners in the countries of arrival of the migratory trajectory. The progressive stabilization of immigrants in receiving societies implicates an attention to the inclusion of the "new" citizens in the social and political life within the "new" territory of residence. One of the point of the scientific debate on the integration of foreigners in political life considers the different forms thorough which immigrants share the social norms, political practices and values of receiving societies. The proposed contribution starts from the assumption that a crucial element for the political integration of immigrants in receiving societies is the active participation of the newcomers citizens in political practices and debates of the country.

The contribution examines closely, both from the empirical and from the theoretical point of view, the issue of the political integration of foreigners in Italy. The case studies consider a recent instrument of political inclusion for immigrants activated in some Italian cities at institutional level: the consultative body of immigrants. These organisations composed of elected representatives of non-national immigrated communities, were founded in some Italian cities at the end of the 20th century in order deal with the problems and opportunities related to the phenomenon of immigration and the foreigners' presence. The case studies focus on the impact that consultative bodies of immigrants have on the city context. In particular they reconstructs the impact that the representative bodies for immigrants have on the administration, in the public sphere and the relationship they establish with associations. The case studies evaluate, on the one hand, if these participative bodies are tools for an effective and substantial political participation for immigrants and, on the other hand, explore - at a more theoretical level - the relation between collective (cultural) identity and political participation.

The social magic of political representation

Jentges, Erik

*Institute for Social Sciences, Humboldt-University Berlin
Berlin, Germany*

Keywords

Civil Society, European Union, Germany, representation

There is a social magic inherent in all forms of political representation. Drawing from a sample of interviews with nationally based civil society interest groups who represent their constituents towards the European governance arrangement, the paper argues that representativity is achieved through rhetorical strategies of representative claims-making. The theoretical background is adapted from the concept of group charisma and group disgrace, developed by Norbert Elias. Representative claims-making by civil society interest groups can be analysed as a specific form of moral communication, because they ascribe charisma on themselves and disgrace on others. Communication thus structures the political field. Within the political field, interest groups weigh their own social power as a reassessment of their representativity and position themselves vis-à-vis others. The EU devotes attention to un-elected political actors and invites especially civil society actors into decision-making procedures to raise legitimacy, to incorporate expertise and to link EU policies back to citizens. My suggestion to analyse the EU's representative system with a sociological perspective is to look at the ascriptions of praise and blame by civil society organizations. With their representative claims they request leadership (for themselves and/or for others) and construct notions of responsibility. Their participation in governance arrangements slowly establishes new routines for political representation and allows to turn governance back into government. The paper presents results from a PhD in the project: "Building the EU's Social Constituency: Exploring the Dynamics of Public Claims-Making and Collective Representation in Europe" at Humboldt University Berlin.

The Swiss migrants' `Integration` agenda and the myth of a depoliticized education: Switzerland and its efforts to join the `European Space of Education`

Shaik, Farah

Education and Society: Centre for Educational Sociology, University of Edinburgh Edinburgh, Great Britain

Keywords

Integration, Role of Education, Europeanization

Based on the perspective of Europe as an ongoing and continually constructed space of networks, flows and movements, this study examines the particular policy construction of migrant `integration` within the educational setting in Switzerland as a case-study on policy narratives. To pursue a newer Political Sociology approach of studying what has been called a `European shared space of Education`, a specific national context opens up new possibilities to explore processes of translation between collective (or the idea of a European `problem`) and more public or what is argued here are national `problems`, which could become institutionalised. Problematization and instrumentalisation of issues around migrant integration within a specific public policy sector, here education, become an interesting arena for exploring the negotiation of policy agendas by looking at narratives of policy actors involved. This research moreover looks at politicization and depoliticization of this policy `problem` perspective within the education arena and the vernacular or discourses that shape these amongst different networks of actors. What makes Switzerland an interesting case-study, is its political stance of being outside the legal capacity of the EU but nonetheless increasingly (pressurized into?) participating in the notion of a European dimension to education and market. Questions arise about processes of an eventual European Integration and more interestingly what could arguably be the nationally self-fuelled generation of processes that lead up to it. This study is empirically based on views and experiences of Swiss policy makers in education, and other actors closely linked to migrant `Integration` policy in both Federal and Cantonal governmental and non-governmental organisations forming networks, as proposed in this study. On the one hand, the Swiss case of strong regional distinction, federalism and the re-contextualisation it creates using educational data could address what role education is taking in these processes of what can be argued is a highly political negotiation. On the other hand, questions arise about how integration policy measures are created, given that education is considered a potential sphere where integration of migrants within a national system is seen to take place, and about how a growing instrumentalization of education may potentially affect these measures.

Translucent social citizenship: Detecting and governing "work ability" in Swedish public employment services

Jacobsson, Kerstin

School of Social Sciences, Södertörn University Huddinge, Sweden

Garsten, Christina

*SCORE, Stockholm University
Stockholm, Sweden*

Keywords

Governance, Foucault, political technologies, social citizenship

The refashioning of the welfare state towards enhanced efficiency and effectiveness involves a number of significant challenges, tensions and contradictions. The many institutions of the welfare state are up against the task of making clearly visible and legible guiding norms and policies, while at the same time being attentive and attuned to the sway and tides of the global economy. In times of financial crises, these tensions grow all the more severe, and involve reconfigurations of social citizenship and as well as re-articulations of responsibilities.

In this paper, we wish to highlight the ways in which social citizenship is being re-negotiated through the local practices of public employment agencies. The new policies and routines being put in place in Swedish public employment agencies rest on a set of governance techniques that involve the active participation and activation of the individual. The individual is taught to see him or herself through the evaluative template of the agency, and to engage in a consensus-oriented dialogue with a grassroots level bureaucrat aimed at classifying his or her "employability" and "work ability". The paper identifies and critically analyzes the governance technologies in use in this work. We argue that these technologies involve a silencing of conflictive agentic power and alternative points of view. Moreover, we argue that the contemporary economic turn in public policy, as evinced in Sweden, encourage a reconfiguration of agency that speak to more encompassing changes in the notion of social citizenship. The paper aims to contribute to a critical discussion of the place of such governance techniques in the larger space of a changing political and social landscape.

Transnationalized Europhiles and Localized Eurosceptics: Attitudes towards European Integration from a Sociological Perspective

Kuhn, Theresa

*Political and Social Sciences, European University Institute
S.D. di Fiesole, ITALY*

Keywords

transnationalism, Euroscepticism, European Integration, attitudes

This paper aims at explaining mass-level Euroscepticism by emphasizing the impact of globalization and European integration on the social structure of national societies. The integration process, both a response to, and a trigger of globalization, has not only thoroughly changed Europe's political landscape, but has also had a tremendous impact on people's everyday life. In fact, the fading away of national borders and the rise of a supra-national polity have given rise to a vast array of opportunities beyond the nation-state. However, these processes are not beneficial to everyone and thus provoke a new division between winners and losers of integration. In light of these transformations, mass-level Euroscepticism seems to be a corollary of the processes of globalization and regional integration rather than a mere instance of public discontent about politics in general. Thus, this paper aims at analyzing the interplay between macro-level transnationalization and individual transnational practices and its impact on attitudes towards European integration. More specifically, it hypothesizes that on the individual level, transnational interaction makes Europeans more prone to favor the integration process. In other words, the extent to which individuals are engaged in cross-border interaction and mobility is expected to determine their attitudes towards European integration. On the macro level, however, transnationalization is expected to create a polarization between pro- and anti- European attitudes. The more a country is enmeshed in transnational networks and interactions, the more pronounced is the polarization. Hence, localized individuals in highly globalized countries are deemed to be most critical towards European integration. These hypotheses are tested empirically in a multi-level analysis of public opinion data from the Eurobarometer survey 65.1 (2006).

Voluntary Associations and Local State in Finland and in Lithuania

Siisiäinen, Martti

*Department of Social Sciences and Philosophy, University of Jyväskylä
Jyväskylä, Finland*

Kankainen, Tomi

*Department of Social Sciences and Philosophy, University of Jyväskylä
Jyväskylä, Finland*

Keywords

Voluntary association, local community, network, DEMOCRACY

The purpose of this paper is to examine the role associations in local communities in Finland and Lithuania. Special focus of the paper is on the relationships between associations and actors and institutions of local government (local democracy) in the two countries. This part of the paper is based on the comparison of the differentia specifica of the associations in both communities. The data was collected by surveys in two rural localities communities, that were (are) dominated by a big industrial enterprise (Lievestuore in Finland and Pabradė in Lithuania ) in 2008. The information is intended to fill to some extent the lacunae in comparative studies on local associations and their relations with public and private organizational at the local level.

The central interest of the research is to find out who are the local (and supra local) interaction partners of associations and what are the main fields of associational action in the communities. Sub-questions concern the interaction of associations with municipal institutions, trustees and officials, the media, church congregations, companies and other associations. The research also depicts the relative prevalence of the interconnecting networks among associations. Similarities and differences in the creation of interconnecting networks in Lievestuore and Pabradė will be explored. A general (theoretical) background for comparison are typologies of (local) state - civil society relations. The relationships between citizens - and citizens? associations - and the state have historically developed in very different ways in Finland and Lithuania. In Finland the relations between associations and the state can be characterised as neocorporatist and non-statist, in Lithuania the communist inheritance is more statist and non-corporatist. In this paper we try to see how these relations are manifested at the level of local democracy. We are also asking if there are proofs of the positive influence of corporatism and negative influence of statism on associational activeness in the communities under scrutiny.

RN33

Women's and Gender Studies

"Christian Occident", "Leitkultur" and "Fortress Europe" - challenges to feminist theory and politics

Marx, Daniela

*Goethe Universität Frankfurt/ Main, Cornelia Goethe Centrum
Frankfurt/ Main, Germany*

Keywords

Islam, Western-occidental identity, feminist discourses, feminist theory and politics

Since several years altercations with the Islam shape the political and medial debates surrounding multiculturalism and integration in western european immigration societies. The recourse to the "Christian Occident", the outline of a "Leitkultur", and the defense of the "Fortress Europe" are frequently mentioned keywords in these debates. The underlying subject-matter is, however, not exclusively the marginalization of the Islam and of Muslims: As so-called christian-occidental values such as tolerance and freedom of opinion are of high significance in these debates it becomes clear that it is rather the (re-)formulation of a western and european identity which is at stake in altercations with the Islam. Interestingly, the recourse to hierarchical gender orders occupies a central position in depicting the central features of the Islam and in justifying the assumed difference between members of the so-called islamic and the so-called western culture respectively.

These interwoven themes pose a challenge to feminists: Because of the multiple references to ostensibly feminist argumentations in the altercations with the Islam they find themselves positioned as the avant-garde of those battles, which are now fought out in the context of the (re-)definition of a western occidental identity.

In my contribution I will reflect feminist reactions to these challenges out of the perspective of a critical Occidentalism. Using the example of feminist discourses about the Islam in Germany and the Netherlands I will clarify the various positionings that are situated between universalist critique of multiculturalism and relativist critique of Enlightenment and Occidentalism. Thereby I focus on the hegemonic "occidental" feminist self-constructions that are apparent in these discourses: How are these being charged in form and content with regard to the topic Islam and "the muslim others"? Through which discursive figures and argumentative strategies is hegemonic feminist identity (re-)produced? Which theoretical assumptions underlie these constructions?

Based on this analysis I am going to focus the challenges that feminist theory and politics is currently confronted with: Which requirements result out of the virulent negotiations of "western-occidental" identity with regard to the (re-)formulation of feminist theory and politics? Which contribution can be provided by the gender studies to the aforementioned negotiations?

"Lazy boys and ambitious girls" - The view of school students from a qualitative perspective

Gruenewald-Huber, Elisabeth

Institute of Pre-Schooling and Elementary Schooling, School of Teacher Education, University of Applied Sciences Berne Switzerland, <http://www.faulejungs.ch>

Beat, Muerner

Research and Development, Project "Faule Jungs", School of Teacher Education, University of Applied Sciences Berne Berne, Switzerland

Keywords

qualitative research, adolescence, school performance

After gender equality regarding educational attainment and school performance was largely reached in European countries in the last decades of the 20th century, public attention has shifted towards the growing difficulties of boys in the school system ("boys turn"). The PISA studies provide profound evidence concerning gender differences in performance: girls perform better in languages while boys are stronger in natural sciences and mathematics. And the advantages of girls in languages are more relevant than the advantages of boys in mathematics (Faulstich-Wieland 2004). Furthermore overall marks of girls top those of boys.

This paper intends to examine the effects of gender role models and some individual factors like values and self-concepts of school ability on the performance of girls and boys in the school system. Another interesting question is how these individual characteristics are formed and reproduced in the daily interactions of pupils, for instance when doing gender processes take place. The presented analyses are based on qualitative data that have been gathered in low level and high level secondary grades during group discussions in Switzerland. Inspired by ethnographic approaches the analytic results of the group discussions are complemented by video-based classroom observations.

Preliminary results: A comparison between low level and high level grades indicates that traditional gender roles seem to be more common in lower social strata. Whereas especially boys at low level grades inherit very traditional gender roles, girls represent a larger variety of gender concepts. Analysing the group discussions, a subjective "common sense theory" on the causes of the gender-gap in school achievement may be identified: Girls and boys both to some extent share the assumption that boys in comparison to girls perform worse at school because they adopt an attitude towards school as well as a learning behaviour that is not supporting school achievement.

"New Maternal Lifestyle" - Analysis of the Changes in Motherhood in Poland

Mlodawska, Agata

*Sociology, Jagiellonian University
Krakow, Poland*

Keywords

Poland, lifestyle, Motherhood

The aim of following paper is to analyze the ways the model of "Matka Polka" (Mother Pole) has been challenged in within last few years. Matka Polka is known as construct that limits femaleness to "procreation and domesticity". Its main features are said to be "faithfulness to the church, obedience to a husband, devotion to household chores as well as handiness connected to permanent tiredness".

Although tendencies to reproduce or even reinforce traditional motherhood might be observed, they seem to be limited to lower classes. My goal is to study privilege mothers and their presence in space outside home. I am interested in investigating very specifying context of privileging motherhood, that is free market institutions stemmed from attempts to derive parenting from home. In other words objects of my interests are mothers friendly cafes, magazines promoting fashionable motherhood, etc. To resume I am concentrating on promoting maternal lifestyle targeted to high classes and transformations of public sphere it involves.

Moreover it is interesting how challenging catholic model is justified. My previous research showed that in Internet discourse concerning motherhood category Polish is usually used to describe practices defined as traditional, obscure, catholic, anti/modern and backward, whereas label "European" means civilized modern, fashionable, etc. I am interested whether "Matka Polka" is present in nay way in institutions I mentioned above.

My main question is what is their approach toward matka polka. Do they define themselves as European or cosmopolitan or, on the contrary seek new fashionable Pole. Do they operate traditional definition of modernity or reconceptualizing it by remodeling Matka Polka. What alternative model they are promoting

In my investigation I am using the category of lifestyle, that insofar has not been used in social research concerning motherhood in Poland. Previous research were rather influenced by moral panic related to decreasing birthrate. Apart from these rather confusing considerations how to force young selfish consumers to traditional parenting there were also scholars that analyzed motherhood as institution. Using the framework of lifestyle brings new perspective that might explain relation of class differences and mothering.

"Prevailing Women Ideal(s) in Modern Turkey: Always Honourable, Strong but Manageable"

Simsek, Leyla

sociology, marmara university, istanbul

istanbul, turkey

Keywords

representation, television, patriarchy, woman ideal

My objective is to analyse the persistence of patriarchal mentality under different guises in comparatively modern and liberal segments in Turkey focusing on the representations of female characters -both female TV celebrities and the female ideals they are supposed to embody in TV narratives- in mainstream TV channels after the 1990s and especially in the 2000s. From the 1990s on the flourishing advertising industry and TV dramas that attract a wide spectrum of audience have created numerous modern female ideals that left traces in public memory. As products of the male imagery, these TV representations incorporated ?beautiful, strong and intelligent heroines mostly appropriated into a romanticised version of patriarchal culture with its values, norms and relations. After a modernisation process of about two hundred years, women's status in the public sphere and society in general has still been a difficult issue in comparatively western, urban and liberal segments as well as in relatively eastern, rural and traditional ones. Even though it is never manifested frankly, honour is the basic requisite for the construction of modern "Turkish female ideal" that is created through different forms of media as proper wife and/or mother. TV representations most often play a role in legitimising the submission of women in patriarchal relations creating images of chivalrous and magnanimous heroes and expecting heroines to hand their lives into the hands of men by whom "a sympathetic and desirable" form of patriarchal dominance is created. Looking at the reflections of the female ideals on TV screen -both the heroines and TV celebrities-, it can be claimed that this male desire for strong, but manageable and always honourable women is one of the central features of the gender regime in contemporary Turkey and an analysis of representation can help unfold the multilayered intricacies of gender regime at work.

(Re) constituting the past, (Re)branding the present and (Re)imagining the future: Young women's spatial negotiation of gender and class

Taylor, Yvette

Geography, Politics, Sociology, Newcastle University Newcastle Upon Tyne, UK

Keywords

Gender, Youth, class

This ESRC funded research seeks to explore women's lives in the North East of England in the context of de-industrialisation and the transition to a service sector, leisure-based economy. Based on interviews with 97 women in the North East of England, this article aims to explore younger women's spatial negotiations in the context of change and continuation, where regional efforts on regeneration can be conceptualised against the backdrop of de-industrialisation and (urban) re-branding; the "past", "present" and "future" sit uneasily in these (re)imaginings. These re-constitutions force consideration to the different forms and consequences of social transformation, negotiated in the dis-identifications made by women where, for some, their presence was marked as distinctly out of place, as opposed to others who could more easily claim a movement and placement compatible with the sense of regional change and mobility. The themes of mobility and transformation occupy centre stage in many sociological accounts, where "movement" references people and places often without situating how these may be actually fixing or reconstituting class and gender inequalities, spatially, culturally and materially (Adkins, 2002). Attention to how gender and class may be reconfigured in changing times queries straightforward notions of change and "crisis", pointing towards the reshaping of exclusions and their intersecting dimensions.

A «new man» for a New State: The construction of masculinity within the Mocidade Portuguesa

Gouveia, Ricardo

Sociologia, Universidade do Minho

Braga, Portugal

Keywords

Gender, Masculinity, Estado Novo, Mocidade Portuguesa

The 1926 coup d'état has instituted in Portugal a dictatorial regime politically characterised as anti-liberal, anti-political parties, and anti-parliamentary, the Estado Novo [New State]. Its swift, though gradual consolidation has aimed from the start to indoctrinate the nation in the regime's ideals. In this sense, several organisations have been created to support such goal, among which the Mocidade Portuguesa (M.P.) [Portuguese Youth], founded in 1936. Initially, the MP was an exclusively male organisation, and only one and a half year later was created its female counterpart, the Mocidade Portuguesa Feminina [Feminine Portuguese Youth]. The affiliation in the MP was mandatory to all boys between 7 and 14 years old (the Lusitos and the Infantes, respectively), and their training rested on the objectives proclaimed when the organisation was created: physical training, moral formation, and devotion to the Homeland. These principles were to be accomplished and undertaken through the establishment in schools of «instruction centres» where boys were to be formed. As a formative complement, several publications were also created (O Jornal da MP, O Guião, O Camarada, Pisca-Pisca, O Boletim da MP, among others) that aimed to inculcate the regime's ideals. Since the ideology of the Estado Novo rested on the valuation and promotion of gender dimorphism, and their «natural» inequality proclaimed, the boys' training clearly departed from that of girls. So, whereas the first were educated to manage their «natural» leadership and head-of-the-family appetencies, the latter were trained in obedience to husbands and in domesticity. In this communication, we intend to analyse the configuration of that masculinity ideal within the MP based on a content analysis of two of the organization's publications, Guião, a doctrinarian magazine for leaderships, and the comics magazine O Camarada, designed to reach all boys. Results show that the mechanisms used by the regime in the construction of a Man who was supposed to be new rested on two fundamental clauses: first, an ideological cut from the recent (liberal) past; and second, the extinction of the «I» in detriment of the «We».

Being a Woman in Prison From Gender Based Sociological Perspective: A case study in Closed Woman Prison in Sincan Prison Campus, TURKEY

Gürtuna, Oksan

*Sociology, Ankara University
Ankara, Turkey*

Çabuk Kaya, Nilay

*Sociology, Ankara University
Ankara, Turkey*

Keywords

Crime, Gender, incarcerated woman, prison life, rehabilitation

The crime rates are being increase in today's Turkey because of several social or/and economic factors and it is known that theoretical studies and the researches in this area are insufficient in Turkey.

Under the supervision of "Modernization of Judgement and Penal Reform Project" which is being implemented with the cooperation of Republic of Turkey Ministry of Justice, the European Commission and the Council of Europe; the Turkish government aims to modernize the prisons.

On the other hand, Modernization of Judgement and Penal Reform Project aims to build up a modernised prison management perception, to create "the ideal type prison architecture", to support the on-the-training of the prison staff, the execution adjudicators and the auditing commissions. Furthermore this reform project's one of the main aims is the "rehabilitation" of the prisoner with different facilities.

As it is mostly criticised in the literature the changes were based on the needs of "male prisoners" not on the both "female and male prisoners". As set out here, our study tries to assess "the male needs-based" from a critical point of view and to take a picture of the "woman in a prison".

The study, aims to reveal how women maintain their womanish lives and the impact of the rehabilitation programs during their incarceration period from a gender based sociological perspective and problematizes that the women in the prison can not provide her basic needs as she did in her pre-prison life.

This study consists of two stages: one of which is theoretical in which basic concepts of the subject, theories tending to explain the criminal behaviour, gender effect on the criminal behaviour, the historical evolution of the prisons in the world and in Turkey, sociological approaches to the concept of prison and approaches to woman in prison, are mentioned.

At the second stage; field study will be conducted by using questionnaires and in-depth interviews to a random sample of 75 women with different penal times and crime types in closed woman prison.

Care Strategies and Social Inequality in Spain

Castelló Santamaria, Laia

SOCIOLOGY, UNIVERSITAT AUTÒNOMA DE BARCELONA
Cerdanyola del Vallès, SPAIN

Keywords

care work, social inequalities, Gender, Mediterranean countries, domestic service

The principal aim of this paper is to present the different "care strategies" of Spanish households -with women as main protagonists-, in their every-day life. These strategies are basically aimed to the supply of welfare to the members of the family, through domestic and care work, and are the result of the "work-life balance" opportunities and privations of each household. The understanding of these "strategies of care" will be illustrated from a perspective that integrates the dynamics and conflicts of power "intragender", originated by the position of women in the coordinates of social stratification like the ethnic group, the social class or the age.

The study of these strategies has allowed, in first place, to construct a typology of women depending on their mode of articulation of the production-reproduction binomial and, in second place, to approach us to their practices and experiences, as well as gender identities and social imaginaries.

One of the "care strategies" that will be analyzed in depth will be the "outsourcing" of the domestic and care work to the market -or commodification-. The literature and the datum make evident the raise in Spain, during the last decades, of the practice of moving the reproductive work from the family to the market. This commodification of the reproductive work could be considered a time-saving strategy by female employers; though in no case should it be considered a strategy that puts familistic and patriarchal values in doubt. The solution to the problems that Spanish households (women) have with self-managing reproductive work have been pre-eminently sought in the domestic market, without disrupting gender roles, the ethnic segregation or the lack of involvement of public institutions.

It is due to this that a "crisis of care" is occurring in Mediterranean countries, but without moving the bases that make it possible: the scarcity of personal public services channelled by the Welfare State and the low involvement of men in domestic affairs.

Caregivers for old people and social class

Langa Rosado, Delia

*Faculty of Social Sciences and Law., University of Jaén
Jaén, Spain*

Ariza Segovia, Sergio

Faculty of Social Sciences and Law, University of Jaén, University of Jaén Jaén, Spain

Martínez López, David

Faculty of Humanities and Education Sciences, University of Jaén Jaén, Spain

Olid González, Evangelina

*Faculty of Social Sciences and Law, University of Jaén
Jaén, Spain*

Keywords

women, Social Class, caregivers, old people, Family

In this work we aim to offer an analysis of those who care for old and dependent people in Andalucía. We use a data base produced by the Andalusian Statistic Institute in collaboration with Andalusian Universities from a survey about familial networks. This survey took place in 2005 with a sample of 10.000 people.

In a first analysis of the data (Langa Rosado et al., 2007) we emphasized the great importance of the family (in relation to the extremely low presence of public sector and volunteering), and specially women in the provision of care for old people.

Now, in a more detailed exploitation of the data, we would like to know more about the heterogeneity of these caregivers, making an analysis of them from a social class point of view. Besides, we make use of another information not just referred to the whole family of the caregiver but to the caregiver himself. This kind of data is about his/her cultural level, labour activity and obviously, gender (La Parra, 2001). García Calvente et al. (2004) say in this respect that class inequality and gender inequality are clearly linked.

So in this paper we aim to approach to the sociological profile of caregivers from different angles. We would like to know why they care, how much time they dedicate to this, when they care, how this activity affects their lives and what is the familial structure of duties and rights from where they become caregivers. Besides we want to read all this activity from the social position where we situate the familial and individual strategies (Bourdieu, 1988) where the decisions of caring old and dependent relatives are adopted.

Disable Women: Claiming for Equality

Arenas Conejo, Míriam

*Sociological Theory, Philosophy of Law and Methodology of Social Sciences, University of Barcelona
Barcelona, Spain*

Keywords

women, Social Transformation, disability, activism

Although more than a half of people with disabilities in Europe are women and girls, it has been a general absence of gender thinking in relation to women/girls with disabilities in both women's and people's with disability movements. Recognising and giving space to their voices is not only a social justice issue but it also has important implications for feminist thought and praxis. The Manifesto by Disabled Women in Europe in 1997 was born with the intention of calling for awareness and cooperation within the disability movement, within the women's movement and in society at large, but also as a tool for "women's with disabilities empowerment". This paper offers a general approach of these objectives ten years after the Manifesto was adopted, mainly focusing on two aspects: how women with disabilities have organized themselves across Europe in organizations for improving their lives through social and political transformation, and the synergies and distances that these groups have faced in relation to other women's organizations. For doing so it starts by analysing the characteristics of a selection of these organizations of women with disabilities, based on Internet available information. Also considering some key documents of their activism, it becomes the basis for offering a tentative description of the similarities and differences of activism of women with disabilities across Europe. Therefore, there will be explored some of the transformative effects that their discourse may imply when addressing gender equality policies, as for example those related with care activities. In this specific case, if we attend to the Position Paper on Care Issues (2006) of the European Women Lobby, when confronting the issues in the care sector we must recognise two sets of needs and preferences - the needs of those dependent or older people themselves and the needs of those who provide their care, recognising in turn, that women are not only the large majority of those who provide care but also of those cared for. Therefore, including the claims of women with disabilities in women's and gender studies emerges as a key question for its transformative consequences for the women's movement.

Do Gender Disparities Shape Female Decisions?

Gstrein, Michaela

*Economics and Finance, Institute for Advanced Studies
Vienna, Austria*

Mateeva, Liliana

*Economics and Finance, Institute for Advanced Studies
Vienna, Austria*

Schönpflug, Karin

*Economics and Finance, Institut for Advanced Studies
Vienna, Austria*

Keywords

care paradox, gender disparities, reaction chains, reproduction, work-care cluster.

While gender equality is a general aim of European policies, data shows that women are still empirically disadvantaged on a large scale. We look at gender disadvantages from a theoretical point of view, constructing various reaction chains to show potential effects of a wide variety of policy measures and their expected outcome for female decision spaces. How do gender disparities affect female labour market participation, the use of human capital, female income and careers, reproduction, care and participation in political and managerial decision making? How can policy measures change such disparities?

The paper will investigate the value of human capital in the context of Bourdieu's capital concept, the effect of the EU Lisbon targets for economic growth and sustainable development (e.g. high female employment) on care (care paradox), equity targets in democratic input-output models and the so-called glass ceilings in female careers.

While from a society's point of view, the attainment of high female employment is one of the most important factors to stimulate EU economic development and offset the effects of population ageing, female reality is often determined by many discriminatory factors that shape choices to the disadvantage of society itself - such as, for example, the currently low reproduction rate and observed deficits in old age care. A cross-country macro cluster for Europe concludes the approach, giving an impression of how women in different EU countries deal with the current contradictions and paradoxes of the existing gender order in Europe.

Drop Out of Women Graduates using the Example of Engineers in Baden-Württemberg, Germany

Jeanrenaud, M.A., Yves

*Gender Studies in Engineering, Technische Universität München
Germany, <http://www.ei.tum.de/gender>*

Ihsen, Prof. Dr. Susanne

*Gender Studies in Engineering, Technische Universität München
Germany, <http://www.ei.tum.de/gender>*

Keywords

drop out, gender bias, politics, employment, career

As the Learning Society in Europe gains more importance, the need for graduates increases, especially in manufacturing. The percentage of female graduates overall ranges about 40%, in manufacturing there are only a few. This can be seen very clear in German-speaking countries, where the pseudo-choice between family and career is as conspicuous and unequal biased. This gets even intensified when it comes to manufacturing enterprises and careers.

Hence our current study, funded by the Economics Ministry of Baden-Württemberg, analyses the reasons and causes for women engineers to drop out of employment corresponding to their technical education. First, there is only a small, nonetheless slowly increasing, amount of women engineers in Germany. Only about 20% of graduates in engineering sciences are female. Out of all engineers employed and contributing to social insurance only about 11% are women. Furthermore, figures show that chances to be unemployed are more than 2 1/2 times amongst women engineers than their male counterparts. Nonetheless, there is a strong demand for skilled highly qualified and specialised personnel, particularly engineers in mechanical and process engineering. This paradox is the starting point of the research discussed. Literature suggests several reasons for this circumstance. Hence the necessity to clarify what part the Glass Ceiling, the lack of appropriate role models and Work-Life-Balance take. Another hypothesis leads us to focus on the evolving of habitus ambivalences which tend to make it impossible for women engineers to harmonise their different habitus and segregated concepts of technology.

The study carried out by Gender Studies in Engineering at the Technische Universität München longs to answer the questions as to why these women dropped out and how to win them back into technological fields. Hence, the study primarily consists of biographical telephone interviews among women who possess engineering degrees but are no longer or have never been employed in the professions their education led towards. Additionally, we identify the need for women engineers by surveying potential employers and run an expert workshop where recommendations for politics and economy are developed on how to encounter these drop outs and regain the out-dropped women engineers.

Economic restructuring and the nature of things From industry to the care sector, working-class women in rural areas undergoing industrial decline

Pernigotti, Elisabetta

*Département de science politique, Université Paris 8 - Saint-Denis/Vincennes
Paris, FRANCE*

Keywords

nature, economic crisis, precariousness, working-class women

The modifications of the socioeconomic system can be extremely harmful for some categories of workers, such as working-class women living in rural areas undergoing industrial decline. The economic reorganisation acts as a massive push towards expanding the local care sector, frequently offering workers precarious and low-paid jobs identified with the feminine caring role. In spite of living this precarisation, the ideas of a feminist revolt appear far away from the worker's daily preoccupations. In this proposed paper I will present a comparative analysis of women's experiences of precarisation and of the activities within the care sector in France and Italy. I argue that heteronormativity, as inscribed in the composition of families and in the public and private gender labour division, plays a role in shaping the legitimacy of the socioeconomic transitions. Within a broader reflection on women's relationship to the local economy, I will then investigate the gendered dimensions of the socioeconomic transformations, which are connected to the reorganisation of the global neoliberal system. How do global socioeconomic transformations find their legitimacy? What refrains the examined category of workers from openly resisting such harmful orders? On the basis of a qualitative fieldwork research among precarious working-class women, living in the rural de-industrialized French and Italian territories, I will illustrate the dynamic of subjective experiences and subjective representations of the personal and local socioeconomic transformations. I will argue for the centrality of naturalisation and for the strategic synergy of multiple personal, local and g-local naturalisations, on which the relative acceptance of the global economic transformations relies. The paper will propose an analysis of the interweaving of subjective representations of, on the one side, working-class women's labour life, and on the other side, global economic transformations. I will focus especially on the idea of femininity emerging from the experiences of precariousness, as well as on the women's interpretation of the economic crisis. My analysis shows the centrality of locality and of the articulation of multiple naturalisation processes, which are gendering the global transformations and help shape the process of "becoming a g-local working-class woman".

Excellent (woman) scientist in Estonia: discourses of excellency in science.

Talves, Kairi

*Institute of Sociology and Social Policy, University of Tartu
Tartu, Estonia*

Keywords

discourse analysis, women in science, excellency, BASNET

Excellence in science is often considered as neutral from gender point of view. Still, the statistics shows that there is considerable gender gap in European research area and especially on high positions. Male-dominated culture and evaluation criterias keep women away from high positions and not only in SET and ICT areas, but also in humanitaria, which traditionally should be female dominated.

In current paper, we will shed a light to the women's voice in science. Interviews were made in 2006 with female scientists in Estonia, Latvia, Lithuania, Romania and Poland in FP6 project BASNET (<http://www.basnet-fp6.eu/>). We analysed the discourse of "excellent scientist" and how this will influence the Estonian women's self-positioning in science. Previous studies have shown that in masculine culture women often choose the strategy of withdrawal. As a result, their marginality appers to be chosen by them, although it is caused by the masculinity structures that prevail (Husu 2004). As these structural factors are difficult to recognise, women seem to settle voluntarily in the (lower?) position that is created for them (for example teaching) in the masculine organisation and accept it as their own (Naskali 2004).

In current paper we created the model of four types of "excellent scientist" that shows the women?s positioning in science and discourses around the excellency and how these affect the women self-perception and advancement. These four types named as a salesman, a creature from outerspace, a workaholic and a queen bee characterise the different types of excellency in science and are divided on the scale of masculinity-femininity. Therefore, some of them are masculine and considered as a norm or as a "real" excellency, but hardly achievable for women. Some of them are feminine, considered as suitable for women, but not so highly valued or desirable also by women themselves. As a result, this kind of understanding of positions of men and women in science creates the notion of gender segregated and masculine institution, where gender assumptions form the strong (hidden?) structure.

Families and Migrants on the Foundations of the Spanish Welfare State. A Diversion towards Informality in the Carework for Dependent People

Pérez Caramés, Antia

*Department of Sociology and Political Science, Faculty of Sociology. University of A Corunna
A Corunna, Spain*

Martínez Buján, Raquel

*Department of Sociology and Political Science, Faculty of Sociology. University of A Corunna
A Corunna, Spain*

Keywords

carework, Welfare State, Gender, ageing, female migration

The aim of this paper is to analyze the role of public policies towards dependency in Spain and their impact on the emergence of an informal economy of care services. Thus, we will study the legal basis of social protection towards old age, more specifically, the Promotion of Personal Autonomy and Care for the People in the Situation of a Dependency 39/2006 Act. A particular emphasis will be also put on the link existing between the Spanish economic and welfare models in the context of the European Union.

Within a context of demographic ageing and progressive incorporation of women into the formal labour market, the demand for employment in the sector of in-home care services is growing considerably, and the institutional response does not question its familistic nature. The recent approval of the so-called Dependency Act brought to light in the public debate the prominent role played by families in the provision of carework. Despite this public appreciation of the importance of informal care within the family, this legal text relapses into the familistic approach to carework, as well as into the privatization of the provision of care services. Hence, a double-sided informal diversion of carework occurs. On one hand, the strengthening of the traditional solution of assuming carework by women within the family. And, on the other hand, the commodification of this reproductive work by means of hiring female migrants.

The growing proportion of aged persons and the apparent future trend of reduction in the migratory flows coming to Spain set us in the most likely situation of an imbalance between the supply and demand in the provision of care services. In order to estimate this imbalance, we will use the "potential index of female carer" (as employed by OECD, 1994), applied to a projection of the Spanish population based on the cohort-component projection method with a horizon 2031.

An analysis of secondary data related to the public provision of care services and to female participation in the workforce will also be considered. Finally, information gathered from in-depth interviews with family and migrant carers will be employed.

Female Celebrity in Portuguese women's lifestyle magazines

Jorge, Ana

*Ciências da Comunicação, Faculdade de Ciências Sociais e Humanas
Lisboa, Portugal*

Keywords

magazines, local, global, women, celebrities

Within the scope of a research project aimed at exploring women's discursive representation in women's, men's and teen magazines, we propose to carry out an analysis of the particular discourse built around female celebrities in women's lifestyle magazines, focusing on the ways in which public and private lives are articulated for local and global, as well as for younger and older, celebrities.

Aimed at a female audience and built on a celebratory discourse, women's lifestyle magazines now use female celebrities as their main anchor, be it in interviews, red-carpet photos, film or music suggestions, or fashion and make-up references geared towards imitation. We wish to see, then, how these are used to convey a particular discourse on female identity, articulating certain dispositions regarding family, sexuality, relationships, motherhood, consumption, and public careers. We also wish to explore contrasts between celebrities and "ordinary" women, as well as between female and (the few) male celebrities in the magazines, so as to understand how discourse on "female celebrity" builds its specificity in these magazines, supported by strong lifestyle images. By analysing the March, June, September and December 2008 editions of Máxima, Activa and Cosmopolitan, we plan to conduct a quantitative analysis on the main categories of liberal feminism and post-feminism, and a subsequent critical (textual and visual) analysis of selected features on celebrities, highlighting how the negotiations between public and private lives, particularly between marriage/motherhood and career, are effected for Portuguese and global celebrities.

Female Contemporary Art Dealers in Chelsea (New York): What Happened to the Glass Ceiling?

Quemin, Alain

Department of Sociology, Université Paris-Est / Institut Universitaire de France Marne-la-Vallée Cedex 2, France

Keywords

women, professional success, glass ceiling theory, galleries, art market

In most countries, the population of visual artists represented by art dealers mostly consists of men as do most activities that deal with "business". It is, however, striking, that art galleries, especially those specializing in contemporary art, are often run by women and that women run some of the most important galleries. Thus, a social milieu in which the kind of discrimination that often affects women's trajectories and careers does not play, or, at least, plays a much less significant role than in most other social spaces is a worthy object of study.

Our fieldwork will take place at the very heart of the competitive contemporary art market, in New York's Chelsea. Here, we will study women gallerists and will attempt to determine in what measure their activity is different from their male colleagues. We will first compare the characteristics of the contemporary art galleries run by women with those that are run by men in terms of success. Then, we will study the trajectories of those women who direct the most important galleries. Our presentation will first rely on quantitative analyses in order to try and objectivate the link between gender and success. We will also deploy qualitative methods in the form of in-depth interviews with contemporary art dealers. We will use these interviews to try and understand their trajectories and to determine the factors that make it possible for women to succeed in the contemporary art market, in light of the barriers that women still face in other professions.

Female Research Excellence and Academic Migration in Europe

Dr. Wolfram, Andrea

Integration Team - Gender and Diversity Management, RWTH Aachen University Aachen, Germany

Lämmerhirt, Miriam

Integration Team - Gender and Diversity Management, RWTH Aachen University Aachen, Germany

Keywords

, migration of high-qualified women, women in higher education and research, women in science and engineering

Against the background of global challenges (migration, mobility, social equality, social crisis of human reproduction etc.) and an increasing lack of highly skilled academics in Germany and Europe the question of gender equality concerning access to and persistence in academic careers in science and engineering will continue to have high political relevance.

In a German joint research project the integration of highly skilled female migrants, especially from the new EU membership states as traditional sending countries, on the German scientific labour market is being investigated. The aim of the project is to determine effects of migration on the career development of highly skilled women in science and engineering.

So far, career development of highly skilled migrants in science and engineering has neither been considered in gender research nor in migration research to an adequate extent.

Accordingly, only marginal knowledge exists about the allocation of these female migrants on the scientific labour markets and their integration process. As a start, this research gap shall be closed through the joint research project for the German context as exemplary for the old EU membership states that are traditional receiving countries. In the project is being carried out analyses of representative data and qualitative interviews with highly skilled female migrants in science and engineering. It will deliver insights into the allocation of these highly skilled female migrants and reveal mechanisms that are relevant during the process of allocation and career progression. Methodologically, an intersectional approach will be applied in order to grasp the regimes of power at work that shape gendered diversity relations on the scientific labour market.

This presentation shall primarily focus on female academic migrants in the higher education and research sector in Germany in comparison to other European receiving countries. The conception and initial results of the sub-project "Allocation of female academic excellence on the move in higher education" shall be presented and its premises and perspectives for more gender equality in higher education shall be discussed.

Female self employment as a means of avoiding or circumventing the glass ceiling?

Ulbricht, Susan

*Sociology, Berlin School of Economics (Fachhochschule für Wirtschaft Berlin)
Berlin, Germany*

Gather, Claudia

*Sociology, Berlin School of Economics (Fachhochschule für Wirtschaft Berlin)
Berlin, Germany*

Keywords

Success, Glass Ceiling, motivation, Women`s Self Employment

According to research we conducted in 2008 based on data from the German Mikrozensus, German income tax data and registries into the Berlin Commercial Register on average a self-employed women in Berlin earns less than a female employee. Nevertheless there are very successful self-employed women regarding their income and the number of people they employ.

We would like to present findings from a research project that focusses on these successful female self-employed. We raise the issue if highly qualified women start their own business to avoid the glass ceiling of gender-related negative experiences, barriers or borders as employees. We particularly consider transitions between employment and self-employment. The study is based on qualitative interviews with self-employed women and longitudinal data about the professional career histories of women from the German Socio-Economic Panel Study (GSOEP).

Women are not as well represented as men in managerial und executive positions especially in Germany. Why do high qualified women leave the workplace to become self-employed? For highly qualified, successful female entrepreneurs we would like to discuss the thesis that starting a business is a means to avoid the glass ceiling in the labour market. The glass ceiling assumption is widely reported, but lacks scientific structured view and empirical evidence. We present findings of quantitative analysis using GSOEP-data, e.g. at which point of their professional career women tend to establish their own business and how are they doing there? Furthermore we present data from the qualitative case studies of highly educated and qualified women, most of them formerly in leading positions, who successfully set up their own business. Sensing and escaping the glass ceiling is one of the reasons, but not the only one by far. Women are motivated to go it alone from negative gender-specific work experience or an insufficient work-life-balance, but likewise by the desire for autonomy or self-fulfilment. They show a broad range of motives for starting their own business.

We would like to discuss the role of the professional life as pull as well as push factors in women?s decisions for self-employment. Can self employment help to avoid glass ceiling?

Femininity, patriarchy and resistance in the postwar Bosnia and Herzegovina

Majstorovic, Danijela

*Department of English language and literature, University of Banja Luka, Faculty of Philosophy
Bosnia and Herzegovina,*

Mandic, Maja

*Department of English language and literature, University of Banja Luka, Faculty of Philosophy
Bosnia and Herzegovina,*

Keywords

femininity, patriarchy, critical discourse analysis, discourse, resistance

Acknowledging that womanhood in Bosnia and Herzegovina (BiH) has traditionally meant complying with the more or less rigid patriarchal norm, especially when a war came to an end, this paper seeks to contextualize current female identities in the postwar BiH by assessing women's discourses with respect to patriarchy and resistance.

After WWII, modernity and industrialization of the ex-Yugoslav society resulted in a greater equality and emancipation of women only to be reversed by the increased repatriarchalization and poverty that ensued after the 1992-1995 Bosnian conflict. We believed that such a situation only made it worse for all women in BiH irrespectful of their ethnicity or religion and expected the social status to be a more important determinant in coping with the patriarchal legacies and emancipatory demands. We thought that women in BiH have more or less developed certain mechanisms of resistance and wanted to look into them in a feminist action research study that combined various multidisciplinary elements.

Presuming discourse to be both socially determined and socially determinative when it comes to attitudes, identities and agency, this triangulated study combined available data from previous social research on women in the region with six focus groups of BiH women of different social status. Then we analyzed the obtained transcripts in the manner of critical discourse analysis (CDA) in order to see what resistance discourses and strategies they used on a day-to-day basis when it came to surviving under and subverting the conditions of oppression.

Feminism Viewed as the Theoretical and Methodological Basis of Gender Contradictions

Narbut, Nikolaj

*sociology, Peoples' Friendship University of Russia
Moscow, Russia*

Keywords

gender attitude, gender role, gender stereotype

Feminism still remains a controversial phenomenon both for the Russian society and for the Russian social science. The underlying conditions are rooted in the peculiar features of social and cultural development of our country. The equality between the sexes which was specifically conceptualized and implemented in the Soviet times resulted in women shouldering «double burden». The idea of battle for the «utmost equality» under the conditions of complete equality of rights from a legal perspective is associated in the public conscience mostly with woman's private life frustration and the implied necessity for her self-fulfillment in the "alternative" social activity.

Such an attitude which is natural and fully justified at the level of the public conscience is often revealed in the research sphere where the implicit understanding of the specific position of feminism as the theoretical background for gender studies without which the academic status of the latter discipline cannot but raise doubts has not been gained yet. The above will show that the detailed analysis of feminism viewed as the integral theoretical conception revealing its heuristic value in the context of gender sociology regarded as the middle range theory is absolutely indispensable. The analysis of the basic concepts of gender sociology such as «gender», «gender stereotype», «gender role», «gender attitude», «gender stratification», etc. in the context involved is a must. However, it is well to bear in mind not only these concepts' interpretation in the «purely feminist» discourse (from Simone de Beauvoir to Julia Kristeva, etc.) but also their apprehension by male theorists not infrequently manifesting their masculinity in the understanding of the basic gender concepts - from sociological (A. Giddens) to purely philosophical (M. Foucault).

Freedom as Conformity: Re-veiling of Urban Women in Turkey

Cirakman Deveci, Asli

*Political Science, Bilkent University
Ankara, Turkey*

Keywords

patriarchal bargain, veiled women, Turkey

This study is a product of a larger project conducted in five cities of Turkey in 2009, supported by a generous grant from TUBITAK. This research is based on interviews, observations and focus groups conducted among veiled women who are employed as sales representatives in retail sector. The main concern of this paper is to see whether veiling or wearing the headscarf becomes an issue in the patriarchal bargain through which single or married women gain autonomy to enter into public space and in this case to appear at the counter. Re-veiling in the discourse of Islamic movements in Turkey throughout the 1990s came to represent the liberation of women from the oppression of secular and modernizing state. In fact, the issue of women's clothing had become an effective tool in the hands of both Islamist and secularist political projects in their struggle to establish or challenge the boundaries of public space. As operating within the parameters of dominant ideologies, in what aspects does re-veiling empower urban saleswomen with primary or middle education? Is re-veiling about conforming the existing patriarchal relations or does it mean a partial liberation from domestic activities or obligations? What are choices of these women within the context of patriarchal order who almost always live with their families or parents? What is the role of re-veiling in the renegotiation of gender identities?

Gender and heterosexuality: an analysis of visual discursive strategies in women's magazines advertisements

Pinto-Coelho, Zara

CECS, University of Minho

Braga, Portugal

Mota-Ribeiro, Silvana

CECS, University of Minho

Braga, Portugal

Keywords

social semiotics, Women's ads, heterosexuality

Images are a crucial social actor in the communication landscape of contemporary societies. Due to its commercial and aesthetic value, as well as public dimension, commercial ads play an obvious role in the configuration of this landscape. Not so obvious, though, are the roles that they play in processes of (re)production of social inequalities. Following previous research on gender and ads (e.g. Goffman, 1979; Sullivan, 1988), we explore how women's relationships with others are visually constructed in and through women's magazines advertisements. Since the visual others are mainly men, we show the connections between ads and discourses on sexuality (Foucault, 1976) and gender discourses (Wodak, 1997; Lazar, 2005). What kind of knowledge, attitudes and ideologies about sex and gender do these ads express and produce? What kind of social identities and relationships are constructed by them? And what are the visual choices that result from and produce these social effects?

Drawing upon social semiotics (Kress & van Leeuwen, 1996), we consider that visual choices perform three simultaneous functions (representing the world, acting upon it, and creating visual cohesion), and they constitute and are constituted by social situations, institutions and structures. To analyse the ways in which print ads construct women's relationships with others, we focus on the visual structure of representation, the position of the viewer, aspects of modality, and the meaning of composition.

Results of our previous research about female representation in the Portuguese press and ads (Pinto-Coelho & Mota-Ribeiro, 2005; Mota-Ribeiro, 2005) are articulated with a reflection on female sexuality (Butler, 1990), as well as with studies on women's images and ads (Berger, 1972; Williamson, 1988; Betterton, 1987; Winship, 1987; Goldman, 1992; Weitz, 1998;), to show the present evolution of visual constructions of gender and sexuality in advertising.

Our research shows that women appear mostly accompanied by man, mainly in a one to one relationship, annihilating sexual orientations other than heterosexuality. Although this is not different from conclusions of previous studies, there is a clear evolution in the representation of female sexuality towards man. However, does this sexual empowerment mean a change towards more egalitarian gender discourses?

Gender and Personal Networks in Spain at the beginning of XXI century

Ortega Gaspar, Marta

Sociología, Universidad de Málaga Málaga, Spain

Keywords

personal satisfaction, Personal Networks, informal social support, Gender

Gender and Personal Networks in Spain at the beginning of XXI Century.

This research is an empirical analysis of the relationship between the structure of personal networks and gender in Spain at the beginning of a new century (XXI).

The main objective is included into a general one that is related to a I+D Project : Social Networks as articulators of the Social Support, that pretends to know how personal networks contribute to offer an important informal social support in Spain and the rest of European countries.

The research pretend to answer the following questions: Which are the main characteristics of personal networks according to their sex? Which are the similarities and the disparities between personal networks by sex? Are there any correlation between the social support giving by a person and the type of network to which he or she belongs to? And Are there any different level of personal satisfaction according to the kind of the social support giving and the sex of the person who offer it?

Firstly a descriptive analysis has been carried out to know the structure of the personal networks by sex. And afterwards an analysis has been carried out applying a regression to determine the influence on the informal social support of the age, marital status, educational level, activity, habitat since a gender perspective. The data is based on The International Social Survey Programme 2001, Social Networks II.

Gender and Power in Local Politics

Maciel, Diana

CIES, ISCTE

Lisboa, Portugal

Keywords

political power, Gender, leadership

This abstract is about the relation between gender and power in local politics. How far do the political attitudes of women differ from those of men? What are the barriers and challenges women face to pursue a political career? What do men think about women political participation in society? What are the consequences in the family of women with political career?

For decades, women struggled to obtain universal suffrage and the right to participate in society. And for ages, women were attached only to household and domestic tasks. Since 2003, in Portugal, women are 25% of the government, but are only 5% in local power.

Between 2005 and 2008, I developed a research for my master degree, orientated by Professor Analia Torres, in which I interviewed 12 of a total of 18 mayors in the Metropolitan Area of Lisbon, eight of them men and four of them women. These interviews allowed me to identify their social profiles, to understand how they perceived their gender, what were their political priorities to their council, what were their major difficulties in work care, their ideas and concerns about women participation in political life and what kind of leaders were each one of them: men and women.

Gender Empathy Citizenship

Vianello, Mino

STATISTICS, UNIVERSITY OF ROME "LA SAPIENZA" IT,

Keywords

GENDER DIFFERENCE, DEMOCRACY, COMUNITARISM

THE PAPER QUESTIONS THE TRADITIONAL APPROACH THAT CONSIDERS THE MALE PSYCHE AS THE UNIQUE AND UNIVERSAL MIND OF THE HUMAN SPECIES, AND THE MECHANISMS THAT CHARACTERISE POWER IN THE PUBLIC SPHERE AS THE NATURAL AND INEVITABLE ONES WITH THE CONSEQUENCE THAT THE ATTEMPT BY LIBERALISM TO CONTROL THE ELITE OF POWER, TRADITIONALLY A MALE ELITE, IS THE MOST THAT CAN BE ACHIEVED. BASED ON AN ANTROPOLOGICAL-PSYCHOANALYTICAL APPROACH, THE AUTHOR CLAIMS A GENDER DIFFERENCE IN THE PSYCHOLOGICAL STRUCTURE OF THE HUMAN SPECIES, DUE AS FAR AS COLLECTIVE LIFE IS CONCERNED TO SOCIAL EVOLUTION. CRITICISING MAINSTREAM PREMISES IN THE VARIOUS FIELDS OF SOCIAL SCIENCE, THE AUTHOR PROPOSES IN THIS LIGHT A RE-EVALUTATION OF COMUNITARISM MADE POSSIBLE BY THE STILL EMBRYONAL, BUT PROMISING ACCESS OF WOMEN TO PUBLIC LIFE.

Gender equality policies and social practices: new developments in Spain

Tobío, Constanza

Political Science and Sociology, Carlos III University Getafe (Madrid), Spain

Keywords

GENDER EQUALITY, SOCIAL POLICIES, SOCIAL PRACTICES, Spain

Since 2004 gender issues are high in the Spanish government's political agenda. Half of the ministers are women and the first law sent to the Parliament for discussion focused on violence against women. In 2007 an innovative law on gender equality was passed by the Parliament. Beyond equality of opportunities, it aims at results in terms of a minimum representation of 40% of each gender in all spheres of public life such as political institutions, professions, workplaces and decision making bodies, particularly administration boards. It seeks to have equality discussed as a relevant issue through equality plans which are compulsory for all enterprises and institutions with more than 250 employees. The law develops former policies for the reconciliation of work and family life, focusing on the involvement of fathers in care. A new paternity leave up to four weeks is included based on the "use it or lose it" principle. In addition, it includes the promotion of gender equality in education and media, as well as in science and research. The paper discusses to what extent social practices and perceptions are being changed by gender policies. On the one hand, public spaces occupied only by men are increasingly considered to be anomalous and the presence of women required. Paternity leave measures have been very successful in terms of take up rates, thus changing ideas about fatherhood. In spite of that, violence against women fails to decrease and gender equality ranks low in the perception of social problems to be addressed.

Gender Inequality and Female Political Participation in Great Britain

Di Bartolomeo, Anna

*Department of Demography, Faculty of Statistics, University of Rome "La Sapienza"
Rome, Italy*

Keywords

Great Britain, panel data, political participation, gender inequality

This paper aims to study the rationale of women's political participation in Great Britain. In particular, we focus on the impact of family orientations about gender inequalities as people's attitudes can often predict behavior patterns; we also consider other factors related to gender issues, e.g. employment status, job satisfaction and household structure. Specifically, by using the British Household Panel Survey, we evaluate the impact of these determinants on the transition of women from a politically active life to the abandon of it. We use panel data methodology by considering both fixed and random effect models and discriminate among them by the Hausman test. We found evidence that gender inequality-oriented women have a higher probability to abandon an active support to a political party than others; while women who declare "neutrality" in gender equality opinions tends to become more likely to be not political engaged than gender equality-oriented women.

Gender made by nutrition. Forms of social reproduction of a difference

Rückert-John, Jana

*Institute for Social Sciences in Agriculture, University Hohenheim
Stuttgart, Germany*

John, René

*Institute for Social Sciences in Agriculture, University Hohenheim
Stuttgart, Germany*

Keywords

nutrition, needs, gender-role

Studies of nutritional sciences usually suggest a physical relation of sexuality and nutritional behavior. It is assumed that because of the different body composition (fat-water ratio) there are not only different nutritional needs but different preferences to food. Therefore gendered behavior appears as an effect of the naturalized body structure. Beside the rejection of some important arguments of the gender discourse of the 1990s, this assumption draws a very confined picture of the phenomenon of nutrition and eating.

Eating goes beyond the satisfaction of physical needs. Indeed occasions of eating have to be understood as causes for representing social relations. Since the 1920s there have been many studies showing that through eating the boundaries of community are constituted and confirmed, as well as role expectations. Gender marks one important aspect of social relations as well as its definition of male and female roles. As with every social occasion, nutrition as well realizes social relations and confirms also gender roles.

To argue for a gender-confirming instead of a sex-dependent status of nutrition, four observations will be discussed. Firstly, the social effects of the conversion from hunting to agriculture will be noted. Secondly, there are some remarks on the anatomical reasoning for the female status in antique households. Thirdly the argument will focus on the changed anatomy of women driven by changes in moral expectations during the 17th and 18th century. Lastly, attention will be drawn to the attribution-process of current gender role identities. In all these cases it can be illustrated that the valuation of nutrition was synchronized according to the current gender roles and gender hierarchy but the explanations have changed. Therefore nutrition is not an almost ahistorical expression of sexual differences but an occasion for the everchanging realization of gender differences.

Gender Narratives and Gay Marriage : Towards Deconstruction of Family Ideology

Lee, Soyoung

*Harvard University, Harvard-Yenching Institute
United States of America (nationality: Republic of Korea),*

Keywords

Gender, Narrative, minority, Gay Marriage, Regulating sexuality

This presentation deals with the controversy over gay marriage, which brings about the duplicity of governmental intervention and thereby marginalizing complexity of gender narratives by over-simplifying them.

I would be starting by examining genealogy of three historical phases of legal approach to homosexuality. Though homosexuality had generally been recognized throughout human history as abnormal, it was religious ethics that specifically banned and punished homosexuality. Moreover with the rise of imperialism, male homosexuals were persecuted as political scapegoats for masculine culture. Nevertheless with the advancement of human rights discourse, most of states nowadays have seized to prohibit homosexuality, except for gay marriage.

Gay marriage has become burning issue in discourse over human rights of sexual minority, for several countries had already started to approve it. Considering the tendency in cultural changes, it seems just as a matter of time even in many societies, just to converge the difference of homosexuals as that of the Others. However deeper problem originates with a paradoxical situation, for those of whom being oppressed by the government end up desiring the government's desire. In other words when the sexual minorities call for help of governmental authorities or legal enforcement, they cannot but experience excessive interference. Hence, soon as gay couples weave into the official institution of marriage their uniqueness and radical culture would probably start to get drained, and they would end up being assimilated to the ideology of normal family. Hence reconstruction of legislation towards gay marriage should simultaneously take place with deconstruction of family ideology.

For the purpose of eventually deconstructing the myth of home sweet home that unconsciously suppresses sexual diversity, I will try to investigate the very nature of family ideology in legal culture. Such work requires the supplements of various postmodern theories in psychology, legal anthropology, as well as law and literature. It includes the interpretation of mythology on Oedipus and Antigone, fieldworks done in polygamy societies, and critique of literary pieces that deals with sexual minorities.

Gender Narratives and Ideological Effect of Patriarchal Protection toward Minorities

Lee, Soyoung

*Harvard University, Harvard-Yenching Institute
United States of America (nationality: Republic of Korea),*

Keywords

patriarchy, Prostitution, Gender narratives, Ideological effect

In this article I will be examining how, fixing a minority subject to the imagery of stereotyped victim is by itself an ideological effect, how it shatters polyphonic voices of resistance, confining them to the refined political effects.

The ideology of paternal protection identifies the role of government as that of the Father, thereby operating as an almighty micro-power. Patriarchs would be more docile and passive toward the macro-power, by being granted the micro-power and authority within their individual family units to serve the role of one who look after the weak. Besides, another ideological effect of legal protection is the placing of individuals in the subject position of minority, as ones to be looked after and to be spoken on behalf of. It may easily take the form of "though you may not know, I tell you, it is for you"

A good example may be found in Anti-prostitution Acts that had been enacted in 2004, which aroused controversial debates in Korean civil society. This may demonstrate an interesting case study to European gender studies, too. While this act had been suggested and strongly reinforced by feminist movements namely to protect the human dignity of prostitutes by eradicating the brothel, the prostitutes held protests against this prohibition, insisting that they want to be acknowledged as sexual workers instead of being "protected" against their own work fields. Nevertheless their voices were not significantly recognized in the course of public debate. Major feminist NGOs didn't take their narratives seriously, worrying that such voices of prostitutes might be viciously misused by the opposing side, by those who try to justify prostitution claiming that brothels are necessity evil for vitality of society. Hence the narrations of prostitutes were being double marginalized; by male dominant society as well as by feminist groups who speaks on behalf of their rights, both of whom perceives prostitution as the Other to family-based social system.

Gender Representation in Italian Trade Unions

Soldà, Monica

*Sociology and Social Research, University of Trento
Trento, Italy*

Keywords

visual narrations, Gender, trade unions

This paper draws on a case study of an Italian trade union, CGIL, to illustrate the importance of rethinking the industrial relations tradition from a gender perspective which considers gender as socially constructed and whose primary focus is on gender relations. In Italy, as well as in all Europe, after the Second World War, trade unions gradually adopted the "breadwinner" wage objective, legitimating a form of hegemonic masculinity, the worker masculinity, and thereby driving divisions between male and female workers. So, Italian trade unions are traditionally male dominated organizations where women are underrepresented and their experiences marginalized.

Up to today scholars investigating Italian trade unions have been considering only the question of women underrepresentation in these organizations. The choice of a gender perspective to analyze trade unions is relatively new in this field of studies.

The focus of my paper is therefore on the topic of gender construction in trade unions, referring to gender as a social and discursive practice that is constructed in everyday interaction and that places people in asymmetrical power conditions. My aim is to deepen the understanding of whether men and women unionist conform with this hegemonic worker masculinity or, otherwise, if there are alternative forms of masculinities and femininities.

My focus will be on CGIL (Confederazione italiana del lavoro), the oldest and biggest Italian trade unions confederation that in recent years has fostered some good practices promoting equal opportunities between men and women and the presence of women in leadership positions.

For my purposes I used tools coming from the visual sociology tradition, that is, the use of visual media to study society as well as the analysis of visual representations of social relations. I started from the assumption that gender is inherently a visual topic, and therefore I analyzed how visual artifacts as pictures, posters and newspapers have been vehicles of trade unions' gender culture in Italy.

In this paper I'll present and discuss these artifacts in a narrative perspective in order to understand how the union itself represents gender, that is, how femininities and masculinities have been visually constructed in these organizations.

Gender, locality and social capital. Studying diversity and (trans)formation of social capital across individual life course

Kivelä, Päivi

*Department of social sciences and philosophy, University of Jyväskylä
Jyväskylä, Finland*

Keywords

Pierre Bourdieu, life course, social capital, locality, agency

Main stream research recognizes social capital generally as a positive outcome of sociability in a community or society level. In addition capacity to gain economic benefits through social network connections has been stressed. However, quite limited attention has been paid to understand diversity and unequal potentials of social capital at individual level. This paper and a larger research project behind it, contributes to repair this gap. I intend to analyze conflicting affects of social connections in relation to socioeconomic disadvantages. This paper draws from my doctoral dissertation study exploring diversity, (trans)formation and capacity of social capital by investigating actor's practices and life course trajectories in one geographically limited rural locality in central Finland. I consider that actor's social capital may open - or close - access to various networks. The volume of social capital equals to the extent and variation of resources, which can be mobilized though different network relations. Theoretical point of view refers to the approach of Pierre Bourdieu, and to ongoing discussions in women's studies taken place since 1990s. Considerable number of scholars have stressed that bourdieusian analysis is useful for feminist studies because it provides a possibility to combine class analysis and cultural studies in a way, which pays attention to individual experience.

My empirical analysis exploits firstly survey data collected in research locality. It measures accumulation and diversity of economic, cultural and social capital possessed by different age groups and provides a three dimensional base for local inequality (or class) structure. Secondly life course interviews with relatively low-educated mothers in their 50s enable to analyze how class and intersecting divisions like gender, age and region of living are framing women's agency. I am asking: How women have managed such individual transitions as returning to paid work after several years of child rearing at home? How they have coped with societal and local transitions, like the collapse of symbolic value of hands-on experience compared to formal education and qualifications? And above all: what are the potentials and contradictions of different types of social connections and social capital in their coping?

Gender, Migration, Remittances: Evidence from Germany

Holst, Elke

*SOEP, DIW Berlin, University of Flensburg
Berlin, Germany*

Schaefer, Andrea

*Bremen International Graduate School of Social and DIW Berlin, Bremen International Graduate School of Social Sciences and DIW Berlin
Berlin, Germany*

Schrooten, Mechthild

*SiB, University of Applied Science Bremen
Bremen, Germany*

Keywords

Immigrant Workers, Economics of Gender, Remittances

Gender-specific determinants of remittances from the senders' perspective are the subject of this study based on German SOEP data (2001-2006). In 2007, about 7 million foreigners were living in Germany. While the total number of foreigners has decreased over the last decade, female migration to Germany has increased. Until now a study that addresses gender-specific determinants of remittances from Germany is lacking. Focusing on gender roles and intra-family network effects we attempt to fill this gap.

Basically, we distinguish between two different groups of migrants: foreigners and Germans with migration background. Our findings show, above all: gender matters. Taking financial transfers into account, females remit less than males. However, this negative effect disappears after controlling for intra-family networks. Nevertheless, using gender-specific interaction terms reveals further insights to gender-specific determinants of remittances. Foreign females with children abroad remit significantly less than males. At a glance this finding might be confusing. However, it might result from traditional gender roles. It has to be taken into account that the probability to leave a child left abroad seems to be lower in the case of women than of men. In addition, it is argued that typically the economic power to transfer financial resources depends on gender effects. It can be assumed that females provide several non-monetary goods and services. Differences in the determinants of remittances between foreigners and Germans with migration background might result from their differences concerning the possibility to reunion the family in Germany.

Gender, Prisons and Drug Abuse

Torres, Analia

*Sociology, CIES/ISCTE
Lisboa, Portugal*

Maciel, Diana

*Sociology, CIES/ISCTE
Lisboa, Portugal*

Sousa, Isabel

*Sociology, CIES/ISCTE
Lisboa, Lisboa*

Lito, Ana

*Sociology, CIES/ISCTE
Lisboa, Portugal*

Keywords

drugs, Prison, Crime, drug addiction, Gender

We gather here results from two different research projects one about drugs and prisons and the other one about life trajectories of female and male drug consumers. We discuss some examples of how gender shapes life course and is constantly at stake whether we are talking about organisational issues - trajectories of male and female prison's directors, for example - types of crimes committed and their relation to drugs, or family patterns histories and practises with intimate perceptions of drug addict's.

The first research findings, about Drugs and Prisons, were obtained through a survey questionnaire applied both in 2001 and in 2007 to a representative sample of all the inmates of the Portuguese prisons and through a questionnaire applied to all the prison's directors. With the survey to the inmates we could analyse what were the types of crimes committed and what was their relation with drugs, among a lot of other issues. Gender differences were systematically analysed. Through a multivariate analysis we could clearly identify gender patterns distinguishing both female and male inmate's trajectories. With the results of the questionnaire to the prison's directors, using also with multivariate analysis, it was possible to draw a picture of how gender inequality is still present even when - and this was a surprising finding - the majority of the prisons' directors are now women?

The main goals of the second research were to understand and to explain the social processes, the family patterns and the individual features that can contribute to drug addiction. We were trying to answer questions like: why so many young people experiment drugs and only few become addicts? Why in the same family context siblings have different attitudes and behaviours towards drugs? Why are there so much more male than female addicts? How does gender construction plays a role? With the general purpose of answering these questions we started a research using different research techniques: the analysis of a database of a centre for drug addicts treatment in Lisbon; a follow-up study of a group of patients; in-depth interviews with a comparative analysis of the individual histories.

Hidden Prostitution: Tendencies, Subcultures, Cultural Mobility

Barnao, Charlie

*DOPES (Dipartimento di Diritto dell'Organizzazione Pubblica, Economia e Società), University of Magna Graecia, Catanzaro, Italy
Catanzaro, Italy*

Keywords

culture, Ethnography, Prostitution, Gender, Homosexuality

Hidden Prostitution: Tendencies, Subcultures, Cultural Mobility

The paper examines the so-called hidden prostitution.

Usually, hidden prostitution is the prostitution of somebody who receives at home through ads, or picks up customers in nightclubs, bars, saunas, beauty centers, etc. In the present work I use the term hidden prostitution with a broader meaning, including in it another form of prostitution: male prostitution in parks, public toilets, car parking, etc.

The main hypotheses of the paper are: a) there are specific subcultures within the phenomenon of prostitution, b) the phenomenon of prostitution is developing on the basis of two main trends: invisibility and impersonality of sexual acts; c) the subculture of prostitution has important connections and elements of integration into the dominant culture.

Based on the results of an ethnographic research (October 2003 - March 2005, with returns on the field in 2006, 2007, 2008 and 2009) that I conducted in Italy, I describe the phenomenon highlighting certain aspects: roles and organizational structures, relational dynamics, emotional labour, prostitute/client interactions, communication codes, gender differences.

The picture that emerges is a complex and varied phenomenon which quickly transforms and adapts itself to market needs maintaining, however, a clear cultural horizon of reference.

How different is the work-life balance satisfaction between men and women in European comparison?

Szalma, Ivett

*Institute of Sociology, Hungarian Academy of Sciences
Budapest, Hungary*

Keywords

Gender, work-life balance, division of housework, multilevel analyses, satisfaction with work

In this paper we focus on questions related to work-life balance issues paying special attention to significantly different views of men and women. In the socialist era just a few women stated that they had difficulties in reconciling their family lives and their work while the most of them were in full time position in Eastern-Europe. The situation has changed and the number of women who have difficulties in harmonizing their roles (as wife/mother and employee) is increasing in Eastern Europe. It is a well-known fact that the participation of men in housework can reduce the burden on women. We can find that men especially in the Scandinavian countries take part in housework activities more.

We try to find answers to questions like: Is there yet differences in work-life balance satisfaction between Eastern and West European countries? The women in Scandinavian countries are more satisfied with the work-life balance than in other countries?

We expect that the family type would have significant effect: singles would be more satisfied with the work-life balance than those who have partners. The impact of employment on parenthood is also different for men and women: Hungarian as well as European data show that childless women and men with children do more paid work than women with children and childless men. The fact that men with children are more likely to be employed than women with children can indicate that men are dealing with less time management problems deriving from reconciliation of family and work than women.

Data from the third wave of the European Social Survey (ESS), conducted in 23 European countries (N=42,999), are used to test the assumptions. In addition to descriptive statistics displaying the European situation, causal models are developed to investigate statistical relationship with basic socio-demographic categories, some work attributes, as well as the workplace and employment relations characteristics as the main predictors of work-life balance satisfaction, separately for men and women. We will apply multilevel analyses to eliminate the design effects in the sample.

How to explain the gender gap in self employment?

Claudia, Prof. Dr. Gather

*FB I, Fachhochschule für Wirtschaft
Berlin, Germany*

Ulbricht, Susan

*FB I, Fachhochschule für Wirtschaft
Berlin, Germany*

Keywords

lack of theoretical framework, gender inequality, self employment

In the last 40 years much research was done on gender inequality in the labour market. We know a lot about the gender wage gap, women's participation in the labour market, sex segregation of jobs, gender educational attainment, and different opportunities of advancement. A lot of theories were developed to explain those differences (i.e. collective bargaining power, sex segregation of jobs, the disembodied worker, gender bias in the job evaluation system, etc.)

Contrary to employment we don't know much about the gender gap in self-employment and gender imbalances in enterprise development. Compared to male entrepreneurs in all of the European countries women entrepreneurs are less numerous. Self-employed women earn less money than their male counterparts, their enterprises start smaller and stay smaller. We conducted a research project on self-employment of women and will report empirical evidence for the gender gap (based on data from the German Mikrozensus, German income tax data and registries in the Commercial Register).

Some scholars argue that gender differences in self-employment can be explained by differences in the human capital. Others claim that women appreciate different values than men and that their different living conditions can affect their motivations and expectations for their businesses. We will instead argue that there are gender-specific barriers and constraints that may not be easily visible at first glance but nevertheless affect and shape women's self-employment. There are few conceptual frameworks regarding women entrepreneurs (i.e. the concept of biographical embeddedness, social exclusion and self-employment Apitzsch/Kontos). We need more theoretical concepts in order to understand how gender as a social institution works for female entrepreneurs in detail on different levels and for various female entrepreneurs differently. Together with sociologists from other countries we would like to discuss how to fill this theoretical gap and where to start.

Infertile women facing catholic morality in Poland. The case of in vitro fertilisation

Kirejczyk, Marta

Science Technology and Policy Studies, University of Twente Enschede, The Netherlands

Keywords

Poland, religion, in vitro fertilisation, regulatory policy, Gender

In Poland in vitro fertilisation, although practiced for many years, is completely unregulated and accessible only to women who can afford it. Recent policy initiatives to regulate this area pose formidable challenges to women's feminist movement. In the country where moral values of the Catholic church dominate the public discourse and hardly any political, social or professional organization dares to oppose it, where women's reproductive rights are not highly regarded and even those who qualify for a legal abortion cannot be certain to get one, there are good reasons to fear that new controls will be imposed on women and their reproductive bodies. And indeed, the regulations being drafted by the main political parties range from the total prohibition of IVF to limiting the access to married couples only, excluding sufferers or carriers of genetic conditions, forbidding creation of spare embryos, forbidding pre-implantation genetic diagnosis and further eroding the highly restricted right to abortion.

As was the case in the regulatory debates carried in the Western-Europe at the end of the last century, the public discourse revolves around the embryo and its protection while women's needs are hardly mentioned. But in recent months Polish feminists become more visible in the public arena and make efforts to enter the political arena. The perspectives of the Polish feminists differ strikingly from those of the feminist movements in the West in the 1980s and 1990s. There is no debate about the liberating or oppressive character of reproductive technologies. Feminists are united in claiming the women's right to the 'state of the art' infertility treatment and in defending the right to abortion. They prove capable of forging alliances with a range of public and political actors, of mobilizing public support and of organizing opposition which catches the attention of the media. Will they be successful?

Against the backdrop of attempts by the church and the political establishment to institute a post-transition Poland as a 'model of moral order' for Europe, I will analyse the evolving dynamics of the Polish women's struggle in defence of their reproductive rights.

Integration strategies and policies in Italy: the case of intellectual migrant women

Stratti, Ingrid

Human sciences, International University Institute for European Studies Gorizia, Italy

Dugulin, Lorenzo

Passage XX-XXI, Université Lumière Lyon 2 Lyon, France

Keywords

migrants, intellectuals, women

In the controversial debate in Italy regarding, on one hand, the possibility/impossibility of migrants' integration and, on the other, the complexity of the integration process, most scientific works focus either on the legal aspects in a merely juridical or economic perspective or on the integration of the more "disadvantaged" migrants in a sheer perspective of human rights defence. Our paper will focus on an aspect which has been completely neglected until now, that is the study of the integration processes of migrants from another point of view, that of the migrant women. This paper will overcome all previous studies about immigration and integration in Italy through a more mature analysis of the migrants' integration process taking into consideration its highest manifestations, that is the study of the integration strategies enacted by intellectual migrant women in Italy.

Most scientific works focus on gender migration in Italy from a paternalistic point of view, taking into consideration only the most disadvantaged ones, that is those carrying out menial jobs. This approach is not enough in order to demolish the stereotypes and prejudices which are commonly associated to migrant women.

Our hypothesis is that intellectual migrant women do not follow "traditional" strategies to integrate into the Italian society, but they go beyond the learning of the hosting country language and of the learning of cultural habits through the achievement of a deeper awareness which allows them to overcome the daily problems in order to participate in cultural and social activities at a higher level. Therefore, we will argue what strategies are enacted by intellectual migrant women to integrate into the Italian society through the analyses of a certain number of interviews and writings produced by migrant women residing in Italy.

International Women's Day: from objects to subjects of history

Cerqueira, Carla

*Communication Sciences, University of Minho
Vila Verde, Portugal*

Cabecinhas, Rosa

*Communication Sciences, University of Minho
Braga, Portugal*

Keywords

Evolution, objects, International Women's Day, triumphs, subjects

There isn't a consensus as to the historic occurrence which originated the International Women's Day. However, the more prominent viewpoints suggest working women's struggle for better living conditions as the starting point. We do know that the International Women's Day was proposed by Clara Zetkin in 1910, during the II International Conference of Socialist Women, which took place in Copenhagen, Denmark. Thus, there is an omission of the historical truth behind the origin of the event, but from that date on, the day has been celebrated in several countries, commemorating the national and international economical, political and social triumphs of women. Initially, the event was also marked by strong movements of political and working demands, strikes and police prosecutions.

The 8th of March became prominent and in 1975 the UN established the event, which has been celebrated in Portugal ever since, due to the recent triumph of Democracy, after a 48 year long dictatorial regime. The Portuguese context possesses certain characteristics which come from the political, social and cultural contexts, and made feminist struggles' visibility start only in the 70's and 80's of the XX century. Nowadays, feminism takes new contours in a society marked by capitalism, where women have gone from being seen as objects to being subjects, but where emancipation becomes apparent.

This communication aims to reflect upon the origin of the International Women's Day and the steps of a feminist path, which culminates in the contemporary society, marked by the paradigm of the body.

Interrogating the Epistemic Status of Gender Research in European Sociology

Pereira, Maria do Mar

Gender Institute, London School of Economics and Political Science London, United Kingdom

Keywords

Higher Education, academia, women's studies, Gender Studies

In many European countries, sociological research on gender has increased and intensified in recent decades and become an integral part of current training and debates in Sociology. Several authors have commented on these processes and their work has made crucial contributions to our understanding of the factors and agents which shape the emergence, expansion and sometimes decline of gender as an object of teaching, research and publication in Sociology. However, most of these studies do not problematise in detail the epistemic status of gender research, i.e. the degree to which work on gender is recognised as a valid, relevant, credible and authoritative field in sociological academic communities.

In this paper I draw on my own empirical work and a broad literature review to argue that diverse competing discourses about the epistemic status of gender research are often mobilised in those academic communities. I claim that this has concrete effects on the conditions and possibilities for researching, teaching and studying gender issues, and the degree to which, and terms on which, work on gender is disseminated and engaged with in wider Sociology communities. I argue that if (as feminist epistemologists have shown) it is in large part due to its association with specific markers of epistemic value that the authority of academic practice is produced and legitimated, then the ways in which gender research is positioned in relation to those markers in concrete institutional and national contexts must be closely examined.

Managerial Gender Discourse, Human Resource Management and Organisational Change

Meuser, Michael

Institut fuer Soziologie, Technische Universitaet Dortmund Dortmund, Germany

Keywords

managerial gender discourse, gender politics, gendered organisation, gender mainstreaming, Managing Diversity

The approaches of Gender Mainstreaming and Managing Diversity changed gender discourses within the field of gender politics. Both approaches contribute to gender becoming part of human resource management, Managing Diversity more than Gender Mainstreaming. The semantics of gender, formerly determined by a discourse of social inequality, is extended or - as some critics argue - replaced by an economic or managerial discourse.

The paper first reconstructs the semantics of the new economic or managerial gender discourse. Two interconnected features will be explained: (1) the revival of the figure of a gender-specific working capacity which was prominent in (German) gender studies in the eighties, but later on criticised for its essentialist undertones, and (2) the implicit understanding of gender as a human resource of females only.

Second, the paper asks how organisations will probably change if the new meaning of gender as a human resource is implemented. It is to be expected that the organisation's self observation will change. Gender would become a routine criterion in it. This opens interesting questions for the sociology of organisations. The mainstream of organisational theory sees organisations as gender-indifferent formations. If gender becomes a regular resource in organisational development the empirical reality organisational theory is related to changes. Organisations will observe themselves through the lenses of the managerial gender concept, but it is questionable that thereby the gendered substructure will be detected. Gender theory and organisational theory are challenged to explore how the hidden gendered substructure and the new explicit focus on gender are related.

Finally, the efforts of organisations to make use of (female) gender as a human resource are discussed in gender-political terms. Does "capitalising" the gender difference mean more than radicalising the logic of a market related individualism? Is the new gender discourse part of a politics of inequality and by this only a rhetorical modernisation? Or does the economically motivated "utilisation" of gender - paradoxically - result in more gender equality than older approaches in gender politics were able to realise?

Migrant Women's Organizations in Athens: Gender and Social Capital

Leontsini, Mary

*Early Childhood Education, University of Athens
Athens, Greece*

Christopoulou, Nadina

*Early Childhood Education, University of Athens
Athens, Greece*

Keywords

social capital, Migration, Gender

Migrant women in Athens liaise and organize themselves in a variety of ways, forming groups, networks, associations and organizations. Most of those groupings are limited to female members, while others appear in the form of cultural associations and include men, although their participants are in the majority female. They are at most ethnically based, although there are two umbrella organizations which function in close contact with one another, and which encompass various ethnic groups: the African Women's Association which is open to membership from all over Africa, and the Pan-Hellenic Network of Migrant Women, which aspires to include all the migrant women's groupings all over Greece, and to act as a joint platform. Gender issues are of crucial importance to the process of multicultural democracy: men and women participate to the making of everyday life in the host country following a division of labor, which constitutes a re-negotiation of cultural values, symbolic meanings and material conditions. We are studying the quality of social capital which can be fostered and mobilized within the scope of women's organizations, both formal and informal. Based on in-depth interviews and participant observation, we are planning to analyze a) the various modes of networking of migrant women's organizations in Athens, b) the ways in which formality and informality of women's networks and / or organizations affect the social integration of migrant groups in Athens.

New developments on the Prevention of Violence Against Women

Puigvert, Lidia

*Sociological Theory, Universitat de Barcelona
Barcelona, Spain*

Flecha, Ainhoa

GEDIME, Universitat Autònoma de Barcelona Bellaterra (Cerdanyola del Vallès), Spain

Pulido, Cristina

*Sociological Theory, Universitat de Barcelona
Barcelona, Spain*

Keywords

Preventive Socialization, attractiveness models, violence against women, sociological theory

In recent years, great efforts have been articulated from the research community to study violence against women from different disciplines and focuses such as the origin, its causes and occurrence of gender based violence at different settings like homes, workplaces, or universities. In this paper, authors will present some of the findings of studies that have been conducted under the new approach to the sociological analysis of violence against women denominated preventive socialization on violence against women. Research on preventive socialization on violence against women is rooted in recent developments in contemporary sociological theory (Duque, Giddens, Habermas, Benhabib, Elster, Gómez, Butler, among others) and the studies conducted among teenagers and university students about their socialization processes and their potential connection to violence against women. The central premise is that there are different socialization processes that prepare teenagers to feel attracted to individuals whose values and behavior tend to be violent, leading to unequal or even violent relationships. In the case of young girls, studies have shown that there is a greater attraction to a male model that represents the hegemonic model, with values similar to the patriarchal society. In these studies, it is showed how this kind of socialization is articulated and how female teenagers have learned to feel attracted to violent partners, instead of refusing them. Opening up this new research area has enlightened the existence of many questions that need to be further explored from this perspective. Authors will present the theoretical framework as well as some examples of empirical research that has been conducted.

New gender inequality in a multicultural society: The dominance of masculine culture in a primary school

Chen, Hsin-Jen

Centre for Teacher Education, National Chung Cheng University Chia-Yi, Taiwan

Li, Ying-Zi

primary school teacher, Huwei Elementary School Yun-Lin, Taiwan

Wang, Ya-Hsuan

Institute of Education, National Chung Cheng University Taiwan, Taiwan

Keywords

Gender Division of Labor, gender regime, gender hierarchy, masculinity/femininity, gender ideology

Gender inequality and gendered regime still exist in schools as well as in the wider society. It appears as a new form of inequality that glass ceiling is gone in the condition of women acting masculinity (Connell, 2006). Especially the gender division of labour is often seen in the personnel arrangement of schools. Addressing the policy of gender equality, this research examines whether "school leadership is a masculine culture" and "school is a male institution". This paper aims to explore the dominance of masculine culture in a primary school's personnel and space arrangement. Drawing the male/female discourses on personnel/space arrangement, we focus on the themes of gender hierarchy, gender femininity/masculinity and gender regime.

Based on a primary school as a case study, we collected qualitative data by participant observation, individual interviews and focused group interviews from both 9 teachers and 12 six-grade students in the researched school. The interviewees were asked about their perceptions of doing administration, doing gender and performing femininity or/and masculinity.

We argue that primary school is constituted of a masculine culture in the gender division of labour determined by teachers' masculinity or femininity. Both male and female teachers with masculinity dominated the masculine job such as student discipline, while those teachers with femininity dominated the feminine job such as student counseling. The personnel arrangement of classroom teaching job appears a pattern of masculine teachers for higher graders and feminine teachers for lower graders.

The formation of masculine culture was grounded on the school micropolitics of gender regime. There is a consensus between headteacher, administrative staff and parents who agree to manipulate the personnel arrangement according to teachers' ability (the ability means being able to act masculinity). In a word, this primary school reproduced the gender hierarchy of traditional patriarchy society but it appeared as a new form of masculinity/femininity inequality. Gender inequality is still in place after practicing the policy of gender equality for years in Taiwan. We suggest that the gender education program need more dimensions such as gender masculinity/femininity and gender regime in order to help teachers promote gender awakening.

Paradoxes of citizenship and migrant domestic workers, the case of feminine migration in Italy

Stefanelli, Laura

Political Science and CPDS Centre sur les politiques et le développement social, University of Montreal, Canada Montréal, Canada

Keywords

Intersectionality, citizenship, domestic work, female migration

Over the last few years "new immigrant countries" such as Italy has seen an increase in feminine transnational migration. Women come for domestic and social care work, because it provides a work permit and legal status for many undocumented women. This phenomena leads to the emergence of a political and social problem: "who cares of our elderly?". Responses differ from case to case and region to region in Europe, which can be correlated to different mechanisms of inclusion/exclusion of certain people and to the achievement of immigrant social citizenship. The study of "the ethic of care" highlights the substitution of native-emancipated-woman by the immigrant-domestic-worker in order to maintain the traditional "household model". Italian families seem to "import femininity" for preserving the traditional system of gender relations. This paper highlights differences of citizenship between the native-emancipated woman involved in their emancipation and decommodifying process through their "exit out of domestic sphere" and the immigrant-domestic-woman who fills the "low side" of female traditional figure in the domestic sphere. The paper proposes the case of immigrant domestic workers in Italy as an example of emergence of new social risk categories that leads to a paradox of citizenship in the access, participation and incorporation of social programs.

Personality, Gender and Career in Management

Tobsch, Verena

*IPA, Helmut-Schmidt-University Hamburg
Hamburg, Germany*

Holst, Elke

*SOEP, German Institute for Economic Research (DIW)
Berlin, Germany*

Fietze, Simon

*IPA, Helmut-Schmidt-University Hamburg
Hamburg, Germany*

Keywords

Germany, Gender, leadership, risk propensity, big five

In the discourse on leadership personality traits are often linked to careers, access to managerial positions and professional success. The so-called trait-theory has been harshly criticized by scientists, but still plays an important role in practice for those who select, promote, and evaluate executives (as can be seen in job advertisements) as well as for the executives themselves. Additionally, personality traits in general and especially those known to be leadership skills are often attributed to gender stereotypes.

This paper focuses on women and men who already managed to overcome possible obstacles in order to reach a management position. By means of the Socio-Economic Panel (SOEP) - a representative individual dataset for Germany with more than 20.000 respondents - we investigate the impact of personality traits on (objective) professional success. Therefore the self-reported personality traits of women and men employed in the private sector in Germany in 2005 are analyzed with regard to their professional status and compared against each other.

Our bivariate analyses confirm that executives differ significantly in their personality traits (Big Five and risk propensity) compared to those employees not in managerial positions - both for women and for men. But women in management seem to differ from female employees with lower professional status to a greater extent than their male counterparts do.

However, by taking other individual characteristics such as human capital investments, work environment, and life circumstances into account (multivariate analyses) we have no statistical evidence for differences in the impact of personality traits on professional success between women and men. Different chances of women and men for their career advancement could rather be explained by years of work experience, extent of overtime work, and by labor market segregation.

Regarding the effect size of several determinants of professional success our results show both for women and for men that personality traits are less relevant though statistically significant compared to objective indicators such as duration of education or extent of overtime work. Nonetheless, personality traits might play a role for gender differences more indirectly because some of these objective characteristics already reflect the level of certain personality traits.

Professionals and Mother or Professional Mothers? A Study of Career Paths of Young Women in Latvia and Portugal

Ms. Boronenko, Vera

*Faculty of Social Sciences, Institute of Social Investigations, University of Daugavpils
Daugavpils, Latvia*

Prof. Schouten, Maria Johanna

Department of Sociology, Centre of Social Studies, University of Beira Interior Covilhã, Portugal

Keywords

Portugal, Latvia, childcare, career, Motherhood

The paper aims to present the first results of a comparative research among highly qualified women in Latvia and Portugal into the main factors which determine their option for motherhood, whether or not in combination with a professional career. The two EU-countries compared have distinct historical and cultural backgrounds with special significance for the theme under study. Our central question ties in with major concerns among the policymakers in Europe, such as the low fertility rate in all of Europe (Latvia and Portugal both had in 2006 a fertility rate of 1.35 children per woman, according to EUROSTAT data) and the ambition to attain more educational qualification for all the citizens. Relating to these considerations and to the goal of providing equality of opportunities, the social and family policies have undergone recent changes to facilitate an articulation between family life and work, in several countries including Latvia and Portugal. However, despite the higher instruction of women and the incentives for mothers to proceed a career, recently a reverse trend in various western countries, such as the USA, the UK, France and the Netherlands, has become manifest: highly-qualified women choose increasingly for a full-time motherhood rather than the combination of a career with the caring for children. In the present paper it will be seen how the tendencies are in this respect in Latvia and Portugal, taking into account the general attitude regarding the place of mothers of young children. Comparison between these two countries adds to the results of the various studies which have already been carried out on labour participation of young mothers in both Portugal and in Latvia (although research comparing these two countries as yet is virtually non-existent), and the comparative studies between several countries within and beyond Europe. Taking into consideration the institutional historic and cultural frameworks, as well as of the relevant theories in this area, in this paper, the analyses of the in-depth interviews will convey facts and ideas about the conditions and motivations for motherhood, a career or a combination of the two paths among highly-educated women in the countries under consideration.

Reconciliation of work and family as a new social risk: Child care policies and the politics of inclusion and exclusion in Finland

Eräranta, Kirsi

*Department of Sociology, University of Helsinki
University of Helsinki, Finland*

Keywords

Governmentality, Care policies, citizenship, new social risks, reconciliation of work and family

Reconciliation of work and family life has been recently discussed as a "new social risk" in comparative welfare state research. According to this literature, the social security systems of traditional welfare states, which were built during the post-war years to protect family (male) breadwinners against the "old social risks" (retirement, unemployment, disability etc.) are partly inadequate for dealing with new risks, resulting from complex changes in population structures, employment practices and family life.

Based on a case study of child care policies and their transformations in Finland from the 1980s to the 2000s, this paper critically reflects upon the fruitfulness of the conceptualization of work/family reconciliation as a new social risk especially in the Nordic countries, which are known for their established policies for combining (female) parenthood and paid work. Drawing from Foucauldian analytics of government as well as feminist theorising on citizenship, the paper asks how exactly is the "social risk" of work/family reconciliation defined, and managed in Finland during these three decades, and with what kind of effects. The focus is on two main categories of Finnish care leaves that deal with reconciliation, namely parental leave and child home care leave. The paper examines the politics of inclusion and exclusion inherent in these leaves, by analysing, first, the insurance vs. tax-based allowances tied to these leaves, and second, the criteria of eligibility for these leaves. The empirical material consists mainly of policy documents on the reconciliation of work and family, published between 1980 and 2008 in Finland.

Overall, the paper problematizes certain theoretical assumptions inherent in the conceptualization of work/family reconciliation as a new social risk, namely its generic notion of post-industrialization, its insensitivity toward questions of power, and its emphasis on income benefits at the expense of social services.

Responses to Trafficking: law enforcement and women's state agencies in two port-cities

Denissen, Amy

*Sociology, California State University Northridge
Northridge, CA, United States*

Prata, Ana

*Sociology, California State University Northridge
Northridge, CA, United States*

Keywords

Gender, Women's trafficking, state agencies

The trafficking of women for the purpose of sexual exploitation is a central social problem facing most societies. As a complex phenomenon, women's trafficking has been researched in several ways: victimization; legal and policy frameworks (national, European, and international law); baseline statistics; recruitment and migration patterns (countries that are mostly importers, exporters, and both); and responses to trafficking by various agencies (NGO's, police forces, women's state agencies). Our paper focuses on current legislative and law enforcement responses to the traffic of women in two major cities: Lisbon and Los Angeles. While the traffic in women is anchored in global migration and global economies, it is national, state, and local agencies that are responsible for responding to trafficking. Based on interviews with key actors in local policing agencies as well as content analysis of legislative documents, we draw a comparison between how the police force in two major port-cities deals with victims and perpetrators of trafficking including how they construct meanings regarding victimization and criminalization and how they attend to the human and citizenship rights of those involved in trafficking. In addition to police forces, our research also focuses on women's state agencies and their responses to trafficking, since these agencies have a mediating role in dealing with state and local governments, law enforcement agencies, women's movements, and women's NGO's. Examples of these agencies are the Commission for Citizenship and Gender Equality (Portugal) and Interagency Council of Women (United States). In this paper we argue that law enforcement and women's state agencies are two essential components for understanding how issues of racial and gender inequality are embedded in the perception and treatment of those involved in trafficking.

School dropouts and the social construction of masculinity

Carrito, Manuela

Science Education, Faculty of Psychology and Educational Sciences, University of Porto Porto, Portugal

Araújo, Helena C.

Sciences of Education, Faculty of Psychology and Sciences of Education, University of Porto Porto, Portugal

Keywords

education, masculinities, Dropouts

The relationships between school achievement and gender identities are relevant to be questioned when statistical data in different countries of Europe (including Portugal) confirm a higher school failure and a higher school dropout rates for boys, especially coming from groups with fewer economic resources or a cultural capital not recognized by the school. Gender and women's studies provide important contributions to this problem, since their concerns are for broader forms of inclusion and citizenship. Men's studies have also pointed out that feminist perspectives have had major impact on how the reconfiguration of affection and implementation of rights are central for extended forms of citizenship. There is nowadays a marginalized masculinity "that emerges from the articulation of gender with other structural conditions such as ethnicity or class", (Amâncio 2004:25) leading many boys to a disaffection from school, joining groups at social margins. An enlarged view of citizenship in a democratic society cannot be alien to the diversity and needs of individuals within it, and the right to education, as Marshall noted, is an unquestionable contribution to decent patterns of living.

Within the framework of a review of European contributions on the subject, the paper will present the outcomes from focus group discussions involving eighteen boys who have dropped-out from schooling the ways they give meaning and name their experiences on this issue and on how they position themselves concerning girls'school pathways.

Sex and Gender: innate or learned? An analysis of the interplay between biological, evolutionary, psychological and social factors

Capella, Danielle

*Sociology Department, Universidade Nova de Lisboa
Lisbon, Portugal*

Keywords

nature, Gender, interaction, nurture, Sex

This is a theoretical paper that aims to present an integrative approach of gender complex and propose pathways for empirical research that provides us with a trial and validation of this model. From a systemical and dynamical perspective, we analyze the interaction between biological, evolutionary, psychological and social structures in the stratification of existent gender differences. Based on nature and nurture debate, we address gender differences in terms of genetic variance, evolutionary forces as a tool of behavioral and genetic modulation, psychological features as a turning point or an order maintainer of gender roles expectancy and social instance as working on concentrating, distributing and hierarchizing those differences. We go further and present data that supports the existence of gender differences regarding the four major structures quoted before. Our hypothesis then is that since Stone Age, Cave society provided themselves with labor division based in natural skills identified as being better performed by one sex than another. The division based in tendencies of better performance and specialized skills - nature factors - was reinforced by evolutionary processes and socially valued and organized - nurturing factors. As a result, by psychological adjustment, such as group pertain and identification, women and men go in the direction of either fulfilling social scripts or even breaking then as a response to their dissatisfaction. It is important to highlight that this process is not taken as a deterministic causation, instead, as a system-based model, we understand that the different structures involved influence each other mutually, but, on the other hand, we do assume that biology is the basis in which all this process develops and that all the possible variability and malleability is limited by biological constraints. Contributions that make up this theoretical proposal come from different fields, namely: physics, biology, genetics, psychology and sociology.

Sexual and Gender Harassment at University: The Case of the Czech Republic

Vohlídalová, Marta

*Institute of Sociology, Academy of Sciences of the Czech Republic
Prague, Czech Republic*

Saldová, Katerina

*Institute of Sociology, Academy of Sciences of the Czech Republic
Prague, Czech Republic*

Tupá, Barbora

*Institute of Sociology, Academy of Sciences of the Czech Republic
Prague, Czech Republic*

Keywords

sexual harassment, survey, University

The issue of sexual harassment on college campuses has been widely conceptualized in western and primarily American sociology since the 70's. Since then, many surveys, attempts to design standardized research tools, theoretical studies explaining the phenomenon as well as efforts to set up an effective university anti-harassment policies have been carried out. Sexual and gender harassment seems to be a well established topic in the Anglo-Saxon world both for the researches and university policy makers. However, any serious discussion about the problem is still missing in the Czech republic. Czech universities have no anti-harassment policies available either for students or staff, the legislation lacks appropriate laws concerning sexual and gender harassment at universities (as well as at workplace) and no survey has been conducted yet to monitor the university situation. The aim of this paper is to present main findings based on the first survey of sexual and gender harassment in the Czech Republic carried out at one selected university in Prague. The goal of this pilot survey held in 2008/2009 was to monitor the prevalence of various forms of sexual and gender harassment concerning students as well as their attitudes towards this phenomenon.

Shifting Gender Relations in Old Age?

Braukmann, Stephanie

*Fachbereich Sozialwesen, Universität Kassel
Kassel, Germany*

Keywords

Masculinity, care work, age, Gender

Feminist gerontologists are not alone in underlining that age, like gender, is a socially constructed category linked to a system of power relations which can give rise both to privilege and oppression. While the intersections between gender relations and further dimensions of social inequalities such as class or ethnicity/race are prevalent subjects of women and gender studies, much less attention has been paid to the question of how masculinities and femininities are shaped by age relations.

The proposed paper bases on the results of a qualitative study funded by the Fritz Thyssen Foundation, which analyses the interaction of age, gender and labour in the third sector in Germany. It deals with voluntary care work provided by senior citizens in self-help-organizations for the elderly with a particular focus on male caregivers.

Previous studies on masculinity in later life indicate that masculinity is constructed "through and by reference to age" (Hearn 1995), highlighting the fact that hegemonic masculinity, with its emphasis on physical strength, wealth, virility and professional status is increasingly difficult to achieve for aging men (Calasanti 2004). The tensions between age and hegemonic masculinity are said to become even more considerable if older men engage in feminized tasks such as care-giving (Meadows/Davidson 2006).

In-depth interviews carried out as part of our study with both male and female volunteers in self-help organisations for the elderly reveal that elderly males engage in an unanticipated amount of reproductive labour in the voluntary sector. In contrast to approaches suggesting that gender differences become less relevant with age (Gutmann 1987), the proposed paper will reconstruct the set of different coping strategies our male interviewees developed in order to reconcile care-giving with their male identities, which include caring styles which stress 'male' behaviour patterns, relating current care activities to an earlier career or overemphasizing manliness within their biographical narratives.

In addition to providing empirical results, the paper will discuss the assumption that masculinities and femininities in old age do not diminish, but rather vary in ways which make them a challenging subject for feminist research.

Social birth of the unborn: ultrasound visualization, consumption and medicalization

Saenger, Eva

Faculty of Social Sciences, Goethe University Frankfurt Frankfurt, Germany

Keywords

medicalization, pregnancy, reproduction, visualization, ultrasound

Social and biological birth have become uncoupled in late modern western worlds (Morgan 1996). This means that as a result of reproductive visualization technologies the attribution of personhood, the "social birth", can now precede the biological birth. The result is a new category of persons: fetal persons that need legal protection or medical attention. It has even been argued that through the usage of reproductive visualization technologies, the fetus has become a public issue, while pregnant women have at the same time experienced disembodiment (Duden 2007). In my paper I will analyze how middle-class pregnant women in Germany experience the visualization of the unborn through obstretical ultrasound scans. By drawing on my ongoing research project on women's experiences with ultrasound scans, I argue that foetal sonograms are both material and visual objects. I will expand on this in my presentation by discussing how fetal sonograms can be seen as material objects and visual artefacts that have different meanings in different contexts and by discussing which relations are enacted and mediated through the fetal sonograms and in which way these relations concerning the unborn become commodified and medicalized.

Socio-demographic characteristics and gender expectations in transition: the case of Bosnia and Herzegovina

Turjacanin, Vladimir

*Social psychology, University of Banja Luka, Faculty of philosophy
Banja Luka, Bosnia and Herzegovina*

Majstorovic, Danijela

*Department of English language and literature, University of Banja Luka, Faculty of Philosophy
Banja Luka, Bosnia and Herzegovina*

Keywords

Bosnia and Herzegovina, demographic, attitude, identity, gender roles

Bosnia and Herzegovina (BiH) is an interesting case study for observing the changing gender roles and expectations as a tumultuous region marked by the patriarchal Balkan tradition, post-WWII modernity that resulted in paid labor and emancipation for Bosnian women, and the most recent, postwar and transitional context, which makes lives difficult both for men and women.

In this multidisciplinary study we analyze quantitative socio-demographic data on attitudes of 1966 respondents conducted in 2008 with respect to gender roles and expectations about work, family and perceived success in life.

This analysis is then supplanted and enriched with the qualitative data obtained from 6 different social strata or classes the researchers believed to be the most representative of women in BiH: boutique workers as the new working class that emerged in transition, the rural women, the middle class urban women with children, the childless/feminist/lesbian/high professional women, the female students, and the unemployed women. To give a more precise diagnosis of BiH society's gender (in)equality, we look at the ways in which gender roles and expectations change with respect to different variables such as income, rural or urban place of origin, age and gender.

Subjective representations of gender role-set in southern Italy

Valarino, Isabel

Interdisciplinary Institute of Life Trajectories, University of Lausanne, Faculty of Social and Political Sciences Lausanne, Switzerland

Caporali, Arianna

Independent Research Group, Culture of Reproduction, Max Planck Institute for Demographic Research Rostock, Germany

Bernardi, Laura

Interdisciplinary Institute of Life Trajectories (& Independent Research Group, Culture of Reproduction), University of Lausanne, Faculty of Social and Political Sciences (& Max Planck Institute for Demographic Research) Lausanne (& Rostock), Switzerland (& Germany)

Keywords

Italy, gender role-set, paid and unpaid work, subjective representations

Research on gender role-sets and share of domestic labor among partners has mostly used diaries and time use surveys to compare the number of hours men and women devote to domestic and paid labor. Mostly quantitative, this research pointed out how women's rise in labor market participation has not been accompanied by a rise in men participation in domestic labor. Whereas some little change has been found concerning father's involvement in childcare, domestic chores remain mainly a women's task. However little research is devoted to the satisfaction or dissatisfaction of women regarding the gender role-set they are experiencing or the arguments with which they sustain their role-set, both the actual and the desired one. Even less research focus on the desired gender role set of childless women. This paper makes secondary use of 55 in-depth interviews carried out in 2004-05 in Naples (southern Italy) with childless women and mothers as well as their partners when available. We develop a theoretical typology of gender role-sets depending on the share of paid work, child care, and domestic work among partners. Our empirical data from southern Italy help defining six of these gender role-set types. We focus on subjective representations of ideal gender role-set and the reference to family, gender, work and religious attitudes and values involved. We also elaborate on respondents' expressions of (dis)satisfaction in each of them and on ideas of equity versus equality.

The age norms of childbearing in European comparison

Paksi, Veronika

*Institute of Sociology, Hungarian Academy of Sciences
Budapest, Hungary*

Szalma, Ivett

*Institute of Sociology, Hungarian Academy of Sciences
Budapest, Hungary*

Keywords

Gender, life course, age norms, timing of childbearing, multilevel analyses

Nowadays the timing of the first childbearing has shifted to older ages all over Europe; therefore, we consider it is important to examine whether the attitudes toward the ideal age of childbearing have adjusted to this trend. First of all we analyze attitude type questions, we focus on when people think it is ideal, too late or too early to become a mother or a father in Europe. We try to find out if there are any differences in the age norms of childbearing among Eastern, Western and North Europe. We examine the ideal time of childbearing not only from age aspect but also regarding when it would be ideal compared to other life events of becoming adults (cohabitation, marriage) in each of the countries. We find out whether in Europe the first childbearing is actually considered part of the process of becoming adults or not. We examine how the educational level, the age groups, the type of residence and the religion variables influence the attitudes towards the ideal, too early and too late timing of childbearing in Europe.

Data from the third wave of the European Social Survey (ESS), conducted in 23 European countries (N=42,999), are used to test the assumptions. In addition to descriptive statistics displaying the European situation, causal models are developed to investigate statistical relationship with basic socio-demographic categories, partnership, as well as the workplace and employment relations characteristics as the main predictors of the timing of the first childbearing separately for men and women. We will apply multilevel analyses to eliminate the design effects in the sample.

The control measures directed against victims of human trafficking and procured women in Finland

Viuhko, Minna

*HEUNI, European Institute for Crime Prevention and Control, affiliated with the United Nations (HEUNI)
Helsinki, Finland*

Keywords

Human trafficking, Finland, organised crime, Prostitution, procuring

A joint Finnish-Swedish-Estonian study completed in 2008 analysed the connections between organised crime and human trafficking for the purpose of sexual exploitation. The aim of the study was to map the trafficking process and describe it from the recruitment in the source country through the transport to the procuring taking place in the destination country. The aim was also to study criminal actors and organisations involved in human trafficking and organised procuring.

This paper discusses prostitution-related human trafficking and procuring situation in Finland in the 2000s. Finland is studied as a destination country to which foreign women mainly coming from the adjacent region are brought to sell sexual services. The presentation focuses particularly on the means of control that the criminal actors direct at the procured women.

There are not many indications of total "prison-like" conditions regarding the prostitutes in Finland, but there is evidence of serious human rights violations regarding e.g. the circumstances and conditions where women are prostituting themselves. The traffickers and procurers use different means of control. Strict rules and long days, fines and large percentages of the earnings going to the criminal organisation, debt bondage, force, threats and lack of right to choose when to give up prostitution are common ways of controlling the procured women.

The discourse on body and femininity in Romanian women's magazines: an audience-oriented approach

Damean, Diana

*Sociology and Social Work, Babes-Bolyai University
Cluj-Napoca, Romania*

Keywords

Body, uses and gratifications theory, cultivation theory, identity, women's magazines

The paper employs an interdisciplinary approach, integrating perspectives from gender studies, media studies, and social sciences, in order to explore the symbolic constructions of femininity. The main focus of the research is on the media-related issues of the body, namely on the representation of the feminine body in women's magazines. The analysis will concern not only how is the feminine body represented in visual culture, but also how these representations affect the feminine public and their relation with their own bodies. The paper combines survey research and media content analysis, in order to examine the associations between the frequency of girls' exposure to women's magazines and their perceptions of femininity and the body (the cultivation theory), as well as the associations between the girls' motivation for reading women's magazines and their perceptions regarding femininity and the body (the uses and gratifications theory). The survey was conducted on a sample of 200 Romanian college women aged 19-25 ( $M=20.13$ ,  $SD=1.42$ ,  $Me=20$ ) and examined how the discourse of the Romanian women's magazines alter their reader's perceptions of femininity and the body. The main instruments used (Adolescent Femininity Ideology Scale, Socio-cultural Attitudes Towards Appearance Questionnaire, and the Body Shape Questionnaire) tested whether exposure to the media promoted messages has positive effects (authentic self in relationship, refusal of self-objectification), respectively negative effects (inauthentic self in relationship, self-objectification, eating disorders) on the female public. Also, the 2008 issues of the 5 most-read women's magazines among the respondents were subject to content analysis, following 3 main dimensions: beauty, relationship, and career. The media discourse is often a contradictory one, both objectifying and empowering women, and appears to be thorn between advertiser's interests and feminist ideology. The messages in women's magazines have a significant influence on their readers' attitudes and behaviours, no matter if the public is active or passive.

The effect of democratic values and institutions on gender beliefs in nineteen European societies

Voicu, Malina

The Research Institute for the Quality of Life, Romanian Academy Bucharest, Romania

Keywords

post-communist countries, support for democracy, democratization, gender beliefs

Attitudes about the appropriate roles of women and men have changed in all European societies during last decades. However, there is a great variation in support for gender equality inside Europe, Nordic countries being the most equalitarian, while post-communist countries lag behind the Western average (Kalmijn, 2003). Part of the existing literature has focused on the individual level explanation, taking into account family context, individual resources or religiosity when predicting the individual level of support for gender equality (Baxter & Kane, 1995; Bolzendahl & Myers, 2004; Brewster & Padavic, 2000). Other studies emphasized the effect economic and technological development (Wilensky, 2002) or the impact of cultural change (Inglehart & Norris, 2003; Inglehart, Norris, Welzel, 2002) on the gender beliefs shared by individuals.

The present paper will focus on the role of democratization as a driving force behind the changes in gender beliefs, focusing on the case of post-communist countries from Central and Eastern Europe and comparing them with long established democracies from Western Europe. In these societies, democratization brought new democratic institutions, as well as a new political culture. Consequently, the political transformation has affected gender beliefs in two ways, by changing the individual values orientation and by reshaping the societal institutions. Thus, changes in political and civic culture instill in post-totalitarian societies values of equality and tolerance which are very important for the development of a democratic society. On the other side, freedom of speech and association allowed women to publicly address question of gender equality. Using World Values Survey data collected in 2005 in nineteen European societies, this paper tests the effect of support for democracy as well as of the way in which democracy works in a given society on gender beliefs. The paper employs multilevel regression analyses in order to better capture the effect of individual orientation towards democracy, as well as the impact of societal democratization on the dependent variable.

The Multi-Purpose Community Centers: Empowering Southeastern Anatolian Women, Turkey

Kaya, Nilay

*Sociology, Ankara University
Ankara, Turkey*

Hancer Odabas, Yonca

*Sociology, Ankara University
Ankara, Turkey*

Keywords

women empowerment, multi-purpose community center, inequality, capacity building, Turkey

Multi-Purpose Community Centres (MPCC) project is one of the community development programs intended to eliminate gender based inequalities by means of improving women's individual, social and economic accomplishments in Southeastern Anatolia region. These community centers started to conduct its first activities in 1995 in Southeastern Anatolia region. The organizations of these community centers became widespread by considering local needs. The main purpose of MPCC integrates the economic, social and environmental dimensions of sustainable development through strategies for poverty alleviation and that focus on participatory approaches and capacity building for disadvantage groups from a gender perspective.

The objectives of MPCCs are as follows:

Creating opportunities for women to become aware of their problems and launch initiatives for their solution, - Ensuring that women take part in public sphere and benefit more from available services, - Enhancing female employment and entrepreneurship, - Contributing to equal opportunities by empowering women, - Starting the process of gender balanced development and developing replicable models relevant to local circumstances for participatory community development

The primary aims of the community development programs of these centers are to increase the number of literate women, maternal and infant health, domestic economy and nutrition, skills development and educational programs, increase women's self-confidence, construct an awareness of being "us" and organize social and cultural activities to develop local initiatives. The community centers are primarily situated in areas of poor and deprived families, small town centers and villages.

At present there are 30 MPCCs active in 9 provinces. The target population of these centres consist of women and young girls.

The purpose of this paper is to provide the evaluation of MPCC from gender perspective. This paper will address the participants profiles and their activities. This study will be also identify characteristics of good practice in the MCC for the promotion of gender equality and empowerment of women.

The object women in science in trading zones

Linkova, Marcela

*Gender and Sociology, Institute of Sociology of the Academy of Sciences of the Czech Republic
Prague 1, Czech Republic*

Cervinkova, Alice

*Gender and Sociology, Institute of Sociology of the Academy of Sciences of the Czech Republic
Prague 1, Czech Republic*

Keywords

women in science, trading zone, modes of ordering, enactment, Gender

Today, there is a lot of talk about women in science. Different talk in different contexts. Women in science are an object of interest for science policy, research, support organisations, industry, researchers, media, cosmetic firms (L'Oreal Prize for Women Scientists), students and others. In our presentation we are concerned with women in science. Not practicing researchers doing scientific work but the object "women in science" as it is being enacted in various spaces in Europe: organisations for supporting women in science, gender and feminist theoreticians, science policies. With John Law (2004) we look into which object women in science is made to matter in each of these domains, and how these objects interact, struggle to matter in places where they meet, places that Peter Galison calls the trading zone (1999).

Building on the concept of trading zones (1999) we explore the ways in which these various objects "women in science" are communicated in arenas and among actors who "speak differently" or, as Gorman puts it "have difficulty communicating" (2002). We are interested in how some objects are made to matter more and some less, and how this happens. Building on Law's classification we develop the mode of anti-interference to showcase the ways in which powerful and dominant object of women in science manages to enforce itself from science policy to the other domains, and how other objects women in science are silenced, made not to matter. We argue that despite the problems with enacting the "avantguard" object women in science, current changes in science and science policy with its stress on accountability do open and legitimate objects enacted from the avantguard and must be insisted upon.

References

- Galison, Peter. 1999. Trading Zone: Coordinating Action and belief. Pp. 137-160 in Bagioli, Mario (ed.). The Science Studies Reader. New York: Routledge.
- Gorman, Michael. E. 2002. Levels of Expertise and Trading Zones: A Framework for Multidisciplinary Analysis. Social Studies of Science 32 (5-6): 933-938.
- Law, John. 2004. Matter-ing, Or How Might STS Contribute?, published by the Centre for Science Studies, Lancaster University, Lancaster LA1 4YL, UK at <http://www.comp.lancs.ac.uk/sociology/papers/law-matter-ing.pdf>. [cit. 2.10.2008].

The parenthood effect: what explains the increase in gender inequality when British couples become parents?

Schober, Pia

*Social Policy, London School of Economics
London, United Kingdom*

Keywords

childcare, housework, gender roles, transition to parenthood

The transition to parenthood is a crucial junction in people's life cycles from which social and economic inequalities between women and men start to widen. Since long-term inequalities are likely to be driven to a large extent by how couples' adapt their division of paid work, housework and childcare after becoming parents, this raises the question what the main influences are of couples' division of labour choice shortly after the birth of their first child.

Most existing research on the transition to parenthood did not consider both changes in couples' paid and domestic work or just described the changes occurring. Therefore relatively little is known about possible determinants of couples' adaptation in employment and domestic work. This study extends the literature by examining the relative importance of both partners' gender role attitudes and earnings before a birth for the way British couples organise their division of labour in the second year of parenthood.

The empirical analysis uses binary and ordered logistic regression models of couples' division of childcare, housework and paid work and is based on fourteen waves of the British Household Panel Survey (1992-2005). The findings suggest that men's and women's gender role attitudes are of greater importance for how parents' adapt their division of labour than partners' relative or absolute earnings. This contradicts predictions based on neo-classical economic theory and earlier results from a similar study in the US, where earnings appear more important than people's gender role attitudes.

At first sight, the greater significance of both partners' gender role attitudes may be interpreted as couples in the UK having more choice to follow their identities rather than economic pressures. A comparison of maternity/paternity leave entitlements and childcare availability in the two countries however suggests some alternative explanations of gendered policy contexts overriding economic arguments as well as constructing people's gender role identities.

The procedures of identification and of work with trafficked women: involvements for the measurement of the phenomenon

Mena Martínez, Luis

Sociology and Communication, University of Salamanca Salamanca, Salamanca

Keywords

women, Spain, measurement, Human trafficking

The measurement of women's trafficking is problematical. On the one hand, the impossibility to fix the number and the permanent situation of the universe that we want to work with is. On the other hand, as a result of this population's situation of irregularity, the possibility to work with them once found, worsened for the situation of especial vulnerability of these women. Immense disparity among data clearly identified and esteems is another serious situation. For that reason we have considered analyzing the procedures that trafficked women are identified for and that data are compiled in Spain.

In order to get close to generation's process of data on trafficked women, in addition to do a general evaluation of existent data, we have carried out a Delphi procedure with people that they are in direct contact with (potentials) victims of trafficking and that they have a certain level of responsibility. This includes policemen, district attorneys and judges, employees of centres of attention to immigrants, social services, and also NGOs dedicated to immigrants, refugees, women or prostitutes. With them we have discussed three points:

- The characteristics of the people on who information is picked up; an evaluation of the quantity, reliability and accessibility of the aforementioned information; and perceived needs of information
- The procedures of work (including the process of identification as victim of trafficking), protocols and typical cases, making a point of the relation with other institutions
- Needs perceived for intervention with these women, as well as improving proposals.

The outcome let us analyzing the procedures of generation of information on the phenomenon to be able to appraise the information (and esteems) on the phenomenon of women's trafficking in Spain.

The Social Construction of Gender Identities in Children: a qualitative study

Miranda, Patrícia

Sociology, ISCTE

Lisbon, Portugal

Keywords

Gender, identity, interaction, socialization

This paper appears as a result of a doctoral thesis entitled "Processes of Social Construction of Gender Identities: an intensive study of a preadolescent group in Viseu". The field work in a preparatory school in the city of Viseu, Portugal, has predicted a variety of logics underlying these processes and two major trends stand out in the construction of gender identities in children: the incorporation of what is transmitted in socialization contexts; and also the individualization and negotiation of gender roles. Some ambivalence emerged in the various social actors, since we could identify signs of gender "equalization" and, at the same time, actors have expressed gender stereotypes in their speeches, which can be associated with male and female representations. So, a gap was noticed between how reality "should be" and the accurate attitudes and practices, which hence reveal gender schemas based on naturalised categories "man" and "woman". In some way the reflexive modernity context shows us social changes as a growing individualization and a strong subjectivity in the projects of personal and social identities construction. The study's first results show evidence of several logics in the processes of gender identities construction, which go beyond socialization theories. There might be tensions caused by the coexistence of different approaches in gender identities construction, since actors seem to be divided between discourse and practises referring to gender roles representations and the interactions in which they embody that roles. This can also generate a tension in gender roles and stereotypes negotiation, or even a tension between the sexualized body and self-aspirations in identities construction. Thus, in these children's complex gender identities construction processes and identization projects, we've been attempting to understand more profoundly the mosaic of tensions, ambiguities and contradictions they live in their quotidian lives. Not only in children, but also in adults as teachers and parents, we can see some ambivalences in the way they talk about gender and how gender is produced in school and at home, showing us many possibilities of performing and representing gender, even combining logics that may appear as antagonist.

The Social Forge - Cooperation and individual performance among young male climbers

Nilsen, Ake

*School of Health and Social Sciences, University of Halmstad
Halmstad, Sweden*

Keywords

Masculinity, experience, Performativity, subculture, Bouldering

Based on an ethnographic fieldwork on climbers this paper explores the relation between the group and the individual in the context of risk-performance. In the subculture of Bouldering (a kind of climbing) the performance of the single climber is dependent on the creativity and cooperation of the group with an ongoing negotiation between the participants. The paper focuses changing gender identities among young male climbers and challenges mainly the concept of "hegemonic masculinity" (Connell) with the help of "performativity" (Butler) and "experience-oriented" actions (Schulze).

The Stigma of Male Infertility: Historical and Contemporary Examples

Sinkovic, Matija

*Department of Sociology, Faculty of Humanities and Social Sciences, University of Zagreb
Zagreb, Croatia*

Keywords

history of medicine, human reproduction, Masculinity, infertility, patriarchy

When it comes to human reproduction, feminisms have elaborated well how women are subjugated to men within the patriarchal system. Focus of medical science on women that made them objects of scientific inquiry rather than subjects, as well as the load of responsibilities without rights when it comes to giving birth and child rearing are just some of the issues that were explored and criticised. Regarding infertility, women were the ones that were traditionally blamed for it and often publicly condemned and scorned as the sole culprits. Their primary role was the one of a mother and a child bearer, and if this role was unattainable, than they were not considered as "proper women". Men on the other hand, seemed to have avoided such stigmatization, at least in most of the cases. But that does not mean that there was no pressure on men to be fertile. To the contrary, I would argue that the cultural pressure on men to be fertile was even greater than on women, although on the manifest level this might seem quite the opposite. In order to preserve male dominance, pressure exerted on men was of such extent that it made the very topic of male infertility a taboo. Consequences of such attitude are visible in the neglect of male reproductive health, as Cynthia R. Daniels has shown in her work. In this paper, I will try to prove this thesis through three points. First, by showing how the medicine has treated male infertility throughout the history (Daniels, Pfeffer, Farley). Second, by establishing the importance of fertility in the construction of masculine identity (Gilmore, Connell). And third, through the empirical research about the issues that medical professionals in Croatia are facing when treating infertile couples. By comparing historical data with my own research I will show that on the symbolical level, the stigma of infertility for men is of such intensity that it threatens not only personal masculine identity, but also patriarchal order as such.

The visual representation of genders: one analysis through the male magazines

Rodrigues, Elisabete

CIES, ISCTE

Lisboa, Portugal

Keywords

Gender representations, masculinities, embodiment

This paper presents the results of a research on the diversity of masculine representations through the analysis of different ways of visually representing the body (male & female) carried out in some of the male magazines circulating in Portugal. Special attention was dedicated to the male identity representation or following Goffman's approach, "hiper-ritualization" given by the media and publicity. For this purpose, magazines with a higher volume of paid numbers in circulation were selected: Maxmen, FHM, Men's Health and GQ; and the analysis was focused on advertisement images and the ones included in editorial contents.

The paper starts by presenting some data regarding the emergence and evolution of the market of male magazines in Portugal, as well as the reader's profile. Therefore, through the diversity of images of women and men that integrate these publications (offered in publicity or those ones that results of editorial choices) there will be a discussion on the different conceptions of gender implicated in the magazines.

This research supports the rejection of an essentialist and universal masculinity conception and underlines the importance of the sexual orientation in the construction of male identities. There were found significative differences between publicities and editorial contents: while the first displays more androgen models, the second sustains more conservative imaginaries and traditional gender roles. The images of women offered in the magazines promote a traditional picture of the gender relations, in which they represents a small range of roles, mainly related with erotic-pornographic contents.

Times of uncertainty - uncertain masculinities - A critical approach to questions of transforming gender orders

Neuber, Anke

*Social Work, University of Kassel
Kassel, Germany*

Bereswill, Mechthild

*Social Work, University of Kassel
Kassel, Germany*

Keywords

employment, gender order, Masculinity, uncertainty

Looking at sociological debates about increasing precarious living conditions in post-industrial societies, we find differing ways of dealing with gender: Ignoring the gendered dimensions of social transformation while at the same time referring to a now fragile masculine position - the male breadwinner. In contrast to this well known bias in social theories we find the modernisation diagnosis that the dissolution of regular employs and the increase of discontinuities in the life course lead to an alignment of women's and men's circumstances and biographical trajectories. And, not at least, social transformation is discussed as crisis of masculinity in the context of changing gender configurations (providing for a family as masculinity resource). All these theoretical assumptions affirm - explicitly or implicitly - the link of full employment, working identities and masculinity.

In our paper we will discuss this theoretical implication by focussing a constellation which points to contradicting dynamics within the gender order: marginalised masculinity. Drawing on theoretical assumptions of Bourdieu (masculine domination) and Connell (hegemonic masculinity) we will exemplify our theoretical arguments by empirical findings from a qualitative longitudinal study with young males whose life course is shaped by social disadvantage and social control within the German welfare state. Enfolded the case of marginalised masculinities enables us to re-think the relation of gender, social uncertainty and biographical discontinuity which leads to open questions about transforming gender orders. The link between masculinity and gainful employment is put into motion and the complexity of the relation between power, social inequality and gender configurations become visible.

Trafficking in women in the Context of Sexual Exploitation: theoretical and empirical debates

Duarte, Madalena

*Centre for Social Studies, Centre for Social Studies
Coimbra, Portugal*

Keywords

women, Prostitution, migrations, Law, Trafficking

One of the most visible forms of trafficking today is that of women for the purposes of sexual exploitation. This is a complex phenomenon, with many aspects, and many, too, are the inequalities that underlie it: economic inequality; the division of borders between rich and poor; certain of the first world's migration policies which, instead of organising immigration, push it into the arms of mafias and criminal gangs; and the 'desperate expectations' which get people to believe in promises of a better life in a world which has fewer and fewer certainties.

In this paper, based on a research project developed, I will critically discuss the measures to combat this phenomenon. Are they incorporated into the broader perspective of combating violence practised against women? Do they take into consideration that these women are different and come from disparate social and cultural regions or do they fall into the basic formulation of women as a homogeneous category? Those measures are a priority in the concerns over human rights, or are instrumentalised by both reactionary groups, in terms of sexual morality, demanding the abolition of prostitution, and by some States which, besides showing altruist concerns, wish to control their borders? Also, I will discuss the binary system of legal logic in what concerns sexual traffic, namely the consent/nonconsent binary opposites. It should be noted that defining the concept of trafficking in women for sexual exploitation, essentially involves a social construct of what it means to be a victim. Thus, there appear to be several levels of victimisation which correspond to different types of victim, according to the centrality of the consent. Finally, I'll analyse the role of the feminist movement in this matter. These and other questions will be analysed concerning the Portuguese and the European context.

Transnational Mobility and the Intersection of Multiple Inequalities in Higher Education

Bauschke-Urban, Carola

Center for Higher Education Research and Faculty Development, Technical University of Dortmund Dortmund, Germany

Keywords

Intersectionality, Biographical Research, transnational mobility, globalization of higher education, postcolonial theory

The globalization of higher education creates a restructuring of careers within the sciences. Transnational mobility within, into and out of Europe reshapes the landscape of higher education and is especially important at the early stages of scientific careers. This paper proposes a transnational perspective on the constructions of individual biographies of women scientists who have chosen strategies of mobility to shape their doctoral and postdoctoral qualification paths. Processes of transnational migration of scientists intersect with multiple inequalities in higher education such as gender, ethnicity, citizenship and world regional origin of the mobile individuals.

The paper is based on a biographical research among transnational mobile women scientists (doctoral students and postdocs) from Germany/Turkey, Poland, Ex-Yugoslavia, India, Bangladesh and Morocco, who were temporary fellows at various European higher education institutions in Germany, Italy and the UK. The scientists of the sample already performed multiple mobilities in the processes of their career buildings to and from universities in other countries, including higher education institutions in Asia, Africa and the US. The research perspective focuses the influence on biographical constructions of mobile scientists in respect of 1) processes of doing science in changing places and 2) the production of transnational biographical structures by living simultaneously in more than one country. How do women as mobile actors in the sciences reflect their career paths and the transnational arrangements of their networks, of their family relations and their partnerships? The survey also considers the requirements of inclusion and the effects of exclusion within differing national social contexts for global bordercrossers in the sciences. It shows how transnational configurations of social structures increase the complexity as well as the contingency of biographical experience. Another effect of globalised lifestyles of scientists is a strong increase of biographical risk, which is not only structured by multiple, but also by contextually shifting social inequalities.

The analysis of the biographical data is based on the approach of "doing biography" combined with the grounded theory methodology. It includes postcolonial and intersectional perspectives on the construction and deconstruction of social differences in transnational biographies in the context of increasingly globalised structures in higher education.

When nationality matters: Women's Labour in Domestic Work and Escorting Services

Ibanez-Angulo, Mónica

Sociology, University of Burgos

Burgos, Spain

Keywords

national identity, women's labour, Transnational migration

The ongoing process of globalization encompasses a complex set of developments in the sociocultural, economic and political fields which have a "global" dimension in so far as they affect almost any social group. Yet, the ways in which these processes (e.g. transnational migration and the constitution of supranational institutions and organizations such as the EU and the WTO) affect and are affected by local and regional conditions are, indeed, very different. We can ask, thus, what is the role of specific constructions of nationhood and of national identity in the local unfolding of these global social, economic and political processes.

By examining classified advertisements in national and local Spanish press (El País and Diario de Burgos) for a period of ten years (1998-2008), and conducting telephone interviews with selected advertisers among those who explicitly indicate sex and nationality of the worker, in this paper I will analyze how and to what extent access to the Spanish labour market is articulated by specific constructions of gender and national identity. The paper is structured in three parts. In the first part, I will look at the sector of production and at the instances in which sex and nationality of the worker who searches and/or is searched for a job are been made explicit: How and to what extent is access to certain sectors of production and to certain kinds of jobs articulated by specific constructions of gender and nationality? In the second part, I will look more closely to those classifieds offering and/or demanding women to work in domestic care and personal (escorting) services: How and to what extent do specific constructions of a gendered national identity may contribute to a further labour segmentation and exclusion of immigrant women from certain kinds of jobs? Finally, in the third part, I will analyze those classifieds which make explicit the gender and/or nationality of the worker from a spatio-temporal perspective: When and to what extent have specific constructions of gender and nationality become an issue in the national and local Spanish labour market?

Who earns more? Influences on income distribution in couples - A European comparison

Boehnke, Mandy

Institute of Empirical and Applied Sociology, University Bremen

Bremen, Germany

Keywords

hierarchical linear modeling, gender roles, female employment

Female labor force participation, in general, and labor force participation of mothers, in particular, have increased remarkably over the last decades especially in industrialized countries. A number of factors that interact with each other are usually held responsible for this development, e.g., an increasing importance of education, a shift of values, changes in labor markets and welfare state regulations, an increasing variety of living arrangements. Despite this general development, percentages of employed women and employed mothers, attitudes toward female employment as well as gender wage gaps differ sizably between countries.

Utilizing a multi-level analytic approach, the study analyzes reasons for variations in relative earnings of 20- to 65-year old women in comparison to their spouses in 19 EU countries, surveyed in the International Social Survey Program 2002. On the individual level, age, educational attainment, having a child, occupational characteristics as well as gender role attitudes were used as predictors, whereas on the country level, masculinity scores from the Hofstede data base, the Gender Empowerment Measure as well as policy regimes indicators were included.

It emerged that women with a higher education as well as those who are professionals had a higher propensity to have an income higher than their spouses. It seems furthermore important whether a women works as long as her children are under school age: Those women are more prone to reach a higher relative income. Having a child and a spouse who is himself a professional on the other hand had a traditionalizing effect for the income distribution in a partnership. Support of traditional gender roles is above average in families where men are the main breadwinner. On the country level policy regimes seem to be important for the income distribution in a household whereas structural gender equality as well as cultural gender equality do not seem to have a tremendous influence. Moreover, several cross-level interactions were found: among others the influence of motherhood on gendered family income is weakened by country-level gender equality.

Wife Murder: How This Cross European Phenomenon Due to Gender Inequality Continues to Be a Salient Concern to Everyone

Magalhães, Maria José

CIIE, Faculdade de Psicologia e Ciências da Educação da Universidade do Porto Porto, Portugal

Coimbra, Artemisa

CIIE, Faculdade de Psicologia e de Ciências da Educação da Universidade do Porto Porto, Portugal

Keywords

power relations, gender inequality, wife murder, media and juridical discourse

During the last five years (2004-2008) more than a hundred women were murdered by their husbands, ex-husbands, boyfriends and ex-boyfriends. These numbers show how dramatic this problem is in Portuguese society.

In order to try to understand the range of this phenomenon, we will present the analysis of the data considering the following variables: women's age, social background, previous history of domestic violence suffered by these women, the nature of the intimate relationship, the existence of reports to authorities, the age and background of the offenders, the weapon used in the crimes, the regions where the murders occurred, children eye witnessing and the months of the year the murders took place. The analysis ultimately tries to understand the ambiguities that result from particular instances of discourse that people's utterances follow, when they take part in different domains of social life, and in this case being the media discourse as a social practice.

Besides the analysis of these data, it will be presented content analysis of some court decisions related to these crimes in order to show how juridical Portuguese system deals with this dramatic social problem.

Women and men as rural community leaders in Poland: activities, strategies of local cooperation and social networks. Is gender the strongly differentiating factor?

Matysiak, Ilona

Institute for Social Studies, Warsaw University Warsaw, Poland

Keywords

Gender, social capital, Social Networks, rural areas

According to the investigations on rural families and their living conditions, Polish rural women used to cope with the "triple burden": working in the household and agriculture, taking care of their families and doing professional jobs. Apart from that, the women were highly involved in community activities. However, they have not been considered to be important actors of local public life.

Nowadays the situation seems to change. In today's Poland, due to the implementation of decentralization reform and than access to the European Union, rural areas in Poland seem to develop more dynamically than the cities. According to the decentralization reform, "so-tysi" - officially elected rural community leaders are more to support the activities and decisions of local authorities. Practically, they often convert to leaders who initiate the process of the community development. Despite the lack of statistical data related to the exact number of women rural community leaders, the increasing trend of "feminization" of this group has been highly discussed in Polish mass media.

Therefore, it could be extremely interesting to analyze the types of activities, strategies of undertaking the initiatives and social networks that are built by women and men rural community leaders. What are their ideas for rural community development, how do they involve other people in the local cooperation, what kind of local resources do they use while putting their ideas into action. What is the influence of the gender factor in this area? Apart from that, what types of "the channels of entrance" to the local public sphere could be identified? How do these "channels" differ in relation to women and men? How do rural women and men build and use their social capital, especially in terms of social networks? All these questions will be discussed on the basis of existing relevant quantitative and qualitative data and also the results of the author's recent research (survey conducted in chosen group of women and men rural community leaders and case study analysis of two different Polish rural areas).

Women in the lives of Romanian transnational families

Ducu, Viorela

*Sociology and Social Work, BABES-BOLYAI UNIVERSITY
Cluj-Napoca, Romania*

Keywords

transnational family, migrant women, care-provider

In this study I present the strategies through which migrant women manage to fulfill their role of care-provider from a distance. The illustration of the transfer of care towards another woman at home (daughter, sister, mother etc.) stresses the way in which women support each other within transnational families. Interviews with transnational family members (migrants and non-migrants) underline the way in which migrant women manage actively supporting their family financially and emotionally. Moreover, presently in Romania migrant women and their families need to confront the stigmatizing public discourse in which they are referred to as irresponsible mothers leaving their children and careless wives leading their families to divorce and falling apart. This paper is based on 31 interviews and six focus groups on the topic of transnational families. Participants include respondents (transnational family members and key persons) from three rural communities

Women migrants and care work in the South of Italy

Vingelli, Giovanna

*Department of Sociology and Political Science, University of Calabria
Rende, Italy*

Garreffa, Franca

*Department of Sociology and Political Science, University of Calabria
Rende, Italy*

Keywords

care, Gender, Migration

Several research works and analyses have identified a close link between the changes brought about by globalisation and the feminization of migration. Within these macro-processes, some profound differences can be detected among different patterns of migration, their underlying reasons and the meanings attached to female immigration in the different countries of destination. In the richest countries, care work is also undergoing a crucial commodification process. However, this outsourcing process involves individual, face-to-face relationships. The care of children, of disabled people, and of the elderly, besides house cleaning tasks, are generally entrusted to some specific people and they embrace some extremely complex relational spheres, which go far beyond the contractual relationship that formally regulates them. This study is particularly concerned with these relationships and examines the Italian situation as a case study. In Italy, women immigrants are not only an asset for the high and middle classes, but they are more and more frequently employed by the petty and medium bourgeoisie, sometimes working in single-income families. This is the case especially in Southern Italy, where local women find it extremely hard to enter the labour market. This widespread use of home helpers can be partly ascribed to the fact that the family still plays a key role in social mediation. Women are still key actors in this complex network of social relationships and institutional roles. They tend to bear the burden and the cost of transformation processes that are taking place in society. The Italian welfare system has always delegated the satisfaction of everyday needs to the family and, hence, to women. Nowadays, this task has become increasingly arduous, due to the new pace and needs of social reproduction. The aim of the research is to deal with such questions, adopting an intersectional approach (Crenshaw, 1991)- focusing on the evidence that domestic work created specific forms of social marginality - and racialization - for migrant women, though it paradoxically allowed Italian women to convey their new social identities within and outside the family. The research will thus present the results of a quantitative survey, and the outcomes of a qualitative investigation.

Women's Participation and Democracy in the University

Araújo, Helena C.

Educational Sciences, University of Porto/CIEE/Faculty of Psychology and Educational Sciences Portugal, <http://www.fpce.up.pt/ciie>

Keywords

University, women, decision-making, participation

Participation appears to contain an important message for women, considering the state and democratic discourses underlining the equal capacity of women as a social group to live and construct the polis. Feminist and women' studies stress largely the importance of women's participation. Several meanings are attached to participation in educational and policy studies. First, there is the meaning connected to the presence in terms of access to attend democratic institutions. A second meaning is related to provision of conditions to allow the persons of being able to succeed; hence, participation as the involvement in activities with success. A third meaning of participation is certainly the capacity to occupy posts of leadership and of decision-making, due to her or his merit and profile. Certainly other meanings for participation can be advanced. However, in this paper, the intention is to focus women's participation in the academia in processes of decision-making, in a context where their visible presence as lecturers in universities and other higher educational institutions increases in numbers and qualifications. However, their participation in terms of leadership, representation and the sharing of decision-making is far from being in similar terms. Decision-making and representation posts are in general perceived as male activities. Many would also say that frameworks and styles maintain the male definition of doing the job. Stereotypes are constantly around us, albeit many times they are fought, or reconfigured, or even re-appropriated in new forms that are more open. The data that will be presented will compare the Portuguese data with other European countries, stressing that in fact this points to a problem of democracy. The data has been collected within a financed European project and has recently been reformulated.

Women, Family Status and Class Position: Cases of Locally Notable Families in Provincial Turkey

Ozsan, Gul

*Sociology, Marmara University
Istanbul, Turkey*

Durakbasa, Ayse

*Sociology, Marmara University
Istanbul, Turkey*

Karadag, Meltem

*Sociology, Gaziantep University
Gaziantep, Turkey*

Keywords

Life Styles, Women's Narratives, Social Class, social status, Locally Notable Families

In this paper, we aim to elaborate on the interviews we want to interpret the women's narratives from the e-rafi (locally notable) families based on a recent joint research project (Ayşe Durakbasa, Gül Özsan, Meltem Karadağ; funded by TUB-TAK) Women's narratives contained important data about e-rafi families as a social status group. Interviews with women of these families reinforce the status-markers in relation to the domestic activities and other festivities with public significance. Women were engaged in building relationships with the local governing elite, the newcomers to the town, and their families. They functioned as representatives of family status. They were active in the formation and development of the social capital and building of appropriate marriage ties by the maintenance of social equivalence in the marriages. They stressed the importance of rituals such as weddings, how and where they are conducted and what kind of a recreation is preferred. Thus, even though the foundations and symbolic characteristics of the e-rafi and being from the e-rafi are rooted in a male structure, women played primary roles in all relations with the similar status families and different status families, that is, in the realization of class practices, in general. Women from historically earlier families and what might be called as the old eshrافی emphasized their distinct social status indicators in manners, and codes of etiquette and social respectability in relation to how they regard their wealth and advantaged social position and very clearly differentiated themselves from the new eshrافی who have more recently appeared as economically powerful families at the local setting.

The biographical stories related by these women, from the rich and notable families of the provincial towns, suggest significant keys in relation to the construction and realization of modernization and nationhood at the local level as well as the specific context about the particular town and province. Besides, the narratives also illustrate how the provincial e-rafi perceive themselves in comparison to the bourgeoisie of the metropolis such as "Istanbul" and "Zmir" and inform the exemplary life styles followed by these women and their families.

RS01

Sociology and Disability

"Safe territories": How the special education discourse legitimises the classification of students as "learning disabled" and their segregated schooling in Germany

Pfahl, Lisa

*Skill Formation and Labour Markets, Social Science Research Centre Berlin
Germany,*

Powell, Justin J.W.

*Skill Formation and Labour Markets, Social Science research Centre Berlin
Germany,*

Keywords

segregation, discourse, learning disability, life courses, subjectivation

This contribution addresses the ideologies and history of remedial or healing pedagogy ("Heilpädagogik") and its impact on life courses and the selves of youth transitioning from school-to-work in Germany. The paper analyses:

- a) the special education discourse over the 20th century using an archive of the "Zeitschrift für Heilpädagogik", the journal of the German special education professional association that is the main actor that constructed and legitimised disability in the German educational system up to the present day.
- b) standardised survey results on the life courses of children who are classified as "learning disabled". These students' backgrounds are characterized by social and economic disadvantages and unsuccessful school careers; about 80 percent who leave segregated special schools lack any qualifying school certificate.
- c) biographical case studies of four special school-leavers at two points in time: as they left compulsory schooling and as they entered vocational training. These reveal how the themes of the scientific discourse of "learning disability" are adapted in these individuals' life stories.

The professional construction of learning disabilities focuses on "healing individual cognitive deficits" of students who attend segregated schools. Segregated educational environments, viewed by educators as providing special support by offering a "comforting space" (Schonraum), actually limit the educational attainment and personal development of their students. Additionally, the incorporation of scientific discourse elements of physical "incompleteness" and "disruptiveness" shapes the biographical selves of youth, such that they remain in purportedly "safe territories", which restrain and constrict their participation and inclusion.

Theoretically, we distinguish two mechanisms: 1. Students are subjectivated (Foucault 1976) through the educational system's hierarchical structure, which "limits" their educational success and allocates them to low social and occupational positions. 2. The segregation of students with learning disabilities stigmatises (Goffman 1975) them as "incompetent" (Jenkins 1998); as it simultaneously shields persons -- via the territories (Foucault 2004) in which they are socialised -- from educational standards and societal expectations.

Thus, Germany offers an ideal typical case of segregated spaces, educational and environmental. Moreover, for the sociology of disability, the biographies of classified students provide a crucial source for the (de-)construction of learning disability in meritocratic societies.

A sociological critique of disability commissions and rehabilitation in Russia

Rasell, Michael

Centre for Russian and East European Studies, University of Birmingham Birmingham, United Kingdom

Keywords

medical, Social Policy, disability, russia, qualitative

My paper looks at one of the most controversial institutions of Russian disability policy: the medical-social commissions that assess disability and the welfare needs of individuals with health impairments. I am interested in how their work contributes to the creation of disability as an official category and type of need in Russia. I also explore the consequences of this for the well-being of people with physical disabilities. These questions have gained importance following recent reforms that changed the legal definition of disability and introduced new procedures for obtaining welfare support and assistive devices.

My discussions are based on ten months of qualitative fieldwork about the role of social policy in the everyday lives of physically disabled people in Russia. I offer a bottom-up perspective on the Russian welfare system by discussing personal experiences of the medical commissions and juxtaposing them with official discourses and statements. The paper contextualises the current medical commissions by showing how they represent a reworking of earlier Soviet-era practices that were ostensibly overhauled in the 1995. Medical experts control the various procedures with very little input from non-health personnel, NGOs or disabled people themselves. Disability policy in Russia thus remains largely medicalised, focussed on individual 'rehabilitation' rather than social inclusion and independent living.

A Transversal Politics of Accommodation: Toward an Expanded Model of Social Justice for Mothers (and Others) with Disabilities

Pinto, Paula

Sociology, York University

Short Hills, USA

Keywords

disability, social justice theory, politics of reasonable accommodation

Nancy Fraser's famous model of politics encompassing the three dimensions of redistribution, recognition and representation, offers a productive framework to discuss justice claims in contemporary societies (Fraser 2005). However, in her theorizations Fraser has rarely addressed issues of (dis)ability. Drawing from data collected in a study which explored the experiences of mothers with disabilities and the policy context in Portugal, I show that Fraser's framework is helpful but indeed insufficient to think about a justice paradigm which delivers "participatory parity" to mothers (and others) with disabilities. In fact, even more than other justice claimers, persons with disabilities require that both equality and difference are emphasized, since to ignore one or the other engenders their exclusion (Devlin & Pothier 2006). At a fundamental level, however, Fraser's model disregards the difference of disability and thus also fails to engage with it. To ensure the participation of people with disabilities on equal terms with others in social life, I argue, we need more than redistribution, recognition and representation; we need to re-configure social and physical environments in ways that acknowledge and accommodate non-normative forms of embodiment and ways of life. A transversal politics of accommodation is thus a fundamental tenet of an expanded model of social justice capable of delivering substantive equality for people with disabilities. In concluding the presentation I offer tangible examples of how such a four-dimensional politics could begin to be developed in the Portuguese context, and with what effects.

Actors and Power Dynamics in the Struggles of People with Disabilities: A Comparative Study of four Turkish Disability Organizations

Yardimci, Sibel

*Sociology, Mimar Sinan Fine Arts University
Istanbul, Turkey*

Bezmez, Dikmen

*Sociology, Bahcesehir University
Istanbul, Turkey*

Keywords

Rights, disability organizations, Turkey, citizenship

This paper focuses on the struggles by people with disabilities in Turkey from a citizenship perspective. More specifically, within the framework of the revived interest in citizenship since the late 1980s, it examines whether the struggles in Turkey could be conceived within a similar framework. For this purpose, the paper analyzes four disability organizations, each representing a different approach to disability. The goal is to investigate these organizations' capability to deliver a rights-based discourse, for it is the presence or absence of such a discourse that constitutes one of the cornerstones of current citizenship debates. First, the Association of People with Disabilities of Turkey, with its connection to the state, as a beneficiary of the latter's charity, plays the role of the mediator, whose duty is to redistribute to the "needy" disabled, the grants provided by the "charitable" state/society. Secondly, the Whitemoon Association for the Blind, whose founder is a deputy of the leading party, represents a form of organizing intertwined with the central government, and is under the influence of the "charity" approach to social policies promoted by the party in power today. Thirdly, the Six Dots Foundation for the Blind, embodies, at least in relative terms, a different approach in the sense that its efforts are directed at the empowerment of blind people within society, through educative and rehabilitative projects. Finally, the Disabled and their Friends Platform, is able to develop a more rights-based attitude, closer to the current-day citizenship conceptions, due to its alternative form of organizing over the Internet, which frees it, to a large degree, from relations of patronage. Drawing upon these four cases, the paper argues that in contrast to recent developments in other national settings, due to the institutional, political and historical specificities of Turkey, despite their differences, most organizations maintain relations of patronage with state actors, preventing them from developing a rights-based attitude. Yet, parallel to the impact of the European Union and technological developments such as the Internet, alternative forms of organizing started being formed at the virtual level. These developments act as the harbinger of a relatively more rights-based discourse.

Capabilities for What? Italian Employment Policies for Disabled People between Obstacles and Opportunity

Mozzana, Carlotta

*Department of Social and Political Studies, University of Milan
Milano, Italy*

Monteleone, Raffaele

Department of Sociology and Social Research, University of Milan-Bicocca Italy,

Keywords

participation, disability, job insertion policies, capability for work, personalization

In 1999, Law n. 68/99 "Rules on the right to work of disabled people" introduced a new framework of personalization in job insertion for disabled people within the Italian social policies' context and conferred competence for local planning to Italian Provinces. In this paper we present the results of an empirical research that focuses on the Provincial Plan for job insertion of disabled people in Milan (Plan Emergo). The research combines content analysis and semi-structured interviews to project coordinators and social workers, and its aim is to investigate, through the concept of capability, if and how this Plan reaches its purposes: which capabilities are pursued and for which job?

The Emergo Plan, developed in 2004, was the first of a new generation of instruments that aimed at reorganizing fragmented and differentiated measures for job insertion policies for disabled people at the local level. In theory, the Plan promotes personalized projects designed according to persons' characteristics and it pursues real conditions of employment through the promotion of people's capabilities, in particular of their capability for work.

The first part of the paper sets the case in the framework of Italian policies for disabled people. It highlights the connections between social services and job insertion policies.

In the second part we examine the courses of action and the organisational logics of local agencies (both public and private ones) that implemented job insertion projects through the Plan. We considered two levels of analysis of the policy devices: design and implementation.

The research shows that the Plan could not transform the way the agencies work: measures are bended and adapted to agencies' organisational routines or to labour market's logics and they do not guarantee adequate social support in order to promote disabled people's capabilities. This situation has relevant consequences in terms of: a) chance of personalization of the projects; b) participation and activation of disabled people; c) job opportunities.

Starting from this case, we finally present some indications about the organisational dimension of job insertion policies, in particular as regards the relation between capabilities and participation of disabled people in building personalized interventions.

Cultural capital of disabled students in the context of meanings constructing the educational and social discourse of inequality

Rzeznicka-Krupa, Jolanta

Department of Social Sciences, University of Gdansk gdansk, Poland

Keywords

social inequalities, cultural capital, disability

The concept of cultural capital in the P. Bourdieu theory defines - in the most general meaning - all attributes and skills of the individual which are socially inherited (descent) and acquired during a life and which have a symbolic nature according to social and cultural perception and evaluation processes. The category is strongly connected with the signs locating individuals in the hierarchy of social space and within the specified groups. It may be understood as resources which are realized on the different levels and in the various forms as a social, economic, language and cultural capital. But the particular elements do not have the same power to validate (it depends on the connection with the dominant groups culture) and generate individual habitus - a mentale structure which shapes the people way of thinking and acting so it can be interpreted as a kind of bridge between the individual structures of meaning and the society organization. It becomes a part of social and cultural capital of individual and takes part as well in the process of identification and localization in the social hierarchy as in the processes of social exclusion and self-exclusion.

Social inequalities can be defined as a phenomenon connected with the unequal access and opportunities to use and profit from social goods and services as well as restricted participation in some groups and processes, which can be expressed in various dimensions, e.g. institutional, spatial, educational, vocational, et cetera. By means of different strategies and mechanisms they lead to the processes of discrimination, marginalization and exclusion of some individuals and groups what M.Weber called a 'social closure' syndrome. Inequalities, caused by cumulating of individuals features and social and cultural capital of their families, are strengthened by the schools or other educational institutions inherent attributes connected with their organization and functioning.

The paper presents the results of the quantitative and qualitative empirical studies on some elements generating the cultural capital of disabled students in chosen special and inclusive forms of education in Poland.

Disability imagined: heroes and spongers in Soviet visual policy

Iarskaia-Smirnova, Elena

*Social Anthropology and Social Work, Saratov State Technical University
Saratov, Russia*

Romanov, Pavel

*Social-Economic Systems and Social Policy, State University - Higher School of Economics
Moscow, Russia*

Keywords

Soviet history, representation, disability

The different forms of visual arts, including propaganda contributed into political discourse of socialist society using old and new imaginary for classifying Soviet citizens in different historical periods. Posters and propaganda films provided an effective vehicle for conveying Bolshevik interpretation of citizenship through the issues of ability, gender and age. The Soviet strategies of modernization included the Taylorization of disability rooted in scientific management approach in industry as the pre-revolutionary film clearly demonstrates. The early Soviet propaganda film is structured along such important dichotomies as capitalism vs. socialism, experts vs. the disabled, disability vs. shock work, workers vs. spongers, backward vs. technically advanced, - all that along with the notions of pure collective political identity depict social context of industrialization, collectivization, campaign against wage-leveling, etc. The most persistent approach of Soviet disability iconography was "who does not work does not eat", which resulted in legitimacy of differential social inclusion. Mental impairment, women, children and elderly were excluded from the war and labour heroics of Soviet disability discourse. State control and isolating forms of care provision increased, so that by the 1960s there was little chance that a disabled person could have economic independence, and a general suspicion of the disabled as an irresponsible sponger is seen in posters and movies along with traditional connotations of victimization, pity, and heroism. While the State continued to present itself as a rich and responsible provider throughout the "Zastoi" (stagnation) years, a sense of rebellion and liberation was revealing itself in underground literature, until the idea of "rights" reached the light in the years of post-Soviet freedom. Disability at large appears as an iconic sign, a metaphor conveying meanings of misery and fear derived from religious and folk traditions. New connotations have been attached to and detached from disability in Soviet and post-Soviet times in a long process of shaping value system of socialism and then re-drawing the imaginary map according to landmarks of the new bureaucracy, human rights movement and the market.

Disability, education and employment in Europe: A comparative study

Fylling, Ingrid

*Department of Social Science, Bodø University College
Bodø, Norway*

Sandvin, Johans

*Department of Social Science, Bodø University College
Bodø, Norway*

Keywords

europe, employment, education, disability

Enabling people with disabilities to entering the labor market has been an important goal within disability policy in most European Countries, as well as in the EU. However, while people with disabilities represent around one sixth of the overall EU working age population, their employment rate is comparatively low. Disabled people are almost twice as likely to be left out of the labor market as non-disabled people. Many argues that the main way of achieve increased employment for people with disabilities is to strenghten their access to education.

In the paper, we explore the relationship between education and employment for people with disability in Europe. Using data from the EQLS (European Quality of Life Studies), we want in particular to focus upon two interrelaed questions. The first questions concerns the impact of education in increasing employment rates among people with disabilities. How much of the variation in employment rates for people with disabilities in European Countries could be explained by differences in education? Imbedded in this question is a discussion on whether (and why) the inclusion prosesses have been more successfull in education than in employment. The second question we adress in the paper concerns to what degreee the relationship between education and employment for people with disailities vary between different countries which by a model developed from Esping Andersen's model could be classified as different Welfare Regimes.

Disabled mothers and child custody in Canada and the UK; Intersections of Discourse, Practice and Narrative

Malacrida, Claudia

Sociology, University of Lethbridge Lethbridge, Alberta, Canada

Keywords

discourse analysis, Narrative, Surveillance, Motherhood, child custody

Disability Studies typically examines barriers to inclusion and citizenship from a materialist and structural basis, often failing to take into account the voices and experiences of those served by public policies and practices. Conversely, narrative studies often fail to connect the embodied experiences of disabled people to the broader structures that constrain or facilitate their lives. Finally, the discipline of disability studies has been charged with being gender-blind in its analyses, marginalizing the concerns of women in the broader struggle for disability rights.

This bridge these gaps, first by examining the narratives of Canadian and British women with disabilities about their gendered experiences as mothers, with a particular focus on mothers' struggles to maintain child custody. Second, through a critical discourse analysis of policy relating to family, apprehension and disability, the research outlines structures that facilitate or impede disabled mothers and their families. Finally, extending the ideas of feminist poststructuralist Chris Weedon, it unpacks the ways that discourse and narrative intersect.

The data draws on narrative interviews with 43 Canadian and 39 British women concerning their challenges and triumphs and their interactions with helping professions in maintaining full child custody of their children. The study also explores disability and family policy in Canada and the UK, using critical discourse analysis to examine assumptions of pathology and lack embedded in the discourse. These data, drawn from two similar yet divergent cultural contexts, permit us on a manifest level to speculate on best practices, as indicated through the women's stories about differences in surveillance, intervention and policy relating to child custody. On a latent level, the data also permit us, through an examination of some of the similarities in these social experiences and institutions, to unpack some of the assumptions that are embedded in public policy and practice across cultural contexts pertaining to entitlement, responsibility, and personhood for women with disabilities. Finally, the study permits us to move narrative analysis outside of the bounds of the personal or interactional so as to connect the women's experiences to broader discursive and material practices of surveillance, intervention and oppression.

Disabled people and edgework: Disability, access and voluntary risk taking

Burns, Nicola

*Sociology, Anthropology and Applied Social Science, University of Glasgow
Glasgow, UK*

Watson, Nick

*Sociology, Anthropology and Applied Social Science, University of Glasgow
Glasgow, UK*

Keywords

Risk, disability, access, edgework

Risk and disability are inextricably linked. Disabled people are seen as risky; they are not to be trusted and they are seen as a risk both to themselves and to others. They must be supervised at all times. Their bodies are not to be depended on, they do not operate in the same way as nondisabled people and we cannot have confidence in what they can and cannot do. Disabled people are also seen as a product of risk. People become disabled because of risky behaviours; either their own or that of others. Car accidents, drinking, drug taking, climbing, horse riding and other high risk sports are all seen as a major cause of disability. Disabled people are also not meant to take risks and are meant to be risk averse in their everyday lives, they are not meant to voluntarily place themselves in a risky situation. They are supposed to adopt safe and comfortable life styles.

Much public policy for disabled people around, for example access is aimed at reducing the risk to disabled people. Whilst there has been a recent drive to promote access for disabled people in a wide range of activities health and safety fears have traditionally been used to deny disabled people that right. In this paper we draw on a recently completed study into disabled people's access to woodland to examine the way that risk is used by organisations to deny access and by disabled people to promote not just their right to access but also the way that they discuss the enjoyment they get from such access. We use the concept of edgework to examine the contradiction between a public agenda to reduce risk and a private agenda to increase and embrace such risk.

Disabled People and Self Directed Support Schemes: Re-Conceptualising Work and Welfare in the 21st Century

Prideaux, Simon

*School of Sociology and Social Policy, University of Leeds
Leeds, UK*

Roulstone, Alan

*Faculty of Health and Life Sciences, De Montfort University
Leicester, UK*

Harris, Jennifer

School of Education, Social Work and Community Education, University of Dundee Dundee, UK

Barnes, Colin

*School of Sociology and Social Policy, University of Leeds
Leeds, UK*

Keywords

Direct payments, employment, independent living, policy, theory

This paper critically explores and adds to research on the social benefits of self directed support schemes for disabled people and their families. We argue that, although research to date has defined the benefits of such services within conventional "cost-benefit" frameworks, this approach has failed to address the more significant challenge to traditional models of welfare and particularly the role of users of these schemes as employers. The paper begins the process of repositioning understandings of welfare and work with reference to self directed support services. In so doing we argue that future research and policy should be based on a more thorough analysis of the less acknowledged socio-economic costs and benefits of these developments for users, their families, personal assistants and local/national economies.

Disabling disability or the making and ameliorating of ontological outsiders

Hughes, Bill

*Law and Social Sciences, Glasgow Caledonian University
Glasgow, UK*

Keywords

ontology, elimination, disability, correction

In this paper, I will argue that elimination or correction has been the primary social response to impaired bodies in modernity and that the primary form of experience (of disability), during the same period, has been one of invalidation. Invalidation carries a "dual meaning" as both "confinement through incapacity" and "deficit of credibility" (Hughes 2000: 558) This (latter and more crucial) claim is based on the view that, in the non-disabled imaginary disability is an "ontological deficit" - a reduction of "leib" to "korpor", human to animal, subjectivity to meat, identity to excessive corporeal presence. It is this deficit of credibility that provides the rationale for the disposal of disabled bodies by means of elimination - either through extermination or segregation - or correction, particularly by way of rehabilitation, a practice designed to erase the difference/aversion that disability has come to represent. The paper mobilises the category of "ableism" as well as the argument that this category can be used to suggest that we live in a culture in which the emotional parameters of "pathology" include repulsion and disgust. These emotional responses are, therefore, central to the practices of elimination and correction that provide the "normal" response to disability.

Does size matter?

Widding, Steinar

*Work Research Institute, Work Research Institute
Oslo, Norway*

Keywords

SME, disability, work, Integration, inclusion

In Europe, most enterprises have less than 20 employees. Small enterprises have a large potential for job creation. However, the potential of small enterprises as workplaces for people with disabilities, have received relative little attention in the research literature. This paper builds on qualitative data from a comparative project on enabling and disabling factors within three sectors (ICT, construction and health). The situation in three countries (Norway, the Netherlands and UK) are compared. A special qualitative study of a sample of Norwegian small enterprises was done as a part of the larger study. The study revealed a pronounced difference in employers' perception between insiders and outsiders, influencing recruitment practices. While recruitment of people with disabilities was looked upon as unnecessary risk taking, many of the small enterprises already had employees with disabilities, but they were seldom thought of as that. The study reveals that financial incentives and measures for recruitment and retention of workers with disabilities do not necessarily balance out the employers' negative views of disability. However, incentives might be more effective if they are combined with measures that permit employers to learn from personal experience with disabled workers.

Education for personnel in the care for persons with disabilities, a sometimes invisible issue

Ahnlund, Petra

Social Work, Social Work

Umeå, Sweden

Keywords

education, care work, personnel

The presentation consist of a research review which aims to analyse how education for care workers in elderly care and in the care for people with disabilities is studied in a Swedish and international context. My earlier research has shown that at a national level questions concerning education for care workers are more discussed and studied upon for personnel in elderly care than for personnel in the care for persons with disabilities.

The material consists of 46 articles, 28 from the disability sector and 18 from the elderly care sector. According to the analytical concept of shared value system, the reason to do research about education for care workers in the disability sector is grounded in the needs of the care recipients. Their quality of life is the most important motive for educating care workers. In comparison to the elderly sector, both the needs of the elderly and personnel are questions concerning further education.

According to issues of the practice, there were no studies in the research review that relate to national goals for initial education for care workers. In the disability sector, it seems to be that the norms for handling issues of education by educate already employed personnel. In these studies, the care recipients are involved in the educational activities. The trend is individualisation where personnel and care recipients undergo the education together.

At large, education for care workers in the care of disability sector is more discussed on a international level than in Sweden. Also, the question of education for personnel is on a more individual basis, where care workers learn together with the care recipient. Educational levels, the work environment and relations with colleagues and care recipients are connected and support from the managers is important for understanding the work and the relational perspective. I mean however, that it is important to include, in a much more legible way, the personnel in the care for persons with disabilities in the discussions about education in a Swedish context, both on a national level but also among social researchers.

Exclusion or integration of social assistance recipients from youth to adulthood

Hammer, Torild

*NOVA, NOVA, Norwegian Social Research
Oslo, Norway*

Keywords

disability, social assistance, unemployment, Youth

There has been a significant increase in disability benefits among young people in Norway the last two decades. Research has showed, by analysing the diagnoses over time that the increase has mainly been in psychiatric diagnoses (Brage and Thune 2008). Moreover, OECD (2008) has recently evaluated the school to work transition in Norway. The report question the high proportion of young people living on benefits in a time with very low unemployment rates in Norway. I want to explore the consequences of receiving benefits as young for their situation in adulthood. The aim of this paper is to analyse integration or exclusion of previously unemployed social assistance recipients from youth to adulthood

The research questions will be investigated by using a unique combination of survey and register data from the "Work, Lifestyle and Health" survey. This survey is a longitudinal panel survey following a sample of nearly 2000 individuals, representative for the Norwegian cohorts born 1965 - 1968. The survey was introduced in 1985 with follow ups in 1987, 1989, 1993 and again in 2003. The time window thus allowed by the survey spans from 1985 - 2003 giving us the possibility to view individual life trajectories from the age of 17-20 to 35-39 during 18 years... The panel was stratified based on the individual's main occupation in 1985. Those in education were picked by the lowest probability (0.25, N=801), those in employment with a higher probability (0.70, N=800) and those neither working or in employment with the highest (1.00, N=394). In 1985 the survey consisted of about 100 questions on health, future ambitions, school- and work- adjustment. In 1987, 1989 and 1993 questions regarding health, both physical and mental, sick leave, leisure activities and substance abuse were added.

The results showed that even controlling for social background, alcohol-and drug use, mental health and total weeks of unemployment, to receive social assistance increased the probability of being provided by public support in adulthood.

From charity to social citizenship: disability policies and the Disabled People's Movement in Portugal

Fontes, Fernando

School of Sociology and Social Policy, University of Leeds, Centre for Disability Studies Farsley, United Kingdom

Keywords

state, social model, SOCIAL POLICIES, Disability / impairment, Disabled people's movement

In the Western world, disability has been historically construed as unwanted, impure, sinful and tragic. Accordingly, disabled bodies have been narrated as social threats which are predominantly acknowledged as sources of pity, charity and, more recently, medical intervention. Social policies have not been immune to this imagery. Based on my PhD research about social citizenship and the Disabled People's Movement in Portugal, this paper explores emergent data related to disability policies put forward in Portugal since 1974, after the re-establishment of democracy.

I begin by examining the disability policies in a time span perspective, highlighting major tendencies, changes and driving forces. This will be followed by an analysis of the disability imagery in the Portuguese law. More specifically, I will examine how disability and disabled people have been portrayed by and addressed in the legal documents which guide disability policies. This analysis will allow me to identify the models of disability that have been mainly used by the Portuguese state.

In the last part of the paper I will consider the social context in which disability policies are implemented in Portugal. In order to do so, I offer a characterisation of the Portuguese Disabled People's Movement (DPM), situating this movement in light of the theoretical debates in Disability Studies. I conclude by assessing the role of the DPM in politicising the concept of disability and challenging dominant and disabling understandings of disability.

Invisible Women: the lives of blind women in the Asylums and outdoor Missions in Edinburgh and Glasgow

McFarlane, Hazel

*Sociology, Anthropology and Applied Social Sciences, University of Glasgow
Glasgow, Scotland*

Keywords

women, asylums, blindness, blind asylums, outdoor missions

This paper will present data on the Edinburgh and Glasgow Blind Asylums established in 1793 and 1828 respectively. These institutions sought to render blind people, useful members of society. Much of the emphasis was placed on making blind people contributors and socially useful and much effort was placed on employment. Whilst most of the inmates were men, women also came under the institution's control. The director's intentions towards female inmates were quite different from that applied to men. The women were seen as being in need of protection both from the rigours of everyday life but also, importantly, from themselves. And a great deal of emphasis was placed on the provision of pastoral care. Blindness, class and morality were closely connected. For women from poorer classes in particular, sight loss was often directly attributed to immoral behaviour.

Pastoral care emphasised that although female inmates or outworkers were from the poorer classes, they were of good moral stature, thereby retaining their status as "deserving objects of charity". The Missions had a strong belief in the reformatory effects of religion upon wayward, wanton blind women and it was within this discourse that the women had to live their lives.

This paper explores the religious and moral undertones that influenced the enforcement of strict rules, regulations and regimes, supposedly to protect the women's moral stature. The constant surveillance and monitoring to which female inmates were subjected to, acted to oppress, control and restrict the women's lives and choices. They were for example denied the right to form relationships. The threat of dismissal encouraged conformity, however, a few female inmates did clearly engage in resistance.

One Size Fits All? Exploring the lived experiences of women with "mental health problems" in an outreaching activation program in the social workplace

Vandekinderen, Caroline

*Vakgroep Orthopedagogiek, Universiteit Gent
Gent, België*

Roets, Griet

*Social Welfare Studies, Universiteit Gent
Gent, België*

Keywords

insiders perspective, women with mental health problems, un-employability, recovery

This article is based on an evaluative survey in the context of a pilot activation program for women with "mental health problems" and additionally diagnosed problems of drug addiction in the context of a social workplace in East Flanders (a region in the Dutch speaking part of Belgium). Subsidized by the European Social Fund (ESF), the project managers set up an outreaching and innovative method in which three women with "mental health problems" were deployed to recruit, activate and "guide" other women of this "target group" to the social workplace. As part of the research project, the research team explored the insider perspectives on work aspirations and experiences of the eleven women involved in the program retrospectively to identify critical factors in their search for employment and to engage in a qualitative in-depth analysis. Some critical insights emerged and are illustrated. The women involved were positioned in a categorising niche that confirms the socially constructed notion of un-employability in the context of the social workplace that functions as an isolated men's bastion. Symbolically relevant were the oversized overalls that women were forced to wear. However this one size fits all-approach reflects gendered social institutions and discourses guided by the abstract norm of a white middleclass bourgeoisie and by artificial boundaries between "normal" and "abnormal" men and women. This activation discourse and associated praxis mirrors a welfare-to-work agenda in which normative notions of citizenship are at work and instant employment status reigns. In line with the way how the women involved dealt productively with the complex amalgam of relevant problems and issues in their everyday lives, we want to challenge this unilateral one size fits all mantra. In that vein, we address implications in line with the emerging recovery paradigm of psychiatric system survivors, where to find and to loose a job is considered as an inherently meaningful and unique process of recovery and as part of lifelong career development.

Personal assistance: a gap in Portuguese inclusion strategy for people with impairment

Oliveira, Pedro

*Department of Materials and Production Technologies, National Institute for Engineering, Technology and Innovation
Lisbon, Portugal*

Anjos, Cláudia

*Research and Consultancy, National Institute of Administration
Oeiras, Portugal*

Rando, Belén

*Research and Consultancy, National Institute of Administration
Oeiras, Portugal*

Keywords

independent living, active citizenship, personal assistance, sustainable innovation.

OBJECTIVE: The purpose of this paper is to analyze the adequacy of the Portuguese Rehabilitation and Inclusion System (PRIS) for people with impairment (PWI) in order to guarantee full and active citizenship. Also, it intends to examine PRIS's sustainability.

METHODS: To this end, an analysis of the national system for supporting PWI has been made. In addition, a literature review has been made concerning solutions for these people in general and, in particular, regarding personal assistance service.

RESULTS: Results prove that PRIS focuses only in health, education and employment/professional training areas, excluding economic and justice sectors. In addition, assistentialism, compensation, institutionalism, statism, centralism and associativism are the general principles of this system. This model doesn't ponder the person with impairment as a consumer, getting far from the independent living (IL) philosophy. The last one constitutes a more constructive answer and it has been already included in the Standard Rules on the Equalization of Opportunities for Persons with Disabilities, as well as it is being developed in European context. On the other hand, evidence reveals several social and economical advantages for sustainable innovation associated to the IL philosophy.

CONCLUSIONS: It has been verified the insufficiency of the PRIS for guaranteeing equal opportunities and full and active citizenship for PWI, especially in the case of severe impairment. The evidence shows that personal assistance and support services are the most cost-effective means to ensure that PWI and their families are able to enjoy all rights as citizens, guaranteeing they can work, receive education and training, in brief, they can pursue an active social and economic life, reducing dependency on informal or charitable forms of support. This solution also helps to create a competitive market with quality rules that turn users into customers. Finally, aiming at narrowing the gap identified, several solutions to reform the system and to create a personal assistance model are suggested.

Public controversies and social care policies: experts and social movements in the history of care policies for dependant people in Spain

Rodríguez-Giralt, Israel

*Psychology and Education, Universitat Oberta de Catalunya
Barcelona, Spain*

López Gómez, Daniel

*Psychology and Education, Universitat Oberta de Catalunya
Barcelona, Spain*

Planella Ribera, Jordi

*Psychology and Education, Universitat Oberta de Catalunya
Barcelona, Spain*

Keywords

social movements, Spain, social care, expert knowledge, dependant people

The Spanish Government has recently set up a new social care policy for dependant people. This policy is currently surrounded by a huge controversy concerning the definition of what a dependant/autonomous person is, the necessities that must be covered according to different degrees of autonomy/dependency and the types of care-giving needed. In this paper we would like to present the preliminary results of a research project on the techno-scientific controversies implied in the new Spanish social care policy for dependant people. We would like to present some findings about the role of experts (mainly social workers and health professionals) and social movements in the production of different understandings of dependency/autonomy and good/bad care during the last century and how these different understandings might be influencing social care policies for dependant people in Spain.

Revisiting the "dys-appearing body" through the lens of psycho-emotional disablism

Reeve, Donna

Applied Social Science, Centre for Disability Research Lancaster, UK

Keywords

chronic illness, sociology of impairment, phenomenology, psycho-emotional disablism

The social model of disability has been criticised for maintaining an artificial separation of the impaired body from socially constructed disability. Whilst politically this has been very useful in helping the disabled people's movement recognise and challenge forms of social oppression experienced by people with impairments, this dichotomy fails to recognise the "carnal politics of everyday life" (Paterson and Hughes, 1999). One potential solution to this problem is the introduction of a sociology of impairment which recognises that "impairment is social and disability is embodied" (Paterson and Hughes, 1999: 598). Drawing on phenomenological concepts, these authors showed that when people with impairments experience disabling barriers such as patronising behaviour, then the impaired body is brought into focus, "dys-appearing" because of its perceived "abnormality".

It is clear that the experience of psycho-emotional disablism (Thomas, 2007) which arises from disablist attitudes and behaviours at the interpersonal level, is closely related to Paterson and Hughes' account of the "dys-appearing" body. Therefore, one aim of this exploratory paper is to examine what the concept of psycho-emotional disablism brings to their theoretical work on a sociology of impairment.

Secondly, this paper considers the particular experience of one relatively neglected group of disabled people within disability studies, those who are seen as the "unhealthy disabled" (Wendell, 2001). Data from doctoral research is used to illustrate how interactions with strangers can cause the chronically ill body to "dys-appear", in order to satisfy the stranger's need to maintain a belief in their own invulnerability (Hughes, 2007).

Finally, for many people with chronic illness, their impairments can be invisible or fluctuate over time - thus their bodies can "dys-appear" one day, only to "disappea" and be "taken-for-granted" the next. This failure to fit the stereotypical image of a disabled person with a stable impairment makes it difficult for many people with chronic illness to claim disability benefits and services unless they draw attention to their impairments (Wendell, 2001), making their own bodies "dys-appear". Consequently, the claiming of disability benefits is intricately tied up with notions of identity (as disabled or not) as well as psycho-emotional disablism and impairment.

The importance of cooperation for the total benefit of children with special needs in kindergarten

Jensen, Hanne Cecilie

*Welfare Research, Agder Research
Kristiansand, Norway*

Nilsen, Ann Christin

*Welfare Research, Agder Research
Kristiansand, Norway*

Keywords

children, cooperation, coordination, special needs

In this paper we discuss some major findings generated in the explorative and action-oriented research project entitled: 'Cooperation for the total benefit of the child?' . Our focus of interest in the project is children with special needs attending Norwegian kindergartens. In order to ensure the well-being of these children there is a need for substantial cooperation and coordination among the children's families, their kindergartens, and bodies within different sectors of the welfare system (e.g., educational and medical services). The children in our sample all have so-called 'individual plans' (IP) in which goals, roles and activities at the center of this cooperation are documented. The aim of this project is to address how the relations within the cooperative team are constructed and carried out when there is an IP from the perspectives of the different agents who comprise these teams. In addition, the knowledge generated from the project is intended to improve cooperation within the participating teams as well as provide the groundwork for developing models of 'best practice'.

In the discussion we will draw on theories of coordination and cooperation (Zahl 2003, Knudsen 1993, Lauvås og Lauvås 2004). According to these theories cooperation and coordination are mutually dependent. Whereas coordination is formalized, time limited and rooted in 'top?', cooperation is less formalized, occurs more often on an ad-hoc basis, and is rooted in 'bottom?'. The discussion will concentrate on the following questions: What differences exist in how cooperation is coordinated with respect to roles and responsibility, procedures and work methods? How do the different agents experience their cooperation? And finally: How important is coordination for cooperation, and vice versa?

Knudsen, Harald (1993): 'Samarbeid på tvers av organisasjonens grenser?' i Repstad, P (red.): Dugnadsånd og Forsvarsverker. Tverretattlig samarbeid i teori og praksis, Oslo: TANO

Lauvås K. og Lauvås P. (2004): Tverrfaglig samarbeid. Perspektiv og strategi, Oslo: Universitetsforlaget

Zahl, M-A (red.) (2003): Sosialt arbeid. Refleksjon og handling, Bergen: Fagbokforlaget

*In Norwegian: 'Samarbeid til barnets helhetlige utbytte?'. The project is financed by the Norwegian Research Council.

The Lives and Loves of the She-Devil: exploring poststructuralist feminism as a source of inspiration for critical disability studies

Roets, Griet

Department of Social Welfare Studies, Ghent University Ghent, Belgium

Keywords

critical disability studies, poststructuralist feminism, imagination of subjectivities

I look at my face in the bathroom mirror. I want to see something different. I take off my clothes. I stand naked. I want to be changed. Nothing is impossible, not for she-devils. Peel away the wife, the mother, find the woman, and there the she-devil is. Excellent! Glitter glitter. Are those my eyes? They're so bright they light up the room (Weldon, quoted in Braidotti, 2002, p117)

Critical disability studies is an emerging interdisciplinary academic field that examines social, cultural, political, historical, and relational theories of disability and impairment related to the dynamic interplays between impaired bodies and minds and various aspects of contemporary culture, politics, and society. In this paper, I focus on the ontological question underlying current praxis in disability studies to create cultural re-symbolization. Ontological grounds may be seen as sets of basic beliefs about the nature of reality and how it may be perceived on a continuum ranging from substance and essence (fixed, biological and essentialist) to social, in process and political (anti-essentialist). In that vein, the field is invited to radically unsettle 'social categories' like class, age, gender, and disability, and to challenge social barriers to identity experimentation. I want to theorize these social categories in more fluid, creative and social ways as it emerges in social theory and practice, in order to re-inscribe new impresarios in our contemporary discourse and shared culture. Critical feminist disability scholars are in search for process ontology at the centre of participative knowledge production and praxis, and I explore a poststructuralist feminist translation of ontological grounds inspired by Haraway (1991), Braidotti (1994, 2002, 2006) and Grosz (1994). They stress the need for process ontology to posit the primacy of (inter)relations over substance and essence, and to reinvent and re-imagine subjectivities. The analysis highlights a nomadic, multi-layered, embodied female subject who works upon her selves amid differences within herself and within the others, within a wider context of ambivalence surrounding her existence, and as the author of her own life.

The problems of disabled people

Vosyliute, Anele

Institute for Social Research, Institute for Social Research Vilnius, Lithuania

Keywords

models of disabled people, situation and emotions of disabled, attitude of society

The purpose of this presentation is to discuss social model of disability in Lithuania; the issue concerns the relationship between the status of the disabled people and the attitude of the contemporary society. The demand to investigate disabled people's movements is related with increasing number of such inhabitants in all social and demographic groups of society.

The author examines disability in light of cultural and historical view and in modern Lithuania. In the research were stressed such indicators as: how much the population has the genuine interest in disability issues and problems, what is the process of ensuring legal rights for people with disabilities. The author is discussed what are their material, social and psychological wellbeing and their development (who are with positive life attitude or depressive, have the feel of realistic view of the world or are as victims, excluded). In the paper, using body's sociology concept, the attitudes to the disabled body is researched; modern training and their adaptation to the environment is stressed.

The paper is important for the social understanding of disability (especially in such dimensions as social status, needs, psicho-emotional situation); it can explain their communication and relations with non-disabled people, facilitate their interactions. The disability investigation can help for the society to know their identity, emancipation factors, and maybe the oppression from the others social groups.

The Significance of FASD - diagnoses in the accounts of professionals in social and health services

Eriksson, Susan

*Center for Research and Development, Finnish Association on Intellectual and Developmental Disabilities
00700 Helsinki, Finland*

Keywords

discourse, professional ethics, FASD - diagnoses, moral

According to some evaluations, FASD (Fetal Alcohol Spectrum Disorder) is regarded as one of the most significant causes to disability in contemporary society. In the Ministry of Social Affairs and Health in Finland, they have started to prepare new legislation for developing caring facilities for those mothers who have alcohol problems during their pregnancy. The public discussion concerning this issue has had many dimensions in moral and ethical sense with the rights of the unborn child on one side and social rights of the mother on the other. In this cultural and political atmosphere it has been important to begin with a project for development which aims at increasing knowledge about the affects of alcohol use on fetuses, developing educational models for experts and professionals and investigating, what kind of support are provided by the social and health care services for the children with FASD. This research project has started in the autumn 2008 along with the research question, what kind of social positions are constructed for those children in those relevant professional fields and are those positions constructed in moral sense. The data has been gathered during this winter among doctors in neuropsychology, children's psychiatry and developmental disabilities, nurses in social pediatry and drug use units, social workers in child protection and teachers in day care units for children with special needs. It has been surprising, that in the interview accounts of those professionals the significance of FASD - diagnoses seem to be controversial. Many seem to think that the diagnoses of FAS or FAE are necessary for the children to gain relevant social, educational and health care services. On the contrary to that, many professionals have the opinion that the diagnoses may be harmful, since they are stigmatizing. Some of them also seem to think, that it is not always necessary to investigate the cause of the disability, since care is provided for them according to the specific symptoms, in any case. These different discourses concerning the significance of FASD - diagnoses are analysed together with discussing the ethical and moral implications within these professional accounts.

The Uses and Misuses of Disability Diagnostics

Vehmas, Simo

*Dept. of Education, University of Jyväskylä
Jyväskylä, Finland*

Keywords

disability, diagnostics, ADHD

In this presentation I will discuss the expediency and justifiability of categorizing human difference through psycho-medical diagnostics. Recognition and respect of individuality has traditionally been the basis of diagnostics. It has been assumed that meeting people's various needs requires proper knowledge about their characteristics, which medicine and psychology purportedly provide. However, numerous sociological analyses have pointed that categorizing human beings and their characteristics on the basis of diagnostics includes the danger of labeling and stigma. This is especially the case with neuropsychiatric diagnoses such as ADHD and Asperger's that have no verifiable organic cause. Rather, these diagnoses are ultimately based on observations about certain people's problematic characteristics and behavior. This inevitably raises several ontological and political issues. For example, what is the truth value of ADHD and other diagnoses of so-called behavioral disorders? In other words, is ADHD in any way a real entity, and if so, in what way? Assuming that ADHD is a meaningful diagnosis, does it have implications regarding one's accountability and moral responsibility? I will argue that simplistic accounts that overemphasize either the physical or social dimension of human difference can be both inaccurate and potentially harmful. Similar sensitivity to the relational nature of human existence should be bore in mind when evaluating the significance of neuropsychiatric diagnoses for one's responsibility and accountability.

When equality meets market forces: anti-discrimination legislation, fairness, justice and "good" business practice

Ferrie, Joanna

*Sociology, Anthropology and Applied Social Science, University of Glasgow
Glasgow, Scotland*

Watson, Nick

*Sociology, Anthropology and Applied Social Sciences, University of Glasgow
Glasgow, Scotland*

Keywords

Justice, Equality policy, Business-speak, Economic viability, market forces

In the UK, ensuring equality of opportunity and human rights are now high on the social, political and intellectual agenda. In the last 5 years the British Government has introduced changes that it has described as "the most significant review of equality in over quarter of a century". At the same time, the Government are also placing public sector organisations under increasing pressure to use business-speak and apply market models to their strategies. The aim is to reduce wastage by increasing performance measurements.

This concept has spread to the implementation of equality policies. In 2008, the Equality and Human Rights Commission announced that they would be encouraging public bodies with a duty to respond to disability, race equality and gender equality policies to employ cost-benefit analyses to persuade compliance from individuals or departments who had been reluctant to engage. Therefore the drive to comply with this legislation would no longer come from a commitment to fairness or an investment in justice. Rather the drive would come from increasing profit margins, productivity and performance.

Drawing on data from two recently completed projects, one examining the impact of recent policy changes in Equality and Human Rights legislation and the other evaluating the impact of the Disability Equality Duty, this paper will examine tensions in these two developments. Interviews with organisations from the private sector revealed that businesses were not convinced with the need for more legislation to tackle equality and human rights in the workplace. Rather their focus was on improving the economic viability of their business; equality action had the potential to damage this. For public sector bodies however, those who were most successful were those who used business analogies and could demonstrate improved departmental performance as a result of listening more closely to the needs of their customers (achieved through a careful and creative implementation of the DED).

This paper asks to what extent business analogies are useful to engage non-traditional supporters of equality legislation? It also asks to what extent hiding notions of fairness and justice, damage the progress towards greater equality promised by anti-discrimination legislation?

RS02

Dynamics and Complexity of Minority Statuses in Plural Societies

"Ethnic" Media and Ethno-cultural Media Landscape in the Post-Soviet Russia

Peshkova, Vera

*Centre for Analyses of Social-Political Processes, Institute of Sociology, Russian Academy of Sciences, Institute of Sociology Russian Academy of Sciences
Moscow, Russia*

Keywords

ethnic media, ethno-cultural diversity, post-soviet Russia

In post-soviet Russia national, regional, ethnic, cultural and other expression of diversity has grown last two decades. The Mass media play the essential role in defining of the public discourse about ethno-cultural diversity in contemporary Russia. There are some speeches and cognitive strategies, which greatly influence on people perception of the information about ethno-cultural diversity represented in the Russian mass media: headlines of publications, speech and cognitive strategies, local meanings and so on.

I argue that ethno-cultural diversity is produced, reproduced and perceived in the Russian society both the mainstream media and "ethnic" media. However activity and the role of "ethnic" media are differ from the role of media in the classical immigration countries (where the tradition of ethnic media is long enough).

I would like to discuss what role "ethnic" media play in contemporary Russia both in co-operation with the mainstream media in representing of ethno-cultural diversity of Russian society and the role of "ethnic" media in life of ethnic communities. My presentation will be based mainly on case-study of "ethnic" media in Moscow, first of all on analysis of expert opinions (leaders and representatives of ethnic organizations of Moscow; producers of "ethnic" media) and analysis of Moscow mainstream media about ethno-cultural diversity.

In the focus of the presentation: describing of the most active "ethnic" media; how media outlets reflect different needs of ethnic minorities; the dynamic between "ethnic" media and their audiences; the role of ethnic media in every-day life of ethnic communities; the role of ethnic media in (re)production of minority identities; the influence of "ethnic media" on integration of minorities and how it promotes cultural pluralism in Russian society.

Between ethnonational and civic national: The Hungarian Minority Identities from Romania, Slovakia, Serbia and Ukraine

Veres, Valér

*Sociology Dept., Babes-Bolyai University
Cluj-Napoca, Romania*

Keywords

national identity, ethnic minority, comparative, Hungarian, interethnic relation

In this paper will comparatively analyze the way in which ethnonational belonging and the social identification to the majority National community functions among different ethnic Hungarian minority communities in Central and Eastern Europe. Secondly, we also aim to understand how citizenship and the relationship towards the state of residence is framed and reflected in the ethnonational identity of Hungarian minorities, including majority / minority relations. Researching this topic is actual givent that the social changes, emerged by the European integration significantly modified the Hungarian society and of the Hungarian minority communities from Romania, and Slovakia, respectively from Serbia and Ukraine.

According to the research hypotheses the identity and the changes in the identity of Hungarian communities living outside the borders of Hungary are determined by the following social processes:

According to the research results, taking into consideration the content of spontaneous national identity and group limits, Hungarians from outside the borders of Hungary do not entirely behave as a unitary group. We can observe differences according to the EU national or not. Still, there is a majority of them indentify with the Hungarian ethnocultural nation in transborder sense, but a significant part of our respondents feel that they are also connected to the Romanian, Slovak, Serbian, Ukrainian civic nation. However, these larger social groups are less important in the natural national identity of Hungarians from outside the borders of Hungary. This may be empirically grasped both at the level of the Hungarian community from the region as primary in-group and the perception of social distances.

According to identity profiles, in every country there is an absolute or relative majority with a different weight who defines its national belonging in terms of a Hungarian regional community in Romania or Slovakia, and in a certain sense it accepts that it belongs to the Romanian civic nation as a secondary tie and it considers that its country and/or region is its fatherland and homeland.

Community status of labour immigrants. The process of cultural adaptation and intercultural communication of labour immigrants

Melnikova, Anna

*Social Anthropology, Russian Social State University
Moscow, Russian Federation*

Keywords

Expatriates, Intercultural Communication, Minority Status, adaptation, Labour Immigrants

Lately the number of labour immigrants coming to Russia from European countries has grown several times. It is mainly caused by the boost of economy and development of European companies on the Russian market. Large corporations and branch offices in Russia invite their colleagues from European offices in order to maintain business processes and develop the capabilities of successive leaders.

Moving to Russia is a serious step for labour immigrants, as it entails not only change of environment, but also readiness to be immersed into Russian business and culture for several years. In spite of the difficulty related to perception of local mentality and acceptance of life realities in Russia, immigrants say "yes" to offers received from Russian branch offices. They take the decision and move to Russia along with their families automatically getting the status of expatriates.

Due to various reasons most of expatriates prefer to keep their cultural identity and not join Russian community. The choice of communication network and social sphere depends on nationality and social status of the person.

Labour immigrants can get help in adapting to Russian reality in different business clubs and associations that organize informal evening events, where the expatriates can communicate with each other and Russian people and discuss business and personal matters. Informal organizations are also very active.

The background for this research was two-year active work with expatriates and dwelling in their inner community. The undertaken activities included administrating the British Business Club - a non-profit charity organization that conducts monthly informal events which unite expatriates from Europe and give them an opportunity to discuss work and personal issues. Other activities' participation in HR conferences and trainings held by international associations and chambers of commerce, cooperation with embassies in order to organize events for expatriates and representatives of Russian business.

The current research expands on pitfalls that can be found on the way of labour immigrants who move to Russia. It describes the community of expatriates and the process of adaptation to Russian culture. The research reveals basic methods of intercultural communication that are a pressing issue for expatriates.

From 'Race Relations' to 'Super-Diversity': Where does an Individual Immigrant Fit in the British Discourses over Migration and Integration?

Unutulmaz, K. Onur

Institute of Social and Cultural Anthropology, University of Oxford Oxford, United Kingdom

Keywords

immigrants, identity, UK, Integration Discourses

Most mainstream sociological and political science studies and politicians alike talk about "Turkish immigrants" or the "Muslim community" in relation to their processes of immigration and integration all over Europe. The current context in Europe, however, is one of "Super-diversity" where diversity is marked with an unprecedented level and kind of complexity created by a dynamic interplay of variables including the country of origin, ethnicity, language, religion, local identities carried over from the sending context, migration channels, legal status, and personal strategies. In such "super-diversity", then, both the way of framing the public debates and political and legal frameworks in relation to migration and integration should be reconsidered.

Through a critical review of the academic and political discourses over immigration and integration in the UK, this paper addresses the question of where an individual immigrant fits in the debates over immigrants, particularly in relation to the issue of integration. The paper discusses the implications of the "race relations", "multiculturalism", and "cohesion and integration" frameworks in the UK as public debates, policy-relevant research and political discourses revolve around these frameworks. The critical review aims at showing how these discourses undermine (i) the complexity, multiplicity and fluidity of immigrant identities; and, (ii) the importance of the various migration processes as experienced and perceived by the individual immigrant.

The paper is based on an extensive review of the integration literature and various policy reports published between 1996 and 2008 in the UK. The critical account produced in this research constitutes the fundamental starting point of an ethnographic field-study on the integration experiences of the "Turkish immigrants" in London which has received funding and will be conducted starting from October 2009. Based on the findings of this paper, London field-study aims at illustrating the undermined heterogeneity of the community of "Turkish immigrants" in terms of the complex ways in which they experience, perceive and assess the immigration reality in the UK, and how these interact with, transform and/or consolidate their identities in various ways.

Identities Gypsies in Portugal, plural identities?

Magano, Olga

*Departamento de Ciências Sociais e de Gestão, Universidade Aberta
Porto, Portugal*

Keywords

Gypsies, plural identities, social integration

Gypsy people are usually referred to as a socially and culturally homogeneous group, with the allocation of certain negative social characteristics. However, the social reality is dynamic and diverse, with multiple social experiences of Gypsy people reflected in various gypsies groups, with different expressions and identity affiliations.

Individuals have different social experiences and may even live a plurality of socializations and opening up themselves to multiple and significant ways in their environment. For this analysis we combined the theory of habitus (Bourdieu, 1979), regarding the issue of the habitus transposability, with the interaction scenery (Goffman, 1974) that allow the learning of new skills without losing cultural references and previous identifications. The possibility of new learning and internalization of new skills, relational or conduct ones, lead to diverse social logics. Thus, the plurality of habitus derives directly from the plurality of experiences of socialization and these ones largely derive from the plurality of significant contexts of interaction.

Accordingly, the individual can move between different worlds and social contexts, activating different forms of action vested in the diversity of contemporary contexts of socialization (Lahire, 2005) that returns the player contextual frameworks in social interactions and records. There is then a selective activation of certain forms of action, between the various learned in different social contexts and interactions in the course of several significant social experiences of individuals.

In this paper we discuss the gypsy identity as a complex social phenomenon, impregnated by the influence of social contexts in which individuals move and the importance of diversity in social relations. The data presented were collected through a qualitative research conducted in various geographic regions of Portugal, with the application of in-depth interviews with individuals of gypsy origin who self-describe themselves as gypsies.

Identity of Polish nonbelievers as a patchwork and as a process

Tyrala, Radoslaw

*Department of Sociology and Social Anthropology, AGH University of Science and Technology
Krakow, Poland*

Keywords

identity, Polish nonbelievers, plural societies

The main subject of my paper is identity of nonbelievers, one of the Polish minority groups (in Louis Wirth's sense). I want to put the stress on two matters - types of identities and its dynamics. My conclusions are based on my own research, which I currently conduct on community of nonbelievers in Poland (web survey and in-depth interviews).

Unbelief is usually associated with lack of affiliation to any religious institutions and lack of any religious beliefs. It is an ideal, "pure" type of consistent unbelief. Meanwhile in Polish conditions I observed two mutations of such unbelief. Firstly there are nonbelievers who, in consequence of dominant Catholic culture pressure, accept some of their elements (usually religious practices, sometimes beliefs). Their identity soaking in Catholic lifestyle, way of thinking, system of norms and values, become a kind of synthesis of unbelief and Catholicism. Secondly circa one fifth of my survey respondents declare sympathies to some forms of non-catholic religious beliefs (for example faith to other than personal form of God). It is interesting combination unbelief and spirituality drawing inspiration from many different sources (like Buddhism, Neopaganism or New Age). It is a good example of fact that non-religiousness, similarly to religiousness, subject to processes of pluralization and privatization in postmodern societies. Both of above mentioned kinds of nonbelievers identities, far from "pure" type, I called patchwork-identities.

I am also interesting in the matter of dynamics shaping of unbelief as a one of individual identity's dimensions. I treat identity in the processual way - as something changeable and liquid. It may be more or less important for particular nonbelievers and place different positions in their individual hierarchies of identities. Furthermore it may be stimulate, periodically get stronger or weaker due to many different factors. Moreover, in my opinion, that feature of nonbelievers' identity could be generalized to identities of other kinds of minority groups (religious, ethnic or sexual).

Immigrant associations: between participation and institutionalization

Carballo, Marta

*Instituto Universitario de Desarrollo y Cooperación - Dep. Migraciones, Género y Desarrollo, Universidad Complutense de Madrid
Madrid, Spain*

Garcia Burgos, Jorge

*Instituto Universitario de Desarrollo y Cooperación - Dep. Migraciones, Género y Desarrollo, Universidad Complutense de Madrid
Madrid, Spain*

Keywords

Integration, Migration, partnership, Institutional, transnational social networks

Recently, with the consolidation of Spain as migration destination, it came up new dimensions and possibilities of actors able to address issues related to the integration of immigrants in societies of destination. There are approaches in which social networks of migrants are presented as a new subject of study that transcends particularities and structural explanations on causes, perpetuation and settlement migration.

One of the obvious forms of crystallization of transnational social networks is the formation of immigrant associations that shares geographic area, country or location; they join together on various issues, responding to issues as legal and political or to social, cultural or identity. Thus, membership of associations depends, not only on the direct benefits they can bring to their members, but that also on a sense of belonging based on identity criteria. For this reason, it is not surprising that some of these associations focus on spaces of interchange and cultural developments, more than attention to integration offered by other civil society organizations.

As happens with many other self-participatory processes, authorities have realized on potential of partnerships as ways of integrating immigrants, trying to act as catalysts. With government regulations and participation of immigrant associations in spaces created and regulated by various political actors, institutionalization circle of migrant participation in collective practices is closed. While this can be an institutional incentive or impetus to associative processes, it is possible that associations get accommodated and partly reduce or lose its capacity. This situation could be seen as a no legitimization or lack of recognition from immigrants groups of who claim to be represented.

Immigrants and social networks: cultural approach

Zrinscak, Sinisa

*Department for Social Work, University of Zagreb - Faculty of Law
Zagreb, Croatia*

Keywords

welfare, Social Networks, immigrants

This paper is based on the comparative research project titled 'Welfare and Values in Europe: transitions related to religion, minorities, and gender', undertaken in twelve European countries. The project identifies three interconnected dimensions of social change in Europe, change related to religion, minorities, and gender, and examines these dimensions through the prism of welfare. On the base of the empirical qualitative research the paper will particularly focus on family, ethnic and religious minority organizations which appear to be main channels for realizing different social rights and in general for social orientation of immigrants. However, the focus on immigrant social networks, and particularly on the importance of separate religion and language, point to other important elements in studying of the position of immigrants in societies: immigration policy, position of non-governmental organizations inside the welfare state structure, general role of religion in society, role of social professionals, etc. The ambiguous role of such network is also important, they help individuals and communities but at the same time underline differences between minorities and majorities. The paper will also compare the situation of immigrant organizations and of access of immigrants to welfare rights in different states, and will argue about inadequacy of the welfare state approach in studying the position of immigrants in different societies.

Influences on a sense of 'Britishness' among different ethnic and religious groups in England

Karlsen, Saffron

*Epidemiology and Public Health, UCL
London, UK*

Nazroo, James

*Sociology, University of Manchester
Manchester, UK*

Keywords

identity, racism, Britishness, ethnicity, religion

Debates regarding the attitudes of different ethnic/religious communities towards their lives in Europe never seem far from public or media agendas. Concern is voiced that some communities wish to live their lives separately from the rest of society, and that this will have negative consequences for social cohesion and ethnic relations and lead to the alienation and radicalisation of minority (particularly Muslim) groups. Despite a lack of empirical evidence to corroborate such concerns, they have coincided with an increase in displays of prejudice against certain faith populations and there are reports that this prejudice is considered more socially acceptable than other forms of victimisation.

This paper will present findings from a follow-up survey to the Health Survey for England 1999 which suggest that the majority of individuals from ethnic and religious minority communities in England think of themselves as being "British". But that this "Britishness" exists alongside other forms of national/ethnic identity, and a desire to maintain non-British traditions. The form that this "Britishness" takes is adapted in light of other aspects of an individual's identity, as well as experiences of and attitudes towards life in Britain. Strength of an identity related to being a member of an ethnic minority group was found to be associated with particular ethnic and religious affiliations and certain migration characteristics. Exposure to victimisation appeared critical to whether or not respondents both felt able to access a sense of "Britishness" and recognised a need to preserve "traditional" ways of life considered under threat.

Minorities within and minorities outside

Kurczewska, Joanna

*Institute of Philosophy and Sociology, Polish Academy of Sciences
Warsaw, Poland*

Kurczewski, Jacek

Institute of Applied Social Sciences, University of Warsaw Warsaw, Poland

Keywords

local communities, national minorities, borderlands, local politics

Minorities within and minorities outside paper presents the identity structures and minority politics of three groups - German minority in Poland and Polish minorities in Czech Republic and in Latvia. Their common characteristics is that these are indigeneous minorities with mythical eternity of residence. Despite the historical differences their existence is due to the political changes in the Central-Eastern Europe since centuries. In three locations each of these minorities was studied with help of the interviewing of about 200 people . In case of German minority they form part of the random sample taken in the locality, in case of Polish minorities they are picked up randomly from the membership of local Polish organizations. The identity questions were asked allowing for multiple identity choice, including also European identification as well as the local and regional one. The political attitudes of the organizations of minority as well as the views of the ordinary people were studied as well as the history of minority activities in the locality and region. It seems that after the sudden liberalization of the ethnic and national identities after 1989 the stabilization of the views occurred. The concept of Czech or Latvian Polishness and of the Polish and Silesian Germanness is getting strength. This is related to the freedom of movement within the European Union as well. The local minorities seem to become voluntarily strengthening their ties with their "local" political units also because of the developing regional identity. The politics of citizenship, however, like the German constitutional clause or the "Charter of Poles" may still strengthen the isolationist tendencies but only amongst the ever smaller strong core of the one nationality holders in contrast to the growing share of the multiple-identity holders,

Minorities' situation in a majority Catholic society: a case study of a Polish rural area

Pasieka, Agnieszka

II, Max Planck Institute for Social Anthropology Halle/Saale, Germany

Keywords

religious minority, Roman Catholic Church, dominance, majority-minority relations

The idea of this paper arose thanks to my current research project, held in the Southern Poland, in a rural area that is both ethnically and religiously heterogeneous. The commune I am focusing on is inhabited by Poles and Lemkos, representing seven different religious denominations, what in Poland - in majority Catholic society - makes quite a particular case. Although the relations between members of different communities seem to be "correct" at the surface, a deeper investigation shows that the reality is quite more complex and rather far from harmonious.

Drawing a picture of this commune, I would like to emphasize three issues. Firstly, I would like to remark a process which consists in both a tendency of the Roman Catholic Church to dominate over other (minority) religions and a "tacit" acceptance of this situation by members of other denominations. This process leads to treating the Roman Catholic Church as a norm and, subsequently, to negotiation of minorities' identity in the relation to this norm. Secondly, I would like to present the dynamics of minorities' status in different contexts, i.e. to show its constant redefinition while moving from private to public sphere. And finally, I would like to ask how the status of a religious minority relates to other dimensions of people's status - such as ethnic, gender, or economic one.

Concluding, I would like to reflect on whether such a case study can reveal some universal patterns of majority - minority relations.

Multiplication, differentiation, hierarchical integration of identities

Ikonnikova, Nataliya

*General Sociology, State University - High School of Economics
Moscow, Russia*

Keywords

integrity, religious minority, identity, Hierarchy

Identity is considered as the process of symbolic construction of structural conjunctions between individuals. It means bilateral process: expansion of individuality as "inner reality" of self-identity on the closest circle of those, with whom identity is shared, and at the same time, adoption of shared collective identity. It is not just labeling but its construction is meaning attribution through rationalization, value estimation, affective tinting, and then normative establishing and presentation in things as signs of identity.

Therefore, first, I consider non-primordial identities. Social (structural) identities use "cultural" masks for representation and, at the same time, they are mythologized by latent cultural content.

Second, I accept the idea of individuation as a trend of contemporary societies and communities within their transformation.

The result is visible multiplication of identities. Also differentiation as increasing of number and complexity of structural conjunctions of individuals takes place.

However, the most important process is hierarchical integration of identities. Ambivalent and "plural" identity is indeed integrated by the hierarchy of shared values, knowledge and accepted norms.

The "strong" subjects for this theoretical frame testing are religious minorities. I compare two communities: the Orthodox Old-believers (with special case of Bashkir) and the Vaishnavas (Krishnaites) community in Russia (with focus for Moscow commune. Survey and expert interviews have been used). Religious values and norms structure the social conjunctions of the members of communities in their interrelation within different social institutes: economic, politic, public, education, entertainment, family, spare time. These structuring effects have resulted in the options important and escapable spheres of social activity, modes of interaction, depth of adoption in them.

Therefore, first, the minor community appears to be "open" as number of members of large society, but it is close as identity by shared knowledge, values and norms.

Second, the "communal body" and artificial corporeality are important media for even religious (not only for so called "youth subcultures") identity presentation and, especially, (re)construction.

Third, the strategy of majority toward these identities is their "minorisation" in each separate sphere of interaction with spontaneous or premeditated ignorance the integrity of structural conjunctions by some identity.

Muslim pupils and the negotiation of Portuguese postcolonial identity

Santos, Hélia

*Universidade de Coimbra, Centro de Estudos Sociais
Coimbra, Portugal*

Keywords

Identities, Portuguese postcolonialism, public school, Muslim pupils

The postcolonial Portuguese identity is a concept currently under negotiation and definition, though seldom publicly acknowledged or debated. The process of redefinition of the national identity of a country under deep social, political and cultural transformations during the past thirty years can be found in micro-processes, led particularly by younger generations. Aiming at a better understanding of such processes, I carried out an ethnographic study in a public school in the region of Lisbon, in order to observe how and to what extent Muslim pupils negotiate their belonging to the national identity imaginary, which still projects Portugal as a monocultural (esp. catholic) country.

The diasporic history of the Muslim families I worked with, most of them Portuguese since colonial Mozambique and Guinea-Bissau, re-unites Portugal to a past that it has tried to forget (or to silence). The self-statement of this "minority" as Portuguese, through the voice of the interviewees, clashes with racial, ethnic and religious boundaries imposed by the majority imaginary that marks these Muslim families as "immigrant minorities", hence external to the cultural identity of the country. To support and reinforce their belonging, the Muslim community also argues that Portugal owes important cultural legacies to the presence of Islamic culture in the Iberian Peninsula in medieval times.

I will present the main conclusions of the study I carried out for my MA dissertation, contributing with qualitative data to the reflection about cultural boundaries that continue to mark who belongs and who does not belong to European nations, ignoring a colonial past that inevitably has been transferred to present Europe. Public school is indeed a privileged stage to observe such tense and daily negotiations, and to start decolonising imaginaries.

Slums and plans: Poverty and spatial segregation of Roma in Serbia

Lekovic, Milica

*Architecture and Urban Planning, master level student, Faculty of Technical Sciences, University of Novi Sad, Serbia
Novi Sad, Serbia*

Keywords

forced evictions, Roma, slums, Social inclusion, spatial segregation

Serbia is a country currently presiding Decade of Roma Inclusion 2005-2015.

Last census of 2002 has determined that Roma population in Serbia counts 108,000 , though it is widely accepted to be a significant underestimation of the true size. Unofficially, it has been estimated that the real figure is somewhere in between 400,000 and 800,000. Such an unreliable data is yet another proof that Roma population has been heavily marginalized and excluded in today's Serbian society. It has been noted that the poverty among Roma is between four and five times higher than among the general population. In addition, it has been predicted that in the following 5 years another 150,000 Roma will be forced to return from EU countries to Serbia.

Poor housing conditions are in fact both a cause and a consequence of Roma exclusion in Serbia. Majority of Roma population lives in the so-called "Roma mahalas" - enclaves with number of inhabitants ranging from few hundreds to couple of thousands people, formed on religious and/or ethnic basis. Nearly 80 percent of Roma live below the poverty line, in separate settlements, mostly alongside industrial zones, garbage dumps, and marketplaces. Studies have shown that 43.5 percent of all Roma settlements are categorized as slums , just 47 percent are connected to the city water supply, only 24.2 percent have sanitation, while 10 percent are without electricity.

Following the privatization process of state properties in the neoliberal market of transitional Serbia, forced evictions of Roma families squatting these properties often occurred. Alternative accommodation is almost never provided and when it is, the new location is on the edge of the city, making it hard for Roma to commute to the city centre where they, in most cases, make their living. Most previous attempts of social and spatial inclusion failed due to resilient attitude of non-Roma population living on the location.

Issues concerning Roma inclusion can be solved neither by simple housing refurbishments nor by shortsighted relocations. A well planed state-governed action is needed, implying a set of measures of economic, social, educational an urban policies, all developed in cooperation with Roma.

The Construction of the Modern Political Image through Tradition and its Presentation in the Media: The Modern Alevi Movement and Pir Sultan Abdal

Yalçinkaya, Ayhan

*Political Science and Public Administration, Ankara University Political Science Faculty
Ankara, Turkey*

Poyraz, Bedriye

*Journalism, Ankara University Communication Faculty
Ankara, Turkey*

Keywords

Alevi, Modern Alevi Movement, Pir Sultan Abdal, Media, Presentation

It is well known that Turkey has a pluralistic ethnic and religious structure. However, the dominant ethnic and religious trend does not want to recognize diversity. Even though there is not any kind of discrimination according to the legal system, there is very widespread discrimination in practice.

In this presentation we will analyze how one of the most important figures of Alevi literature and Turkish folk literature, Pir Sultan Abdal, has been turned into a political image and how his discourse has been politicized. We will concentrate on how the political image of Pir Sultan Abdal is presented in the media by the Alevi movement and how the Alevi movement has tried to use Pir Sultan Abdal to gain approval in the public sphere through the media.

It is not easy to analyze the whole history of the modern Alevi movement, especially when we consider that it covers more than twenty years. In this frame we will analyze in particular two important cases that have made the movement more visible and gained attention. These two cases have been defined as promotion packets by the current government in 2007 and 2008. In other words we will study how Pir Sultan Abdal as a well known figure has been manipulated through the media during the these cases.

The Russian Minority in the Finnish Labour Market and Work Communities

Kähäri, Outi

*Departement of Sociology, University of Turku
Turku, Finland*

Keywords

Russian immigrants, work communities, social capital

Immigrants from Russia form the largest ethnic minority group in Finland. The attitudes towards Russians among the native population are relatively negative. There are several concerns about the problems of Russians to integrate into Finnish society and the Finnish labour market.

Previous research has been predominantly focused on the difficulties and barriers that immigrants face while seeking for employment from the point of view of discrimination, racism and the logic of labour markets. There is some evidence that, due to their high education and good skills in Finnish, the Russian speaking immigrants have either assumed or proven possibilities to integrate into the Finnish society. My aim is to investigate why the human capital in the case of the immigrants from Russia does not necessarily benefit these people on the Finnish labour market. What kind of social capital can be distinguished in the Finnish labour market and in the Russian-Finnish work communities in Finland in order to avoid to social conflicts or misunderstandings which are culturally and communicatively related.

I collect qualitative empirical data on social capital in multicultural Finnish work organizations. Work communities in Finland are becoming more pluralistic but they tend to hold some characteristic formal and informal values, norms and traditions when it comes to working culture and social interaction. The preliminary analysis, using semiotic sociology as a method, concentrates on the forms and changes of the human and social capital of the Russian minority workers in Finland. The analysis also aims to find positions, statuses, divisions and inequalities connected to the complex ethnic (and other) minority relations in the work organizations.

Who are we? Where are we headed? The Kashubian ethnicity

Warminska, Katarzyna

Institute of Regional Studies, Jagiellonian University Cracow, Poland

Keywords

identity politics, ethnicity, minority

Who are we? Where are we headed? The Kashubian ethnicity.

When researching Kashubians, one of the minorities inhabiting Poland, I have observed a process of transformation of inner-group discourse pertaining to the group's ethnic status. The discussions and ventures of the group's leaders, as they remain in the center of my research interests, related to numerous issues, like "Who are Kashubians?" and the most crucial issue for ideological thinking, i.e. 'Who should the Kashubians be?' These are fundamental questions to entities engaged in the identity politics, whose basic aim is to mobilize fellow countrymen to act in the name of a shared collective vision - the ethnic 'We'. The key issue in this case is that within the community there is no agreement on the fundamental issue, i.e. the ethnic status of the said 'We'. The sociological research on the collective identity of the community members reveals a complex character of the identification project within which Polishness and Kashubianness are located and which remain toward each other in a different configuration as regards the symbolic content of the project, the importance of a given identification as well as the degree of awareness or habituation of each of the elements. We deal here with a complex identity in the ethno-cultural aspect.

I'll show two dimensions of the Kashubian identity discourse. Firstly, I'll present an analysis of ways in which Kashubianness is conceptualized, i.e. how the leaders respond to the question 'Who are Kashubians?' as a community. Secondly, I'll show consequences of a given vision of collective characteristics for the actions within the identity politics as it is a derivative to a great degree of how they said 'We' is defined, which consequently influences placing the group in relation to the dominating group (e.g. as an ethnic minority, a regional or language group or a separate nation or part of the Polish ethnos). In my analysis I'll consider both the wider historical, cultural and social context of the relations between the dominating group and the Kashubian minority, the character of cultural resources of the group, and the identity rhetoric exercised by its leaders.

RS03

East and West in Europe

"Free movers" instead of immigrants? Polish migrants in the Irish labour market

Krings, Torben

*Department of Sociology, Trinity College Dublin
Dublin, Ireland*

Bobek, Alicja

*Department of Sociology, Trinity College Dublin
Dublin, Ireland*

Moriarty, Elaine

*Department of Sociology, Trinity College Dublin
Dublin, Ireland*

Salamonska, Justyna

Department of Sociology, Trinity College Dublin Ireland,

Wickham, James

Department of Sociology, Trinity College Dublin Ireland,

Keywords

Migration, East-West, Enlargement, Ireland, Poland

Since EU enlargement in 2004, Ireland experienced large-scale immigration from the new EU member states (NMS). Currently, NMS migrants account for almost eight per cent of the Irish labour Force. As such, Ireland has by far the highest share of NMS migrants of all "old" EU15 countries. It is therefore well-placed to study recent East-West migration which arguably constitutes "a new migration system in Europe" (Favell 2008).

In some important aspects, East-West migration resembles earlier "guestworker" and post-colonial immigration in Europe. Then, as now, there was a significant income gap between sending and destination countries and migrants were over-represented in labour-intensive, low-paid jobs. However, contemporary intra-European migration exhibits some novel features that sets it apart from previous population movements. Whereas many immigrants who arrived during the "guestworker" era settled down in the host society, current forms of intra-European migration appear to be more transient. Facilitated by a free movement regime and new and cheap travel opportunities, many NMS migrants are in fact more likely to be "free movers" (Favell 2008) than permanent immigrants.

To illuminate the novel character of recent migration flows from the NMS, this paper utilise data from an ongoing Qualitative Panel Study on the experience of Polish migrants in the Irish labour market. The preliminary findings of the study suggest that the initial decision to move to Ireland was mainly based on economic considerations, although for some the desire to improve their English and the search for a better "quality of life" also featured prominently. Moreover, perhaps contrary to a widespread perception, NMS migrants are not confined to low-skilled jobs but are found in occupations across the skills spectrum. Most importantly, in spite of the fact that some have to endure harsh working conditions and violation of their employment rights, the fact that as EU citizens they enjoy the same rights as Irish nationals in the labour market has opened up new career opportunities often unknown to previous generations of European immigrants.

References

Favell, A. (2008) "The new face of East-West migration in Europe", in Journal of Ethnic and Migration Studies, 34 (5): 701-716.

Basic Human Values on Cultural Level in East and West of Europe

Tart, Indrek

*Centre for Contemporary Cultural Studies, Tallinn University, Estonian Humanitarian Institute
Tallinn, Estonia*

Keywords

multidimensional scaling, European Social Survey, basic human values, Eastern and Western Europe, cultural communities

Europe under its enlargement and integration processes has become overloaded by immigrant populations who carry with them the human value preferences that took shape in rather different living environments than those of their current host country. Thus, in general European countries acquire more and more ethnically flavored layers into their national as well as cultural communities' value structure. Basic human values are important entities to catch motivational space of different cultural areas. If value structures can be treated as stabilizing mechanisms resulting from the process of socialization then we have tools describing how politically-socially-culturally different and changing human environments function. Also it will be possible to test how strong these value constellations are to the adding "otherness" makes them to reconfigure?

But first of all there must be clear understanding which basic value constellations Europe already has. Do European ethno-linguistic value-fields look more unified or diverse? Do Eastern and Western Europeans share only partly basic human values constellations and which values show the watershed? Do cross-cultural comparable surveys (ESS, ISSP, WVS, EVS etc) could deal with such problem?

In the paper we will use the Shalom Schwartz - Portrait Value Questionnaire 21 - item version from the three rounds (2002, 2004 and 2006) of the European Social Survey presenting 39 ethno-linguistic communities of more than 120 thousand respondents. This paper will describe and analyze the value constellations of similarity and dissimilarity at cultural ethno-linguistic-community level in the multidimensional scaling space. Evaluation of the correctness of the highly aggregated circular model of basic human values (by Shalom Schwartz) will be done separately for East and West of Europe. It allows estimation of how homogeneous and isotropic value constellations in different parts of Europe are.

Beyond Ethnic Networks - Sociability Patterns of Romanian Students and Workers in London

Morosanu, Laura

Sociology, University of Bristol

Oxford, UK

Keywords

transnationalism, Social Networks, new Europeans, high- and low-skilled migrants

In migration research, assimilation and transnationalist theories have long developed in isolation. Recently, there have been attempts to bridge the two paradigms and study "transnationalism-cum-assimilation combinations" experienced by national groups (or subgroups) in both sending and receiving states (Morawska 2003). Whilst this may reinforce a binary focus on two national groups and contexts (immigrant and native, home and abroad), a useful approach to avoid this, it is argued here, would be to examine the social ties employed, created, or maintained by migrants, so as to assess the directionality, and impact, of their social networks not only across territory but also beyond one's ethnic group.

Drawing on preliminary findings from a qualitative project comparing young Romanian students and workers in London, the paper will explore their sociability patterns in different, work and non-work, areas of life abroad. If a great share of migration literature looks at ethnic networks or often ends up ethnicising them, this paper aims to examine how ethnicity matters in building and maintaining different types of social relations by young Romanians in London. It will thus distinguish between three areas of social capital that seem to yield different outcomes not just in ethnic but also transethnic and class terms, i.e. professional, companionship, and personal support, which engage in complex ways British, foreign (including East European) and Romanian (including family) connections in Britain or abroad.

Democracy in a Wider Union: Europeanization as Differentiation

Blokker, Paul

*Sociology, University of Trento
Trento, Italy*

Keywords

democratization, Europeanization, differentiation, political cultures, NMS

Most accounts of democratization in Central and Eastern Europe have in one way or the other entailed an attempt to assess the New Member States' rapprochement towards a 'normal', liberal democratic regime. In this regard, the EU has been understood as a 'beacon of democracy', and membership of the EU as a confirmation of the consolidation of the new democracies. This paper argues that while in an institutional-structural sense such a reading of democratization as 'normalization' and, in a related way, Europeanization as the institutional convergence to a West-European type of democracy has some merits, in general it tends to overlook the cultural dimension to both processes, and the emerging variety in democratic cultures between and within the New Member States (NMS). In this, it seems that one of the more significant conflicts that has emerged in the wake of the Eastern enlargement is that concerning the specific understanding of the EU for national democracy. While a widespread consensus on EU membership was prominent in the run up to enlargement, in its wake political-cultural conflicts over the meaning of Europe have emerged more clearly in some of the NMS. The paper analyses democratic discourses with regard to European integration and European democracy in three countries: Hungary, Poland, and Romania, and relates different understandings of the politicization of the EU to different democratic cultures.

EUropean "East" and "Wesr" in terms of Basic Human Values

Magun, Vladimir

*Personality Studies Department, Institute of sociology, Russian Academy of sciences
Moscow, Russia*

Rudnev, Maksim

*Personality Studies Department, Institute of sociology, Russian Academy of Sciences
Moscow, Russia*

Keywords

value differences, basic values, East Europe, cultural heterogeneity

The authors rely on the Schwartz values module data from the third round of the European Social Survey held in 2006-2007. Starting from the analysis of the aggregate data (just comparing the country means) we have found that the main difference in basic values is between most of the former socialist countries emphasizing Conservation and Self-Enhancement values and inhabitants of the other European countries emphasizing the opposite values of Openness to change and Self-Transcendence.

It is evident that there are people with different values in each country, so our next step was putting aside the respondents' national identity and pooling the respondents from different countries all together. Employing cluster analysis we divided all respondents into 4 all-European clusters (types) relying on their value indices only. It became clear from this analysis that each European country population has a share of people from each of the 4 all-European clusters. And the between-country differences in values evolves because of the different representation of the members of the 4 value types mentioned in different countries. It looks like the within-country distributions of the respondents between 4 value types in the former socialist countries is less equable (with visible majorities and minorities) than in the European countries who has no socialist inheritance.

Identities and identity politics along the eastern fringe of the European Union

Assmuth, Laura

*Dept. of Sociology, University of Helsinki
Helsinki, Finland*

Keywords

politicization of identities, EU's eastern border regions, Baltic states, Identities, russia

Borderlands are areas where local, religious, ethnic and national identities meet. This makes them ideal for studying the mundane forms of nation building. Our research explored how the neighbouring states' efforts at nation building with and at their borders concretely affect the everyday lives of women and men, young and old, who live in a peripheral area of the former Soviet Union where Estonia, Latvia and Russia meet. The research examined local residents' efforts to adapt to, support or oppose the workings of the respective states and their representatives in a situation where the recently enacted state borders are an important part of everyday life. The issues of border crossing, citizenship, and ethnic/national/local/religious identity were vividly present in local people's acts and conversations, and therefore we have used them in our analyses as clues to studying the local actors' relationship with their state, its neighbours, and Europe. The findings are based on intermittent long-term ethnographic fieldwork in the area in 2000-2006.

Ethnic and other identities can easily become sensitive, politicized and even explosive issues in a borderland context. Our research provides a methodological example of this: the paper deals with different kinds of outside involvement and interference in the research process and the challenges this poses to face-to-face research encounters around the eastern fringe of the European Union.

Identity Dimensions: Russia in comparison with China

Danilova, Elena

*Institute of sociology, Institute of sociology RAS
Moscow, Russia*

Keywords

social identities, russia, China

The construction of social identities in Russia and China is an important issue for understanding social integration and social divisions as consequences of economic and political reforms which are different by speed and ways of realization in both countries. The paper explores identity dimensions in contemporary Russia and draws comparisons with those in China. Paper presents findings of the comparative study conducted in Russia and China in 2008, on the basis of the data collected in the surveys of adult population in two large cities: St. Petersburg and Shanghai. The study aims at assessing similarities and specific features of social identities and applies the adopted concept of multidimensional social identity indicated various social settings. Both in Russia and China increasing differentiation of possessions and the demarcation in respect to ways of thinking and vital convictions joins to a sense of closeness to one's generation. The idea of national identity in contemporary Russia is contradictory in terms as it contains ethnic, civic and regional components with a dominance of the regional and ethnic. In Shanghai there is prevalence of regional identity and with the statehood. Paper examines a whole set of identities - ethnic, regional, local, with the statehood and European or Asian as well as attitudes towards other nations.

On the representation of "others" at Europe's borders: the case of Iraqi Kurds

Demir, Ipek

*Sociology, University of Leicester
Leicester, United Kingdom*

Keywords

orientalism, Turkey, representation, stigmatization, Kurds

In my paper, I will examine the representation of Iraqi Kurds in the Turkish media. Based on an examination of 350 news articles from Hürriyet, one of the most widely read and influential newspapers in Turkey, the paper will argue that Iraqi Kurds are consistently presented using Orientalist tropes, images, themes and messages. The paper aims to draw attention to the media representation and stigmatization of subjugated groups on the borders of Europe, focusing on how Europe's "others" also construct Orientalist notions of superiority and inferiority when engaging with their "East".

Poles-the biggest national minority in Ireland after the enlargement in 2004. Why some people perceive it as a danger when others as a chance?

Muszel, Magdalena

*Social and Political Sciences, European University Institute
San Domenico di Fiesole, Italy*

Keywords

Poland, Ireland, migration movement, Polish community

Immigration is often characterized as "good" or "bad" despite the obvious fact that it brings both benefits and costs. However, these effects are often interrelated and potentially conflicting.

The enlargement of the EU in 2004 caused a huge migration movement from the "new" EU countries to the "old" EU countries in a very short time span. In terms of the amount of immigrants, Poland was the biggest "sender" among ten new member states that joined the EU at that time.

One of the destination countries has been Ireland.

The data of the Department of Social and Family Affairs in Ireland states that from the beginning of May 2004 till April 2008, 278,842 Poles applied for the Personal Public Service Number in this country. This constitutes about 7 percent of the whole Irish population, which makes Polish immigrants the biggest and the most visible migration group in Ireland. The Polish community in Ireland created after 2004 is undoubtedly larger and more vibrant than any other migration community

In this paper I will analyze the attitudes towards the recent Polish migration to Ireland from three different perspectives: Irish, Polish immigrants in Ireland and the reactions and opinions of Poles in Poland.

Additionally I would like to compare the official positions of the Polish and Irish governments on the case to the public opinion of the Irish society, the Polish immigrants in Ireland and Poles in the homeland.

Questions which will help me to develop this part of the paper are:

Are the Polish and Irish public opinions and political views on the case of the recent Polish migration to Ireland different from each other and why? How do they influence each other and how?

The paper will be based on interviews with Poles in Poland, Poles in Ireland, Irish in Ireland and the official stands on the case of the Polish and Irish governments. The fact that I am Polish will make the research easier and Possibly the fact that I am Polish will be very helpful in the creation of trust and frankness among interviewees and will help in my research.

Political convergence of Polish peasants with European alter-mondialist movements: a matter of time?

Darrot, Catherine

Rural Development Laboratory, UMR SMART-INRA, Agrocampus Ouest Rennes Cedex, France

Keywords

Poland, Agriculture, political party, syndicates, European movements

The Polish family-like farming systems have not been driven to disappear by the new liberal context settled in Poland since 1988, as initially announced by economical analysis. On the contrary, small and medium sized farms showed an unexpected ability to resist within this new context, thanks to a complex strategy of autonomy, based on a combination of both farm activity (based themselves on autonomy), and on external job. Both ecological and social positive impacts of those farming systems have been measured here thanks to specific indicators, built in order to measure their sustainability. Within this frame, the performances of those farms are globally excellent.

These performances would let assume that some national-wide political or social movement would have recently emerged in Poland, aiming to bring this category of farms closer to western movements identified as alter-mondialists, as it is the case for peasant-like movements in other European countries. An overview of the position of the main Polish syndicates and political movements will show that until now it is not the case: the good performances of this wide group of farms (representing 60 % of the national agriculture) are not accompanied by a national-wide social movement revendicating their positive value (as sustainable) and their importance for the country on the European scene. The political referential of market and modernisation still dominate the national scene.

This situation can be interpreted as the fact that until now the western contestation of this European dominant political frame has not been imported in Poland while importing this model it-self: is this temporary? The political future of those farming systems remains uncertain at the moment, and will depend on the emergence or not of a national positive political representation.

Post-communist contentious politics and the social movements in Central Eastern Europe

Piotrowski, Grzegorz

*Social and Political Sciences, European University Institute
San Domenico di Fiesole, Italy*

Keywords

social movements, Central Europe, Post socialism

For many years researchers were using the label of post-communism (or post-socialism) to explain the phenomena taking place in Eastern Europe and the post-Soviet bloc. Is this tool still useful 20 years after the transformation? Most of the countries in Eastern Europe are now members of the EU and NATO and living standards are heading to match with the Western countries. But still the level of civil engagement, measured in the number of people at demonstrations, voting turnouts or in the number of people belonging to any organization is lower than in Western Europe.

By calling these struggles 'post-communist', one assumes that the ground for their characteristic features must be rooted in the previous regime. But creating a 'history (and culture) of contentious politics' is a difficult issue, mainly because of the lack of generational continuity in Central and Eastern Europe. People that were the elites during the communism switched usually to business and the former dissidents became the new elites, creating a social gap. To fill it, a whole generational turn had to take place and the new activists framed their actions in a different way, linking themselves to the newly emerged alterglobalist movement.

I would like to argue, that the nature of post-communist protests is also formed by the post-transformation period. The outcomes of the new-introduced capitalism (such as unemployment rate, stratification of the society etc.) were an important mobilization factor as well as redefined the political representation of many social groups.

To what extent their actions are a direct 'translation' of the Western models and how they are biased by the post-communist legacy is my focus of interest. Basing on the ethnographic data collected during fieldwork among activists in Central and Eastern Europe I would like to ask a question of how useful the label post-communism is.

Social and political divisions in Eastern Europe: the case of Poland

Schmidt, Filip

Social Sciences Department (Wydział Nauk Społecznych), Institute of Sociology (Instytut Socjologii) Poznań, Poland

Keywords

social inequality, Eastern Europe, cultural divisions, political divisions, material vs. postmaterial values

Among many political and cultural cleavages between Eastern and Western Europe there are both differences in attitudes towards the protective role of the state (economic equality vs. economic freedom) and in attitudes towards some questions concerning morality and material vs. postmaterial values (cultural order vs. cultural freedom). My aim is to create a "map" of the main lines of social and political division in Poland which are based on divergent interests and values and to compare them with some similar maps of Western societies.

Eurequal - a study conducted by Oxford University in cooperation with several universities and research institutes countries in Eastern Europe in 2007 - gives an excellent opportunity to create such a map and to address the question which differences between Polish society and chosen Western societies are tenacious and stable and which have declined. Secondly, as the study was conducted as a replication of a survey from 1993, it gives a possibility to address the question of social change in Poland in the last two decades. Finally, it allows to test the degree of homogeneity of some Eastern European countries in regard to the two basic dimensions mentioned at the beginning.

The declining middle classes - A critical analysis of a new debate about inequality and its relevance for West and Eastern Europe

Dallinger, Ursula

Sociology, University Trier

Trier, Germany

Keywords

changing social structures, polarisation, social inequality, country comparison, empirical secondary analysis

The paper examines the debate about disappearance of the societal middle classes and asks, whether it can describe reality in both western and eastern European countries. The hypothesis of the decline or threat of the societal middle first was used to describe the growing income inequalities in the liberal countries. Now it also has gained attention to analyse the changing inequalities in other highly developed post industrial countries like Germany, that up to now are seen as countries with relatively equal wage structures, household incomes and life chances. It is contested, whether there is actually a decline in the income and job position of the middle or whether the debate is more a felt decline rooted in subjective insecurities and fears. The question in how far the position of the middle classes actually became worse or whether it is just a subjective phenomenon, will be analysed first. A second step is dedicated to the debate, that we observe two diverging developments regarding the social position of the middle classes in the Middle and East-European countries on the one hand and the West-European countries on the other hand. Our hypothesis is: Whereas in the Eastern European countries the middle classes are newly forming, in the western European countries a social decline is visible. Based on indicators for both the objective and the subjective social position of the middle classes the hypothesis is tested. The paper is based on secondary data analysis of existing data sets like the LIS, ECHP, ESS, ISSP and other available.

The moving border between East and West in Europe: indicators, imageries, identities

Lauristin, Marju

*Institute of Journalism and Communication, University of Tartu
Tartu, Estonia*

Vihalemm, Peeter

*Institute of Journalism and Communication, University of Tartu
Tartu, Estonia*

Keywords

post-communism, economic crisis, East-West division, border construction, EU enlargement

The paper looks at the construction of the place of new EU member states among the countries of Europe, depending on the indicators and imageries in the different spheres: economic development, human development, democratic consolidation, media representations. The analysis focus on the changes of the symbolic border between East and West during the three periods. The first period started with political mass movements in the late 1980s, when the border between the East and the West was clearly defined and symbolically marked by the Berlin Wall. For the differentiation were on the first place used the political concepts created during the cold war. The changes of the political East-West border were considered as simply removing it in the process of the re-unification of Europe, imagined as an unidirectional and unilateral process of westernization of the previous East. The post-communist countries were grouped by international experts according to their speed of moving from the East to the West. This moving could be described and compared, using the set of standardized objective indicators. This period ended and the second period started with the accession of the one part of the previous eastern bloc to EU. During the second period revealed itself the ambiguity of the new united Europe. On the one side, the new EU members became the western neighbours of their previous fellow countries with whom they have shared the fate of the communist dictatorships. From the other side, the western identity of the new EU members was challenged by the imageries and attitudes still dominating in the old Europe. At the same time, the new distinctions and groupings appeared among the new members themselves, distinguished now more often according to their northern, central and southern European identity, than to the East and West affiliation. Especially after the second wave of the eastern enlargement of the EU the border between the West and East became blurred. The new situation emerged in 2008. Under the impact of the widening and deepening economic crisis, the tendencies for the protectionism and isolationism threaten to re-fix the old divisions between the East and the West.

Trends in value orientations in Eastern and Western Europe: a comparative analysis

Comsa, Mircea

*Sociology, Babes Bolyai University of Cluj Napoca
Cluj Napoca, Romania*

Rusu, Horatiu

*Sociology, Lucian Blaga University of Sibiu
Sibiu, Romania*

Keywords

values, Social change, crossnational and longitudinal analyses

Today, many comparative studies, at European level, are available (i.e. EVS, ISSP, ESS). Many of them search for value similarities / dissimilarities and value change especially in the Western European countries (Arts, Hagenaars & Halman, 2003; Arts & Halman, 2004; Ester, Braun & Vinken, 2006; etc). Although starting with the beginning of 90's EVS extended to East, there are not as many comparative studies dedicated to the Eastern European countries too.

In our paper, we employ both a longitudinal and cross national analysis, dedicated to value change in 10 countries from the European Union. 'What are the trends in value orientations and how do they vary between countries?', 'Is there a dynamic towards cross-national value convergence between the Eastern and Western European countries?' are the main research questions in our study.

We move beyond a particularist view of values, that is focused on a specific value domain (i.e. religious values, family values, work values, political values, etc.), and employ a dimensional perspective, focusing on a value system. We will use EVS / WVS 1990-2006 A special attention is given to Romania, where 2008 data will also be included in the analyses. The main method employed is multi-group confirmatory factor analysis (MGCFA); we are testing for measurement invariance (configural, metric and scalar) and then compare the means of the latent variables (values).

Troubles with transformation of Polish political and cultural space. Antiliberalism in contemporary Poland.

Jakubowski, Marek

*Department of Humanities, Nicolaus Copernicus University
Torun, Poland*

Keywords

Poland, DEMOCRACY, transformation, liberalism, antiliberalism

In the works devoted to political life in the countries of former soviet bloc we may often find the thesis about the liberal shock, which passed these countries in the 90's. But the authors often do not perceive that this explosion of liberalism that took place on two different levels, what makes the perception of this phenomenon difficult. The first level is formed by language and praxis of political life, the second is the theoretical or politically-philosophical debate. In the first case we have a problem of openness of society and politicians to liberal values and ideas and of degree of support for building liberal state institutions. The second case concerns the participation in the intellectual discourse of liberalism. The second level is in the fundamental way determined by the fact that the big political doctrines of the last two centuries arised in the West, and not in the Eastern Europe. Theoretical debate on liberalism, which we have to deal with is therefore derivative to the western one. The matter is different in the political life culture. The notion of liberalism itself is applied arbitrary in the language of politics, very often as an epithet to discredit the politicians as well policies. At the same time no serious politicians, or parties question the fact that the precondition for including Poland in the circle of developed and stable democracies is to develop and defend the free market, to guarantee respect for human rights, and therefore creation of stable institutions of liberal state. The problems with liberalism in Poland are very well illustrated by the dilemmas, which conservative critique is facing. If the conservative critique on the level of philosophical discourse means unquestionably continuation of the same reflection on society, culture and politics, which oppose to the melioristic conceptions of liberals, then troubling is the question how to be a conservative politician in the country for which the only one way of escaping from catastrophic consequences of radical melioristic communist doctrin is moderate meliorism of liberals.

Uses of "Europe" - Conflicting Interpretations

Mueller, Klaus

*Dept. of Political Science & Contemporary History, AGH University of Science & Technology
Kraków, Poland*

Keywords

"New Cold War", (Post-)Nationalism, Postcommunist Transformations

The Eastern Enlargement of the EU put questions about Europe's borders, values and identities back on the agenda. Different uses of "Europe" had, in fact, played a decisive role in the extrication from communism. Reference to the "common house of Europe" set the metaphorical end mark to old Cold War confrontations; the "Return to Europe" was an escape route from Soviet hegemony back to interrupted national histories; "Europeanization" became a friendly name for an all-encompassing transfer of institutions, rules, laws and conditions from the old EU countries to the post-communist accession candidates.

Meanwhile it became clear that the processes described in this way are not following a smooth path of social evolution. The regained national sovereignty of the new members caused frictions with the post-national demands of western dominated EU-institutions - conflicts which led sociologists like Jürgen Habermas to accentuate the virtues of a "core Europe" against an unreconstructed nationalism in the East. The recent financial crises opened new divisions: some Mediterranean members do not agree that the vulnerable new democracies deserve special treatment in terms of financial assistance. Last but not least, the easy talk about a "New Cold War" seems to follow Huntington's logic of clashing civilizations: the "New Russia" is widely perceived (especially in some former satellite states) in terms of "European values" against a resurgent "autocracy".

The paper will argue that conflicts of this type (as well as critique) have always been constitutive elements of the European discourse. Conflicts inside the enlarged union should not be dramatized: insistence on national sovereignty vis-à-vis the EU is a well-known game also in the states of "Old Europe". The EU has not exquisite authority to define Europe. The rift between the EU and Russia should be de-escalated; it should be understood not as antagonistic but as indicting specific problems of the Russian condition, esp. a stateness-problem much sharper than in most central-east European countries.

RS04

Europe and Immigration

"Changing teams". Citizenship ceremonies as policies for social cohesion

Hagelund, Anniken

ISF, Institute for Social Research

Oslo, Norway

Reegård, Kaja

AVF, Fafo

Oslo, Norway

Keywords

Immigration, citizenship ceremony, social cohesion, citizenship, Integration

Immigration and the social, cultural and religious heterogeneities that have followed in its wake have challenged long-standing ideas about citizenship, national identity and social cohesion in Europe. Several Western European countries have in recent years introduced policies aimed at strengthening new citizens' sense of and capacity for belonging through various forms of citizenship policies ranging from compulsory citizenship tests and citizenship courses to voluntary citizenship ceremonies. One way of depicting the trend is to say that receiving societies are addressing concerns about social cohesion by actively communicating a message of fundamental values, rights and responsibilities all citizens are expected to adhere to. Scholars have debated whether this represents an assimilationist turn and the extent to which European integration policies are converging, but few have, so far, looked at the actual implementation of these policies or tried to capture the participants' experiences and assessments of such measures.

In this paper we focus on the Norwegian citizenship ceremonies which were introduced in 2006. Following the new Citizenship Act all new citizens are being invited to a citizenship ceremony organised by the County Governor. The ceremony is voluntary, but includes a compulsory oath of allegiance for those who elect to participate. Primarily it is established as an occasion to formally mark the transition to Norwegian citizenship in a dignified manner.

First, we analyse the arguments and ideas that were put forward in the process leading up to the adoption of this new citizenship policy. To what extent and how did this change reflect shifting ideas on citizenship, nationhood and social cohesion in Norway? We also locate this policy change in the wider context of European policy trends in this area. Second, we address new citizens' experiences from being subjected to this type of citizenship and cohesion policy. We are able to draw on register data on participation and newly gathered data from semi-structured interviews with more than fifty new citizens, to ask questions such as: How do such ceremonies shape the actual relationships between migrants and the state? Do they make a difference to new citizens' ability and desire to participate and belong?

A Comparative Analysis of Variations in Islamic Faith and Practice among Muslim Immigrants in Europe and Japan

Kojima, Hiroshi

Faculty of Social Sciences, Waseda University

Tokyo, Japan

Keywords

europe, immigrants, Religiosity, Japan, Muslim

This study analyzes the variations in Islamic faith and practice among adult male Muslim immigrants in Europe (188 cases from 21 countries), drawing on the European Social Survey conducted in 2002/2003, and those in Tokyo Metropolitan Area (149 cases), drawing on the Social Survey of Muslim Population in Japan conducted in 2005 and 2006 by Waseda University (PI: Hirofumi TANADA). A preliminary analysis by the year of entry shows that the Islamic faith in Europe (% choosing religiosity scales of 8-10) becomes stronger from those having entered 1-5 years ago (40.5%) to those having entered 6-10 years ago (44.4%), but it goes down among those having entered 11-20 years ago (31.9%) and goes up again among those having entered more than 20 years ago (46.9%). The religious faith as measured by the very strict observance of Islamic rules does not change linearly in Japan, either. It is 61.5% among those having entered in 2005-2006, but it goes down to 21.5% among those having entered between 2000 and 2004.

It goes up to 43.5% among those having entered between 1995 and 1999, but goes down to 26.7% among those having entered between 1990 and 1994 and to 5.9% among those having entered before 1990.

The frequency of attendance at prayer service in Japan shows similar changes with the year of entry and the percentage of attending more than once goes down from 26.9% (2005-2006 entrants) to 23.1% (2000-2004), but goes up to 39.1% (1995-1999) and goes down to 26.7% (1990-94) and again to 17.6% (pre-1990). But in Europe the percentage continues to go up from 5.4% (1-5 years ago), through 8.3% (6-10) and 12.8% (11-20) and 17.2% (20+). But the percentage of prayer once a week goes down in the last group by almost 10%. Perhaps, these non-linear changes in Europe and Japan are related to the timing of rise of religious fundamentalism in sending countries in addition to the integration process in receiving countries. At the time of meeting, the results of comparative logit analyses will be also presented.

A Comparison of Internal Mobility of Immigrants and Natives in Turkey

Sirkeci, Ibrahim

European Business School London, Regent's College London, United Kingdom

Cohen, Jeffrey

*Anthropology, Ohio State University
Columbus, United States*

Can, Neriman

*population and migration division, Turkish Institute of Statistics
Ankara, Turkey*

Keywords

culture of migration, Europeans in Turkey, immigrants in Turkey, internal migration

In this paper, we are analysing the 2000 Turkish Census data in order to investigate internal migration patterns of the foreign-born in comparison to the native born population. Cumulative causation model suggests that earlier migration experiences have an impact on further international migration propensity. In this paper we attempt to look at a later stage in international migration to see how internal migration moves of immigrants are shaped following their international migration experience. Expecting a higher level of mobility compared to the native born internal migration movements, the culture of migration model is discussed with this particular perspective. The most recent Turkish Census (2000) data offer variables at individual and household levels. We have enriched the set by integrating socioeconomic development level scores at community level to control some of the environmental/contextual effects. Multinomial logistic regression models are used in the analysis while also population descriptions are presented in tables and graphs. This study stands as a pioneering analysis of foreign born - mostly European - immigration and internal migration in Turkey. It is the first ever analysis as such and also providing an overall picture of immigration in Turkey as identified through official statistics.

A space-sensitive approach to migration: New ways to migrant participation beneath and above the national level

Scheibelhofer, Elisabeth

Department of Sociology, University of Vienna

Austria, <http://www.soz.univie.ac.at/elisabeth-scheibelhofer/>

Keywords

methodological nationalism, theories of space, migrant participation

During the last years, some migration researchers have pointed out that social scientific research is hampered by some limitations that Wimmer/Glick Schiller (2002) named methodological nationalism. There exists already a considerably amount of empirical studies suggesting that the participation in social groups, networks and/or institutions of many migrants are not anymore limited to one nation-state and thus that their ways of participation is not adequately perceived by "classic" migration research because of its focus of the activities within one nation-state at a time. With this assessment in mind, it is now the question how we could go beyond these limitations. It is clear that we need new research strategies and new concepts in order to perceive the diverse social realities and social relations migrants are involved in. Thus, in this paper I suggest that we could profit at this point having a look at the social scientific theories of space in order to shed the limitations of methodological nationalism. This blooming stream of research on space (recently also in sociology) is making it obvious that we are confronted - as well as in the empirical world as in the sociological thinking - with different concepts of space: First, a container-like and essentialist understanding of space, second a relational understanding of space and third a socially constructed space. Surprisingly enough, there is only scarce evidence that migration researchers are reflecting upon their own conceptions of space. I argue that a space-sensitive approach to migration research could help us to shed the limitations of empirical nationalism and thus have a more accurate look on immigrant lives, their participation in diverse networks and communities. In this presentation, I will bring examples from empirical migration research in order to show how such a space-sensitive approach can open up more adequate ways to consider migrant participation not only within the confines of the nation-state but also on other scalar levels such as above or beneath the national container.

Attitudes and representations of health and illness in immigrants

Dias, Sónia

*International Health, Institute of Hygiene and Tropical Medicine
Lisboa, Portugal*

Cortes, Maria

*International Health, Institute of Hygiene and Tropical Medicine
Lisboa, Portugal*

Carreira, Mario

*Epidemiologia, Instituto de Medicina Preventiva
a, a*

Alarcão, Violeta

*a, Instituto de Medicina Preventiva
a, a*

Horta, Rosário

*a, ARSLVT
a, a*

Silva, António

*a, ARSLVT
a, a*

Keywords

representations, attitudes, immigrants, illness, Health

The greater diversity of population resulting from migratory flows pose new challenges to the host countries, namely in national health care systems. The immigrant's access to appropriate health services contributes to an improvement in the level of health of these communities, to a better quality of life and to their integration in the host country.

Migrants bring with them cultural attitudes and representations to health care appropriate in their own experience, and not necessarily to the host country. The attitudes and representations of immigrants not only influence the perceived need to use health services but also how to use them. In this sense, identifying attitudes about illness, health and health services is a first step toward improving health care utilization among immigrants. In Portugal limited data are available about these issues.

This study aimed to identify the attitudes and representations in relation to health, illness and health services utilization. This was observational, cross and analytical study.

A community-based survey was conducted to obtain a sample of 1.152 immigrant communities of African origin, Brazilian and countries of eastern. Data were collected through questionnaires developed specifically for this study, administered by trained interviewers.

Our results suggest that attitudes and representations about health, illness, access and utilization health services differ between migrants groups: African, Brazilian and Eastern Europe. These results are consistent with literature and indicate that immigrant's communities have less preventive care opportunities. Migrants are often language difficulties and are unfamiliar with practices of health care regulation in the host country. Results suggest that migrant's communities are less likely to receive even routine medical procedures, experience a lower quality of health services, are less satisfaction with health services.

The conclusions can support the development of policies and strategies that can promote access and appropriate health services, reduce health inequalities and have a positive impact in immigrants health.

Crossing ethnic lines

Bruess, Joachim

*Research and Analysis, InterMedia
Washington DC, USA*

Keywords

Migration, longitudinal survey, interethnic relations, social milieux, 2nd generation

Research and Analysis of interethnic relations typically assumes that ethnic groups are coherent entities.

In many cases the intergroup perspective is prevalent and variation within ethnic groups and possible crossings across groups are often neglected. This might lead to a more static view on interethnic relations whereas relations are in fact more like processes and thus subject to change over time.

This paper will address some of these questions based on a longitudinal data analyses. Between 2001 and 2005 more than 10.000 German, Turkish and Resettler adolescents were surveyed to explore contacts, prejudice and acculturation preferences as crucial aspects of interethnic relations. To allow for subgroup differences that might reach across ethnic groups, life style clusters or social milieux were examined over time. Initial results indicate that members of three social milieux of each ethnic group tend to reach out to members of other ethnic groups. In contrast, a few social milieux seem to reject members of a different ethnic group. On the whole the findings provide some evidence that interethnic relations are more differentiated than expected and coalitions of the willing coexist next to tendencies of withdrawal and rejection. More detailed empirical evidence is analyzed with regard to interpersonal contact, prejudice and social rejection, and acculturation preferences.

Do migrants trust? - A multi-level analysis of individual, community, origin and destination effects on the level of interpersonal trust of migrants in Europe

Roeder, Antje

*Sociology, Trinity College Dublin
Dublin, Ireland*

Keywords

social cohesion, trust, Migration

Ethnic diversity is often claimed to lead to a decline in social cohesion and lower trust levels amongst citizens, although this is much disputed (Hooghe et al. 2006, Lancee and Dronkers 2008, Putnam 2007). Trust is arguably maintained more easily in a homogenous setting, based on the assumption that "familiarity breeds trust". High levels of trust in a society are generally considered desirable because they act as a "lubricant" for various processes (Nannestad and Svendsen 2005) and have been shown to be linked to democracy (Inglehart 1999), a thriving civic society and even the economic success of a country (Putnam 1993, Fukuyama 1995). Previous research on interpersonal trust has primarily been concerned with the (declining) trust levels of natives, but relatively little work has investigated whether migrants trust their host societies. This paper aims to explore this further, with focus on two core issues: firstly, to discuss how migrants' trust levels are influenced by a range of factors that could aid or impede their ability to trust, such as discrimination and difference, as well as a the national policy environment. Secondly, to contribute to the debate around the nature of trust, in particular the interplay of a "culture of trust" learned early during socialisation, and a "rational" trust based on the evaluation of current circumstances and experiences. Multi-level modelling is used to allow for the investigation of multiple origins and destinations using data from the three rounds of the European Social Survey, supplemented by data related to migrants' communities, origin and host countries. It is found that cultural, religious or ethnic differences do not seem to impede migrants' trust in others, whereas discrimination leads to significantly lower levels. Favourable policies and citizenship are not found to have the expected positive effect. A "honeymoon" effect was found with regards to length of stay, with recent migrants being significantly more trusting than migrants that arrived a long time ago. The "culture of trust" of the origin country continues to influence migrants' trust levels, although the context of the host country has a stronger effect.

Ethnic organizations as representation of intra-European immigrants' interests - the case of Polish immigrant NGO's in Germany

Nowosielski, Michal

none, Institute for Western Affairs

Poznan, Poland

Keywords

ethnic organizations, immigrant organizations, intra-European migration

The problem of intra-European migrations is usually analysed in the context of workforce flows and differentiated politics of member states towards free labour movement from "new" European countries. Studies on the intra-European migration usually underestimate the problem of political representation of immigrants' interests, and their modes of influence on the activities of public authorities of the host society. It is implicitly assumed that immigrants who have European citizenship have in fact more political power than other immigrants. Yet it is worth noticing that their influence on public authorities is highly limited.

The proposed paper will aim to investigate the modes of representation of intra-European immigrants' interests by immigrant organisations. With the use the example of Polish immigrant and ethnic organisations in Germany it will describe this aspect of the intra-European migration. More detailed research questions explored in the proposed paper are:

1. What are the main issues that are potential spheres of activity for Polish immigrant organisations in Germany?
2. What is the profile (organisational density, number of members, resources, cooperation with other organisations at different levels, etc.) of Polish immigrant organisations in Germany?
3. What strategies and instruments do Polish immigrant organisations in Germany adopt to represent immigrants' interests?
4. What are the most efficient modes of action and tactics of Polish immigrant organisations in Germany in representing the interests of immigrants?
5. How do Polish immigrant organisations perceive their role in representing immigrants' interests?

The paper will present results of on-going study of Polish ethnic and immigrant organisations in Germany: typologies of modes of action, ways of adaptation and channels of influence applied by Polish immigrant ethnic organisations in the context of a united Europe. Research methods employed for the study are: analysis of Polish immigrant organisations websites, in-depth interviews with leaders of most important Polish immigrant organisations as well as organisational postal survey.

Europe is my oyster: experiences of Finns working abroad

Koikkalainen, Saara

Department of Social Studies, University of Lapland Rovaniemi, Finland

Keywords

Finland, EU, labour mobility, skilled migration, free movement

Transnational mobility within Europe has been moderately on the rise and the European Union encourages labour mobility to create a common European labour market. My conference paper looks at the experiences of Finns working in other EU countries, based on a Working in Europe online survey, which was conducted in 2008. In addition data from a longitudinal record data on a 10 per cent cohort of Finns born in 1973 and 1978 is utilised.

The respondents of the survey were found via a method of snowball contact. Thanks to the free movement rights and the ease of migration, mobile EU citizens are a "hidden population" in the destination country and they cannot be easily accessed to form a statistically representative sample. Therefore the results of the survey cannot be generalised to represent the views or career paths of the whole population of Finns living abroad.

The responses of the survey can, however, give an interesting view to the working life experiences of at least this group of tertiary educated Finns in other EU countries. It is well known, that when transferring abroad the loss of cultural capital, as well as problems with degree recognition and knowledge of the local language may worsen the migrants' labour market situation. Yet the majority of the 364 Finns, whose survey responses were analysed, rate their experiences as positive.

My paper outlines four explanations to this almost univocal happiness. Firstly Finns seem to have good standing compared with other mobile groups and their education holds its value abroad. Secondly they work in international environments where employee nationality per se is not very significant. Thirdly many respondents were employed because of their language skills, especially because they speak Finnish and Swedish. Fourthly, it can be argued, that the sample is biased: perhaps only those who are happy responded, whereas those who were disappointed did not reply - they returned back home. To supplement this picture and account for the relative weight of explanation number four, a set of more thorough qualitative interviews is envisioned as a continuation of the study.

Finnish Voluntary Associations in Europe: Transnational Civil Society Actors in Different Polity Regimes

Vierimaa, Sanna-Mari

*Social Sciences, Sociology, University of Jyväskylä, Finland
Jyväskylä, Finland*

Keywords

migrant associations, transnationalism, polity regimes

Today transnational communities are more connected to their societies of origin than ever before. Hence, it is questioned whether ethnic minorities fail to develop serious attachments to the host societies leading to the weaker cohesion in the immigrant receiving states. The focus on migrant associations sheds more light on this obstacle as associations are key actors, for example, in facilitating integration as well as maintaining links with their countries of origin. One gap in research on migrants, however, is a lack of knowledge about the variety of roles migrants' voluntary associations have adopted in their new home countries whilst systematic comparative analysis of the impact of state regimes on migrant associations remains weak.

This study investigates the relationship between the polity regimes and the type and the number of Finnish voluntary associations in Europe using the previous literature, archive material, associations' websites and the registry of associations' contact information provided by the Finland Society and the Finnish Expatriate Parliament (FEP). The case of the 1.3 million Finnish emigrants around the world makes up an excellent migrant group to be examined as they have established about 1500 associations and are well connected to Finland through the cooperative forum, FEP. As it is argued that political structures constrain distinctive patterns of civic engagement either encouraging or discouraging it, the type of the Nordic regime inspires associational activity. Hence the influence of the relationship of Finland's polity regime and the polity regime of the host society on associations is understood as reciprocal and dialectical. This paper also observes whether Finnish voluntary associations abroad reflect the typical characteristics of the associations located inside the borders of Finland and whether they change according to the polity regime. The hypothesis is that transnationalism does not have a significant influence on ethnic minorities' attachment to host societies, but the type of the polity regime may be a better indicator of the sense of belonging.

Gender Equality and Women's Rights - Contested Concepts in the Multicultural Nordic Countries

Keskinen, Suvi

*Department of Social Research, University of Tampere
University of Tampere, Finland*

Keywords

GENDER EQUALITY, Nordic welfare states, violence in migrant families, welfare state nationalism, women's rights

Nordic welfare states have been called "women-friendly" due to the broad range of social benefits and services provided for their citizens. The countries are also seen to be characterized by a specifically strong commitment to gender equality. Recently, however, feminist researchers have pointed out that questions related to multiculturalism and racism have challenged this positive view. During the last decade, the Nordic countries have experienced heated public debates concerned with issues of gender, ethnicity and sexuality, related to issues like "honour-related violence" and "female genital mutilation". "Gender equality" and "women's rights" have been used to heighten anti-immigration rhetorics, and to create dichotomous divisions between the "gender equal" majorities and "patriarchal" minorities ("us" and "them"). Such trends are not limited to the Nordic countries, but cover most West European countries.

In this paper I use data from a recent study on violence to migrant women in families to elaborate on the themes of gender equality, welfare state nationalism and women's rights as a multifaceted issue. The data consist of thematic interviews with welfare state professionals, as well as interviews with abused women who migrated to Finland from the Middle East, Africa and Post-Soviet states. The paper analyses how the interviewed professionals and authorities position themselves and their clients in relation to the gender equality discourse and how "race" and ethnicity feature in this. In some cases, for example, positions of superiority were created for Finnish female professionals whose role became to teach and guide migrant women to the "wonderland of gender equality". Furthermore, the paper discusses how the theme of gender equality and women's rights appear in the narratives of the interviewed migrant women. In these narratives women's rights are highly valued, but rather than appearing as values adopted in Finland (as many of the professionals present the case to be) women's rights seem to have been important for many women already in their "home countries" and they engage in several kinds of acts to gain rights.

How to be European? Denationalized life in the capital of Europe

Cailliez, Julie

Département des Sciences Sociales, sociologie, Université Libre de Bruxelles Bruxelles, Belgium

Keywords

European institutions, space appropriation, European identity, denationalized life, Cosmopolitanism

European integration is based on the free circulation of goods, services and people inside the borders of Europe. Mobility would indeed allow erasing the national borders and would perhaps lead to the construction of a supranational feeling of belonging. But, for now, various ways of being or feeling European coexist within the European society.

My paper propose to explore a certain way of becoming European, or, at least, of feeling European. In Brussels, for many individuals working in or around the European institutions, the sense of belonging to Europe is clearly connected to the opportunity to live denationalized lives in the city. Through a qualitative research based on interviews with civil servants and trainees of these international institutions, we will show that those specific international workers experience a deterritorialized and denationalized universe on a daily basis. The way they use and appropriate the city of Brussels but also the way they privilege social encounters within their own cosmopolitan environment reinforce their belonging to the European identity.

The Brussels' case is particular in this respect. Since the installation of the European Institutions in 1958, the city has known an unprecedented increase of the European foreign population. Today, the international functions of Brussels attract more than 100.000 persons working directly or indirectly for the construction of Europe. These foreigners, far from considering themselves as migrants, are multilingual. They value the experiences of international mobility and privilege a cosmopolitan environment. The outbreak of international infrastructures, the specific services intended for this qualified foreign population, the international and European schools of Brussels, the cosmopolitan universe offered by the capital (at least by certain places in the capital) but also the weakness of the Belgian national identity are some of the elements which create a real opportunity to experiment a denationalized live. My PHD research brings to light the ambivalent character of their feeling of belonging: even if the national roots remain present in their mode of identification, they value in the same time a symbolic and pragmatic identification to an European cosmopolitanism.

Identifications of Second Generation Muslim "Immigrants" in European Societies - a Comparative Case Study of Berlin, Paris and London

Jikeli, Gunther

, IIBSA

London, UK

Keywords

identity, minority, belonging, Muslim

National identities play an important part in the discussions about social cohesion and issues of belonging. In this paper I analyse the self-perceptions of collective identities regarding nationality, ethnicity and faith of young male European Muslims based on interviews with 117 young Muslims in Berlin, Paris and London conducted from 2005 - 2007.

Most interviewees are born in the country they live in and hold the respective nationality. However, many have a disparate feeling of belonging, either because they do not feel fully accepted as German, French or British or because they are more attached to other collective identities, or a combination of both. The interviews show evidence for a relation between these two reasons in some cases: some interviewees expressed the feeling that they are not perceived by the majority society as German, French or British nationals but that they are seen as members of other ethnic groups and thus feel as such. However, most interviewees endorse a collective identity relating to ethnic backgrounds - in opposition, or addition to, or in combination with the national identity of the "receiving society".

Despite the diverging perceptions, the tendency for interviewees in Germany is to see their ethnic identity opposing the German national identity. In France, interviewees largely perceive themselves French and also Algerian, Moroccan, Tunisian etc. In Britain, many consider themselves as British-Asians. Three interdependent factors for a non-identification with the respective nationality are identified:

The extent to which the interviewees feel accepted as nationals by the majority society.

The interviewees' perception of ethnic, cultural or religious heritage and identity in relation to a national identities.

The concept of national identity within their social circles, i.e. with friends, in school, within their family and in the district they live in.

For many interviewees, the religious identity plays an important role in the issue of belonging to the "receiving society" as some feel that it is incompatible with a national identification with the countries they live in. However, only few have a strong perception of cross-national unity of a Muslim community (Ummah).

Immigrant Integration and Transnational Activities. The Situation of Immigrants in Germany

Schunck, Reinhard

Bremen International Graduate School of Social Sciences, University of Bremen

Bremen, Germany

Keywords

Integration, Germany, transnationalism

The paper analyzes transnational activities among immigrants in Germany, one of Europe's major receiving countries. On the basis of the German Socio-Economic Panel (1994-2006), the paper seeks to answer the following two general questions: First, to what extent do immigrants residing in Germany engage in transnational activities? And second, how are these activities related to the immigrants' integration into the receiving country?

Not only is empirical evidence on this issue still limited - especially for Europe -, but there are also theoretical blind spots regarding the determinants of the phenomenon. On the one hand, the literature assumes that those immigrants, who are not well integrated into the receiving society, are more likely to show a strong orientation towards their sending country and engage in transnational activities. On the other hand, studies from the US show that highly skilled and economically well integrated migrants command more resources, which enhance mobility and ease border crossing activities.

The empirical analysis focuses on one main example of transnational, border-crossing activities that is visits to the country of origin. Descriptive analyses reveal that a significant proportion of the immigrant population in Germany is transnationally active. With respect to the relation of integration and transnational activities, the application of longitudinal data analysis (logistic regression models with random effects and population-averaged panel data models), shows that those immigrants who are economically well integrated and at the same time not well integrated on other dimensions (e.g. cultural or emotional) are the most likely to visit their country of origin and spend considerable amounts of time there. However, this relation is not unidirectional, as further evidence suggests that transnational involvement also has important implications for subsequent integration into the receiving society. For instance, immigrants who frequently visit their country of origin have lower German language skills.

Therefore, systematically incorporating transnationalism into models of immigrant integration can advance our understanding of the complex processes and paths of immigrant integration.

Immigrants' Access to Local Political Spaces: Voters and Elected Candidates in Portuguese Municipalities and Parishes

Zobel, Clemens

*Centro de Estudos Sociais, Centro de Estudos Sociais, University of Coimbra
Coimbra, Portugal*

Keywords

participation, immigrants, Local Elections, Voting, Abstention

Since 1996 Portugal is one of the European countries where local-level voting rights and rights to eligibility are not only extended to EU citizens but also include foreigners from Portuguese community countries and countries that grant similar rights to Portuguese emigrants. This paper presents the results of the first study assessing the impact of these voting rights. Its first objective is to explain the weak participation of foreigners in three rounds of Portuguese local elections (1997, 2001 and 2005). This phenomenon is closely related to the non-registration of a large percentage of non-nationals which would have the right to vote. On the other hand, the presentation discusses the motivations of those immigrants who decide to vote or to run as candidates. It starts by exploring the reasons why in the late 1990s laws were passed to give certain groups of foreigners voting rights. This involves presenting the development of migrant flows in Portugal, the ways in which migrants organized themselves to defend their interests and how alliances were forged with political parties. After a brief outline of the law, which includes only certain groups of foreigners, the paper then addresses the reasons for which foreigners abstain from voting, or, to the contrary, make use of their rights. Finally, we deal with the motivations of migrants to run for elected offices in municipal or parish councils. Analysis takes into account the differences among immigrant groups and social categories, as well as regional variations, and relations between formal and informal political participation.

Immigrant's integration: comparing migratory policies in Portugal and Spain

Fernandez Suarez, Belen

*Sociology Department, University of A Corunna
A Corunna, Spain*

Keywords

comparison, foreigners, Integration, migratory policies

The main objective of this paper is to draw a comparative analysis of migratory policies in Portugal and Spain as regards immigrant's integration. Both countries are considered as making part of the Southern European migratory regime (King and Ribas Mateos, 2007), a fact that makes necessary to assess and review the similarities and differences in policies regarding immigrant's integration. Indeed, in this paper we will take into account the different timing of the migratory processes in both countries, as well as differences in the incorporation of foreigners into the host societies, the socio-demographic aspects, as well as the divergences in the profile and composition of immigration in both the Spanish and Portuguese context. We consider all the aforementioned factors as the key elements guiding the implementation of integration policies.

More specifically, we will contrast integration policies from a juridical perspective through the comparison of legal texts and the construction of indicators for the incorporation of foreigners into the host societies and the labour markets, family reunification, long-term residence, naturalization processes, political rights and access to the main Welfare State benefits in Portugal and Spain-

Finally, we will compare the most recent integration plans of the two countries, which have been both passed in 2007, in order to identify the main elements of integration policies and to assess the successful measures and programmes in order to consider its possible transference to the European context.

Impact of migration on social participation

Voicu, Bogdan

*The Research Institute for Quality of Life, Romanian Academy of Science
Bucharest, Romania*

Serban, Monica

*The Research Institute for Quality of Life, Romanian Academy of Science
Romania, <http://www.iccv.ro>*

Keywords

multilevel analysis, europe, Migration, membership in associations

Recent papers conceive social capital, particularly participation in associations and social participation (involvement in social networks), as being determined both by individual level factors and contextual characteristics (Schofer/Fourcade-Gourinchas, 2001, Curtis et al., 2001; Fidrmuc/Gërkhani, 2008; Meulemann, 2008; van der Meer et al, 2008). They converge in presenting evidences that when considering explaining the production of social capital at individual level, the individual factors are more important than the societal ones.

This paper considers a similar approach, focusing on the participation in formal associations of new and second-generation migrants, in European countries.

We consider a model of producing participation that involves at country level two types of mechanisms, related to the social order, respectively to the social opportunities (Meulemann, 2008). At individual level, we consider four types of factors: (a) existing resources, constraints and opportunities; (b) defining the situation according to the individual perceptions and representations; (c) values and ideologies; (d) other manifestation of BrSC (Voicu, 2009).

Past individual experience creates various resources and constraints for involvement in formal associations. New immigrants, lacking connections and knowledge about their new society, are likely to have lower probability to involve in associations. On the other hand, second generation migrants often do not integrate in the host society, and have a lower probability to participate to the social life.

Using large scale datasets and multilevel regression analysis, we test these two hypothesis, considering involvement in any kind of association. Secondly, we consider involvement in various kinds of statutory associations, considering the existing classifications (Schofer/Fourcade-Gourinchas, 2001, Curtis et al., 2001; Meulemann, 2008; etc.) and construct and test the validity of specific explanations for the specific immigrant behavior related to these types of associations.

In-depth analyses of attitudes towards immigrants in a highly multi-national society. A case study of Luxembourg

Valentova, Marie

*PSELL, CEPS/INSTEAD
Differdange, Luxembourg*

Berzosa, Guayarmina

*PSELL, CEPS/Instead
Differdange, Luxembourg*

Keywords

Multiculturalism, Immigration, composite indicators, attitudes

Luxembourg is one of the European countries with the highest proportion of immigrants in the population and with a relatively long immigration history. According to the latest official statistics, the immigrants represent 43% of the Luxembourg population. Thus, we can observe a progressive change in the population profile where the number of immigrants (considered as minority) is slowly reaching the number of natives (considered as majority). In this context, the notion of the minority/majority dichotomy is losing its traditional sense and the country is in the process of finding a new equilibrium between ethnic diversity and social cohesion of the country.

This, in Europe unique, situation evokes a lot of questions regarding national identity, assimilation, multilingual/national state. Given this, it is extremely legitimate to study how do different segments of inhabitants of Luxembourg perceive immigrants and how does the multicultural nature of the society affect social cohesion. The analyses will be based on the European Value Study data from 1999 and 2008.

In concrete terms, the present paper has two principal aims: firstly, to create a composite indicator/s of attitudes toward immigration and secondly, to examine the effect of selected factors on it/them. To meet the first aim of the paper, factor analysis and scale internal consistency measures are employed on a set of questionnaire items regarding attitudes towards immigrants. With respect to the second aim of the paper, various regression models are estimated to compare the effect of selected socio-demographic and labor market factors (i.e. age, educational attainment, labour market status, earning capacity, region, size of the settlement, level of proficiency in the country's official languages and social strata) on the attitudes towards immigrants across different national subgroups of respondents (the native Luxembourgers, immigrants of the first generation, immigrants of the second generation, different national groups of immigrants). The longitudinal nature of the data allows us to examine the evolution of attitudes to immigrants during past decade.

Intermarriage among five immigrants communities living in Portugal: the case of Brazilians, Ukrainian, Angolans, Cape Verdeans and Guineans

Ferreira, Ana Cristina

Quantitative Methods, ISCTE

Lisbon, Portugal

Ramos, Madalena

Quantitative Methods, ISCTE

Lisbon, Portugal

Keywords

Intermarriage, Endogamy, Patterns of marriage, immigrants, Exogamy

In a single decade, the number of foreign residents in Portugal increased 137%, from 172.912 in 1996 to 409.185 in 2006. This growth in the number of immigrants obviously had consequences in the context of marriage. The data for the marriages occurred between 2001 and 2005, provided by the official national statistics, indicated that the unions in which at least one spouse born outside of Portugal increased in that period of time 107.8%, from 2063 to 4287.

In this research we examined the intermarriage patterns among five groups of immigrants in Portugal, those who correspond to the majority groups and that are associated with different flows in the Portuguese history of immigration: Angola, Cape Verde, Guinea-Bissau, Ukraine and Brazil. We used the marriage microdata from the 2005 official national statistics.

We are interested in the existing patterns of marriage, not only between nationals and non-nationals, but also among non-nationals.

Logistic regressions done by country of origin and sex show that there are different marriage strategies between groups of immigrants corresponding to the oldest flow of immigration and the most recent one, being the latter the one with lowest levels of endogamy. Our results also reveal gender differences regarding the levels of exogamy. Among the groups with the highest levels of exogamy (Brazil and Ukraine), women are those that tend most to marry outside their group of origin.

Labour Mobility of Foreigners and the Role of Ethnic Networks in Germany

Damelang, Andreas

*Institute for Employment Research and University Erlangen-Nuremberg, School of Business and Economics, Graduate Programme
Nuremberg, Germany*

Keywords

labour market integration, ethnic networks, labour mobility, Foreign employees

This paper aims to investigate differences in the mobility behaviour of foreign men in Germany in contrast to German employees. Hereby, the influence of ethnic networks is of main interest. Ethnic networks allow for the use of homeland specific resources such as language and culture. But embeddedness in ethnic networks may hinder structural assimilation (e.g. labour market integration) by potentially leading to ethnic economies with low mobility rates.

Beside further socio-economic factors (e.g. regional unemployment rate, urbanisation, firm size) individual characteristics such as age and endowment with human capital as well as unemployment duration are considered. Unemployment is one of the main driving forces of regional mobility. Hence, this investigation combines the micro perspective with the opportunities and constraints on the macro level. The analysis is based on the value-expectation theory of migration enabling to include the objective conditions of the situation with the individual perception of it.

For the analysis a detailed micro-dataset, the IABS-04, is employed which includes very reliable information at individual and firm level, aiming at describing which factors drive mobility. It can be shown that foreigners are more mobile than Germans. Looking at different groups of nationals, Turks and people from former Yugoslavia are more mobile while people from EU-countries are not. Generally, this can be traced back to a higher willingness for mobility of young workers as well as to the higher likelihood of being unemployed for both groups. But considering these factors in a multivariate approach the propensity of mobility remain significantly higher upon including network characteristics.

Although the mobility restraining forces of networks are a well known fact in mobility research, it seems that ethnic networks are even more impeding. This mobility barrier may cause a lower speed of structural assimilation leading to persistent ethnic penalties.

Migrant Integration Research: Do we need a change of focus?

De Jong, Mart-Jan

Faculty of Social Science, Roosevelt Academy/University of Utrecht Middelburg, The Netherlands

Keywords

Integration, Research, trends

In the preparation for this paper a sample of academic journals is being studied. The sample is taken from the period 1985-2008. On the basis of the first outcomes of this study, which is still in progress, it can be stated that the paper will show that the main topics of research and essays are not equally focused on processes of inclusion, exclusion and self-exclusion. Moreover, the sample shows that there is a strong tendency to focus on social problems related to the integration of immigrants and that very limited research is carried out to investigate why some groups or individuals have been successful in attaining a good position in the country of settlement. The paper will finish with an analysis of the scientific and political consequences of the overrepresentation of studying processes of exclusion and manifestations of failing processes of integration.

Migrant workers in Latvia: positive and negative aspects in population attitudes

Briska, Iveta

*Research department, Social research centre SKDS
Riga, Latvia*

Keywords

long-term effects, impact on ethnic relations, Immigration

Population attitudes towards foreigners coming to Latvia for the purposes of work significantly differ. The complicated historical development - deportations and artificial immigration, caused by forced industrialisation of Latvia since the beginning of 1950s had a fundamental effect on the ethnic situation of Latvia.

At the end of 2007 and beginning of 2008, the Social Alternative Institute conducted a research "Impact of Migration on Ethnic Relations in Latvia". The overall objective of the research is to promote democratic ethnic policy and balanced ethnic relations in Latvia under the circumstances of immigration. The research explains the views of various socio-demographic groups living in Latvia in respect of the potential migration of foreign workers to Latvia and their integration in society.

Such research methods as analysis of documents and previous researches, expert focus group discussions and population survey through direct interviews were used during the research process.

According to the survey results, residents of Latvia lack information about immigration of workforce. Up to the end of 2008, several economic sectors needed foreign labour. In population attitudes, the main negative consequences of labour import are related to belief that the inflow of foreign workers could threaten the Latvian ethnic identity and local population employment opportunities as well as would increase crime related risks.

The majority of respondents who had strictly negative views regarding arrival of foreign workers to Latvia supported the rigorous policy that was implemented at that time in Latvia in respect of labour immigration and restricted employers wishing to attract foreign workers. Now, after the rapid increase in the unemployment rate since the end of 2008, the proportion of residents who support such a policy would probably be higher.

At present, policy makers should fully understand the consequences of employment of foreign workers. Researches and thorough analysis of situation would allow prognosticating how arrival and stay of foreign workers in Latvia will affect not only the growth of particular companies or sectors, but also the country's economic, political and social development.

Mortality and causes of deaths of foreigners in Italy (1997-2002)

Colombo, Asher D.

*Education, University of Bologna
Bologna, Italy*

Santangelo, Federica

*Sociology and social research, University of Trento
Trento, Italy*

Keywords

death causes, death rate, immigrant selectivity, immigration in Europe

The existence of an inverse relationship between social class and mortality rates is a well known and documented phenomenon in scientific literature. Since the mid-eighties of the last century scholars, especially epidemiologists, however, have noted the existence of an advantage with regard to physical and mental health of some groups of immigrants and members of ethnic minorities. This finding has raised some surprise and even some suspicion, for immigrants often belong to socially disadvantaged groups. The phenomenon has been explained in three different ways: as a result of immigrant selectivity (healthy migrant theory), of the returns of migrants in poor health (salmon bias effects), the effect of social and cultural (social buffering effects). Based on two hierarchical datasets of deaths in Italy between 1997 and 2002 ( $N > 5$  million of deaths, by nationality, sex, age, cause according ICD9, legal or illegal residence, region of residence, data obtained from the National Institute of Statistics of Italy (Istat)), the paper addresses the case of mortality rates and causes of death of immigrants in Italy during the period 1997-2002. Compared to other studies that restrict the analysis to differences between foreigners and natives, the this paper extends the focus to the comparison between migrants and non migrants in emigration countries. The analysis shows that the mortality rates of some immigrant nationalities are lower than those of the Italians and those of non migrants at home. The extent of this advantage, however, varies depending on the causes of death. The advantage is minimum when factors related to context of arrival are at work, as in the case of cancer, trauma, poisoning, violent death. However further research is needed for the understanding of the factors that explain the differences.

Negotiating belongings in transnational social fields: migrants from former Soviet Union in the Czech Republic

Klvanova, Radka

Institute for Research on Social Reproduction and Integration, Faculty of Social Studies, Masaryk University Brno, Czech Republic

Keywords

inclusion, transnational perspective, Migration, Central-Eastern Europe

An increasing mobility within Central-Eastern European migration space has been receiving a growing attention in both academic research and public debate. In this region, rather inexperienced with foreign newcomers who often seem to settle for longer than previously expected, questions of migrants' inclusion and the processes of change of legal as well as symbolic boundaries of membership in various imagined communities are being opened.

In my research, I examine the process of inclusion/exclusion of the first generation migrants from former Soviet Union (Belarus, Russia and Ukraine) residing long-term in the Czech Republic. I develop a critical approach towards the concept of inclusion/exclusion of migrants that has been traditionally conceptualized with respect to the idea of society as a bounded container of a nation state. Transnational theories cast doubt on mutually exclusive inclusion of migrants, who nowadays often belong by some means to two or more communities in transnational social fields. Therefore an important empirical question when researching migrants' inclusion/exclusion is the study of at which levels within transnational social fields migrants are included. Posed in this way the question permits us to come to terms with the problem of the hidden assumption of the inclusion of migrants into the bounded homogenous community of the host nation state, and can reveal the diverse levels of belonging to civic communities in transnational social fields.

Based on the analysis of narrative interviews with migrants, the paper will focus on the process of negotiation of migrants' belongings under tensions brought by living cross-border lives in the world dominated by nationalist order. It will explore how migrants' belongings are contested and transformed in the process of migration in a specific Central-Eastern European migration space where historical legacy of the Soviet imperialism, nation building processes in Central and Eastern Europe as well as incorporation of the former socialist countries into global capitalist order and international political formations form an important context of negotiating belonging.

New migrants, new community: Polish nationals in Ireland after the EU enlargement in 2004

Bobek, Alicja

*Sociology, Trinity College Dublin
Dublin, Ireland*

Keywords

Ireland, Polish migrants, ethnic community

Although Poland has been a country of emigration for many decades, Ireland has only recently become a destination country for Polish nationals. Most of the Polish migrants in Ireland came to this country directly prior or after the EU enlargement in May 2004. Therefore this community is still in the process of formation, and rapid changes can be observed. Despite the novelty of this migration flow, Polish citizens constitute one of the largest immigrant groups in Ireland. With the current circumstances of the freedom of movement between European Union states, new light can be put on the concepts of migration, ethnic identity and on such concepts as "home" and "belonging".

The aim of this paper is to describe and examine the process of the formation of Polish community in Ireland, showing how this situation differs from the situation of those Polish communities that have already been well established in other countries and how some patterns from the past are still replicated. The main focus of the presentation would be analyze the influence of the Information and Communication Technologies on both, ethnic community formation and on the relationship between Polish migrants in Ireland, their local communities 'back home' and migrants in other countries. I will argue that the traditional concept of "ethnic neighbourhood" does not apply to this community and it has been, to some extent, compensated by the notion of "virtual community". I will also show the internal divisions within the community, which are no longer based on differences between migrant cohorts but rather are based on class and cultural capital characteristics. Finally, I will present the place of this community within the larger context of the Polish Diaspora.

The paper utilises data from my ongoing research on Polish migrants in Ireland. This research utilises qualitative methodology combining fieldwork, semi-structured interviews and on-line ethnography. In addition to that I have been using data from the Migrants Careers and Aspirations project, part of Trinity Immigration Initiative research programme.

Not only transnational: family patterns of immigrants in Italy

Colombo, Asher D.

Education, University of Bologna

Bologna, Italy

Keywords

Family, transnationalism, international migration, care workers

Family reunions continue to be the main port of entry for foreigners, both in the old immigration countries - although in recent years they have adopted progressively more stringent standards - and in recent immigration countries, that could quickly adapt to the firsts. Yet the systematic study of family patterns of migrants in countries of arrival is an understudied topic. Based on three major databases - the first consisting of 650 extensive life stories of care and domestic workers of both sexes and of many emigration countries, the second consisting in some surveys on the immigrant population of a region with high presence of foreigners (N=7.000), the third from administrative microdata - the paper strives to reconstruct a part of the picture. Among the peculiarities of the sources used should be noted that the first two databases include information both on legal and illegal foreign residents.

The analysis shows (1) that in Italy there is a wide variety of patterns of families of immigrants, (2) that the so-called transnational families, formed by members located in different countries and related, are only one of these patterns, and (3) that part of transnational households can be considered as one stage of the cycle of family life.

Polish bi-national migrants in Northern Ireland -the study of the division into typically Polish and Northern Irish aspects of life

Samolyk, Justyna

Sociology, Social Policy and Social Work, Queen's University Belfast Belfast, United Kingdom

Keywords

bi-national practices, immigrants, European society

Immediately after Poland joined the European Union in May 2004, Polish nationals were given unrestricted access to the labour markets of the United Kingdom, Republic of Ireland and Sweden. Many Polish migrants who took advantage of the 'open borders' and moved to the countries that abolished work permits were, for the first time in their lives, confronting multicultural societies. At the initial stage of the large wave of migration from Poland after 2004, there was a high level of optimism amongst Polish politicians and media, predicting that those migrants would gain valuable experience when working abroad, and come back to their homeland as cosmopolitan citizens adding to Polish economic and cultural development. The study conducted in Northern Ireland in 2007/2008 consisting of 30 in-depth interviews with Polish immigrants, revealed however, that paradoxically, the experience of migration catalyzed in a large group of Polish workers the strategy of dividing different aspects of everyday life into typically Polish and Northern Irish. Hence, they have not converted themselves into the members of the European society, but instead, they made a large effort in preserving their links to Poland, in some practices simultaneously developing connection to Northern Irish in the others. This type of behavior will, in the forthcoming paper, be termed as bi-national practices, when some activities are aimed at maintaining ties with Poland- inter alia getting a medical treatment in Poland, watching exclusively Polish television and participation in solely Polish cultural events- whilst the others were merely associated with Northern Ireland- mainly those associated with Northern Irish labor market and searching for accommodation in the areas where no other Polish people live. The advancing technology, especially in communications and transport, has an inevitable effect on the enlarging of the spectrum of the service providers for migrants, enabling them to evaluate and chose the most suitable options. However, in the case of Polish immigrants it is interesting to disclose the motives underlying the decisions of the division of different aspects of life into Polish and Northern Irish and that is what the proposed paper will be intending to present.

Re-Localization of Conflict Dynamics: "Conflict-generated Diaspora Groups and the Transportation of Homeland Conflicts to Western Europe", A Focus the Kurdish- Turkish Immigrants

Baser, Bahar

*Political and Social Sciences, European University Institute
San Domenico di Fiesole (FI), Italy*

Keywords

Diaspora, Second and Third Generation Migrants, long-distance nationalism, level of integration

Today inevitably as a result of violent conflicts in many parts of the world, high levels of transnational migration flows will continue for the foreseeable future and will keep giving occasion to the emergence of new diaspora groups or fostering the already existing ones.

It is eminent that conflicts compel people to migrate and, ironically enough, conflicts tend to migrate with people as well. Accordingly, immigrants belonging different parties of a conflict actually find themselves in the same country or region in the end and form their own diasporic communities there. Since in most of the cases, "leaving homeland" does not necessarily include "an emotional goodbye", diaspora groups have a tendency to affiliate themselves with the politics of both homeland and the hostland, especially if there is a conflict situation at home. Therefore they keep reproducing the already existing homeland conflict dynamics in their country of residence and cause the re-localization of the disputes. In this context, understanding why the liberal environment in the hostland does not lead to more moderate groups rather than marginalized long distance nationalists is essential. My focus is on the second and third generation migrants who are born in the hotland, do not have a prospect of going back to the homeland but still get involved actively in the issues related to homeland conflicts.

Examples: Kurds and Turks in Germany, Sri Lankan Tamils and Sinhalese in Norway.

In this context, my paper will focus on the transportation of conflicts to Western Europe, by diasporas and mainly on the relations between the groups which come from the opposing sides of the story. Simply, I would like to look at the questions of: "How and in what ways do the diaspora groups from opposing sides of the conflict establish relations with each other in Western Europe?" "What is the impact of the Western European hostland's political environment on the re-localization of conflicts?" The aim is to come up with a coherent analysis of trans-state loyalties of the diaspora groups by exploring the conflict-generated diaspora groups' behavior towards each other by the help of case studies.

Receiving Fantasy and Refugee Dream: Reception of Asylum Seekers in Sweden and Italy

Wettergren, Åsa

Department of Social Studies, Karlstad University Karlstad, Sweden

Keywords

emotions, Sweden, Italy, asylum seekers, migration regime

What are the differences and similarities between Swedish and Italian asylum reception and introduction practices? This study explores how two sharply contrasting migration regimes can be experienced by the local frontline workers and by asylum seekers from East Africa. A theoretical point of departure is to try to capture the emotional aspects of these experiences and the ways that emotions are dealt with by frontline workers and asylum seekers.

During 2006 through 2007 ethnographically inspired observations and qualitative semi-structured interviews were conducted at two locations; one reception/introduction and accommodation centre in North Italy; and at one introductory course and an accommodation centre in mid-west Sweden.

The results show that frontline workers in both cases frame their activities in terms of limited resources and their interactions with asylum seekers in terms of cultural differences that warrant a certain degree of control and discipline. The integrating mission tends to be shaped by normative ideals, aiming at integration into the society that "would be" rather than the society that "is". This receiving fantasy conflicts with the motivation of the asylum seeker to find a job and realize the dream of "a normal life" - a dream that may even be counteracted by the introduction process. From the perspective of the frontline workers the asylum seekers' dream is ignorant and simplistic. In addition, workers strive to integrate the asylum seekers into the nation state but from the asylum seeker's perspective the host nation may be contingent and secondary to the dream of a normal life. The conflict is girded by emotions such as anger, disappointment, and shame at both sides. Given the structurally asymmetrical relationship between workers and asylum seekers, emotions are managed and expressed differently. Frontline workers withdraw behind "a professional attitude" prescribing a detached form of engagement whereas asylum seekers embody "the humiliated habitus" struggling to cope with despair while maintaining hope.

Comparison between the two cases raises questions about the prevailing construct of European identity vs "the others"; about the role of emotion in integration; and about the micro level consequences of a converging migration and asylum policy in the EU.

Regionalization of Social Work: Is there a way to reconcile national integration policy with transnational everyday worlds?

Watarai, Tomoko

Sociology, University of Munich Muenchen, Germany

Keywords

Integration, inclusion, Exclusion, Regionalization, immigrants

Integration of immigrants increasingly becomes a central issue in social policies worldwide. However, its discourse seems to lack an appropriate distinction between two different aspects of integration: a formal (i.e. political and legal) integration on the one hand and an integration experienced by migrants in their transnational everyday worlds on the other hand. The former is ensured mostly by nation-states giving the right to vote and/or permanent residence. The latter relates to migrants' cultural identity and self-contentment in local communities and doesn't necessarily accompany the former one.

This paper highlights the discrepancy of these two types of integration and seeks to establish a conceptual framework to grasp the interpretative aspect of social integration.

Firstly, I review - referring to Durkheim, Parsons and Marshall - the modern sociological understanding of "the social" and point out a basic assumption which today's social policies seems to have in common: shared values and norms as the very condition of the social cohesion. Then I take up Luhmann's concepts "inclusion-dividuality" and "exclusion-individuality" in order to address the question of comprehending "the social" without individual loyalty to generalized norms and values as social bondage.

Applying Luhmann's concepts to the analysis of success and failure in recent communal integration policies in Munich, finally, I illustrate the practice of making societies from the bottom as well as its dynamics operating between different perspectives on integration.

Service, intimacy, subjection: three forms of work relationships in the domestic service sector

Colombo, Asher D.

Education, Università di Bologna

Bologna, Italy

Keywords

international migration, sociology of work, care workers, Family

In recent decades, in some areas of Europe, the domestic service had almost disappeared. The aging of population, the growth of female employment, the weakness of the welfare state in some parts of Europe are just some of the factors that have caused a growing demand for waged domestic service. As happened in other countries of the Mediterranean Europe - but not exclusively - in Italy this workforce was supplied mostly by foreign women from Eastern Europe, Latin America, Asia. But what changes in the forms of domestic relationships has caused this massive entry of women (and men) in the homes of foreign families?

Based on one major databases consisting of 650 extensive life stories of care and domestic workers of both sexes and of many emigration countries, the paper strives to reconstruct a part of the picture. Among the peculiarities of the sources used should be noted that the first two databases include information both on legal and illegal foreign residents.

The analysis shows that we can single out three major forms of work relationships based on the pure supply of service, the intimacy with the employers or with the cared people or both, and the subjection of the employees to the employers.

Sources of disadvantage in occupational transition of immigrants in the Spanish labour market

Stanek, Mikolaj

*Sociologia II (Ecología Humana y Población), Complutense University of Madrid
Madrid, Spain*

Veira Ramos, Alberto

Institut für Soziologie, Georg-August Universität Göttingen Göttingen, Germany

Keywords

Immigration, Spain, labour market, occupational mobility

Large empirical evidence from different geographical and social context shows that immigrants tend to experience U-shaped pattern of occupational mobility. In other words, the migration often implies initial occupational downgrading followed by gradual improvement with the passage of time in the host country. Chiswick, Lee and Miller observed that the depth of the initial occupational downgrading varies by characteristics of immigrants' skills, and its transferability to the host country context. Other authors state that the clustering in low-income and low status occupation should be attributed to the fact that the newly arrived immigrants are highly dependent on social resources. On the other hand, the hypothesis of the selective discrimination of immigrant from certain origins could also be considered. Finally, increasing/decreasing disadvantages faced by the immigrants in the first job after arrival could be attributed to the changing conditions of the receiving country's labour market.

This paper examines the hypothetical sources of the newly arrived immigrants' occupational disadvantage in the Spanish labour market. The main question we address is: which ethnic, social and demographic profiles are more prone to occupational downgrading? The empirical analysis is based on data from recently released data from the Spanish National Immigrant Survey (Encuesta Nacional de Inmigrantes - ENI) carried out in 2007 which includes information of around 15.000 individuals. ENI data set includes information on pre-immigration occupation, the first occupation in Spain and several data on immigrants' characteristics such as (a) educational and skills level, (b) sex, (c) region of origin, (d) year of migration to Spain, (d) social networks on arrival. In our study we compare the first occupation in Spain with the last job in the country of origin in order to identify patterns of occupational mobility. Subsequently, logistic regression models are used to estimate the odds of occupational downgrading. We test several hypotheses that includes above mentioned sets of variables in order to identify the strongest predictors of decline on the occupational scale.

The Age Dimension of European Immigration: A New Challenge for European Societies?

Barbulescu, Roxana

*Political and Social Sciences, European University Institute
Fiesole, FI, Italy*

Keywords

European immigration, convergence, aging societies, age discrimination

European societies are increasingly aging societies. However, aging societies debate has failed to consider that contemporaneous European societies are immigration societies. This paper addresses the age distribution(s) of immigrants in Europe and suggests that there are clear cut cleavages among the immigrants' age groups. Moreover, contrary to the immigration tradition and policies of the member states, across Europe the age of the immigrants converges towards young adult age. Employing Eurostat data, the paper shows that despite the European non-discrimination legislation and, in addition to the age discrimination on the labour market, immigration into Europe has significant negative age dimension. Overall, half of the immigrants are under 29 years of age and only 11 % are age 50 or over. The median age of total reported migration in 15 EU member states was 28.8 years old, for the return nationals it reached 30.3, and for EU citizens was 29.9, meanwhile for non-EU citizens it was only 27.7 years old. For the last citizenship group, there are three years of difference with the returning nationals and one and a half years difference with EU citizens. Thus, the findings show that as immigration is more formally regulated, the age of the immigrants decreases. The paper finds that, on one hand, this is due to the policies of admission (family reunification, student visa and guest worker programs) negatively select on age; on the other hand, the paper claims that in the absence of a protective system against discrimination acting at the international level, age is regarded as a proxy for welfare dependency and low productivity. The age discrimination at admission also generates unintended social consequences such as failure in reuniting families with grandparents who could contribute to childcare and increase fertility among immigrants. It also generates severe unbalancing between the working population and the elderly and the children i.e. the most vulnerable categories in home societies. Consequently, the work recommends the introduction of a weighted quota system for aged immigrants in Europe. The results support an agenda for a better understanding of the "fuzzy logic" of immigration patterns in increasingly convergent European society.

The networks of foreign immigrants in Italy

Conti, Cinzia

*DCIS, Istat
Rome, Italy*

Guarneri, Antonella

*DCIS, Istat
Rome, Italy*

Tucci, Enrico

*DCIS, Istat
Rome, Italy*

Keywords

international migration, social network analysis, internal mobility

The present study exploiting network analysis techniques aims to describe the ties existing between origin and destination geographical areas.

The analysis of internal and international migratory flows is based on the data collection of changes of residence.

We apply the method of social network analysis (SNA), a technique for visualizing, describing and analyzing a system of relations. SNA has developed a number of indicators that focus on the relationships between the nodes, the centrality of the node in the network, the distance between nodes.

In a first step we focus on international mobility that has so radically transformed the map of countries of origin and destination of migratory flows over recent years. In the case of the foreigners' international migration flows the countries of origin are identified as "sending nodes" and the local Italian areas are identified as "receiving nodes".

In a second step to study the foreigners' internal mobility we consider local Italian areas as nodes.

The big cities, such as Rome and Milan, are no longer the areas that mostly attract immigrants. Many small centres, in the dynamic north of the country, play a very relevant role as destination of internal migration flows of foreigners.

The analysis underlines the difference in the networks of the various communities. Migration dynamics seem to be deeply determined by the presence and the functioning of a variety of networks at different levels of aggregation. Migration networks can be defined as "groups of social ties" formed on the basis of kinship, friendship and common origin. They link migrants and non-migrants together in a system of reciprocal obligations and mutual expectations. Networks bring about the cumulative causation of migration because every new migrant reduces the costs of migration for a group of non-migrants, thereby inducing some of them to migrate, creating new network ties to the destination area for another group of people, some of whom are also induced to migrate, creating more network ties, and so on [Massey, 1990].

The political development of origin and host countries: Democratic contributions of the transnational associations' movement

Capmdepadros, Roger

State Law and Sociology, UNIVERSITY OF MALAGA MALAGA, SPAIN

Santa Cruz, Iñaki

Economía de la Empresa, UNIVERSITAT AUTÒNOMA DE BARCELONA SABADELL, SPAIN

Serradell, Olga

*Sociology, UNIVERSITAT AUTÒNOMA DE BARCELONA
BELLATERRA (BARCELONA), SPAIN*

Keywords

democratisation, multicultural societies, transnational associations', transnationalism

The phenomenon of transnationality is acquiring greater significance in Europe but especially in Spanish society. The contributions of the immigrant population to the economic and political development of origin and host countries is being analysed through the R+D project entitled "TRANSMIGRA: The analysis of processes of Moroccan, Ecuadorian and Romanian economic and political transnationality. Migration as a development factor in origin and host countries" (2005-2008).

This paper takes part of the TRANSMIGRA fieldwork and focuses on the analysis of the participation of the immigrant population in associations from the host country which are linked to associations in the country of origin. Some of the contributions of the immigrant population to the host and origin societies can involve going deeper into the processes of democratisation which the countries of origin are immersed in. On the other hand, they can lead to an improvement in democracy in the host countries as multicultural societies.

The Social Capital of Romanian Migrants: Social Networks, Trust and Association

Mihai, Ioana-Alexandra

Sociology, University of Bucharest

Bucharest, Romania

Keywords

Migration, Social Networks, social capital

Romanians' migration for work started in the nineties and has grown to an estimated number of more than two million people living abroad at the present time, especially in Italy and Spain. Romanians are concentrated in some regions of these countries and, within these regions, in some cities and villages, the latter being mainly a consequence of the migrants' use of social networks.

This paper uses quantitative and qualitative data gathered during fieldwork in Romania, Spain and Italy between 2006 and 2008. It focuses on the way migrants use their social networks in order to get along in the country of destination and it describes the connections they keep with Romania, as well as the connections to people of other nationalities, especially those from the country of destination. It furthermore explores the new community-like structures that arise in Romanian communities from the Madrid region, as an illustration of the way migrants' social capital is shaped by living in another country.

Transnational immigrant religions in Europe: Muslim's links to their home countries

Alvarez-Miranda, Berta

*Sociology III, Complutense University Madrid
Madrid, Spain*

Keywords

Immigration, religion, transnationalism

Religious belonging is one among the multiple allegiances of immigrants in Europe; for some of them, religion is the basis of a deeply felt identity, overarching racial and national identities, and conditioning social relationships both in the host society and with the home country. The last three decades have witnessed an intense public debate over the growing presence of Islam in Europe, an issue that has become particularly salient after events of open conflict in different countries, at different points in time. But Christian denominations other than those major in each country are also thriving, including Eastern Orthodox ones, together with Judaism, Buddhism and Hinduism. With a special emphasis on Islam, but considering other religious traditions too, this paper looks at the different ways in which this new religious pluralism is being accommodated in Western Europe, and the different ways in which immigrants relate to their transnational religious communities.

Transnational living? The trade-off between sending remittances and integrating in the host society: data and reflections based on the NEPIA survey

Rinken, Sebastian

Institute of Advanced Social Studies (IESA) // Permanent Migration Observatory of Andalusia (OPAM), Spanish Council for Scientific Research (CSIC) Sevilla, Spain

Keywords

transnationalism, Remittances, social integration, Time of Residence, Priorities

In recent years, an increasing body of research has evolved regarding the cross-national nature of many international migrants' social networks and practices. While clearly addressing a relevant topic, the research literature on "transnationalism" has at times sampled on the dependent variable or even focused deliberately on specific segments of the migrant population, thus raising doubts as to the real-world relevance of cross-border networking.

This paper analyzes survey data (N=1800) collected in Andalusia (Spain) among international migrants from five different geopolitical areas of origin (Magreb, Subsaharian Africa, Eastern Europe, Latin America and Asia) with a view to assessing the relevance and sustainability of what arguably is the most significant transnational practice in practical terms, i.e. sending remittances. The survey was conducted in 2003 in the framework of the NEPIA study (Needs of the immigrant population in Andalusia), co-financed by the Regional Government of Andalusia and the European Social Fund.

Our results contradict received wisdom on the topic, pointing as they do to a substantial reduction of remittance sending among those immigrants that have advanced most in terms of integration in the host society (length of stay; socio-economic attainment). Indeed, in general terms, our data imply that remittance sending behavior takes the shape of an inverted U, with a first period characterized by insufficient resources, a second period marked by relatively wide-spread and intense remittance sending and the third, by an equally marked decline. Remarkably, that decline seems to occur already after a few years of stay in the host country, far earlier than the existing research literature would suggest.

These results may be interpreted as evidence of shifting priorities. To the degree to which immigrants form or re-assemble a family and adopt some of the host society's dominant patterns of behavior, including namely consumption patterns, the needs of other family members appear prone to recede in terms of perceived priorities. If confirmed by other studies, this finding could spell bad news for the prospect of converting remittance flows into a mainstay of economic "co-development", but good news for the process of social integration in Europe.

Turkish migrants and native Germans compared: The effect of inter-ethnic and intra-ethnic friendships on the transition from unemployment to work

Lancee, Bram

*Political and social Sciences, European University Institute
San Domenico di Fiesole, Italy*

Hartung, Anne

Institute of Social and Political Opinion Research (ISPO), K.U. Leuven Leuven, Belgium

Keywords

Germany, social capital, transition to work, unemployment duration, Turkish migrants

In many European countries, certain groups of migrants are more frequently, and longer unemployed than native residents. One of the factors affecting labour market outcomes is the social capital a person holds. Especially ties bridging between different networks is found to contribute to achieve success on the labour market. However, it is not clear from the pertinent literature to what extent bridging social capital also affects the duration of unemployment. Moreover, there is not much known about whether the effects of bridging social capital are different for immigrants and native residents.

Comparing Turkish and native residents in Germany, we investigate in this paper to what extent social capital can help reducing the duration of unemployment. More specifically, we analyse whether having inter-ethnic and/or intra-ethnic friendships can be associated with shorter unemployment duration. With data from the German Socio-Economic Panel Survey (GOSOEP) we estimate an event history model and find that for native Germans, intra-ethnic friendships lower unemployment duration, whereas inter-ethnic friendships do not. For Turks, inter-ethnic friendships reduce the unemployment duration, whereas intra-ethnic friendships do not. In other words, only having German friends facilitates the transition to employment, for both Turks and Germans, but in particular for the first generation Turkish migrants.

Visible/Invisible: Chinese Diaspora in the Republic of Ireland

Wang, Ying Yun

Department of Sociology, Trinity College Dublin, Republic of Ireland

Keywords

identity, Diaspora, chinese migrants

The different experiences and hybrid identities of the different waves of Chinese migrants in the Republic of Ireland are problematised in this paper. It focused particularly the pre-Celtic Tiger and the post-Celtic Tiger waves of Chinese migration. Ireland only became a country of net immigration after the unprecedented economic boom of the Celtic Tiger in the mid-1990s. Even though Ireland is not a country for Chinese migration traditionally, Chinese migrants were already a significant presence pre-Celtic Tiger (approximately 1000 Chinese migrants in 1986). In the late 1950s and early 60s, earlier Chinese migrants moved to the Republic of Ireland from Northern Ireland and UK, mostly originating from Hong Kong. The population of Chinese migrants increased significantly in 2001 onwards (some estimates were of 5816 Chinese migrants in 2006 from 1493 in 2000). Most of those Chinese migrants came directly from mainland China.

Chinese migrants in Ireland are not a homogeneous group and are diversified in relations to age, gender, place of origins in China (urban or rural setting), occupation and their legal status. Even though Chinese migrants are numerically a significant presence, the 2006 Census indicated that the Chinese were the fourth largest ethnicity minority group after the Polish, the Lithuanian and the Nigerian. The Chinese migrants remain an invisible group as they are largely homogenized. There are only four official Chinese migrants-oriented reports from various NGOs so far which were all published after 2002. The Chinese students are those reports' main research target, while there is little attention on earlier Chinese migrants and the Chinese migrant workers. However, the Chinese migrants have been set up as "multicultural representations" during the Chinese New Year Celebration by the Dublin City Council in 2007 and 2008.

This paper will also consider how the different waves/groups of Chinese migrants have different phases of setting down in Ireland and they have different sense of belonging in relation to both China and Ireland. This is what I theorise as a "Chinese Diaspora in Ireland" because the Diaspora is a journey of "setting down and putting roots elsewhere" which cross the "geographical and mental borders".

Well-being of ethnic minority pupils in Flanders

Lenaers, Steven

Applied Economics, Hasselt University Diepenbeek, Belgium

Keywords

education, ethnic minority, well-being

Most research in the field of education focuses on the impact of certain factors on individual study performance. Studies on education and ethnicity therefore mainly focus on the gap between ethnic minority and ethnic majority school performance. This research project however will focus on differences in well-being at school between ethnic majority and minority pupils. Research clearly indicates that performance and well-being at school are mutually dependent. The PISA 2003 study showed that the largest gap in mathematics performance in the world exists in Belgium. Since ethnic pupils tend to perform less well at school, it is expected that they will feel less well at school than non-ethnic pupils. But looking at existing research, they hardly do. Why is this?

To answer this question a quantitative design was used. The research project collected survey data from 7087 pupils from eight secondary schools in Flanders. The written questionnaire was completed by the pupils in the classroom. The questions were all part of a number of scales on well-being in general or in a particular area of school education: school level, class level, pressure and learning programme, friendship, behaviour, parental involvement, choice of curriculum. Ethnic origin was measured both by birth country of the ancestors and by mother tongue. In this way differences in well-being between ethnic groups can be established by generation, by country of origin and by native tongue.

Analysis uncovered a limited but significant difference in general well-being between ethnic majority and ethnic minority pupils. But rather than a direct ethnic influence, this difference appears as the consequence of weak performances and an orientation towards technical and vocational education among ethnic minority pupils. Behind this limited difference in general well-being a number of hidden processes emerge. Ethnic pupils tend to feel less well as to the more academic aspects of school life but they feel better as to a number of social aspects. Here some ethnic influences emerge. So ethnic pupils barely feel worse at school in general but they feel differently.

Why Do "Good" People Think That Immigrants are "Bad"?

Pichler, Florian

*Department of Sociology, University of Surrey
Guildford, United Kingdom*

Keywords

Anti-foreign sentiment, cross-national comparative analysis, European Social Survey, Immigration, xenophobia

Media and academic research on attitudes towards immigrants suggest that anti-foreigner sentiments are part of everyday life in many European countries and become more and more presentable in all sorts of contexts, including politics. The causes of xenophobia, though very complex, are often identified in political orientations (e.g. leaning towards the far-right, authoritarian "minds") and personal experiences (for instance, fears about social security) in the literature. Nevertheless, we know rather little about perceptions of the more specific perceived "harm" done to society by immigrants. Furthermore, it is not clear whether only "bad" people are against foreigners, where bad usually refers to right-wing party voters, holders of anti-democratic views or those opposing equality and integration. But what about anti-immigrant sentiments in general as these views become more widespread? Here, we also set out to portray "good" people and their views with respect to anti-immigrant sentiments. Are they so much different? Using data from Round 3 of the European Social Survey, we offer a study differentiating between the perceived impact of immigrants on economy and culture on an overall assessment of the consequences of immigration for the "host country". Applying multilevel regression techniques, the cross-national comparative analysis explores a series of objective and subjective determinants of anti-foreigner sentiment. We tentatively conclude that xenophobia is not an attitude of only "bad" people any longer but that the "immigrants are bad" belief is widespread across a large number of European countries.

RS05

Historical Sociology

Electronic ID Cards in the Societies of Control

Topak, Ozgun Erdener

*Sociology, Middle East Technical University
Ankara, Turkey*

Keywords

Deleuze, Foucault, Governmentality, Identity Cards, Surveillance

The establishment of electronic ID cards is a point of major controversies throughout the world, especially in Europe. These high-tech cards usually contain biometric information and are linked to national searchable databases which enable the authorities to sort and categorize people continuously and which consequently increase the pressure on the disadvantaged groups greatly.

However, neither the identification documents nor the desire to categorize people are new. That is the reason why the emergence of electronic ID cards should be analyzed from a historical perspective by means of taking into account the continuities as well as discontinuities in the rationalities of the state and the type of subjectivities that are linked to these rationalities.

Following Foucauldian genealogical path, in this paper, firstly the emergence of identification practices will be discussed with an emphasis on the relations between the modern state, surveillance and modern conceptions of subjectivity. The works of such theorists as Giddens, Dandeker, Torpey, Caplan, Noiriel, Hacking, Higgs et al. will be used to provide a history of ID cards as tools of governance.

In the second part, the continuities and discontinuities of rule in terms of ID cards will be discussed with reference to the Deleuze's society of control in which the transformations in capitalism and the changing composition of nation-states with the globalization will also be emphasized. Combining the works of such contemporary surveillance theorists as Lyon, Haggerty, Ericson, Walters, Bigo, Bogard et. al. with those of neoliberal governmentality scholars such as Rose, Dean, Gordon, Lemke, Ong et. al., it will be argued that electronic ID cards emerge as perfect tools of governance in the society of control in the sense that they secure the places of those who conduct themselves in a neoliberal way (active, self-enterprising subjects) from the presence of those who are failed to do so (growing hordes of immigrants, third world proletariats, welfare dependants) by means of tying the exercising of citizenship to a legitimate database record. In that sense, this paper also aims to contribute to the debates on whether EU is sincere in its call for the integration of different groups.

Paradoxical turns and changing horizons. Notes on the current landscape of the project of a cohesive Europe

Vando, Borghi

*Dept. of Sociology, University of Bologna
Bologna, Italy*

Keywords

Publicness, individualisation, welfare capitalism

Metamorphoses of the European project have to be understood in the broader dynamics of welfare capitalism that characterizes its historical development. The paper focuses on two social and institutional key-elements of that project. On the one hand, individualisation, as social process and ideal project; on the other hand, publicness, as fundamental characteristic of the institutional programme, on which was concretely based the individualisation project itself. But (welfare Eu) capitalism has dramatically changed in the recent history. The "new spirit of capitalism", based on network models of organization that have been increasingly applied not only in the labour and market spheres of social life, but also in public life as well as in the area of social policies (through the so called passage from government to governance), is associated to emerging grammars of justification, orders of evaluation, modes of individual engagement into the socioeconomic.

The emerging of these new grammars of justification, that is that motivational resources through which apparently only economic action can be constantly reproduced, is strictly interwoven with a paradoxical turn that crucial factors for the European project - individualisation, publicness - have been undergoing and that produced a structural metamorphoses of their concrete meaning. Considering that social reality is never linear and monolithic, what are the grammars of justification working in this new context? What "moral economies" are emerging? Beyond its power of appealing, what does concretely mean a network society based on imperatives of active connectedness and which new fields of tension it raises?

The paper deeply develops and inquiry these aspects, drawing supporting signs and signals supporting the interpretations advanced mainly from labour market and social policies and matters.

Social desintegration in the long-term: the possibility of decivilising processes

Ampudia, Fernando

*Departamento de História, Instituto de História Contemporânea-Universidade Nova de Lisboa
Lisbon, Portugal*

Keywords

civilizing processes, decivilisation, Norbert Elias, historical sociology

The aim of this paper is to offer a general perspective on the concept of decivilisation. This analysis is carried out in the framework of the civilization process theory defined by Norbert Elias. According to the author, social processes develop within a tension balance of centripetal-centrifugal forces that drive to major or minor levels of social integration. Decivilisation as a social process in the long term implies a process of social disintegration maintained over the centuries. In fact, this kind of process is a disturbing possibility for sociology. Sociology appeared to examine how and why society is maintained and increases its complexity: traditionally, the issue of social integration has been one of the main theoretical problems of the discipline. The concept of decivilisation suggests an interesting theoretical possibility but in an opposite direction: social disintegration as a process in the long term involves a significant reduction of complexity, a fall in the levels of interdependence and transformations in behaviour related to an increase of social constraints.

The Emergence of Agriculture - Review of Recent Research

Muukkonen, Martti

Cultural Studies, University of Joensuu Joensuu, Finland

Keywords

prehistory, theory, Agriculture

The Classical theory of V. Gordon Childe states that agriculture was born due to the Neolithic revolution that emerged in Near East some 11-10,000 years ago. New data shows, however, that it was rather a long process than a revolution.

First evidence of utilisation of wild crops comes from Levant some 15.000 years ago. With the cooling of the climate during the Younger Dryad people returned to moving hunter-gatherer lifestyle. When the climate again warmed, people started again utilise wild crops. This started the slow try and error domestication process when the new skill spread from Jordan Valley to the rest of the Fertile Crescent. First marks of irrigation agriculture are from the Samarra culture in Mesopotamia circa 5,000 BC and after thousand years it was widely utilised.

Theoretically, there is disagreement why this happened. Competing theories claim for environmental stress, social factors and biological symbiosis. One of the major problems is that hunter-gatherers were better fed and got their food easier than agriculturalists. So why to make life more difficult? In this paper I review existing data on the birth of agriculture and existing theories that explain this data.

Welfare beyond Society - What can we learn from the past?

Eigmüller, Monika

*Sociology, University of Leipzig
Leipzig, Germany*

Keywords

Social Policy, Solidarity, nation state

In the course of the progressing political integration of Europe, the question of social integration and thus, development perspectives of a European society both in science and in politics becomes increasingly relevant.

The presentation will deal with this question and enter this discussion with the objective of examining the conditions for the constitution of a European social policy. As the current scientific debate shows, the development of European instruments for the reduction of individual social differences, thus a European welfare state, appears unrealistic: As one of the main reasons the absence of any basic precondition, mainly a uniform willingness for European solidarity is mentioned.

Interestingly, parallels to the historical development of the modern national welfare states and their preconditions are drawn. However, the fact that the national constitution of the welfare state too, was the result of a political process which at its beginning was not developed on a community based principle of mutual solidarity is being overlooked. This development at the end of the 19th century was rather the response to the overall social crises caused by industrialisation and the emerging labour problems; it was a political project to link nation, state and economy. However, the question arises, how did it transpire that the nation state emerged as the framework for the stabilisation of social relations at the time? How did this integration of society into a national framework take place? And how could the principle of territorial fixation eventually develop a category of action that defined social affiliation and therefore, institutionalised the practice of solidarity within the community?

These are by no means questions of only historical interest. I suggest that they form the basis to solve the question of the prospective shape of the European Union and its underlying society.

So the question is: Can we learn from history? And what answers can be given to the special case of the emergence of a European social policy without a European society?

RS06

Maritime Sociology

From Cardiff Docklands to Europe's Most Ambitious and Exciting Waterfront Development: Social and Economic Restructuring in Cardiff's Waterfront

Gonçalves, Ana

English Language and Culture (ESHTE), English Studies (Faculty of Letters, University of Lisbon), Estoril Higher Institute for Tourism and Hotel Studies (ESHTE) and PhD Student at the Faculty of Letters, University of Lisbon Portugal,

Keywords

Urban Regeneration, Social and Economic Restructuring, Waterfront Revitalisation, Cardiff

Cardiff's waterfront, worldwide known as Cardiff Bay, in the capital city of Wales, in the UK, has been undergoing important economic and social changes. Intensive urban regeneration in the Bay has led to the development of new service-based economic activities, to a process of waterfront gentrification and to the appearance of new forms of entertainment and consumption that have been responding to the demands of a new social and economic class at the Bay.

Once a leading world port city in coal exportation and home to one of the most ethnically diverse communities, Cardiff's docklands faced their decline through a process of deindustrialisation, especially after the Second World War, following the trend of many other European and American port cities. The abandonment of the docks and the consequent growth of unemployment have influenced the city government to outline the first regeneration strategies for the revitalisation of the city's waterfront.

The first changes in the docklands took place in what used to be the centre of Butetown, Cardiff's multiethnic neighbourhood, with the construction of high-tower apartment blocks, replacing the two-storey houses that existed in the area. Further regeneration projects were developed, especially after the creation of the Cardiff Bay Development Corporation in 1987, which became responsible for the regeneration strategy implemented in the Bay and for the construction of one of Cardiff's most polemic projects, the Cardiff Bay Barrage, that provided the docklands with a freshwater lake and a completely new waterfront landscape. Therefore, capitalising on the attractiveness of the water environment, new flagship buildings were projected and historical ones revitalised and devoted to leisure, culture, sports and consumption.

Impelled by these changes, a process of gentrification has been taking place in the Bay and new waterfront residential complexes have been emerging in the form of CCTV surveilled luxury apartments in gated communities. These new residential areas aim at attracting a new social and economic class that is characterised by its members' economic activities, by their consumption patterns and by the cultural and outdoor recreational activities that they look for near the area where they work and reside.

Growing up in a seafaring family: recollecting one's childhood with an absent and present father

Heikell, Thomas

*Department of Sociology, Åbo Akademi University
Åbo, Finland*

Keywords

sons, Seamen, normality, narratives, absent father

When we get to hear about everyday life in seafaring or maritime families we usually hear the voices of the women - the wives, the live-in partners - and in some cases the men - the seafarers, the sailors - but seldom the voices of those who are "forced" to live in a seafaring family, in other words, the children. The aim of my ongoing doctoral study is to give a voice to the adult sons of seafarers, letting them recollect their childhood and upbringing in a family characterized by a recurrently absent and present father. How do they portray the everyday life in their childhood families? How do they look back upon their relationship with the father? What memories, what events and incidents, do they see as important and worth mentioning? What kind of narratives unfolds?

The material consists of 20 semi-structured interviews with men, aged between 26 and 51. The occupational positions of the fathers are both ordinary seamen as well as officers. The length of the periods of absence has varied from a couple of weeks up to almost a year, depending on the type of ship and route.

The study has its theoretical background in the discussion about family practices (Morgan 1996) and displaying family (Finch 2007). The concept of family practices presupposes that contemporary families are not defined through 'being family' but through 'doing family things', something Finch wants to nuance by arguing that families need to be 'displayed' as well as done. To display family is in her view a process in which individuals try to convey the family character of their individual actions and thus placing them under the category of family relationships. In the case of the men interviewed this is mainly argued through talk of normality - it was normal to have an absent father - even if a closer examination reveals a more complex and vivid reality, partly because of the fact that the majority of respondents have become seafarers themselves.

History and future perspectives of Maritime Sociology

Kowalewski, Maciej

*Institute of Sociology, University of Szczecin
Szczecin, Poland*

Bryniewicz, Wioleta

*Institute of Sociology, University of Szczecin
Szczecin, Poland*

Kolodziej-Durnas, Agnieszka

*Institute of Sociology, University of Szczecin
Szczecin, Poland*

Stasieniuk, Zaneta

*Institute of Sociology, University of Szczecin
Szczecin, Poland*

Keywords

sociology, maritime, cities, port, subdisciplines

The aim of our work is to present the roots and possible future perspectives of maritime sociology. The unique nature of this subdiscipline will be shown by history of maritime sociology in Poland, and abroad.

The emergence of the subject areas and research of this subdiscipline will be discussed. Searching for its own theoretical identity, being an "enclave" among others subjects of sociology and finally a general trend in social sciences to interdisciplinary - all these factors make difficult clear and consistent definition of the maritime sociology. Researching the port city is the perfect example of the dilemmas that we want to discuss. The main topics of port town studies (e.g. port city as an cultural idea, globalizing port cities) are also the main points of interest of maritime sociology. The aim of our further studies is to draw the portrait of the maritime sociology and recognize its place within social sciences - both in Poland and abroad. Currently, we are in the organization of existing research in this field. Our research project is also meta-sociological as maritime sociology is the field, where the struggle for individuality and uniqueness of each sociological discipline can be perceived.

Legal framework and organizational structure of P&I Clubs

Pazarzis, Michalis

Maritime Studies, University of Pireus

Pireus, Greece

Keywords

Protection & Indemnity Clubs, Marine Insurance, Claims of Marine Insurance, Clauses of Marine Insurance

Part of the protection of maritime companies and their employees was entrusted to P and I Clubs due to the fact that insurance companies either denied or could not undertake all the risks. Therefore, P & I Clubs were established because of the interest and the participatory actions of ship-owners.

This presentation is a critical analysis of the existing legal framework and the organizational structure of P & I Clubs. It presents the problems encountered by the interested parties and makes propositions for the improvement of the legal framework in order to meet the needs occurring from the various activities of maritime enterprises.

Social conditions of transformations in port cities

Michalak, Andrzej

*Instytut Socjologii, Uniwersytet Szczeciński
Szczecin, Poland*

Misiak, Władysław

Instytut Profilaktyki Społecznej i Resocjalizacji, Uniwersytet Warszawski Warszawa, Poland

Kozłowska, Urszula

*Instytut Socjologii, Uniwersytet Szczeciński
Szczecin, Poland*

Keywords

port cities, life style, transformation

New technologies and economic transformation cause crucial social changes in the contemporary port cities. First of all, typical jobs connected with the service of sea institutions such as harbours, shipyards, fishing and the fish processing industry have changed and broadened. Employment possibilities in different fields increase as well. Tourism develops and specific cultural institutions are founded, such as museums and exhibitions which do not happen in cities of a different type. The disappearance of the function of the port in many cities is a separate social problem.

The transformations shown, influence the social structure of port cities and the specific life style of their inhabitants.

Several analyses of representative port cities will serve as an example to introduce the ways of utilizing the potential occurrence of social transformation for positive development and avoiding social pathology.

The Quota Hopping Case: Common Fisheries Policy between Market and Law

Coelho, Manuel

Economia, SOCIUS/ISEG/UTL

Lisboa, PORTUGAL

Filipe, José António

Departamento Métodos Quantitativos, UNIDE/ISCTE

Lisboa, PORTUGAL

M. Ferreira, Manuel Alberto

Departamento Métodos Quantitativos, UNIDE/ISCTE

Lisboa, PORTUGAL

Keywords

uncertainty, Common Fisheries Policy, Quota-hopping, "Free Establishment", "Relative Stability"

The "Relative Stability" shapes the Common Fisheries Policy. This principle prevents the effect of uncertainty in the stocks evolution and guaranties the member states a more or less sustainable division of quotas between member-states.

The objective is to establish the equilibrium between the promotion of efficiency, in the long run, and socio-economic stability in the coastal areas, in the short term.

This fixed formula of quotas distribution between member-states reflects the fact that European fishermen representation is still linked to national and local communities.

But this territorial logic is in perfect contradiction with the development conditions of a free market (the Treaty of Rome). Free movement of capital and the "Free Establishment" principle rest under a different logic.

By purchasing vessels and quotas in different countries, some fisheries enterprises emerged and act like perfect multinational firms capturing fishing stocks that were supposed to belong to national fishing communities. "Quota-hopping", usually understood as the flagging of fishing vessels in order to fish against the catch quotas of another country, is a by-product of European Union's Common Fisheries Policy.

This situation represents an important critic of the stakeholders to the CFP rules. They attacked the way the quota system is being circumvented by the so-called "flag" ships.

In the literature, the phenomenon has been discussed in political terms but the economic and sociological implications have received less attention. Nevertheless, even if the economic impact may be rather small, it raises the important issues of fishing rights in the European Union and the sociological consequences of this process in the coastal areas highly dependent on fishing.

The non-territorial logic of EU governance challenges the social order inherited from the European welfare states. Economic and social actors in the EU are no longer subject to one political authority that is able to guard the values of justice and equity.

The dynamics towards trans-nationalisation encourages a diffusion of power and blurs the exercise of political democratic elected administration.

In general, the purpose of our paper is to investigate this dichotomy between a national oriented policy and the process of de-territorialisation arising from single market construction.

Traditional Ecological Knowledge as an Approach in the Management of Marine Protected Areas (MPAS)

Carbone, Luca

*Department of Social Science and Communication, University of Salento
Lecce, Italy*

Izzi, Carla

*Department of Social Science and Communication, University of Salento
Lecce, Italy*

Keywords

local community, marine protected areas, TEK

The institution of Marine Protected Areas (MPAs) emerges globally as a social phenomenon. Following the sociological concept of community, our study deals with the Traditional Ecological Knowledge (TEK), as an interesting approach in the institution and management of MPAs, in locations characterized by a long history of human settlement. The TEK can be defined as «a cumulative body of knowledge, practice, and belief, evolving by adaptive processes and handed down through generations by cultural transmission, about the relationship of living beings (including humans) with one another and with their environment».

We anticipate that TEK is identifiable as an aspect characterising and identifying the local coastal communities, including those that experienced important social transformations. Also, we consider the TEK as a basic issue in planning policies of marine conservation.

Beside the recognition of the MPAs as an effective tools for the conservation and protection of marine biodiversity, we consider, as sociologists, MPAs as sites rich in "social diversity" where, especially within resident communities, social practices, beliefs, habits, collective memories, traditions and dynamic identities are developed and reproduced in time. As suggested by sociological studies, whatever the society or community is, collective memories are associated to the plurality of formal and informal groups of interest. These memories generate processes of dynamic hierarchies of knowledge, all leading back to disputes and agreements within and intra social groups.

We here hypothesize that the often-recorded refusal by local communities to accept policies of marine conservation is likely to be linked to anthropological reasons such as the sense of interpenetration of local inhabitants toward the territory. That is, the institution and the management of a given MPA by the central government and other external organisations is viewed locally as an intrusion, a threat to long-time, restricted and well-established practices and relationships.

We are convinced that these issues are crucial in the sector of maritime sociology.

RS07

Memory, Culture and Public Discourse

"Memories of Tamazgha" Berber Identity and Memory Politics in Morocco and the European diaspora

Karrouche, Norah

History, Erasmus University Rotterdam Rotterdam, The Netherlands

Keywords

Migration, memory, ethnicity, Diaspora, Morocco

During the sixties, Moroccan emigration policy was aimed at actively recruiting from the underdeveloped and rebellious northern Rif Mountains: "le Maroc inutile" consisted of the areas where not the "Arabs", but the "Berbers" lived. Emigration from the Rif was thought to release the newly independent Moroccan state from existing political and "ethnic" tensions. A complex set of historical processes of migration, French "divide, debase and conquer" colonialism which envisioned the Berbers as "more European than the Arabs" and a rising Arab nationalism after Morocco's independence outline the background against which a contemporary, locally organised élite Berber nationalist scene in both Morocco and Moroccan diaspora in European cities is on the rise.

This paper analyses the ways in which this Berber identity is constructed and defined on a local level by "in-between generation" and "second generation" Moroccan-Berber nationalists through reflexive life story interviewing and investigates in particular the uses and representations of the pre-Arab and pre-Islamic history of North Africa or "Tamazgha" in their rising multicultural, secular and democratic discourses, often focussing on women's and minority rights.

A focus on the local levels of Antwerp and Rotterdam allows for an interesting comparison between two, though similar, also quite distinct forms of local identity politics and as contexts in which these Berber-Moroccans shape and sharpen their identities and collective memories. In addition, the historical and current position of the Berbers in Morocco is taken into account, offering not only a transnational perspective but also a diachronic approach to the construction of memories, ethnic identities and historical cultures in the context of migration.

"New" images for the "old" countryside - an urban reinvention

Matos Fernandes, Ana

*Geografia Humana, Univerdidad de Barcelona
Porto, Portugal*

Keywords

Representations., Natural and Cultural Heritage, tourism, Rural Idyll

After the generalization of the discourse around the notion of functional, demographic and territorial crisis of the rural, it seems more and more clear that the countryside valuation tendencies are gaining strength.

The apparent contradiction is clarified when we realize that the underlining of the crisis often works as an argument for a renewed visibility of the subject.

The idyllic dimension of the rural is reinforced as an answer to the functional crisis. It is used as an opening of new business possibilities. The old signs of the, so discussed, development delay are now confused with the competitive advantages of the countryside. This occurs mainly because they have been converted in elements of an idyllic past and heritage, by public discourses and representations.

The rurality and its products open new markets of consumption to the urban areas, constituting a necessary alterity to the urban unsustainability and representing the memory, nature and all the values that are supposedly jeopardized in the globalized world.

This presentation pretends to discuss this attempt to reverse the rural crisis trough the valuation of its idyllic and heritage potential, which is spread and feed mainly in the urban areas.

'Hello, Lenin!': Sensing The Proletarian Past at a Lithuanian Side-Show of Socialism

Lankauskas, Gediminas

Anthropology, University of Regina

Regina, SK, Canada

Keywords

social memory, the senses, postsocialist transformation, Eastern Europe

Distancing itself from logocentric methodologies that privilege narrative and text in memory research, this paper argues for the importance of the senses in practices of social recall. Its principal ethnographic focus is on Grūtas, a Lithuanian park museum commemorating the nation's recent socialist history through recuperated Soviet-era artifacts. This open-air museum is explored as a place of public memory where Lithuanian socialism is remembered through visual representations (recovered statues of Marx, Lenin, Stalin, among many others), as well as by implicating the sense of taste ('Soviet' drinks and dishes served at the museum's café).

It is suggested that the senses of sight and taste at Grūtas activate differing (and at times conflicting) memories of socialism. While seeing the Soviet era objectified in visual representations conjures up reminiscences of trauma and victimhood, tasting that past engenders more nostalgic recollections of it. It is further argued that Grūtas, as a kind of side-show of socialism, constitutes a visual and gustatory critique of Lithuania's increasingly 'capitalist' and commodified present. It is also proposed that collective memory in today's Eastern Europe affords a productive ethnographic site in which to investigate the ambiguities and paradoxes of the ongoing systemic transformation in the aftermath of communist rule.

Articulations of Generational Memory within the Post-Communist Context

Marada, Radim

*Sociology, Masaryk University
Brno, Czech Republic*

Keywords

Trauma, collective memory, post-communism, generational conflict, triumph

The paper reflects upon developments in two distinct fields of sociological inquiry which have recently attracted attention of increasing numbers of scholars: collective memory and generational conflict. Drawing from classical and latest inspirations, it attempts to elaborate and present a concept of generational memory. The empirical relevance and analytical value of such concept is demonstrated on the example of social, cultural and political struggles evolving around the interpretation of the communist past within post-communist societies. On the theoretical level, the paper combines historical and phenomenological analysis of the generational aspects of the process of remembering and memorizing the national past.

The historical-phenomenological approach makes it possible to account for the relationship between collective memory and generations in a dynamic way. The paper attempts to trace the generational dynamics in historical transformations of particular collective memories, and evaluate the effects of these transformations on the nature of collective identities and social/cultural divisions. It does not see differences in attitudes to the shared past as a mere reflection of different generational experience and ambitions. It also looks for ways in which the contested images of the past contribute to the articulation of generational cleavages in the post-communist environment.

Pursuing these questions, the concepts of trauma and triumph (Alexander, Giesen) acquire a vital analytical status. The paper shows how historical events understood as traumatic or triumphant recurrently appeal to collective identities, while the appeal mutes over time and its meaning transforms along with generational changes. Within this framework, it also traces shifts in meaning (cultural definitions, symbolic status) of historical events or periods along the transition from a direct experience into a culturally institutionalized, socially reproduced and politically contested collective commemorations. In this process, a refined periodization of recent national history may occur (as it does in the Czech case) which also retrospectively affects a sense of generational location and awareness. And it is in this context that present challenges (like, e.g., the Czech "Lustration Act") affect shared memories of the past (like, e.g., the events of 1968 in Czechoslovakia).

Bridge-memory, Trench-memory: The pragmatics of urban memory in the attitudes towards foreign immigrants in two neighbourhoods of the Barcelona Metropolitan Area

Aramburu, Mikel

*IGOP, UAB
Barcelona, Spain*

Villaplana, Laura

*IGOP, UAB
Barcelona, sPAIN*

Hernández, Aitor

*IGOP, UAB
Barcelona, sPAIN*

Ciornei, Irina

*IGOP, UAB
Barcelona, sPAIN*

Keywords

Urban memory, Immigration, neighbourhoods

The construction of historical memory of cities and neighbourhoods is a typical process of our times. Notwithstanding, its signification is not straightforward, as we may speak of a complex pragmatics of memory.

This paper will explore the pragmatics of urban memory in relation to the immigration phenomenon in Catalonia, Spain: urban memory may play different roles in the public opinion's attitudes towards immigration. The study is based on ethnographic research developed in two urban neighbourhoods with a notable presence of (former) internal immigrants (a rural-urban migration from the South of Spain to the urban Catalonia of the 50s to 70s ) and foreign migrants.

The urban memory of internal migrants may be used and built as a bridge or as a trench in their relation to the foreign ones. Although we may find this double dynamics in both neighbourhoods, this paper will explore the contextual factors that determine the predominance of one or another. In one of the cases, most of the native population tends to identify itself with the new migrants by reviving their difficult integration process; while in the other, the memory of the past is used as a difference mark against the new immigrants. However, in both cases, the hegemonic memory it is not a monolithic narrative, but rather a dynamic discursive object that re-positions itself in function of the contextual factors of a given time and space. In this sense we may speak of complex pragmatics of memory that people, groups and institutions constantly (re)construct.

Bringing Home the Dead: Bodies Politic in the New Global (Dis)Order

Drake, Michael

*Social Sciences, Univ of Hull
Hull, UK*

Keywords

war, politics, dead, mourning, sacrifice

Debates about embodiment and identity conventionally focus on the living, individual body, but recent work of philosophy (Butler, Rose) has drawn attention to the function of mourning in the formation of collective imaginaries, which imbue the body of the dead with cultural significance. The bodies of the war dead in particular (like those of martyrs, with whom they share the attribute of sacrifice) stand in for the body politic in the formation and maintenance of national imaginaries.

Informed by these philosophical insights, this paper will undertake a comparative study of the very different public receptions of the Iraq war dead in the UK and the USA, using documentation from the public sphere, to produce insights into current conditions of collective identity formation in these national cultural contexts.

Collective amnesia and financial collapse

Jacobs, Mark D.

*Sociology and Anthropology, George Mason University
Fairfax, VA, USA*

Keywords

culture, cognition, financial collapse, collective amnesia

In late 2007, when the Dow was at an all-time high, the financier George Soros asserted "we are in the midst of the worst financial crisis since the 1930s." As early as 2003, the legendary investor Warren Buffett had issued apocalyptic warnings that derivatives were "financial weapons of mass destruction." In the summer of 2004, former U.S. Fed chairman Paul Volcker claimed that "there's a 75 percent of a financial crisis in the next five years." All these prophecies were widely reported in the press. Although many business reporters on cable television primed the stock market and housing bubbles with their boosterism, the corps of business reporters in The New York Times and other serious newspapers soberly assessed the perilous state of the economy for years before the great crash of 2008.

Why, then, did the recent global stock market crash come as such a surprise to most financial actors and wider publics? Wall Street, Main Street, and Capitol Hill missed the clear warnings in large part for reasons of culture and cognition. Cognitive frames are both made of mnemonic stuff and provide the stuff of memory. Even though the events of 2008 recapitulate in essential respects those of 1929 and 1987, dramatic shifts in the figurative "grounding" of the very conception of "the economy" helps account for the collective amnesia that contributed to the crash of 2008.

Collective memory in public discours.Internet discussion of neighboring group in Poland

Szmeja, Maria

*Department of Sociology and Social Anthropology, AGH ? University of Science and Technology
Krakow, Poland*

Keywords

collective memory, official history, oral history, symbolic domination

Collective memory in public discourse.

Internet discussion of neighboring group in Poland

Official history at school manuals and in scientific publications presented by dominant group is very often questioned by minority groups. Their interpretation of bygone events usually based on oral history. They believed that history transmitted directly in group is more "authentic", contrary to the official which is more ideological.

I went through internet discussion concerning historical background of two neighboring groups. They live on South-West of country, but during the division of Poland in 1792 they were incorporated to different states. One of them - Silesians were included to Prussia, the other group to Russian Empire. The collective memory of these groups were formed in different circumstances and now descendant of these group recall history in different way. They also presented another attitudes toward official history. Nowadays, because of political reason, these groups live in one administration unit. In communist time, group of Russian background was the ruling one. Now Silesians are more influential in social life. What is interesting, both group used history in very instrumental way. The internet discussion shows how both group used their history to substantiate symbolic domination, how they invent their historical position. Discussion contains past events, commemoration of heroes (monuments, name of street), right to use dialect.

Collective Memory, Assemblage and 'Catastrophic Events'

Campbell, Elaine

School of Geography, Politics and Sociology, Newcastle University Newcastle Upon Tyne, United Kingdom

Keywords

collective memory, performance, materiality, assemblage, temporality

This paper makes use of recent developments in assemblage theory and memory studies to revisit Innes's ideas on the relationship between "signal crimes" and collective memory. The "signal crimes" perspective has become influential to understanding the ways in which particular events, through processes of "mass-mediation", are constructed or manufactured as indexical of the state of society. One of Innes's concerns is to explore how "signal crimes" are made meaningful not only to our contemporary cultural experiences of risk and disorder, but also to the production of our collective memories of certain events and how these will come to be publicly remembered. In this paper, I want to rethink the temporal orientation implicit to Innes's work, specifically the notion that "signal events" impact on future behaviours, beliefs and memories in relation to how we manage and engage with insecurities and anxieties. Using a range of cultural media, and drawing on the insights of Deleuzian-inspired assemblage theory, as well as recent discussions of the material-semiotic aspects of memory, the paper examines a number of "signal events" - re-read here as "catastrophic events" in a Baudrillardian sense - as creative, socio-cultural performances which enact, publicize and bring together the rags and tatters of different pasts, presents and futures in imaginative and innovative ways. Such "events" may include, but not be restricted to the discovery of the Fritzl cellar (Austria, 2008); the capture of Marc Dutroux (Belgium, 1996); the conviction of Dr Harold Shipman (UK, 2000); and the trial of Armin Meiwes (Germany, 2003).

Contested images, collective memory and the mediatized public sphere: Abu Ghraib and the cultural construction of war icons

Solaroli, Marco

*Department of Social and Political Studies, University of Milan
Milan, Italy*

Keywords

collective memory, war photography, Abu Ghraib, cultural icons

War images saturate our mediatized environment, yet only a very few crystallize in the collective memory and become cultural icons. In order for their specific event status to be superseded by their symbol status as a source of social influence, they must have wider cultural resonances and political implications beyond the media representation of a specific conflict. By exploring this process, this paper offers a contribution towards a cultural sociological interpretation of the politics of visual representation of contemporary conflicts, in order to unveil the collective cultural structures that shape the cognitive, emotional and moral ways in which individuals socially construct the meaning of wars.

Why and how do images of war, suffering and pain acquire emotional and moral relevance? Why and how can images become symbolic collective representations? Why and how does a specific war image (among many possible others) become a cultural icon? In order to answer these questions, this paper focalizes the attention on the Iraqi war and the Abu Ghraib torture photos. On the one hand, it analyzes the dynamics of production and diffusion of contemporary war images, on the basis of a large empirical investigation of the professional dynamics of production and framing of war pictures in the news press, constituted by qualitative interviews with war photojournalists and photo editors. On the other hand, it analyzes a number of re-articulating practices of productive consumption of war images, mainly in the fields of visual advertising, contemporary visual arts and anti-war social movements.

The theoretical framework draws on the recent studies in the field of cultural sociology and cultural trauma, integrated with specific research in the field of media studies on the relationships between media production of war photography and collective memory. This literature shows the centrality of binary symbolic structures and discursive narratives in shaping the processes of communication of ongoing conflicts. In this context, this paper emphasizes the role played by the visual elements in the framing and re-framing practices through which individuals have attributed meaning to recent wars, by investigating specifically the process through which particular war images came to acquire an iconic status.

Contested memories. The Vietnam War in American popular culture and civil discourse

Binder, Werner

Sociology, Universität Konstanz

Konstanz, Germany

Keywords

cultural trauma, failure, Iraq War, victimhood, perpetratorship

The paper is a theoretical contribution to the contemporary debate on cultural trauma as well as an empirical study of the Vietnam War in American memory. Up until now only the trauma of victims and the trauma of perpetrators have been elaborated in sociological trauma theory - accompanied by a broad empirical research. My paper introduces the trauma of failure as a third type of cultural trauma. The trauma of failure plays an important role public discourses from the German "Dolchstoßlegende" to some American reactions to the military throwbacks in the Iraq war. I will show that the American memory of the Vietnam War is characterized by a threefold trauma of victimhood, perpetratorship and military failure. The contested and collective memories of the Vietnam war manifested themselves in movies, photographs and novels. They are also embodied in monuments like the Vietnam Veterans Memorial, the remembrance of the My Lai massacre and the policy of conservative administrations. I claim that these conflicting narratives shape the discourse of American civil society to this day. I will prove this point by showing how these cleavages in the discourse on Vietnam refracted the public perception of the Iraq War in the last years. With the rising number of casualties and an upcoming legitimization crises the victimization of American soldiers entered the public discourse. The Abu Ghraib abuses rekindled the left wing debate on American perpetratorship. And finally, George Bush's warning of Iraq becoming a "second Vietnam" and the related right wing discourse shows how deep the wound of the military defeat in the Vietnam War is, at least for a substantial part of the American civil discourse.

Convergence Points: Mountain Carvings, Racial Politics, and Contested Memory

Neely, Brooke

Sociology, University of California, Santa Barbara Goleta, CA, USA

Keywords

memory, public discourse, race, place, memorials

How do historical memorials facilitate contested knowledge of race, place, and memory? Drawing on fieldwork at Mount Rushmore and Crazy Horse Memorials, I explore how discourses of history and racial politics play out through local debates and interactions between visitors and memorial employees. Two giant mountain carvings honoring U.S. presidents and a famous American Indian leader, respectively, Mount Rushmore and Crazy Horse draw millions of tourists each year to the Black Hills in South Dakota (USA). The memorials also represent the contestation embedded in the Black Hills, a region with a long history of land conflict between the Great Sioux Nation and the United States and a place where people negotiate acutely with the contemporary consequences of colonization and settlement. This is a particularly relevant time to study contested knowledge at these memorials because Mount Rushmore recently hired its first American Indian superintendent. His presence and his efforts to include Native history at Mount Rushmore have sparked local debates and on-site dialogue over whose history should be represented in both memorial spaces. Like other sites of commemoration, these memorials allow people to make sense of and debate local, national, and global histories, and can be best understood as complex spaces through which social and political struggles play out.

Building upon interdisciplinary work on memory, place, and race, I offer the concept of a convergence point to illustrate how these memorials are forums through which multiple histories, ideologies, and interests intersect, some serving nationalist and consumerist impulses, some invoking multicultural ideals, and some challenging racist tropes and universal narratives of the past. To make sense of this convergence, I look at how the politics of remembering emerges on the ground, particularly between Native employees and non-Native visitors, with the memorial spaces providing venues for negotiating relationships across racial lines and for facing an ugly history through social interaction. These social exchanges, and the ideas and interests they reflect and draw upon, speak to the complicated ways we collectively reckon with the past, negotiate unequal relationships across lines of difference, and develop knowledge about the places that matter to us.

Cultural Trauma and Memory of the Expelled Peoples in Europe

Törnquist-Plewa, Barbara

Center for European Studies, Lund University Lund, Sweden

Keywords

collective memory, cultural trauma, reconciliation, expulsions

The aim of the paper is to discuss to what extent the theory of cultural trauma as presented by Jeffrey Alexander et al in the book "Cultural Trauma and Collective Identity" (2004) could be fruitful in analysing how the present-day populations and governments of various European countries deal with the memory the ethnic groups that had been expelled from these countries in connection to military conflicts during the 20th century. The paper proposed consists of two parts. The first part is a short presentation of a research project on collective memories of Europe's expelled peoples planned by a research group at Lund University, project looking among others at the memory of Germans expelled from Poland, Czechoslovakia, Northern Romania (now Ukraine) and the Republic of Moldova. In the second part the main research questions of the project are discussed in light of theory of cultural trauma. A special focus is put on the question if and to what extent the construction of trauma can be helpful in the process of reconciliation between nations and peoples, a claim made by Alexander.

Distorted narratives: The Women's International War Crime Tribunal in 2000

Nam, Sang-hui

*Sociology, University of Heidelberg
Hamburg, Germany*

Keywords

war crime, narratives, East Asia, comfort women movement

The Asian "comfort women" movement struggles for the moral and financial compensation of an estimated number of 200,000 victims of the Japanese system of military sexual slavery during World War II. Over the last two decades, a number of former comfort women raised their voice in the public on the occasion of press conferences, international and national hearings, and published their stories with the help of civic activists. According to many observers, in this process the comfort women issue has been successfully reframed and transformed from a nationalist and particularistic into a universal narrative of the global women's and human rights movement. In order to adapt the case of the comfort women to the requirements of international humanitarian laws and global norms, the victims were officially labeled as "Japanese military sexual slaves".

The aim of this presentation is to explore the discrepancy between the subjective identity of former comfort women and their representation in the public discourse. The question is whether they consider themselves as "sexual slaves" as they are officially labeled. Besides, it also will be investigated how they cope with other competing descriptions such as "prostitute", "volunteer to make money", "raped woman", "woman to raise atonement or sympathy money", etc. To answer these questions, this study analyzes the transcripts of the Women's International War Crimes Tribunal on Japan's Military Sexual Slavery (08.-12.Dec.2000). In the Tribunal, 64 survivors from nine East Asian countries (North and South Korea, China, Taiwan, the Philippines, Indonesia, Malaysia, East Timor, Thailand, and Japan) and two Japanese Veterans testified. Meanwhile, prosecutors retroactively and symbolically accused nine former Japanese officers and the Japanese Emperor Hirohito. In a special session, the testimonies of the victimized women from Vietnam, Burma, and other east European countries were also heard by the public. By doing so, the organizers of the Tribunal attempted to highlight the connection between sexual slavery in East Asia and the collective memory of violence against women in different places and times. This interpretation strongly affected the meaning frame of the Asian comfort women movement in the 2000s.

From Memory to History: The Gulbenkian Foundation in Portugal

Conde, Idalina

*Department of Sociology, ISCTE - CIES
Lisboa, Portugal*

Keywords

memory, history, power, Public Sphere, Gulbenkian Foundation

As Michel de Certeau argues in his classic L'Écriture de l'Histoire (1975;1984), the present is the "true starting point" for the historian. This idea is retaken now about the Calouste Gulbenkian Foundation (CGF) and (dis)continuities between institutional memory and history. The archeological exercise departed taking account of two facts in the height of the commemorations of 50 years of this major cultural institution in Portugal (and in Europe) in 2005.

First, the CGF controversial decision to end the Gulbenkian Ballet a year before, which aroused a wide criticism about the private legitimacy to banish a "common good". To understand the tension around private/public affairs in this case and the great emotional (and political) impact produced by that decision, we must recall the original and persistent role of the foundation in the Portuguese society. Literally, an hybrid, a private bourgeois sphere acting as "habermasian" creator of our public space in since the 50's. A powerful island or heterotopy (Foucault) dedicated to the "civilizing mission" of the arts and culture; modernity, literacy, development and cosmopolitanism that even challenged the dictatorship's conservatism up to 1974, the year of Portuguese democratic revolution.

The other evidence was the lack of an institutional written history, basically done during the commemorations. To understand why the historians "forgot" this major institution, and a so long tacit knowledge about the Foundation and its presence so embedded in our lives, identity and destiny, we need to catch again the past. The trajectory of this immense, ubiquitous, power; a financial and symbolic power per excellence mainly exerted with discretion and by the mode of influence (notably over dependent Academies, artists and intellectuals). This could contribute to have persisted in that state of social memory (more anchored in "stories" than the "history") but, as the paper will point, its institutional conversion into history was owed not only to the commemorations. The changes in the present showed, also, that "the Gulbenkian" was no longer alone as "our" unique institution - a kind of monopoly in Portugal. It was time, then, to experience a new analytical distance, to go backwards and write the history.

From un-recognized to critically reconsidered past. Public memories about colonialism in contemporary Italy

Jedlowski, Paolo

Dipartimento di Sociologia, Università della Calabria Rende, Italia

Keywords

literature, Public Sphere, culture, collective memory

Since the end of World War II to the end of XX century, Italians almost forgot their colonial past. It was not even a "traumatic" past: at least in the public sphere, it was properly an un-recognized past.

However, different social actors are beginning today to propose some representations of such a past under the influence of various factors. Notably, Italian colonial past is becoming a topic in some popular fiction: novels and comics.

The paper will discuss some of the possible reasons both for past neglecting and current reconsidering Italian colonialism in the Italian public sphere.

But colonial past may be represented in very different ways: the paper aims to show how different these ways may be and to underline the political and moral value of what we may call memoria autocritica: representations of the past that are able to circulate within the public sphere and to foster self-awareness and criticism about colonial ideologies and the crimes they legitimated.

Theoretically, the paper is sustained by a phenomenological and interactionist view on public memory, which the author presented in some of his past articles.

In search of the New European. Identity without memory

Turek, Konrad

*Institute of Sociology, Jagiellonian University
Krakow, Poland*

Keywords

collective memory, european identity, European Integration, symbolic world

The paper addresses the question (1) if the process of European integration can result in the birth of New European, (2) how effective are attempts of controlled creation of new identity's level for 'new cosmopolitan Europe' citizens, (3) what are the possibilities and conditions, in which such category could really arise in European's self-awareness and present an important reference level?

The Old Continent is a spectator of processes in which new Europe forms itself and is tried to be formed at the same time. The new reality comes and calls for fresh categories, meanings and senses, and most of all - it seeks motivation resources, which will direct individual actions at solving problems with wider, supranational optic and horizon. UE needs such motivation, but do Europeans need to be and act in UE as Europeans?

The presentation begins with a definition of identity as a process. Next part describes European citizen's attitude towards history and memory. Further on, the relation between symbolic world (which provides individuals with reference points, categories for understanding and explaining) and social world in the context of integrating Europe is examined, also basing on the statistical data. UE is analyzed using a conception of collective identity by Leszek Kolakowski, what leads to conclusion about conditionings of possible modifications of Europe's and national states' ontology.

The inquiries results in a proposition of New European identity's perspective which emphasizes its processual and unstable character, orientation for future and utilitarian foundation. Traditional understanding of identity has to be changed: it is not the past who expects us to be Europeans, it is us - Europeans - to expect the future to fulfill our expectations for tomorrow. The most important element of such understood identity is neither culture, tradition, history, memory nor language, but - at the most abstractive level - a kind of trust for future. Whereas at the level of everyday life the most important category becomes utility. For national identity people could give their lives. For European identity it has to be worth living for. Only this way it is possible to understand New European's self- consciousness.

Industrial space and collective memory

Krivy, Maros

*Department of Social Policy - Urban Studies, Faculty of Social Sciences, University of Helsinki
HELSINKI, FINLAND*

Keywords

collective memory, industrial architecture, historicity, monument, Cable Factory (Finland)

After most of the industrial built environment in Europe has been made obsolete, speculation in real estate destroyed large part of it. This has called for an increased discursive activity for conservation of industrial architecture, justified by references to historic awareness and collective memory. Paradoxically, this has often lead to emergence of heritage "enclaves", where history is treated as a set of vague signs of past, in the similar way that new speculative developments present a set of vague signs of future. Any traces of change are removed in order to expose selected "significant" historical moment.

In contrast, I want to focus on a different concept of collective memory, based on the notion of historicity. Here, memory is not based on an illusion of static and eternal time, but arises from the awareness of temporal change. Remembrance is derived from the consciousness of historical crisis or failure written in the obsolete architectures and spaces.

In theorizing this distinction, I will rely on Freud's Mourning and Melancholia and refer to theorizing of collective memory by Huysens and Nora and its application on architecture in the writings of Benjamin and Koolhaas.

The difference between two concepts of collective memory leads to the difference how do we understand and produce monuments. I am interested in a notion of a monument that does not relate to collective memory by offering a definitive version of the history, but by preserving the sense of historicity that emerges from the contrast between functionality and obsolescence of industrial urban space.

While the industrial environment stands today between total effacement and mythical narrative of heroic past, there are attempts for such practices of collective remembrance that relate to the very obsolescence of industrial space as its defining category.

As an empirical evidence, I will refer to discursive strategy of the Pro Kaapeli movement during the transformation of the Cable Factory (Helsinki, Finland) between 1989 and 1992, which developed a specific idea of industrial monument as an "empty space". I will also refer to artistic works exploring the relation of collective memory to the historicity of architecture and urban space.

Literary fiction and public discourse. Reflecting upon the German reunification

Grüning, Barbara

*Studi sul mutamento sociale, istituzioni giuridiche e comunicazione, University of Macerata
Bologna, Italy*

Keywords

cultural memory, experience, identity, public discourse

After twenty years from the German reunification, the interpersonal acknowledgement (e.g. Honneth 1994; Ricoeur 2004) between east and west Germans remains problematic. In particular the media as principal entrepreneurs of common memory (Jedlowski 2002) give often an oversimplified representation of the GDR-past (Ahbe 2004) which has a twofold effect: on one hand it stirs up mistrust towards east Germans, on the other hand the east Germans feel themselves non-acknowledged.

With this respect the literary imagination creates an alternative public discourse, offering different interpretations of the reality from the usual ones (e.g. Turnaturi 2003). Moreover by focusing on desires, problems and emotions of the individuals, it restores a human and temporal dimension (Ricoeur 1984) to the often stereotyped identities. In particular, everyday life narrations are relevant for two main reasons. First, they highlight how the systemic transformations had repercussions on the microcosm of East Germans. Second, they give the possibility of a cultural communication without erasing the differences. In fact, from a processual and inter-textual perspective literary narrations collect and build the cultural memory of a collectivity (e.g. Lachmann 1996; Kuhn 2002) and provide us with a non-monolithic image of the collective identity, that results from the tangle of different past and present experiences.

Finally, I will consider some novels of East German authors (Schulze, Gläser, Schmidt, Sparschuh, Brussig, Gröschner) showing how they deal with some relevant questions such as the definition of Heimat, the function of the Heimat for the individual and collective identity, the relation between East and West, the symbolic, social and cultural transformations of places.

References

- Ahbe, T. (2004) Die Konstruktionen der Ostdeutschen, in "Das Parlament" B 41-42, pp. 9-23.
- Jedlowski, P. (2002) Memoria, esperienza e modernità. Milano, Angeli.
- Honneth, A. (1994) Kampf um Anerkennung, Frankfurt/M., Suhrkamp.
- Kuhn, A. (2002) An everyday magic. Cinema and cultural memory, London, Tauris.
- Lachmann, R. (1996) "Intertextualität", in U. Riclefs (edited by), Das Fischer Lexikon Literatur, Frankfurt/M.
- Ricoeur, P. (1984) Temps et récit II, Paris, Éditions du Seuil.
- Ricoeur, P. (2004) Parcours de la reconnaissance, Paris, Éditions Stock.
- Turnaturi, G. (2003) Immaginazione sociologica e immaginazione letteraria, Roma - Bari, Laterza.

Maurice Halbwachs' concept of memory: a critical analysis

Khlevnyuk, Daria

*sociology, Centre for Fundamental Sociology (State University - Higher School of Economics)
Moscow, Russia*

Keywords

social framework of memory, memory studies, collective memory, Halbwachs

Recently one can observe the development of a relatively new field of knowledge, the memory studies. The basic notion for memory studies is the concept of collective memory introduced by French sociologist M. Halbwachs in his work "The social framework of memory" (1925). The basic presupposition of the study is that "collective memory" as a concept can not be used productively without any changes because a lot has changed in social theory and in the society as well since the time when the notion was introduced by Halbwachs. Thus further insights into the problems of collective memory, its relationship with the present situation, culture, politics, etc. would be more effective if the basic notion and the theoretical background of the memory studies could be reconsidered.

The research consists of two parts. The first part is the complex description of the logical construction of the concept of collective memory and theoretical logic of Halbwachs' theory. Based on works by Durkheim, Bergson, Halbwachs and the followers of the latter, the study proposes a profound understanding of the concept of collective memory, its development and evolution. The second part is a critical review. After gaining the understanding of the concept another point of view on the topic of memory in the society is provided and critique of the theory of Halbwachs from this new standpoint is presented.

The result of this research is a revised concept of collective memory. Its opportunities and limitations are revealed and the implications of such a revision for the memory studies are discussed.

Memorial to the Murdered Sinti and Roma of Europe: hierarchies of victimhood and contests of representation

Blumer, Nadine

*Sociology, University of Toronto/Freie Universität, Berlin
Berlin, Germany*

Keywords

minority rights, boundary drawing, Sinti/Roma Holocaust, victim identities, memory politics

Karen Till (2004) writes that through "place-making" - the process of claiming and marking social space - people can return to the past and confront lingering injustice. My research draws on this notion of place by considering the negotiation, debate and planning of a memorial in Berlin to the Sinti and Roma murdered in the Holocaust. In 1993, following drawn-out media debates about the inclusion of Sinti/Roma victims into initial plans for a Berlin Memorial to the Murdered Jews of Europe, the idea of a joint Holocaust memorial was eventually rejected. Accusations of a "hierarchy of victimhood" erupted from the German Sinti/Roma political leadership. The German government responded by approving construction of a separate memorial in the capital city to the Sinti/Roma victims. Soon after, a new series of debates emerged, this time between Sinti/Roma political leaders regarding the dedication to be inscribed on the memorial plaque. Ongoing conflict has obstructed construction for over a decade. In this paper, I situate the proposed memorial as a site upon which - both literally and metaphorically - the political and social identity of a minority group is shaped and represented in contemporary German society. The contest between Jewish and Sinti/Roma memory narratives, and later between various Sinti/Roma leaders is ultimately about claiming ideological ownership of the history memorials are intended to commemorate; it marks a "performance strategy" (Mandel 2002) used by minority groups seeking to stake a claim in majority society and in their struggle for self-definition.

Memory (re)construction: toward the discussion on memory sites renewal

Fen, Ekaterina

*Philosophy, State University Higher School of Economics
Moscow, Russia*

Keywords

reconstruction, public discourse, tradition, collective memory, memory site

For every memory place (that is defined after P.Nora as forming and keeping group or nation identity through images, symbols, traditions etc. and embodied in either in form of an object or in some architectural form) the process of reconstruction is both inevitable and disputable. What happens to the meanings and symbols when the material form needs renovation?

The research focuses on Moscow historic park reconstruction. History's controversies lead to changes in place reception from one epoch to the other. What meanings, should be outlined as dominant ones during the reconstruction? The later ones or the initial ones? This question arises when each new historical period rejects mostly the previous epochs symbols.

Memory place as a part of city space became a sort of heterotopia, the other space within the city. The process of reconstruction is the time when city can vote either for or against the changes. It has legitimate power for institutionalization some tradition, creating memorials, changing architecture. Also the reconstruction process may lead to adding the meanings such as creating tourist or artistic zones.

The last but not the least is that the memory is "alive by nature" and opposed history, that is constructed by nature. That's why memory undergoes permanent evolution, is open to the remembering and forgetting. The memory place is the space for constant community's or nation's traditions forming. What happened to all that processes in reconstructed space? And how will the interactive process of forming of meanings develop after reconstruction?

All this questions make reconstruction rather disputable. There are few groups of "memory keepers" and "history makers": local community, architects, city government, historians. Each of these groups has its own set of ideas, "meaning maps" that shape the place, discourses to depict and arguments to discuss the situation. So the process of reconstruction is the process of discussions and finding conventions: some points remain undisputable, some arise debates. Here reveals the space for the research and analyzing.

Memory and landscape - the unpleasant past in the local context

Polonski, Krystian

Faculty of Applied Social Sciences, Warsaw University Warsaw, Poland

Keywords

collective memory, Landscape, Trauma, unpleasant past

The paper explains relations between memory and landscape on the example of polish mountainous village - Lutowiska. Collective memories of different groups living there and collective memories about different groups which lived there and their connections with landscape will be described.

The idea of landscape and landscape itself is associated with relax and pleasure, spectacular views, aesthetic values. However outstanding view might be used to hide collective trauma. Only connection of landscape and memory allows us to look deeper into this what has happened in certain area. Human memories are immersed in the landscape, traces of the past are written in it - those connected with unpleasant past like guerrilla warfare, genocide and displacement too. In the landscape we may find some ideas of modernisation - total landscape as a social experiment causing giving back certain territory to the forces of nature, landscape of death as a place of genocide, landscape of borders and trauma as a place hiding collective responsibility.

Relations between memory and landscape will be explained using polish region Bieszczady. In this area during 10 years (1939 - 1951) all ethnics groups were killed or displaced (Bojkowie, emkowie, Ukrainians, Jews, Poles). Multicultural society of the region was destroyed. Highly populated region has become almost uninhabited. Coming back of the nature began - in 70. Bieszczadzki's National Park was created at huge part of this territory. The landscape has completely changed - from full of people into wild and desert.

Author conducted researches among and with inhabitants of Lutowiska's village. Participant observation, biographical interviews, photography analysis were used. Information about the picture of the place with unpleasant past was gathered from local people by engaging them into artistic activities.

Not only general reflections about connections of memory with the landscape but also connections of local people with the picture of the place will be shown in the paper. Detailed questions will be answered. How the memory about unpleasant past influences the way people see the place of their living? What new settlers know about the traumatic events which took place in their village and people who lived in the village before them?

Memory, political culture and revisionism in Spain

Ampudia, Fernando

*Departamento de História, Instituto de História Contemporânea-Universidade Nova de Lisboa
Portugal,*

Keywords

authoritarianism, memory, revisionism, political culture

The aim of this paper is to propose a general approach to the historiographical revisionism on the Spanish Civil War (1936-1939) and Franco's dictatorship (1939-1975). As a social phenomenon, revisionism develops beyond the academic field, involving mass media, publishers, think-tanks and political figures interpretations of historical events. So, beyond the "truth" or the "falsity" of the revisionist thesis, this phenomenon will be here analysed in relation to certain social transformations occurred in Spain, since the electoral victory of the Popular Party (PP) of José María Aznar (1996) until the victory of the Socialist Party in 2004. In this sense, it will be considered how the revisionist discourse has a social impact on Spanish political culture and on the public debate about Spanish democracy legitimacy and its assessment. This analysis is carried out in the framework of figurational sociology defined by Norbert Elias. Thus, it will be useful for the analysis proposed here the concept of power balance and the established/outside dichotomy on social relationships.

Memory, time and responsibility

Leccardi, Carmen

*Sociology and Social Research, University of Milan-Bicocca
Milan, Italy*

Keywords

time, memory, responsibility, politics, Social change

Whilst the dimension of memory has attracted the attention of sociology since the first half of the last century, reflection on responsibility has been able to extend beyond the legal-philosophical sphere only in more recent times. Starting from the 80s sociology showed an interest in responsibility from two main points of view: firstly with reference to globalization processes, which require redefinition of the ways in which ethical-political responsibility is conceptualized; secondly in connection with the renewed attention paid to values in order to understand the dynamics of social action. In parallel, also the concern with memory has assumed new characteristics: the connections between individual and collective memory, between memory and history, together with social, cultural and political interpretations of memory, mark out numerous avenues for analysis.

In light of this new scenario, the paper will focus on the links between memory, responsibility and social change. In particular, both memory and responsibility seem able to counter, though in different ways and forms, the discontinuities produced by the velocity of social time characteristic of contemporary Western societies. Not only can each of them be considered forms of the relationship that people establish with their actions (and emotions); they also appear to be decisive dimensions in the construction of identity and intersubjectivity. Memory and responsibility are fuelled to an equal extent by a privileged relationship with time (explicit for the memory; more covert for responsibility). Decisive in this regard is their shared ability to guarantee permanence. Finally, at the collective level, to be stressed is that where memory is 'alive' (and therefore potentially conflictual), the link established with responsibility appears indivisible: as memory constructs identity, it evokes a responsibility. In this regard, both memory and responsibility appear closely bound up with politics.

Mining the past to manage the present: place, memory and identity in the city and the suburbs

Corcoran, Mary P

Sociology, National University of Ireland Maynooth Maynooth, Ireland

Keywords

arts, place, identity, memory, culture

This paper explores the role of place memories in personal and collective identity construction, and community building both in inner-city and suburban locales. Attachment to place is frequently bound up with ideas about the nature of place as construed through signifiers in the built and natural environment, and mediated through particular imagery, memory and tradition. Bridger points out that heritage narratives are of particular importance in this respect, because they provide a version of a community's history that forms what he calls a "constitutive rhetoric" (1996: 353). Borer suggests that "social, public, collective memories are stored and transmitted in and through places. As such, narratives about past occurrences in particular places help shape the identity of the place and the people who use it, care about, or are affected by the decisions made about and to it" (Borer, 2006: 186) Drawing on field work data gathered from inner city neighbourhoods in Dublin and new suburban developments on the fringe over the past ten years, I demonstrate empirically that collective representations and memory traces provide residents with the tools through which they can interpret and make sense of their environments. Sentiment plays an important role in developing an attachment to place. This sentimental attachment to place may be based both on symbolic representation or "markers" but also on myths, narratives and collective memories. These various sources of attachment are frequently overlain on each other, acting as a resource that can be drawn upon at times when a place is changing or is under threat. The paper demonstrates how cultural symbols and artistic codes for representing place operate not just at the national level but also at the local level, on the street, in the housing complex and in the suburban neighbourhood.

References:

- Borer, Michael Ian. 2006. "The location of culture: the urban culturalist perspective" in City and Community, Vol. 5, no 2. pp. 173-197.
- Bridger, J.C. 1996. "Community Imagery and the built environment" Sociological Quarterly, 3: 353-74

Negotiated memory of Second World War in the border city of Narva

Nikiforova, Elena

Studies of Borders and Border Communities, Centre for Independent Social Research St. Petersburg, Russian Federation

Keywords

politics of memory, commemorative landscape, post-Soviet borderlands

In light of the Tallinn events in April of 2007 known as the Bronze Night, transformation of the commemorative landscape in the city of Narva, the border city in Estonia with predominantly non-Estonian population, is of particular interest. The Second World War when the city was destroyed and its population relocated marked a great rupture of Narva's timespace and signaled a construction of the new, Soviet Narva which for the next few decades developed as an industrial centre of proletarian internationalism and a home for in-migrating workers from all over the Soviet Union. The heroism of Soviet soldiers-liberators of Narva was fixed in place in a dense network of cemeteries and commemorative sites and transmitted through a set of commemorative events, and became one of the central grounds of Narvan local identity and pride.

In 1991 Estonia's regaining of independence launched a new era of place and identity transformations for Narva's inhabitants. In the course of state nationalizing policies non-Estonians living in Narva were excluded from citizenship and redefined as exterior to the Estonian nation-state, while the town itself became an object of renarration works aimed at the desovietization of Narva and creation of a new public narrative of Narva as an Estonian and European town. In the process of renarration, Narva's memoryscape has become one of the main grounds for contestation.

In this paper I explore the politics of memory in Narva with the emphasis on the analysis of transformation of the commemorative landscape of WW II. More specifically, I investigate the way that liberation and occupation narratives have been deployed and negotiated in Narva, the role of states, local elites and local publics in these negotiations, and the impact of these narratives on how place and identity are practiced in this setting. The study is based on several years of fieldwork in Narva.

Polish Collective Memory of the Holocaust: Social and Education Discourse after 1989

Boron, Aleksandra

Department of Educational Studies, Adam Mickiewicz University Poznan, Poland

Keywords

Poland, holocaust, post-communism, collective memory, Jews

The purpose of this paper is to describe the phenomenon of social including and excluding of the Jews as a process of transformation of collective memory in Poland.

The process may be divided into three periods:

1. Communist ideology versus social memory of World War Two. in postwar Poland
2. Political transformation of the memory in Poland during the 80's and after 1989
3. Introducing the term "Holocaust" in postcommunist Poland (both in social and educational discourses)

The construction of the past raises the question of how collective representation is shaped by ideologies together with social and political changes in the context of Polish post-Holocaust and post-communist society. For understanding of Polish collective memory (or understanding why Polish memory is not necessarily "collective") it is important to distinguish between the communist and post-communist eras. Each of these periods produced commemorative narratives about events that deeply divided Polish society after World War Two. The formation of the new Polish state by armed force and Soviet intervention affected patterns of commemoration and the Party recognized as heroes only those who were communist fighters, while the ethnicity of heroes and victims was (almost totally) repressed or marginalized.

Political transformation during the 80's returned to social memory the traces of erased collective memory - among these the Jewish presence in Poland before and after World War Two. In consequence, the Poles had to face in public debate the facts of annihilation of the Jews of Europe both during World War Two and persecution after the war (Kielce and the anti-Semitic campaign of 1968). In this context we can adopt the term "cultural trauma" and see how it affected the changes in Polish society, for example following Jan B?o?ski's essay or the revelations about Jedwabne.

Postcards and déjà-vu: the "stamped picture" in our memories

Correia, Maria da Luz

*Université Paris Descartes - Faculté des Sciences Humaines et Sociales, Sorbonne; Universidade do Minho - Instituto de Ciências Sociais, CEAQ (Centre d'Études sur l'Actuel et le Quotidien) - Université Paris Descartes, Sorbonne (Paris - France); CECS (Centro de Estudos de Comunicação e Sociedade) - Universidade do Minho (Braga, Portugal)
Paris, France*

Keywords

Advertising, arts, collective memory, social history of images, Visual culture

The postcards, which are in a way moving images (since they are sent through the postal system) in the age of omnipresent screens, are an important element of the social imaginarium, of our collective memory and of our visual culture. Postcards not only make up an intimate message but they also provide one of the most complete and democratic visual repertoires, by assembling advertising graphic creations, photographic expressions, visual design compositions, fantasy motifs and works of art reproductions. Since it mixes a public visual discourse with a personal message and souvenir, the postcard is an ideal starting point to present the image as "an organ of the social memory and a nucleus of the spiritual tensions of a culture" (Giorgio Agamben, 2004).

As it developed at the same time as photography, the postcard became a crucial device in the building up of our photographic vision of the landscape. Being contemporary of the work of art in the age of its technological reproducibility (Walter Benjamin), postcards are also an important support to Malraux's Imaginary Museum: owing to their small price, they provide a shared access to art images. Often appropriated by artistic avant-gardes, the postcard allows the decentralisation of art (for instance in the 60's, with Ray Johnson and mailart). On the other hand, this petite monnaie de l'art [petty cash of art] (as it was called by Paul Eluard) is also a profitable consumption object controlled by international advertising industries (from mass tourism to art institutions).

Thus postcards constitute one of the XXth century most complete visual atlas, archived by collectors (such as Walker Evans), by museums (such as the Curt Teich Postcard Archives in Illinois - USA) or by nostalgic receivers. At a time when the world pictures arrive mainly from screens, postcards continue to be published, edited, sold, bought, used and collected. This presentation proposes a revision of the role of postcards in the social memory of images, namely by following the notion of Nachleben from Aby Warburg works and the idea of dialectic image from Walter Benjamin's approach.

Public discourse, political accountability and the collective memory of socio-political events: A discourse analysis

Tileaga, Cristian

Social Sciences, Loughborough University Loughborough, UK

Keywords

revolution, political accountability, public discourse, discourse analysis, collective memory of socio-political events

This paper presents a discursive analysis of a political news interview as a site for the social organization of public discourse and collective memory of controversial past events. It is argued that in order to understand the formation and reproduction of ideological representations of socio-political events and the meanings assigned to different versions of the past researchers need to engage with the argumentative contexts in which the meaning of such events is being negotiated and accomplished by social and political actors. Taking the contested memory of the Romanian "revolution" of 1989 as a case in point, the analysis shows how, in a context of commemoration and finding out the truth about the past, concerns with accountability, justification and criticism, locating the essence of categories and debate acquire relevance as publicly available discursive resources to make the case for a "preferred" reading in the public arena. The possibility of knowing the truth, the nature of actions and rationales for actions, issues of (political) motive and stake, morality and accountability are framed by constituting the events of 1989 as belonging to the social category "revolution". In the context of several versions of the same socio-political event competing in the public forum, the study of the production and transformation of collective memories becomes a matter of appreciating the public display and strategic use of social categories within an array of argumentative and rhetorical meaning-making strategies.

Reflections of a Tragic Hero: How a distant past reconciled a distant future

Baker, Stephanie

School of Social Sciences, University of Western Sydney Sydney, Australia

Keywords

emotions, memory, reconciliation, temporality, Mythos

The vignette of Zinedine Zidane, the French captain of Algerian descent, expelled during the World Cup in 2006 after reacting against an alleged racial insult, captures the diverse narratives constituting France's collective memory. The mythic significance of Zidane's incident will be interpreted with respect to interviews and media analysis as a contemporary manifestation of mythos.

Myths are archetypal narratives through which individuals examine their lives in conjunction with civic values and ideal character types. As common frames of reference, each generation inherits and retells these stories conditioning the minds of communities who judge and live their present lives according to preceding narratives. This is evident from French spectators' transformation of the Zidane incident into a mythic narrative that not only reflects contemporary post-colonial relations in France, but was distinctly interpreted as frames of reference reflecting individual's temporal perspective within their broader cultural milieu. The value of these myths lies in their ability to weave diverse threads of cultural and temporal experience to encapsulate the emerging social fabric of multi-cultural France.

Sympathetic projections towards France's heroic icon, however, appear to incongruously reflect France's moral order. The incident amplified issues sensitive to French sensibilities as it was interpreted within discourses of race, ethnicity and class, as well as cultural and religious differences. The insult engendered broader significance as it became a provocation not limited to an isolated football player; it was an insult discriminating against a racial minority in France. The 'Zidane myth' must be understood within shifting postcolonial attitudes in Europe which challenge conventionally racist attitudes. The lived and inherited emotional memories of Algerian minorities in France subsequently positioned Zidane's mythos as a gesture of heroic valour juxtaposed to the racial discrimination provoked from his villainous European persecutor.

Memory is crucial to civic unrest. It is precisely our inability to reconcile inherited and acquired memories within a living present or imagined future that paralyses cultural communication, facilitating civic dysfunction. Examining diverse accounts of the "Zidane myth", reveals how diverse memories contributed to cross-cultural dialogue enabling individuals to actively reconstruct conflicting memories positioning Zidane as "the symbol of the new multiethnic society".

Reflections on Editing the Collective Memory Reader

Olick, Jeffrey

*Sociology, University of Virginia
Charlottesville, Virginia, USA*

Vinitzky-Seroussi, Vered

*Sociology and Anthropology, Hebrew University of Jerusalem
Jerusalem, Israel*

Levy, Daniel

*Sociology, Stony Brook University
Stony Brook, NY, USA*

Keywords

sociology, reader, memory

Social memory studies, Olick and Robbins wrote in 1998, is "a non-paradigmatic, transdisciplinary, centerless enterprise." Has the situation improved in the last ten years, in which we have witnessed a veritable explosion of writing on collective memory and its correlates? We argue that it has not, because, as that review also stated, social memory studies has ironically not developed a memory of its own. In this paper, we explore the challenges we faced in editing The Collective Memory Reader, to be published later this year by Oxford University Press. Is it possible to define a field, identify exemplars, and to construct a canon without reducing creativity and excluding difference? More mundanely, what works have we considered essential, and how did we go about drawing boundaries?

Reflections on the construction of the historical memory of nations: is it just useful or also needed?

Santos, Alexandra

*Sociology, Instituto de Ciências Sociais da Universidade de Lisboa
Lisboa, Portugal*

Garcia, José Luís

*Sociology, Instituto de Ciências Sociais da Universidade de Lisboa
Lisboa, Portugal*

Keywords

collective memory, nationalism, identity, history

Regarding nationalist discourses, historian Patrick Geary argued they had transformed history into a "dump of toxic waste", thus reflecting an adverse attitude common to academics. In this view, nationalism is understood as a destructive force, responsible for most of the wars that devastated the World since the beginning of the twentieth century.

Introducing some shades into this attitude, sociology has been showing the existence of low intensity nationalism, one that permeates everyday life. This vision is present in well known concepts such as methodological nationalism (Hermínio Martins) and banal nationalism (Michael Billig). Also in the field of political science has nationalism been reassessed, being revealed its ability to produce the cohesion essential to the maintenance of democratic societies (Margaret Canovan).

As the understanding of the nationalist phenomenon changes, so does the comprehension of the relations between history and the building of national identities. A major tendency aims at understanding the ways in which processes of manipulation and fabrication of the past evolved in nationalist environments. Most of these works, on the trail of Ernest Gellner's Nation and Nationalism, tend to perceive cultural heritage and history as elements used to construct the belief in the antiquity of each nation, being the objective of such a construction to legitimize the newborn nations. Critical of this vision, Anthony D. Smith emphasized that, other from being useful to legitimize the nation, national history is also the living source to which people turn in search of behavior models, being thus necessary at a much profounder level. In this sense, collective memory is essential to the formation as well as the maintenance of national identities.

The present work reassesses the importance of combining both approaches when dealing, as we do, with historical novels that carry a clearly nationalist message. In our view it is important not only to determine the interests that lie behind a certain representation of the past, but also to clarify the ideas that deeply cross it, having in mind the ability of these to lastingly produce senses, and thus influence the future.

Remembering the victims of terrorism: A comparative analysis of the commemorative anniversaries of 9/11 in New York City and 3/11 in Madrid

Flesher Fominaya, Cristina

*Sociology and Political Science, Universidad Carlos III, Madrid
Getafe, Spain*

Barberet, Rosemary

*Sociology, John Jay College of Criminal Justice, CUNY
New York, NY, USA*

Keywords

culture, terrorism, victims, collective memory, public discourse

In this paper we explore the political and cultural dynamics that shape how victims of terrorism are remembered, through a comparative analysis of the commemorative anniversaries of 9/11, New York and 3/11, Madrid, from the first anniversaries to the present. Drawing on the sociology of collective memory, cultural trauma and sociology of culture literatures, we examine how anniversaries, as social rituals, provide collective moments and spaces for grieving, remembering, honoring and 'taking stock', but also serve to reaffirm ideological values and further political agendas. With the passage of time, these ceremonies serve to anchor and cement what our collective memory of the tragic events themselves will retain. We will limit ourselves to the formal, official commemoration ceremonies, and briefly highlight other local commemorations.

Our analysis, based on media reports, examines the rituals themselves, their settings and contexts, choice of music, readings, speeches, activities, cultural symbols, who attends (and sometimes more importantly, who does not) and how the ceremonies reflect universal themes but also localized cultural values and ideals.

The anniversaries in the United States reflect a highly personalized and individualized culture of commemoration. Ironically, this very emphasis on victims as unique individuals combined with a commemorative culture that emphasizes diversity led to a fragmentation of victims groups and less ability to influence the shape commemorative rituals took. In Spain, victims are commemorated collectively, to the point where no names are read; however, because victims groups are centralized, albeit into two highly polarized organizations connected to competing parties, they have an institutional representation in decisions around commemoration not present in the U.S.

In both cases, rituals establish the moral superiority of the victims. In the United States, however, the victims are seen as selfless heroes, and their 'sacrifice' is linked to the defense of the central values of democracy and freedom. In Spain, the bombings are also characterized as attacks on freedom and democracy, but victims' hero status is played down. Unlike the U.S., commemorations are strongly polarized along partisan lines, which lessens the focus on victims, survivors and their families and instead highlights political and social divisions.

Russian Diaspora in Central Europe: Collective Memory and Identities

Kosyaeva, Tatyana

*UPCES CERGE-EI, Charles University
Prague, Czech Republic*

Keywords

collective memory, identity, critical discourse analysis, interview-in-depth

This paper aims to investigate an important cultural transformation in maintenance of collective memory in Russia.

Collective memory forms the basis of any collective identity such as ethnic identity, and national identity. I use a concept of distributed version collective memory due to Wertsch (2002), who writes: " The distributed version of collective memory assumes that a representation of the past is distributed among members of a collective". This concept entails that "collective remembering is a form of mediated actions, which entails the involvement of active agents and cultural tools".

As empirical case I study the Russian diaspora in Central Europe, where I conducted interview-in-depth with representatives of different generations of diaspora, including first one, and at the same time I use content analysis and critical discourse analysis, participant observation.

Since the Iron Curtain fall, Russian collective memory started to incorporate material that has been produced by the four waves of Russian 20th century migration - especially by the 1st, post-October 1917 wave. (For example, secondary school curriculum now includes works of major diaspora writers.) However, it is clear that the final re-creation and merging of the cultural memory hasn't happened yet.

Selling Death, Remembering Life: Two Social Memory Sites in Budapest, Hungary

Cucu, Alina

*Department of Sociology, University of Oxford
Oxford, United Kingdom*

Faje, Florin

*Department of Sociology and Social Anthropology, Central European University
Budapest, Hungary*

Keywords

community, identity, postsocialism, space, memory

Our paper focuses on the relations between politics of memory, the identity of a community and the social construction of places. Using both ethnographic and historical material we explore two social memory sites in Budapest following the processes of their construction as places and as sites of enactment for differently-oriented politics of memory during the socialist and the postsocialist periods: the 'Stolpersteine' project on Raday Utca, and the ensemble of commemorative monuments built around the Dohany Utca Synagogue. Following Pierre Nora's distinction between 'lieux de memoire' and 'milieux de memoire', we argue that the memory site in Dohany utca functions more as a lieu de memoire while the stones on Raday utca are closer to a milieu de memoire. We trace the implications of this distinction for different types of remembering enacted in Budapest through monuments produced at various historical times. The research is fundamented on two key assumptions. First, there is a fundamental link between the identity of a community and the historical events it chooses to remember in particular moments. The identity of the community is usually built around such events; therefore, insights regarding the commemorations are also insights about the way this identity is being constructed. Second, the memory of these events is not only preserved but also continuously constructed in social memory sites as the ones we observed in Budapest. Thus, our paper is meant to be a contribution to social memory studies as well as to the sociology of space literature.

The 1989 Revolutions and European Commemorative Agendas of 2009: Voids, Fallen Walls, and Memory Constructions

Pearce, Susan

Department of Sociology, East Carolina University Greenville, NC, USA

Keywords

arts, identity, Eastern Europe, culture, collective memory

The year 2009 marks the 20th anniversary of the 1989 European revolutions across most of the Central and Eastern regions of the continent. This year, therefore, will be one in which both the continent and the individual countries involved in those revolutions will be reflecting and commemorating. This paper assesses the terrain on which commemoration and monumentation are taking place in 2009. The destruction of monuments and landscape markers of communist regimes across the region after 1989 could be viewed as leaving a memory "void," but in contrast to Iwona Irwin-Zarecka's description of memory voids as gaps that "ought not to be," most would interpret them as gaps that "ought to be." What is filling those voids, both materially and symbolically? What artistic, governmental, educational, and activist events will mark this anniversary, and what will be their messages and moods? Informed in part by ethnographic work on memory work in Poland regarding the Solidarity movement, this paper surveys the memory terrain for the Central and Eastern Europe region regarding the changes that 1989 introduced. That terrain involves the issue of memory ownership as belonging to state or civil society, rebirths of ethnic and national heritage and resulting conflicts, the themes of unity versus disunity in the redrawing of borders and accessions to the European Union, the vulnerability of young capitalist and democratic countries in the global economic recession, and the politics of transitional justice, including lustration trials and formal apologies. This paper will be presented at the onset of an ethnography in Central and Eastern Europe to document those commemorative events; the paper will, therefore, provide the theoretical and analytical overview for this project and survey the region's anticipated events across the autumn months of 2009.

The city in songs, songs of the city: Lisbon's major role in the lyrics of an urban popular song (1935-2009)

Gonçalves, Ana

Institute of Social Sciences, University of Lisbon

Lisbon, Portugal

Keywords

urban identities, power, popular culture

Songs about cities, being marginal in the whole range of popular songs, play an interesting role in the understanding of the urban experience and the urban imagination: through them the most intangible and abstract structures of urban spaces gain strength (we use here the dualistic vision which makes perceptive territorial identities, cultural heritages, collective memories and everyday life experience as more abstract component parts of the urbanity, opposed to the materiality and the physicality of the city buildings and the city infrastructures).

Thus, if understood as a performative expression ? both musical and literary ? that evokes images and organize common discourses on the city, the Grandes Marchas de Lisboa acquire a renewed interest. Once these popular songs are a poetic-musical component of the urban spectacle of the Marchas Populares de Lisboa, one of the main cultural events on municipal festivities in June, initiated during the twentieth century, whose motto is the city and its ?traditions?, the collection of more than forty songs allows a diachronic perspective on the symbolic representation of Lisbon over the last seven decades.

From the results of a content analysis of lyrics we intend to evaluate the link between real space and imagined space, detect changes or persistence on the multifaceted set of elements associated to Lisbon city and note the presence of the main urban archetypes: e.g., epicenter of the Portuguese colonial empire (until 1970s), Portuguese capital city in the global era (after 1970s) and city of neighborhoods (in both periods).

The Construction of Memory. History and culture in Italy, among personal, institutional and media memory (1948-1960)

Leonzi, Silvia

*Department of Sociology and Communication, Sapienza University of Rome
Rome, Italy*

Ciofalo, Giovanni

*Department of Sociology and Communication, Sapienza University of Rome
Rome, Italy*

Keywords

communication, memory, national identity, cultural consumption, modernization

Since the second half of the 20th century, the approach to memory was the one of keeping it alive, bringing dramatic events of mankind history into the light, translating in-human facts into updated meanings, with the aim to avoid making the same mistakes of past. Today, the study of memory is inclined to track directions more articulated and differentiated.

The crucial role played by communication in our time, as social actor's strategic resource and elective habitus, represents surely a propulsive factor of a process making the dialectic of Memory and Oblivion one of the most important challenges of the collective self and social identity constitution process.

In this regard, the specific empirical research being conducted in Italy is based on a "public" and dynamic conception of memory, divided into three dimensions - personal, institutional and media - contributing to define the comprehensive frame of individual and national identity, also in the light of coming of television on 1954. The research focuses on the period 1948-1960, and it is realized by integrating autobiographical descriptions (in-depth interviews and focus group - 60/80 people), media narration (analysis of cultural outdoor and indoor goods) and "official" historical contents (consultation of political parties, cultural associations and labour unions archives), aiming to survey the extent of cultural consumption in individual daily life and to detect the main characteristics of Italian modernization process, during a significant time interval being related to the beginning of the Italian economic boom.

The Instrumental Uses of Memory in Urban Conflict: Barcelona's Can Ricart Industrial Site

Marti-Costa, Marc

Institut de Govern i Polítiques Públiques, Universitat Autònoma de Barcelona

Barcelona, Spain

Keywords

collective memories, urban renewal, industrial heritage, social conflict, public policies

This paper explores the production and use of memory by different urban actors in conflict. Through the study of the preservation and uses of the Can Ricart industrial site in the Poblenou neighborhood of Barcelona, this paper analyzes the use of memory as a power resource that evolves during a conflict and that determines a series of outputs for urban public policies.

In 2000 the 22@ plan was approved, with the objective of transforming the industrial neighborhood Poblenou into a new technological and business district. This process has generated mobilizations by part of different associations on the Poblenou, who claimed the preservation of the industrial heritage and the improvement of different local social services. One of the most important conflicts centers on Can Ricart site, due to its architectural characteristics as well as the intensity of citizens' mobilization. Through the case-study in question the paper will develop the following issues: - The tensions that arise between regeneration and preservation. The opposition between the local history promoted by 22@ (the triumph of technological renewal over an industrial past) and the collective memories of the inhabitants local groups which are tightly related to a contentious workers' consciousness. - Social conflict as a generator of collective memory. Memory studies have revealed the role of "traumatic" episodes (natural disasters, holocaust, etc.) in the generation of collective memories. Coalitions of plural actors (artists, workers, etc.) opposed to the demolition of Can Ricart showed also the strength of social conflict as a generator and recuperator of histories and forgotten memories in an urban conflict during the process of legitimization of their demands. - The absence of industrial sites from Barcelona's official historical preservation policies. Heritage policies in Barcelona have been traditionally focused on pre-industrial and modernist structures, where tourist promotion policies are concentrated. The conflicts over the industrial heritage of Poblenou show the preference preservation policies give to the residential areas of the bourgeoisie while at the expense of working-class areas, where the wealth to build the modernist buildings was created, fall into oblivion.

The Peaceful Revolution and its Aftermaths. Collective Memory and the Victims of Communism in Eastern Germany

Gebauer, Ronald

Department of Sociology, Friedrich Schiller University of Jena Jena, Germany

Keywords

collective memory, resistance, counter culture, compensation

Twenty years after the fall of the Berlin Wall, East and West Germans share equal civil rights. However, the peaceful revolution of 1989 did not lead to a state of thrive and contentment. Discontent with the new system is the cause that certain aspects of the old system are remembered positively - here the keyword is ostalgia. Shortcomings of communist hegemony are thereby blocked out. This is also true for political crimes and injustices that were committed under communist rule.

Estimates indicate that 260,000 people were imprisoned for political reasons during this period of German history. In 2007 the Jena Center of Empirical Social and Cultural Research (JEZE) collected a survey of more than 300 interviews of applicants on rehabilitation. An important part of the results is that younger and older generations of applicants are especially disadvantaged in their social and health situation in comparison to the Thuringian population that was not victimized in the past.

Yet how does the public perceive the victims of the communist past today and how do the victims perceive themselves? Here no easy answer can be given. Of course ostalgia is not an appropriate public mood to promote a deeper awareness of the victims' special social situation. Awareness of the resistance in the former GDR among Western Germans was and is also restricted and did not find adequate consideration in Germany's legislation. Much disappointment of the former opponents is captured in Bärbel Bohley's phrase: "We wanted justice but we got the rule of law (Rechtsstaat) instead". Although they achieved the downfall of East Germany's communist regime, they were neither in the situation to bring the perpetrators to justice nor to put their own interests considerably into practice. Here the contribution to the conference continues. The current legal situation will be addressed. The pursue of the victims' interests will be discussed. The relevance of collective memory as interface between memory policies and 'common memories', as collections of individual memories in the face of a multiple divided German culture of memory is taken into account.

The Phantom of Introjected Antisemitism: Hebrew, Yiddish, and the Return of the Repressed

Erdinast-Vulcan, Daphna

The English Department, The University of Haifa

Haifa, Israel

Keywords

Avot Yeshurun, Hebrew, Yiddish, Repression

The first part of the proposed paper would focus on a historical psycho-social phenomenon which I would describe as "introjected anti-Semitism" in relation to the rupture between the collective subjectivity generated in the course of the Zionist revolution and the diasporic mode of Jewish existence. Zionism, albeit a miraculous process of national re-birth, involved not only a secularization of Judaism, but also a communal internalization of anti-Semitic stereotypes. The immediate casualties of the process were Yiddish language and culture, which were identified with the diasporic history of persecution, humiliation, and fear--everything which the emerging Israeli nation was determined to leave behind.

The second part of the paper deals with the belated recognition of the immensity of the loss, and turns to the poetry of Yechiel Perlmutter (1903-1922), which I read as the "return of the repressed". Perlmutter, who had renamed himself Avot Yeshurun in the aftermath of the holocaust, developed a radically transgressive Hebrew idiolect, broken up, fragmented, and mangled by Yiddish phrases and syntax. The poetry written in this idiolect is a labour of mourning for a lost world, and a desperately belated attempt to make amends by reversing the historical process of dispossession. Following the psycho-social framing of the discussion, and using some of the psychoanalytic conceptions developed by Nicolas Abraham and Maria Torok, I would suggest at the conclusion of the paper that what we read in Avot Yeshurun's poetry is a painful and sometimes brutal exposure of the introjected phantom which has haunted Israeli society and culture throughout its formative century.

The structure and the mechanisms of shaping national historical consciousness in contemporary Russia and Germany (based on analysis of school textbooks of history and schoolchildrens survey)

Pushkareva, Tatiana

*Department of Cultural Affairs, Russian State University of Sociology
Moscow, Russia*

Keywords

collective memory, historical consciousness, historical memory, school textbooks

In the framework of the Immanuel Kant German Academic Exchanges Service programme and The Development of Scientific Potential of Higher School in 2006-2008 (N2.2.2.2.16231) Russian federal programme I have conducted in 2008 the comparative analysis national historical consciousness in Germany and Russia based on the analysis of school textbooks of history and the small-scale survey of schoolchildren from these countries.

The school system of historical education and textbooks of history are major sources of shaping historical consciousness, both a vehicle and a means of shaping collective historical memory.

The traditions of historical school education in Russia and Germany show different approaches to the understanding of general and national history.

In Germany the study of common history is proposed (including world, national, regional and European dimensions). In the didactic tradition of Germany the notion of recollection culture (Erinnerungskultur) has been rooted. These peculiarities allow developing inclusiveness of historical memory (A. Assmans term) which is an important condition of coexistence in the global world. In Russia, on the contrary, world, national and regional histories are studied as separate disciplines.

Historical consciousness of German schoolchildren is more unified and structured and historical consciousness of Russian schoolchildren is more amorphous, but the interest to national history in young Russians is much higher than in Germans.

In the consciousness of German schoolchildren the idea of "the golden age" of national history - an historical period with special positive potential, which, however, has not been used (the time of Weimar Republic) - is expressed rather clearly. One can see several central ideas around which historical consciousness is organized (e.g. the idea of collective guilt).

Everyday consciousness in Germany shows both the higher level of historical participation and the higher level of mythologicality.

The role of the textbook as a source of shaping historical consciousness is more expressed in Germany than in Russia.

The German experience in creating a negotiated civil version of the past can be useful for the Russian society where the practice of civil "processing of the past" has, for different reasons, an episodic character.

Transmemory, Identity and the Boundaries of the Portuguese Postcolonial Nation

Basto, Maria-Benedita

Ecole des Hautes Etudes en Sciences Sociales, Centre d'Études Africaines

Paris, France

Keywords

memory, Postcolonial Nation, Return Migrants, War-Veterans

This paper examines a kind of transnational writing resulting from transmemory work. The concept of transmemory reproduces movements beyond established communitarian spaces, national ones or others, translating geographical and social migrant experiences. Its production implies the establishment of relationships among individual or group representations of the past in colonial situations, which impact the present. Countering binary categories and stereotypes, transmemories take up Frantz Fanon's idea of a decolonization that concerns both the colonized and the colonizer. Two perspectives will be interrelated: on the one hand, military life through the memorial production of soldiers of the colonial war, and, on the other hand, civic life as represented by the memories of "retornados", Portuguese settlers repatriated after the end of the empire. Memory work on the colonial war started in the 1970s. It gave rise to a diverse corpus of literary writings, biographies, diaries, films, documentaries, press publications, military history books, blogs, sites, conferences and commemorative trips. Public memorial production of "retornados" is more recent and mainly represented by a few novels, blogs, a televised soap opera, and coffee table books with photos of colonial cities. In contrast to the treatment of war memories, which tend to be more open to the present, this body possesses a strong nostalgic character that seems to be enforced by the rarity of exchanges involving the memories of those that stayed in Africa. Confronting civic memory work with its military counterpart not only improves our knowledge of its respective specificities, but also allows to overcome the division between these two realms which was upheld by the political propaganda of "Estado Novo". Most importantly, dealing with transmemory, allows us to grasp how the dynamics of identification and de-identification destabilize the established borders of the postcolonial nation.

Urban life, city planning and the rebuilding of public discourse

Fanizza, Fiammetta

Facoltà di Scienze della Formazione Continua, Università di Foggia (ITALIA)

Foggia, Italy

Keywords

politics, urban environment, city

Cities as places of civilisation demonstrate a progressive loss of cultural heritages and identity values. In a urban context there is a need to work out a lasting model of dialogue, in order to reconstruct social memory and logos and to set up means of collective involvement.

It is, first of all, a question of semantics that determines the comparison between the idea of urban landscape and that of human landscape as the communal habitat.

In particular, it's a question of establishing an interaction between the objectivity of a transformed environment and the subjectivity of the membership, between the subjectivity of the cultural rootedness and of the subjectivity of historical memories in order to look for and/or deepen teoretical perspectives about the organization of means of collective involvement compared to the urban area arrangement.

It is, advisable to think about the need to reestablish a public issue in a critical way considering the general behaviour of the governance and its consequent alienation feelings. This need is to find an historical and social capacity to translate mass interests into ways through which the social recognizability became an example to favour dialogical practices rather than allowing a narcissistic and private use of the places.

The reconstruction of the "public" involves a reconstruction of the language irrespective of the presence of power, of the rethorical expressive spreading forms to allow the restructuring of the public institutions role and their legitimate functions.

The transformation of the welfare state into a trading state requires the statement of a new sovereignty which conceptualizes again the urban environment mainly to limit the growing political influence of the lobbies.

The erosion of the solidarity concept has produced not only a crossbreeding of the public organizational forms but it has created a social immovability too. Because of that, all the elements of the urban territory and all the actors of the social system have to take on the responsibilities to affirm relations in order to find new connections between things and people.

War Commemoration in Post-Soviet Russia: ceremonies, symbols and practices

Danilova, Nataliya

School of Politics and International Relations, University of Nottingham Nottingham, UK

Keywords

politics, war commemoration, practices of memory

The processes of re-making war narratives in post-communist countries are a popular agenda of research in contemporary social sciences (Wolentarska-Ochman 2006, Onken 2007, Rondewald 2008, etc). Scholars examine how these societies revise memory of the Second World War; how they apply the new narrative in order to achieve reconciliation and enhance the newly found national/collective identity. It might be suggested that the experience of post-Soviet Russia occurred to be less examined. Between possible reasons for academic reluctance may be an assumed continuity of the Russian collective identity or its almost uncontested authoritarian character. This project questions these assumptions. It suggests that the understanding of war/military conflicts has been changing over the last twenty years in Russia. This change affects the memory of the Second World War and memory of post-Soviet military conflicts.

This paper seeks to investigate the political and social meanings of war commemoration which is expressed in ceremonies, monuments, and popular practices of "using" memorial sites. This approach is grounded in research methodology that considers war memory as a dynamic process of social interaction between state, survivors and public (Ashplant, Dawson, Roper 2000, Misztal 2003).

The paper is structured around memorial sites. This approach contrasts with traditional method to concentrate on analysis of the WWII memory as a dominant war narrative in Russia (Forest, Johnson 2002, Onken 2007, Khazanov 2008). The empirical sources for this paper are two memorial sites. One site is in the capital of Russia, Moscow (Poklonnaia Gora). Another is in Perm, provincial industrial town, situated in Ural. These memorial places demonstrate how various war narratives interrelate and compete with each other in one geographical place. Both cases have the memorial parks in the central part of the cities with monuments dedicated to different war/military conflicts. The paper also illuminates popular practices of "using" and "consuming" memorial space. It discusses diversity of social functions of these places in post-Soviet society ranged from official war commemoration ceremonies to leisure activity and weddings photos. The empirical sources are ethnographic observations, media analysis, analysis of visuals images and interviews with visitors.

What is the meaning of the past for young people? The sociological portrait of the contemporary visitors to the memorial sites of the former Nazi death camps

Stec, Katarzyna

*Department of Sociology, The Jagiellonian University
Krakow, Poland*

Keler, Karolina

*Department of Sociology, The Jagiellonian University
Krakow, Poland*

Keywords

commemoration, collective memory and identity, contemporary youth, memorial sites

The aim of the paper is to present the sociological portrait of the contemporary visitors to the memorial sites of the former Nazi death camps in a wider context, and it is the result of the combined research project containing both: advanced quantitative modelling and qualitative deepening of the subject.

The portrayed characteristics focus particularly on the expectations and motivations of these visitors, as well as the importance of the visit and the very process of learning about the history and the past; that is, identified experiences that have the pivotal influence on these young visitors, the most important aspects of the visit, and knowledge provided for them. These portrait is based on the outcomes of quantitative sociological empirical research conducted among international youth (the secondary school children) visiting memorial sites in Poland such as the Auschwitz-Birkenau State Museum, State Museum at Majdanek, and the Memorial Site at Belzec. To analyse these sociological characteristics, log-linear models with latent classes were used. The application of this multivariable approach is the consequence of the main analytical problem: finding the types of these visitors and correlate them to the characteristics that have explanatory function, such as nationality, age, gender or preparation for the visit.

Additionally, the contemporary visitors are analysed from the perspective of guides of these memorial sites, with whom focus group interviews were conducted. Particularly, the paper explores behaviour of these young people during the visit. Moreover, it contains the reflexion on the discussion about the significance of the history and the past in building or strengthening a collective memory and historical awareness of young generations. Finally, the paper arises additional questions about the identity as a process of the constant merging of the different understandings and interpretations of the historical and symbolical meanings of the past. All these additional facts in relation to the identified types of contemporary visitors to the memorial sites of the former Nazi death camps are used to provide a full explanatory portrait of them.

RS08

Modernization Theory. Dead or Alive in the 21st Century?

Digging for Democracy Modernization, Development and Archaeology in Greece

Lalaki, Despina

*Department of Sociology, The New School for Social Research
New York, USA*

Keywords

Development, modernization, classical archaeology.

How has modernization theory conditioned our system of knowledge and thought? How have modernization and development shaped our academic practices? And how did scholarship come to play such a primary role in the project of democratizing the world? By way of answering these questions we may find that we never actually parted with modernization theory and that it has been harbored and reproduced even by the most improbable of all disciplines; classical archaeology.

One might say that the debate following WWII about the relation between federal government and the social sciences was not pertinent to the discipline of classical archaeology for the minor effect that the discipline could have on the formulation of public policy. If one looks towards the direction of representational politics, however, a different story unravels. In this paper, I examine the history of the American School of Classical Studies at Athens (ASCSA), one of the most prominent institutions of classical studies internationally. I argue that the underlying ideology that sustained the relationship between the government and archaeologists, who enlisted as "social scientists" supported the war efforts, persisted long after the war and exerted influence upon the School's work. The primacy of democracy and the importance of liberal economy for world peace were best represented by the ASCSA, which draws much of its prestige from excavating the Athenian Agora, the symbolic birthplace of western democracy. Supported by governmental and private institutions the School projected to the world the image of post-war America as it was meant to be exemplified in free, scientific, non-political research.

Unlike anthropology and other disciplines, which have been subjected to this kind of scrutiny, classical archaeology and its institutions have not been studied under this light. This study opens new directions for a field, which has been criticized for nourishing ideas of western cultural superiority but its political dimensions remain in the dark; furthermore, it problematizes the relation between modernization theory and scholarship and places it in historical perspective.

Divergence of Transformation Processes in Post-Communist Societies: a Civilization Context

Shkaratan, Ovsey

Chair for Economic Methodology and History, State University- Higher School of Economics
<http://www.hse.ru/org/persons/65591/index.html>,

Yastrebov, Gordey

Center for Fundamental Studies, State University - Higher School of Economics
Moscow, Russia

Keywords

civilization differences, post-socialist transformation, modernization theory, socio-economic systems

The discussion of transformation outcomes has become increasingly tense in the recent years and is now challenging contemporary social sciences. Two major approaches can be distinguished today. According to one of them, transformation is a linear process and it refers to logical transition from non-market to market economy. Such understanding of social development constitutes the classic theory of modernization (W.Rostow, T.Parsons). Similar lack of alternativeness is also a characteristic of the increasingly popular world-system analysis (I.Wallerstain).

Yet it can be argued that institutional and value systems, which determine the inner logics of social development, are not so universal in nature. The end of 1990s has seen the rise of new theories of non-European modernity, the variety of capitalisms and the trend towards distinguishing modernization from westernization. These ideas have received much support in developing countries. We too argue that the difference of transformation outcomes in European and Eurasian areas cannot be adequately explained in terms of single-vector deterministic model. The reason for the emerging variety of socio-economic developments may very well lie in the inner civilization differences between countries.

By merely accepting the multilinearity of transformation in the post-communist world we can explain the divergence of development paths in different societies and their economic performance after liberal reforms. The contemporary Russian society, as well as its Soviet predecessor, belongs to a specific (Eurasian) civilization and it is substantially different from European (Atlantic) civilization with its strong traditions for private property, market and the rule of law.

By analyzing data from three consequent surveys we have found some empirical evidence for a civilization-specific social organization in contemporary Russia. It is peculiar that classes and class relations immanent to capitalist societies do not exist in Russia in the sense they are usually perceived in European societies. What we have here can more likely be referred to as estates. Moreover, we discuss the results of other comparative research on basic values (evaluated according to G.Hofstede, S.Schwartz, etc.) and political culture (based on ESS waves) of different societies to substantiate our concept of existent civilization heterogeneity and its socio-economic effects.

From modernity through postmodernity to reflexive modernization. Did we learn anything?

Heiskala, Risto

*Institute for Social Research, University of Tampere
University of Tampere, Finland*

Keywords

reflexive modernization, Postmodernity, Modernity

Modernization, in the sociological tradition, was usually understood as increasing differentiation, i.e., as a process in which the demands of valorization of capital make "all that is solid melt into air" (Marx) and transition from mechanical to organic solidarity (Durkheim) is a consequence of the differentiation of valuespheres (Weber) or subsystems of the social system (Parsons). Theorists differed in degree of optimism or pessimism and the detailed interpretation of the process of differentiation but they all shared the view that modernization meant opening of new horizons. When Lyotard's Knowledge in Postmodern Society was published (in 1979 in French and 1984 in English) it transformed the aesthetic postmodernism debate to a debate about postmodern society. Contrary to the tradition of differentiation theoretical sociology the pamphlet interpreted modernization as a process in which the plurality of local cultural traditions was destroyed and their various narratives rearticulated under the repressive metanarratives of science, progress and enlightenment into a unified modern canon. According to that view the metanarrative of enlightenment created a one-dimensional world. Postmodernity, then, was for Lyotard a welcome new opening which meant the flourishing of alternative cultural interpretations and identities based on the various newly emerging local narratives. Sociologists were first at odds with this new interpretation until Beck, Giddens and Lash in their Reflexive Modernization (1994) and related publications brought up the idea of modernity in two phases. According to them the first phase brought up "traditional modernity" which was based on cultural closures such as unified class-identities, nationalities and fixed gender-identities. "Traditional modernity" itself was a result of differentiation but the continuation of the process of differentiation made it transform into "second" or "reflexive modernity" where several traditions lived side by side and the "life political" condition of every member of society was characterized by the "possibility and necessity of choosing between traditions" (Giddens) just as the postmodernists claimed. A huge debate emerged. The paper asks, did we learn anything about the debate on reflexive modernization and if so, can the lessons learned be used fruitfully in the study of contemporary society?

From the margins to the centre: Post-modern geographies in the study of gentrification

Mendes, Luís

*Centre for Geographical Studies, University of Lisbon
Lisboa, Portugal*

Keywords

Gentrification, post-modernity, geography, urban studies.

For the past three decades, the housing market of historical centres in advanced capitalist cities has experienced significant changes, with the emergence of new housing products and of new housing formats, with consequences in the urban spatial organisation. In fact, according to a great number of authors, these changes have been outlining the recentralisation trend regarding the revaluation of areas in the inner city and includes the rehabilitation of old places and the re-usage of under-occupied areas, besides the more permanent processes of renovation in some areas, or zoning, all leading to gentrification processes.

In a final stage in the study of gentrification, the analysis of the phenomenon has focused on theories of production and consumption. The explanations tended to be different from one another, each one aimed at privileging the supremacy of one sphere in relation to the other in the study of this process. The first theories have managed to emphasise the importance of capital and the different institutional agents (State, Local Government, Banks and other financial institutions) in the restructuring process of urban space. In this perspective, gentrification results from the movement of capital circulation in urban areas, which explains this process through the devaluation that affects the urban land, regarding the income that a new investment can bring. On the other hand, the theories that privilege consumption understand gentrification as a direct consequence of demographic and social changes and people's lifestyle of certain middle class sectors, in the values consumption patterns associated with them.

The development of this article is based on the discussion and theoretical reflection about the general issues related to the recent post-modern trends regarding the evolution of geographical thought and of its repercussion on the methodology and conceptualisation in the study of gentrification. We intend to interpret this theme of urban geography within the framework of the general normative positions of this movement that explains the social and spatial reality in the scope of the Epistemology of Geography and the Philosophy of Science in general.

Modernization in the Arab countries of the Mashreq region

Veira Ramos, Alberto

*Sociology, Carlos III University
Getafe, Spain*

Sánchez Barricarte, Jesús Javier

*Sociology, Carlos III University
Getafe, Spain*

Keywords

modernization, Mashreq, women emancipation process

The most populated countries of the Mashreq region, Egypt, Jordan, Lebanon, Palestine, Saudi Arabia and Syria have witnessed substantial socio-demographic changes which allow to think they are deeply involved in a modernization process.

Increases on literacy rates as well as decreases on infant mortality and fertility rates experienced by the countries of the Mashreq region are notorious for being the fastest in the history of the world. However, important differences continue to exist between them concerning variables considered by many sociologists to be strongly associated with modernization such as urbanization, tertiaritiation of the economy and the process of women emancipation. This has contributed to shape a landscape of great regional heterogeneity and diversity. On this paper, we present statistical data obtained mainly from the United Nations, the US Census Bureau and the International Labour Office data sets, to draw conclusions on the complex existing relationship between different indicators of modernization in the above mentioned countries, and to explain why, under certain circumstances, they should not be expected to evolve concomitantly.

A rough description of how these variables have interacted in a rather counter-intuitive fashion in the region could be the following: Higher levels of income per capita such as those of Saudi Arabia have led to improvements on female schooling but also allow larger number of households to continue attached to a model of a sole male breadwinner. They also facilitate earlier emancipation from parental households of young adults and earlier formation of couples (in particular the occurrence of early marriages, those in which the wife is younger than 20 years old). Thus, it should not be surprising that female participation rates are higher in a country like Syria (with lower GDP per capita and lower rates of female literacy and university enrolment) than in Saudi Arabia. In Syria, as in Jordan and Lebanon, data on income per capita and female employment suggests that the revenues from womens activity in the labour market is needed in a larger number of households than in Saudi Arabia.

Networking and self-organising societies: the fields of tension of our modernity

Vando, Borghi

*Sociology, University of Bologna
Bologna, Italy*

Keywords

responsibility, network, individualisation

The metaphor of the network is probably one of the most successful self-representations of our current societies. Moreover, it is sometimes used in a more deep way than a simple metaphor, because it seems to provide the most effective vocabulary for understanding crucial social processes: the modern corporation and more in general the "new spirit of capitalism", in which being connected is the first prerequisite; but also the "passage from government to governance", concerning the great issues of public administration and policies, being justified, independently from the specific sector focussed on, as the necessary passage requested by the art of governing in times of networks. Moreover, network organizational model is usually presented as more democratic and open, compared to the traditional modern hierarchical devices. Organising via vertical devices - institutions, political representative systems, etc. - has to leave space to the self-organising, horizontal society via networks. So, the new framework through which reinterpreting the concept of modernization seems to be ready: network paradigms and models.

The paper intends to point out some fields of tensions that anyway are produced in the real working of that grammar of justification. More precisely, have to be deepened:

- the way that grammar of justification addresses a fundamental historical process of the Western societies, that is the process of individualization
- the increasing problem of a definition of responsibility's concept in a context in which networks claim themselves as able to produce, manage and apply it by themselves in their own bonds

Social Development: Unrefined or Undefined?

Shipman, Alan

*Economics, Open University
Milton Keynes, UK*

Keywords

Development, Evolution, modernization, progress

"Economic development" and "political development" have been relatively easy to define, measure, theorise and advocate. Even if it has been difficult to reach agreement on what causes them, and how best to promote them, there is broad agreement on what constitutes economic progress (towards greater prosperity) and political progress (towards democracy and civil society). Economic and political science owe much of their intellectual legitimacy and policy influence to this definitional success. "Social development" has, this paper argues, not been open to the same consensus definition, measurement or advocacy. This has sidelined sociology's central concept of modernization, causing the discipline to lose influence despite the centrality of social problems and policy to contemporary debate. Successive social, psychological and anthropological studies - including the recent cluster of Happiness and Capability projects - constantly undermine any attempt to rank societies as more or less socially developed, challenge any suggestion of a social development as correlated with economic or political development, and rule out the measurable pursuit of social development as an end in itself.

This paper identifies eight main approaches to social development, all emerging from the original Modernization theory: Utilitarianism, Evolution, Mobility/Meritocracy, Equality/Citizenship, Growth of Knowledge, Risk/Security and Human Rights. It shows that each, though sometimes attaining initial acceptance, has later become contested to the point where it loses intellectual or popular acceptance. The paper then reviews more recent attempts to connect social development with economic or political development, but argues that any synthesis has been achieved only by submerging the social element. Relativism, postmodernism, path-dependency and reflexivity, among the most powerful discoveries of social enquiry and therefore readily appropriated by social theory, are shown as inherently obstructive to defining social development, and even to preserving the "social" as a meaningful category. The paper concludes by considering whether sociology could gain greater influence by filling-in this gap in theories of development, or owes its remaining influence to the persistence of the gap.

The cultural underpinnings of contemporary modernity: a world-polity perspective on regional mobilisation in Europe

Büttner, Sebastian

*Bremen International Graduate School of Social Sciences (BIGSSS), University of Bremen
Bremen, Germany*

Keywords

europe, world culture, EU Cohesion policy, sociological neo-institutionalism, new culturalist theory

Definitely, "grand narratives" of modernization predicting unitary paths of change and increasing homogeneity have increasingly raised suspicion. However, if we look around, if we look at the activities of states, organizations and countless professionals all around the world, we get the impression that the old myths of modernisation, the old beliefs in future progress and governability of human development, are vivid as ever before. State bureaucracies and ever more International Organisations outline more and more programmes and strategies for "active intervention". Moreover, apart from traditional state organisations a whole army of all kinds of humanitarian organizations are constantly concerned with interventions and "managing" projects of human progress and modernization.

Starting from basic assumptions of world-polity approach this paper introduces a culturalist perspective on modernization that is able to account for both the global dimension and the strong modernist impetus of current changes and transformations. Hence, despite all suspicion regarding modernist approaches, modernization is not dead at all. In fact, it must be understood as fundamental practice and experiences of modernity actualizing in numerous projects of social mobilization around general and highly rationalized goals of development. While acknowledging that there are "multiple" and contingent paths of social change we must consider all these processes as embedded in a broader "cultural" background, a particular highly scientific "world culture" (John Meyer) of professionals, experts, and scientists determining appropriate "actorhood" as well as means and ends of human development. Yet, the idea of world-cultural development should not be confused with simplistic notions of increasing formal-rational standardisation (or: "McDonaldization"). Rather, we must see "world culture" as a basis of diverse and contingent development bringing about dozens of "unintended consequences". However, from "world-polity"-perspective the major directions of development and the way society is mobilized are structured in similar "reflexive" ways, and the perception of "unintended consequences" further accelerates efforts of social change and modernisation.

This thesis world-cultural development will be specified at the example of my current research on regional development strategies within the framework of EU Cohesion policy mobilizing localities all over Europe on the basis of similar goals, standards, and practices.

The modernization framework as a means of justification: the case of medical biotechnology development strategies

Syväterä, Jukka

*Department of Social Research, University of Tampere
Tampere, Finland*

Keywords

modernization, Medical biotechnology, Governmentality

The modernization framework as a means of justification: the case of medical biotechnology development strategies

Even if modernization theory is not so popular among the contemporary sociologists, it seems that many fundamental assumptions of earlier sociological discourse of modernization are still embedded in everyday thinking. The positive images associated with modernity are still guiding all kinds of reforms throughout the world. Economic development and advancement of human rights, for example, are understood as unavoidable prerequisites for modernization. Especially in respect of technological progress, nation-states are assumed to be destined to follow an evolutionary developmental path, which is understood as the only way to guarantee the well-being of their population. Because nation-states aspire to be modern, they engage themselves with reforms that are guided by the optimistic expectations about new technologies. The most part of the hype connected to the cutting-edge sciences and technologies associates now with life-sciences and biotechnology. In fact, it could be said that investing to development of biotechnology has begun to symbolize nation-state's will to be dynamic, progressive and modernizing.

The aim of the study is to find out how this modernization framework is used in justification of reforms which are directed for intensifying the development and utilization of medical applications of biotechnology. Data to be analyzed consists of biotechnology strategies and other documents relating to projects and policies that are aimed to boost medical biotechnology. The modernization framework will be interpreted from two theoretical standpoints. Firstly, Michel Foucault's governmentality approach is employed because it emphasizes the role of desires and hopes (of progress and modernization, for example) and the way they have been exploited and shaped in attempts to govern. Secondly, the modernization framework is interpreted from the point of view of world polity theory. Modernization is thought in terms of world cultural models. It is argued in this study that the modernization framework plays an important role in the process in which reforms connected to new technologies are carried out in nation-states.

Theorizing racialization as modernization: interpreting social change in Russia

Zakharov, Nikolay

*Sociology, Uppsala University
Uppsala, Sweden*

Keywords

russia, social theory, modernization, racialization, entangled modernities

Despite the fact that racism and the processes of race-making have often been recognised as one of the attributes of modernity, they remain underdeveloped on a theoretical level. This becomes clear when one takes into account the absence of work on analysis of the processes of racialization in "different" modernities. Whereas in western countries, anti-modernization sentiments were characterized by nostalgia for lost traditions, the Soviet view of the anomies of modernity allowed no looking backwards. Aimed at drastically transforming its society and battling against "the backwardness for which we've been punished" in the economic, research and education spheres, the race concept was developed using possibilities opened up by Enlightenment methodologies. At the same time, racism was seen as the salient evil of capitalism, successfully overcome in the process of socialistic modernization. The analysis I offer of racialization processes in Soviet and post-Soviet Russia allows one, firstly, to demonstrate the centrality of analyzing the processes of racialization in order to understand the processes of socio-historical change conceptualized in terms of modernization theory. Western modernity remains the only frame of reference for an analysis of the success of modernization, but only in the sense that its antinomies become a challenge which is taken up by "alternative modernities". The internal contradictions of modernity, which allow one to speak of the postmodern condition and of reflexive modernization, are also characteristic of a key concept of modernity such as race, which holds the social fabric together at the same time as undermining the unity of society, thus operating in a dialectical fashion. Secondly, in this paper I argue that racialization processes in the post-communist world cannot be considered to be either "fake modernization", or a return to traditionalization, but rather a compromise between modernizing imperatives and the constraints of communist legacy, between a striving towards global unity and ethnic-centred particularism, a compromise which consists of indigenous Russian traditions containing pro-modernization themes. I argue that it is possible to apply both path dependency and "latecomers-learning" approaches to the analysis of social change in Russia and thereby affirm the continuing viability of some insights of modernization theory.

Towards a New Sociology of Change for the Extended Borders of Europe: An Evaluation of the Revision and the Criticism of Modernization Theory to Understand EU Enlargement

Çampinari, Tevfik

*Department of Sociology, Hacettepe University
Ankara, Turkey*

Keywords

Globalization, modernization theory, EU enlargement, postcolonial theory, multiple modernities

From 1960's, the most remarkable criticism of structural-functionalist modernization approaches developed as a result of the historical categorizations between traditional and developed forms of societies since Enlightenment was focused on the linear representation of historical progress and the convergent model of development. The latter concepts like multiple modernities and alternative modernities were attempts to overcome the linear and convergent aspects of the previous modernization approaches and these concepts were revisions of the theory in some wise. Nevertheless, a radical criticism of modernization theory was put forth by scholars of postcolonial analysis with a broader critical approach that could be applied countries which does not have a colonial past. However, these two tendencies had some drawbacks which could be expressed as breaking off the connection of social science with the historical process itself. The drawback of the revision of modernization theory was achieving a high level of abstraction independent from historical processes and insisting implicitly on the uniqueness of the forward historical path for societies while accepting the multiplicity of backward (past) paths. On the other hand, the drawback of the radical criticism of modernization theory coming into existence by postcolonial analysis was disownment of the history and accepting it as a product of Western hegemony. When the enlargement and the demographic changes of EU are considered, it may be seen that this process not only creates new interdependencies, new integrations and new homogeneities but it also generates new antagonisms, new identity crises and new fragmentations observed with newly arising nationalist movements and discriminations. It is possible to consider this process as a self-definition and a reconstruction process. The main aim of this paper is to question the limitations and applicability of radical criticisms as well as alternative concepts of modernization when analysing the EU enlargement in relation with globalization. Another aim is to analyse the cases of new members in Eastern Europe and the case of Turkey as a candidate in terms of convergences to estimate the direction of future approaches that would be substitutable with the former modernization theory and the role of sociology to analyse the EU enlargement.

Was the Soviet Union modern?

Gronow, Jukka

*Department of Sociology, Uppsala University
Uppsala, Sweden*

Keywords

Modernity, social institutions, fashion, cultural transfer

Was the Soviet Union modern? This is the core question in the lively controversy that has been going on among the historians of the Soviet Union and socialist Eastern Europe in general since the collapse of communism. On the one hand, the "Modernists", "led" by Stephen Kotkin, the author of the famous work "Magnetic Mountain", have emphasised that the building of socialism shared many of the tendencies and aspirations essential to the project of modernity like economic and scientific progress, urbanization, etc. On the other hand, the "Neo-Traditionalists", "led" by Sheila Fitzpatrick, have repeatedly pointed out that despite some of its seemingly modern features, the Soviet Union was more traditional than modern lifting up, among others, the role of clientilism and the importance of ascribed social statuses, both ethnic and professional, as well as the privileges and corruption following from them (that is, a kind of pseudo-estates). The answer to this question undoubtedly depends on what one means by a modern society or modernity. As is usual in scientific disputes like this, the adversaries often talk about different things and thus their arguments, however well-founded, fail to convince the other side.

In a recent article, summarizing the dispute, Michael David-Fox suggested that we should pay more attention to the concrete forms of cultural transfer between the capitalist West and the socialist East and to the various ways in which they were adapted and modified in their countries of destination. In this paper, we shall follow his suggestion by describing and analysing one specific, important field of Soviet consumption: the clothes fashion. If we are to believe the great sociologist of modernity, Georg Simmel, fashion, if anything, is essential to our experience of modernity. According to Johan Arnason, in evaluating the multiple paths to modernity it is exactly the experience of modernity which is important. We shall describe both the establishment of the major social institutions and organizations of fashion as well as the development of the aesthetic and moral discourse or etiquette, which regulated or guided the common Soviet man and woman in their everyday relations with fashion.

World polity theory as a new theory of modernization

Alasuutari, Pertti

*Department of Social Research, University of Tampere
Lempäälä, Finland*

Keywords

modernization theory, neoinstitutionalism, World Polity Theory

The paper discusses whether world polity theory (Meyer 2000; Meyer et al. 1997) can be considered as a new modernization theory. According to it, world models shape nation-state identities, structures, and behaviour via worldwide cultural and associational processes. Consequently, nation-states are more isomorphic than most theories would predict and change more uniformly than is commonly recognized. As a theory, it is neoinstitutionalist rather than functionalist; it does not assume that the direction of change is somehow predetermined or that the social system of advanced market economies are the natural end result of social change. Related to that, it does not argue that the institutions created necessarily serve primary functions of human societies. Yet it is an interpretation of the same development that Parsons' modernization theory (Parsons 1964; 1966) talked about. Furthermore, one of its representatives, John Meyer, makes a distinction between instrumental and expressive culture, and argues that world models spread in the area of instrumental culture appealing to rationality. In that sense he comes close to the rationalization thesis. However, it can be concluded that world polity theory is a critical explanation for the isomorphic development of regional states, often referred to as modernization or globalization, not a theory that seeks to justify it by presenting the direction of change as functional and thus predictable.

RS09

Research Methods in Ethnic and Migration Studies

A qualitative approach to the study of immigrants: health and care of irregular immigrants in the city of Naples

Gagliardi, Adele Stefania

Agenzia Regionale Sanitaria, Regione Puglia

Bari, Italy

Keywords

irregular immigrants, health and care, qualitative methodology, Southern Italy, récits de vie

Italian legislation states that irregular immigrants may receive urgent or essential medical and hospital care from the public health structures. Many immigrants, however, either due to diffidence or ignorance, do not make the most of the rights provided to them by law. This inspired the author to investigate the healthcare irregular immigrants use outside the institutions officially delegated to resolving their health problems, performing a study in the city of Naples, a large metropolis in the South of Italy, and the destination of consistent migratory flow since the 1970s.

Considering its particular object, a qualitative methodology was used to conduct this study. This did not, however, exclude the use of what quantitative data is available on the subject, in order to obtain a clearer picture of the context in which the study is performed; this information also enabled the author to elaborate a reliable estimate of the irregular immigrant population, valid for the territory and the period of the study.

Within the situation delineated by the quantitative data she then inserted the qualitative approach based on Daniel Bertaux's "récits de vie": in fact, she preferred to build a communicational relationship with each immigrant in which he or she was given the occasion to talk about themselves and their own experience of immigration rather than keeping the contact within the strict boundaries of an interview focussing only on healthcare. Overall the author performed 40 interviews, 10 with privileged observers and 30 with irregular immigrants.

In particular, the methodology used allowed her to highlight the centrality of the meso level in the subject studied, in the sense that immigrants' healthcare was closely connected to the quality of the relational network to which they belonged. This contributed to show that the world of irregular immigrants is more composite than we can consider and there are surprising affinities and separations between irregular immigrants, regular immigrants and citizens within a contemporary society which is becoming ever more complex.

Applying Internet ethnography in a study of transnational practices

Virkama, Anna

*Department of Education, University of Tampere
Tampere, Finland*

Keywords

Migration, Internet ethnography, transnational practices

Most scholars in the field of transnational migration recognize the importance of new communication technologies in creating and maintaining social relations across the national borders. For transnational migrants, Internet offers a space for social organization and networking. It also offers a place to display emerging, new cultural identities in different types of virtual communities. Yet, so far only few studies focus on possibilities of Internet in studying transnational migrants' everyday practices and networks.

This paper explores the possibilities of applying Internet ethnography as a complimentary method in studies on transnational migrants' everyday practices. Concrete examples are taken from the author's on-going PhD study that focuses on transnational practices, strategies and networks of Moroccan students in France. The data of this study combines 20 semi-structured face-to-face interviews combined with interviews conducted 'online' (i.e. on Internet), together with observations both online and offline.

Today, North Africans in France do not necessarily share the same experience of "double absence" (Sayad, 1999) of the first generation immigrants, since the new communication technologies allow virtual presence both "here and there". Internet provides an accessible way of staying in real time contact with friends and relatives in other countries. Therefore, discussions with family members abroad, using applications such as Skype or MSN Messenger that allow live video conversations, have become a part of everyday routine to many transmigrants. At the same time, different internet discussion forums and free-access social networking websites such as Facebook offer new platforms and spaces where identities and belongings can be negotiated in new ways. Students are often among the early adapters of new communication technologies.

Applying on the empirical data, this paper addresses the following questions:

- 1) How Internet ethnography can be implemented in the studies of transnational practices as a complimentary method?
- 2) What kind of methodological possibilities and challenges emerge when Internet ethnography is combined with "traditional" ethnographic methods such as interviews and observations?
- 3) How Moroccan students use Internet in their transnational practices?

AUDIOvisual sociology, participation and migrations. An hypothesis of a shift of power

Collizzolli, Stefano

*Dipartimento di Sociologia, Università degli studi di Padova
Italy, <http://www.zalab.tv>*

Keywords

back-talk, power differential, video, visual approach, participatory video

The basic assumption of this paper is that an (audio)visual and participatory research approach appears to be very well suited for the Ethnic and Migration Studies field.

That assumption will be illustrated through the comparison of two case studies.

1. Visual method has been widely used to study underprivileged people. Without falling into a naïf iconism, it's possible to affirm that visual methods can overcome intercultural difficulties and linguistic incommensurability.

2. Participatory methods, meant as an explicit attempt to maximize the authorship of the researched, have been developed to try decrease the power differential between the ethnographer and the *ethnographied(s)* - or between the trainer and the trainees. They thus seems very appropriate for a power unbalanced situation.

3. I will develop my argumentations through comparing two case studies.

The first one, "Does Bologna Integrate?" was a participatory video process involving 12 students from Bologna University and 6 asylum seekers. Through an auto-narrative approach, we were willing to investigate the impact of an EU social integration project, integRARsi.

The second one "As Human Being and Citizens" was a dissemination video of Wave, an EU-funded research that investigated access to and perception of local welfare by immigrants. We discussed the research outcomes together with women from Romania and Nigeria, and filmed the discussion.

4. Through a year long process, "Does Bologna Integrate" provided a deep insight on asylums seeker's perception about their daily life in Italy; on the other hand, it showed some limitations of participatory approaches, when carried out in formal and institutional settings.

5. "As Human Being and Citizens" was meant as a tool to discuss with persons that normally would not be reachable through University workshops; it has been something more. By a participative scriptwriting, research outcomes were re-hierarchized, and validated through a form of back-talk; and many issues not considered during the research came to light.

Between "objective" and "subjective" quality of life measures. Material living standards and individual perception of life in a central Bosnia and Herzegovina area

Parra Saiani, Paolo

*Dipartimento di Ricerca sociale, Università Cattolica di Milano - Facoltà di Sociologia
Milano, Italy*

Perino, Maria

*Dipartimento di Ricerca sociale, Università del Piemonte Orientale
Alessandria, Italy*

Keywords

quality of life, Bosnia i Herzegovina, objective and subjective measures

The lack of congruency between "subjective" and "objective" measures in the quality of life studies has been subject of discussion since long time (Diener e Suh 1997; Easterlin 1995; Oswald 1997; Cantril (1965), Ouweneel e Veenhoven (1991), Diener et. al. (1995), Schyns (1998) and Hagerty and Veenhoven (2003).

The paper will follow this line using data recollected in a survey conducted in the Zavidovici's area (Bosnia Herzegovina), a small rural village which population is characterized by different migration experiences and by an ethnic and religious self identification. 150 women were interviewed using a questionnaire aimed at studying material living standards and subjective satisfaction on life. Our aim is not to re-open an ancient debate on the theoretical soundness of different type of measures, but to show another occasion in which looking at only one "side of the street" may be a source of misinterpretation.

Conducting migration research in transnational social fields

Cukut, Sanja

Sociomedical Institute, Scientific Research Centre of the Slovenian Academy of Sciences and Arts
<http://dmi.zrc-sazu.si/?q=en/node/35>,

Keywords

Life stories, female migrants, ethnic group, qualitative approaches

The proposed paper will draw on my experience within an international research project on migration (female migrants) in 2006-2007 and on my ongoing research work that deals with the categorisation and classification of different migrant groups along gender, ethnic and class lines in migration policy at the EU level, using primarily biographic approaches understood as connecting migrant experience to the wider socio-political framework. By using mainly feminist epistemological and methodological insights that point to the importance of studying the social position of the researcher and its relevance for the social interaction with the research participants and the production of knowledge, the paper will focus on three main issues:

- The potential and difficulties of conducting migration research across and beyond ethnic lines (de-ethnicising migration research, e.g. units of analysis), the issue of comparability of such research results and the dangers of essentialising ethnic identities, i.e. migrants of specific ethnic groups by assuming the equivalence of culture, community, ethnic category and ethnic identity;
- The issue of the my own standpoint mainly across gender and ethnic (being a woman and having ethnic minority background) and also age and class lines; and the issue of 'juggling' between being constructed as both an insider and outsider by the collocutors and understanding how these diverse social positions construct and influence the research process;
- How the transnational activities, organising and civic participation of migrants are transforming our research fields beyond the 'traditional' nation-state paradigm, how the distinction between immigrants and nationals is increasingly blurred, denaturalised, no longer taken for granted, and what the possibilities and challenges of conducting more transnational research in migration studies are.

The paper will explore these issues through a detailed analysis of ethnographic material, collected with interviews and participant observation with female migrants from Bosnia and Herzegovina and the former Soviet Union that live in Slovenia.

Constructing an empirical understanding of globalisation in the everyday lives of asylum-seeking refugees

Bergman, Jonny

Sociology, Umeå University Östersund, Sweden

Keywords

globalisation, refugee migration, asylum seeking, qualitative methods

The paper will discuss the issue of empirically strengthening the understanding of the relation between the individual asylum-seeking refugee and global structures of mobility and migration. My research involves the question of an empirical understanding of globalisation by arguing for the importance of studying social interaction in everyday lives as the source of knowledge. This means that bringing to the fore the asylum-seeking refugees' own experiences is especially important. By using a discussion on social interaction in connection to agency - structure interrelationships I propose a way forward to an understanding of globalising structures and practices.

For this occasion I will focus on the transferability and translation of the focus on social interaction in everyday life to theories dealing with structures and practices of globalisation. I will also turn to issues, practical as well as theoretical, of trustworthiness and ethics in the construction of data within the field. In my research this includes data from participant observations, interviews and other material produced in the context of being an asylum-seeking refugee from Afghanistan in Sweden.

I have so far found that the asylum-seeking refugees manage their time in waiting (partly) through seeking empowerment from and within a disempowering situation. They do this by searching for meaning and seeking to act. This searching and seeking is framed within structures and practices of both empowerment and disempowerment. It is within these frames I hope to find the relation to the more abstract levels of structures and practices of globalisation.

Apart from constructing a grounded analysis of the management of the difficult situation facing asylum-seeking refugees, such an empirical understanding of global refugee migration can also serve as an important background for moral and practical discussions on policies on asylum and the reception of refugees.

Discursive exclusion of migrants - towards a new concept of social exclusion

Herzog, Benno

Sociology and Social Antropology, University of Valencia Valencia, Spain

Keywords

discourse analysis, identity, Social exclusion

Migrants in Europe often are victims of processes of social exclusion and marginalization. Sociological research about this issue often is hampered by the fact that there are few sociological theories of social exclusion responding to the questions. What is social exclusion? Who or what is excluded in relation to what? How is exclusion produced? In social research, there is the additional problem of identifying migrants as a target group of social exclusion as traditional categories of nationality or ethnicity become blurred and therefore hinder the identification of the marginalized in terms of social groups.

The aim of this contribution is to show sociological discourse analysis models as helpful instruments for investigating migrants' social exclusion and to develop a new model of discursive exclusion.

The author's research results using discourse analysis of popular discourses and discourses in free daily newspapers are compared with other findings on that field. With Foucault, these discourses were presented as internal dislocation thus facilitating the development of new models of discursive exclusion.

It can be shown, how migrants are considered irrelevant in the hegemonic construction of their own identity, i.e. migrants as physical persons are excluded from the production of their social self. The concept of collective identity itself as a mechanism of social power and control has to be criticized as it is used to sustain hegemonic exclusion.

Dynamics of Migrations Across Time and Space. Multi-Sited Ethnography, Grounded Theory and History in Transnational Studies

Krzyzowski, Lukasz

DEPARTMENT OF SOCIOLOGY AND SOCIAL ANTHROPOLOGY, AGH UNIVERSITY OF SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY
Krakow, Poland

Keywords

transnational, multi-sited ethnography, history, Migration

Technological revolution, development of the modern long-distance communication and liberalization of migration policies of national countries, led to a change in the traditional patterns of migration. Theoreticians of migration, more and more often, tend to analyse foreign citizens movements in the context of transnational social space. Transnational communities create new, different socio-economical relations that function across different boundaries. In the paper I would like to present my research concerning transmigration from Radgoszcz, a small Polish community, in the end of 19th century and nowadays. I would like to focus on methodological issues concerning both historical and contemporary migration flows between the communities (sending and receiving). My research strategy was based on multi-sited ethnography and grounded theory approach. The empirical data have been gathered for three years - since 2005 till 2008. At the beginning this research was concerning contemporary migration process from Radgoszcz. The first thesis has been modified by historical data. The empirical data referring to the historical part of my research is based on diocesan archives in Tarnów and content analysis of local newspapers from 19th century. The empirical data related to the contemporary part of my research was collected with the use of focus group interviews conducted among transmigrants from Radgoszcz in Vienna and Radgoszcz and surveys of students (graduate classes) from Gymnasium in Radgoszcz. By using diversified data it was possible to discover three main phenomena. First of all, realized research strategy allows to see the local migration dynamics and social attitudes towards this life strategy across time and space. Secondly, the findings show that mass migration from the 19th century left numerous tracks in mentality, history and genealogy of contemporary citizens of this area. Contemporary migration from Radgoszcz continues the tradition on one hand, and global tendency on the other. Finally, by diversifying research methods in both sending and receiving societies it made possible to find the "constant" variable factors of transmigrants and their children's life strategies.

Escaping methodological nationalism - How migration research can profit of the sociology of space

Scheibelhofer, Elisabeth

*Institute of Sociology, University of Vienna
Vienna, Austria*

Keywords

theories of space, spatial migration research, methodological nationalism

Much scholarly work has been done during the last years covering transnational aspects or circular mobility of migrants. On a theoretical level, the insights gained in such empirical works have led to discussions of methodological nationalism and its damaging effects on migration research. Since then, migration scholars worked on possible escapes out of the troublesome consequences of nationalistic thinking.

In my presentation, I will suggest that a look into another area of sociology might help us out of this methodological-nationalist trap: The sociology of space suggests that space-informed methodological approaches can help us to go beyond nationalistic and hegemonic interests built into some of the migration methodology and methods. The literature on the sociology of space shows us that we are at the moment basically confronted with two conceptions of space: a container-like understanding on the one side and a relational, social constructivist view on the other side. Based on my empirical and theoretical work I would like to suggest a "space-sensitive" approach to migration research methodology. It is operating on three different levels:

- (1.) the level of the constructions of space the actors themselves are coming up with and their implications for social interaction;
- (2.) the level of space constructions migration scholars are (implicitly or explicitly) using when they are conducting their research;
- (3.) the level of social systems and institutions and constructions of space that are built into them (e.g. the nation-state, the national educational or labour market systems; the European Union, etc.)

Looking in such a way at the conceptions of space can give us insights into specific social contexts as to how they are bound to questions of power, of inclusion and exclusion - and thus questions intrinsically important to the analysis of ethnic relations and migration. Based on empirical examples of my own research I will argue that such a "space-sensitive" approach to migration might be of considerable help in order to escape the methodological nationalism already described during the last years.

Everyday life - stories from elderly refugees and migrants: "What am I to do?"

Ask, Torunn A.

*Department of sociology, social work and welfare studies, University of Agder
Kristiansand, Norway*

Keywords

partnership, elderly migrants, practitioner research

In partnership between university and practice we are exploring the theme: Social work in a multicultural society. The project has an action research approach. An ambition is to develop cooperation between researchers, practitioners and users of welfare agencies to investigate issues and increase knowledge about migrants and their situations. Part of the project investigates especially how elderly people (55+) with migrant backgrounds (mostly refugees) experience their meetings with the Norwegian society and the welfare system and how they express their everyday life in new frames. Qualitative interviews with elderly refugees are the main part of the empirical data. The migrants interviewed have been settled in Norway for five years or less.

The framework and background for the project is that all municipalities offer an introduction programme to everyone who has been granted a residence permit. The programme is compulsory for refugees, but not for those who are 55+. Although they have a possibility to attend, we may ask whether these individuals are being neglected in the official work that aims to contribute to equality in living conditions and diversity through employment, integration and participation. Another aspect is that the operating line of getting everyone into work may weaken the attention paid to elderly people's voices and contribution in society. They may as such become a minority within the minority. Persons 55+ are also in number a minority among those who apply for asylum and stay in Norway. We may question whether they have lost most and perhaps gained least through their changed conditions. We do not know, however, because little attention has been paid to their stories and viewpoints.

Methodologically the project involves practitioner research which also actualises ethical considerations because practitioners (together with researchers) perform interviews with the migrants who they also (partly) know from their position in the refugee services. One aims at developing and improving practice through scrutinising and critically investigating one's own practice. This represents challenges and interesting reflections.

This is an ongoing project and the presentation will deal with the experiences so far.

Following globalization. A grounded approach to pendular migration of Portuguese construction workers in Spain

Queirós, João

*Faculdade de Letras da Universidade do Porto, Instituto de Sociologia da Faculdade de Letras da Universidade do Porto
Porto, Portugal*

Monteiro, Bruno

*Faculdade de Letras da Universidade do Porto, Instituto de Sociologia da Faculdade de Letras da Universidade do Porto
Porto, Portugal*

Keywords

Ethnography, "pendular" migration, construction workers, grounded globalization

With this paper, we try to explore some methodological issues raised by an ongoing research on the transformations of work and work-related mobility in Northwest Portugal.

The research focus on the case of Portuguese "pendular" migrants working in construction and construction-related activities in Spain. Although in Northwest Portugal emigration has always been the strategy of a relevant number of families facing unemployment and low income, never like in the last few years had this weekly or fortnightly commuting of Portuguese workers to Spain been so intense, in result of declining economic growth rates and growing unemployment (we mustn't forget that the region's main industrial activities - textiles, clothing, footwear, furniture - are facing intense international competition).

Setting out from this general context - and after confronting ourselves with the results of other researches we were conducting in Northwest Portugal, all pointing out the growing social relevance of this "pendular" migration - , we decided to study these migrants' everyday experience, through a multi-sited and diachronic, though always "contemporary", ethnography. By doing research both in the migrants' communities of origin and in their worksites in Spain (we lived for a week with a group of construction workers in O Carballiño, Galicia), we were in better position to analytically reconstruct the set of social relations underlying this apparently rational "choice" to migrate and to better understand how migration is experienced in everyday life, and what kind of real personal and social consequences it implies.

But this grounded approach we propose is not only about getting to know the Portuguese migrants' everyday life. In fact, what we wanted to do was to construct a perspective on globalization "from below", using ethnography to set out from the real spatial and temporal experience of Portuguese migrants in Spain in order to explore its global context.

Gender, interviews , newspaper and successful migrants

Silius, Harriet

*Women's Studies, Åbo Akademi University
Åbo, Finland*

Keywords

interviews, newspaper, successful migrants, Gender

Journalist interviews with migrants

Feminist scholars have problematised the power asymmetries and the lack of reflection on interviewing in mainstream research. What kind of contribution to interview studies does feminist criticism offer? If there are methodological issues to address in research interviews, what about non-scientific ones? Can they be used as research data? If yes, what problems may occur? This paper problematises interviews in newspapers and magazines which are everyday reading but seldom discussed from a methodological point of view. While most texts on interviews address questions on how to do the interview, this paper gives examples of ways of analysing them and focuses on how theoretical questions shape the analysis.

The paper deals with journalist interviews with Swedish-speaking Finns, who have migrated to Sweden and who are working in the cultural field. I argue that migration studies benefit from paying attention to different types of migrants and to various social contexts. Not all migrants are extremely poor or arriving in an unfamiliar cultural context. Whereas the European public debate often considers migration as a problem, this paper concentrates on migrants who successfully contribute to cultural fields.

The paper draws on insights from a research project on integrated research methods in Gender and Migration Studies called Research Integration. The project showed how different research methods can lead to the illumination of the phenomenon of migration from very different angles. The participants of the project represented eight different countries (Finland, France, Germany, Hungary, Norway, Spain, Sweden and the UK). The analysed methods in Gender and Migration Studies were biographical methods, archival research, discourse analysis, phenomenological approaches, narrative methods, quantitative methods, visual methodologies, ethnographic approaches in addition to interviewing.

Get under Their Skin and in Their Shoes. How to Address the 'Race-of-interviewer' Effect in Qualitative Research with Ethnic Minorities

Van Kerckem, Klaartje

Sociology, University of Ghent

Gent, Belgium

Keywords

Ethnography, social desirability, race-of-interviewer effect, ethnic studies, imbalance in power

When it comes to studying minority groups, it is often suggested that it is better to opt for a researcher that belongs to that minority group, in order to gain access to respondents and accurate answers more easily. The fact that the ethnicity of the researcher has an effect on how respondents answer, is commonly referred to as the race-of-interviewer effect. Although the term usually refers to answering tendencies/biases in interviews, I will use it more broadly to refer to the effect the ethnicity of the interviewer has on the process of gaining access to the field, finding respondents and the actual interviews.

During my own research, I discovered how difficult it is for a white female researcher to gain access to (members of the) Turkish community in Belgium. I discovered, however, that the race-of-interviewer effect does not necessarily have a negative impact on gaining access, finding respondents and the quality of qualitative data.

In this contribution, I argue that the ethnicity of the researcher does have an effect on the behavior of a possible respondent, but that this effect is not necessarily negative, at least, if one applies rigorously certain basic ethnographic rules. The guidelines and rules presented in this article aim to address two issues that are the result of a difference in ethnic background between respondent and interviewer. First of all, the researcher needs to address an imbalance in power. Because the population under study belongs to a minority group, and the researcher to the majority, there might be a tendency to distrust and unwillingness to cooperate, and social desirability in answering patterns on the part of the respondents. Secondly, the researcher needs to be aware of the fact that members of the population under study might see him/her as ignorant. Although this also has its good side, addressing this might be necessary to show commitment and win respect of the respondents. By the development of practical strategies to address the race-of-interviewer effect, this paper aims both at improving research methods in ethnic studies, and at contributing to the discussion on the impact of the researcher's identity.

Inheriting the Immigrant Condition - Immigrant Families' Strategies of Social Reproduction in Murcia (Spain)

Garcia, Inaki

Dpment. of Ciencia Politica y Sociologia, Universidad Carlos III de Madrid Getafe, Spain

Pedreno, Andres

*Dpment. of Sociologia y Política Social, Universidad de Murcia
Murcia, Spain*

Keywords

Family, qualitative, Spain, migrations, children of immigrants

The Mediterranean region of Murcia is, together with Madrid and Barcelona, one of the main poles of attraction of foreign immigrants to Spain. But in contrast to these two Spanish metropolitan centers, Murcia is not an urban pole with predominant industrial and services activities, but a territory where the agriculture represents one of the region's economic driving forces.

In previous research we coined the concept of Immigrant Condition to define the effects that the combination of several structural logics of domination (based on class division, legal status hierarchy, and ethno-cultural discrimination) has on immigrants coming from the peripheral areas of the Capitalist World-Economy. These logics reinforce and overdetermine each other, constructing immigrants as an stigmatized population excluded from citizenship status. E.g., since all the agriculture day labourers in Murcia are immigrants, most nationals think that immigrants (especially Moroccan) are only able to work as day labourers.

The questions we are now considering are: will the children of these immigrants inherit the Immigrant Condition? What strategies will their families develop for avoiding this to happen? For answering to these questions, we have conducted an empirical research taking as units of analysis each reunified family. 40 in-depth qualitative interviews were made, 32 of them to members of the two family generations (twelve to immigrant parents, twenty to children), and another 8 to teachers or educators, in order to explore subjects as: the parents' migratory projects and expectations, up to which point the children were matching these expectations, and their school performances. In every family parents and children were interviewed separately, and when possibly, each one of the parents individually.

Sociology of Migrations has fragmented artificially too many times immigrant families, taking parents by one side and children (the so called "Second Generation") by the other, as different objects of study. This research aims to show that such fragmentation supposes an epistemological mistake, because the families' conditions of existence constitute the children's conditions of primary socialization. Therefore, the latter's identities and social trajectories can't be properly understood without taking into account the former's projects and strategies.

Inside the moment: Negotiating integration through language, identity, and culture in Finland

Hoffman, David

*Finnish Institute for Educational Research, University of Jyväskylä
Jyväskylä, FINLAND*

Hirshiaho, Anu

*Department of Social Research, University of Tampere
Tampere, FINLAND*

Kokkonen, Marja

*Finnish Graduate School of Language Studies LANGNET, University of Helsinki
Helsinki, FINLAND*

Pöyhönen, Sari

*Centre for Applied Language Studies, University of Jyväskylä
Jyväskylä, FINLAND*

Rynkänen, Tatjana

*Centre for Applied Language Studies, University of Jyväskylä
Jyväskylä, FINLAND*

Tarnanen, Mirja

*Centre for Applied Language Studies, University of Jyväskylä
Jyväskylä, FINLAND*

Keywords

Integration, culture, identity, mixed methods, language proficiency

Does language proficiency still play the part in integration we have long assumed, or has something changed? How are identities - of all members of society - being negotiated in educational, occupational and other everyday settings? What kinds of meanings and explanations are attributed to culture in these negotiations? And are these attributions really explanatory?

This article is based on an emerging research agenda and methodological approach in which the roles and interplay of language, identity and culture are being critically re-assessed with regard to integration in a rapidly changing Finnish society. The project focuses on the perspectives of both migrants and natives of the host country to integration in the following key settings: working-life, education and everyday life.

Language, identity and culture remain undisputed key focal points in explaining integration - or its' absence - across Europe. However, it is increasingly clear that unquestioned normative assumptions and conflation of ideas about language, identity, culture and integration itself have resulted in "cultural shortcuts" (Hansen 2000), in which stratification is now challenging European societies previously characterized by an absence of stratification (Forsander 2004). What has escaped attention, in countries like Finland, is the fact that integration occurs in a series of ephemeral moments, most of which pass unnoticed.

The methodological approach featured in this article is based on the state-of-the-art interdisciplinary results of the authors, who themselves have formed a multicultural team in order to circumvent ethnocentric assumptions. For approaching the negotiation of integration, three different themes have been chosen that empirically and conceptually illuminate "critical sites" of integration in Finland: 1) language proficiency, 2) social conditions and strategies, and 3) culture and identity. The research team uses a mixed-methods concurrent nested strategy (Creswell 2002). This strategy is designed to fundamentally challenge normative policy discussion, parochial substantive and conceptual framing of migration-related issues within a robust, methodological approach to migration that will go beyond state-of-the-art in the Finnish context and lay the groundwork for subsequent international comparative research.

Interrogating the Insider Outsider Binary in Qualitative Research: Insider, Outsider or Both?

Wray, Sharon

Behavioural and Social Sciences, University of Huddersfield Huddersfield, UK

Keywords

Insiderness, outsidersness, ethnicity, culturally sensitive

This presentation examines the issues relating to insiderness and outsidersness within the qualitative research process. It draws on the researchers' experience of researching older minority ethnic women's accounts of ageing in the UK. Considerable attention has been paid to this topic as researchers have sought to reflect upon the impact of their biographical background on the practicalities of doing and producing research. In the presentation it will be argued that commonalities of experience are always mediated through difference and therefore cannot be conceptualised as fixed and knowable. Additionally, that the researcher is neither an insider nor an outsider but instead often occupies both positions simultaneously to varying degrees, throughout the research. A central contention of the presentation is that the development of empathetic understanding between researcher and participant is not solely based on similarity of background and experience, or being an 'insider'. Instead it is suggested that this may be less important than the identification, scrutinisation, and destabilisation of those power relations that inadvertently reconstruct insiderness and outsidersness as binary oppositions and lead to essentialist notions of difference. For researchers, this means defining and examining the processes that re-inscribe prevailing representations of otherness as they emerge within the research setting. This is important because it contributes towards the development of a culturally sensitive approach to research methodologies that are able to move beyond the binaries of outsider/insider and the false ethnocentric categories these inevitably (re) affirm and (re) create.

Investigating the intergenerational solidarity in transnational families. Methodological considerations

Gherghel, Ana

CES-UA, University of Azores

Ponta Delgada, Azores, Portugal

Le Gall, Josiane

Département de communication sociale et publique, Université du Québec à Montréal (UQÀM)

Montreal, Canada

Keywords

intergenerational solidarity, transnational family, Transnational migration, biographic interview, social support

How is the intergenerational solidarity reconfigured within the transnational families? What forms of support and exchanges take place in the transnational networks? We examine these questions in our exploratory research focused on a yet undocumented migration phenomenon, that of Portuguese population from the Azores archipelago to Canada. These migration flows directed to Canada started in the mid-1950s and reached a peak in the 1970s, continuing until nowadays at lower levels. Maintaining strong ties with the communities left behind and the return migration of the first generation migrants registered in the last decade allow us though to observe the transnational migration as a historical and present phenomenon. Organized as an important family-led migration, this phenomenon involves nowadays three generations of migrants. While the immigrants settled in Canada maintain strong ties with their origin communities (through visits, traditional feasts, etc.), the return migrants preserve important links with the destination society because their children remain.

For all these characteristics, the migration of Portuguese population from the Azorean archipelago to Canada represents an interesting case study for the debates on transnationalism because it involves a continuous back-and-forth movement between the origin and destination countries for over more than 50 years, in a context where geographic distance shapes the exchanges and supports circulating.

Based on biographical interviews conducted with members of 2 or 3 generations of a same family living in the Azores and Montreal, Canada, this paper contributes to the analysis of the intergenerational solidarity in transnational families involving migrants and non-migrants in various and multi-directional exchanges. We discuss the methodological issues related to conducting multi-sited research at both ends of migration chain: constructing narratives through biographical interviews, linguistic difficulties, transmission of information, and the choice of most adequate investigation tools to capture the agency of actors involved in the migration process but also other determinants (life course, family-related considerations, etc.). Moreover, the presentation focuses on the complementarities between the qualitative methodology (semi-directive interviews) and quantitative one (timetables). Finally, we explore the possibility to establish a comparative approach, with other transnational migration phenomenon such as the Portuguese immigrants in France or other European countries.

Measuring the integration of immigrants. Critical notes from an Italian experience

Caselli, Marco

Dipartimento di Sociologia, Università Cattolica del Sacro Cuore Italia,

Keywords

Italy, Integration measures, Integration, Immigration

The paper describes an instrument developed in Italy by the Ismu Foundation to measure the level of integration of immigrants present in the country. The instrument consists in an index based on data collected by means of a structured questionnaire. The paper first describes the technical characteristics of this instrument and the main results obtained from its first and experimental use with administration of over 10,000 interviews in Italy. There follow some critical notes on the limits and potential of the application of synthetic indexes in the analysis of migratory processes, and particularly in study of the integration of immigrants.

Migration Studies and Research Methodological Challenge

Ussawarakha, Sirima

*Health and Social Care, Royal Holloway University of London
Egham Surrey, United Kingdom*

Keywords

identity, research methodological challenge, Postnationalism, citizenship

The emergence of postnationalism, the transformation of national identities via the influence of globalization as well as affiliations to supranational organizations like the European Union (EU), has shaped attitudes of both the nation-states and immigrants. This influx of immigrants produced an ethnic diversity affecting the social and political structures of the receiving countries. However, due to the difficulty of integrating and adapting to the lifestyle and culture of the host countries, it is often observed that immigrants seem to attract and remain within groups of people who come from similar or identical ethnic groups. The presence of these insular groups of ethnic minorities in society, within which people practice and follow cultures and ways of life that differ from the rest of their host society, has the potential to cause civil, cultural or even legal disagreements. It is inevitable that a variety of migrant groups will make demands for their particular rights, shaped by their beliefs, identities and values which may differ enormously from the culture or laws of the host population. Also, migrants attempt to capitalize on privileges that a host country's citizenship offers, while simultaneously clinging to the benefits of their indigenous national or ethnic identities. There are conflicts relating to the integration of minorities into host societies which damage the stability of the host country's social cohesion. The identification of these problems of integration which affect social harmony inspired me to carry out this paper discussing immigrants in European countries, their identity, and the methodological challenges arising when conducting research in ethnic and migration studies. This paper will critically examine research methods focusing on methodological challenges, in the light of participatory and ethical approaches of immigration, influenced by postnationalism. To comprehend how immigrants conceptualize their identity and sense of belonging toward the receiving country enables the host government to implement appropriate policies to deal with immigrants.

Keywords: Postnationalism, Citizenship, Identity, and research methodological challenge.

Mobility of Russian Scientist: the comparative analysis of the historical stages

Asheulova, Nadia

*Centre for Sociological and Science Studies Research, St. Petersburg Branch of the Institute for the History of Science and Technology, the Russian Academy of Sciences
St. Petersburg, Russia*

Erokhina, Kira

*Centre for Sociological and Science Studies Research, St. Petersburg Branch of the Institute for the History of Science and Technology, the Russian Academy of Sciences
St. Petersburg, Russia*

Keywords

Mobility in the Russian Science, Migration, Global Scientist Community, Mobility as a Mechanism of Science Globalization

The scientist mobility has various forms. Our study is concerned with territorial movements of scientists in Russia at various historical stages as well as finding out how the territorial mobility influences Russia's integration into the global scientist community.

The paper will show that the territorial mobility of scientists hardly existed in the Soviet times with isolation from the world and total control of international contacts. Even inside the country it was forced (graduates were sent to work by the choice of government). Geography of international contacts was limited, mainly within the socialist bloc. In the post-Soviet period, mobility took quite the opposite forms. The mass irreversible migration of scientists weakened Russian science and was one of the factors that generated a deep crisis in science. More liberal international cooperation increased tenfold the pendulum mobility, geography of scientific cooperation was extended thanks to ties with scientists from various countries.

Today, the territorial mobility of scientists in Russia is much lower than in the West. The mobility of scientists in Russia is of markedly emigrational nature, it is often irreversible. There are no strong ties with scientists who emigrated to work abroad and there are no mechanisms to get those scientists back home. The pendulum mobility of scientists is also low. Most Russian scientists maintain relationship with colleagues mainly in Russia. Weak participation of Russian scientists in joint projects, international scientific conferences, symposiums, an insignificant number of joint publications with foreign authors, a low citation index are a result of the low three types of mobility: inpatial (inside the country), pendulum and a migration with a feedback. The irreversible migration (without a feedback) is a barrier to Russia's integration into the world division of labor.

Nowadays, some measures have been taken in the science policy to keep scientist elite in the country and to correct the mobility, however it remains to see how these changes will reveal themselves in future.

Narrative interviews and participatory methods for researching immigrant children's educational experiences

Moskal, Marta

Centre for Educational Sociology, University of Edinburgh Scotland, UK,

Keywords

research with children, post-enlargement migration, participatory methods, narrative interviews

The proposed paper discusses and exemplifies how "ethnographic research methods" can shed light on educational processes framed by the post-enlargement European society. It is based on the research within Marie Curie Project on the recently arrived Polish population in Scotland. The situation with Polish immigrants in Scotland may well be new-not only in that they are entering a space with very few minority population members, but also in that they may not be looking to 'settle' but to create an existence in which they are partly settled (through work and schooling) but remain culturally attached to the 'homeland'. This 'in-between' identity creates new challenges to policy-makers in Scotland, and especially to schooling, which is, in any case, not well equipped to respond to the specific needs of children of Polish origin. The exploration of migrant experiences through narrative interviews with migrants children - using participatory methods (and their parents), participant observation and informal discussions in home, school and community life context, along with investigation of teacher and education policy-makers attitudes and experiences (in depth interviews) can help us understand if educational institutions are responsive to that or continuing to assume that the dominant (Scottish) culture can be produced and reproduced in schooling for these populations. The research seek to define the forms of interaction between schools and families; the extent to which language is an issue and strategies for meeting language needs-in general, the extent to which schooling practices are or are not being adapted to meet the needs of migrant children and to establish the extent to which those children/young people are successfully negotiating the interface between family and school.

National Identity and Otherness in Greek Speakers. Talk about Immigration: Methodological and Disciplinary Reflections

Xenitidou, Maria

*Sociology, University of Surrey
Guildford, Surrey, United Kingdom*

Keywords

transdisciplinarity, methodological nationalism, banal nationalism, discourse analysis

The aim of the present paper is to present the potential contribution of using a discourse analytic approach and a transdisciplinary point of departure (social psychology, social geography, migration studies) to studying national identity and immigration. Conclusions derive from a study on Greek national identity negotiations in relation to immigration flows from Central and Eastern Europe and the former Soviet Republics since 1989. Semi-structured focus groups were conducted with participants who identified as Greek citizens of Greek ethnic origin. The transcriptions of the focus groups were discourse analysed focusing on content, rhetorical strategies and their functions and on interactional identities.

The study has been guided by the perspective of banal nationalism in its understanding of national identity as a form of life in a world divided into nation-states (Billig, 1995). In terms of Greek national identity and immigration as topic, the study drew similarities between the perspective of banal nationalism and the critique of methodological nationalism (Wimmer and Schiller, 2002). The assumptions and conclusions of the study supported the critique of methodological nationalism on traditional (sociological) migration research and aimed to contribute to a shift in perspective away from methodological nationalism. This was done, firstly by exploring the complexity of Greek national identity in talk and challenging the fixity and homogeneity of Greek national culture with reference to immigrants. Secondly, by focusing on the interconnectedness between traditions of argumentation of Greek nation-building and discourse on immigrant integration, which has been identified as a major shortcoming of migration research (see Brubaker, 1992; Castles, 1995; Favell, 1998). In terms of methodological implications, the significance of the findings of the study is found at identifying the potentials of opting for a relational approach to identification as well as at foregrounding the complexities of identification. Finally, in evaluating transdisciplinary research, the conclusions of the study pointed to the interaction of concerns on identity and otherness between sociological, social psychological and social geographical research on migration, which supports the argument against methodological and disciplinary isolationism.

Research Methods on Undocumented Migration in Southern Europe

Almeida, Joelma

*Centro de Estudos Africanos, Instituto Superior de Ciências do Trabalho e Empresa
Lisboa, Portugal*

Keywords

Europe, Africa, Undocumented migration, Measuring

Since early 1980s, former traditional emigration countries in Southern Europe have experienced increasing immigration from less-developed countries, namely from Africa. A significant share of total immigration, in absolute and relative figures, is composed of illegal foreigners.

Undocumented migration takes on many different forms which greatly depend on immigration regulations, border regimes and physical characteristics, and policing. Experts, however, aggregate several subtypes and variations of this form of immigration in three basic groups: those who illegally or clandestinely cross a border, those who cross a border by using falsified documents, legal documents one is not entitled to, or legal documents for illegal purposes, and those who stay in a country after one's legal status has expired.

Undocumented migration is hardly captured by the official surveys. Despite the importance of this phenomenon, undocumented migration is difficult to measure and to estimate. Some experts argue however this form of migration is not completely undocumented. Some indicators and approaches can be used to estimate it as shown by past experiences. Their availability depends largely on country specific conditions (i.e. resources, willingness, among others).

In this presentation we will discuss research methods implemented by three southern European countries, former traditional emigration countries, to measure, estimate and deal with undocumented migration, as well as examining the main results of the procedures proposed.

Research with and by Migrant Children

Rita, Bertozzi

Department of Social, Cognitive and Quantitative Sciences, University of Modena and Reggio Emilia Reggio Emilia, Italy

Keywords

working children, Participatory approach, migrant young people, peer research

Child-centred approaches focus on the children's perspective and participation. Participatory action research could be an interesting methodology to investigate topic as the labour of children. In the framework of a survey project on the labour of migrant young people in Italy, we chose to involve actively a group of foreign girls and boys as peer researchers. The research was an action in progress during two years, testing different methodologies.

After a first stage of training, the teenager group was involved in the elaboration of the survey methodologies, elements to be investigated, subjects to be interviewed and actions to be realised. Peer researchers have collected 105 interviews in two years and discussed the collected data with adults who accompanied the whole process. The way of disseminating results was decided together with children, elaborating two final documents, brochures for peer and employers and a video with some interviews. Peer researchers participated in the evaluation process and, the second year, in the implementation of action.

The active participation by children in the survey entailed several ethical and methodological challenges and questions, offering stimulating reflection areas. The setting of flexible working methods, able to follow both the survey evolution and personal needs and paths of children involved as peer researchers, enabled to build the research path while researching and to adapt it depending on the resources of the subjects.

The experience made has, moreover, favoured among kids a process of empowerment and support to self-confidence and the enhancement of their knowledge, in a view of proposal and project exchange with adults.

Researching Ethnicity without Ethnicising Migrant Social Lives

Morosanu, Laura

*Sociology, University of Bristol
Oxford, UK*

Keywords

transnationalism, sampling, assimilation, ethnicity, Social Networks

Sociological and anthropological migration research has often taken ethnicity to be a key factor in migrant lives. (Neo-)assimilationists and transnationalists alike tacitly assume the relevance of ethnicity, frequently working through a bi-focal lens (i.e. the migrant group versus the receiving community). On the one hand, the (neo-)assimilationist perspective concentrates on the receiving context measuring the extent to, and "uneven" processes by, which migrants integrate into the "mainstream" or remain embedded in their "ethnic community". On the other hand, if transnationalists have gone beyond national borders, focusing on how migrants spread their lives across two or more societies, they have not looked beyond the ethnonational community, to a similar extent. Migrants thus remained confined to the ethnic community at both destination and departure points. Yet, in their everyday lives, migrants will also interact with a variety of people and cultural scripts, of natives or other foreigners, whose impact on social relations has comparatively little been addressed so far.

This paper problematises the taken-for-grantedness and prioritisation of ethnicity in understanding migrant social lives. In doing so, it makes three methodological suggestions for researching ethnicity without "ethnicising" the subjects. First comes sampling. While a great share of qualitative migration studies use ethnic associations and snowballing strategies to recruit participants, non-ethnic sampling routes are key to reducing the "ethnic" bias. Secondly, comparing different migrant subpopulations (e.g. migrants in high- and low-skilled occupations) rather than different migrant groups will likely lend different results regarding the role of ethnicity in people's lives. Lastly, using a social network approach to understand how migrants build and maintain their social ties will help reach beyond the "ethnic community" home and abroad by revealing the multiplicity of social relations (e.g. with natives, other foreigners, as well as co-ethnics home and abroad) in which migrants are embedded and the interests behind them. Through these three ways, the paper argues, one can examine the relevance of ethnicity in different spheres of social life without assuming or prioritising it as such. The arguments will be illustrated by reference to a qualitative project on sociability patterns developed by Romanian students and workers in London.

Researching migrant prostitution: racism and sexism in the field

Crowhurst, Isabel

*Birkbeck Institute for Social Research, Birkbeck College
London, UK*

Keywords

ethics, Prostitution, racism, sexism

In this paper I explore some of the methodological challenges that I encountered in the course of the fieldwork conducted in Italy as part of my doctoral research. My PhD thesis examined discourses, policies and practices underpinning the response to, and governance of, prostitution-related migrations of women in contemporary Italy. It analyzed how Italian socio-political factors, such as national identity construction and political opportunism, and normative values and cultural practices contribute to different understandings of, and responses to, the new presence of migrant women operating in the sex industry in Italy.

The study adopted a feminist qualitative research methodology and was primarily based on in-depth interviews and participant observation with a number of diverse third sector organizations that operate in the provision of support services to migrant women in the Italian sex industry. These bodies, and the people working in them play a crucial role in the provision of assistance to migrant prostitute women and often are the only ones to act as intermediaries between them and other Italian social institutions.

After presenting a brief overview of my methodological approach and of the content and context of my doctoral thesis, the paper will focus in particular on two issues. Firstly, my decision, developed in the course of the fieldwork, not to interview migrant prostitute women. This choice was motivated by the ethical concern not to negatively impact upon the well-being of these women, given the circumstances of my fieldwork and my position as researcher in this context. Secondly, the paper will discuss some of the highly sexist and racist comments and behaviors that my Italian research participants made and displayed towards the migrant women they work with and are supposedly meant to help. I will reflect on these encounters and on the extent to which my outsider position, the sharing of my interviewees' "race", but not necessarily of their "culture" and gender, may have played a role in creating the space for the display of such strong and hostile sentiments .

Social Psychological Considerations of the Use of Participatory Approaches: Ethical and Methodological Implications for Qualitative Migration Research

Kuehner, Angela

*FB Gesellschaftswissenschaften, Goethe-Universität Frankfurt and LMU Munich
Frankfurt, Germany*

Langer, Phil C.

Psychology, Ludwig-Maximilians-Universität Munich Munich, Germany

Keywords

ethical research approaches, minorities, Migration, Social Psychology

Doing research with socially excluded and stigmatised groups always runs the risk of reproducing existing power relations and can be understood as a form of symbolic violence. In this context, participatory approaches are seen as important instruments for power-sensitive research. They nevertheless raise (new) ethical questions, e.g. conflicting perceptions and interests at the stage of interpreting qualitative data. In our paper we want to extract ethical problems from two own "power-sensitive" empirical studies and discuss implications for critical migration research.

A qualitative interview study on school-based Holocaust Education in Germany was carried out on behalf of the "International Task Force On Holocaust Education, Remembrance and Research". It focussed on the - supposed - challenges that immigration society (re)presents for the discourse on National Socialism and the Shoah. In this context especially male Muslim adolescents are said to be reluctant against the topic. This exemplifies an important question of power-sensitive research: How can one deal with a research question that is so close to the typical anti-Islamic stereotype of Muslims endangering western progressive achievements? How to investigate i.e. Muslim adolescents' perspective if such suspicions are so prominent in the field?

In another study in-depth interviews on sexual risk behaviour were carried out with HIV-positive gay men on behalf of the Federal Centre for Health Education in 2006/07. As members of a multiply stigmatised "minority within a minority" participants were accosted by a HIV-positive positioned "peer". But how can one publish and use the sensitive data that was originally shared in an intimate situation with the HIV-positive positioned "peer"?

In our paper we will re-analyse implicit and explicit strategies we used and compare them to considerations found in recent literature from the field of critical migration research, e.g. back-talk focus groups as proposed by Frisina (2006). We aim at identifying typical chances, limits and dilemmas of power-sensitive/ethical approaches and at discussing their specific implications for migration research.

Socio-Cultural Diffusion in the Baltic Countries

Kochegarova, Tamara

*Russian-and-Baltic Center, Affiliation of Russian Academy of Sciences Institute of Sociology RAS
Moscow, Russia*

Keywords

non-tolerant, motivation, mentality, diffusion, socio-cultural

The distinctions between representatives of ethnic communities are caused, first of all, by those cultural-historical dominants which are the kernel of consciousness, the base of ethnic mentality and which will be always capable to "punch" the surface layers that testifies of the stability of the archetype of ethnos. But at the same time there are some psychological motivations connected with top (or surface, in particular, "television") layers of mass consciousness. In these motivations there is no direct correlation with an ethnic belonging of individuals. So, in "non-tolerant" statistical groups it is observed the highest confrontation of consciousnesses and thus rather slightly depending on an ethnic belonging. In these cases the various over-layers as a result of an individual life experience, and not at all a kernel of national consciousness, play a defining role in the formation of psychological motivations of a person.

The specifics of a present situation in the Baltic countries consist in the expansion of an ambivalent layer which representatives show an inconsistent behavior within the limits of its ethical system. Among the part oriented on the European values, there were displayed the signs of confrontational consciousness. Especially it is inherent to the leaders of the national-radical part of a political spectrum, namely by their efforts in Latvia and Estonia there was reproduced the ranging of ethnos on grades that was peculiar to the state system of the USSR and against which recently they so actively acted. With that only difference that in the USSR there were never people without citizenship. On the other hand, among a part of the Russian people who always showed hostility to local culture in general, and to the local forms of social behavior, in particular, now it is fixed a rather steady preference of a dialog, inclination to the compromise. Thus, the verbal and social behavior of carriers of non-characteristic preferences shows that the diaspora does not always conduct itself as diaspora. Increase of an ambivalent layer in the two-commune state is a characteristic and a very important indicator of changes in psychology of representatives of Russian community occurring in Baltic countries.

Some reflections about EU funded research on youth of immigrant origin: the politics of subjectivity, ethics and standpoint

Padilla, Beatriz

-, CIES-ISCTE
Lisbon, Portugal

Keywords

Ethnography, Migration, ethics, Ethnic Relations

This paper is a reflection upon an EU funded project about the youth of immigrant origin. Reflections will review some key aspects of the research project and its methodology: a) positionality of the researched and researchers (diversity of the research team vs uniformity of the researched), b) the ethics of how & why involving the researched, c) dealing with cross-cultural (im) possible comparisons.

Survival Guide for Expats in Russia

Melnikova, Anna

Social Anthropology, Russian Social State University Russian Federation,

Keywords

Migration, Labour Migrants, Status of Minority, HR studies

Relocation to another country is always an important decision to make, meaning not only change of environment but also readiness to merge into allogenic culture.

Russia is a crumpet for Western companies, due to its developing economics and big opportunities it offers.

Transnational corporations and representatives attract colleagues from European offices for the purpose of business establishment and shift preparing in its Russian offices. The management board of biggest companies consists of expatriated employees.

Regardless of difficulties in perception of Russian mentality and national peculiarities, labour migrants take offers from representative offices and filiations of foreign companies located in Russia and together with their families move to Russia, automatically gaining status of expat. Needless to say that their relocation is supported by attractive contracts covering housing allowance, benefit plans as well as monetary compensation that is several times higher than their existing salaries.

As the bases for the following research became years of experience working with expatriates, being able to observe their internal community from the inside.

An important link, that initiated research and development of directed seminars on foreign employee's adaptation in Russia, was the first seminar, organized by Russian-British Chamber of Commerce with support of British Business Club in March 2008: "Survival Guide for Expats in Russia". The Seminar touched upon topics that are considered most vital for foreign citizens living in Moscow, such as: search and rent of accommodation, work related issues, visa support, immigration rules and regulations, social infrastructure, children's education as well as cross-cultural moments and other peculiarities of expats' everyday life.

The following research will be based on reports of afore mentioned seminar, annual compensations survey reports conducted by Hay Group, survey polls and individual interviews with expatriates as well as personal observations. The added value of the research will be in development and implementation of new techniques and methods that can be used by HR departments in terms of adaptation and cultural integration of expatriated employees working in the company.

The German Integration Panel - How to measure the influence of integration courses on migrants' integration?

Rother, Nina

*Referat 222, Bundesamt für Migration und Flüchtlinge (BAMF)
Nürnberg, Germany*

Keywords

Migration, Integration, language acquisition, longitudinal survey

In 2005, the German government introduced integration courses as a means for migrants to improve their German skills and thereby also their general integration into the German society, thus hoping to avoid the formation of parallel societies. Participation in these integration courses is obligatory for all new immigrants from third countries with insufficient German skills. For EU-migrants as well as foreigners with long-term residency in Germany participation is voluntary. Since 2005, about 600.000 migrants have been granted the right to take part in an integration course. Yet the question remains, to which degree and in which way course participation fosters the participants' further integration.

This paper presents the methodological challenges that had to be overcome while establishing the German Integration Panel, a longitudinal survey aiming at analysing not only the efficiency and sustainability of integration courses but also the general integration processes. Among the key issues of this survey was its global design, especially the composition and accessibility of a control group of non-course participants that is needed to classify course effects and monitor basic integration processes. Another challenge was to find a way of surveying heterogeneous groups of participants that was not only suitable for different cultures but also for marginal subjects. Among them illiterates, who are learning in parallel German as well as reading and writing for the first time in their lives. The assessment of German language skills in a comparative way throughout the whole integration process without having the opportunity of employing an extensive test of these skills, constituted another obstacle that had to be dealt with. With regard to all these challenges, it will be discussed which decisions were taken in order to conduct a survey leading to authoritative results concerning obstacles and facilitations in the integration processes of culturally different migrant groups into German society. Additionally, first key results of the survey will be presented.

The meanings of 'refugee'

Scherschel, Karin

*Institut für Soziologie, Friedrich-Schiller-Universität
Jena, Germany*

Keywords

asylum, marginal subject, refugee

There is no homogenous understanding of the concept of "refugee". Some authors have been using the term as a symbol for worthlessness and lack of rights. In her well known essay "We Refugees", Hannah Arendt describes the condition of refugee as person without a country. The refugee as the one who has lost all rights shows the worthlessness of human being. Giorgio Agamben adopts this notion from Arendt, comparing the refugee with the homo sacer. This figure symbolizes the status of naked life, of someone who is called 'sacred' in the sense of the ancient Roman law which stated that the person was destined to die.

Zygmunt Bauman even identifies refugees as 'human waste', persons that have become redundant in their own societies and thus lost their right to remain there. All these interpretations underline the hopelessness of marginal subjects. In contrast to this, 'refugee' also designates a legal label and a codified definition following the Geneva Convention. The Geneva Convention has an understanding of refugee which focuses on governmental persecution based on a number of reasons (e.g. religion, race). This definition has an impact on opportunities and interpretations for those people who are classified as refugees. The Geneva convention originates from a certain historical context - the post-World War II era. Influenced by the experiences of war, its definition does not cover a number of other causes of flight (such as natural disasters), and it fails to take into account the situation of those refugees who do not have the chance to leave their country of origin. Thus, a large number of persons who are in a situation of flight today are not refugees in terms of the convention. This raises a number of questions: How do migrants use the legal label refugee? What meanings do they assign to it? Do these migrants describe themselves as marginal subjects? Empirical research shows that migrants have different ways to employ the label. My contribution focuses on the different meanings of the term and concept of 'refugee' by contrasting political, academic and migrants interpretations.

The online migrants: toward a cosmopolitan turn in migration studies?

Nedelcu, Mihaela

Institute of Sociology / Swiss Forum for Migration and Population Studies, Neuchâtel University Neuchâtel, Switzerland

Keywords

transnational e-practices, Netnography, methodological nationalism, cosmopolitan vision, highly skilled migrants

Recent migrations occur in a world deeply transformed by both the globalization processes and the digital revolution. The broad accessibility of the mobile information and communication technologies (MICTs) generates various flows, characterized by the simultaneity and the intensity of the transnational exchanges. Internet facilitates the co-presence of mobile actors in multiple locations and allows the emergence of new transnational habitus. Thus, the digital revolution accelerates the transformation of the society from inside and contributes to a kind of "cosmopolitanization of nation-state societies" (U. Beck). This way, it enables new cosmopolitan and transnational forms of identification, belonging and participation which challenge migration patterns and theories. Grounded on the results of a sociological study conducted between 2003 and 2007 exploring the use of Internet by highly skilled Romanian migrants, this paper addresses the question of these challenges at different levels.

First, ontologically, it shows that in a migratory context Internet becomes a tool for social innovation, shaping differently notions as borders, space, time or mobility. It also underlines the ambivalence of the computer-mediated transnational practices. On the one hand, the MICTS allow the migrants to multiply their belongings, to capture cosmopolitan values, to develop deterritorialized identities and biographies and to act at a distance in a real time. On the other hand, they also enable them to defend particularistic values and to claim a particular belonging while living the world.

Second, methodologically, this paper shows that studying migratory phenomena in a digital era and more specifically the deterritorialized practices of online migrants, requests a "transnational sensitivity" of the social scientist's toolkit. Thus, the study of the computer-mediated practices of the Romanian migrants resulted in a multi-sited approach which combined various qualitative methods (netnography, webographic analysis, semi-structured interviews, and more classical participant observation).

Last, but not least, this paper aims also to improve the epistemological debate criticizing the limits of the methodological nationalism. It proposes to revisit the national-transnational nexus by adopting the "cosmopolitan vision" (U. Beck) of the "both here and there" condition within a local-cosmopolitan continuum.

Understanding Integration by Addressing Complexity: The Study of "a Europe of Fortresses"

Koff, Harlan

*Laboratoire de Sciences Politiques, Université du Luxembourg
Walferdange, Luxembourg*

Keywords

Crime, economic integration, housing, Immigration, political participation

The integration of non-EU migrants is one of the most salient political issues in contemporary European politics and social scientists have dedicated significant attention to this question. Even though this field is generally characterized by its richness, its weaknesses have been its theoretical focus on specific aspects of immigration, such as political participation, immigrant entrepreneurship, models of citizenship, etc and its methodological focus on explanation rather than theory-building. This paper, which employs the comparative method, addresses migrant integration in its complexity (data on party systems, social movements and civil society, labor markets, entrepreneurship, housing, geographic segregation, crime). It has three specific objectives: 1) to comparatively analyze local integration regimes (Florence and Bari, Italy and Toulouse and Lille, France) because levels and modes of integration vary throughout Europe, all the way to the sub-national level; 2) to address the relationships between integration in various spheres in order to examine the question of 'spillover'; and 3) to explain the links between political, economic and social integration through interdisciplinary analysis based on power, class and status. The paper proposes scaling and spatial modeling techniques aimed at harmonizing quantitative and qualitative research on immigration. Thus, through its analysis of relationships between spheres of integration and its focus on understanding complexity, the paper argues that the term 'Europe of Fortresses' seems more accurate than the commonly used 'Fortress Europe'.

Visual methodologies and the study of daily life microgeographies of immigrants in public space

Menezes, Marluci

*Social Ecology Division (NESO) - Buildings Department, National Laboratory for Civil Engineering (LNEC)
Lisbon, Portugal*

Allen, Judith

School of Architecture and the Built Environment, University of Westminster London, England

Vasconcelos, Lia

*Science and Environmental Engineering Department (DCEA), Science Technology Faculty (FCT), New University of Lisbon (UNL)
Caparica, Portugal*

Keywords

visual methodologies, immigrants, urban landscape, interdisciplinary

Immigrants are important in the transformation of urban space and cultural landscape. This creates new challenges to the cities. Among these challenges the question of social, urban and environmental management is relevant, namely for what concerns the processes of integration. But the complexity and the multidimensionality of these questions also place new challenges for the researchers. These challenges contribute to the development of theoretical and methodological approaches that are innovative and interdisciplinary. Aiming to understand how immigrants contribute to the construction and definition of urban ambiances and landscape, an exploratory research was developed that we intend to present. This research took place in Praça da República (Ericeira) - situated in the Lisbon metropolitan area. In this study, we explore a protocol for interdisciplinary work involving innovative methodological approaches to the migratory phenomena, particularly in what it respects the practices of use and appropriation of the square by brazilian immigrants. The methodologies and visual techniques of approach were central in the work developed. This communication intends to argue about the advantages of using visual methodologies: 1) to collect and register information; 2) to benefit from the inter and multidisciplinary potential underlying in those methodologies of work; 3) to improve the capability to understand the diversity and the urban social complexity; 4) to the mapping of social practices by the immigrants. The work was developed with the support of the Treaty of Windsor Anglo-Portuguese Joint Research Programme.

RS10

Socio-Anthropology of Trans-national Migrations and Migrants' Families

(De)constructing family migration: female migrants in Slovenia (a case study)

Cukut, Sanja

*Sociomedical institute, Scientific Research Centre of the Slovenian academy of Sciences and Arts
Slovenia, <http://dmi.zrc-sazu.si/?q=node/24>*

Keywords

biographical approach, agency, female migrants, family and marriage migration

Debates on immigration reveal a tension between selecting and restricting the number of immigrants and the need for the migrant labour force in ageing societies. In these discourses, practical and analytical categories such as voluntary/forced migrant, low-skilled/skilled migrant un/documentated migrant, labour vs. family migrant are often uncritically used both by policy makers and migration researchers. However, these categories may contain value-laden lines and are problematic in assuming that people defined within them are all similar and that the categories themselves are already distinct. Moreover, these categories do not correspond to the diversified nature of today's migration.

The paper will focus especially on one of these categories - that is family migration, and in particular marriage migration. This will be done through the analysis of life stories of female migrants from the former Soviet Union and Bosnia and Herzegovina living in Slovenia. It will be studied how female migrants as social actors with their own goals and strategies negotiate the meanings and statuses imposed on them by official policies and discourses and how they construct and challenge formal (official) categorisations in their life-stories (narrations), both in relation to their individual life-histories and in relation to their families. Consequently, the variability of individual agency of female migrants within a discursively constituted migration and social policy will be analysed and individual histories will be located in the context of patterns of social differentiation and stratification. It will be analysed how female migrants are found on the crossroads of political, national and class junctures and their ways of resistance to the restrictive migration policies at the level of the EU that privilege marriage as an institution as opposed to other forms of family life and as such create possibilities for subordination of individual women will be revealed. High, low and turning points in migrants' lives will be pinpointed in order to demonstrate how family (and marriage) migration is not a unitary concept, as it can encompass diverse families, motives forms of migration and institutional contexts, making this category highly fluid and intersecting with other categories of migration.

Andean Immigration and the Reshaping of Contemporary Madrid

Rubio, Felipe

Research Academy Leipzig, University of Leipzig Leipzig, Germany

Keywords

Global City, Social spaces, Hybridity

From 1990s to the present, international immigration to Spain - from the European Union (EU), other European countries, and other continents - has increased at high levels. The proposed project is set to investigate four of the five largest ethnic groups - populations from the Andean Region of South America: Bolivia, Colombia, Ecuador, and Peru, the majority of whom are of Mestizo (Spanish and Native) origin - in Madrid, Spain, and how a population that has risen from 3, 272 (1998) to 406, 410 (2007) influences the social, political, and cultural re-construction of this global city.

The focus of this study is the transformation of social, cultural, and political discourses and practices concerning the hybridization of Madrid's population with immigrants from Andean countries as the principal subjects of study. At the same time, this transnational phenomenon posits the possible need to re-conceptualize the notion of community, national identity, and citizenship. Migrants' activities in such spheres within a large urban centre can have significant effects on national ideologies of membership and citizenship, and community. The project will discuss how immigrants contribute to a (re)definition of culture, politics, and identity through the more constant inter-relations between people that share a common geographical space.

The research considers Andean immigration within the following debates: 1) Immigrants are partaking in the development of the "city" and becoming less associated with the margins of society; and 2) the re-spatialization of social, cultural, and political space within Madrid.

Note: The fifth in this group are Romanians, which being an EU member state, falls outside the scope of the project
These are official numbers published by the Spanish National Institute of Statistics

Beyond motherhood: transforming sexualities and developing intimacies while maintaining transnational families (the case of Ukrainian caregivers in Italy)

Fedyuk, Olena

*Sociology and Social Anthropology, Central European University
Budapest, Hungary*

Keywords

gendered nationalism, intimacy, transitional motherhood, Transnational migration

My research is looking at one of the most popular survival strategies in post-Soviet Ukraine, i.e. temporary labor migration abroad. While migration to Italy constitutes only the third largest migration stream in Ukraine (estimated to be at 700.000 people) it is the most outstanding in terms of its gender composition; out of 195.000 officially registered migrants, 83% are women majority of whom are in their late 40s (Caritas 2007).

These days, migration to Italy is undergoing fascinating changes; Ukrainian women who pioneered mass migration to Italy in the late 1990s now seek to retire in Ukraine. However, reluctant to loose an important source of income, they have started to re-unite with their children who then pick up their work and keep the flow of "Italian money" coming into the extended family networks. Arrival of these young family members shifts the existing care-chains, flow of care and remittances, thus shaping different kinds of arrangements and investments in both Italy and Ukraine. The research seeks to grasp these transformations shedding some light on the gendered and nationalistic nature of care-chains and labor migration experience.

The focus of the paper that will be presented in ESA 2009 will be on the intimate sphere of the relationships that migrants establish in Italy, while still maintaining their transnational families. While most of the transnational migration literature focuses on the position of women within their families and on their roles as mothers, the media and public discourse in Italy often stigmatize these women as a threat to Italian families and men - hunters. What falls in between these discourses is the widest array of intimate / romantic / sexual relationships, in which these women engage while their stay in Italy. Based on the year of fieldwork in Naples and Bologna, the paper will use collected ethnographic material in order to explore the transformation of sexuality, shift in the social age, new subjectivities and an intricate pattern of pragmatic, emotional, personal and "for-the- better-good" decisions that shape migrant women's choices.

British Migration to Mugla-Gökova Region in Turkey: In the Search of Authenticity

Ertugrul, Gokcen

Sociology, Mugla University

Mugla, Turkey

Keywords

Turkey, British Migration, International Tourism, Retirement Migration

International migration is usually associated with the mobility of the people of the "underdeveloped" countries to the "developed" world in search of work and/ or political security. Therefore integration and adaptation have been the main issues regarding the cultural dimensions of this kind of transnational migration. However, recently we are witnessing a different pattern of international migration, of the migration of the people from the Western/Northern Europe to the Southeast Europe. Spain, Portugese, Greece and Malta have witnessed this migration earlier than Turkey, and especially in the case Spain, are about to consume the process. This migration flow is now moving to Turkey mainly because Turkey is not a part of EU and Turkey's Aegean and Mediterranean coasts are attracting many migrants in the search of not work or security but an escape from an overly-rationalized world.

This kind of migration has been studied as "retirement migration" of the elderly people who are in search of a place which could both provide suitable climate and economically advantageous conditions. Also since the term "migrant" has connotations of "backwardness" and "necessity", these new migration pattern has led researchers to discuss this migration in terms of international tourism and postmodern transnational life-styles.

This presentation is based on a fieldwork conducted on British migrants settling in Turkish villages away from touristic centres and away from other British migrants who prefer to live in a ghetto-like communities with other British migrants. The findings from this case study show that it is an oversimplification to conceptualize this migration as a retirement migration. This presentation aims to discuss the findings from the fieldwork, especially in terms of how the migrants articulate their experiences with reference to their social and political frustrations toward Britain and EU and to their search of authenticity.

British Pakistannis: the role of kinship networks in political participation

Akhtar, Parveen

*Sociology, University of Bristol
Bristol, UK*

Keywords

British Pakistanis, kinship networks, political participation

My paper addresses a question central to the ethnic minorities and political participation literature: how do young people from minority backgrounds view and experience "the political"? My paper examines this question in relation to a specific group, British Pakistani Muslims, about whose political engagement there has been a significant amount of public and policy debate, but less research. My main finding is that young British Pakistani Muslims are disenfranchised in two ways: first, in relation to mainstream society; and, second, in relation to their own community. Politics is a "lived experience" for many British Pakistani Muslims: the stereotypes of Muslims in mainstream media and in popular discourse have an effect on their everyday lives, through for example segregation in schools and in housing. My research also suggests that within segregated Pakistani communities, biraadari, or kinship politics, is influential. As a consequence, younger British Pakistanis are turning away from the political mainstream and towards other forms of participation. Within arenas such as community organisations, I argue that there is evidence of a concerted effort among young people, of both sexes, to broaden their horizons and build up their own cultural capital; in other words, to develop the confidence required to feel comfortable and confident in the decision making process.

Children Sent Behind: the Dynamics of Transnational Families through the Prism of European Citizenship as Enacted by Bulgarian Muslims Migrants

Deneva, Neda

*Sociology and Social Anthropology, Central European University
Budapest, Hungary*

Keywords

Transnational migration, transnational families, Bulgarian Muslims

This paper aims to address the transnational parenthood practices of Bulgarian Muslims migrants in Spain. While most studies explore the aspect of children left behind, here I focus on the issue of sending children back to the place of origin after an initial period of living together with them in Spain. I look at the motivations of parents and the particular practices which are involved in the process of sending children behind. Based on extended ethnographic field work in a Bulgarian Muslim migrants' community both in Bulgaria and in Spain, I look in details at the care arrangements and their transformations over the last few years. I explore the everyday interaction between the children, the carers and the parents, as well as the flow of goods, money and symbolic items between Bulgaria and Spain.

In addition to that, I argue that the phenomenon of sending children behind is related partly to the particular generational dynamic of the migrant community and it is to be explained with the age structure of the migrant group and the particular care arrangements between generations. At the same time, another motivational aspect is related to the flexibilization in all aspects of migrants' lives. Thus sending children behind to go to school to Bulgaria is an expression of the temporality of the migrants' plans to stay in Spain and it is a symbolic link with their place of origin. Finally, Bulgaria's accession to EU is another motivational aspect. Conceiving Bulgaria and Spain as part of one space, rather than two oppositional points creates an incentive of linking the two places through their own lives. Thus, sending children behind links the migrant community with Bulgaria in a physical way, but also in a temporal way, oriented towards the future.

Constructing a Refugee: The State, NGOs and Gendered Experiences of Asylum in the Czech Republic

Szczepanikova, Alice

*Department of Sociology, University of Warwick
Mannheim, Germany*

Keywords

Gender, asylum, refugee, Czech Republic, agency

The paper explores an institutionalised world that refugees inhabit in today's Europe. It argues that the institutional system that organises the reception of refugees and their settlement in a receiving country is based on historically and politically contingent constructions of "a refugee". It is based on research conducted in the Czech Republic - an emerging country of immigration and asylum at the semi-periphery of the European Union. It draws on qualitative empirical data generated in interviews and participant observations among state officials, intergovernmental and non-governmental workers, asylum seekers and refugees from Armenia, Belarus and Chechnya. The analysis brings together the key actors that shape the construction of "a refugee" and examines the key sites of the refugee system where this construction takes place: asylum and immigration legislation, refugee determination process, refugee camps and non-governmental spaces of assistance and public representation of refugees. "A refugee" is analysed as an idealised concept that underlies asylum policy-making; as an object of governance that shapes institutional practices; and as a lived and performed gendered experience that forms and transforms identities. The dominant view of refugees as people of little or no choice is challenged by presenting them as knowledgeable actors who act strategically in an unevenly contoured terrain of the refugee system.

Could exist a zero (pre-first) generation in migration? Transnational habitus formation and intergenerational solidarities within the Romanian migrant families

Nedelcu, Mihaela

Institute of Sociology / Swiss Forum for Migration and Population Studies, University of Neuchâtel Neuchâtel, Switzerland

Keywords

co-presence, intergenerational solidarity, internet, transnational habitus, « zero generation »

Intergenerational transmissions and cultural reproduction have gotten great prominence in migration studies. However, the generation question arises only for the migrants' line of descent; thus one speaks about first, second, even third generation in migration. What happens with the generation of the migrants' parents? Are they merely sedentary populations, passively subjected to the consequences of their children migration? Moreover, the generational analytical schema does remain relevant to understand family dynamics within migration, in a social world getting in an accelerated process of comopolitanisation? How interaction processes between generations of migrants are affected by the transnationalisation of the social structures and the wide spreading of information and communication technologies (ICTs)? How are migrant families functioning in a transnational social field overlapping space and time discontinuities? These are the questions this paper tries to answer on the basis of a qualitative interview-based research conducted among skilled Romanian migrant families to Canada.

By grounding on the case of Romanian "grand-parents" in Toronto, it argues that a new unexpected actor "the zero generation" emerges on the migratory scene. This actor is part of a two-step process. First, the parents still resident in Romania are extensively engaging in transnational symbolic and material exchanges. While keeping a daily contact with their descendants through email, chat rooms, mobile phones and videophone systems and softwares (like MSN or Skype), they are accommodating at a distance to the Canadian environment of their migrant children. In a second phase, a great part of them develop a heightened mobility between the two countries, mostly to respond to an increasing demand for grandchild care and domestic work. If a couple of them engage in back-and-forth movements for years, others end-up by establishing in Canada as their children are sponsoring them within the family reunification procedure. Lacking necessary linguistic and social skills to integrate within the Canadian society, this retired population surprisingly generates innovative transnational and community dynamics. The interplay of three generations enables also new forms of intergenerational solidarities and transmissions. Combined with the use of the ICTs, it gives raise to new transnational habitus, family reproduction and socialisation practices.

Does communication matter? Transnational communication within transnational family

Muszel, Magdalena

*Social and Political Sciences, European University Institute
San Domenico di Fiesole, Italy*

Keywords

transnationalism, transnational family, transnational communication

This proposal is based on my PhD project which concerns "Family in the face of migration. A case study of the Polish immigrants in Ireland."

To gain a complete picture of transnational family life we must study it from a dynamic perspective. To do this, I introduce in my research three main stages of transnational family life: the pre-transnational, the transnational and the post-transnational family stage.

In this paper I will focus mainly on the transnational family communication at the second stage of transnational family life- that of the transnational phase.

While studying transnational family communication at this stage I would like to highlight the significance of the everyday communication that occurs among transnational family members and the financial and other forms of support that flow both ways; from and towards transmigrants. When studying everyday transnational family communication patterns the attention will be paid to the patterns of usage and combined effects of the usage of new communication techniques like the Internet, mobile phones as well as financial possibilities (for instance cheap flights), as they are commonly used by transmigrants. Transnational communication of families includes also mutual exchange of monetary and non-monetary support between immigrants and their families in the home country. I will focus particularly on: remittances sent by migrants and care giving and receiving. The monetary support is especially significant in labour immigrants' transnational families as the financial motivations triggered the migration and the earnings abroad constitute a part of the family survival strategy. Therefore, it is important to study positive and negative impact of the financial support on the family condition.

Transnational family communication rises many additional questions: Is transnational family situation more constructive or destructive for family structure, family roles and individual family relations? Does transnational communication have any impact on the family conditions' utopian or dystopian influence of new technologies? How do monetary and non-monetary supports change family condition?

The theoretical discussion in this paper will be supported by the data about Polish immigrants in Ireland.

European free movers as an emerging marriageable group: some preliminary findings

Gaspar, Sofia

CIES, CIES-ISCTE

Lisbon, Portugal

Keywords

Free-movers, europe, mixed marriage

In today's Europe, the internal mobility of the population seems to be associated with an increasing number of cross-national marriages. From the various groups that make up the body of mobile EU citizens, "free movers" appear to be rising as an emerging "marriageable group". These are highly skilled citizens who make a personal or professional decision to go beyond their national borders, taking advantage of the freedom of movement guaranteed by the EU. This idea that mobile well-educated individuals represent an emerging marriageable group will be here sustained to show that, throughout the EU, love ties and family relationships are one of the principal reasons for moving. "Intra-European love" therefore represents a driving force behind individual intra-EU migration and an important reason for a person's stay - at least for a period of time - in a foreign culture. The aim of this paper is to discuss this idea by presenting qualitative evidence from in-depth interviews with mixed couples of free movers living in Portugal. As I will suggest, this specific "marriageable European group" has, both at a private and public level, important consequences for EU social integration that should not be disregarded by social scientists.

Family Migration and Transnational Habitus in Post-enlargement Europe: the case of Polish immigrants in Scotland

Moskal, Marta

*Centre for Educational Sociology, University of Edinburgh
Edinburgh, Scotland, UK*

Keywords

Social and Cultural Capital, habitus, transnationalism, Post-enlargement Europe, Family Migration

The transformation of Europe into a single market represents a significant conceptual challenge for conventional accounts of family migration. Reviewing international family-related migration into Europe, Kofman argues that the family has been neglected because of the emphasis in migration studies on the individual and a heavily economic focus (Kofman 2004). The proposed paper presents an empirical study of Migration and the Integration of Polish families and children in Scotland and sets out its theoretical background. It argues that the locations of migrants within the European Community have become more fluid, with families being increasingly likely to inhabit more than one residence. It also argues that the uniqueness of the European setting requires a coherent theoretical focus and conceptual framework for understanding the implications of family migration. It suggests that the notion of transnational habitus generate useful empirical approach concerning migration movements within the European Community. The paper analyses Polish post-enlargement migration and explore the ways in which different forms of migrant resources (social, cultural and economic capital) are accumulated, exchanged and transformed in a transnational habitus.

Growing up with eagle-eyed neighbors. A study on how tight social networks influence norms and values of Turkish Belgians of the second and third generation

Van Kerckem, Klaartje

*Sociology, Ghent University
Gent, Belgium*

Keywords

Turks, migrants' families, social network, acculturation, transmission of values

Adolescents in migrant families often grow up in an environment with paradoxical demands. In the case of Belgian Turks, adolescents are socialized in two quite different socialization systems. On the one hand, the Turkish community expects them to conform to collectivistic norms and values; the larger society on the other hand, demands 'integration', which basically means they have to adapt to individualistic norms and values. The proposed study is part of an ongoing research effort to shed light on the way in which second and third generation Belgian Turks negotiate these possibly paradoxical demands and on how living in these two worlds is reflected in norms and values. The here proposed study focuses on how the composition and characteristics of the social network of adolescents plays a role in the process of transmission of values. We hereby try to find out how (1) social control within the community and (2) both 'bonding' and 'bridging' capital influence both the process of transmission of values, and what norms and values are finally internalized. We focus on social control and social capital, because - based on the social capital theory and field experience - we expect tight social networks to be a source of rigidity, because the tight structure of the network enables parents to control what their children do. Considering the fact that the Turkish community strongly emphasizes a Turkish modus vivendi, we expect adolescents that grow up in a tight community to come less into contact with native Belgians and hence individualistic norms and values.

This qualitative research project can theoretically be situated on the intersection of sociology and social psychology; methodologically we position ourselves on the intersection of anthropology and sociology. The research can be characterized by a strong emphasis on epistemology and multi-method research. Preliminary insights are gathered during participant observation and informal interviews with key informants. Based on these insights, we obtained a purposive sample of 30 respondents who were interviewed alone or together with a sibling. Preliminary insights show that intercultural contact (bridging social capital) is essential for a balanced value-system. Further results will be discussed.

How Young Romanians and Maroccans in Northern Italy use Social Capital

Saint-Blancat, Chantal

*Department of Sociology, University of Padua
Padova, Italy*

Keywords

social capital, migrants, young generations, family network

We are facing dynamic and demanding young generations of migrant's origin conscious of the lack of social recognition regarding their own potentiality. In such a frame, understanding how they value and use their Social Capital appears as a key issue. Three main issues are addressed in this paper: 1) how youngs use and perceive family's social capital, 2) what personal strategies do they adopt to convert family and community's networks in other forms of capital, 3) how do they promote the spill-over effect from bonding to bridging social capital.

Evidence of our research based on an enquiry in three towns and provinces in the Veneto Region (57 in-depth interviews) show that youngs are active agents in the production of their own social capital.

Identifications and consumption styles among young people with immigrant origins in Italy

Rebughini, Paola

*Departement of Social and Political Studies, University of Milan
Milan, Italy*

Domaneschi, Lorenzo

*Departement of Social and Political Studies, University of Milan
Milan, Italy*

Keywords

Youth, Immigration, identification, Consumption

The future of "second" and "third" generations is one of the main topics of research of immigration studies. Since the second half of the last century, the optimistic idea of a straightforward and unproblematic integration of teenage children of immigrants has given way to more complex analysis. The straight line that was supposed to characterise the assimilation process increasingly shows to be a bumpy one, which produces uncertain results: "ethnic" differences do not fade and do not disappear, on the contrary, they are preserved, sometimes resurfacing in new forms, and their "assimilation" can fail, creating new forms of marginality and uncertainty. In this presentation we would like to show the results of a recent research about identifications and consumptions of young people with immigrant origins in Milan. The aim of the research was to look into the processes whereby both collective identifications and consumption styles or tastes are constructed in a complex and varied way among the children of immigrants. This allows them to use identifications and cultural references in a more flexible and blurred way even if socio-economic background and family's cultural capital can influence their choices.

Immigrant children imagining and building belonging in a transnational family

Haikkola, Lotta

*Department of Sociology, University of Helsinki
Helsinki, Finland*

Keywords

networks, transnational family, belonging, children

The presentation deals with second generation immigrant children's perspectives on their transnational families. Whereas the immigrant generation can sustain their previous relationships to (extended) family members in places of origin and other countries, children who immigrated when they were young or were born in the country of immigration have to negotiate their belonging in the almost unknown transnational family network. Building on qualitative network analysis and discourse analytical approach, two intertwined aspects of belonging are discussed: children's ways of constructing their (imagined) families and attempts to build concrete social relationships to the members of extended family network. In the context of relative geographical and social isolation of the transnational family, children imagine being part of it and hope to "know" their families, and consequently be "known" themselves, e.g. claim a belonging in the family. On the other hand, a particular form of belonging in the family network is realized when concrete social relationships are built. Visits to the extended family plays a central role in this, as social relationships are mostly built through face-to-face contact with people. In the final section, the dynamics of exclusion from and inclusion in the family network as a means of negotiating a sense of self is discussed. The paper draws from semi-structured network interviews with 29 second generation children and youth in Finland. In the interviews both data on personal network and interview data was gathered.

Informal economies in the informal city: the case of alternative household's incomes found in hindu families

Cachado, Rita

*CIES - Centre for Research and Studies in Sociology, ISCTE - Instituto Superior de Ciências do Trabalho e da Empresa
Lisboa, Portugal*

Keywords

housing, SOCIAL POLICIES, Informal economy, hindu transnationalism

Underground economy has been studied under three different aspects: criminal activities; financial abuse; and informal economy. In this presentation, I will address the last type. In the last years, I have been conducting research with the Hindu community at Quinta da Vitória neighborhood, in Loures municipality (Great Lisbon), which is an informal dwelling cluster that has been through a rehousing process since the early 1990s. Local hindus are transnational migrants with low taxes of labor stability.

Sixteen years ago, the Portuguese government introduced a special social housing program for those living in so-called shanty towns, which was not yet totally accomplished. Shanty town dwellers were then seen as undistinguished poverty victims, despite of their different economic, cultural and historical backgrounds.

Some families develop informal economic strategies in order to fulfill their monthly incomes. Main forms of informal economy that can be found in the neighborhood are sewing, cooking and cloths trade. Costumers are for the most part of the Hindu community, though neighbors may be alternative clients. Despite the fact that this type of informal economy is of course not exclusive of the local Hindu community, specific socio-political and cultural contextualization, which will be at stake in the presentation, contribute to the informal sector in the neighborhood.

Out of the formal system control, informal labor market is an issue that is not understood clearly by local authorities that are managing the neighborhood rehousing process. These and other questions concerning the Hindu community informal economies at Quinta da Vitória will be at stake in the paper, following new approaches about the informal city and concerning new data from the fieldwork with a transnational Hindu population.

Inter-level social processes within multi-sited migrant families

Kempf, Andreas Oskar

Sociology, Johann Wolfgang Goethe University Frankfurt Frankfurt/Main, Germany

Keywords

Migration, biography, family lives, transnational social processes

Since the collapse of the communist regimes migration flows within Europe have increased and new patterns of migration have emerged. In contrast to former flows of the so-called Gastarbeiter migration today has become much more dynamic. Migrants oftentimes circulate embedded in strong and durable social networks between their country of origin and their country of destination. Nevertheless, migration today is highly regulated and restricted, that is why social relations are still highly structured by different national and inter-national border regimes.

After intensive field research in a Romanian village as a starting point of close network migration to Italy I focus on the biographical meanings of migration experiences for migrants and their families on different levels. On the basis of multi-sited and longitudinal field research in the country of origin as well as in the country of destination living within several families conducting biographical narrative interviews, additional semi-structured interviews and participant observation I analyse various dynamic and ongoing processes.

Besides the different levels on which migration acquires biographical significance according to the contexts of different life trajectories shaping and constantly (re)negotiating possible meanings of migration I have a strong research focus on transborder inner-family and intergenerational processes. Creating a theoretical sample I concentrate on several and differently contrasting individual cases of migrants and their families analysing the structure of the migration process itself and the impact of migration and its different local contexts migrants permanently keeping up agencies with on family lives, generational perspectives and the dynamics of biographies deeply influencing and creating new forms of family transmission. The biographical perspective of migrants and their family members on their own life experiences changes constantly not only due to modified political and juridical frameworks of mobility and of crossing borders but also, and related to this with regard to permanent and profound changes in their life courses and family life arrangements, and finally due to constant social changes taking place within their context of destination and especially within their context of origin.

Intergenerational solidarity in the context of transnational migration

Gherghel, Ana

*CES-UA, University of Azores
Ponta Delgada, Azores, Portugal*

Le Gall, Josiane

*Département de communication sociale et publique, Université du Québec à Montréal
Montreal, Canada*

Keywords

Portuguese immigrants, Migration, intergenerational solidarity, transnational family, social support

How is the intergenerational solidarity reconfigured within the transnational families? What forms of support and exchanges take place between the members of families involved in transnational migration? What changes occur in the organization of support familial networks during important life transitions? These are the questions we examine in our exploratory research focused on a yet undocumented migration phenomenon, that of Portuguese population from the Azores archipelago to Canada. These migration flows directed to Canada started in the mid-1950s and reached a peak in the 1970s, continuing until nowadays at lower levels. Maintaining strong ties with the communities left behind and the return migration of the first generation migrants registered in the last decade allow us though to observe the transnational migration as a historical and present phenomenon. Organized as an important family-led migration, this phenomenon involves nowadays the first, second and sometimes third generations of migrants. While the immigrants settled in Canada maintain strong ties and multi-directional exchanges with their origin communities (through visits, traditional feasts, etc.), the return migrants preserve important links with the destination society because their children remain.

The migration of Portuguese population from the Azorean region to Canada represents an interesting case study for the debates on transnationalism because it involves a continuous back-and-forth movement between the origin and destination countries over more than 50 years. Therefore the impact of migration on the sending community (a European marginal region and insular society) is analyzed including in the research the non-migrants. Based on biographical interviews conducted with members of 2 or 3 generations of a same family living in the Azores and Montreal, Canada, this paper aims to bring an important contribution to the models that conceptualize familial solidarity in a transnational context, an area still under-researched both in European and Canadian contexts. This case study also allows us to initiate comparisons with a more documented migration phenomenon such as that of Portuguese from mainland to France or other European countries, offering a contrasting example where the geographic distance can play an important role in determining the forms of support circulating within the transnational networks.

Is Family a Stumbling block to Highly Skilled Migration to Europe?

Vysotskaya, Volha

*Life-Course and Lifespan Dynamics, Bremen International Graduate School of Social Sciences
Bremen, Germany*

Keywords

decision making, Family Migration, highly skilled migration, receiving country

Is Family a Stumbling block to Highly Skilled Migration to Europe?

The paper looks into how the decision to stay/ leave in a host country is structured by the role of the family of the highly skilled professionals, i.e. a spouse and children. Highly skilled migrants have been often conceptualised as a privileged group of migrants, as they cross the borders via working visas, which they receive relatively easy gratefully to their special rare skills; are welcome in the European Union and provided with steady salaries, international environment, social security, etc. by the receiving states. At the same time, it is acknowledged that the picture painted for the families of the professional migrants following them is much bleaker: Spouses are dependent on their partners' visas and usually have limited opportunities for finding their places in the new society; there is a persisting dilemma for professionals of whether to expose children to a new schooling system or whether to confront them with pressure of integration problems; significant efforts needed to acquire a new foreign language (determining the outcome of a search for a job), and the permanent instability linked to the dependency on the highly skilled's visa, which play out negatively on the whole family. Therefore, the assumed privileges of the highly skilled may be well balanced out by the aforementioned negative impact on their families. The resulting dilemma with which the highly skilled are confronted is investigated in the proposed paper, which focuses on the case study of professionals from Russia who have come to Germany after 1999. Their representations of the lives in the EU have been collected during two rounds of semi-structured interviews and succeeding analysed with the help of atlas.ti. The implications of the analysis are then compared with the underlying assumptions of the emerging policy of the European Union in this field and in particular, the development of the Blue Card

Making new citizens: motherhood and migration

Erel, Umut

*Centre for Citizenship, Identities and Governance, Open University
Milton Keynes, UK*

Keywords

Migration, children, citizenship, mothering

When families migrate they change not only their country of residence, but this also affects relations among genders and generations. The nursery rhymes and the bedtime stories as well as discussions about homework or dating become sites of negotiating the ethnic and cultural identities of parents and children. When it comes to migrant families, where the cultural, social and linguistic resources of the mother's country of origin are different from those in the new country of residence, the aspect of ethnic identity and allegiance becomes part of these negotiations. Based on preliminary analysis of interviews from an ongoing project on migrant mothers', this paper conceptualises mothering as a citizenship practice whereby migrant mothers (co-)construct their own and their children's identities in relation to questions of belonging and participation in the UK. It will look at the ways in which mothering identities are constructed differentially in the home, in the ethnic community, and in relation to British institutions. Mothering is a practice where different, at times conflicting expectations of bringing up children into different forms of community (national British, local multi-ethnic, ethnically specific) intersect. This paper looks at how migrant women make use of different forms of social and cultural capital to constitute themselves and their children as part of British society.

Migrants' Families in Portugal: a socio-anthropological approach

Sousa Ribeiro, Joana

*Sociology, Centre for Social Studies, CES, University of Coimbra
Coimbra, Portugal*

Ioannis Baganha, Maria

*FEUC/CES, University of Coimbra
Coimbra, Portugal*

Areoso Feio, Joana

*Centre for Social Studies, University of Coimbra
Coimbra, Portugal*

Keywords

Family, Migration, Admission Policies, Integration Policies and Portugal

During the second half of the 90's, and in line with what happened in other Southern European countries, Portugal emerged as a host country for the international migratory flows. This paper is based on an ongoing study that, using panel data, researches the familiar immigrants trajectories, the impact of public policies on the 'integration' process and the migrants and their families as social actors on that process. Taking in account the social arrangements in the origin and host societies, the role of family capital and the impact of the admission and integration policies, the migratory project will be understood as a family strategy as well. For this purpose, a total of 90 interviews are being carried out to migrants that came to Portugal from Brazil, Cape-Verde and Ukraine, the three most representative migrants groups in Portugal. This study allow us to gain a deeper knowledge about the previously mentioned immigrant groups, especially regarding the impact of the public policies in the migrants' social inclusion process, the strategies developed by them to face adverse conditions and the risks of exclusion; and the dynamics of the post-migratory projects.

Objects of Love

Ezzeddine, Petra

*Department of Anthropology, Faculty of Humanities, Charles University
Prague 1, Czech Republic*

Keywords

children, Love, Trans-national female migrants, Ukraine

The paper is based on the social anthropological research on trans-national female migrants from Ukraine working and living without their children in Czech Republic.

These trans-national mothers have to experience the spatial, temporal and emotional separation from their own children and at the same time be responsible for the breadwinning of their nuclear and extended families in Ukraine. In my paper, I will "follow the thing" /Marcus,1998/ with those they are trying to supply their role and identity in families. I focus on the meanings /"uses and trajectories", Appadurai , 1986/ of objects which trans-national mothers send and transfer back home. These goods are not just the form of the migrants' remittances ,but there are embodied objects of mother love. Through these objects /presents, dresses, radio, tv, PC, money etc. / they are trying to construct their new "elastic" /Sotelo, 1997/ forms of the motherhood. On the other hand, trans-national mothers are bringing objects /pictures, toys, dresses etc. that belong to their children and help them to reconstruct and evoke their own mother's love. I examine the categories and qualities of those goods, as well as its meanings for the construction and the reconstruction of motherhood. I describe the material side of these objects /in sense of the material culture/ as well as its narrative representations in biographical-narrative interviews. I argue that these "objects of love" have important evocative and "advocating" role in the experiencing of the trans-national mothering.

Return "for good"? : Experiences of Returnees to Turkey

Rittersberger-Tilic, Helga

*Department of Sociology, Middle East Technical University
Ankara, Turkey*

Keywords

Turkey, re-integration, returnees' experiences

Parallel to major economic and political global transformations worldwide migration flows have taking new dimensions and different forms. Migration issues are discussed relating to gender, religion, and ethnicity, human rights as well as to economics. In discussions on globalization migration takes an important part, some scholars stress the importance of a growing polarization of highly skilled and unskilled migrant flows. Further restrictions on migration have increased the volume of illegal immigration and human trafficking. Migration thus became an issue of managing and one of the leading concepts to deal with "the problem of migrants" by the host societies is still integration. What happens to those, who decide to return or are forced to return, weren't they able to integrate? or couldn't they? How are they going to "integrate" into their so called "home country - Turkey?" "Will they move back to Germany?" To understand migration decisions and patterns it seems necessary to integrate the "return" not as something stable but eventually temporary. On a global scale, migration in what ever kind of direction should be considered seriously in an attempt to gain a holistic picture. In this presentation the social profiles and patterns of "re-integration" of returnees from Germany in Turkey are discussed. Personal experiences of returnees and patterns of return have been hardly systematized in the existing literature. Besides structural conditions, the returnee him- or herself is an important agent. Furthermore, it seems important to distinguish into a "return promoted" return or one initiated on a "voluntary" basis. In-depth interviews and personal narratives do enrich our understanding of social reality. Besides the personal narratives of the returnees, expert-interviews including representatives of state and non-governmental organisations, professional chambers, and national and local state authorities have been incorporated into the analysis, too.

State of Imagination: Embodiments of Immigration Canada

Culic, Irina

*Sociology and Anthropology, University of Windsor
Windsor, Canada*

Keywords

subject making, Canada, Romania, international migration, state power

The paper investigates Romanians' immigration to Canada, after the momentous changes of 1989. Such inquiry occasions, on the one hand, a critical analysis of the nature of states and modalities of state power, grounded in an empirical study of Canada's immigration policy. The state is conceived as a historically produced cultural construct, an 'idea' manifested in concrete practices. Selecting candidates for immigration involves a refined politics of making subjects, whereby the state is effected through disciplinary inscriptions on migrant's body and projects of the self, materializes in extraterritorial social spaces, and objectifies in governmentalities of 'external populations.' On the other hand, it opens a new space to explore the workings of the reflexive self in the late modern age. Rights to international mobility and its intricate formal regulation may generate not only hybrid sorts of legal subjects incompletely and imprecisely tied to two states, but also highly reflexive individuals, performatively enacting themselves as subjects of policies, discourses, and knowledges, from positions of ontological and emotional liminality.

The effect of migration for labour of parents on school performance: a study of high school students from Oradea (Romania)

Hatos, Adrian

*Sociology and Social Work, University of Oradea
Oradea, Romania*

Keywords

transnational families, academic achievement, social reproduction

There are authors that attribute to parents' migration for work a decline in academic performances of their offspring left home. The main argument explains the phenomena through the impairment of the family structure due to migration. I used survey data from 1811 high school students from Oradea and multi-level regression to show that the bi-variate relationship between GPA and the situation that both parents have migrated recently for work masks the simple fact that both lower academic performances and migration are the products of a lower socio-economic status. The conclusion is that migration for work of parents is not an academic risk for the students.

The traces of migration: 'here' and 'there' in the discourses of children of immigrants living in Madrid (Spain)

Garcia, Inaki

*Dpment. of Ciencia política y sociología, Universidad Carlos III de Madrid
Getafe, Spain*

Pedreno, Andres

*Dpment. of Sociología y política social, Universidad de Murcia
Murcia, Spain*

Keywords

migrations, identity, Family, ethnicity, Youth

Most families are structured by two elements: gender and generation. This paper, based on in-depth interviews to a qualitative sample of teenagers and youngsters with an immigrant family origin, shows how for their families there is a third element: the binary opposition between 'here' (the place of residence) and 'there' (the family's place of origin). This opposition is present in the narratives of immigrant children, not only in the stories they tell about the migratory past of the family, but in the way they understand and think up the relationships between family members. Also, in the way they identify themselves with people, communities, ethnic groups and places more or less defined, with regard to which they recognize themselves, feel strongly attached or in some way feel they belong to.

Children of immigrants draw a symbolic border that classifies these members between those who 'belong here' and those who 'belong there'. The position each family member has in that imaginary bipolar space does not only depend on the place of residence or birth. Other intervening elements are the migratory path followed by the family, the age classes among the group of siblings, the connection to networks of relatives or communities, ethnicity, gender, and other elements related to family dynamics and configurations. The conflicts and alliances between the members of the family may update and reproduce that symbolic border (that entails the traces of the family's migratory ups and downs), putting it in the middle of family's everyday life.

Sometimes, these families are part of a transnational network of relatives, or have gone through a complex migratory path. In those cases a third spatial pole may appear, which we will call 'the third place'.

Trans national Europeans? The influence of modern technologies on life strategies of Chechen refugees in the EU

Lukasiewicz, Karolina

*Social Anthropology, Jagiellonian University, Institute of Sociology
Krakow, Poland*

Keywords

Migration, identity, transnationalism, refugees

Trans national Europeans? The influence of modern technologies on the life strategies of Chechen refugees in the EU. " ... there are voice rooms where you can meet Chechnyans from all over the world. You have people from all different ages and the topics are from current events to religion and then you have your younger crew who listen to Noxchi music, etc. It's a nice way of learning and touching up on your Noxchi mott and even Russian. It helped me!" (<http://www.facebook.com/group.php?gid=2246058387>, 2007).

The above quotation comes from a Chechen discussion forum on the social networking site Facebook.com. When reading the forum, one can easily discover its relevance to people; due to rapid technological development, Chechens living in Chechnya and abroad, particularly in the European Union exchange important information, share common interests and concerns, all without even seeing each other in the reality. The internet changes people's lives and the process of their adaptation to host societies. Online discussion boards constitute a unique platform of communication between different groups of migrants. It is particularly visible among refugees as they seek contact with family members and their home countries even more intensively than labour migrants. This is the case for the Chechen refugees who have developed various kinds of transnational communities on the internet.

The questions arose how do refugees adapt to host societies in the transnational world of modern technologies? How are their life strategies influenced by the technologies? What kind of social identity do they share? What is the role of the internet in the process of their common identity formation? In order to answer the questions I have introduced computer assisted content analysis based on Grounded Theory approach. I have analysed the biggest Chechen internet forums, e.g. Amina.com, Chechnyafree.ru. and websites providing information about Chechnya, such as Kavkaz Center. I have also conducted in depth interviews with users of the forums and websites. In presentation I will show my research results. I will explain the influence of the modern technologies on Chechen refugees' life strategies and the process of their common transnational identity formation.

Transnational Families

Apitzsch, Ursula

Sociology, Goethe-University of Frankfurt Frankfurt am Main, Germany

Keywords

Migration, Transnational space, gender relations

Transnational Migrant Families

New publications on transnational social spaces are identifying transnational families as most important new transnational institutions. (Pries 2008) However, there are very few publications on transnational families in the European context. More research has been done on Asian and Latin American transnational families. This research identifies transnational family decisions e.g. on education as a condition for upward mobility as often traditional and gender biased. We do not know whether this is also the case in the families of former guestworkers from the European South, from North Africa and Turkey to Northern and Western European countries.

In my paper, I want to present research that already has been done on European transnational migrant families. Furthermore, I will try to draw first conclusions about the co-operation structures in these families. The most important question is how power relations between men and women have been changed in transnational families within the last two generations.

Transnational lifestyles of high and low skilled migrants and their families in Luxembourg

Schneider, Marie

*INSIDE, University of Luxembourg
Walferdange, Luxembourg*

Willems, Helmut

*INSIDE, University of Luxembourg
Walferdange, Luxembourg*

Keywords

international migration, transmigration, high/low qualified migration, Luxembourg

International migration has developed unknown dynamics in the past decades. Not only have the flows and ways of international migrants changed through immense developments in technology and transportation but there is also a rising acknowledgment about new ways of dealing and reflecting the migration experience. Today these developments are described by the concept transmigration which has to be designed as a way of life in transnational and pluri-local social spaces. On the individual level transmigration has to be analyzed with regard to following dimensions: mobility, lifestyle organization, social networking (instrumental strategy), the transfer of goods, artefacts etc., identity and its possible ambivalences. The pluri-local character of transmigration is stable and allows those involved to organize their life trajectories and biographies along different nation states and variable social contexts.

As work is one main motive for migration and the organization of transnational social networks, it is one starting point for transmigration research. Worldwide the gaps between rich and poor, between high and low skilled migrations widen and the impact of work rises. For highly skilled migrants transmigration refers to the so called globalization winner's, for low skilled migrants transmigration is always detached to poor and disadvantaged social groups with low resources. Therefore the conditions and outcomes of transmigration processes of those in high and low social positions are of much interest, especially as they refer to divergent ways and resources of lifestyle organisation.

After giving a short introduction to the concept of transmigration we want to focus on its connections to the theoretical framework of transnational social spaces. Following we want to concentrate towards transmigration in Luxembourg. We are mainly oriented towards two questions. The first is why migrants and their families decide to live this transitory and nomadic transnational life, even more so considering their qualification levels. Secondly, how do these transmigrants organize their life and lifestyles as they move between different societies?

Transnational Migration of Ecuadorians in Spain and Family bonds (ESA)

Setien, Maria Luisa

*Department of Sociology, University of Deusto
Bilbao, Spain*

Vicente, Trinidad

*Department of Sociology, University of Deusto
Bilbao, Spain*

Keywords

Remittances, Transnational migration, transnational families bonds, migration networks

Spain has become one of the countries in the world with the highest immigrations flows in the last years. In this context, Ecuadorian immigrants has reached the third position of the immigration stock at present. This has happened in a very short period of time, mainly in the last seven years. In this process, the transnational networks have played a very important role, not only at the decision taking moment, but also along the process of establishment and integration in the receiving society. Besides, the immigration process does not imply the breakdown of the relationship with the home country. Transnational relations became more and more important nowadays, specially among the family members. In this context this paper will present the main results of our research based on transnationality and family bonds shown by the Ecuadorian population living in Spain. In order to do this, we will focus our attention in different aspects such as the networks that facilitate the decision making process at the country of origin and/or at the receiving society. We will draw the attention to the transnational exchanges among the family members (economic remittances, goods, emotional support, information channels, contacts, etc), taking into account who is the sender and the receiver. The migration experience represent an important challenge to the family structure. That is why we will also deal with the families changes (gender roles, family reunification, the changes that children experience) that take place in the Ecuadorian families along this process.

Transnational Motherhood: The Case of Romanian Women

Ducu, Viorela

*Sociology, BABES-BOLYAI UNIVERSITY
Cluj Napoca, Romania*

David Kacso, Agnes

*Sociology and Social Work, BABES-BOLYAI UNIVERSITY
Cluj-Napoca, Romania*

Keywords

, transnational families, transnational motherhood, mothers migration, migrant women

Our study analyses the phenomenon of transnational motherhood as exemplified on the case of Romanian women migrating for temporary work abroad, based on 31 interviews in the topic of transnational families. The participants are respondents from three rural communities (transnational family members and key persons).

In the context of transnational motherhood, children represent both a reason for migration, as well as a strong argument for maintaining the migration process: mothers produce money for the children's existence costs and for ensuring their future.

This study will present strategies of transnational motherhood through which mothers manage to fulfill their role to take care and protect their children from a distance. Transnational communication, transfer of direct care to another person, redefinition of motherhood through emphasis on financial support are some of the ways in which migrant mothers try to stand by their children. Moreover, in Romania migrant women and their families presently need to confront the stigmatizing public discourse in which they are referred to as irresponsible mothers leaving their children.

Through illustrating the experience of transnational mothers as a reply to their defamation by the Romanian public, we hope to offer our readers a micro-level perspective regarding the international functioning of mother-children relationships.

Young descendants from PALOP - ethnic identities

Ferreira, Tatiana

Sociology, ISCTE

Lisbon, Portugal

Keywords

identity, nationality, descendants of immigrants, ethnicity

The majority of immigrants from Portuguese Speaking African Countries (PALOP) are in Portugal for many years. Therefore, either by family reunion or by marriage in the host country, already have descendants.

This explains why the ethnic-national identity of young African immigrants children can be of particular interest, since they absorb and keep some of the specificities of their parents culture of origin and at the same time incorporate the Portuguese values and representations system, the society where they were born or grew up.

The aim of this paper, product of a Sociology Master's thesis, was to understand the process by which the ethnic-national identity of these young descendants from PALOP immigrants is structured. Moreover, to grasp the dynamics of expression of that identity using for this propose semi-structured interviews on eleven youngsters of different nationalities.

To fulfill this aim, the research followed the social identity model (Tajfel) in order to outcome a better comprehension of the ethnic-national identity of these young people. Thus, six dimensions of analysis were created: "Me and my journey of life" (social and demographic characterization of the interviewed), "Me and my parents" (social and demographic characterization of the parents), "Image of me" (self-characterization in terms of nationality), "The others and I" (representations I believe others have about me), "Identities - practices and the symbolic" (dimensions in which they express feelings of belonging), "Images in two tones" (representations and future expectations about the two countries).

The results showed that the identities were built and reconstructed through elements such as music, food, sports, perceptions of discrimination and image of "others". These two last elements assume particular importance in the identity definition of youngsters with nationality of origin (many of them don't have Portuguese nationality).

Furthermore, other elements of differentiation were identified among these youngsters since their ethnic-national identity is structured and influenced by their social conditions and relations. Consequently, one of the main contributions of this research is the enrichment of the conceptual discussion about "second generation immigrants". A concept used in many institutional and academic contexts and that sometimes can forget the inherent condition of being young.

RS11

Religion and the Sociology of Religion in Europe

Charity in religious institutes: person's identification and social policy

Kuznetova-Moreno, Irina

Quality studies, The Centre for Advanced Economic Studies of Academy of Science of the Republic of Tatarstan Kazan, Russian Federation

Keywords

Social Policy, identity, charity

The paper bases on the author's research of religious charity in the Republic of Tatarstan of Russia in 2006-2009: the study of Muslim charity - official discourse and daily life of people and Muslim clerics (discourse analysis, interviews); the study of charity practices of Muslim and Christian organizations in Tatarstan (interviews); the role of charity in religious identity (interviews); the popularity of charity in Tatarstan society at hole (mass survey).

The official discourse of religious charity connects it with traditional patriarchic values and serves to support the ethic renaissance in Tatarstan (especially the Tatar's identity), far from daily practices and particular needs of local religious organizations. The factual behavior of people shows quite low inclusion to charity practices and low level of value of charity - both religious and secular. The official proclamation of Muslim charity and arisen of Muslim identity doesn't correspond with activity of people. The features of religious charity behavior reflect the peculiarities of religious identification which shows more often poor inclusion of religious belifes in daily life. The most popular form of religious charity are alms and "home religious meetings" (among Muslims) which "symbolic exchange" supports ethnic and religious identity, reproduction of family values.

At the same time some practices of religious charity is structuring in some religious instutitions and even fill desideratum in social work in sphere of work with prisoners, the disable, drug-addicted people. Fundraising of majority of local religious organization is not developed and use mostly work with individuals then with corporations, but some institutions with high official status obtain permanent support by pro-state big enterprises.

Four Approaches to Dealing with the Religious - Secular Divide

Kucukural, Onder

*Political Science, Sabanci University
Istanbul, Turkey*

Keywords

rationality, Turkey, sociology of religion, tensions

This paper discusses the preliminary findings of a research project entitled "Social Structure and Religion in Turkey", sponsored by the Scientific and Technological Research Council of Turkey. In its broadest sense the project investigates the impact of religion on economy, politics and gender in Turkey. In particular, the research poses questions such as: how do the different social groups perceive religion? Do different perceptions influence political behavior (democratic attitude), views on economy (entrepreneurial culture), and gender relations (formulation of more equal gender relations) and how does it effect attitudes towards EU?

In-depth interviews and participant observations conducted with local religious notables in three cities revealed that dissention with the state is voiced through a religious discourse. This discourse which entails negotiation, compromise and interaction between the traditional and dominant secular norms is framed through five juxtapositions: (i) sacred (transcendental) and profane (mundane), (ii) traditional and modern, (iii) public and private space, (iv) text and praxis, and (v) religious and scientific knowledge. But how do individuals bridge these tensions? What sort of strategies religious authorities and key persons make use of in attracting and persuading believers? Based on the preliminary observations and data, depending on the circumstances and the target audience four approaches were identified. The utilitarian pragmatic approach involved strategic calculations of rewards and punishments. External incentives or threats were perceived in relation to the core principles of religion. The communitarian approach centered on norm compliance and made use of a bounded rationality. Close community and group environments "provide simplifying shortcuts, cues, and buffers that can lead to the enactment of particular role conceptions among individuals" (Checkel, 2005, 810). It best manifested itself in attitude toward family affairs and was articulated through a masculinity discourse. The communicative approach materialized when agents presented arguments to persuade each other through reasoned communication. Last approach, radical rationality, appeared when the recognition of the impossibility of reaching a universal common ground was accepted; it rejected an all-encompassing project for entirety of society and looked for tolerance for difference, thus being more suitable for the democratic attitude where social divisions are stark and deep.

Legacy and challenges: sociology of religion in Central and Eastern Europe

Zrinscak, Sinisa

*Department for Social Work, University of Zagreb - Faculty of Law
Zagreb, Croatia*

Nikodem, Krunoslav

Department for Sociology, University of Zagreb - Faculty of Philosophy 10000, Croatia

Keywords

Development, Central-Eastern Europe, sociology of religion

This paper will focus on the development of the sociology of religion in Central and Eastern European countries after the fall of communism. The paper is divided in three parts. The first part will briefly outline the development of the sociology of religion in Croatia, and the second part the development of the sociology of religion in other parts of the former Yugoslavia. The comparison of these developments will show the interaction between legacy (some former republics of the former Yugoslavia had quite developed sociology of religion, some much less) and social development in the period after 1989, characterized by war, conflicts, political isolation of majority of post-Yugoslav countries, and by revitalization of the social role of religion. In the third part of the paper this analysis will be extended to other Central and Eastern European countries. The sociology of religion in that region experienced rapid development, measured by research and papers at national and international conferences and journals, but there are also reasons for critical judgment about that development. The crucial questions are: (a) who and how set the agenda for research, (b) how (if) different religious situation of different countries is reflected in sociology of religion, and (c) if there is a need for different concepts and theoretical approaches in comparison to sociology of religion of Western countries.

National imaginary and the academic approach of religious phenomena in France

LAMINE, Anne-Sophie

Social Sciences, Laboratoire Cultures et Sociétés en Europe - Université de Strasbourg Strasbourg, France

Keywords

religion, France, belief, general sociology, national imaginary

In this paper, I intend to analyse how the French national imaginary impacts the trends in dealing academically with religious phenomena in France. I propose to investigate in the field of sociology as well as in neighbouring fields such as political theory. As Birnbaum, among others, underlines it, the idea of imagined France is beside all one of unity. It also goes with the idea of the decline of religion and of its incompatibility with modernity. For this purpose I will draw on relevant examples within three themes to carry the analyses. The first field of investigation is the place of the study of Islamic religious phenomena in social science. The second is how religious phenomena (and what kind of religious phenomena) is considered in general sociology. The third deals with matters of studies about belief and how this theme is related to rationality.

On "Cultural Catholicism" and experiments with religion in Slovakia

Podolinská, Tatiana

Slovak Academy of Sciences, Institute of Ethnology Bratislava, Slovakia

Keywords

experimental religiosity, "cultural Catholicism", sociology of religion in Slovakia

The paper will give brief overview of the state of sociology of religion in Slovakia (kinds of approaches applied and theoretical framework developed). The core of the study will be devoted to the in-depth analyses of two phenomena picked up from sociological surveys conducted in Slovakia (international: EVS 1991, 1999; PCE 2000, ISSP 1998, 2004, 2005, and domestic).

The author is focused on two interesting phenomena: A) People may be churched without being religious; B) people may be unchurched without being secular.

A) Slovakia is widely known as one of the "towers" of Catholicism in Europe (64% of Catholics in 2000). Nevertheless, detailed analyses show that only 38% of Catholics in Slovakia would be characterized as "core worshippers". This "deviation" from institutionalized Catholicism is visible in all dimensions of religiosity (intellectual, dogmatic, ethical and liturgical). The author regards the typology Catholics religiosity of Janusz Marianski (applied on Polish material in 1981) and the concept of "cultural religion" of N. J. Demerath III (2000) as very productive for Slovak settings. Author claims that evolution from "church oriented Catholicism" towards the "selective Catholicism" (or "Cultural Catholicism") in Slovakia should not be "simply" regarded as detraditionalized (modernized) Catholicism. More probably, Catholicism functions here "only" as a proper "label", it is a way of how to be religiously connected without being religiously active.

B) The next part of the study is devoted mostly to the non-institutional types of religiosity. The author points out, that recent sociological approach would reconsider the categories of "churchliness", "confession" and "conversion". She points out that in recent Slovak (urban) environment we meet with various combinations of categories "belonging", "believing" and "taking active part in church activities". Following the various forms of conversions and various forms of institutional or private forms of religiosity/spirituality she designs a typology operating with 1. experimental religiosity, 2. multileveled religiosity, 3. parallel religiosity, 4. migratory religiosity, 5. composite religiosity, 6. fuzzy religiosity.

Religiosity in Cyprus: Towards secularization or cementing an ethnicity identity?

Vryonides, Marios

Social Sciences, European University, Cyprus Nicosia, Cyprus

Keywords

ess, ethnic identity, Secularization, Cyprus, Religiosity

The issue of religion in Cyprus is particularly important considering the dominant position that the Greek Orthodox Church had and still has in the social, political and economic life of Cyprus. It is probably a unique phenomenon by western European standards the fact that for 17 years (1960-1977) the archbishop of Cyprus was being elected as the president of the Republic. This was the product of a long historic tradition whereby the Greek Orthodox Church acted as the political leadership of the Greek Cypriot population during the Ottoman period and during the British colonial rule. Today Cyprus is characterized as a country that, by all accounts, arrived late to modernity compared to other western European societies. In Europe part of the modernization process had been enacted by secularization. In Cyprus, however, religion and the Church continue to be the forefront of the public discourse affecting public and social life in a number of ways.

Using data from the third round of the European Social Survey (ESS, 2006) this paper explores the issue of religiosity in Cyprus. We examine actual and past religious belonging, participation in public and private religious practices, and degree of social identity. Religious involvement is then used as an explanatory variable (predictor) for value orientations and for political and social values. We also examine how far the variation in religious involvement can be explained by social background variables.

Results indicate that Cypriots appear to be amongst the most religious people in Europe. The key question, however, is the extent to which religiosity is associated with social values and behaviours such as trust, social solidarity, acceptance, volunteerism and other. The findings show that religiosity as a predicting variable is not strongly associated with these facets of social life. Rather, the paper suggests that religiosity serves as a form of cultural identification and belonging to an ethnic group with strong traditional undertones while it appears to have a minimal impact on the way modern Cypriots shape their way of life in pursuing collective social objectives.

Sociology of Religion in Germany: The Revitalization of Religion and the Boom of Research on Religion

Schnettler, Bernt

*Department of Sociology, University of Bayreuth
Bayreuth, Germany*

Keywords

religion, qualitative research, sociology of culture

The religious landscape in Germany shows highly diverse regional patterns, some of which result from well-known historical reasons: Broadly speaking, the north is predominantly protestant and the south catholic. But twenty years after the wall came down, one of the most salient differences continue to exist between formal church membership of nearly three quarters in the west versus almost the same percentage of formal agnostics in the east. Regional diversity has been further enriched by international migration and mobility. While Christianity decreases, even in rural areas, Muslim communities are gaining growing minority presence, especially in urban areas. Even the religious activities of Jewish communities have reinvigorated notably in the Holocaust origin country over the past decades. As a result, far from having disappeared from the public, religion is reparably vivid in Germany. The vitality of religion, however, does not restrict to the official churches. A growing market of alternative religion and spirituality has become an integral part of private and public life in Germany over the past decades. Correspondingly, there is an important increase in research activities on religion, especially during the past decade. Research on religion has exploded over the past decade after 9/11 profoundly changed public perception of religion. The presentation will sketch the current situation of religion in Germany and the especially the research in sociology on religion and cognate phenomena. Far from being invisible, religion is amplified by sociological research. The paper will sketch current developments in sociology of religion in Germany with a special focus on the recent boom in studies on religion.

Sociology of Religion in Portugal: a difficult emancipation process

Dix, Steffen

*Institute for Social Science, University of Lisbon
Lisbon, Portugal*

Keywords

Portugal, sociology of religion, Roman Catholic Sociology, Emancipation Process, Secularisation

The most important precursor of modern sociology of religion in Portugal is a kind of scientific branch that could be called "Roman Catholic sociology". Instigated by the Roman Catholic Church through the so-called Secretariado de Informação Religioso, the first empirical works on the religious situation in Portugal began to emerge in the late 1960s. The foremost aim of these studies was to carry out a sociological analysis of the increasing de-Christianisation. However, these studies were not simply aimed at making a theoretical-empirical description of what was happening, but rather they sought to find a means to invert this growing tendency. Which is to say that the first modern "sociological" studies into the religious situation in Portugal were closely connected to the Roman Catholic Church.

Considering that it was only from the mid-1990s onwards that sociological studies began to be more independent, it should be acknowledged that sociology of religion in Portugal is a comparatively young discipline. A further difficulty is the fact that social sciences as a whole in Portugal continue not to attribute great importance to recent studies in sociology of religion perhaps as a result of its historical background. Consequently, it faces a doubly complicated situation. On the one hand, it still finds it hard to detach itself completely from the influence of the Roman Catholic Church, while on the other hand, it still needs to achieve recognition and its proper place among the social sciences. Some of the key strategies to solve these problems mainly involve the reformulation of theoretical questions and the reconfiguration of empirical studies. There have been recent theoretical and empirical attempts to redefine the field of the sociology of religion in Portugal. Therefore the main aim of my communication is to describe the current situation of the sociology of religion in Portugal and to put forward current strategies so that sociology of religion may find itself properly and solidly established within the canon of social sciences in Portugal.

Some dilemmas of sociological study of contemporary political dimensions of religion: the case of the Church of Holy Simplicity

Crnic, Ales

*Faculty of Social Sciences, University of Ljubljana
Ljubljana, Slovenia*

Keywords

registration process, political dimension, religion

In some parts of Europe we have been witnessing certain revitalization of religion in last decades. These processes are quite complex and follow several different directions: sociological surveys show the growth of religious belonging (mostly the type of religiosity British sociologist G. Davie calls "belonging without believing"), in some countries the connection between religion and nationalism is quite common (this connection often derives from the equation of religious and national identity), for decades we encounter the growth of new religious and spiritual movements. These processes pose different theoretical and practical questions and dilemmas concerning the social and political notions (definitions) of religion. What is the role of sociologists and their research approaches in all this? Is this role limited to describing and analyzing of contemporary religious situations and trends? Or can they, on the basis of their knowledge, try to more actively influence the social and political processes, connected to religion?

This paper will offer some possible answers to such questions by presenting a case of the Church of Holy Simplicity, which was founded in 2004 in specific social circumstances by a tiny group of Slovenian sociologists. This unique (and for many controversial) project of participant-observation was designed with the intention to publicly open a serious of pressing questions about the social and political role of religion in modern society, and with launching the official process of registering a religious community maybe also to influence the work of some state agencies to become more competent and in line with legal standards. The church has been denied the registration and the case is after two positive decisions of Slovene Administrative Court and one decision by Supreme Court waiting for the trial by the Constitutional Court.

Strategies of the constructing of credibility of the Roman Catholic Church in Poland in the face of cultural-political transformation after 1989 year

Leszczynska, Katarzyna

Sociology and Social Anthropology, AGH University, Faculty of Humanities Cracow, Poland

Keywords

Secularization, Poland, Strategies of the constructing of credibility, Roman Catholic Church, crisis of credibility

The aim of my paper is to answer to the question about methods of maintaining of credibility of the Roman Catholic Church in Poland (RCC) in the dimension of actions and statements. My presentation will be based on the research which included analysis of content of the official and unofficial documents of RCC in Poland (1990-2008) concerning the social problems related to the political and economic modernisation. The research includes also the interviews with clergymen about this issue.

The category of the credibility of religion was inspired by P.L.Berger's ascertainment and reinterpretation of his theory made by the Polish sociologists e.g. I.Borowik. In the epoch of the individualisation of the West, where the superior value is the goodness of an individual independent to the transcendent conditioning, monopolistic religions experience the crisis of credibility. Religion concern as immutable truth is much more harder to justify, particularly in the situation of pluralism which accepts the different structures of credibility concerned by an individual as possibilities of choice. These possibilities are not always mutually exclusive and axiological conflicting. The perception of a religion in the context of the pluralistic process is dependent on how much credible is a explanation of a religion system about its functioning in the new social order. The aspiration for making a religion credible is the convincing to its functionality in the presence of a new social reality.

The social changes in Poland after 1989 have become the impetus to reinterpretation by the RCC its new role in the context of occurring changes. The RCC which has been for ages the dominant in Poland creates the different strategies of dealing with the differentiated reality. These strategies are present both in the dimension of the church's rhetoric and symbolic actions. As my research proved the main strategies are e.g.:

- Sacralisation of the social reality understood as justification of the desired social order where occurs appeal to the sacrum sphere.
- Negation of the different outlooks on life and the dichotomisation of the social reality.
- Assimilation what means obliteration of the contradictions between traditionally understood sacrum and profanum.

The disciplinary ambivalence of Scandinavian Sociology of Religion

Sundback, Susan

*Åbo Akademi University, Department of Sociology
Åbo, Finland*

Keywords

sociology of religion, vulnerable status, Scandinavian countries

The paper will discuss the vulnerable status of the sociology of Religion in the Scandinavian countries. In 2009 one of the most successful units for Nordic sociology of religion was suddenly closed at the University of Lund, where it had been operating in close connection with the Theological disciplines. The paper will give an oversight over the institutional development and main theoretical orientation of the development in all five countries (Denmark, Norway, Iceland, Sweden and Finland) and draw conclusions about the impact gradual isolation of sociology of religion from general sociology and of the institutional - and thematic - attachment to theology and the National Lutheran churches that took place in the latter part of the 20th century.

The Function of Religion in Multi-cultural Swedish Society

Jung, Gowoon

*Sociology, Yonsei University
Seoul, South Korea*

Keywords

Immigration, Multi-cultural European society, religion, Swedish society

This paper pursues to experiment how much the unifying function of religion works well in nowadays's multi-cultural European society by many immigrations through specific case study of Sweden. For a long time, there was a huge belief that religion plays an important role in strengthening bond between social members and communicating ideology and emotions for social relations. However, most European societies detached themselves from those benefits of religion. In the case of Sweden, social welfare policies and social institutions provide citizens with the freedom of time and money, so they utilize those resources for developing social relationships and communication among people instead of depending on religion. However, it seems that immigrants, who are not completely included in that society, have some difficulties of generating social ability only with those social welfare policies and institutions. Therefore, this paper wants to investigate and redefine the real meaning of religion as a channel of synthesis and communication in multi-cultural society.

The paper focuses on the Swedish society and protestant immigrant group which is composed of immigrants from Asia, Eastern Europe, and America. Even though Sweden is religious country with the adoption of protestantism, the religion do not have much influence on most Swedish people. In reality, protestant immigrants group adapts to the Swedish society by themselves only with the institutional help from the local government without religious help. Also, they owe the same religion with Swedish society, but they have difficulties of completely adapting to society between immigrants and assimilating with Swedish society. However, immigrants group which has the same religion with Swedish country have more hope than immigrants group which has the different religion with Swedish country in assimilating themselves with their new society. It seems that the fact of having the same religion helps immigrants to identify themselves as a justified social member of the Swedish society. Therefore, this paper explores the religion's new possibility in this multi-cultural society with many immigrants.

The imperfect secularization. Young people and the Italian way to secularization

Martino, Simone

*Scienze sociali, Università degli Studi di Torino
Turin, Italy*

Keywords

Youth, religion, Secularization

How is it possible that 84% of Italian young people are Catholic but only 20% attend religious services at least once a week? How is it possible that young people today are less religious than in the past but at the same time the Catholicism maintains its supremacy almost intact?

The paper tries to answer to these questions, testing some of the main hypotheses related to the paradigm of secularization. By analysing data of a subsample of 1003 Italian young people between 16 and 34 years old collected within a survey, carried out in 2006, on a representative national sample of 3160 people aged between 16 and 74. The data on young people collected in 2006 were compared with those of adults collected in the same survey and with those relating to young people from an earlier investigation on the religiosity in Italy carried out in 1994.

The argument is that in Italy the process of secularization can't be accomplished. It's true that today young people in Italy are seemingly more secularized than in past: from 1994 to 2006 the percentage of young Italians who are totally detached from the main dimensions of religiosity (such as belief, practice or importance attached to religion in life) has increased. On the basis of indicators of religiosity proposed by Inglehart and Norris (2006), we find that 32% of young people in 2006 show a high degree of secularization, compared to 23% in 1994. But many other evidences suggest that religiosity is still present among young Italians, even though under different forms from those pointed out by the theories of the "revival" of the religious (neo-fundamentalist movements, new religious movements, religious and individual re-enchantment). The data suggests that in Italy young people all new forms of religiosity are influenced by Catholic culture.

The Sociology of Religion in Europe

Knoblauch, Hubert

*Institute of Sociology, Technical University Berlin
Berlin, Germany*

Keywords

europe, religion, sociology

The situation of Religion in Europe is doubtlessly exceptional compared to other continents. Sociology of Religion, likewise, is highly varied and diverse in the different European societies and regions. As opposed to the very general approaches of comparative studies on religion, in this meeting we would like to make a first attempt of looking at the richness of the various perspectives on religion that have developed in the different European countries, assuming that the variety of religion and the variety of the sociology of religion may be related in a way to be specified. The introduction will sketch a short map of the sociology of religion both, geographically and theoretically, and will indicate those areas neglected in the meeting.

RS12

Arts Management: Sociological Inquiries

Art and cultural planning in Italy

Verdi, Laura

*Sociology, University of Padova
Padova, Italy*

Keywords

ART AS SOCIETY, cultural planning, ITALIAN CULTURAL POLICIES, local development, WORLDS OF ART

The sociological glance on the worlds of art has become more specific in recent years as a result of the recognition of the firm and fundamental social construction of the reality of art (Berger, Luckmann 1969), or perhaps even of the very collective nature of artistic creation (Becker 2004). This glance is also the result of the world of art opening to complexity. Vis-à-vis this crucial moment, which marked the shift from modernity to post-modernity, the worlds of art had to propose at least dealing with some essential points, if not satisfying some special conditions. First, giving up being the object of cultural policies and, rather, becoming the subject of cultural planning. They still have to open to the heuristic dimension of art as society (Heinich 2004), paying special attention to formation and management of the public as well as to feed-back processes between the public and the generators of cultural policies.

In order to scrutinise more closely the changes that the cultural heritage can face to transform from object of exploitation to instrument for local development, and to verify the likelihood of creating cooperation and assistance networks through the cultural capital (art), innovatively understood as stimulus and producer of the social capital (thus overturning Becker's theory), I thought of using a series of data coming from planners themselves and obtained via a top-down approach. They are completely original, unpublished data on perspectives and aspects of Italian (especially Veneto region) cultural policies directed to the organisation of cultural exhibitions and events: projects to be offered to museums, local bodies, or different territorial realities looking for ideas and stimuli. Cultural projects that are indeed planned top-down, but as the result of network efforts between individuals, cultural realities, businesses, scholars, experts, as well as subjects and communicators, among which press offices (Amari, 2006), often involved in the machine of the abnormal production of exhibitions and other events in Italy (about 100 a day!). Such projects create a public, be it real or fictitious, recruiting crowds of both potential enthusiasts and passive fashion slaves.

Arts Management and the Practice of Practice

DeVereaux, Constance

not applicable, Independent Scholar

Flagstaff, Arizona, USA

Keywords

Practice theory, practice of practice, discourse of practice

The theoretical problems of arts management are not apparent to the unaided eye of the practicing arts manager. To be sure, most arts managers are not aware of the theoretical underpinnings of their field, much less the notion that any problem of a theoretical nature might exist. Yet, in a field so focused on practice, lack of awareness - itself - presents a problem. The attempt to incorporate the concrete practices of management into the ethereal and ineffable dimensions of art (even if limited to the arena of practice) necessarily presents challenges of theoretical import. Typically, effectiveness and success in arts management are seen as outcomes relating to the conduct of specific tasks, i.e., managing the production, organization, distribution, and marketing of the arts, for example. Analysis tends towards the overly empirical with little concern for foundational assessment of arts management practices in themselves. In other words, there is no practice of assessing the practices from a broader, conceptual view. Stated in more philosophical terms, arts management suffers from its own problem of the diallelus. The way out is to engage in theoretical consideration of arts management practice with a view towards developing a discourse of practice as a tool of reflection.

Expanding earlier work by this author, the paper draws on the practice theorists such as Theodor Schatzki, Charles Taylor, and others to look at the fundamental phenomena of the field and the intangible notions of practice, in arts management, as objects to be examined through a theoretically critical lens. The paper argues that an analysis of arts management practice through a discourse of practice will have advantage in development of a field where reaction to social and political forces is more common than pro-action, and where practices have been adopted, for convenience, from other fields with little regard for how suited they are for application in the realm of arts and culture. It also argues that theoretical engagement will serve to elevate the awareness of the importance of the arts in human interaction and development, as well as an ability, among arts managers, to articulate those values.

Arts management as concise or diffuse activity - value orientations of arts managers between culture and business, ideology and pragmatism

Kirchberg, Volker

Culture Sciences, Leuphana University Lueneburg Lueneburg, Germany

Keywords

amalgamation of roles, value orientations, entrepreneurship, alienation, arts management

Arts manager positively identify, negatively abject or neutrally encounter a broad spectrum of values when being in the business of managing the arts. With this presentation I will sketch out a preliminary typology of values that guide the activities of arts managers. This presentation is based on concepts such as alienation, commercialization, bureaucratization, and entrepreneurship (cf. Marx, Adorno, Peterson, DiMaggio, Brooks, Bell, Boltanski and Chiapello, and Broeckling). Not all these concepts - especially not the early ones ? have been applied to value orientations of arts managers. However, these concepts seem to provide an important framework for the guiding principles in arts management between, pro- and anti-capitalistic attitudes, and art world conventions and business conventions. Value differences between arts managers and artists are sometimes distinct, sometimes blurred. Even differences between artists and arts managers are often unclear due to the personal amalgamation of the tasks (functions of art production, art management, and art distribution are often executed by the same person). The presentation postulates a system of dominant values that guide arts managers (and often artists) in their work. These hypotheses are a first step to an empirical test about guiding value orientations of arts managers and about potential dissent with other important participants in the same art worlds.

Arts management as interface between aesthetic and managerial norms -the case of the "manager" for the contemporary arts

Behnke, Christoph

Culture Sciences, Leuphana University Lueneburg Lueneburg, Germany

Keywords

arts management, Sociology of Professions, Curators, contemporary art, Managerialism

Arts management has become a sociological object for research and theory, applying from different but overlapping perspectives. On the one hand, following the concepts of the sociology of occupations and professions, arts management is not a profession in the conventional sense as defined, e.g., by Parsons who describes professions as formal, institutionalized modes of regulation with corresponding structures of hierarchy and privileges. Instead, the profession of the arts manager is less defined by explicit formal requisites of knowledge, titles or diplomas, and is more an example for an activity that receives professional legitimation and access through (informally presented) competence and (informally constructed) connectivity to networks in the field (cf. Svensson's "new professionalism" or Nonaka & Takeuchi's "tacit management"). On the other hand, sociological interest in arts management is less oriented towards a structural theory of conventions and inclusion or exclusion but more towards a theory of action with contradictory objectives (cf. Palmer's "frames") or dispositions. For instance, arts managers can be evaluated and legitimated either by general business issues (efficiency and effectiveness, control, calculability etc., cf. Ritzer) by categories of entrepreneurship (cf. Schumpeter), by aesthetic standards in the field (cf. Bourdieu's variations of cultural capital), or by social effects that the managed arts organisation has (cf. DiMaggio). These normative contradictions refer to conflicts among definitions and legitimation, especially among art managers who emphasize their autonomy towards other (e.g., economic, political, legal or educational) fields, and arts managers who acknowledge their professional activities as cultural entrepreneurs, in the "new spirit of capitalism" (cf. Boltanski & Chiapello). This theoretical categorization of arts managers is then illustrated and exemplified by the changing role of the curator in the contemporary arts. The curator in his or her recent profession is at the interface of social fields or subsystems with their contradictory objectives. Thus, it is impossible to regard the arts manager (in the contemporary art field) as detached from aesthetic and curatorial, and purely focused on managerial issues. The legitimation and evaluation of arts managers in this field is based on both, aesthetic as well as managerial competence.

Arts management, institutional logics and public culture. The case of Umbria Jazz Festival

Santoro, Marco

*Discipline della comunicazione, University of Bologna
Bologna, Italy*

Solaroli, Marco

*Studi politici e sociali, University of Milan
Milano, Italy*

Keywords

arts management, Festival, Jazz, institutional logic, public culture

Music festivals are major sites in which the performative and public dimensions of music come to be articulated. At the same time music festivals are key places for the strengthening of the ongoing process of music commodification. On this basis, this paper aims to investigate the artistic management, the institutional logic and the role in public culture of one of the most important European jazz festivals - and one of the most celebrated Italian music events: Umbria Jazz. Since 1973, every year leading national and international jazz artists are brought together in the relatively small city of Perugia, in Umbria. From the organizational viewpoint, the most crucial role has since been played by the artistic director, Carlo Pagnotta. As a cultural entrepreneur, over the years he has been able to gain an internationally acknowledged artistic and managerial credibility despite the clear touristic aims. In 1990 the Umbria Jazz Foundation was formally founded in order to manage the economic aspects and to develop the professional image of the festival. Since 2000, UJ has become an internationally known cultural and commercial brand. Despite the process of institutionalization and its growing economic and public relevance, the artistic management and practical organization of Umbria Jazz still depends exclusively on the work of the director and his very restricted, highly creative and mainly informal network of collaborators. How is it possible that the organization of such a huge event depends on such a very small number of individuals? What's the cultural and institutional logic behind their artistic choices? How the content of the musical offering ? jazz but also some rock and pop music - has to do with the organization and management? And what kind of political connotation and civic effects can such a festival turn out to have in the realm of public culture? This paper aims to unveil these kinds of socio-cultural dynamics. The analysis is based on fieldwork and on historical sources and qualitative interviews carried out with both members of the managerial and organizational staff of the festival and with Italian jazz artists.

Arts Managers as Interfaces Between Arts and Finances

Küsters, Ivonne

Fakultät 12 Institut für Soziologie, Technische Universität Dortmund Dortmund, Germany

Keywords

qualitative research, Sociology of Organisation, Sociology of Arts, theoretical sociology, Sociology of Professions

The public perception of arts managers is focused on their financial and administrative tasks. The sociological research on the profession also accentuates mainly the administrative and financial aspects of arts management (DiMaggio 1987 for example).

This has led to an underestimation, even an unawareness of the partaking and the actual impact that arts managers have on the core aspects of the artistic work they deal with: on the contents and on the ways of producing, performing, and presenting art to the audiences.

The former somewhat one-sided view on arts management should be corrected by surveying meticulously what arts managers actually do. And therefore the analysis should especially pay attention to their assumed partaking in two (or even more) social spheres and the supposed division of their tasks in such financial and such artistic, and how they deal with that at the same time.

An already well developed catalogue of similar matters is provided by the theoretical concept of functional differentiation as it is used by Niklas Luhmann (1997) and also (but with remarkable differences) by Pierre Bourdieu (1992) in his field concept. For speaking of differentiation inevitably raises the questions of the integration and cooperation of the differentiated spheres.

The qualitative study on arts managers presented here is based on 17 open interviews with arts managers of major classical orchestras, music festivals and concert halls. They were inquired in detail about the managing process accompanying their recent season. In the process of analysing the interviews has been made use of the concepts of functional differentiation and cooperation.

The application of the theoretically induced list of questions produces distinctly different and interesting results concerning the role of arts managers as human interfaces between social spheres or fields as art and economy. In dealing with the increasingly precarious matter of financing the arts they actually have (and aim for) a high impact on matters that are hitherto seen as mere artistic. On the other hand, by taking the full responsibility for the finances and hereby influencing the artistic decisions they manage to keep the performing artists relatively free of financial considerations.

Arts Mangement from the perspective of sociology of professions

Schnell, Christiane

*Institute Labour and Economy, University of Bremen
Bremen, Germany*

Keywords

, Sociology of Professions, professionalization, arts management

The paper addresses the question, how Arts Management might be explained from the perspective of sociology of professions. Two different theoretical models, the idea of "organizational professionalism" and the concept of a "moral community", will be considered in particular. Professionalization of Arts Management will be mapped and analysed related to social practices, aspects of qualification, organizational structures, markets and Cultural policy. Referring to the German example, the main hypothesis discussed in the paper is that the professionalization of Arts Management is the consequent answer on the ongoing structural changes of the Arts field.

Cultural Leadership: Emerging the emergent

Sutherland, Ian

*School of Music, Memorial University of Newfoundland
St. John's, Canada*

Gosling, Jonathan

Centre for Leadership Studies, University of Exeter Exeter, UK

Keywords

dwelling, affordances, administration, management, leadership

Developing from histories of arts administration and arts management Cultural Leadership has recently become a focus within the cultural sector and creative industries of the UK. This paper interrogates a basic question, what is cultural leadership? Beginning with secondary sources (historical summaries, policy documents, arts/cultural grant applications) we contextualize the developments and practice of cultural leadership as an outgrowth of the discourse around arts/cultural administration and management re-oriented to leadership practice in the face of significant crises (financial, administrative) in major British cultural institutions (English National Opera, British Museum, Royal Opera, Royal Shakespeare Company) around 2000. We locate the re-orientation to leadership from administration and management as part of projects with the de facto aims of democratising and instrumentalising culture.

Drawing upon primary survey and interview data from twelve cultural leadership practitioners we then reflect upon whom cultural leaders are (career history, motivation, etc.). Turning to practice we consider cultural leadership as advocacy for, and facilitation of, cultural activity. This is largely based on culture's perceived ability to cultivate individual and group potential. More specifically, we define cultural leadership through descriptions of effects (rather than personal or positional inputs) by cultural leadership practitioners, specifically where it taps into affordances (Gibson, 1966; Greeno, 1994; DeNora, 2000) of cultural products (material and otherwise) for world making activity. We join recent leadership theorists in making use of Heidegger's "Building, Dwelling, Thinking" (Ladkin, 2006; Carrol et al., 2007) to contextualise cultural leadership as activity enabling engagement with cultural artifacts and activities. Through advocacy for and facilitation of cultural engagement cultural leaders are involved in projects which invite others to situations outside "everyday experience that which is from the outset "habitual""(Heidegger 1971: 147) where positive affordances of culture may emerge from interactions with cultural artifacts and events leading to a reflexive engagement with the world - dwelling.

Cultural leadership is an activity more explicitly centered round encouraging engagement with various cultural activities, practices and artifacts in the belief that such engagement may have positive social benefits for those engaged. It is an activity focused on emerging the emergent from cultural interactivity.

Entrepreneurial agency and the case of a multi-media art director

Utriainen, Terhi

*Department of comparative religion, University of Helsinki
Helsinki, Finland*

Vesala, Kari Mikko

*Social Psychology, University of Helsinki
Helsinki, Finland*

Keywords

Social Psychology, Self-presentation, Entrepreneurial agency, entrepreneurship, arts management

Entrepreneurial agency and the case of a multi-media art director

Entrepreneurship is conventionally associated with starting and running a private business. It has, however, become increasingly common to use the word entrepreneurship to connect the realm of firms and small businesses to other areas of human activity, economic as well as non-economic. Entrepreneurship is, for example, associated with political and cultural discourses which promote innovative and competitive business as a metaphor and model for the organisation and also the governance of social life. In such discourses, entrepreneurship is often introduced as a generic orientation or agency which can be transported and applied well beyond the conventional boundaries of commercial business. Through this, obviously, the exact meaning of entrepreneurship has become less self-evident and susceptible to contextual variation, which calls for closer scrutiny.

In this paper we explore the construction of entrepreneurial agency in the context of art and arts management. By entrepreneurial agency we refer to the cognitive and social construct which is portrayed in the research literature on entrepreneurship, especially in the psychological stream of it. Innovativeness, pursuit of opportunities, risk-taking, alertness, etc, serve as typical criteria for such entrepreneurial agency. The individual's own activity and self-reflection as well as social environment and interaction all contribute to the construction of such an agent.

We analyse a case of an internationally known Finnish multi-media artist and director, focussing on the aspects of her self-presentation in an ethnographic interview situation. We aim to show how the construction of entrepreneurial agent is based not only on her role as a business founder and manager, but as well on the roles of artist and art director, and further, and more profoundly so, on the special way in which different roles are reconciled and managed as a whole.

Investing in Mixed Goods: How perceptions of art and artists impact support for funding of the arts in the United States

Nalkur, Sonal

Sociology, Emory University

Atlanta, GA, USA

Keywords

Bourdieu, Arts funding, United States, public goods

In his discussion of arts policy in the United States, Bill Ivey, former head of the National Endowment for the Arts, points out that America's arts industries have been given over rather freely to an economic marketplace, an "open playing field" characterized by the lack of public policy and federal support. But as Paul DiMaggio notes, American culture also seems to find the "inadequacy of proprietary markets to sustain the arts so lamentable" that government subsidies for arts organizations and the rise of nonprofit organizations that support artists persist. American society seems torn between a desire to support the arts and an unwillingness to institute policy for this kind of support, a sentiment couched in the pursuit of free market ideals.

Caught in this contradiction, art in America can be understood as a "mixed good," that which is supported by both public and private market exchanges. This conceptualization of art not only asks us to consider the public's expected contributions of art and artists, but also the subsequent impact on psychic support for a range of funding sources from individual patrons, businesses, charitable organizations to state and federal governments. Bourdieu's framework on the symbolic nature of exchange allows us to explain DiMaggio's observation by considering how individual differences in economic, cultural, and social capital complicate the binary opposition of producers versus consumers. And in the context of relationships of exchange in the arts, Bill Ivey argues that key to the improvement of support structures for artists in America is a shift in the public perception of art. In this vein, I examine The Urban Institute's "Public Perceptions about Artists (2002)" national survey data about the American public's opinions on the lifestyles, work, and contributions of artists in the United States. The survey data includes information on individual's perceptions of artists, participation in arts activities, personal contact with artists and attitudes on funding support for artists. Research is on-going, but preliminary findings suggest that support for public and private funding sources are affected, in quite different ways, by perceptions of artists' contributions to society and emotional responses to art.

Is Arts Policy to the benefit of the Autonomous Artist? The Position of Artists in Flemish contemporary Arts Policy

Segers, Katia

*Centre for Studies on Media and Culture (CEMESO), Vrije Universiteit Brussel
Brussels, Belgium*

Schramme, Annick

Arts Management, Department of political Science Management, University of Antwerp Antwerp, Belgium

Keywords

artistic autonomy, Flemish arts policy, Role and position of artists, Effects of subsidies, Policy paradox

The role and position of artists in Western arts policies is much debated within academic and policy literature. Whereas Anglo-Saxon literature focuses on the role of artists both as cultural entrepreneurs and as symbol creators in the (regional) development of cultural industries, the ongoing debate in continental Europe is about the benefit of government support for the autonomous artist. Recent attention paid to the artist, follows a period in which continental European cultural policy makers focused mainly on aspects of arts participation and arts management. Previous international research shows that efforts on the level of marketing and changes in organisational structure have not been effective in increasing audience attendance, nor in creating cost efficiencies. On the contrary, they had the paradoxical effect that overhead costs have raised.

These findings raise important questions for the role and position of the individual artists. This paper aims to examine the recent situation of individual artists in Flanders. The Flemish performing arts are flourishing as never before: the Arts Decree of 2004 provides a solid statutory framework, subsidies have been raised significantly since 2001, and the number of artistic companies and productions has increased. One of the novelties of the Arts Decree is the greater attention to the artist. Besides professional arts organisations, individual artists are now also eligible for subsidising. Consequently, artists are no longer compelled to embed their artistic work within an organisational structure in order to qualify for public funding.

In this paper we will examine to what extent the growth of the arts budget since 2001 has been to the benefit of the artists. This research is based on a data-analysis of unpublished source material on cost and income structure of Flemish arts organisations and the evolution of subsidies and labour costs within these budgets. This research leads to conclusions that are relevant not only to the Flemish situation but also of importance in an international perspective. Our findings confirm the internationally noticed paradox: the more the arts have been embedded within organisational and management structures, the more the situation of the individual artists has become vulnerable.

Marketing Strategies and Efficacies for Nonprofit Cultural Organizations

Tai, Yun

*Sociology, Emory University
Decatur, USA*

Keywords

arts management, cultural marketing, marketing strategy, cultural organization, nonprofit organization

Marketing strategies are essential not only for the interest accumulation of commercial companies but also for the development of nonprofit institutions. How do nonprofit cultural organizations promote their product, that is, how do they attract a larger audience to consume their cultural items in order to fulfill their organizational goal of preserving and propagating the arts and cultural genres? We can approach this inquiry by looking more carefully at three questions: (1) what the characteristics in different types of cultural organizations are; (2) what the organizations have done with respect to marketing what their promotion strategies are; (3) what the outcomes of their efforts are what kinds of participation changes they have achieved. Different types of cultural organizations with distinguishing characteristics may use different promotion strategies to increase the participation in their activities which may in turn lead to different marketing efficacies. In this article, I use the data from Survey of Arts and Cultural Organizations (2000) in which the respondents including government or not-for-profit art and cultural organizations in five geographic areas in the United States. Based on the original survey question about the strategies adopted by organizations to encourage more active participation, I classified the promotion strategies into three categories: economic capital strategies, social capital strategies, and cultural capital strategies. Based on the survey question about the different aspects of participation change in the organizations' programs or activities, the efficacies falls into five types: the overall numbers of participants, the racial/ethnic composition of participants, the number of participants who are residents/members of particular communities, the number of participants who are young people and families, and the number of participants who are lower-income persons. By analyzing the survey data, as a first step, I have found that organizations of different sizes indeed differ in their use of all kinds of social capital and cultural capital strategies and of several kinds of economic capital strategies. As a further step, I will try to establish a causal relation between the last two questions, that is, the patterns between the promotion strategies and their particular efficacies.

Movie producers and project development

de Verdalle, Laure

UVSQ, Laboratoire Printemps - CNRS Meudon, France

Keywords

entrepreneurial activities, Risk, project development, Movie production

Producers intervene at every stage of the movie production. However, development is particularly central in their activities. The process of development legitimates the producer as a partner of the director, and at the same time gives his work an entrepreneurial dimension. Indeed, the period of development concentrates most of the risk linked to the movie project: the producer invests money in the development of a project which might not be eventually finalized and produced.

This proposal is based on a qualitative investigation among French movie producers involved in various genres: fiction, documentary, long and short movies.

I will first present the genesis of movie projects. Therefore, I will deal with the various ways for a producer to take part in the project writing together with the director and the scriptwriter (if any).

In a second step, I will confront these attitudes of producers to the ways of dealing with financial risk during this development period.

From this point, I shall propose a typology of producers which inter-connects these two dimensions: the ways producers intervene in the project development and the ways they manage the financial risk (which is particularly high at this stage since the project might fail, with a total loss of the money invested so far). Doing so, I will consider the subvention sources (CNC being one of the main providers) and the relationship between producers, banks, and TV channels (largely involved in the movies funding).

On arts initiative and artistic policy: a history of institutionalisation, financing and artistic programming of the Belgian "factory of sounds" - the National Radio Institute and its orchestra - between 1929 and 1960

Segers, Katia

*Department of Media Studies, Centre for Studies on Media and Culture, Vrije Universiteit Brussel
Brussels, Belgium*

Van Den Buys, Christine

*Royal Conservatory of Brussels, Erasmus University College Brussels
Brussels, Belgium*

De Cang, Lien

*Department of Media Studies, Centre for Studies on Media and Culture, Vrije Universiteit Brussel
Brussels, Belgium*

Goessens, Lieselotte

*Royal Conservatory of Brussels, Erasmus University College Brussels
Brussels, Belgium*

Keywords

Institutional history of arts organisations, Artistic policy and programming, Public support of the arts, Public broadcasting institute, Production of culture paradigm

This paper aims to investigate the interaction between institutional, political and financial conditions and artistic policy of arts organisations. The question to what degree institutional factors are influencing or even shaping artistic policy is central to the "production of culture" paradigm. Whereas a lot of empirical work has been done from this perspective in most European countries, no similar research exists in Belgium.

Being part of a larger research on the history of private and public arts initiative in Belgium, this paper is devoted to the Belgian public broadcasting institute, the National Radio Institution (N.I.R./I.N.R.) and its orchestra, the Big Symphonic Orchestra between 1929 and 1960.

The N.I.R./I.N.R., founded in 1931, created its Big Symphonic Orchestra in 1935. This orchestra was recognized as one of the world leading orchestras between the two world wars until the 1960s. In this specific period it was innovative for its live performances and broadcasting of modernistic music of composers like Stravinsky, Bartok, Prokofiev, Milhaud, Hindemith and Berg. Departing from the political context outside the institute and its history of institutionalisation, financing and political control (impact of the broadcasting associations of the political parties), this study investigates the impact of these conditions on artistic policy. Vice versa, the impact of artistic choices on political support and policy measures regarding the broadcasting institute will be demonstrated. Aim is to illuminate specifically how and why the N.I.R./I.N.R. moved from a broadcasting organisation focussing on entertainment and light music - being a "factory of sounds" - to a high cultural institute that gave birth to this famous symphonic orchestra, the first fully subsidized symphonic orchestra of Belgium.

On the one hand this research will enlarge the historical and empirical knowledge of the Belgian/European public broadcasting organisations, on the other hand this research aims to contribute on a theoretical level to the questioning and refining of the 'production of culture'-paradigm. It is based on a quantitative analysis of historical data sources (from the archives of the N.I.R./I.N.R. and of the political parties), collected and centralised in a relational data bank, developed in a preliminary stage of this research project.

Organisations and Arts Organisations

Dr. Troendle, Martin

*Studienzentrum Kulturmanagement SKM, Universität Basel
Basel, Switzerland*

Keywords

organizational sociology, arts administration theory, system theory, creative processes, self organisation theory

Over the last 20 years, the mainstream arts administration literature has tried to apply general themes and techniques from business administration and management studies. Leadership skills, financing, organizational planning, distribution and marketing are the principle issues of standard arts administration publications, often labelled as "arts-marketing", "arts-sponsoring" or "arts-project management".

It has been only on rare occasion that authors have radically questioned the appropriation of managerial tools from the business sector into arts management, and if such tools are indeed suitable for arts institutions such as theatres, opera houses, museums or festivals. Can an artistically driven production process, such as creating an opera, be "managed" using business - centric managerial tools, which refer to linear, decomposable production processes? Or, rather, are creative processes open, iterative, recursive and non-linear and therefore not plan-able? Art Organisations have different aims, and therefore operate with a different "logic". How does this logic operate? And how can art administrators cope with this altered "logic" in theory and practice?

The Paper will investigate the questions mentioned above. Firstly we will examine the specifics of art organisations - in comparison to other organisations such as corporations - by focusing on its aims, its modes of production and its organizational sociology. These observations shall be done from the perspective of social systems theory (also known as self organisation theory, referential authors include: Niklas Luhmann, Dirk Baecker, Karl Weick, Hermann Haken), because the theory is used in management and organisation theory as well as in sociology and art theory. The systems theoretical approach acts as a quintessential comparative device, since it operates within the same conceptual framework and definitions allowing one to examine different fields on equal footing.

Second the author will show, how a new understanding of arts management is emerging from a sociological perspective rather than from business administration.

Thirdly there will be a brief introduction on the theoretical development of arts administration within German speaking countries, as well as contemporary debates, which focus on a new understanding of the term "management" in arts management and arts administration.

Product placement: a new tool to manage for the art sector?

Mortara, Ariela

*Consumption, behaviour and corporate communications, IULM University
Milan, Italy*

Bagnasco, AnnaMaria

*Economics and Marketing, IULM University
Milan, Italy*

Keywords

product placement, non-profit, art management

In a very competitive context, like the contemporary one, creative industries and artistic and cultural sectors have been increasingly considered a driver for the economic growth. Creativity, art and culture are not only key strategic assets for improving competitiveness in the knowledge based economy, but they also perform multiple social and political functions. Nowadays, considering the actual crisis (no public money available and reduced expenditure attitude by consumers) art and cultural institutions are looking for new ways to create profitable business and new ways to raise resources for their sustainability. Therefore, an increased cooperation is necessary between business management and creative staff to reach these goals.

Corporate grants for non-profit arts institutions complement public, individual and foundation subsidies. So, especially in a period of economic recession, the role of corporations has become crucial. Corporate contributions allow a mutually beneficial interaction, whereby the company gives mostly money, but also goods and services, or expertise, trading it for the benefit of the association with the non-profit institution.

The aim of the paper is to explore the role of product placement as a new form of collaboration between corporations and art institutions. After an analysis of the international scenario, the paper will examine the case of the successful insertion of the line for the hair care Diamond Gloss by Nivea in the Italian version of the musical Hairspray. Through the methodology of the case study, the paper will highlight the risks and the eventual benefits of this new form of cooperation between profit and non-profit sectors.

Professional development of young art managers in Austria

Kohl, Manuela

*Institute of Culture Management and Culture Studies, University of Music and Performing Arts, Vienna
Vienna, Austria*

Zembylas, Tasos

*Institute of Culture Management und Cultutre Studies, University of Music and Performing Arts, Vienna
Vienna, Austria*

Keywords

Academic art managers, entry-phase and professional development, working conditions

Arts management represents a young professional field with low institutionalisation, i.e. with very few and very weakly structured professional associations and standards that would define a clear qualification profile. The article, which is based on an empirical survey, investigates the entry phase and career development of young university-trained art managers in Austria.

To summarise, we note on the basis of our study that the labour market in arts management is not very regulated. Many jobs are not publicly advertised but filled by personal recommendation. Networks and personal contacts are therefore particularly important at the start of a career. Integration in a team and recognition received for personal ability to interact with colleagues and superiors are decisive for subjective job satisfaction, for becoming established in the profession and for a person's further successful career. Work in cultural institutions and realisation of complex projects require both technical knowledge as well as practical competence and implementation skills.

Programming the Long Tail: Docs On-line Digital distribution is revolutionizing our cultural industries

de Valck, Marijke

Media Studies, University of Amsterdam Amsterdam, Netherlands

Keywords

internet, Curators, programming, documentary, long tail

Although its effects are not yet clear, one of the main arguments - captured in the concept of the long tail (Anderson, 2007) - is that niche markets can be economically attractive. For many media scholars the accompanying promise of a more diverse supply of cultural products is very appealing (e.g. Iordanova, 2008). However, better availability and access to moving image niches does not guarantee people will find and appreciate all films that make up the long tail equally. In this paper I will take a close look at web-based portals for creative documentary (a niche product that is likely to benefit from digital distribution), and assess what strategies of presentation programmers/curators are developing to interest audiences for such niche content while upholding high standards of selection and contextualization. In my analysis I will 1) include a conceptual discussion of curating as a practice; 2) address the parameters that influence the programming in virtual space; and 3) pay special attention to the way online programming differs and relates to programming at film festivals, which provide the most important off-line exhibition spaces for creative documentary today.

This paper is part of a new research project - Documentary After Digital Distribution: Programming Niche Content Across Channels - and builds on the presenter's research expertise on film festivals as alternative distribution and exhibition network for film (De Valck, 2007, 2008).

- Anderson, Chris (2007). The Long Tail: How Endless Choice is Creating Unlimited Demand. London: Random House Business Books.
- De Valck, Marijke (2008). "'Screening' the Future of Film Festivals: A Long Tale of Convergence and Digitization." Film International 6 (4): 15-23.
- De Valck, Marijke (2007). Film Festivals: From European Geopolitics to Global Cinephilia. Amsterdam: Amsterdam University Press.
- Iordanova, Dina (2008b). Budding Channels of Peripheral Cinema: The Long Tail of Global Film Circulation. Available via on-demand print at www.blurb.com.

[Mediation of Cultures]

Social impact of top managers in the performing arts

Isakovic, Smiljka

Faculty for Culture and Media, Megatrend University of Applied Sciences Belgrade, Serbia

Keywords

Performing arts, arts managers, artistic performance, social impact, transitional societies

The contribution of arts managers to issues of satisfaction of social needs and cultural development, relating to the field of artistic production and consumption, and the transitional state as an increasingly important sponsor of public arts, are perceived as important issues in Serbia lately. Through valuing performing arts in relation to socially stimulating activities and making independent judgements of artistic quality, arts managers are important. They shape artistic and esthetic policy, thus creating artistic climate, also influencing articulation of country cultural policy.

Human resources management represents the most important part of any organization in the new millennium, especially so in the sensitive area of Arts Management, where emotions, creativity, ideas and artistic performances are in the centre of any activity.

The role of arts management is vital in providing smooth and successful flow of artistic successful careers and performances.

This paper discusses key issues relating to the aesthetics of social policy, drawing on a study by the author of the professional and creative identities of top arts managers in performing arts. New political and social goals, established in the transition country, require holistic existent and modified policy of Arts Management, even more so facing global recession. As arts improve the quality of life in general, creating richer social environment, the world of performing arts needs highly specialized and extremely flexible and cooperative management, in case to be able to create and perform, to be able to influence artistic and social development of the society.

Sociology in Art Business Studies: the influences of Becker, Bourdieu, and DiMaggio

Chong, Derrick

School of Management, Royal Holloway, University of London Egham, Surrey, England

Keywords

intermediation, auctioneers, art dealers, contemporary art market

"In the last analysis, the artist may shout from all the rooftops that he is a genius; he will have to wait for the verdict of the spectator in order that his declarations take a social value and that, finally, posterity includes him in the primers of art history", according to Marcel Duchamp (1957).

Duchamp's quote, which addresses the circulation of art from production to consumption, is core to art business studies, which can be viewed as a segment of arts management. This contribution to RS12, which draws on the MA in Art Business at Sotheby's Institute of Art, considers the influential contributions (primarily from the 1970s and 1980s) of three sociologists, Howard Becker, Pierre Bourdieu, and Paul DiMaggio. They serve as intellectual markers to elucidate Duchamp's quote on the market for contemporary art, which is marked by its absence of the role of intermediaries between artists and spectators.

Several key art business organizations can be cited in the circulation of contemporary art: leading art schools as entry portals; primary and secondary dealers and auction houses as key intermediaries between artists and collectors; and the art museum as an idealized final repository for art (i.e., "museum quality" is a promotional term used by leading dealers and auctioneers).

Becker has been instructive in highlighting the role of a network of coordinated activities underpinning the art world. Most recently, collecting contemporary art has become an enviable social network to belong, with dealers (via art fairs) and auctioneers assuming the role of market-makers. Bourdieu's identification of educational attainment and social origins as key predictors to "high arts" consumption, such as visiting art museums, has been validated outside of France. Indeed it has been interpreted as a structural barrier to wider participation in many Anglo-American contexts. This has led to the instrumentalism of the arts as part of public policy, with the UK being a key example: in short, recipients of subsidies need to demonstrate a contribution to various extra-artistic performance measures. DiMaggio helps to explain the not-for-profit form of cultural industries via the constraints patterns of funding place on art museums, for example.

Stimulating Creativity of Original Television Production at the BBC

Nicoli, Nicholas

*Communications, University of Nicosia
Nicosia, Cyprus*

Keywords

creativity, BBC, Television Production, Television Commissioning

The current Royal Charter has set the BBC six public purposes for the decade 2007-2017. One of these is to "stimulate creativity and cultural excellence". The organisation consequently delivers on this purpose by producing "more programmes that are fresh or demonstrate new ideas" (BBC Annual Report 2007/08). In this paper I will address how exactly the BBC attempts to stimulate creativity of its original television production. I will also analyze long-term changes in television production at the BBC and argue how the organisation now combines accountability with creativity. Finally, I will analyze how creativity was perceived at the BBC historically and how it is perceived today. The paper therefore seeks to contribute to the discourse on managing creativity in television production.

Recent restructuring and internal policy decisions at the BBC, especially the adoption of the Window of Creative Competition (WOCC) from January 1st 2007, can be seen as a significant attempt to stimulate its creativity of television production. The WOCC results in the BBC's in-house production unit and the independent production sector to openly compete for approximately 250 million pounds worth of annual commissions of original television production. Based on a report by an independent consultancy commissioned by the BBC (The Work Foundation July, 2005), this will progressively lead to a decline in in-house television production making the WOCC susceptible to further examination. Other efforts to stimulate creativity include more use of technology during the commissioning process and more emphasis on audience research and programme-testing during the development phase.

The paper draws on a wide range of primary and secondary sources. It combines case study exploratory analysis with long-term historical perspectives on organisational changes that have occurred at the BBC.

The coping strategies and the new approaches to management in the Russian cultural institutions: western influences and local traditions in the 1990s and 2000s

Tchouikina, Sofia

*Sociology of Culture, Centre for Independent Social Research, St.Petersburg and CERCEC, Paris
Paris, France*

Keywords

russia, culture, organisation, transformation, art-management

After the beginning of Perestroika and of liberal economic reforms in Russia, the cultural institutions began to face multiple difficulties in their activities. Their problems concerned various aspects of their functioning, both substantial and practical. The mission of the institution and the contents of the cultural product had to be revised, because the demands of the public were changing rapidly, and at the same time their everyday functioning had to be reformed as well, since the budgetary subsidies became insufficient. The sphere of culture underwent a profound change: the new private institutions appeared (galleries, labels, theatre companies), and the old ones tried to adapt to the new situation, to develop their coping strategies. Besides the ministry of culture who remained an important actor, there appeared western foundations, located most often in Moscow and Petersburg, but also in other cities. They offered grants for the realization of the cultural projects in Russia, or financed residences abroad for the representatives of the cultural institutions, who consequently began to call themselves "art managers". Some foreign ideas, foreign concepts of management took root in Russia, others were rejected. After twenty years of crisis and transformation, two types of attitudes can be observed: some institutions and individuals develop the "project thinking" and "project management", multiplying "partnerships" and the practicing the "horizontal relations" inside and outside the institution, whereas others practice the Soviet-type functioning with fixed hierarchical relations and subordination where the status of everyone is pre-defined, the activities are planned ahead and the initiative "from below" is not at all encouraged. My paper will be based on the results of a sociological research devoted to western influences on Russian art-management which was undertaken by myself in Volga Region and by my colleagues in other regions of Russia (Siberia, North-West) in 2004 and on the in-depth interviews conducted for other research devoted more specifically to employees of museums in Saint-Petersburg in the 2000s.

RS13

Re-Assessing Class in Contemporary Sociology

"We're all ordinary people": perceptions of class and class differences in personal relationships

van Eijk, Gwen

OTB Research Institute for Housing, Urban and Mobility Studies, Delft University of Technology Delft, the Netherlands

Keywords

identity, class, difference, relationships, social network

This paper examines people's perception of class and class differences through social network analysis of people living in Rotterdam, the Netherlands. First, data from an original survey on networks (n=195) shows that most people think they are middle class, although many lower class respondents classified themselves as working class. Additionally, most of their network members have, according to respondents, a similar class position. Secondly, in-depth follow-up interviews (n=30) focus on respondents' considerations. Contrary to what has been suggested by some scholars, the interviews suggest that people perceive themselves as middle class not so much because their network is class homogeneous (and people thus fail to recognize class differences) but rather because they contrast themselves with people of higher and lower class positions, finding themselves "in between" - ordinary - and thus middle class. Most people furthermore are able to classify themselves and others, and are able to talk in great detail about, and pinpoint various aspects of class. On the other hand, people seem less able or willing to recognize a class hierarchy, stressing equality and tolerance. However, people that deal with differences through work (e.g. social workers) or their network/living environment (e.g. ethnic minorities) seem more comfortable with recognizing class differences within their network. In this way class seems an important (although often hidden) aspect of people's social identity - either through stressing tolerance for differences or through distancing themselves from (more) deprived categories.

Class Cultures in "Classless" Finland - Preliminary Results from a National Survey

Kahma, Nina

*Dept. of social policy, University of Helsinki
University of Helsinki, Finland*

Toikka, Arho

*Dept. of social policy, University of Helsinki
University of Helsinki, Finland*

Keywords

Bourdieu, class, cultural differences, lifestyles, multiple correspondence analysis

In recent writings on class it has often be stated that Finnish society would somehow have become equal and classless society. This "classlessness" has often been supported by studies that emphasize the exceptionally narrow income differences in Finland as compared internationally but also some lifestyle and cultural studies, which state that in Finland class and taste differences are almost nonexistent in the area of culture, too. This paper focuses on the cultural aspect of class and addresses cultural participation and taste in Finland. In mapping out the possible class differences, the applicability of Bourdieusian approach to cultural differences between the classes, but also more recent critical developments on the theory of distinction will be discussed.

This paper draws upon the nationally representative survey data (N=1388) collected in 2007 by the research project "Cultural capital and social differentiation in contemporary Finland: An international comparison". In the paper Multiple Correspondence Analysis (MCA) will be applied in order to map out what Bourdieu calls "space of lifestyles". This space of lifestyles will be constructed on the basis of questions concerning different areas of culture including music, TV, films, literature and leisure activity. In what follows we will superimpose different background variables in order to find out about different cultural patterns or certain categories of people sharing different tastes. The analysis focuses on the aspect of class in order to understand, if there are clear class patterns what comes to culture and taste. Furthermore, we shall then compare the results with the results of congruent study in Britain.

Classifying Class in a Context of Crisis: exploring the nature of class in the early 21st Century

Byrne, David

Applied Social Sciences, Durham University Durham, UK

Keywords

quantitative programme, classification, Crisis

A decade ago serious authors felt able to propose not only that class no longer had social significance in advanced societies but that there had been a:

"...radical dissolution of what might be called the class mechanism." (Pakulski and Waters 1996 668)

Well things change. We are now in a context where as E.P.Thompson so vividly put it: "Experience has walked in the door without knocking" (1981) and in the midst of the most profound crisis of capitalism for three generations. The consequences of this basal transformation have enormous implications for the historically contingent formation of classes as potential social actors. All the super-structural aspects of culture which underpinned the view that social identities were now constituted by consumption relations dependent on a re- distribution of ownership of real assets, especially housing assets, have now been transformed by the implosion of the secondary circuit of capital. Crouch's identification of the failure of "privatized Keynesianism" (2008) shows how the class mechanism is very much with us. This paper will explore the consequences of this quantitatively, not by the reductionist multi-variate approaches which have characterized those working in the traditions of both Olin Wright and Goldthorpe, but through the dynamic use of classification approaches, drawing on longitudinal data resources. We need to know what classes as real entities look like as a basis for understanding what they might do. In particular we need to understand how lives have changed for collectivities through the crisis and what that implies for potential social action.

Cultural and Moral Class Distinctions in a Nordic Context: Findings from a city in Denmark

Skjøtt-Larsen, Jakob

Department of Sociology, Social Work and Organization, Aalborg University Aalborg Ø, Denmark

Keywords

class, symbolic boundaries, social differentiation, cultural boundaries, moral boundaries

One of the major contributions of Pierre Bourdieu in Distinction (1984 [1979]) was to illuminate the function of cultural consumption as a marker of status in 1970's France. Since then, there has been an ongoing debate as to whether these findings apply to other national contexts, and not least, whether other forms of symbolic boundary-drawing may be more relevant. The aim of this paper is to investigate whether cultural consumption and moral/political stances serve as markers of class positions, and to elaborate on the specific ways that people in different social positions draw symbolic boundaries between "us" and "them". Based on a survey conducted in the municipality of Aalborg in Denmark in 2004 (N= 1174), and by the use of multiple correspondence analysis, a space of social positions is constructed. The distribution of cultural practices and moral/political stances among different class positions within that space is examined. By introducing a range of qualitative semi-structured interviews with respondents from the survey, the specific modes and the relative weight of the two forms of boundary-drawing are evaluated. It is argued that both cultural practices and moral/political stances serve as markers of social position. However, while examples of symbolic boundary-drawing based on cultural distinctions do exist, it is more pronounced, even within the fractions richest in cultural capital, to draw boundaries towards other social groups on the basis of moral/political criteria. Attitudes towards immigrants seem to play a particularly important role. Finally, boundaries are not only drawn by the privileged towards the less privileged positions. Antipathies towards the cultural elite are expressed through aversions against the state subsidization of high brow culture.

Exterminism and class struggle in E. P. Thompson: preliminary reflections

Muller, Ricardo

Dept. of Sociology and Political Science, Universidade federal de Santa Catarina (UFSC) Florianopolis, Brasil

Keywords

social movements, class, REALISM, Exterminism, Class struggle

Thompson's most significant contribution to the Cold War debate and against the arms race, the nuclear threat and for the organization of peace groups and movements was his 1980 pamphlet Protest and Survive. In his essay Thompson foresees Europe not as a war theatre, but as a peace theatre achieved through popular democratic pressure. However, an international détente would be necessary so that this scenario might come true. Such détente should guarantee an independent future on the war system: once strategies were defined, the contradictions of Europe's role in the Cold War might be used against both Washington and Moscow Administrations. Thompson was committed to devise this strategy over the 1980s and bound several movements of popular resistance. A necessary resistance, since the structure of Cold War implied the notion of extermination of society. As he realizes the existence of "an internal dynamic and reciprocal logic requiring a new category of analysis", Thompson states the concept of exterminism to examine this new reality. The most controversial issues of Thompson's interpretation of the Cold War system, regarding his particular proposal concerning exterminism, are his approach to the concept of class struggle and his rejection of the notions of imperialism and militarism. Thus, these notions convey a strong ideological content and tend to express the image of a system, rational at first, which nonetheless might at some point provoke its own irrational explosion. Hence Thompson insists on the formation of a new consciousness. Class struggle remains a key issue, but the imperative is now to save humanity itself: in view of exterminism the political cause must be redefined, as much as class and class struggle concepts. This paper focuses the meaning of Thompson's ideas, the theoretical connections between class categories and assesses their political and contemporary relevance.

Gender and class composition: A discussion on women's unpaid work in a globalised world in the light of cases from Turkey

Hattatoglu, Dilek

*Department of Sociology, Mugla University
Mugla, Turkey*

Keywords

Gender, unpaid work, class composition, class theory, work.

In the contemporary world, the proportion of informal jobs and informal workers is increasing; the size and scope of informal economy are growing in both first and third worlds; the proportion of women in the informal economy is growing. Turkey is not an exception.

In the first part of my discussion, I argue that, as mainly based on my field research on weaving in Turkey and from data on home-based work, work status of women -in both senses of being workers and of being workers with poor working conditions and without social security protection- and their concentration in informal and insecure jobs are closely connected with the unpaid work which is traditionally left on women's shoulders and now is doubled with the shrinking of nation-states and with the privatisation of especially health and education services. In other words, there is a strong relationship between women's unpaid work load and the composition of the working class.

The second part of my discussion is about the effects of this for the theory of class formation. If women's positionalities within the working class are mainly determined by their unpaid labour, what are the results of this in terms of class theory? In this part, I will emphasize the importance of the theories which theorise women's unpaid work as production (not re-production). I will call attention to especially Christine Delphy's work.

Increasing upper and lower classes - shrinking middle class?

Lauterbach, Wolfgang

*Education, University of Potsdam
Potsdam, Germany*

Tarvenkorn, Alexander

*Education, University of Potsdam
Potsdam, Germany*

Keywords

education, inequality, labour market, middle and upper class, aging society

Increasing upper and lower classes - shrinking middle class?

- Are there signs for new boundaries in society? -

Concerning society as divided into several classes we observe an increasing gap between low and high classes in Germany. Particularly this development holds for the last 20 years. Thus more people become poor and even more people become affluent. But what happens to the middle class?

On the one hand results show, that the middle class is shrinking because changes in educational and labour market factors which causes a high risk of downward mobility. On the other hand it is widely known, that Germany is an aging society and that the classic family structure deteriorates. Within these societies the aging coefficient shows an increase of the elderly population. In general wealth grows over labour life and also higher class position are usually reached in higher ages. Thus there maybe not a "new" boundary between the class, but even a development based on demographic factors. Therefore we witness two contradicting explanations, why the middle class is shrinking.

The hypotheses will be tested for the 1980s, the 1990s and the middle of the first decade in the new century. We use regression models and all calculations based on the German "Socio Economic Panel" (SOEP) and on a new data set called "Vermögen in Deutschland" (ViD) where the people of the upper class are especially sampled.

Intergenerational social mobility and differentiated social capital: two studies of single-industry communities

Salminen, Veli-Matti

*Dept. of Social Sciences and Philosophy, University of Jyväskylä
Jyväskylä, Finland*

Keywords

locality, resource networks, Social Mobility, social capital

The question of inequality in possession of social capital is raising growing interest. Recent studies especially on European societies have showed the obvious relation between social capital and social stratification, the observation level being mostly national or international. In this paper I bring the analysis on a local level, having as research cases two small population centres, so called single-industry communities, the other one located in central Finland and the other one in eastern Lithuania. For this study, locality is the place in which economic, cultural and social processes and differentiations are created and maintained and where they are experienced and lived by local subjects.

I approach class from the point of view of intergenerational social mobility. The degree of social mobility has traditionally been considered a measure of the openness of society. However, according to e.g. the study by Erikson and Goldthorpe in 1992, social mobility tends to decrease when major societal changes such as industrialization are over. In addition, in developed industrial countries the intergenerational social mobility is quite stable and no remarkable mobility from lower to higher classes can be observed. In my analysis of the survey data collected among the inhabitants of the two local communities in 2006 and 2007, I found that the relative differences in social mobility of different social strata are not decreasing but rather reinforcing themselves over generations. My empirical analysis then points out the differentiation of individual social capital in relation to the type of social mobility, added the context that the locality itself gives. Social capital here is understood to be a multifaceted form of capital which accumulates in various types of networks, ranging from associational affiliation to informal networks of resources and positions.

The paper is part of my doctoral research which addresses local attachment from the viewpoint of social, cultural and economic capital. It is attached to the research project "Resources, locality and life course" funded by the Academy of Finland.

Post-communist Social Structure: The Case of Romania

Vasile, Marian

*The Research Institute for the Quality of Life, Romanian Academy of Science
Bucharest, Romania*

Keywords

lifestyle, multilevel analysis, preferences, Social Class, life chances

There are several concepts that apparently express different forms of social stratification: social class (Bourdieu, 1984; Erickson and Goldthorpe, 1992; Giddens, 2001; 2007 etc.), occupational status friendship (Chan and Goldthorpe, 2007), social position (Nicolas, 1996; Beck and Beck-Gemshem, 2002; Beck, 2007 etc.), lifestyle (Kirby, 1999; Ken, 2006; Paterson, 2006; Featherstone, 2007 etc.). These concepts emphasize the shift from the social hierarchy mostly generated by the possessed inherited material resources, to the positioning in a dynamic social space in which the social mobility is primarily determined by the characteristics and the preferences of the individuals. So, which is the most appropriate way of using these concepts, as opposed one another or complementary?

I believe that these concepts are complementary and reflect different aspects of the same reality: material stratification (social class), symbolic stratification (occupational status friendship) and cultural stratification (lifestyle). All these put the individual in a social position from which he/she can migrate along his life in accordance with its characteristics and preferences. Social positions or social classes have new forms (Giddens, 2007). Still, the social mobility is influenced by the life chances that individual has, by the material, cultural and symbolic resources that he/she can access.

In the case of Romania, I expect to find, in the big cities that are highly developed, where the social and cultural diversity is high, a diversity of social positions with the hierarchies between them being rather diffuse. On the other hand, in the small and the undeveloped cities and the rural area, I expect to find few social positions with the hierarchies between them being rather obvious. The social stratification schemas (CASMIN etc.) used in developed countries should be adapted to the East European post-communist reality.

Using large scale datasets and multilevel regression analysis, besides cluster and latent class analysis, I will test this hypothesis. Implicitly, I will test the validity of the classical social stratification schemas in the case of Romania.

Re-inventing yourself ?: new patterns of working-class youth transition in post-socialist St. Petersburg

Walker, Charlie

*Russian and East European Studies/Sociology, University of Oxford
Oxford, UK*

Keywords

Eastern Europe, individualisation, masculinities/femininities, working-class youth

This paper explores the changing nature of working class youth transitions to adulthood in post-Soviet Russia, drawing upon ethnographic research amongst vocational school students and graduates in St Petersburg in 2007. As in the majority of Western countries, processes of deindustrialisation in Eastern Europe have transformed the prospects of young people leaving school with few academic qualifications as old pathways into factory-based employment have become increasingly untenable. Alongside this structural shift, Russia is also experiencing a cultural shift towards the widespread denigration of working class cultures and forms of employment; yesterday's "worker-hero" is commonly reduced to a grotesque caricature in the post-Soviet youth media. In this context, although traditional forms of factory-based manual labour continued to be available to the young people participating in the research, the majority were looking to emergent forms of service sector employment and the expanding higher education system for opportunities to advance themselves. The paper uses a gendered perspective to examine the changing experience of "class" amongst the respondents, focusing on the ways in which new opportunities in education and work acted as a site for "self re-invention" through the construction of new forms of working class masculinity and femininity. While the young women in the research were uniformly attracted to "interactive service work" such as tourism - which possessed social and aesthetic dimensions absent from traditional forms of female labour - the young men were looking to higher education as a way to construct "hegemonic" rather than "subordinate" forms of masculinity by upgrading from machine worker to engineer. These imagined transitions, and the individualised narratives of self-reinvention which accompanied them, pointed to the disembedding of class as a social identity amongst the respondents. At the same time, however, the barriers they faced in realising new directions in education and work indicated the continuing salience of class as a social division. Moreover, a sense of responsibility for "wrong choices", particularly amongst male respondents, provides support for the argument that the increasingly meritocratic environment in which young people make transitions to adulthood has transformed aspects of class-based inequality into matters of individual failing.

Similarities and recent differences in the post-communist world: Social class differentiation and inequalities in Hungary and West-Romania

Veres, Valér

*Sociology, Babes-Bolyai University Cluj
Cluj-Napoca, Romania*

Monostori, Judit

*Population Research Institute, Hungarian Statistical Office
Budapest, Hungary*

Keywords

Romania, comparisons, inequalities, Hungary, social class structure

The paper aims to highlight the characteristics of social stratification in Hungary and West-Romania (Transylvania) during the mid 2000's in a comparative perspective, with an emphasis on the situation of Hungarians from these regions. Our purpose is to analyze and compare the accession to different social positions, the main inequalities in income and resources.

The theoretical background we used the Szelenyi, Townsley and Eyal's and Erikson-Goldthorpe-Portocarero's theories about stratification and transformation.

Social structure and the ethnic character of mobility in communist regimes has been little investigated. In Romania, but we have relevant studies in case of Hungary.

Methodologically, our paper is construed as a status index which contains the following dimensions: income, housing conditions, material situation, life conditions. By combining the status index and occupational positions, we create a classial structure with five main classes, while this method is also adequate for international comparative purposes.

The source of empirical data is represented by a retrospective processing of the 1. Wave of the research entitled "Turning points in our lives", carried out among Hungarians from Hungary and West Romania.

The comparison between Hungary and West Romania takes place along following dimensions: economic activity, occupational level, labour market situation, life conditions, spousal structure, occupation structure, incomes, characterisation of occupational groups from a material-income point of view, evolution of social status, social status determining factors according to cohorts.

As results, the following may be stated in relation to this comparison between the two countries and regions. In Hungary, the regime change took place according to a different pace than in Romania, which marked differently the social structure created. The fact that the proportion of agricultural workers is significantly higher in Transylvania than in Hungary may be interpreted as the survival of differences perceptible during historical development. Another important characteristic is that the service sector is more widespread in Hungary and the proportion of related occupational groups is higher. Inequalities have been increasing since the 1989 regime change from the perspective of the material situation and incomes. Income inequalities are even higher and the stratum of deprived persons is larger in Romania than in Hungary

Social Class as Power Play and Status Games at the Local Level: Provincial Businessmen in Turkey

Karadag, Meltem

*Sociology, University of Gaziantep
Gaziantep, Turkey*

Durakbasa, Ayse

*Sociology, Marmara University
Istanbul, Turkey*

Ozsan, Gul

*Sociology, Marmara University
Istanbul, Turkey*

Keywords

ethnicity, business class, Islamic identity

Social class as power play and status games at the local level: Provincial Businessmen in Turkey

We would like to present the findings of our research project about business class in five provincial cities namely Mugla, Aydin, and Denizli in the southwest; Gaziantep, and Kahramanmara in the southeast of Turkey. This provincial class of entrepreneurs had established earlier firms that were small or medium scale before 1980s; while most of the surveyed firms were established either in the post 1980 period or after 1990. At present, these firms can be identified as large-scale manufacturing industries. The research is based on oral history interviews with members of business class families. Drawing upon the oral history interviews with members of business families in these provinces, we want to discuss how cross-cutting mechanisms such as ethnicity and religious identities operate. The interviews show that Islamic and ethnic identities have become salient in struggles in the cultural field. In Turkey, while Western life styles and Kemalist ideology has been a marker of certain status recollections indicate that members of business class among the provincial bourgeoisie on the rise in the recent decades have taken their part within the status struggles, adopting Islamic lifestyles. Indeed, recollections show that not only preferences in clothing, eating and entertainment but also spatial and bodily practices are formed along the Islamic way of life. Furthermore, the struggle between the Kurdish and the Turkish businessmen in the economic and cultural fields of these cities highlights the interplay between class and other lines of social division.

Social Class in the Domestic Sphere: Housewives and Unpaid Live-in Servants in the name of "adopted daughters" in Turkey

Durakbasa, Ayse

*Sociology, Marmara University
Istanbul, Turkey*

Ozbay, Ferhunde

*Sociology, Bogazici University
Istanbul, Turkey*

Keywords

housework, Live-in servants, Housewives, Social history, Family life.

In this paper, we want to investigate the upper and upper middle class family life in selected provincial towns in the South West and South East of Turkey in the early and later generations of the Turkish Republic in the 20th century.

In the traditional, fairly upper class households, usually having an extension in the rural countryside, house work or domestic work involved activities and tasks that could not be confined to the social-spatial boundaries of the house or the domestic. In the paper, we want to expand on the extra-domestic activities of such housewives and how they coped with the running of a big house, aided by domestic servants.

Orphan and poor girls were brought to such households as unpaid domestic servants in the name of "adopted daughters". The paper will also focus on these girls and their relations with the household members.

Another theme we want to develop in the paper is the transformations in the social practices related to housework and self-definitions of housewives during the modernization process in Turkey. How come being a housewife is still a prestigious position in Turkey? What are some of the investments made into the domestic sphere and into the use of domestic space, management of intra-family and inter-family relationships, community networks and rituals by "modern" housewives of upper classes? We also want to expand on different types of labor (emotional, organizational, aesthetic, manual etc.) involved in housework, paid as well as unpaid domestic labor, and according positions among the women of the house, women relatives and servants.

The ongoing relationships of loyalty and patronage and social support between upper class families with the servants raised in the family and their families also hint at some patterns of social mobility for the lower classes and sustained forms of social respectability and social distinction for a sector of upper classes in Turkey.

Qualitative data were collected for the project of "A Study of the Social History of Housework in Turkey: Housewives, Women Relatives, Servants and Pseudo-adopted Children", funded by Turkish Scientific Research Institution (TUBITAK).

Social Classes and Individual Pathways: Theoretical Issues and Empirical Research on Higher Education Students

Costa, Antonio Firmino da

CIES, ISCTE

Lisboa, Portugal

Keywords

social pathways, life courses, class analysis, HE students

Sociology has been devoting increasing attention to the analysis of individuals' social pathways or life courses in contemporary society. How is this kind of sociological research related to class analysis? This paper debates some theoretical and methodological issues on the subject. We examine the well-known hypothesis - underlined by several sociological approaches - that in the present social context individuals have more autonomy in relation to social constraints than before and are able to define their life courses and lifestyles more reflexively. We particularly cast a critical eye on the position of those who use this hypothesis to consider class analysis to be obsolete. We claim, on the contrary, that class analysis is fundamental in the study of social trajectories and life courses. We also endeavour to show that, provided they are properly articulated with other scales of analysis, sociological analysis at the individual scale can make specific contributions to deepening class analysis. They can help, namely, to advance knowledge on the active relationships that individuals establish (in variable ways) with the structural inequalities of their social contexts. The theoretical discussion has the empirical support of a recent multi-level sociological research on the social background and academic pathways of higher education students, which included comparative, quantitative studies at the European level and qualitative biographical studies in Portugal.

Social Classes, Age and Values in Europe

Ferreira de Almeida, João

*Sociology, ISCTE
Lisbon, Portugal*

Brites, Rui

*Quantitative Methods, ISCTE
Lisbon, Portugal*

Keywords

values, social classes, European Social Survey

Following Schwartz, who advanced the basis for a structural theory of values, motivational goals shape and differentiate those values (Schwartz, 1996). Values can also be understood as an organized and relatively durable system of preferences expressed in a specific culture (Almeida, 1990). Values analysis assumes a central stance in social research

Bearing in mind the actionalist properties of values, their behavioural repercussion, the research program that the authors have been developing in this domain identifies patterns of values connected to social classes. However, other values settings may equally show relevant distinctions, either in an isolated way or combined with social classes, as it is the case, for instance, of age or gender.

Analysing some results of the third round of the European Social Survey (2006), the aim of this presentation is to illustrate how social class and age contribute to differentiate individuals' values.

Social classes, social capital and political attitudes in Europe

Almeida, João Ferreira

*Sociology, CIES/ISCTE
Lisbon, Portugal*

Brites, Rui

*Sociology, CIES/ISCTE
Lisbon, Portugal*

Carmo, Renato

*Sociology, CIES/ISCTE
Lisbon, Portugal*

Nunes, Nuno

*Sociology, CIES/ISCTE
Lisbon, Portugal*

Keywords

collective action, political attitudes, social capital, political capital, social classes

This paper seeks to understand the way in which social capital resources are incorporated, appropriated and distributed by different social classes in Europe and their effect on political attitudes and collective action. Its main goal is to produce a conceptual framework by linking the concepts of social and political capital with the different theoretical assessments developed by the sociology of social classes, specially the contributions of Pierre Bourdieu's thought. Our main research-question is that the rank of accumulated social and political capital represents a sort of mediator between the composition of social classes and the rates of political and social participation. In order to measure the relationship between these concepts, we will work out a set of quantitative indicators from the European Social Survey-2006 for 23 European countries, which cover a sample of 43 000 individuals. By applying quantitative data analysis, our methodological approach will combine national and transnational levels, i.e. it will not only be an international comparison between European countries, but also an analysis of individuals and their belonging to social classes.

The Limits of the Cosmopolitan Vision: Class, Mobility and Mindset

Atkinson, Will

*Department of Sociology, University of Bristol
Bristol, UK*

Keywords

class, Bourdieu, Beck, individualization, Cosmopolitanism

Ulrich Beck has argued that the "cosmopolitan vision" that sociology must adopt if it is to understand the contemporary social landscape necessitates a shift away from concepts of old. In particular, he claims that the notion of social class is now redundant, trapped within a flawed "methodologically nationalist" perspective, and unable to account for - even obscuring - the new forms of border-spanning inequality that really matter today. This paper takes issue with this approach. Pulling out some of the theoretical weaknesses of Beck's vision and drawing on a recently completed qualitative research project based in the UK city of Bristol, it argues that class, as defined by Pierre Bourdieu, not only remains as important as ever in terms of objective life paths and subjective perception but, crucially, seems to underlie some of the supposedly "cosmopolitan" ways of being observed. This is not to deny the existence and importance of cosmopolitan forms of inequality, but the paper provides a counter to exaggerated statements on the future of sociology by asserting their interaction with long-standing intra-national divisions.

The Rise of Class-based Wage Inequality. Results from the German Labor Market

Johannes, Giesecke

*Presidential Department, Social Science Research Center Berlin
Berlin, Germany*

Verwiebe, Roland

*Institute of Sociology, University of Vienna
Wien, Austria*

Keywords

Social Class, Germany, wage inequality

In many European countries, among them Germany, the distribution of income and wages has become more unequal since the end of the 1990's. In that context the class position turns out to be particularly important for describing the recent growth of inequality. These observations can be linked with economic and sociological explanations. First, based on the idea of a skilled-biased technological change (SBTC), economists would argue that the growth in the demand for non-routine skills led to an increase of the wages of employees with those skills. Accordingly, an increase in class-based wage inequality would reflect qualification differentials that are inherent in the concept of class (i.e. higher classes consist of individuals with non-routine skills). Secondly, in contrast to the SBTC-approach, a sociological, structural theory-based explanation would postulate that substantial parts of the class-based wage differentials are the result of social closure. Hence, the increase in wage inequality is assumed to reflect the fact that incumbents of higher class positions are able to maintain or even expand their wages, whereas incumbents of lower class positions have increasingly to expect lowering wages.

In order to specifically examine the class-based rise in wage inequality we use data from the German Socio-Economic-Panel. The empirical analyses are based on models that allow us to investigate changes in the class differentials taking into account heterogeneity between classes due to qualification, i.e. formal education plus occupational skill requirements. Moreover, by using these models we are able to study changes in the wage differentials within classes (i.e. growing wage inequality between occupations). First results show that while both between-class and within-class wage differentials have widened over the last years, these changes can only partly be explained by increasing returns to education and to occupational skills, which is contrary to dominating economic explanations in the literature. Our findings suggest that recent changes in class-based wage inequality have to be explained with a stronger sociological approach, including rent-related components and social closure mechanisms by which individuals in lower class positions are increasingly confronted with shrinking wages.

Time Use as Indicator for Social Inequality: Social Classes in Comparison

Becker, Maya

Department of social sciences, Goethe University Frankfurt Frankfurt am Main, Germany

Keywords

social inequality, social classes, time use, time budget data, structuration theory

Time is not only a dimension of each social act, but also a resource with high value. This makes time a central concept for social inequality analysis. The unequal use of time is often connected to gender, age or lifestyle differences, whereas social classes are neglected.

In this presentation, structuration theory is brought together with time budget data on the empirical side to analyze time use of different social classes in Germany. The German Time Budget survey 2001/2002, a representative cross section survey from the Federal Statistical Office in Germany, is used for empirical calculations. 35. 691 time diaries that cover 24 hours a day of a person (three diaries per person; all household members included with time diaries) are contained in this survey. Emphasis is given on daily time use (paid and unpaid work, leisure, travel, sleep). The results show that social classes are an important concept for inequality of time use, especially because of the differences between working and upper class persons.

Understanding the Dynamics of Class and Class Relations in Contemporary Scotland

Law, Alex

School of Health and Social Sciences, University of Abertay Dundee Dundee, Scotland

Mooney, Gerry

Department of Social Policy & Criminology, Faculty of Social Sciences, The Open University Edinburgh, Scotland

Keywords

agency, neoliberalism, inequality, class, Scotland

This paper critically reflects on the empirical state and theoretical understanding of class relations in contemporary Scotland. In particular it attempts to re-centre class, both as an analytical category and as lived reality, within the story of the devolved Scotland. Over the past decade and more, class in both senses has been largely eclipsed by a focus on the "Scottish national" question and questions of Scottishness and Britishness. Against this we argue that class, understood here in the sense of exploitative class relations and class as agency, remains absolutely central to our analysis and understanding of developments in recent Scottish (and UK) society. There are several related material, political, social and cultural dimensions to this, including the restructuring of work and employment, workplace militancy and the prevalence of poverty and other dimensions of disadvantage. Neoliberalism has degraded work, employment, social and public services, bringing with it a progressive financialisation of everyday life. At the same time, however, resistance to neoliberal policies, managerialisation, privatisation and work intensification remains an important element of class relations.

As in many other contexts, class is an ever present signifier in Scotland today - or rather an absent present - rarely mentioned explicitly but typically signalled by a range of euphemisms. These betray the divisive material and cultural dynamics of class not only of the matter at hand, but of Scottish society itself. This paper will explore different dimensions of this in relation to the idea of 'problem' populations and 'problem' places.

Urban youth from wealthier families: a way of life

Strelnikova, Anna

*Sociological department, Russian State University for the Humanities
Moscow, Russia*

Keywords

stratification criteria, lifestyle, youth from wealthier families

Elite has always been considered difficult to empirical study. Therefore, quantitative assessment of this group has to get on indirect signs. One of these signs is a way of life, and in particular, demonstrative idleness and demonstrative consumption.

This social group is stable in Russian society there is at least 10-15 years, and this time the generation of a people for whom an idle life style has become accessible from childhood, as well as consumption of a particular kind - demonstrative consumption. Idleness has become a model of behavior for a given social group, and it also forms one of the criteria for its separation. Based on the idea of T. Veblen that demonstrative idleness is possible to maintain a recognizable image in the eyes of others, we have conducted its own investigation.

The empirical object of study is young people (17-25 y/o/) from wealthier families, which most of the time do not work and / or do not study.

The aim of our study was the study of demonstrative forms idle pastime of young people from wealthier families, in terms of social reproduction of a specific lifestyle. This objective involves the following tasks:

- 1) determine what activities constitute the lifestyle of young people from wealthier families (in particular, to examine the budget of the time: how they spend their time, depending on time of day, season, etc.)
- 2) to examine the main types of idle time (not related to work or school).
- 3) examine the perception of young their lifestyle as special.
- 4) learn how to lounge becomes the criterion for the identification of young people from wealthier families, ie becomes a status / group characteristics of high yield social stratum.

RS14

Chronic Regional Conflicts

"From the River to the Sea, Humanity will be Free" - The Dynamics of the New Civil Society in Israel

Lunat, Ziyaad

Government Department (alumni), London School of Economics and Political Science Miratejo, Portugal

Keywords

Civil Society, identity, Post-Zionism

This paper argues that a new civil society is emerging in Israel that is fundamentally distinct from the old state-led civil society. Its core organising logic is cosmopolitan, universalist and post-Zionist, expanding its sphere of contestation to challenge the ethno-nationalist and communitarian basis of the enduring Zionist societal consensus. The implications of this phenomenon are uniquely profound for the Israeli context. A cosmopolitan post-Zionist civil society challenges the raison d'être of the state in its current ethno-nationalist construction, calling for the inclusion of marginalised groups into its sphere. The Jewish people have for long debated the merits of universalist ethics vis-à-vis particularistic considerations. The horrors of the Holocaust tilted the balance of the debate in favour of the communitarians, culminating with the establishment of the state of Israel as a Jewish national home. More recently, a growing interconnectedness of social relations has forced a reassessment of the moral basis of the Israeli society reigniting once again the rift, this time between Zionist communitarians and post-Zionist cosmopolitans. To develop this argument, the old and the new civil society will be contrasted on the basis of the conceptual limitations of common understandings of civil society. This will enable an adequate assessment of the empirical and aspirational forms of the term and the merits of a cosmopolitan post-Zionist civil society in a global age. The emerging phenomenon will be then explained through the ongoing process of displacement of identities which have forced Israelis to reconsider existing perceptions of the self, the meaning of being an Israeli; and the construction of external others. Finally, it will be concluded that Israel is at a cross-roads and civil society can play a key role in drawing the future of the state.

Binationalism in the Israeli-Palestinian Conflict

Shafir, Gershon

*Sociology & Institute for International, Comparative, and Area Studies, University of California, San Diego
San Diego, USA*

Keywords

binationalism, ethnic cooperation, partition

A little known and never carefully analyzed response to the outbreak of the Arab Revolt in April 1936 was a binationalist blueprint offered by a coterie of Jewish leaders in Palestine. They are referred to in Ben Gurion's memoirs as "The Five", intimating that they undertook this initiative strictly as individuals. In fact, in contrast to most other Mandatory binationalist programs which were put forth by socialist or liberal bodies and individuals, this blueprint bears the hallmark of the leading entrepreneurs in the Yishuv who sought Middle Eastern markets and, consequently, economic cooperation with the Palestinians. This blueprint offered not only a political program of "parity", but also considered the economic conditions under which the cooperation of two national movements might be possible. The proposal floundered on the opposition of the Labor Zionist movement and the indifference of the Palestinian leadership. The paper relies on hitherto unused archival sources and its goal is to offer a general framework for examining the circumstances for the conception of binationalist blueprints and the political and economic conditions that make them feasible.

Israeli/Palestinian Peace Building as a Social Process

Bendelac, Leticia

Social Change Department (Sociology I), Universidad Complutense de Madrid, SIN Madrid, Spain

Keywords

conflict, transformation, Social change, process, peace building

A trend that has been characterizing either scientific studies or the media coverage of conflicts is to associate those issues to eventuality. Thus, it is common to simplify the nature of conflict to the point of considering that they just exist during major bombings or during atrocities such as genocide or ethnic cleansing. Moreover, the fact that the term conflict is often used with adjectives such as "armed" or "war", contribute even more to get off other problems and confrontations prolonged in time and across space. However, conflicts are beyond war and news; they are complex phenomena that require, for their proper understanding, the location within a specific historical context and a pacification and reconstruction program. What is certain is that conflict must necessarily be regarded as a social process by which social transformations are done on existing social order. In the Israeli/Palestinian case it would be recommendable to analyze the situation according to a contextualization; study of social change and its implications in population has to be present as a way to broaden the perspective. Transformation of social structures and thus, social relations, must be necessary for a sustainable peace. In this aspect, the importance of intervention on political and decision-making levels is crucial and therefore, capacity building on intermediate strata of society.

Military Rationality in Aerial Bombardment from Kosovo to Gaza - Underpinning Global Securitisation

Drake, Michael

*Social Sciences, Univ of Hull
Hull, UK*

Keywords

conflict, military, targeting

This paper examines the military rationality of targeting strategies through a comparison of recent aerial bombing campaigns, including the Israeli assault on Gaza in January 2009, informed by analysis of military manuals. It advances the argument that despite the appearance of senseless destruction, such campaigns are not ad hoc, nor are they tailored to the attainment of objectives in particular circumstances. Rather, they follow a generic pattern, as programmatic applications of military practices that are not peculiar to a particular national force, illustrating a military totality - a distinctive military world-view that is technical not ideological, but that is increasingly shaping strategic thinking as political reasoning yields precedence to security considerations and military intelligence in the emergence of securitisation as a domestic and global political strategy.

Politics and Violence in Israel/Palestine Past, Present and Future

Grinberg, Lev Luis

*Sociology and Anthropology, Ben Gurion University
Beer Sheva, Israel*

Keywords

Israel/Palestine politics, Peace process, military occupation, palestinian resistance

The Israeli regime is a paradox. Considered a democracy, it has no recognized borders, and controls the majority of Palestinians by military rule. In this peculiar dual military-democratic regime the military is a crucial political actor, while the resistance of non-citizen Palestinians - neither fully integrated nor completely separated - exerts major influence over politics and policies. In the absence of borders, conflicts cannot be successfully contained through political dialogue, and frequently deteriorate into violence. The author describes and analyzes the sequence of events that engendered mutual recognition between Israelis and Palestinians and peaceful negotiations during the 1990's, and its subsequent reversal, leading to escalating violence in the 2000's.

The author argues that Israelis and Palestinians could imagine the Oslo agreements as a peace process because the pre-1967 border was considered the basis for the "two-state solution" by both parties. The peace accords and their implementation, however, blurred the border, facilitating violent acts which derailed the negotiations, and encouraged what the author entitles the military occupation of the political space. Countering the current political despair of many Israelis and Palestinians, Grinberg points to new directions beyond the impasse of the dichotomous single-state or two-state solutions. His original analysis seeks to demystify the past in order to facilitate the reinvention of the future.

The author's presentation is based on his upcoming book Politics and Violence in Israel/Palestine: Democracy vs. Military Rule (Routledge 2009). The text will become available, ahead of time, to colleagues/discussants who are already participating in RS14 sessions with a regular paper presentation.

Discussants/Commentators: Gershon Shafir, Director, Institute for International, Comparative, and Area Studies, University of California, San Diego, USA; Ziyaad Lunat, Alumnus of London School of Economics and Long-term Activist for Palestinian Rights, Lisbon, Portugal; Leticia Bendelac, Ph.D. Student, Department of Social Change, University of Complutense, Madrid, Spain.

Towards Inner Coexistence: The Long-Term Effects of Jewish-Arab Youth Encounters in Israel

Shani, Maor

*School of Humanities and Social Sciences, Jacobs University Bremen
Bremen, Germany*

Keywords

Israeli-Palestinian Conflict, Peace Education, Social Psychology, Intergroup Encounters, Peace Psychology

Jewish-Arab structured encounters have become the most prevalent form of peace education interventions aiming to improve relations between the two ethno-national groups in Israel. Despite the recent increase in studies on encounters' effects on participating adolescents, little attention has been paid to the long-term psychological and behavioral effects of the participation (i.e. one year or longer), and not much is known about what happens to participants after they return to their corresponding communities. This MA thesis proposes a framework for evaluating these long-term effects and suggests several categories for examining the latter based on the literature on coexistence and its sociopsychological components. The central hypothesis behind the framework is that participation in Jewish-Arab encounters might have more modest long-term effects on participants than what is often speculated by practitioners in the field. This possibility is strengthened by recent studies (for example, Bar-Natan, 2004; Rosen, 2006), according to which changes observed in beliefs of Jewish and Arab participants immediately after interventions wore out substantially a few months afterwards. However, according to the suggested framework, even modest changes in attitudes and beliefs, such as increasing interest in and awareness of the conflict, increasing tolerance of the other's beliefs, increasing support for intergroup equality, and increasing understanding of the complexity of the conflict, can be manifested ultimately in a state of "inner coexistence" among participants, i.e. a state of mind compatible with a preliminary phase of positive (but not harmonious) intergroup relations.

This hypothesis was explored through qualitative follow-up interviews with Jewish high school students who participated in Jewish-Arab encounters. The results indicate that the encounter is perceived by former participants as a meaningful, enriching, and often positive experience amidst the conflict, and that it has left a mark on the way they perceive the relations between the groups. Since the study relies on post-encounter self-evaluations, it has only led to general conclusions about the possible application of the theoretical framework in future studies. Generally, the results of this pilot study encourage the examination of the suggested framework through a rigorous longitudinal evaluation.

Two Peoples in a Shared Ecology: Framing Strategies and Outcomes of a Middle East Environmentalist Initiative

Schoenfeld, Stuart

*Sociology, Glendon College, York University (Toronto)
Toronto, Canada*

Zohar, Asaf

Business Administration, Trent University Peterborough, Ontario, Canada

Keywords

environment, identity, Framing, peacebuilding, Middle East

The conflict between Israel and the Palestinian Authority is not limited to issues of legitimacy, national rights and borders. An additional fundamental factor in the conflict is control over scarce resources, particularly land and water. Disputes over water and land have extended to disputes over effluents, toxic waste and contaminated water, ground and air. In the dominant nationalist discourses in the region, environmental issues are framed as injustices - irresponsible acts and crimes perpetrated by one side against another. Several transboundary environmental civil society initiatives since the 1990s have framed the regional environment in the opposite way as a potential tragedy of the commons unless the peoples in the region develop joint robust environmental management institutions based on the recognition that they share one ecological system. The paper describes the structure, outlook, achievements and challenges of one such initiative: the Arava Institute for Environmental Studies. Since 1996, the institute has conducted a small university level residential program in which over 500 Israelis, Palestinians, Jordanians and others have studied together over four or eight months. In addition, the institute has a research division that has participated in or initiated joint Israeli-Palestinian-Jordanian projects and conferences. Broader issues of Israeli-Palestinian relations and visions for the future are necessarily raised in both the academic and research work of the institute, making the institute a setting where environment and peace-building intersect. The institute sees itself as reframing regional identity by adding a layer of common regional identity to existing national identities, reconfiguring national identities to allow for regional pluralism, and fostering a network of mutually supportive regional environmental professionals. This is not in itself a solution to the regional conflict, but it is seen as an important contribution to a solution. Based on interviews with former students, the paper examines the experience of being in the program and its meaning to alumni. These interviews help us to probe to what extent creating contacts and a common culture around a shared ecology makes a contribution to a permanent and genuine resolution to the longstanding regional conflict.

RS15

Rethinking intergenerational transmission of inequalities

Doing interviews on potentially sensitive issues with young people and their parents

Aaltonen, Sanna

*Department of Sociology, University of Helsinki
Helsinki, Finland*

Keywords

parents, qualitative methodology, young people, interviews

This paper will examine some of the methodological issues involved in using qualitative approach to study intergenerational transmission of inequalities. The paper is based on my research in which I focus on the classed and gendered transitions, imaginable prospects and actual choices of ninth graders. The specific group I am interested in are the participants of six multiprofessional Helsinki-based services offering support for young people to complete comprehensive school and/or to prevent marginalization. Many of these 15-17-year old young people have a history of poor school achievement, truanting, delinquent behaviour and/or abuse of intoxicants. The biographical interviews I have conducted with both the young people and with their parents/caretakers are analyzed to investigate what kind of inter-generational changes or continuities can be traced in the young people's lives and orientations to the future.

In this presentation the main focus will be on reflexive analysis of the data production. The key themes that will be discussed are those of advantages and limits of qualitative approach in studying intergenerational transmission of inequalities as well as accountability and ethics in relation to access and informed consent. Further, the presentation will examine what kinds of implications do the contexts - projects offering support for young people 'at risk' - have for recruiting the informants and for making the interviews.

Economic support by own parents: Does the welfare state assure the basic security among young adults or does the parental support increase polarization?

Majamaa, Karoliina

*Department of Social Policy, University of Helsinki
Helsinki, Finland*

Keywords

young adult, parental economic support, basic security

The idea of retrenchment has been prevailing in the post-industrial welfare states since 1980s. In Finland the tendency of retrenchment strengthened after 1990s regression. In the 21st century it seems that especially those who live on a basic security are in a vulnerable economic position because these welfare benefits have substantially fallen behind the earned-income. In other words, the allowances of working-age people, who live without earned-income or earnings-related allowances, has been almost on the same level since 1990s regression. Only in some allowances the impact of inflation has been considered.

Especially economic situation of young adults have become weaker in Finland since 1990s regression. Poverty among young adults is often related both to the ongoing studies and insecurity in the labour markets. It also seems that the Finnish welfare state has tried to shift some of its earlier responsibilities back to the family of origin. However, parents' ability to give economic support to their adult children varies a lot, as well as the cultural climate of giving support among the family members. It is often argued, that generational support is based on need, and this seems to be, at least partially, true. This paper focuses on next research question: Are those young adults whose income is largely consisted of basic security receiving more economical support from their parents, than those young adults who are earning their income by working or getting earnings-related allowances?

Received economic support is investigated with the help of a survey-data. The data was collected by Statistics Finland in 2007, and it consists of questionnaires filled by 1115 Finns born in 1945-50 and their 1435 adult children. Some register-based data was also merged into the survey-data, such as individual level information about incomes and education. At least to preliminary research results supports the assumption that young adults who are on basic security are receiving more frequently economic support from their parents. Further analysis will give more detailed results.

Basic security contains: labour market subsidy, basic unemployment allowance, sickness allowance, maternity/paternity/parental allowances, home care subsidy, disability pension, family pension, social assistance and student's grants and housing supplements.

Elements of Inequalities in the Life Course of Young Adults - Comparing the life course of young adults in two medium-sized towns in Finland and in Poland

Naumanen, Päivi

*Department of Sociology, University of Turku
Turku, Finland*

Rek-Wozniak, Magdalena

Institute of Sociology, University of Łódź Łódź, Poland

Keywords

life course, young adults, inequalities, welfare policy

Along with the globalisation process the life courses in modern societies are changing. Comparative research indicates that the youth and young adults in all developed countries are experiencing more insecurities than people in other age-groups. Particularly the young adults' labour market situation has degraded, and this group is constantly exposed to fundamental uncertainties in its employment and working career. Furthermore, the growing economic and employment insecurities lead young people more and more to postpone or give up family formation. At the same time, the social inequalities are strengthened, because individual resources gain in importance through the increasing market competition. However, the form and scope of changes in the life course as well as the patterns of social inequality develop in different ways in different countries varying according to the institutional settings and social structures. The institutional settings are important - not only because they create opportunities and constraints, but - because they reflect and help to establish normatively appropriate ways of performance. In this paper we examine the similarities and differences in the life course of young adults in two medium-size towns in Finland and Poland. The purpose of the study is to find out the main factors shaping the life course - and more specifically the unequal life course - of young adults in the two communities. First, we try to establish a life course regime that is specific in both countries in terms of relevant institutional settings such as welfare regime, labour market regulation and educational system. Secondly, we look how young adults originating from low-status families in the two communities perceive their life conditions and opportunities, and how they see the impact of various factors on their lives and future prospects. Thirdly, our task is to find out how the individual trajectories and institutional settings are linked to each other. Finally, we attempt to answer the question, whether it is possible to identify a community-specific life course model that reproduces inequalities.

The paper is based on research data collected in the EU-funded PROFIT project.

Generational change of personal social space: the case of Estonia

Masso, Anu

*Institute of Journalism and Communication, University of Tartu
Tartu, Estonia*

Keywords

generational change, personal social space, post-soviet transition

This paper explores the personal social space of inhabitants in Estonia. The author analyzes survey data and uses variables about the perception of distances with different countries, and contacts with these countries (face-to-face, or mediated contacts). The multidimensional scaling approach is used for comparing patterns of personal social space of different generations. The analysis suggests a hypothesis that among the older generation, personal social space is shaped primarily by institutional factors (e.g. the media, tourism). Among younger generation, the formation of personal social space is more autonomous with regard to media than in the case of older generations, and rather based on personal social networks. The analysis also demonstrates that the symbolic division of the world (geographical like east-west, and "ideological" like Baltic-Nordic, Russia-USA) shapes the imagined generational spaces and people's thinking patterns about "others".

Housing for the new economic elite - A case study of Novi Sad in Serbia

Reba, Darko

*Department of Architecture and Urbanism, Faculty of Technical Sciences
Novi Sad, Serbia*

Kostres, Milica

*Department of Architecture and Urbanism, Faculty of Technical Sciences
Novi Sad, Serbia*

Keywords

housing, spatial segregation, economic inequality

This paper will examine the spatial dimension of economic inequalities that occurred in Serbia over the last 2 decades. The paper will present a case study of a city of Novi Sad, the medium sized city, second largest regional center in Serbia and the capital of predominantly rural Autonomous Province of Vojvodina. The city has undergone radical changes both within its social and spatial structure that even today remain unparalleled in the region in terms of their nature and rate.

In the 1990s, the specific political and economic conditions have led to the great transformations in demographics and the overall social structure, since the city, formerly experiencing negative population growth rates, has been rapidly populated by refugees from the wars in former Yugoslavia. At the same time, a large gap between the poor and the wealthy was created as the result of changes that marked the transition to the post-communist society. This has caused great changes of the built form that previous master plans could not anticipate. The implications of this process for housing involved the spatial segregation of diverse socio-economic groups. The paper will present 2 urban fragments where the houses for the new economic elite were built, both of which represent inadequate models. In the first fragment, luxurious houses were built illegally on one of the most beautiful hillsides on the southern edge of the city. The second complex was planned as a gated community of individual and multi-family houses, surrounded by illegally built structure inhabited by residents with low incomes. Both cases represent monotonous environments that lack spatial complexity and not encourage community binding. The paper will tackle the question: Can these housing models facilitate future sustainable development and become a good starting point for social welfare gains?

Inheritance - Extra income or generator of inequality?

Kramer, Melanie

*Department for Education, University of Potsdam
Potsdam, Germany*

Stroeing, Miriam

*Department for Education, University of Potsdam
Potsdam, Germany*

Keywords

inheritance, wealth, social gap, intergenerational transmission of inequalities

There has always been potential for conflicts when it comes to inheritance and inequality.

Concerning the family and private property as two basic institutions of modern societies, family members take the right to inherit for granted. Actually we witness, that more and more wealth is passed on to family successors. The question that arises is how do bequests influence inequality in society? The common position in politics is that intergenerational inheritance causes social inequality dramatically: The rich become richer and the poor become poorer!

Empirical findings however indicate that heritages oftentimes do not cause inequalities. In fact heirs are already well-off by the time they inherit, thus the bequest can be seen as an "extra income" but not as a cause for inequality. Bequests rather lead to a constancy of the socio-economic position of the family - an intergenerational transmission of inequality.

To what degree however does heritage actually contribute to the gap between the rich and the poor? How exactly are inheritance and inequality connected? Is it truly possible to become wealthy just by inheritance? And if so, how common is this phenomenon? Those questions lead over to a discussion about how to counteract the social gap.

This lecture will provide an overview of contemporary inequalities related to inheritance in Germany. Furthermore we will analyse various determinants of becoming wealthy and thereby focus on the role of heritages, comparing people in wealthy households to those being not wealthy.

Our assumption is that inheritance is not the only and not even the most essential determinant for social inequality. In our opinion this assumption holds, because the emergence of the social position of the family is much closer related to educational and occupational outcomes than to inheritance.

We will discuss this topic theoretically and we will present empirical results. The data we use is the 2009 study "Vermögen in Deutschland (ViD)" (Wealth in Germany), as well as the German Socio-Economic Panel (GSOEP) and additional secondary findings. The ViD data contains substantial information about approximately 500 wealthy households.

Literacy and social inequalities in the Portuguese society

Ávila, Patrícia

*CIES-ISCTE and Department of Quantitative Methods, ISCTE
Lisboa, Portugal*

Keywords

social inequalities, Literacy, IALS

Contemporary societies witness an unparalleled universalisation and democratisation of access to reading and writing. Present-day societies are characterised not only by the pervasive and across-the board presence of writing but also by the fact that, in these societies, the mastery of writing becomes of critical importance to individuals. Departing from significantly different conceptual positions numerous theoretical reflections on contemporary societies have showed that the absence of skills in processing written information compromises reflexivity and the access to knowledge and information. Inequalities in the distribution of literacy competencies can therefore be associated with the main social divisions and inequalities in the knowledge societies.

The aim of this communication is the sociological analysis of literacy distributions in the Portuguese society. The empirical data used is the international adult literacy survey (IALS) and also a qualitative research recently conducted in Portugal.

International large scale assessments in this field have attempted to deal with an important issue: the discontinuity often encountered between school level obtained and the actual competencies in reading and writing. This is achieved with a methodological strategy that aims to assess the literacy levels of adult population. The data obtained through these studies offer an important opportunity for the sociological analysis of the relation between literacy and social inequalities in contemporary societies.

The results to be presented in this communication show that Portugal is one of the countries with a higher proportion of adults in the lowest literacy levels and, simultaneously, presents one of the highest levels of internal inequalities. The analysis conducted (using multiple correspondence analysis) also shows that literacy competencies are strongly associated with other social stratification dimensions. For example, the association between socio-occupational categories and literacy confirms literacy as an indispensable condition for people's access to employment and to the most advantages positions in the social structure.

The factors underlying this situation were also explored (using regression analysis). The main conclusion is that individual's literacy profiles cannot be understood without paying attention to educational background and also to everyday reading and writing practices: literacy competencies are anchored in daily practices and habits, which, in turn, strengthen and update these competencies.

New models of social representations about the future: short term strategies and social mobility processes

Ceravolo, Flavio Antonio

Social Research, University of Eastern Piedmont

Alessandria, Italy

Keywords

social inequalities, representations, Globalization

The flexibilization of global labour market induces in individual life new representations about possible futures. In particular this phenomenon affects the strategies of personal identity construction in two spheres: educational choices, labour market's access. Social inequalities could play a crucial role in setting up non only the instrumental constrains to the individual choices, but also the structure of social representations that influences them. So the structure of social stratification could be considered as a function of the instrumental constrains and of expressive criteria on which choices and life courses strategies are based. On the other hand, modern conceptualization of stratification explains that individual conditions are the result of composition processes among different dimensions of inequalities: gender, class, migration, etc. All this dimensions give forms to the structure of constrains and representations in a different way for each individual because of his/her role set. Also the meso level designed by short egocentered networks are vehicle of social representation and because of their stratification in society (that could be modeled in social circles) they could be an important milieu of reproducing inequalities mechanisms.

Starting from this theoretical framework, the paper focus the attention to the analysis of reproducing inequalities mechanisms in a specific context, that is the city of Turin. This City, localized in North West of Italy is moving from an industrial collective identity to a post industrial social organization of social relations. This process affects local representations of the populations. In the paper are discussed results of an empirical research realized in this context interviewing, with a quantitative design, 1300 young-adult people (range of age between 25 and 3

On inequality of intergenerational transfers: baby boomers as helpers of their children

Roos, J P

*Department of Social Policy, University of Helsinki
Helsinki, Finland*

Rotkirch, Anna

*Department of Family Research, Family Federation of Finland
Helsinki, Finland*

Haavio-Mannila, Elina

*Department of Sociology, University of Helsinki
Helsinki, Finland*

Keywords

baby boomers, family generations, inequality

On inequality of intergenerational transfers: baby boomers as helpers of their children

In a study of intergenerational transfers between baby boomers (age cohorts 1945-50) and their children (born mostly 1965-85) in Finland, a very strong asymmetry is revealed: the (adult) children of baby boomers receive much more practical and financial help than what they give. On the other hand, they help their friends a lot, and rather symmetrically.

From the point of view of their economic situation and the level of education, which generally would enable the children of baby boomers to help, this is surprising. However, the results confirm the intergenerational expectations regarding obligations to help: baby boomers do not expect help whereas their children expect help from both parents and their own children. Baby boomers give financial transfers exclusively to their children but help a broader group of relatives in practical matters. Their children receive help from all kinds of relatives and friends. The results are discussed as an effect of age, a generational effect (in the sense that baby boomers and their children belong to different social generations), and from the point of view of altruistic help between parents and children.

The data stems from a representative survey of baby boomers and their actual children in Finland in 2007 and is complemented with in-depth interviews with members of selected families, whose helping traditions diverge strongly. These will be used both in explaining the results and specifying the actual inequalities in intergenerational transmissions

Primary and secondary effects of family background in the educational decisions of minority and majority youth in Finland

Kilpi, Elina

*Department of Sociology, University of Oxford
UK,*

Keywords

educational inequality, academic performance, minority youth, educational choice, primary and secondary effects

Finland has been found to be a relatively egalitarian country when it comes to educational performance, as assessed by the PISA studies. For educational continuation, at least from compulsory school to upper secondary education, school performance plays a much larger role than family background, thus hinting at relatively small social differences at this stage. However, it is yet to be assessed whether this applies to ethnic minorities too. Although immigration to Finland is a recent phenomenon, there are sizeable populations of both immigrants and the second generation forming in Finland, particularly the metropolitan region.

This paper uses register data to analyse the educational performance and continuation of students at the end of comprehensive school. The data, obtained from Statistics Finland, has samples of 50% of students registered as foreign-language speakers (3,670 students), 30% of Swedish-speakers (5,014), and 5% of Finnish-speakers (14,521) completing comprehensive school between 2000-2004. Eight immigrant-origin groups are distinguished, as well as mixed, unknown and three Finnish-origin groups.

Ethnic inequalities in the Finnish educational system will be assessed through potential ethnic differences in both performance distributions and transition propensities, controlling for other family influences. The analyses focus on the school-leaving average grade as a measure of performance and on continuation in upper secondary education as a measure of attainment. Continuation in general versus vocational upper secondary will also be analysed separately. Measures of family background include parental education, socioeconomic status and income.

Moreover, it will also be assessed whether the intergenerational transmission of inequalities works in the same way for minorities as it does for the majority. Assessing how the social inequalities in transitions within education are divided into primary and secondary effects is one way of analysing how social reproduction works and whether it works in the same way for different minority groups. In order to do this the method developed by Robert Erikson and his colleagues will be used.

To the extent that is possible, these results will be reflected against ones obtained from similar studies in other European countries, although very few have been published on this issue to date.

Puzzles and evidence on the transmission of social inequality across generations: parenting, emotional support and educational values

Irwin, Sarah

*Sociology and Social Policy, University of Leeds
Leeds, UK*

Elley, Sharon

*Sociology and Social Policy, University of Leeds
Leeds, UK*

Keywords

education, Generation, class, emotion, parenting

Family background and context remain fundamentally important in the generational transmission of inequalities. Much research has been heavily influenced by Bourdieu and cultural capital theory, with particular interest in the link between parenting practices and values and children's life chances. Quantitative evidence across Europe reveals the ongoing salience of class, and also the importance of cross cutting factors, including diversity in parenting values and practices (e.g. Barone 2006). Internal family processes remain something of a black box. In contrast qualitative research "gets inside" families. Many here argue that middle class advantage and working class constraint are reproduced across generations due to parental values and practices which are, in turn, embedded in unequal social structural circumstances. The conclusions of the qualitative research are not straightforwardly compatible with the quantitative evidence, so whilst insightful there remain gaps in explanation. One strategy to help address this gap is to more adequately locate qualitative evidence in respect of general processes. In turn this requires that we more fully address internal class diversity and complexity.

The research reports early findings from a study of family contexts, parenting and class, run as part of the UK's ESRC National Centre for Research Methods. This comprised a survey of parents and a series of follow up in-depth qualitative interviews. Interviewees were strategically identified with reference to class and to their subjective views about the importance of education to children, and if this has changed over time. This allowed us to locate our qualitative sample with reference to key societal processes, and to tap into internal class complexity, as well as cross class diversity. For example, it very effectively identified people in the same broad class categories who held widely divergent perceptions of how to best influence their children's lives. We offer an analysis of parents' accounts of what is important to them in bringing up children, and explore the articulation of emotional support and educational values in these accounts. The evidence provides new insights into class complexity. Understanding this complexity is crucial to more adequately theorising unequal social contexts and the transmission of inequalities across generations.

Reproduction of Social Inequality in Urban Russia: Investigating the Effects of In-Family Culture Transmission

Yastrebov, Gordey

*Center for Fundamental Studies, State University - Higher School of Economics
Russia, <http://www.hse.ru/org/persons/188901/index.html>*

Ochkina, Anna

Chair for Sociology and HR Management, Penza State Pedagogical University Russia,

Keywords

human capital, cultural capital, social reproduction, social inequality, social capital

The industrialization, being the core source for accelerated development of the most Russian provincial centres, had a vast impact on the social and institutional basis of their urban environment. The important aspect of this industrialization was the adaptation of rural migrants, which along with intense inter-regional exchange played a vital role in the forming of the cultural environment of Russian provincial cities. It was highly likely for most non-working class families to provide higher education for their children outside the native city or even region. But everything has drastically changed with the implementation of market reforms of the beginning of the 1990s. Although the demand for higher education grew rapidly and stimulated the development of many provincial universities as well as the emergence of many new ones (state-budgeted and commercial), less families could afford the luxury of quality education for their children. Provincial universities are now producing a limited number of graduates to satisfy the region's demand for specialists, which leads to a state of "cultural isolationism".

In our research we attempt to investigate the relationship between the character of urban development and the change in family's socio-cultural characteristics in the course of several generations (based on materials from Russian representative surveys held in 1994, 2002 and 2006 and a qualitative study). The research focuses on rather complex, but vital and long-discussed aspects of this relationship: how an urban family behaves in relation to education, culture and communications by exploiting the infrastructure provided by their city; what role the pre-accumulated cultural resource of an individual family plays in the forming and further use of the human capital apart from its economic situation, etc.

Teenage parenthood and intergenerational transmission of social inequalities

Bunio, Paulina

Institute of Sociology, University of Lodz

Lodz, Poland

Keywords

inheritance of inequalities, poverty pockets, teenage parenthood

The paper will be based on empirical study carried out in Lodz, large de-industrialized city in central Poland, within the framework of a research project named "Strengthening opportunities and weakening transmission of poverty among inhabitants of towns of the Lodz province". The social policy-oriented project is being conducted by the team of researchers from the Institute of Sociology of the University of Lodz with financial support from the European Social Fund. The main project's objective is to support social inclusion in the region of Lodz by producing knowledge on mechanisms of social exclusion and by providing knowledge-based solutions to overcome the exclusion to be implemented by social policy subjects.

The paper will touch on the subject of intergenerational transmission of social inequalities concentrating on one specific group of the excluded, namely teenage parents inhabiting poverty pockets (areas where poverty rate doubles the city average). The analysis will encompass multiple dimensions of exclusion the young people experience and life strategies they undertake in the context of social policy responses to their specific needs and problems. Teenage parents' narratives will be juxtaposed with social workers' stories, supplemented by examination of European, national, regional and local social policy agendas. The expected result of the study and the paper is the formulation of recommendations for social policy agents, aimed at stopping the process of intergenerational inheritance of inequalities.

The income situation of Europe's elderly. A national, an intermediary and a European perspective

Goedemé, Tim

Sociology, Herman Deleeck Centre for Social Policy - University of Antwerp Antwerp, Belgium

Keywords

social inequality, Poverty, elderly, Europeanization

A growing stream in the poverty literature tries to meet the challenge posed by the "European society versus European societies" debate. This is translated into a debate about the usefulness of a Europe-wide poverty line as compared to a purely national one. Until now, the latter approach has largely been predominant due to the assumption that poverty is a relative phenomenon which should be evaluated by referring to the situation of the broader, national society. The former approach does not necessarily question the relative character of poverty, but states that the proper frame of reference is the wider European society, and not the national one. However, the literature remains rather inconclusive from both a theoretical and an empirical point of view as to which perspective is most appropriate for the present situation. Some claim that poverty should continue to be measured by referring to a strictly national context, while others argue that, at least, this perspective should be enriched by also using a Europe-wide poverty threshold. Maybe, some intermediary position between a strictly European and a strictly national frame of reference represents most closely the experience of Europe's citizens. However, it is not very clear how such an intermediary perspective should be operationalised - especially with regard to the study of specific groups in society. In this paper, I therefore analyse the elderly's income situation from various perspectives while exploring different methods of operationalising the intermediary position. For the analysis, the EU-SILC dataset is used. This dataset includes cross-nationally comparable data for 25 member states of the EU. The first part of the paper reviews the debate on the most appropriate level of income analysis in general and poverty analysis in particular. In the second part, the income situation of the elderly from both a purely national and a strictly European perspective is analysed. In the last part of the paper, previous results are contrasted with an analysis from an intermediary point of view.

The Russian Minority in the Finnish Labour Market and Work Communities

Kähäri, Outi

*Departement of Sociology, University of Turku
Turku, Finland*

Keywords

social capital, Russian immigrants, work communities

Immigrants from Russia form the largest ethnic minority group in Finland. The attitudes towards Russians among the native population are relatively negative. There are several concerns about the problems of Russians to integrate into Finnish society and the Finnish labour market.

Previous research has been predominantly focused on the difficulties and barriers that immigrants face while seeking for employment from the point of view of discrimination, racism and the logic of labour markets. There is some evidence that, due to their high education and good skills in Finnish, the Russian speaking immigrants have either assumed or proven possibilities to integrate into the Finnish society. My aim is to investigate why the human capital in the case of the immigrants from Russia does not necessarily benefit these people on the Finnish labour market. What kind of social capital can be distinguished in the Finnish labour market and in the Russian-Finnish work communities in Finland in order to avoid to social conflicts or misunderstandings which are culturally and communicatively related.

I collect qualitative empirical data on social capital in multicultural Finnish work organizations. Work communities in Finland are becoming more pluralistic but they tend to hold some characteristic formal and informal values, norms and traditions when it comes to working culture and social interaction. The preliminary analysis, using semiotic sociology as a method, concentrates on the forms and changes of the human and social capital of the Russian minority workers in Finland. The analysis also aims to find positions, statuses, divisions and inequalities connected to the complex ethnic (and other) minority relations in the work organizations.

The transmission of inequality through a professional group: reflections on the reproduction of the dominant classes in Portugal and in Europe

Chaves, Miguel

*Sociology, New University of Lisbon
Lisbon, Portugal*

Mendes, Hugo

*Sociology, CESNOVA
Lisbon, Portugal*

Sedas Nunes, João

*Sociology, New University of Lisbon
Lisbon, Portugal*

Keywords

"Social reproduction", "Professional groups", "Dominant classes", "Transition to work"

Over the last decades, European countries went through a process of enlargement of the social basis of recruitment of professional groups which, in a not distant past, worked as closed channels for the reproduction of elites. In Portugal, as in other countries, lawyers are a classic example. Having experienced an extraordinary quantitative growth, in particular in the 1980s and 1990s, this group began to integrate students who, in the past - due to their lower social background -, tended to be excluded from this professional world. Against the verdict suggested by many observers, however, this does not reduce the professional group's power to work as a filter, selecting individuals of privileged origin to reproduce their positions in the social structure. As we turn the analysis not to the inequality of access to the professional group but to its internal hierarchy, we see how it continues to be used by dominant classes as a platform to guarantee the inter-generational preservation of social positions and privileges.

Using the data from a study of the process of transition to work of young law graduates in Portugal, we will show how this selection is explained by the action of mechanisms which are relatively new within the profession, and how, mostly through non-intentional actions, the top positions of the professional hierarchy are appropriated by individuals whose social origin, and the correspondent level of cultural, economic and social capital, locates them in the highest positions in the social structure. On the other hand, we will show how these mechanisms do not only reproduce structural inequalities, but also contribute to cover up this process, as they get to be seen by most people as working according to meritocratic criteria.

Finally, we will argue that these mechanisms work beyond the boundaries of a particular professional group. Reflecting upon the processes of reproduction of dominant classes in contemporary Europe, we will mobilize research data and advance particular hypotheses about the way these mechanisms work and about the scale of their impact, and also the extent to which their role in social reproduction is recognized by European citizens.

Transition to adulthood in Casal da Boba, Amadora

Machado, Fernando Luís

CIES-ISCTE, CIES-ISCTE

Lisboa, Portugal

Silva, Alexandre

CIES-ISCTE, CIES-ISCTE

Lisboa, Portugal

Keywords

Transitions to adulthood, Social exclusion, descendants of immigrants

Casal da Boba is a neighbourhood recently built in the city of Amadora, on the outskirts of Lisbon. Since 2002, families living in shantytowns across Amadora have been relocated here. The population is around 700 households, about 2000 people, and there's a significant presence (64%) of migrants from African origin as well as their descendants, mostly with Portuguese nationality.

A survey conducted in 2006 showed that this population is mostly underschooled, has low qualified jobs with low incomes. In the same trimester the unemployment rate was three times higher than the national rate. This survey also showed that even though there is a great degree of homogeneity of social conditions, there were still a few cases of young people that reached graduate studies and had more stable and qualified jobs. This observation led us to enquire: why do people of very similar social origins followed so different paths to adulthood? Do these paths differ according to gender and ethnic background?

The objectives of the research conducted, intends to answer these questions by describing the social profile of youngsters living in Casal da Boba; to reconstituting their transition paths to adulthood through school, family and work domains; and identifying the factors involved in the social construction of their reproduction and mobility paths.

To achieve these objectives we carried out a deeper analysis in 2006 and conducted a series of 20 semi-directive interviews to youth living in the neighbourhood.

The main results of this research were: - The younger generation, in Casal da Boba, just like Portuguese youngsters in general, have higher educational levels than their parents. They also tend to achieve better jobs; - Unemployment is more prone to affect younger individuals as well as more men than women; - Higher education reduces the probability of being in the labour market in precarious conditions, but even the more educated youth get unstable jobs; - Schools have a very important role either in reducing or reinforcing the reproduction of social processes. Their formal role is important (schooling itself) but they are also important in terms of opening or closing up the local and social relations.

Young adults from medium size town in Poland-social mobility and inequality transmission from the life-course perspective

Rek-Wozniak, Magdalena

Department of Applied Sociology and Social Work, University of Lodz Lodz, Poland

Rokicka, Ewa

Department of General Sociology, University of Lodz Lodz, Poland

Keywords

Social Mobility, life-course, young adults, inequality transmission

During last decades, social structures in Central and Eastern European countries, have been reshaped, both in consequence of systemic transformation and global processes. The criteria, under which individuals are ranked on the social ladder, and those, under which the segments are located in the social space, have been changing. These phenomena are accompanied by decomposition and re-composition of social status. Tendencies towards class closure which can be observed in today's Poland, reveal the diversity of life courses, resulting from mutual influence of the stratification process and institutional measures aimed at overcoming structural factors limiting life opportunities of individuals.

Numerous empirical studies in the field of social inequalities and social mobility, are focused on the wide category of people at working age, while both the effects of socio-economic transformation and change within the model of capitalism, are experienced in particular way by different age cohorts. Thus, the proposed paper will focus on presenting the selected factors influencing opportunities for social mobility of young adults between 25 and 29, whose life courses have been shaped under specific circumstances. The turning points in their educational, occupational and social biographies have taken place in the last two decades. What is more, they have been growing up in the region of Poland, which was particularly touched by the effects of macro-economic, political and social processes-deindustrialization, growth of structural unemployment and poverty.

The main body of the presentation will be based on survey and data collected in medium size town located in central Poland, under framework of PROFIT-international research project conducted under 7th Framework Programme of EU. The project was focused on intergenerational transmission of inequalities and policy responses to this phenomenon.

Analysis presented in the paper will be divided into two parts: intergenerational mobility study will mainly concern the strength and patterns of intergenerational inheritance of social position, and show who among young adults and to what extent bears the major costs (poverty, unemployment, threat of inequalities inheritance) of the systemic transformation. The analysis will trace down the social biographies of the young generation, whose lives hitherto, covered the period of the systemic transformation.

RS16

Russia and Its European Identity

'Make Way to Professional Sociology!' or public sociology in the Russian context

Zdravomyslova, Elena

*political science an sociology, European University at St.Petersburg
St.Petersburg, Russia*

Keywords

russia, Public, sociology

The idea of public sociology invokes different responses in different scholarly settings. Sociology is a scholarly exercise sens frontières but the situation in national sociological institutions opens different perspectives. Thus "Cultural translation" may give public sociology a meaning that had never been intended by the adherents of the idea.

In the paper I discuss the ongoing discussion about public sociology into the Russian scene. First I present the context of the current debate about the status of sociology in Russia. Then I map the controversy between professional and public sociology and discuss different meanings that idea of public sociology get in the fragmented Russian professional community. Finally I suggest my reading of the public sociology agenda in the situation of a fight for professional sociology using the case of sociological education.

I claim that both political context and the level of institutionalization of sociology are crucial for the framing of its public role on the Russian scene. The data discussed in the paper are numerous plenary speeches at the Russian sociological congress (2008), publications in sociological journals and the vast interview materials collected by D. Shalin and B. Doctorov and A. Alekseev.

A Country of "Well Educated Amateurs" - Interconnections between Employees' Qualification, Exploitation and Authoritarianism in Russian Business Organisations

Efendiev, Azer

*Faculty of Management, State University - Higher School of Economics
Moscow, Russia*

Keywords

Qualification, Professionalism, exploitation, career promotion, Authoritarianism

High qualification of employees combined with their further training and lifelong education is regarded as a "sine qua non" of human resource management (HRM) in a knowledge-based economy. Basing on the results of the research project "Human Resource Management in Russian Business Organisations: Realities, Problems, Perspectives" carried out in 2007-2008 in State University - Higher School of Economics we examined whether Russian business is approaching to European patterns or remains traditional, non-achieving-oriented.

There is wide gap between high formal level of education of employees and low value of professionalism and qualification in Russian organisations. Functions of more than half employees do not match their formal education. Level of employees' participation in improving their professional skills remains low.

Our data suggest that, contrary to contemporary HRM conceptions, qualification and professional qualities are not key factors of personnel recruitment, remuneration and promotion in Russian organisations. The study revealed a strong link between "good" workplaces and "clannish" types of social organisation, high importance of kinship, social networks and informal ways of job placement.

High qualification does not place its owners into "privileged" sectors of labour market. It is closely connected with good working conditions but high salaries imply, first of all, supernormal working load ? long workweek, short or no yearly vacations. "Exploitative" social organisation of business creates a "vicious circle" in which high working load undermines workers' activity in professional training, and vice versa. Not qualification but "workaholism" combined with loyalty and obedience are the distinctive features of those professionals and managers who were promoted over the last 2 years.

Kinship and informal networks as key factors of "good job" placement, "workaholism" and obedience as main prerequisites of a decent livelihood and career promotion are closely connected with high level of authoritarianism in most Russian business organisations. Managers in their day-to-day practices seek not for the most qualified, creative and pushing, but for "reliable" and obedient workers. It is obvious that these practices work not so much for economic efficiency and development of human capital but rather for conservation of power-dependence relations, power advantages of top-managers in the organisation.

Changes and continuity in mental health policy of post-soviet Russia

Olga, Shek

*School of Public Health, University of Tampere
Tampere, Finland*

Ilkka, Pietila

*School of Public Health, University of Tampere
Tampere, Finland*

Keywords

post-soviet transformations, mental health policy, russia

The aim of the research was to analyze developments in mental health policy of Post-Soviet Russia. The research is based on a qualitative analysis of 21 health policy documents of the Russian Federation published during the years 1992-2006. In our research we consider health policy documents as socially constructed texts that are created in certain historical, social and cultural circumstances. The Soviet Period is considered as a historical context for contemporary mental health policy in Russia. The results demonstrate that post-soviet documents discuss the new principles in terms of an intention to follow the international state-of-the-art in regard to citizen's and patient's rights and as an attempt to overcome old approaches related to the ineffectiveness of the existing health system. The discourse on patient's rights is one of the central themes in the research material. This can be interpreted as a sign that paternalistic social norms in relationship to mentally ill people have changed. The new societal values reflected in the documents emphasize strengthening individual autonomy and dignity. However, anti-stigmatization measures e.g. through public awareness activities are not yet in the center of mental health policy in Russia today; neither are service users actively invited to influence policies. Despite this, the concept of empowerment can be seen as a core idea when individual rights in mental health care and promotion are addressed in the policy papers, because the protection of human rights and social inclusion are closely related to enabling individuals to take control of their lives. The lack of discussion on the active participation of service users could be considered as a reminiscent of the Soviet health care system with its typically passive role assigned to ordinary people.

Civil Society in Russia Facing World Economic Crisis

Lovtsova, Natalia

*Social Anthropology and Social Work, Saratov State Technical University
Saratov, Russia*

Karpova, Galina

*Social Anthropology and Social Work, Saratov State Technical University
Saratov, Russia*

Keywords

mobilisation practices, Civil Society, world economic crisis, protest practices

It is obvious that the civil society concerns that sphere where there is a coordination of efforts. One of the questions mentioning a problem of development Civil society is a question of interaction of Civil society and the State. In the present moment there is no universal definition of Civil society that methodologically complicates effective discussion both at level of a scientific discourse, and at level of the analysis of public opinion on the given problem. There are certain 'points of growth' of Civil society in Russia: some of them "are started" spontaneously during public practice; some can be initiated from outside the State. Under condition of world economic crisis the Civil society can be considered as a resource of softening of consequences of crisis and surviving in difficult social and economic situation. The crisis can become a push for development opportunities of Russian originating from new protest and mobilisation practices. Sphere of culture, including mass-media comes forward an important resource for forming of Civil society.

Constructing gender in women's crisis centres - state and NGO units tackling domestic violence in Russia

Jäppinen, Maija

*Aleksanteri Institute - Finnish Centre for Russian and Eastern European Studies, University of Helsinki
University of Helsinki, Finland*

Keywords

Gender, russia, domestic violence, crisis centres

Gendered violence became a publicly discussed topic in Russia in early 1990's, when women's activists raised the question to public debate. The first women's crisis centres, which had both service providing and advocacy goals, were founded in 1993 by independent women's groups and with assistance of foreign donors. In mid 2000's there were estimated to be 200 units working against domestic and/or sexual violence in Russia. There are state/municipal and NGO crisis centres, as well as "public-civic-mix" units. During the 2000's many of the NGO units have been urged to close due to financial problems, but all more state/municipal crisis departments have been opened.

The first NGO centres were a part of transnational women's movement, committed themselves to principles of feminism, and considered domestic violence as a gendered problem. The public units, which have not been studied that much yet, seem to be more reluctant in their attitudes to directly feminist ideas, but promote gender equality. The services are often directed to all family members, not only women or women with children.

This paper discusses the meanings acquired by gender in the everyday work of Russian crisis centres. Are the working practices gender sensitive or gender neutral? With whom and by whom is the work done? What is the role of men in crisis centres? On the basis of the empirical findings the analysis seeks for connections between gender constructions in the crisis centres' everyday work and Russian gender system.

The work is a part of an ongoing PhD study on Social Work. It is based on ethnographic fieldwork in state/municipal and NGO crisis centres in Izhevsk (Udmurt Republic), Sortavala (Republic of Karelia) and Saratov (Southern Volga region) conducted in 2004, 2008 and 2009. The material consists of fieldnotes and interviews as well as information materials and official documents of the centres.

Cultural identity of Russia

Yarskaya, Valentina

*Social Anthropology and Social Work, Saratov State Technical University
Saratov, Russia*

Keywords

international, russia, interethnic, identity, interaction

The image of Russia both in the West, and in the East, acts as the factor of the international attitudes and the interactions of cultures development, our local worlds appears more closely and connect with a greater world, the ethnic and cultural identification processes are crossed at the glocalization. Social designing of an image of the country supposes an hierarchy of cultural identifications, plays a role of the mirror reflecting images of the Other. The democratic values, social partnership, the consent borrows the certain place in the definition of image of Russia by opinion of other countries. But the practical implementation of these principles involve the complicated social problems and contradictions. Long cooperation and good neighbourhood can suddenly be overturned by a unreasonable politics as the Soviet history suggests. High position of cultural identity in hierarchy of the identities is designed by the respect of cultures distinctions. The travel enables deep understanding of cultural identification, its domination above ethnic. Cultural identification is an establishment of the spiritual interactions among themselves and the group or the country, an experience of feeling of an accessory to national identity, instead of to separately taken ethnic culture. The all-European cultural identification is most widespread among the youth, the formed people and the Russian-speaking (e.g. in Belarus). It is impossible to jump through culture, to be closed from the West or the East, the North or the South. The reflection of a social context requires code switching in interethnic and international interactions which influence each other in cultural evolution of the Russian society, while a withdrawal from a repressive mode is necessary, too. Based on the successful interaction of the cultural, ethnic and so-cial strategies the effective international and interethnic interactions will be possible and a positive cultural identification of Russia will be possible to form.

Cultural identity of Russia

Yarskaya, Valentina

Department of Social Anthropology and Social Work, Saratov State Technical University Saratov, Russia

Keywords

inter-ethnic, russia, international, identity

The image of Russia both in the West, and in the East, acts as the factor of the international attitudes and the interactions of cultures development, our local worlds appears more closely and connect with a greater world, the ethnic and cultural identification processes are crossed at the glocalization. Social designing of an image of the country supposes an hierarchy of cultural identifications, plays a role of the mirror reflecting images of the Other. The democratic values, social partnership, the consent borrows the certain place in the definition of image of Russia by opinion of other countries. But the practical implementation of these principles involve the complicated social problems and contradictions. Long cooperation and good neighbourhood can suddenly be overturned by a unreasonable politics as the Soviet history suggests. High position of cultural identity in hierarchy of the identities is designed by the respect of cultures distinctions. The travel enables deep understanding of cultural identification, its domination above ethnic. Cultural identification is an establishment of the spiritual interactions among themselves and the group or the country, an experience of feeling of an accessory to national identity, instead of to separately taken ethnic culture. The all-European cultural identification is most widespread among the youth, the formed people and the Russian-speaking (e.g. in Belarus). It is impossible to jump through culture, to be closed from the West or the East, the North or the South. The reflection of a social context requires code switching in interethnic and international interactions which influence each other in cultural evolution of the Russian society, while a withdrawal from a repressive mode is necessary, too. Based on the successful interaction of the cultural, ethnic and social strategies the effective international and interethnic interactions will be possible and a positive cultural identification of Russia will be possible to form.

Eco-social images and simulacra of transforming societies (Russian and Moldavian examples)

Sosunova, Irene

*Vice-rector, International Independent University of Environmental and Political Sciences
Moscow, Russia*

Manolache, Konstantin M.

Centre of Strategic Research, Director, Academy of Science of Moldova Chisinau, Republic of Moldova

Keywords

ecological problems, Post-Soviet area, environment, Transforming societies

The present study explored the phenomenon of contemporary social and ecological problems in Russian and Moldavian societies which are on their way of transformation. The purpose of this study was to investigate the elaboration of theoretical-methodological basics and methods of sociological surveys of modern socio-ecological dimension of changing Russia and other European countries in Post-Soviet area, as well as eco-social images and simulacra as determinants of structurization of their socio-ecological dimension. One of the main characteristics of the socio-ecological dimension of contemporary Russia and Moldova is weak structure which is showed in unfinished institutionalization of socio-ecological interests of different social groups and stratas.

Such specific phenomena as images and simulacra have a significant influence on a public consciousness and social actions of different elements of societies in transition. Their meaning in structuring of socio-ecological dimension is actualized by insufficient objective natural-science knowledge in the sphere of environment and the newness of socio-ecological problems for the public consciousness as well as the competitiveness of informational field of environmental decision-making.

Since 2006 till now the complex comparative sociological research devoted to these issues is undertaken in Russia and Moldova. Undoubtedly, some of these phenomena are relatively inaccessible for direct observation and measuring. However, the authors have aimed to gain a fresh perspective and to explore the issues of ecological problems by using of content-analysis of mass-media devoted to ecological situation and expert survey. The conception of reflection of ecological environment to social behavior, orientations and system of values of different groups of population was developed and the reflection of these factors to people was analysed.

Environmental discussion in the world socialist movement in the context of globalization

Velikaya, Nataliya

*Political sociology, Russian State University for the Humanities
Moscow, Russian Federation*

Keywords

environmental movements, socialist parties, Globalization

The majority of modern theories consider world political process through the mirror of globalization which sharpened unprecedented interdependency of states and nations. One can notice different signs of globalization in international relations and strengthening of alternative actors of international life.

Partly it is connected with the crashing of communist regimes and with relaxation of ideological component in politics or with its transformation.

This problem has also another side because of unwillingness of different countries (mainly developing) to participate in the process which was started after Kyoto. They insist that well-developed countries should spend more money and energy to solve the problems of environment.

The problem of climate change and global warming is the one of the main topic in the world socialist movement. Trying to find legal solution European countries offer different methods.

Europe authorities of different levels are involved in the process initiating by Agenda 21. F.e., great number of municipalities has already signed Agenda local 21, which requires compliance with the principles of sustainable development.

Taking into consideration the fact that struggle for a sustainable, equitable and democratic society forward are the main goals of socialist and labor parties we are analyzing socialist movement (activity of parties and Socialist International) which playing important role in the world environmental movements. We found out a growing awareness among socialists that sustainability has to be the driving force behind 21st century socialism as they seek to close the 'rift' that capitalism has created between human beings and nature.

Since Russia is included already in integration process with Europe we are also examining its position on environmental questions. It is interesting to see the role of Russian parties, claiming to be called socialist, in environmental discussion both in Russia and in Europe. Unfortunately the ecological problems are not considered as mentioned by people and it explains why Russian leaders are more active on international level than in Russia.

Anyway data of our research confirm that understanding of importance of these problems has been rising up gradually.

European Education and Russian Universities

Konstantinovskiy, David

*Department of Sociology of Education, Science and Culture, Institute of Sociology, Russian Academy of Sciences
Moscow, Russian Federation*

Keywords

consequences, innovations, cooperation, universities

Cooperation with European universities, internationalization of education generally needs of evaluation both positive and negative consequences, appreciation of cultural traditions, preservation of achievements of the Russian educational system. On one side of the argument are the employers as the main customer on labor market confirming the importance of internationalization and insisting that university graduates must have professional skills enabling them to work in international environment, to participate in international projects. We also see that international activities of the university might have a real influence on the home region: it is more actively involved into international cooperation and integration; the region gets an access to foreign scientific achievements, new material and technology, obtains a possibility for intercultural communication. But many experts are concerned that existing educational model would be destroyed and new one might not have evident advantages. Important argument of the opponents of university's international integration is a fear of 'brain drain'. Such apprehensions do have some grounds, though international activities of the universities can't be considered as an only reason for the 'brain drain', there are others significant causes.

Our researches show what courses are chosen by Russian universities; what attitudes Russian academics have toward innovations in interaction and communication with foreign universities. Moscow and regional universities participated in survey and interested in cooperation with foreign universities face the following difficulties. Often they don't have enough experience in building international cooperation in education sphere. Moreover, there is a lack of information regarding opportunities of such cooperation. Employers are interested in internationalization of education, but don't provide the real support. Many universities experience the lack of financial resources. Russian academic staff and students have a lack of knowledge of the foreign languages. Joint educational programs seem to be too expensive for many Russian students. Significant problem is the attitude of academic staff toward the integration - many are alerted by innovations, mainly because they consider them as a threat to their status.

Internal and External Phobias and Dangers in Russian Mass Consciousness

Gorshkov, Mikhail

*Director, Institute of Sociology, Russian Academy of Sciences
Moscow, Russia*

Keywords

personal and social phobias and dangers, post-reform Russia, socio-psychological condition of Russian society, Russian mass consciousness, internal and external dangers and phobias

Paper is based on the results of a special nation-wide sociological survey conducted by the Institute of Sociology (Russian Academy of Sciences) in September 2008 in order to study socio-psychological condition of Russian society, social feelings and tendencies specific for it under different context and situations, phobias and dangers as they are in Russian mass consciousness as well as reactions of Russians toward challenges of present-day life. National quota sample used by the research team covered 1750 respondents representing different socio-professional groups of population aged 18 and older in twelve territorial economical regions of Russian Federation, Moscow and St. Petersburg. What was Russian mass consciousness dynamics over the last ten years? What kind of socio-psychological feelings tends to dominate in the country as from 2008 when «political eras change» took place? What are Russians afraid of most of all - internal or external dangers? What are personal phobias and dangers of Russians and how does their hierarchy look like? What are Russians afraid of on a national scale? What external dangers tend to dominate among Russians presently? Searching for answers to above and similar questions we analyzed, from sociological point of view, socio-psychological state and conditions of post-reform Russian society assuming that different phobias and dangers are situational specified, determined by different socio-economic and political processes, as well as that sense of fear and danger is quite natural human feeling which turns out to be regular companion of present-day ordinariness. That is why matter should concern reasons promoting - under the conditions of a concrete historical situation - rise and expansion of specific phobias and dangers, rather than our attitudes toward them.

Leveraging Russia - talent abroad in Social Sciences: Evidence from a Survey

Popov, Dmitry

*General Sociology Department, Higher School of Economics
Moscow, Russian Federation*

Tvorogova, Svetlana

*Social - Economic Systems and Social Policy Department, Higher School of Economics
Moscow, Russian Federation*

Fedyukin, Igor

*Centre for Economic and Financial Research, New Economic School
Moscow, Russian Federation*

Keywords

, academic diaspora, development of social research in Russia

Country's science and humanities talent abroad (hereafter referred as the diaspora) proved to be a crucial resource for transformation of higher education and innovation systems at home in countries such as China, Taiwan and India. Middle income economies such as Chile, Mexico, Argentina and South Africa are experimenting in that direction with substantial promise.

Further development of social research in Russia depends, to a large extent, on its integration into the current international debate - that is why connecting with Russian academics abroad is so important. However, little systematic information exist on Russia's diaspora in social, economic and business disciplines, and relevant policy agenda focuses solely on the immediate return of the talent to Russia. On the latter point, appropriate leveraging of high achievers "tenured individuals" can be just as effective, if not more effective (recent complain of Taiwan authorities that because of the overwhelming return of its talent, they are actually losing vital connections to the Silicon Valley is emblematic in this regard).

To fill this information gap, the Higher School of Economics (www.hse.ru) and the New Economic School (www.nes.ru) together with the World Bank conducted the study of the Russian academic diaspora, specifically those working in the social sciences. The research has two main goals: 1) identifying ways to strengthen cooperation between international and Russian academic communities, 2) creating a contact database of those academics and professionals who might be interested in such cooperation. The main results of the research are proposed in this paper.

On the legal monitoring as a sociological means of understanding policy-making process in the Russian Federation

Larisa, Vdovichenko

*Faculty of Sociology, Russian State University for the Humanities
Moscow, Russian Federation*

Keywords

monitoring of legislation, analysis of legal enforcement practice, policy-making process

The substantial criteria of effectiveness of governance structure is its ability to match the long-term goals and values of society and state development, and to guarantee a quality of the legal groundwork set for the changes affecting the country. In order to create a quality legal field, special attention should be paid to the planning of draft law activity, taking into account the strategic goals of state policies for the long-term prospect. In a federal state, for example Russian Federation, strategically oriented legislative activity is impossible without the regular performance of comprehensive analysis of lawmaking activity and legislative enforcement, both on the federal level and in the constituent entities of the Federation.

An efficient tool for achieving the tasks is the monitoring of legislation and the analysis of legal enforcement practices (herewith, legal monitoring). It forms an integral part of the system of lawmaking, allowing constructing the whole legislative process on a transparent, fundamental legal basis.

Legal monitoring has great value in federal state, one where federal and regional legislations are applied simultaneously. Legal monitoring is presently required as a factor unifying the legislative and legal enforcement activities of bodies of power of Federation and its constituent entities, especially in the course of national project implementation. Over the past years, a passage has been made from a theoretical justification of the idea of legal monitoring in Russian Federation, to a practical unfolding of its system on the basis of vital legislative evaluation criteria: the adopted legislation's ability to implement state policy priorities; guaranteed observance of citizens' constitutional rights and freedoms; the legislation's quality and efficiency.

The discussion about the role of legal monitoring in Russia demonstrated the interest in this new form of empirical studies of the policy process in the context of constitutional partnership. An essential role in the coordination of the activity is played by the Council of Federation - the high chamber of Federal Assembly of the Russian Federation. The last five years it prepared annual reports. Today, regional bodies of the state power are also joining this process. My report is a sociological study of this problem.

Power and Influence in Russian Business Organisations

Balabanova, Evgeniya

*Faculty of Management, State University - Higher School of Economics
Moscow, Russia*

Keywords

Authoritarianism, dependence, Influence, power relations

The term "power" is understood in Weberian tradition as opportunity to achieve one's will despite opposition from others. As originally developed by Moscovici and Turner, there is distinction between "influence" and "power" in organisation. Basing on the results of the research project "Human Resource Management in Russian Business Organisations: Realities, Problems, Perspectives" carried out in 2007-2008 in State University - Higher School of Economics we are going to consider the following aspects of power relations in Russian business organisations:

1. Values of organisational culture regarding power relations. From 37 to 53 per cent among ordinary workers reported their acceptance of such situations as superiors' bullying; workers' loyalty and obedience as criteria of their remuneration and promotion; the fact that workers keep silence while superiors violate their rights. The highest rates of agreement with employer's authoritarianism are registered among low-paid socially unprotected workers; workers in constructing and retail; workers in small enterprises with owners-top-managers.
2. "Power for": positive aspects of power relations. Employees' control and participation in day-to-day management in organisation break up into 1) formal control (membership in trade-unions), and 2) real participation in decision making. The former is registered mainly at large industrial post-soviet enterprises while the latter - at the new private sector of economy. Real participation in decision making is closely connected with respondents' high level of education and their orientations on achievement. In Hirshman's terminology, high-resource (competitive and hardly replaceable) workers have "exit" potential that provides them strong "voice" in defining the "rules of the game" in labor relations.
3. "Power over": negative aspects of power relations. It is closely connected with "exploitative" style of management. Enterprises where workers are powerless, dependent, and excluded from decision making tend to have lower wages, 46-hour and longer workweek, black salaries and no work-based benefits. Protest potential, collective bargaining power in case of clash of employer/employee interests remains very low in Russian organizations so many low-resource workers find themselves in "vicious circle" of dependency and exploitation.

Pre/post Globalization in Today's Russia

Pokrovsky, Nikita

*General sociology, State University--Higher School of Economics
Moscow, Russia*

Keywords

Civil Society, russia, pre/post globalization. traditions and modernities

Today's Russia is routinely described by social scientists as being far behind other industrial countries on the scale of modern globalization. However, the complex nature of contemporary pre/post-globalization implies a more diverse and multi-dimensional analysis and prognosis. From this perspective all societies, including Russia, may be expected to demonstrate evidence of hidden (or open) globalization at the cellular or micro-level. In other words, according to the model of pervasive globalization, even the more backward social entities should demonstrate new trans-national, transitional, and future-oriented qualities. (According to the following proposed model, certain transitional social phenomena may simultaneously contain both pre- and post-globalization characteristics.) Social background. Democracy in contemporary Russia is struggling with many difficulties and obstructions, especially in the rural areas, where the state of democracy and civil society is at best, an emergent, or often, a pseudo-democracy. Several factors may partially account for such conditions, namely, a comparatively low educational and socio-cultural level of the general population; insulation and lack of access to open communication channels and exchanges beyond parochial interests; the orientation of local communities towards isolated patterns of family household economy; dedication to specific forms of cultural and recreational activities discouraging individuals from taking an active role in the political process; the controlling of personal freedoms on the part of local bureaucracies resulting in the population's dependency on financial and administrative authorities ("nachalniks"). Plans for the creation of a civil society based on democratic ideals and imported models of economic and political behaviour have proved impractical in their Utopianism. This process has reached a dead end by not taking into consideration the ingrained mentality and everyday life of the population. Clearly, an alternative method is required: "gradual adaptation" of the population to democratic institutions, activation of local communities on a "grass roots" level, in order to bring about profound, phenomenological structures which respect traditions while incorporating modern democratic patterns. It is possible to propose that ?transit? is complicated and contradictorily develops in the direction of global communities, and not in another direction.

Problems of physical inability and invalids

Belova, Natalia

*Sociology, Russian State University for the Humanities
Moscow, Russia*

Keywords

invalids, physical, inability

The social and economic transformations occurring in the Russian society' in 80-s and 90-s, promoted that in our country the acts directed on the decision of problems of invalids have been developed and accepted, adapted to new realities. In 1995 has been accepted " the Federal law is passed About social protection of invalids in the Russian Federation "in which for the first time in the domestic legislation a priority of social policy of the state concerning invalids becomes rehabilitation and their integration into a society.

On official data in Russia today over 13 million invalids that makes about 9 % of the population, however on informal data the quantity of invalids at least is twice more. The problem of the statistical account concerns to one of the basic problems of physical inability.

The invalids living in Russia, test set of problems: are poorly informed about the rights; test problems in reception of means of rehabilitation; problems in a unimpeded access to objects of a social infrastructure, including transport service; problems in reception of formation and employment; problems of carrying out of leisure and many other things.

However one of the most important problems is the preconvinced attitude to invalids in a society. To problems of physical inability in Russia, besides a problem of the statistical account of invalids, the following concern: invalids are not the homogeneous group, differing on a floor, age, group of the physical inability, available restrictions of ability to live; the young invalids demanding special attention from the state, are not allocated in separate group; huge percent of invalids are persons of able-bodied age; the state spends huge material means for payment of grants and privileges, in turn in the budget of the country, because of the low interest of employment of invalids, taxes do not act; till now low interest of invalids in rehabilitation is traced; at presence of the sufficient legislative base directed on the decision of problems of invalids and physical inability, the mechanism of realization of normative legal base till now is not found.

Public Involvement in Civil Activity: philanthropy in Russia

Kononykhina, Olga N.

*Centre for Studies of Civil Society and Non-for-profit Sector, State University - Higher School of Economics
Moscow, Russian Federation*

Mersiaynova, Irina V.

*Centre for Studies of Civil Society and Non-for-profit Sector, State University -- Higher School of Economics
Moscow, Russian Federation*

Keywords

Civil Society, NGO, charity

The development of the public in Russia is increasingly becoming an important political element. These issues are discussed in the Public Chamber and in the special council for public development with the Russian President.

The aim of researchers is not only to scientifically describe the evolution in this sphere, but also to give specific forecasts and recommendations to the government/authorities to implement changes aimed at the expansion of public activity.

That is why the Center for Studies of civil society and non-for-profit sector of the State University - Higher School of Economics conducts sociological monitoring of the Russian public. One of the most important issues is Russian involvement in civil charity, in particular community services and monetary donations.

The results of the nationwide polls conducted by the center (It was polled 1600 people, aged 18 and over, selected by multistage stratified random sample. The maximum allowable sampling error 2.45% with 95% confidence interval) showed that 48% of Russians are involved in charity. According to international studies conducted by CIVICUS, Russia is ahead of some European countries such as Poland, Germany, and Italy. Moreover, there are favorable conditions for the further expansion of Russians' involvement in charitable activity. Judging by the polls, overall, the population established a positive attitude. Almost 60% of respondents believe that charity should be a matter for everyone to the extent of their means. However the main problem is the low level of trust held by NGOs. Only 17% of Russians believe that the activity of these organizations is truly non-profit.

Thus, we can say, that there is a gap. People are willing to give to charity, but have no faith in the charitable institutions. Making the information about NGOs' activities publicly available will enhance the people's trust towards the institutionalization of charity.

This report will review the aspects of Russian charitable activities and indicate the place of Russia among other European countries according to these indicators. Also, it will analyze the ways that can gain the base of civil society in the country.

Russian Press: Problems of Terrorism

Semenova, Anna

*Department of Applied researches, Institute of Sociology of RAS
Moscow, Russia*

Keywords

tolerance, attitudes, image, content-analysis, terrorism

Terror (from latin, terror fear, horror) - policy of deterrence, suppression of the political opponents by violent measures. The definition of a terror in the dictionary of foreign words is those. Unfortunately, in our modern life, this word has become an ordinary concept. Last decade has shown that common citizens are not safe from terrorism, no matter how detached they are from politics. Lack of safety makes clear the fact that the information about terrorism and terrorists is of interest not only for representatives of the competent organs, but also for the common citizens. Therefore it appears to be interesting to use scientific, "strict" methods of the analysis, namely content-analysis of press, to study main tendencies, special features and methods of public opinion on the problems of terrorism formation.

As an empirical basis of the research we took popular press: "Moscow Komsomolets" (the daily political newspaper spreaded in 89 subjects of the Russian Federation, circulation 1.903.320 copies) and weekly newspaper "Arguments and Facts" (circulation 2.921.170 copies). The analysis shows that despite a rather "quiet" situation, the newspapers gave a lot of attention to terrorism. Speaking about an image of the terrorist created by the journalists, we can see that most of them give a one-sided picture. It looks like they try to popularize terrorists' image (romanticism, elusiveness, brotherhood of faithful, mutual help, high financial status) and undermine the authority of special forces.

These are the main conclusions of the analysis of monthly collections of two newspapers. Judging on them, we see that regular and massive analysis of periodic means of Mass Media is of great importance, taking into consideration the fact of increased terrorism danger.

Socio-Cultural Paradigm of Labour Under Globalization and Modernization of Society and Economy

Sidorina, Tatiana

Philosophy, Higher School of Economics

Moscow, Russia

Keywords

labour, society, economy, Globalization, modernization

This presentation is focused on the problem of relation to labour. This problem is viewed in the context of its evolution in contemporary society under globalization and modernization of society and economy and the role and possibilities of the state to take part in the solution of these problems.

Peculiarities and character of labour in XX-XXI' centuries society are symptoms of the phenomenon "the end of labour". We mean the end of labour in its classical interpretation.

We can consider this phenomenon can be considered as a consequence of scientific and technical progress, information development and the phenomenon of mass consumption society.

We want to discuss the following questions.

Is contemporary labour corresponding with the classical interpretation of labour?

How did this social phenomenon convert? Relation to labour had determined life in the society during many centuries. How did the relation to labour convert in XX centuries?

What are the perspectives of human life in the context of changing labour. What's the connection between changing labour and the system of human values? What can we say about the role of state in the process of development relation to labour, process of convert labour's values in classical interpretation? We know some approaches to the solution of the problem of employment in West-European and Russian history. What methods can modern state use to solve these problems under changing relation to labour?

Presentation based on the results of international research in 2008 - 2009.

Striving for social change: Non-governmental organisations (NGOs) and HIV/AIDS in the Russian Federation

Pape, Ulla

Department of International Organisation and International Relations, University of Groningen Groningen, The Netherlands

Keywords

Civil Society, Social Policy, HIV/AIDS, Russian Federation, Non-governmental organisation (NGO)

A strong civil society, defined as "the space between the state, the market and the family" (Gellner), is commonly understood as a precondition for democracy. The concept has therefore been central in the discourse on post-Soviet transition. Since 1991, Western donor agencies have developed a great variety of programmes to assist the formation of civil society in former communist countries. From today's perspective, however, the outcomes of those external efforts to promote democracy and civil society in the post-Soviet space, can be regarded as meagre, as they apparently did not succeed to root the new ideas in society.

It would, however, be wrong to overlook the forms of civic engagement that in fact have emerged in Russia over the past two decades. Russian citizens have predominantly organized themselves around issues which directly affect themselves or their family members. In the context of a collapsing social system, many citizens have taken matters into their own hand and created organisations that respond to concrete social needs. In many fields of social policy, e.g. in the response to the HIV/AIDS epidemic, Russian NGOs have become key actors and are today more and more accepted as partners of state institutions. The question is now, whether those organisations are able to contribute to a genuine Russian development of civil society.

This article will focus on Russian grass-root NGOs which are active in the field of HIV/AIDS, since they can serve as salient examples for civic engagement on social issues. Field work on AIDS-service NGOs has been conducted in three Russian regions: Tomsk, St. Petersburg and Kaliningrad. From a theoretical perspective, the article aims to link the civil society approach to the debate on social movements in order to identify the capacities of NGOs in achieving social change. The paper will be based on empirical research conducted in the framework of my current PhD project on the role of NGOs in the response to the HIV/AIDS epidemic, and thus aims to contribute to our understanding of social change and civil society development in Russia.

Struggling without success? Russian civil society caught between international and domestic demands - the example of aid for disabled people

Fröhlich, Christian

*Institut for Cultural Studies, Leipzig University
Leipzig, Germany*

Keywords

Civil Society, World Policy, democratization, disability

Thematic Section III. Public Sociology in a Civil Environment in Russia

In the course of the social transformation in the 1990s the Russian social security system faced rapid change by declining financial/structural resources and the social situation of especially handicapped people became even more precarious.

In a theoretical perspective the World Policy Theory suggests an international adaption of paradigms of the societal organization, especially in transforming societies. The pressure of the world community on the salvation of national problematic issues should cause improvement for the integration of the disabled from upside down. Since Perestroika international donors and global civil society organizations seek for Russian non-governmental partners to initiate sustainable change in Russian social welfare. But empirical findings show gaps between them in paradigms and values with regard to disabled people and their position in society. On the one hand that leads to ineffective project development. On the other hand international donors choose partners who are already close to their own values and in that way fail to initiate sustainable change.

On the other hand Russian NGOs face normative and structural barriers set by public actors and organizations against their integration measures, because they question the way disabled are officially threatened in society. This is all the more striking because Russian NGOs often fail to connect their concerns with themes and values which are commonly shared by all societal groups.

With the help of empirical finding from in-depth-interviews with actors in international, Russian NGOs and public organizations the paper shows why Russian civil society organizations in the field of disability aid fail to initiate and form social movement activities which would aim on overall societal change. Striving for financial support and legitimization by public and international authorities, Russian NGOs are set in a situation of competition which leads to separation and dissociation.

Tolerance as a Condition of Stable Relations

Tanatova, Dina

*Social Anthropology, Russian State Social University
Moscow, Russia*

Keywords

tolerance, national safety, crisis processes, ethnic migrants

The mass flow of ethnic migrants to Russia has generated a new social phenomenon - migrantophobia. The analysis of the character and contents of migrantophobia shows, that the structure of phobias is represented by the semantic structures cultivated in the natives' consciousness: 1) number of migrants is much more, than the official statistics reports; 2) migrants strive to use what is made by us and that is why belongs only to us; 3) "they" use and reduce our resources; 4) "they" reduce our opportunities of self-realization in economic activities because they are more active and entrepreneurial and they possess big financial opportunities; 5) "they" are neither planned, nor expected, and that is why are not included in our infrastructure (schools, hospitals, transport, benefits, pensions, etc.) ; 6) "they" are more criminal, than we are and they threaten our safety; 7) "they" settle in our territory and thus they attempt it, threaten us and reduce our vital space; 8) "they" threaten our political stability and independence and demand representation in different authorities; 9) "they" are our cultural aliens and threaten our culture (they do not know and do not want to know our language, do not observe our customs and traditions); 10) "they" threaten our social status (they behave freely, impudently as owners; they have everything they want; they live better, than we do); 11) "they" purposefully settle in frontier regions, near to strategic objects and thus they create potential threat to the national safety of Russia; 12) "they" threaten our unity and integrity of the Russian Federation; 13) "they" want to receive a legal status to own our land, etc.

Two Models of Social and Political Communication

Simonyan, Renald

*Russian-and-Baltic Center, Affiliation of Russian Academy of Sciences Institute of Sociology RAS
Moscow, Russia*

Keywords

dialog, communication, model, policy, tradition

The poly-subjectivity is inherent to the Christian world by definition. The subjectivity assumes the presence of two and more parties. In the Christian world and Russia was its part the individuals, the organized communities (shops, universities, monasteries), cities, monarchy are to be subjective. As a result of the Tatar-Mongolian invasion in Russia there has been created a situation when the Power has become the unique subject. The traditions of the monolog political system have come from here. Within this tradition the Power carriers immanently feel themselves not as the officials employed by a society for carrying out concrete state duties, but certain judges of destinies. Here it does not bear any civil responsibility before the society for carrying out of those functions that the State apparatus is obliged to carry out under the contract with it, i.e. under the Constitution. In the monolog system at the individual as soon as he becomes a carrier of imperious powers, the idea of a civil responsibility before the society depreciates or disappears from the structure of consciousness. Therefore, any attempt to control the Power by the society is perceived by it as something ill-intentioned and even as a crime.

In the monolog tradition there is a danger and to the Power. The Power can not talk to the people, even when it is politically useful for it that is possible to illustrate with numerous historical examples. The information received from the original resource is the most valuable material on correction of the State policy with the aim of keeping the Power itself. But the Power instinctively hinders an occurrence and development of public initiative, local government, voluntary associations of citizens and other forms of free associations of people, i.e. all that promotes an occurrence of a public dialog.

The dialog structure of the Power, on the contrary, is oriented on the development of the lower layers of society. Otherwise, the power will not receive a partner for a dialog and will eliminate a concept of a dialog itself. The dialog assumes the presence of two subjects of this process of information change.

Visual sources in teaching public sociology

Iarskaia-Smirnova, Elena

*Social Anthropology and Social Work, Saratov State Technical University
Saratov, Russia*

Romanov, Pavel

*Center for Social Policy and Gender Studies, Center for Social Policy and Gender Studies
Saratov, Russia*

Keywords

visual methods, social problems, public sociology

Visual sources play a growing role in social studies as well as in teaching as they offer new routes to understanding the past and the present. The ways to construct and define social problems as well as approaches to solving them varied in different periods of history. To do so, it is important to challenge an ideological base of such concepts that often are taken-for-granted, to learn how to consider images as a means to conceive the world, as an important form of social knowledge. What are the differences on men's and women's labor? How these distinctions were represented in certain sources and for which purposes? What is the mainstream image of disability in different periods and how it can be challenged? Photographs and episodes from the films, posters and cartoons depicting various images of people in the roles of parents and workers, carers and patients, can be used not just as illustrations or representations but also as an important element of a studied context - as important as official documents or personal narratives. Engaging students and people representing silent groups into the visual production and analysis has an empowering effect not only because of channeling the trauma and suffering through creative practices but also because private experience becomes narrated and politically meaningful. The aim of this paper is to contribute to the discussion on public sociology training by providing an overview of experiences, theories and methodologies on the visual, by collecting and building knowledge based on visual material and demonstrating in particular its relevance to the study of human behavior, social networks and welfare policies.

Where does Russia's welfare state end? The role of non-governmental actors in disability provision

Rasell, Michael

Centre for Russian and East European Studies, University of Birmingham Birmingham, United Kingdom

Keywords

disability, russia, NGOs, Civil Society, state

This paper looks at the activity of non-profit organisations for disabled people in Russia. Given that welfare services in Russia do little to promote the citizenship rights and social inclusion of people with disabilities, it is relevant to raise the question of which non-state sources of support exist. Across the world, civil society organisations have often led the struggle for the equality and rights of disabled people. In addition to this advocacy role, they are increasingly involved in welfare provision through grants and tenders. My discussion draws on eleven months of qualitative fieldwork - including interviews and visits to NGOs - in Kazan and other cities in the Volga-Ural area.

I start with a short discussion of the theoretical and policy context of third-sector activity in Russia. I then map the range of disability organisations in Russia, talking about the work of "official" disabled people's organisations, local associations and small self-help groups. I use research observations and the comments of research participants to examine the usefulness of these different bodies and their varying approaches to disability. I go onto challenge the notion of a clear distinction between the state and third sector in Russia. Regulative and funding provisions ensure that the authorities are closely involved in the activities of the disability movement in Russia, implying that the "social state" extends far beyond the provision of welfare services.

Work Socialization Messages in Late-Soviet and Post-Soviet Schoolbooks: a Content-Analysis of the Features, Occupations, and Roles of Working Personages

Okolskaia, Lidia

*Personality research, Institute of Sociology (Russian Academy of Sciences)
Moscow, Russia*

Keywords

Content Analysis, Work values, Schoolbooks

Background. Textbooks are considered to be important socializing media providing schoolchildren with numerous socio-cultural messages. Underlying messages of textbooks (the so-called hidden curriculum) reflect the most typical norms, roles, and stereotypes approved by an educational system and official culture. This normative mainstream is highly resistant to change, although ideological and socio-economic transformations are likely to affect what children are taught at school. In 20 years, drastic institutional changes in Russia resulted in significant normative changes which affected the educational system as well. School curriculum has been substantially revised, and its normative focus has shifted.

Methods. We conducted a content analysis of Soviet elementary school textbooks (published in 1982-83), and matching post-Soviet textbooks of the 2000s. 30 books were coded. Our analysis focused on work socialization messages, including work roles, motivations, achievements and occupations represented by textbook personages.

Results. Both Soviet and contemporary Russian textbooks emphasize the values of work and diligence. Working individuals are prominently represented, all with positive connotations. In Russian pedagogical tradition, work is mostly done either for altruistic reasons, or as a household duty. Monetary compensation is not a typical reason for somebody's work efforts. Work is mostly portrayed as a masculine and adult activity, with the prevalence of manual labor. In general, we found apparent continuity between contemporary textbooks and their late-Soviet predecessors.

In comparison to the 1980s, present-day curriculum has slightly diminished its emphasis on work values: only 35% of texts contain work images (compared to 46% two decades ago). Patterns of achievement (i.e. extraordinary efforts associated with risk, innovation, initiative, and urgent and complex tasks) are less common. Many heroic and highly ideological stories were removed from the curriculum, but few alternative materials were generated to compensate for this wash-out. However, work for individual welfare (and not for community) is portrayed more often, as well as paid jobs and entrepreneurship.

Content selection strategies in textbook production are formed by changing normative climate and shortage of available cultural material (appropriate for contemporary educational needs). Educational system's rigidity prevents textbooks from marginal insertions and slows down their renewal.

Youth of Post-Soviet Russia: Socio-Economic Position, Value Orientations and Living Aspirations

Tyurina, Irina

*Leading Research Fellow, Institute of Sociology, Russian Academy of Sciences
Moscow, Russia*

Keywords

value orientations and living aspirations of young people in present-day Russia, world financial and economic crisis, socio-economic statuses and positions of young Russians, youth in post-soviet Russia, labor market experience of Russian youth

What happened to young Russian people under transformational processes took place over a reform period? How do they live today and what will be their life tomorrow? Results of monitoring surveys conducted by the Institute of Sociology (RAS) in order to analyze problems, perspectives and living aspirations of post-soviet Russian youth let us to conclude that overwhelming majority of it demonstrates succession with respect to parental generation as regards value orientations and attitudes toward basic vital values. Characteristic features of youth refer to its working qualities and associated with them level of material well-being, its morale and behavioral peculiarities as well as attitude toward politics. Young people have a number of advantages over elder generation since they possess higher level of qualification, skills and abilities appreciated by modern labor market as well as are ready to take proper account of market requirements including re-qualification in case of necessity. Young people's material well-being tends to be better than that of their parents. No wonder that former are much more optimistic estimating personal consequences of contemporary economic reforms. Thus, for example, in 2007 part of young people answering the question «Do you like or dislike life in Russia as it is today?» positively, was half as much as compared with 1997, increasing from 45 up to 60%. It appears that the main reason of positively oriented dynamics of mass youth consciousness consists in the fact that the majority of Russian young people has already adapted - professionally, organizationally and psychologically - to new socio-economical relations and conditions and found (faster than elder generation) the ways to earn their living. At the same time it's worth mentioning that differences between successful and unfortunate young people tend to become more profound and consolidated. Thus, for example, young people working at private enterprises exhibit a tendency to improve their material well-being, while those employed in public ones - quite the contrary. What will be with Russian youth under the conditions of world financial and economic crisis?

RS17

Sociology of Celebration

"Celebrating the family" - On the neglected side of family rituals

Costa, Rosalina

*Department of Sociology, University of Évora
Évora, Portugal*

Keywords

Family, rituals, Celebrations, Gatherings

Family celebrations are sociologically constructed as part of family rituals (Wolin e Bennett, 1984; Imber-Black & Roberts, 1992; Pleck, 2000). In spite of the difficulty in answering the question "what is a family celebration?", a review of the scientific literature under this subject suggests that family celebrations are occasions widely practiced throughout the culture and somehow considered "special" in the minds of the family. Characterized as rituals of "low frequency, high rank" (Douglas & Isherwood, 1979), they are highly elaborated, relative rare and generally involve feasts, where "special" foods, objects or gifts are brought up. Those occasions are usually seen as opportunities to meet family members in a "positive" celebration. In fact, most of the time family gatherings are perceived as privileged places where families are constructed. By the sharing of space, time and meaning, families create and reinforce a sense of unity and identity, define boundaries, and enhance stability and belonging feelings. However, because not always family celebrations work as planned or expected, not rarely those same "special" occasions lead participants to experience conflict, anguish, disappointment, exclusion, or simply unhappiness (Gillis, 1996; Coltrane, 1998; Pleck, 2000). Nevertheless, it is precisely this kaleidoscopic nature that emphasizes the sociological challenge of studying family celebrations. Inspired by and questioning the title of Elizabeth Pleck's book (2000), this paper aims to look at the Portuguese family celebrations, with a special focus on the "other" and somehow neglected side of family rituals. Methodologically anchored upon empirical data from in-depth individual interviews carried out in the context of a PhD research (in course), this paper's purpose is, in a more specific way, to identify some of the occasions included in the category of "family celebrations" and to discuss their value as celebrative forms of being together. Through an empirical and theoretical analysis of collected data we hope to critically highlight the sociological knowledge of the contemporary families' celebrations, discussing the hidden dimensions of "which" family is celebrated, why, how and what actually means "to celebrate" the family.

Can a new celebration bring social change? The phenomenon of new street festivals in Poland

Bielski, Piotr

*Institute of Sociology, University of Lodz
Lodz, Poland*

Keywords

Social change, celebration, street festival, cultural animation, free time activities

Polish people are not used to collective celebrations involving all neighborhood, rather limiting themselves to family and friends or workplace celebrations. The street live is not so vibrant here as in Mediterranean Europe due to many factors including the cold climate and subjective sensation of insecurity.

However, the author with his colleagues from the Foundation for the Living Culture introduced a street festival in Lodz, Poland in the street notorious for illegal alcohol trade and petty criminality. This "Sun rises in Wschodnia" festivity brought a new life to the Wschodnia street with philharmonics musicians playing violin in old run-down buildings, action painting, cinema shows, concerts, wall decoration, parade. The children dressed themselves for the parade and participated in workshops of art, music and street theatre.

Thanks to evaluation study, it is evident that the community changed its way of looking at the street thanks to the festival. As one representative noted "I have lived there 50 years and so far did not see anything special here. Now I am proud of living here". The celebration was an impulse for new local community projects to emerge, like the recycled garden. The Wschodnia festival set a trend in the city inspiring other street's inhabitants to start their local festivals. People are more eager to visit this street which opens perspectives for its development. However, the goal of Foundation of offering sober ways of celebration is not fully reached as significant amount of local people prefer to get drunk at home before joining the feast.

The author will outline the concept, history of festival and its evaluation made by the local people studying the mutual interactions. The text will focus on a possibility of using street festival as a factor of social change and community revival. It will also deal with the meaning and social impact of other street festivals in Europe.

Celebration in the service of togetherness

Kantola, Ismo

*Department of Sociology, University of Turku
Turku, Finland*

Keywords

celebration, shared feelings, community

While celebration, indubitably, can be expected to bring gratification to its voluntary participants, sociology's point of view can, perhaps, best be taken by posing the question whether celebration serves a vital function of the society or whether it indicates the presence of a social mechanism. In the Durkheimian legacy complex social systems do not allow explicit representations of themselves. Instead, social cohesion is maintained emotionally. Stability and continuity is brought about by attaching emotions to material artefacts such as totems, or, in the case of the modern society, science and technology. Shared structures of feeling make togetherness and the presence of community felt. Not only material artefacts but exemplary human beings, performances, and rituals as well may serve as mediators on which feelings can be attached in a shared way. In this regard, acts of celebration can be understood as an attempt to preserve the feelings of togetherness, which is also the main point of the paper.

The point will be exposed empirically by examples from observation data on various contexts of celebration in different fields of sociality.

Crossing Boundaries. The Social Meaning of Celebration in Berlin and Bangkok's Party Scene

Cantó-Milà, Natàlia

*Arts & Humanities, UOC (Open University of Catalonia)
Barcelona, Spain*

Seebach, Swen

*Arts & Humanities, UOC (Open University of Catalonia)
Barcelona, Spain*

Keywords

individualism, élite, Party consummation, excessivity, biography writing

This paper focuses on the social meaning of partying and clubbing, arguing that a relevant change has slowly taken place over the last decades regarding the meaning associated with the transgression of everyday life boundaries that is intrinsic to the traditionally "exceptional" time of celebration and partying. This paper presents the results of field work realised in Berlin and Bangkok in 2007. Its main thesis is that the party scene has evolved towards a highly individualistic and individualised culture of partying, which does not entail much of a social (even communitarian) transgression of the social values and rules. The party scene is a sum of individuals concentrated on the atomised, hedonistic search for their immediate pleasure - and who do not regard celebration as a means to transgress or transform social life. Celebration has thus become a lifestyle (or, better said, a diorama of lifestyles) which is deeply rooted in late capitalistic forms of consumption. This lifestyle (or lifestyles) is orientated towards an accumulation of experiences, in which the quantity of the celebrated parties and accumulated experiences become the most relevant factor for the construction and reconstruction of one's own identity, as well as a means, a necessary presentation card, for belonging to certain networks.

Homus eventis: postmodern citizen between cultural experiences and new forms of participation in collective life

Ieracitano, Francesca

Sciences of communication, Lumsa University

Rome, Italy

Keywords

participation, Postmodernity, cultural events, desire for community

The diffusion of cultural events, rituals and public celebrations seems the direct consequence of postmodernity that sees represented in the events its founding principles: as presentification, the importance of the emotional dimension, the culture of loisir, tribalism etc.. (Morin, 1963; Maffesoli, 2004, Jameson, 2007).

The success of the public that these initiatives recover, pushing the sociological reflection to go beyond the need for entertainment these initiatives seem to satisfy, to investigate what expectations and what needs of contemporary events actually meet.

To examine these aspects have been carried out two field surveys involving the public of two of the most significant cultural events that take place every year in different European cities: the "White night" of Rome and Paris and the "Europe Day" in Rome.

Through the administration of structured questionnaires, we tried to investigate:

- 1) What represent for the collective imagination of the public the participation in these initiatives,
- 2) how these events help to reinforce a sense of belonging among members of a community and encourage dialogue between cultures;
- 3) how are changing the usual practices and cultural habits of the public since the forms of culture "traditional" have been replaced by cultural events.

The main findings from two surveys showed that for the general public participation in these collective rituals, beyond what Maffesoli defines "community desire": that is phenomena of collective celebration of being together without claiming to create lasting bonds where is a rejection of the institutional. Infact:

- 1) firstly, the participation in events creates the illusion that it is free and that everyone can participate in these initiatives and experience according to your taste or culture of their own way, in fact the function of social control by of new cultural industries appears invisible, but nevertheless this is a strong;
- 2) second, the public seems to transcend the mere "want to be," and considers these events as an opportunity to come together in a shared space such as that of their city back to a "public sphere" and to rediscover their sense of belonging to community through a ritual very similar to those analyzed by Durkheim

Imagined Slavery. What happens at sadomasochistic parties

Hitzler, Ronald

*Pedagogy and Sociology, Dortmund University of Technology
Dortmund, Germany*

Keywords

sadomasochism, algophile milieus, ritual, party, role

Sadomasochistic slavery in algophile milieus begins with (various, but typically not violent) procedures of negotiation in which one person (for whatever reason) is induced to take on a role, according to the will of another person, in an "erotic" game. What follows is principally the carrying out of sexually connoted physical and/or mental violence in the one role, and the endurance of this violence in the other. The many and various historical forms of common slavery, by contrast, usually begin with an act of violence - concretely, with the enslavement of a person against his will, i.e. with the appropriation of the power of control over the body of one person by another. What follows does not necessarily need to include further acts of violence on the part of the slaveholder. In short, common slavery means the enslavement of a person (or his antecedents) through an initial act of violence and the bondage of this person through the threat of (unlimited) physical violence at any time. "Slavery" in the sadomasochist milieu described here means inducing a person to agree voluntarily to take on a role in an erotic game that is essentially defined by the continued carrying out or sufferance of physical and/or mental violence.

Spectacularisation of Faith. The Catholic World Youth Day 2005 in Cologne and the complementarity of innovation and canon

Pfadenhauer, Michaela

Institute of Sociology, Karlsruhe University Karlsruhe, Germany

Keywords

Eventization, Spectacularisation, Catholic World Youth Day, Event

In history the Catholic Church in Rome was always able to be both: innovative and canonical-dogmatic. It seems to be a kind of "institutional cleverness" of this two thousand years old organization to observe social trends as - for example - the recent trend towards Spectacularisation resp. "eventization" and, if it can't be stopped or stand out, to integrate it in the own agenda. More than the Protestantism - which was "Zeitgeist" in the 1970s - the Catholic Church lately attracts attention with target group specific events which are increasingly mediatised and, in the clerical context, absolutely innovative. Pope John II was the first one who read the signs of time, and Pope Benedict XVI. follows this route (not enthusiastic but unhesitant). It is interesting to see that the attractiveness of these events remarkably goes along parallel to the continuous explicit displacement of young people from ecclesiastical dogmas and catechistic doctrines. This development sort of runs parallel to the idea that canonical principles, which are clerical indispensable, and - for the core part - indisputable are considered as irrelevant. As I am going to show in my contribution, this doesn't change anything about the fact, that adolescents are magnetically drawn to eventuous belief performances by the church. These performances especially develop a force of attraction when they are accompanied by strong moral appeals to collectivization and charismatic focusing. So to me the question came up, whether the canonical principles and the innovation in an ecclesiastical context are more foiling or mutual evoking. I will try to answer this by using our research on the World Youth Day. In August 2005 this event of the Catholic Church with a tradition of more than twenty years took place in Cologne. It was very successfully organized and attracted more than one million adolescent participants from all over the world (See: Forschungskonsortium WJT: Megaparty Glaubensfest. Weltjugendtag 2005: Erlebnis "Medien" Organisation. Wiesbaden: VS 2007; Pfadenhauer, Michaela: Organisieren. Eine Fallstudie zum Erhandeln von Events. Wiesbaden: VS 2008).

The Celebration of Local Identities through Carnival in Cologne and Paris

Salzbrunn, Monika

Fakultät für Sozialwissenschaften, Ruhr-University Bochum/EHESS Paris Bochum, Germany

Keywords

identity politics, urban studies, belonging, Event, Carnival

In a context of moving European identities, a return to localized identification processes can be observed. Especially celebrative forms of being together can create a communitas or a we-group during a particular social situation. Both in Cologne and Paris carnival, this creation or reinforcement of territorialised belonging goes along with a reinvention of tradition with reference to historical sources. One political message amongst others coming up in recent street carnivals in Paris is a strong local identity to which people from various backgrounds, living in the same quarter, adhere. This demonstration of geographically defined identity can in some cases go along with a collective demonstration of a common standpoint on global political issues. However, the lack of a common musical heritage sets a limit to the expansion of reinvented festive events in Paris. In Cologne, the adhesion to the popular carnival event is constantly increasing. The combination of well-known historical origins, the constant reinvention and renewal of artistic forms of expression and a growing need for local references in a context of globalisation can explain the constant success and the diversification of Cologne carnival. Both cases illustrate the link between culture and power as well as the tension between subversion and submission. This paper will provide a detailed analysis of the conditions of positive celebrations and the role of technology, ideology, and everyday praxis in enhancing (in the case of Cologne) or inhibiting (in the case of Paris) positive celebration. Research is based on fieldwork in both cities during seven years (situational analysis, participatory observation, semi-guided interviews, informal conversations, analysis of archives etc.) and was funded by two research projects (Centre National de Recherche Scientifique and German Research Foundation).

Transformation of the festival calendar in today's Russia: policies and practices

Karpova, Galina

*Social Anthropology and Social Work, Saratov State Technical University
Saratov, Russia*

Keywords

global and local processes, collective memories, festival calendar, patterns of celebration

A paper is about the rapid cultural changes in contemporary Russian festival calendar that reflect complex efforts of the state, market and civil society to formulate the new Russian national identity. A system of Soviet festivals is being forgotten, the significance and semantic load of almost all official celebrities is demolished except for the Victory Day, which is actively used by the authorities and is accepted by the population to sustain the feelings of patriotism and national superiority, as well as collective memories and appreciation for the older generation. The research shows that practically all newly introduced statutory festivals are often misunderstood by population but are welcomed as an additional option for a holyday with (Independence Day, Constitution Day). An increase in popularity of religious celebrations is reinforced by mass media and supported by official discourse. Young Russian people in large cities are welcoming European and global festivals and patterns of celebration, they include in festival calendars of their referent groups such festivals as "Catholic Christmas", "St.Valentine's Day", "St.Patrick's Day". Modification of festivals in today's Russia is in focus of economic interests and information exchange. Such festivals are shaped and framed by the global and local processes, they contribute to dissemination of standardized cultural practices and behaviours.

Abstract Index

COVER .....	0
RN01-Ageing in Europe .....	2
"I'm busy, but I have time for myself" - Gender as a determining factor of active aging .....	3
"Personalising Care": the implications for carers and care workers of policy developments in the Engla (...) ....	4
"The Way of The Cross Leads us to Each Othe" -Religion in Social Connectedness of Finnish Older Adults...	5
A comparative analysis of long-term care for older people in Europe .....	6
A policy of violence?- a reflection on ageing policy, on the example of Poland and Sweden.....	7
Activation policies for the young old: an international comparison .....	8
Active ageing challenges and transitions from employment to retirement in Portuguese health professionals...	9
Active Ageing: Deconstructing the Concept.....	10
Advocacies for frail and incompetent elderly in Europe .....	11
Age, paid work and morality.....	12
Ageing and Quality of Life-related Policies: A Preliminary Review of European Initiatives on Assistive T (...) ..	13
Ageing people as innovators in senior service markets.....	15
Ageing, agency and technology in everyday life.....	16
Aspects of social exclusion: age as a core risk factor for social isolation .....	17
Balancing and negotiating obligations and responsibilities.....	18
Care managers as administrators of the needs of the elderly - contradictions and diversity in Swedish e (...) ..	19
Career transitions and trajectories of older school teachers in Germany and Britain: The influence of m (...) ..	20
Caregivers for old people and social class .....	21
Caregivers´use of time: housework, personal life and labour. Analysis of data from the Spanish Time B (...) ..	22
Changing Family Roles Of (South) African Grandparents .....	23
Combining Parent Care and Paid Work with or without Siblings: How do working carers argue the role (...) ..	24
Community Wellbeing Index: A valid and reliable measure of subjective quality of life in older adults .....	25
Comparative Patterns of Commitment: Old Age Interest Groups and their Members in the Swiss Welfar (...) ..	27
Conceptualizing the neighbourhood as a dynamic social space: older people as actors in place-making.....	28
Conformity and resistance in older women´s life stories.....	29
Consequences of obligations: Family care for elders with Pakistani background .....	30
Constraints for uptake of telecare services in Slovenia .....	31
Demographic Change, Welfare, and Intergenerational Transfers: Globalization and Late Careers in Loc (...) ..	32
Design of Environments for Ageing .....	33
Determinants of formal home care use: the influence of individual life circumstances and family context.....	37
Does cohabitation provide weaker intergenerational bonds than marriage? .....	38
Does the supply of public care services towards the very old affect labour force participation of their c (...) ..	39
Dynamics of Portuguese population and professional workforce and ageing at the work.....	40
Early retirement indicators on the institutional level: clustering countries based on policy measures .....	41
Emergence of romantic relationships in old age .....	42
European society is ageing.....	43
Exploring the sense of neighbourhood: personal resources, opportunities and constraints - Evidence f (...) ..	44
Extending working lives: opportunities, constraints and individual expectations in an ageing society .....	45
Family care of older people in Portugal: caring trajectories and their meanings. ....	46
Family composition as determinant of informal and formal support among the elderly: the influence of c (...) ..	47
Firm-level policies and late career transitions in Germany, Japan and Britain: A qualitative case study a (...) ..	48
From a Bodily paradox to (Age)coded bodies: On Embodied Gendered Ageing .....	49
Gay and Lesbian Aging: How social networks and the experience of stigmatizing affect the need for an (...) ..	50

Gender and the impact of care-giving on sleep in Italy and the UK.....	51
Gender effects of European pension reforms .....	52
Grandparent roles and welfare state context: a Nordic country in comparative perspective .....	53
Grandparents and women's participation in the labour market.....	54
How do we treat our frail elderly? Insights on the Portuguese case .....	55
Impact of informal caregiving on caregivers wellbeing: gender differences.....	56
Intergenerational solidarity and parent-child proximity in Europe. A comparative analysis on the Gender (...) ..	58
Intergenerational solidarity and social cohesion: the limits of private financial transfers within family .....	59
Intergenerational solidarity on the societal level in European countries .....	60
Intergenerational Transfers, Life Course Events, and Social Inequality. A Longitudinal Comparison of G (...) ..	61
International retirement migration and ageing abroad: Life cycle perspectives on successful ageing .....	62
Knowledge and information on ageing and gender: developing a contextual database at an European I (...) ..	63
Liberating Age: Images of Ag(e)ing in Contemporary Film and Fiction .....	64
Life extension as life long learning.....	65
Life story in institutional contexts - looking for a past and a future .....	66
Loneliness and social isolation of older Poles .....	67
Male Caregivers in Self-Help-Organizations for the Elderly.....	68
Multiple Older Parent-Adult Child Relations: Assessing between and within Family Variation in later Life .....	69
Norwegian Sandwich. On the prevalence and consequences of family and work role squeezes in midlife .....	70
Occupation, health behaviour and mortality.....	71
Old age and the city. Social change, ageing and old age in an urban environment .....	72
Particularities of Russian Pensioners' Living Standards .....	73
Past inheritances and inheritance expectations in Europe .....	74
Patterns of Intergenerational Solidarity in Europe .....	75
Perceptions of pension systems and expectations of own retirement ? A pan-European comparison .....	76
Poland: No Country for Old Men? Or: on social construction of old age .....	77
Positive and negative impact of caregiving for elderly parents on working carers - an ethnic comparison .....	78
Quality of employment for older workers in Europe .....	79
Quality of Life in Ageing Societies: Italy, Portugal and Turkey -Cross-country Comparisons of Condition (...) ..	80
Reciprocal Social Support in Older Adults: Secular Trends and Longitudinal Changes over a 16-year F (...) ..	81
Recruitment across ethnicity and nationality in elder care .....	82
Representations of elderly in Lithuanian media .....	83
Resources, evaluations and social contexts - diversity and inequality in later life in a multi-level perspective....	84
Reversing early retirement: Different patterns on the same trend .....	85
Settings that make users: An ethnographic account of telecare for the elderly .....	86
Sexuality, Age and Care in an Inner City Borough .....	87
Stability, adaptability and fragility of the elderly care "configurations" over time: in Belgium, 1994-2002.....	88
Storytelling, ageing and ethnicity in a rural Tornedalen, North Sweden .....	89
Strategies for promoting active ageing in Europe: a review of the literature.....	90
Strengthening self-confidence in own training competencies. Special focus on ageing workforce .....	91
The Age Dimension of European Immigration: A New Challenge for European Societies.....	92
The Apple Doesn't Live Far from the Tree: Geographical Proximity Between Parents and Their Adult C (...) ..	93
The challenge of reconciling work and care for an elderly dependent parent: the Portuguese situation.....	94
The combination of informal care for the elderly and employment - Social inequality and rationality.....	95
The effects of active ageing policy and practice .....	96
The impact of welfare state institutions on the early retirement patterns in Europe: a comparative analy (...) ..	97
The intention to retire early. A comparative study between employees of different European countries. ....	98
The interplay of law and innovation in ICT-supported independent living of older people in the USA and (...) ..	99

The Nature and Dynamics of the Relationship between Migrant Carers and Older People .....	100
The new German labour market policy and older welfare recipients: Activation or "active ageing"?.....	101
The places for ageing in parliamentary speeches .....	102
The Role of Education in Managing Chronic Illnesses and Its Effects on Quality of Life.....	103
The role of home help in the field of formal care for older people in Slovenia .....	104
The Secret of Senior Home Help .....	105
The social relationship in nursing homes .....	106
The usage of ICT by the elderly in Lisbon: Motivations and Attitudes .....	107
Towards a Humanistic Gerontology: Methodological Issues in 'Seeing' Visual Images of Ageing .....	108
Tracing the link between "feeling at home" and quality of life in residential care settings for older people .....	109
Transfers Between Generations in Western and Eastern Europe .....	110
Understanding Precarity in Old Age: Income Poverty or Well Being for Effective Policy Making .....	111
Voluntary and Involuntary Early Retirement in Germany - The effects of labour market structures and g (...) ..	112
Why are we still working - Explaining differences in older persons' workforce participation by individual-I (...) ..	113
Widowhood, Gender and Depression in Later Life .....	114
Wisdom among Older People: Exploring Social Consequences of Virtue.....	115
RN02-Sociology of the Arts.....	116
"Historical Trauma": Representations of Combat Soldiers as Occupiers in the Israeli Theater.....	117
"If you meet them in the street, join them" - The role of public art and redesign of public spaces in Zagreb.....	118
"Violence at Work: Marina Abramovic" .....	119
A Calendar of Ornaments. Temporal Features in Decoration and Art.....	120
A Whole Life Job: the complex working lives of musicians in North East England.....	121
Aestheticization of Everyday Life and Postmodern Cities.....	122
Aesthetics and Art Sociology: for a New Theoretical Platform.....	123
Aesthetics strategies and sociological shifts. Bodies, sex and gender in the practices of women artists f (...) ..	124
An art to "use value": The New Patrons of the Fondation de France .....	125
Anthropological Film, Film and Interpretation, Film and Social Sciences, Image and Knowledge .....	126
Are 'Children' the New 'Social Inclusion' in British Cultural Policy? .....	127
Art and Oil: Visualizing Globalization .....	128
Art and Trauma: Methods of Inquiry, Dialogue and Transformation .....	129
Art Dealers and Museum Directors: Friction at the Boundaries.....	130
Art Experiences and Participatory Culture: the Performance Paradigm in SecondLife .....	131
Art field in Norway in the XIX century and the construction of a national identity: a case study on Alfred (...) ..	132
Art for everybody or for the privileged few - self-definition and self-representation of the contemporary a (...) ..	133
Art of the 1960s. A challenge to Pierre Bourdieu's notion of art reception .....	134
Artification and Its Impact on Art.....	135
Artist Residency: Psychiatric Unit .....	136
Artists and policymaking process: "unacknowledged legislators", or "mad, bad and dangerous"? .....	137
Artists, Singularity and Recognition; a Decade in Portugueses Visual Arts.....	138
Arts and economy: problems of a distinction. ....	139
Arts and Politics: how illustrated postcards were used for propaganda purposes in European societies .....	140
Attitudes of Young Artists toward Public: Communication vs. Romantic Paradigm.....	141
Authority and Orchestration in the literary field. A Network Approach .....	142
Beyond Verfransung: Reflection of Interdisciplinary Cultural Phenomenon in Mauricio Kagel's Antithese (...) ..	143
Body And Visual Image - New Readings: Deconstruction, medium and immediacy .....	144
Constant and Simultaneous Reflexivity as a Dance Professional Competence. Discovering, locating, se (...) ..	145
Contemporary Trends: Between Public Art and Guerrilla Advertising .....	146
Cosmopolitan Individualism: Omnivorousness as Cultural Border-Crossing.....	147

Could Pop Culture be considered as Art Heritage? Japanese Manga as artistic creation.....	148
Creative Infrastructure and Art Market: Practices of Support to the Arts and their Consequences. The C (...)	149
Cultural Diversity in the Globalization Context: The case of the Korean film industry .....	150
Cultural globalization and the practice of translation: Technologies, standards, and routines of audiovisual (...)	151
Culture and Cohesion. How cultural operators access regional development funds in Poland.....	152
Disciplinary imperialism or analytical wrestling: Rethinking semiotics, aesthetics and sociology .....	153
Electro-Acoustic Music Composers and Creative Transformations of Sonic Memories of the World.....	154
eMotion: mapping museum experience - or: How to measure the reception of the art .....	155
Flânerie as a way to explore urban space. Dilemmas and perspectives .....	156
Follow me into the temple of art ! : A sociological account of the performances of multiple museum guides .....	157
Forging Familiar Paths - Cast of Finnish art policy .....	158
From Art experience to art as experience: how three monographic art's museums re-construct their spe (...)	159
From Art to Community: The Implications of Arts Participation for Civic Participation.....	160
From combating to supporting pop music. The paradox of municipal music education in Sweden 1940 t (...)	161
From Identity Politics to Dismodernism- Changes in the Social Meaning of Disability Art.....	162
Horizons and Timelines .....	163
How collective reading practices shape and subvert gender identities.....	164
In what way is the music of Dmitriy Shostakovich political? .....	165
Innovation and experimentalism in cultural mediation: the case of Casa da Musica's Education Services .....	166
Internet, Interactivity and Power: Theoretical Reflections on the Online Encounter of Art Institutions and (...)	167
Is a sociological analysis of works of art possible?.....	168
Is Arts Policy to the benefit of the Autonomous Artist? The Position of Artists in Flemish contemporary (...)	169
Literary writing process and epistemology of artistic practice.....	170
Local Arts, Heritage and Nature in the mountains of Northeast Algarve .....	171
Margin the Border: Streetart in Kosovo and Serbia as an Example for European Societies in Transition .....	172
Memorials and Counter-memorials: Gender, Motherhood and Art in the Israel Contemporary Art.....	173
Museum of Modern Art in Warsaw or keeping up with Europe.....	174
Music and gender in the Greek music folk revival. The case of female musicians today .....	175
Music as human identity indicator.....	176
On arts initiative and artistic policy: a history of institutionalisation, financing and artistic programming o (...)	177
Performing Arts in the Scope Of Mobility: new profiles, practices and roles for artists in the EU .....	179
Postcards: the "stamped picture" in the history of art .....	180
Production, Ready-made and Reproduction: Considering Transformation in Art Works and Art Worlds t (...)	181
Productive Misunderstandings? On Contemporary Art and Science Collaborations.....	182
Promoting Children's Culture - Artistic assessment and peer evaluation and/or regulation and policy ste (...)	183
Public Art, community, Territory: Artistic practices in contemporary public spaces .....	184
Reflections on Art and Science Collaborations.....	185
Self-illusion of the unforgettable aesthetic experience in art museums .....	186
Social Networks and Production of Culture in a Global Environment.....	187
Sociology and Art on the Subject of Dwelling. Similarities and mutual Inspirations.....	188
Strategies and aesthetics: Responses to exclusionary practices in the public art sector .....	189
Struggles on Symbolic Boundaries .....	190
Television drama canonized: critiques of Israeli tv dramas, a case of art field construction.....	191
Territorial Dimensions of the Symbolic Production of Culture: The Case of Visual Arts Reporting in Fra (...)	192
The "Europeanization" of Cultural Policy in Modern Turkey: An Historical and Anthropological Approach.....	193
The "fado" of the Portuguese haute culture: the erudite music as a mirror of semi-peripheral and border (...)	194
The art worlds margins: networks of the portuguese blogger-poets .....	195
The autobiographical role of aesthetics in poverty contexts .....	196

The composer as aesthetic agent: Paul Hindemith in Germany.....	197
The Denial of the Reception of Women in Baroque French Music: New Discoveries of Women Musicia (...) ...	198
The Graffiti Mediator: Debating the Recent Remakes of a Transnational Artistic Practice.....	199
The Impact of Religion and Social Orientations on Visual Arts Appreciation.....	200
The organizational field of popular music festival in Italy.....	201
The role of artist's experience in a research.....	202
The role of the music in the German extremist right-wing movements.....	203
The Ruins of Mitteleuropa: An Investigation into the Cultural Blueprints of the Centre.....	204
The Socially Valued Practice of an Aesthetic Life for Improvising and Jazz Musicians.....	205
The Socio-Artistic Configuration of StreetArt in Israel.....	206
The Visual Arts And The Mediated Public Sphere.....	207
Three cases: how the artist's visibility is shaped by the primary distributors.....	208
Traditional Music Practices and Social Interactions.....	209
Transforming art history elitism: a dialogical experience from the other women in Barcelona.....	210
Transnational realities in the Cinema of the last decades: Portugal as a case study.....	211
Underground music scenes: starting a musician career or partying with friends?.....	212
Vocation and the Artist's profession in the age of complexity.....	213
When is Artification?.....	214
RN03-Biographical Perspectives on European Societies.....	216
"Civil Society Organisations" Spanning boundaries'. The biographical impact of civil society organizatio (...) ...	217
"Heroicized victims": How non-Jewish women in Austria embed National Socialism and the post-war pe (...) ..	218
A sense of belonging - walking, place making and performative praxis.....	219
Art in Action: Exploring Poetry Slam with Ethnographic Discourse Analysis.....	220
Becoming a visual arts teacher in a multicultural European city.....	221
Becoming Cosmopolitanisms in Europe - A Symbolic Interactionist Approach.....	222
Biographical Processes and Supranational Identity Formation in a European Context.....	223
Cross-cultural experiences and exchanges: capacities and identifications.....	224
Cross-generational helping patterns.....	225
Educational and other encounters: narratives of mobility and the biographical significance of internation (...) ..	226
Euroidentities: Transnational Workers in the European Union.....	227
Exploring transformations of worker identities by analysing biographic narratives from industrial worker (...) ..	228
From biographies to social processes. Longitudinal case study analysis.....	229
How to present biographies of the Baltic people at the international level.....	230
Identity transmission in a migratory setting.....	231
Life histories and migration trajectories: Brazilian immigration in Portugal. An overview, presentation of (...) ..	232
Memories Continued and Interrupted: Generations and Social Memory in Latvia.....	233
Men in male-dominated manual occupations in Norway: a comparative perspective on work orientation (...) ...	234
Returns to Places of Birth as biographical work supported by different family generations.....	235
Seeing Community in a Multicultural Society: Teaching about Peopling of Global Cities.....	236
Spatial Semiotics of Difference in Urban Vernacular Neighborhoods.....	237
The "War-Generation" in the period of Cold War. Biographical experiences and political action in Easte (...) ..	238
The Challenge of Translation and Analysis in Biographical Research.....	239
The Here and There of Things. S(h)ifting Fragments of a Narrative Identity.....	240
Through farmers' biographical narratives: towards diversity in the European identities.....	241
Time as a dimension for understanding European diversity.....	242
Towards Social Theory based on Biographical Research.....	243
Translation and the exegesis of terms in transcultural biographical research.....	244
Visual studies of social problems: teaching and research.....	245

Which language should I use when writing on my research? .....	246
Working with bilingual community researchers: issues from a research project.....	247
RN04-Sociology of Children and Childhood.....	248
"Born with skis on your feet" - or becoming Norwegian? .....	249
"I am not like rally, really, really disabled". Exploring Identities of Young Disabled People at School.....	250
"It didn't always work": children's narratives of employment, unemployment and changing family practices .....	251
"There are many worlds in the world": Childhood, Participation and Sociology.....	252
'Why do you think nobody wants to play with Emma?': Persona dolls, participatory methods and metho (...) ..	253
A model to take part The childhood rights. The institution of the civil society at Trento in defense of them .....	254
A short trajectory of research in strange territories .....	255
Above else do not snitch.....	256
Ambiguities in children's citizenship: a dialogue between theory and children's voices .....	257
Assessing European Childhood from Multiple Perspectives.....	258
Asylum-seeking Children's experiences of their social networks.....	259
Between distinction and inalterability: (RE)thinking Child Research Methodologies .....	260
Beyond cultural relativism in the sociology of childhood: the human rights approach .....	261
Categorization and classification of children: the orphan.....	262
Child labour in the Italian press: an analysis.....	263
Child Poverty and Conditional Cash Transfers in Turkey .....	264
Child protection system: tensions, biological bias and children's rights.....	265
Child-led research on trust in social work Methodological reflections and preliminary findings.....	266
Childhood and Bio-politics: Researching children as "life-forms" .....	267
Childhood perspectives of child labour: listening to the voice of children .....	268
Childhood, subjectivity and power in science fiction .....	269
Children and participation: theoretical and methodological perspectives from the Sociology of Childhood .....	270
Children need Brothers and Sisters to Feel Good. Sibship Ensures Enrichment of Relationship .....	271
Children's access to public space in today's London.....	272
Children's epistemological and sociological concepts about books and reading or... how peer groups or (...) ..	273
Children's Everyday Lives and Food Practices in Residential Care: Juggling Tensions Between "Home" (...) ..	274
Children's participation in the traps of cultural diversity .....	275
Children's Programming: what children might expect from television.....	276
Children's subjectivity and welfare: (in)visibility and voice .....	277
Children's Life Spaces in the City.....	278
Citizenship of pupils with intellectual disability in lower secondary schools in Norway.....	279
Constructing childhood in the scout movement - a presentation of a new research project.....	280
Constructing the viewer, making the citizen: young people's relationship with TV news.....	281
Cultural Diversity in Children's Lives: Biculturalism and processes of Mutual Accommodation .....	282
Day-care centre as integrating social institutions for disabled children in Norway .....	283
Developing the Children's Rights Approach: Findings in the Case of Costa Rica.....	284
Digital divides and new "private" frontiers: children and the internet .....	285
Disasters we have had! The importance of place when interviewing children .....	286
Does Religion Count ? Children' Well-Being and Family Life Among Adolescents in a Postsocialist Country....	288
Enhancing Children's Citizenship through Participation: An analysis of professionals, policies and practices ....	289
Ethics of the relationship between the researcher and the informant in observational study of children w (...) ..	290
European Child Welfare Systems - comparative analyses on the meaning of family and the outcomes f (...) ..	291
Experiences and aspirations for how we live citizenship .....	292
Experts of Their Own Lives: The Voice and Representation of Children and Young Adults .....	293
Families with Children and the Changes on Societal Atmosphere in Finland.....	294

Family Law in Germany since 1998: towards an autonomous child? .....	295
Financially oppressive fathers have children .....	296
Foster children's family relations - What are important family relations to a foster child?.....	297
From "genuine childhood" to "age compression": a qualitative content analysis of the representation of (...) ..	298
German Finnish Children and Adolescents and Relationships to Finland .....	299
Growing Community: the social impacts of a school-based kitchen garden program .....	300
Hearing children's voices beyond the adult influence .....	302
How children are seen to behave at home and in day-care? Daily diary method with young children, the (...) ..	304
If You're Happy and You Know It: Young Children's Construction of Emotions .....	305
Informal Education and Volunteer Work of Pupils .....	306
Interviewer-Respondent Interaction and Interactive Skills of Children aged 5 to 11 in Face-to-face and (...) ..	307
Interviewing Children from Enclaves of Poverty.....	308
Living in the Suburbs: Urban Violence from a Child's Perspective .....	309
Men and Fathers - Children's place in men's lives: Childlessness among men is rising. ....	310
Methodological Issues in Researching Childhood and Children's Lives and its Consequences for Child (...) ..	311
Mobilising capitals' Migrant children's negotiation of their everyday lives in Irish primary schools.....	312
Notions of a Proper Child in Finnish Day Care .....	313
On the street: researching childhood and sexuality in Brazil. ....	314
Parenting styles and family structure as risk factors of adolescents' sexual abuse.....	315
Particular Tendencies and Socio-Domestic Aspects of the of Juvenile Delinquency in Romania after 19 (...) ..	316
Photo-interviewing: Usefulness in Understanding a Migrant Child's Perspective of his Culture.....	317
Portraits of children from Europe in the Portuguese press .....	318
Portuguese migrants in Germany: how deceiving can be integration?.....	319
Positioning the Criminal Child - Relational Dynamics of Norm-breaking and Societal Reactions .....	320
Professionals as key holders: Children with communication difficulties and their right to participate in ev (...) ..	321
Reading as a Factor of Primarily Socialization of Modern Russian Children.....	322
Reconceptualising Children's Empowerment in Early Years Daycare Provision: A Comparative Analysis.....	323
Reflecting on research in schools: decisions and dilemmas.....	324
Reflections of a child.....	325
Socializing relations in the family: A comparative study of domestic texts from Norway and China.....	326
Talking about children's strategies to show resistance to teachers in preschool .....	327
The Dimensions of Child Labour in Agriculture and its place in the Work Life in Turkey.....	328
The intersection of children's rights and journalism - an analysis of the Portuguese scenario .....	329
The Place of Non-Parental Adults in Children's Out of School Lives.....	330
The relationship between children's patterns of media usage and their perceptions of the European Union.....	331
The right to work as an "unwritten right" of children.....	332
Trust and power in social and pedagogical work with children: Theorizing (adult's facilitation of) children (...) ..	333
Trust, control and separation in children's after-school care.....	334
Urban Spaces and Childhood: Urban Contexts of Childhood Socialization in Lisbon Metropolitan Area .....	335
Us and Them - Teenagers Constructions of National Identity in Cyprus .....	336
Using the Internet to give children a voice: an online survey of 10 and 11 year old children in Northern I (...) ..	337
Voice and Exit in Children's Lives .....	338
Vulnerable children in family law proceedings: professionals' approaches and children's strategies.....	339
What do children and young people mean by "participation", and why do they do it?.....	340
working vulnerability. Agency of caring children and children's rights .....	341
Young workers risk perception: exploring risks faced by young children at work .....	342
«Here it's like in a family». Children's everyday life between care, fun and control in spaces for children.....	343
RN05-Sociology of Consumption .....	344

"It's more than just the food itself": Expectations and intermediation in the field of eating out.....	345
"What are we to do with new affluence?" The making of Tapiola garden city in the postwar Finland .....	346
Access and appropriation: consumption practices among Portuguese low-wage women .....	347
Are you really sure you do not want another piece of cake? How people react to dietary changes of fa (...) ...	348
Bank Lounges. A Case Of Brand Materialization.....	349
Between ethnicity and mother tongue: Self-images of the Swedish-speaking minority in Finland .....	350
Between singularities and contexts: the (relative) autonomy of cultural consumption.....	351
Between uniqueness and standardisation - gated community as an complex consumer product.....	352
Building an ethically oriented consumption: children produced objects and critical consumption .....	353
Butter in, butter fried, butter on top: Change of food habits and social network relations.....	354
Children's development as consumers of fashion: an ethnographic study .....	355
Class, Cultural Capital, and Consumer Identity. Practices of Wine Consumption .....	356
Consumer policy, consumption practices and consumer society .....	357
Consumers' mode of categorising organic products and the social situation of households: the case of (...) ..	358
Consumer's Riskological potential like characteristic of economic behaviour.....	359
Consumer's Place in the Mall: Reflections of the Global and the Local in four Shopping Malls in Ankara .....	360
Consuming Distinction. The Constitution of the Italian Middle-classes through Housing, Food and Cultu (...) ..	361
Consuming food and global elite culture.....	362
Consuming Individuals, Consuming Societies: Theories of Consumption and the Wider Economy .....	363
Consuming spa in Norway - paths to beauty and health .....	364
Consumption and contemporary distinction.....	365
Consumption and gender: a late-Wittgensteinian view.....	366
Cooking with Bimby: food practices, competences and kitchen technologies .....	367
Cultural Participation: Changes Between 2001 and 2007 in Changing European Union .....	368
Department stores and the early consumer society in Imperial Germany. A discourse analysis of the G (...) ...	369
Distinction through omnivorous musical tastes in Germany: A grounded theory approach to cultural om (...) ..	370
Domestic, European, and American music consumption in EU countries; trends and explanations.....	371
Educating for sustainable consumption .....	372
Ethnic Differences in food consumption.....	373
Food consumption: The connections between religion and food in modern societies.....	374
Future patterns of sustainable food consumption. How consumers' visions are embedded in practices.....	375
Gender and digital gaming: how girls, boys and their parents account of their everyday practices and lo (...) ..	376
Generative Concept of Agency .....	377
Globalisation and the effects of variety: a comparison of Britain and France .....	378
Going Hybrid: An Analysis of Consumer Purchase Motivations .....	379
How big is the fence around music genres? An empirical analysis of people's classification of artists an (...) ..	380
In-school Marketing- selling calories for a captive audience.....	381
Included or Excluded? Poor Youth Consumer's Accounts on Living in a Consumer Society.....	382
Increasing consumer awareness: A review of the Danish campaign One Tonne Less .....	383
Life patterns in contemporary society: a conceptual and operational proposal .....	384
Life Style Differentiation in the Netherlands.....	385
Liquefying Space: The Cultural Politics of 'Loft' Marketing .....	386
Looking Russian or Estonian? Young consumers constructing the ethnic "self" and "other" .....	387
Mapping the art museums' consumption and perceptions.....	388
Moralising New Parents, Moralising Markets: Consumer Culture and the Moral Contours of Early Paren (...) ..	389
Negotiating marginality through consumption.....	390
New and future cultural consumers: The Cultural Consumption and Practices of children aged 6-14 in (...) ....	391
New Perspectives of Consumption: The Ecological Consumer.....	392

Nordic Democracy of Taste: Cultural Omnivorousness in Finland .....	393
Political Consumerism in Israel: The Case of the Religious-Secular Struggle Over the Sabbath .....	394
Political Consumerism or Political Co-optation? Mediating and Mainstreaming Fair Trade .....	395
Re-regulating consumption in a time of crises: An exploration of post neo-liberal regulation.....	396
Semantic of naturalness - re-assuring consumers of a risky food production .....	397
Smoking as an adaptation - rationality and habituality of smoking in manual work.....	398
Social Stratification and Cultural Preferences: National Cultural Capital and Taste in Music in Israel .....	399
Sociological theories and food insecurity: A practice theory approach.....	400
Sociological traditions, taste and new cultural connections .....	401
Some aspects of modern tourism: a sociological review .....	402
Stakeholders' perception of consumers' barriers to energy saving.....	403
Sustainable consumption by online trading: The example of eBay .....	404
Symbolic value as destruction of wealth - Are Bataille's concepts and insights relevant to the sociology (...) ..	405
The "Bimby phenomenon" and the change in food consumption lifestyles .....	406
The Consequences of Cultural and Economic Resources for Tastes and Cultural Participation .....	407
The consumer boycott in Spain - Theoretical reflections and empirical results .....	408
The consumption of aesthetic surgery in Italy: old gaps, new vocabularies .....	409
The contemporary estheticization of products through the shop window-dressing. Parfois: A case study (...) ..	410
The habitus of taste. The blurring of cultural consumption practices.....	411
The image of the consumer role, constructed by motivational research and marketing.....	412
The Lisbon oriental waterfront renewed: Parque das Nações as a metropolitan territory of leisure and c (...) ..	413
The Mcdonaldization of Tourism. An inquiry into the tendency of young people to choose "rationalized" (...) ..	414
The Moral Economy of Consumption in Europe: A Multilevel Analysis across 19 European Countries.....	415
The Paradox of the Shopping Mall in Ankara: The Restrictive But Inclusive Quasi-Public Space of ANK (...) ..	416
The rise of ethical fashion: a sociological perspective .....	417
Transformations of Fashion: On the rise of a new democracy in fashion and its consequences .....	418
Understanding ethical consumption as public participation: institutions and behaviours.....	419
Virtual consumption, real meanings: an ethnographic research about consumption in Second Life.....	420
Visual arts appreciation patterns: crossing horizontal and vertical boundaries within the cultural hierarchy .....	421
What will happen to luxury consumption?.....	422
Wine consumption in semi-public daily life Porto.....	423
«Dematerialization», technology and listening experiences in musical consumption practices .....	424
RN06-Critical Political Economy .....	425
A European Variety of Capitalism as Normative Socio-Economic Construction.....	426
Back to the Future: Can American-Style Consumer Capitalism Be Saved? Should It Be Saved? .....	427
Comparing Britain and France: The Institutional Mediation of the Moral re-valorisation of Islamic Bankin (...) ..	428
Critiques to Concrete - Problems in Constructing Post-Crisis Policy.....	429
Disintegrative Effects of European Monetary Integration.....	430
Economic Crisis and Economic Nationalism.....	431
Everyday Finance in Varieties of Capitalism: A sociological analysis of the credit crisis.....	432
Financial Crisis - Comprehending the past, Raising the future.....	433
Global Finance and Modes of Development in Europe .....	434
Globalisation, EU Enlargement and the Challenge of the Financial Crisis: East-West Migration and the (...) ..	435
How many solutions to how many crises? The European labour movement vis-à-vis the financial turmoil .....	436
Keeping the Aspidistra Flying: The Political Economy of Capital Accumulation in the United Kingdom.....	437
Labour and the Locusts - Emerging Contestation of Financial Governance and Capital Market Liberalis (...) ..	438
Moving beyond the Crisis: The Mondragon Cooperativist Group .....	439
Parasitical economic relationships in the transitional economies: aggravations in the conditions of econ (...) ..	440

Participation and self-management as a strategy for mitigation, reconstruction, prevention and social d (...) ..	441
Past and Future of the European Social Model .....	442
Post-industrial class action in a context of crisis .....	443
Responses to global economic crisis - a verdict on "transition" .....	444
The contradictions and tendencies within state responses to the current crisis: the case of Germany .....	445
The Credit of the State .....	446
The critical in critical IPE research: Progressive Constitutionalism and immanent critique .....	447
The Financial Crisis and the Re-Regulation of the European Financial Service Markets: The Hour of He (...) ..	448
The Global Financial Crisis and the Irrelevance of European Integration Theory .....	449
Varieties of banking aid measures .....	450
Why economic sociology matters to understand the financial crisis (and what should be done according (...) ..	451
RN07-Sociology of Culture .....	452
"A Black Voice": Rap Music and the Construction of Identity among Israeli-Ethiopian Adolescents .....	453
"Cybernetic" cultures of the self - the rise of a new individualism .....	454
"Discreet Multiculturalism" of Poland and the intercultural dialogue in the activity of Polish NGOs .....	455
"It makes you laugh but it's not funny": French audiences and American comedy .....	456
"Making the Europeans": cultural identity and cultural policy between institutional narrative and banal E (...) ..	457
"What is the problem with you?" Accepting culture diversity in Alto Adige .....	458
"Who crushed the Pope" "An art", "a work of art", and "an artist" in a press discussion about jubilee exh (...) ..	459
'Binge' Drinking, Neo-liberalism and Individualism .....	460
A Comparative Study of Images and Representations of Foreign countries in European and U.S. Media .....	462
A cultural sociology of emotions in the art market .....	463
A sociological conceptualization of personal reflexivity .....	464
A tool of analysis for investigating cultures in an inter-cultural and trans-cultural perspective: towards a (...) ..	465
An Exercise in Symbolic Geography: A Cultural Map of Serbia .....	466
Between reflexivity and habits: sociological theory of everyday life .....	467
Beyond the power-colonial-pattern: performing culture in the postcolonial context .....	468
Concepts of Identity in a pluricultural nation - the case of Ecuador .....	469
Conflicting Visions of the Cultural Identity of Europe in Romania .....	470
Cosmopolitanism in Spanish society - An analysis of its profiles and determining factors .....	471
Creative Cities: An opportunity of regeneration .....	472
Cultural Boundaries in Turkish Death Announcements (1970-2006) .....	473
Cultural Performance, Audience Contestation and Bob Dylan's Reputation during the Electric Turn (1965-6) ...	474
Cultural planning in Italian small and middle towns .....	475
Cultural Sources of Subjectivity .....	476
Culture as a Space of In-Between .....	477
Culture, Life-World, and the Constitution of Symbolic Power .....	478
Cultures in interaction: The circuit of science news from the scientist-journalist 'co-production' to the public .....	479
Debatable aspects of the cultural globalization .....	480
Declaration of "me-ness" - A search for individuality through involvement in tattooing in post-transforma (...) ..	481
Demassification in contemporary modernity .....	482
Detraditionalized selves. A comparative analysis .....	483
Developing a Common European Identity using Technology-Based Education: Learning@Europe .....	484
Digital amateur photography as a new communication medium (in the example of Moscow State Muse (...) ..	485
Embarrassment as a Sign of Lack of Embodied Culture in Performance: the Case of Dance .....	486
Embracing the Postnational Nation: The creation of Swedish "National Day" .....	487
Erected by Attalos II King of Pergamon 159-138 B.C. / Destroyed by Barbarian Invaders from the North (...) ..	488
Europe in our pockets: national identity and European currency .....	489

European construction through culture, mobility and people circulation: the case of Erasmus students i (...) ...	490
Feminine male teachers'. A study on the gender relatedness of cultural preferences and practices of FI (...) ...	491
Friendship and public space: a private form of social capital.....	492
Generational differences in ethnic and religious attachment and their interrelation among Muslim minori (...) ..	493
Hybridity as a cultural form of individual subjectivism.Trapped between cultural heritage and transnati (...) ...	494
ICT for Cultural Heritage Communication: Investigating the Impact .....	495
Identity performances of the global elite and the power of the local - Everyday actions of white German (...) ..	496
Ideology and Subjectivity in Fantasy Literature .....	497
Image of Foreigners. Adolescent's attitudes and socializations of diversity .....	498
ImagEnation of the Czech DNA .....	499
Importance of the Visual: ocularcentrist orientation and its research methodology.....	500
Individualistic Metaphors in Conflict: Controversies of the Authorship Perception in Contemporary University ..	501
Language change among Catalan young people .....	502
Looking for "A place in the sun": The Italian way to the soap opera between global and local issues .....	503
Magic as a social institution and the mechanisms of its "self-defense" .....	504
Making Music Together - Performance and Aesthetic Dimensions of Social Action in Alfred Schütz .....	505
Making sense of the procedural footprint of the making of and implementation of cultural policies: a met (...) ..	506
Masks as Important Elements of European Cultural Heritage .....	507
Media and reproductive health. How Italian media establish the social reality of the infertility and its soc (...) ..	508
Mediating Regional Identities; The Popularity and Legitimacy of Regional Television .....	509
National Homogeneity in European Economic Cultures .....	510
Nepantla Sociology .....	511
Perception and meaning in the transformation of museums ? a performance analysis of exhibitions in e (...) ..	512
Performing Cultural Cosmopolitanism: Pop-Rock Cognoscenti.....	513
Performing Power: Public Authority Styles in Finland 1945-2005.....	514
Performing the belief in contemporary dance .....	515
Performing the Enterprising Self - Cultural Hegemony in Times of Uncertainty .....	516
Photographing the Past: the power of the photos in the public inscription of controversial events .....	517
Portugal's cultural policy in the beginning of a new century .....	518
Portuguese Cinema and its publics .....	519
Portuguese Manifest Destiny: The immaterial cultural heritage in a global material dominant culture .....	520
Power in organizational culture .....	521
Powerpoint and the Performance of Knowledge.....	522
Public culture as the answer to calls-problems .....	523
Public Sphere as Assemblage: Assembling Political Cultures.....	524
Publishing studies and theoretical modelling: the case for a Portuguese case .....	525
Qualifying the Impact of 'Commercialization' on the Cultural Coverage of Dutch, French, German and U (...) ..	526
Recreational sexuality as an upper middle-class distinction mechanism .....	527
Rehabilitating Discredited Culture: The Endurance of Distinction in British Comedy .....	528
Reification of Autonomy: Picture Frame as Media.....	529
Religion in Education - between integration and conflict .....	530
Rethinking cultural value.....	531
Scenarios on the Appearance of a Global Civilization .....	532
Social Behaviour as Foundation for Social Relationships.....	533
Social Network Sites and the rise of networked individualism .....	534
Social Networks and cultural exchanges: the phenomena of Couchsurfing .....	535
Social Uses of Internet: Hierarchies in the Digital Life .....	536
Sociology of Culture, Heritage and Identity.....	537

Southern Adriatic and EU. Integrating an anthropology of the absence .....	538
Sports, Identities and Governance. Football and nationalist attitudes within the Basque Country and Ca (...) ..	539
State management in cultural policy of Russia .....	540
The 1940 exhibition of the 'Portuguese world' in postcards. The Portuguese global in a Lusocentric vision .....	541
The biasing effect of overreporting cultural behaviour in standard surveys on cultural and arts participat (...) ..	542
The Culture-Based Developmentt (CBD) Theory and Method of Expressing the Link: Culture as a Reso (...) ..	543
The establishment of the mass media as major players within the art field of the 1960s. A challenge to (...) ..	544
The field of "Philosophical practices" in Italy.....	545
The hidden and illuminated object: publishing as enunciation and prescription of the book .....	546
The hybridisation of culture.....	547
The medical control in visual sources of Soviet Russia in 1930s .....	548
The New Norwegian Work and Welfare Administration. Knowledge sharing and cooperation. ....	549
The process of European integration. Perceptions and evaluations of italian military élite .....	550
The Re-creation of Coimbra´s Touristic Imagery: a Process Based on Its Centuries-Old University as th (...) ..	551
The Relationship Between Prison Officers and Prisoners .....	552
The role of images to building the "enemy" .....	553
The Self-Presentation of Amateur Football Players of Turkish Origin in Berlin and the Reconstruction o (...) ..	554
The Social Appropriation of Internet Technologies .....	555
The social structuring of lifestyles: an analysis of cultural lifestyles, based on both attitudinal and behav (...) ..	556
The special case of Switzerland. A narrative which constituted Swiss national identity, and its present use.....	557
The Varieties of Reflexive Experience .....	558
Underground Impulses : Czechoslovak non-official musicking from 1968-1989 .....	559
Urban representations of troubled histories: Lisbon and Shanghai .....	560
Which cultural policies for planning diversity and territorial development?.....	561
Why (not) me? - Logics of selection within the pop music industry .....	562
Worlds, fields and networks .....	563
«Warce» Theatre: between cultural activism and artistic aspiration.....	564
RN08-Disaster and Social Crisis.....	565
An account of scientific transfer to the industry: the co-development of an incident analysis tool.....	566
Built utopias: the rise and fall of large-scale collective housing in Serbia.....	568
Collecting Quality Data: Do Researcher Profiles and Training Avoid or Create Bias? .....	569
Commemorating La Tragedia. Public and Private Memorial Strategies of the 1999 Floods in Venezuela.....	570
Communication Analysis of Two Spanish Political Crisis: The Ecological Disaster of the "Prestige" and (...) ..	571
Critical Events Information Process: Public Image Transmitted by the Media of the Institutions Concern (...) ..	572
Defining criteria to characterise activity domains: refining Perrow's assumptions .....	573
Effects of the Media Communication in Crisis Catastrophe Situations .....	574
Experiencing mass social riots and/or protests: the collapse of the Greek parliamentary democracy for (...) ..	575
Exterminism or Utopia: E. P. Thompson´s pacifist strategy.....	576
Extreme weather events: Disaster information - or disastrously informed? A diagnosis of shortcomings i (...) ..	577
From forgetting to remembering disaster: the controversial construction of 'discreet memory' in Seveso .....	578
Infrastructures and their failures: mobilizing various knowledges of risk .....	579
Main insights in risk research in Spain: conceptual, methodological and applied research advancements .....	580
Nuclear culture in Spain.....	581
Perceiving Terrorism: Media Coverage and Emotional Responses to the Gungoren and Aktutun .....	582
Planning for Sustainable Settlements along the River Bengawan Solo, Java Island, Indonesia.....	583
Professional emergency responders and unorganized volunteers: incident sites as meeting places .....	584
Resettlement and violence: collateral damages of a well intended humanitarian intervention in Maratan (...) ..	585
Risk Perception, Extreme Events and Institutional Trust in Portugal.....	586

Risks and catastrophes: Attitudes and behaviour in society .....	587
Social impact assessment for natural disaster management.....	588
Social Impact of Disasters in Holistic Perspective .....	589
Speeches and silences of the disaster. Ethnography of the 1999 floods in Cuxac d'Aude (France).....	590
Survivors' and Relatives' Perceptions of Justice in Post-Disaster Trials .....	591
The Distomo Slaughter: Memory, Politics and the Struggle for Closure.....	592
The implementation of new security technologies: the Spanish case.....	593
The socio-psychological ability to be resilient .....	594
The Tsunami-Factor: A Natural Disaster acts as a moderator of the strength of intention-behaviour relat (...) ..	595
Towards Ontological Empiricism in Crisis Management Training.....	596
Watermarks - Floods and Memoryscape in Santa Fe (Argentina).....	597
Ways to remember disasters - inclusions, exclusions and hierarchies.....	598
What Difference Do International and Cross-Disciplinary Teams Make to Disaster Research Practice? .....	599
When public policies demand local populations remember previous flooding: an interdisciplinary research .....	600
RN09-Economic Sociology .....	601
"Crime and Punishment": Enforcement and Compliance in the European Fisheries .....	602
(Re)Defining Corporate Social Responsibility: Beyond the "Business Case" .....	603
Consumers' Cooperatives Directors and Managers: Sociological Profile.....	604
Customer Oriented Approach in Russian Small Business.....	605
Delocalized R&D units within multinationals: an insight on trajectories of innovation.....	606
Does Managerial Capitalism Matter? .....	607
Economic Crises - Global and Local - In Reflection of Polish Press.....	608
Financial Agents with reduced liability - Powerless investors' - towards a critical sociology of economy.....	609
Financial crises in Denmark, Finland and Sweden: 1990-93 and 2008- compared.....	610
Financial Crisis and Systemic Risks: Towards an Economic Sociology of the Crisis' .....	611
Financial Crisis or Crisis in Relationships: A Clash Between Chain Stores and Their Suppliers in Russi (...) ..	612
Financial Crisis, Financialization and Comparative Capitalism.....	613
Financial octopus: emergence and development of the present financial crisis .....	614
Forms of Capital in the Making of a Bourgeoisie: A case-study .....	615
Global Financial Crisis: Complexity, Dilemmas and Regulatory Failures .....	616
How Credit Institutions Look at Society. Economics, Sociology and the Problem of Social Reflexivity Re (...) ..	617
Human and social capital as intermediate variables of economic development.....	618
Human Capital or Discrimination? Labor Market Entry Disadvantages of Second-Generation Turkish Mi (...) ..	619
Inter-ethnic differences in finding the first job by personal contacts .....	620
Is the Killer Art Market Killing Art? .....	621
Islamic Ethic and The Spirit of Capitalism in Turkey: Is it Possible?.....	622
Judgmental vs. Credit Scoring Systems in Evaluating Credit Applications - Outcomes on the Micro and (...) ..	623
Labour regimes in European Advanced Economies: labour markets, carework and welfare states .....	624
Leadership and innovation in economic organisations .....	625
Leveraging Time: Money, Credit and the Crisis of Value.....	626
Local Clusters and Corporate Social Responsibility .....	627
Logic of social capital: the formation of market culture and structure .....	628
Looking back to the future? Or: (what) can we learn from unemployment in former state-socialist societ (...) ..	629
Looking for the keys to the black box of price for medical service (the example of Moscow dentistry) .....	630
Obligations and Expectations: Active Citizenship, Welfare Provision and the State .....	631
On the other side of the Subprime Crisis: How German people save and invest money? And what are t (...) ..	632
Pressure, Trust and Gift - Vertical Supply Chains an Global Price Pressure .....	633
Primitivization of Organizational Forms as a Coping Strategy: Russian Retail Trade Under the Economi (...) ..	634

Professional power and rent seeking: Theoretical assumptions and empirical findings on Polish insolve (...) ..	635
Quality Conventions and Price Formation in the French Online Advertising Market .....	636
Quick lesson on deregulation of financial markets. The case of mortgage borrowers led consumer upris (...) ..	637
Rethinking the demand and supply matching: How revolving accounts have turned into a credit dedicat (...) ..	638
Science on a journey from one change to another: epistemic cultures amidst the global science capitalism .....	639
Skybridge and Grounded Angel: European econo-culturescapes .....	640
Social Construction of Innovation (SCI): Portuguese Cases in Technologic-Based Organizations.....	641
Social Inequalities in Modern Russia: Problems and Perspectives .....	642
Strong Ties, Weak Ties and the Management of Innovation .....	643
Structural-normative dimensions of the spread of rural entrepreneurship in transition societies. The Cas (...) ..	644
Tax Bureaucrats and Their Clients: Changes in Taxpayers and Tax Inspectors Relationship in Russia .....	645
The banking system's monopolization of consumer credit in France: From face-to-face credit to econo (...) ...	646
The culture of risk: Private benefits / Public damages .....	647
The decommodification of humans, hell and ferocity: Notes and observations about empty markets .....	648
The financial crisis and Petrobras's Social Responsibility Policies .....	649
The Impact of Globalization on Rural Poor in Turkey: The case of Social Risk Mitigation Project .....	650
The institutional shape of regional SME-based sectors in Spain.....	651
The World on a Calendar: Coordinating the Global Art Market through Time, Events, and Location.....	652
Trust in Financial Markets and Financial Professionalism: Lessons from the Subprime Crisis .....	653
RN10-Sociology of Education .....	654
A Sociological Inquiry of Wants in Educational Choices.....	655
Academic Achievement and Ethnic Minorities in England .....	656
AIDS Knowledge and Sexual Activity among Flemish Secondary School Students: the Effects of Type (...) ..	657
Are doctoral students creators of new knowledge? Implication of New Policies on Social Sciences Doct (...) ..	658
Becoming a "lifelong learner" - Trajectories and identities of individuals in today's European societies .....	659
Changes in Higher Education: Quality Assurance and University Change.....	660
Changing values in higher education.....	661
Curriculum Reform and New Textbooks in Turkey: Nationalism in an Interactive Education .....	662
Democratisation of School Education in Portugal.....	663
Discussion on Russia's participation in Bologna process.....	664
Earning or learning? Russian students' secondary employment research.....	665
Education and training for lone parents in the Republic of Ireland and Northern Ireland .....	666
Education for Active Democratic Citizenship: a Clash of Practices and Definitions' (European guideline (...) ..	667
Educational choice at the end of primary school. Does the primary school matter? .....	668
Educational inequalities and political representation in European countries; the case of England and D (...) ..	669
Effects of school organization on the unequal outcomes: A qualitative study in a primary school in Istan (...) ..	670
Equality matters: teachers' constructions of professional identities .....	671
Ethnicized Culture, Curricular Imagination, and Divisive Patterns of Schooling .....	672
Europe's challenges in education and culture in 21st century: Consulting Theodor W. Adorno .....	673
Exit Exams - neither a panacea nor a curse .....	674
Expansion and contraction. The development of higher education in Eastern Europe between 1950 an (...) ..	675
Experiences of Textbook Scanners: Is Scanning a way for Transformation and a Tool for Human Right (...) ..	676
Family school investment and schooling context: at the crossroads of family and school strategies.....	677
Female or Male Teacher: A Determinante of Gender-specific Differences in Primary School Achievement .....	678
Fragmentation of higher education in Brazil: new public higher education in Piauí.....	679
Higher Education and Development - Students of the Portuguese Speaking Countries (PALOP) Diaspo (...) ..	680
Higher education in the world countries: the analysis of international statistics and the results of the glo (...) ..	681
Higher Education Success and Failure in Portugal: The Confirmation of School Trajectories and of the (...) ..	682

Hiring from within: institutional inbreeding and its consequences at Russian universities (empirical evid (...) ...	684
Identifying factors influencing school success in lower- and upper-secondary Romanian schools .....	685
Imagined futures among youth from immigrant families: vocational choice, expected and aspired mobili (...) ..	686
Increased Involvement of Parents in School Activity and in their Children's Education .....	687
Intercultural education for all? An investigation of the impact of school composition on intercultural edu (...) ...	688
Interculturalism and Cultural Translation as key-concepts of Transnationalism of Education .....	689
Internationalization of Higher Education in Taiwan: Rationales, Strategies and Responses.....	690
Legitimacy of Public Education: Recent Shifts in Comparative Perspective.....	691
National Truth of PISA: The OECD PISA Study in Finnish media discourses.....	692
Organizational identities and the quality processes in three Russian universities.....	693
Overcoming educational inequalities: Differences among mixture, streaming and inclusion .....	694
Parents Associations, Social Reproduction and Interculturality: Notes from a Sociological Research.....	695
Pedagogic relation changes and challenges: from classroom interaction to the broader sociocultural context ..	696
Perspectives and issues of an 'European' higher education proposal.....	697
Profiles of leadership and democratic school .....	698
Pupil-teacher communication in secondary schools: Evidence from Latvia .....	699
Qualification and occupational position. An international comparison using EU-LFS data.....	700
Quality and Inequality in Eastern European Education Systems.....	701
Quality of teaching - representations and proposals for action: an exploratory study with students from (...) ...	702
Researching Teaching Quality in Higher Education: Ethical and Methodological Issues .....	704
Restructuring the Governance of Portuguese Schools (1998-2008): Policies and Practices.....	705
Revolutionary change or imitation? Social context of educational change in Poland .....	706
Russian Universities and Internationalization of Education .....	707
School Choice and Social Class: The Impact of Education Systems on Patterns of School Choice.....	708
School performance, social inequalities and ethnicity:The children of Cape Verdean and Indian immigr (...) ...	709
School Quasi Market processes and actors' justification about differentiation .....	710
Schools and Immigrant Families: Complex Relations.....	711
Selectivity and flexibility in the German secondary school system: a configurational analysis of recent d (...) ..	712
Self-Esteem of Academic and Vocational Students: Does Inter-School Tracking Sharpen the Difference? .....	713
Shaken, not stirred. A sociological framework for relating school compositional features to school deviance....	714
Social selection during the transition from primary school to secondary education stage: effects of antis (...) ..	715
Structural Impacts on Individual Outcomes: How National Characteristics Influence Student Learning .....	716
Success rates in Portuguese Higher Education.....	717
Systems of Exclusion - Immigration and Inequalities (a multilevel analysis) .....	718
Teacher Trust as an Indicator of Social Inequality in Secondary Education?.....	719
The Bologna Process and the New Legal Regime of Higher Education Institutions in Portugal .....	720
The changes in educational policies and its effects on higher education market in Portugal .....	721
The Curricular Knowledge Construction in Portugal. Historical, Economic, Social and Cultural Features .....	722
The impact of ethnic differences on social relationships in school classes .....	723
The impact of globalization on knowledge and education through international surveys and assessments .....	725
The importance of social and cultural capital for educational performance: Eastern vs Western Europe .....	726
The induction phase in teacher's careers in Flandres .....	727
The late construction of a hybrid vocational and educational training system in Spain .....	729
The Lisbon Agenda as the roadmap of the European education systems .....	730
The perceived (un)desirability of segregated schools: who really wants segregation? .....	731
The Role of Family Factors in the School Success of Pupils with low Psychological Involvement in Education..	732
The role of social capital in applicants' strategies in Russian regional markets of higher education .....	733
The role of suggestion in the process of socialization .....	734

Underschooled youths and adults in Portugal and Brazil: targets of the same logic of conformity.....	735
Understanding Contemporary Educational Changes in Europe .....	736
Voices from within school - young peoples' room for citizenship within reconfigured educational and so (...) ..	737
Welfare-oriented education policy - Wind of change in the relationship of education and social policies i (...) ..	738
RN11-Sociology of Emotions .....	739
"I've got him ..." - Emotions/affects in online mediated love markets: A poststructuralist approach .....	740
"It doesn't feel right - emotional regime and bureaucratic empathy in the Swedish Migration Board".....	741
"You won't mention it, will you?" - On emotional and ethical dilemmas in doing biographical research .....	742
'Emotional Liberation' Among Women Peace Activists In Israeli Society .....	743
A Sensual Economy of Emotions: Commodified connections in Buenos Aires's international tango scene .....	744
A Sociology of Happiness: reflections and perceptions .....	745
Affective communication, social and biological roots.....	746
Authority Styles as Emotional Regimes: Finland 1945-2005 .....	747
Bullying, bystanders, emotions and ethics.....	748
Collective Construction of persons between Habitus and Emotion .....	749
Comte, Durkheim and social affectivity .....	750
Conceptualizing grief sociologically .....	751
Desexualization and sexualization within phases of formalization and informalization .....	752
Discourses of Emotion in Israeli Soldiers' Testimonials.....	753
Emotion Sickness. Pro-Ana Virtual Communities .....	754
Emotion: development of the mind and physical expression .....	755
Emotional aspects of work life and professional career.....	756
Emotional Encounters between Children and Social Welfare Professionals .....	757
Emotional Geographies of Teacher-parent Relations: A Case Study in Taiwan .....	758
Emotional labour and emotional strain among Swedish prison officers.....	759
Emotional spaces.....	760
Emotional Value of Body Image and Self-Esteem .....	761
Emotions and Crime Media Narratives: Shifting Focus to Victims .....	762
Emotions and Ethnicity: Hurt Identities in a Post-War-Society .....	763
Emotions and Everydaylife: The "Homo Sentiens" Floating between Late Moderns Ambivalences .....	764
Emotions and Habitus of Officers in Fictional Literature .....	765
Emotions and Narrative Interview Techniques in Organization Research.....	766
Emotions as cognitions and the consequences for the sociology of emotions .....	767
Emotions as the 'glue' and substance of solidarity .....	768
Emotions at work as a key-factor of well-being in the workplace. An empirical study of local health servi (...) ..	769
Epistemic Feeling, Knowledge and Communal Ethics.....	770
European Re-Writes and Emotions .....	771
Everyday life on the Internet: A conceptual framework for exploring interpersonal communications and (...) ..	772
Facilitating the emotional dynamics of trust, status and power: Toward sustainable processes in integra (...) ..	773
Fear as Social emotions and as social change operators .....	774
Fear, disgust, shock. Politics of affect in the self-fashioning process of religious and secular Muslims .....	775
Financial Satisfaction in Old Age: A Satisfaction Paradox or a Result of Accumulated Wealth? .....	776
Gender, Emotion Work, and Collective Identity in the Soldiers' Mothers NGOs in Russia .....	777
Gendered agency and emotions in the field of care work.....	778
Happiness .....	779
Identity at Crossroads: An Insight into Romania.....	780
Imitating Life or Art: Were spectators' effective in affectively transforming the 'Zidane incident' into civic (...) ..	781
Internet and the plot of resentment.....	782

Management of emotions in organizations. ....	783
Management, dispositions, and particular emotions: Young managers of Lisbon.....	784
Managing Mixed Emotions in the Layered Ritual Reality of Networking Events.....	785
On Friending and Feelings: Civilised, managed or relational emotions in everyday life? .....	786
On the Multiple Causes of Emotional Ambivalence .....	787
Painful emotions and a problem drinking father - considering emotions in the life story interview study o (...)	788
Probing emotions within a sociological identity perspective. Getting at both narratives and everyday life (...)	789
Recognising domestic workers: the impact of emotions on everyday life.....	790
Sexualised violence, cultural meanings and emotions .....	791
Shame and Guilt Feelings: What is there to be learnt from psychological research?.....	792
Sibship as a Mental Health Factor in Families - Emotional Enrichment of Sibling Relationship.....	793
Social relationships and trust in asylum seeking families with children .....	794
Sport as a mode of emotional involvement between nations. An Emotional Sociology's approach to Int (...)	795
The "Unfinished Sentences" Technique in Studying the Loneliness Phenomenon .....	796
The city-as-montage in the labyrinths of memory. An exercise of dragging Braga's postcards from their (...)	797
The emotionality of friendship in the workplace and the impact on the organisational life .....	798
The Metropolis and Mental Strife - measuring the effect of urban living and conformity to emotion norm (...)	799
The risks of the risk society: Regressive ego and fear of freedom .....	800
The role of social emotions in the regulation of drinking. An analysis of young adults' drinking diaries.....	801
We love them, we use them, we kill them - Ambivalent emotions towards animals .....	802
What kinds of norms are "emotion norms"? Steps towards a taxonomy .....	803
What makes us modern(s)? The place of emotions in European societies of the past and the present .....	804
Working with "Quality" - how Lean and Appreciative Inquiry initiatives change social and emotional rela (...)	805
RN12-Environment and Society.....	806
"Rivers are Ours" versus "Rivers are Flowing in Vain" - Conflict over Water Governance in Eastern Bla (...)	807
"Walking on two legs" to the accreditation of CDM? Institutional histories of CDM accredited projects in (...)	808
'Laboratories' for advancing and studying public formations in sustainable development.....	809
Alternative Agro-food Networks: A New Knowledge-based Agro-food Paradigm?.....	810
Alternatives to individual car travel: an environmental attitude? .....	811
Animal welfare: social challenges due to this new concept .....	812
Animal-farming practices and consumer trust in Finland .....	813
Assessing Joint Knowledge .....	814
Attitudes towards animals' rights in Portugal: the influence of social values .....	815
Biological Transfer Agreements and environmental governance: implications for biotechnological research.....	816
Birds of a feather? Food and agricultural risk governance of avian influenza in different EU Member States ...	817
Building Alternative Agro-Food Systems in Hungary .....	818
Building sustainable local food networks in unsustainable environment as a lesson for post-transition c (...)	819
Challenges in incorporating the social dimension in a transnational sustainability project. The case of th (...)	820
Climate change and sustainable consumption - Consumers being torn between increasing environment (...)	821
Climate change: risk perceptions and mass media discourse configurations in Lithuania .....	822
Climate Policies and the Politics in the Design of Markets of Carbon Credits .....	823
Complexity, uncertainties and vulnerabilities in contaminated places decision-making in Portugal and Brazil ...	824
Corporate social responsibility as a business strategy: Stora Enso-WWF partnership project .....	825
Critical aspects of risk theory facing environmental conflicts.....	826
Crucial social and cultural environment of ecological tourism (case study).....	827
Debating a Dam is Debating Dams - Internet environmentalist discussion group on Alqueva dam, wher (...)	828
Does social morphology improve environmental sociology? Origin and future of an old European sociol (...)	829
Energy Efficiency and Renewable Energies in the Context of Communes: Scope of Action and Local E (...)	830

Ensuring Environmental and Social Sustainability of Private Sector Projects: A Comparison of Existing (...)	831
Environment Policy and Governing Nature - Government or Governance?	832
Environmental Attitudes of Urban Dwellers on the Danube River in Vojvodina: Regional aspects, Socio (...)	833
Environmental citizenship and citizen-consumer: Individual actor's role in the environmental question	834
Environmental Citizenship, Natural Resource Governance and Transforming Politics of Sustainability	835
Environmental concern: Empirical analyses on measurement approaches and attitude structure	836
Environmental Issues and Social Capital. Local communities and agricultural development in economic (...)	837
Environmental policies and citizens' participation in Spain	838
Environmental public policies and public awareness in Portugal: a scenario of contradictions	839
Environmental representations and responsabilization in children's books	840
European's Perceptions of climate change and global warming: A micro-macro analysis	841
Experiencing the Global Dimension of Sustainability: Intercultural Dialogue and Competence Developm (...)	842
Farmers facing climate variabilities and changes: the case of groundwater users of coastal aquifers in (...)	843
Food, feed or fuel - experiments on sustainable development alternatives at Finnish farms	845
Forested commons and «deserted» communities ? Is it environmentally wise to have an increasingly d (...)	846
From denunciation to institutionalization. How biodiversity becomes a public issue?	847
From individual to collective change and beyond? Ecological citizenship and politicisation	848
From structural factors to individual practices: reasoning on the main paths for action on energy efficiency	849
Game Theory with Real Game: engaging with deer and biodiversity in the UK	850
Gardening as a consumer power in Finland and Britain	851
Global warming and the case of sea-level rise in New Orleans and The Netherlands: Social reaction- a (...)	852
Globalization of Wild Nature As a Perennially "New" Dreamland: The Ugory Project in Kostroma (Russia)	853
GMOs in Lithuanian Public Opinion and Mass Media Discourse	854
Governing Ignorance: Decision Making in the Restoration of Industrially Contaminated Landscapes	855
Greenwashing - delusive environmental publicity in times of climate change. A comparative analysis of (...)	856
Handling Challenges of Scale in Eco-Tourism	857
Has ecocentrism already won in Europe?	858
How much does it cost?	859
Implementing the Socio-Economic Considerations Claude for Regulatins Genetically Modified Organis (...)	860
Intercultural Perspectives. The missing link in the discussion about Sustainable Nature Management	861
Is Environmental Justice the Main Force for Local Sustainability?	862
Litter in your park: a community based model of sustaining the quality of green areas in cities	863
Local Sustainability and Public Participation: The Role of Municipalities in population's engagement pr (...)	864
Making environmental risks governable. A comparative study on transboundary risk regulation	865
Managing the Chemical Risks with Consumer Goods: The Dual Role and Dilemmas of Member Organi (...)	866
Moral regulation of water pollution in Finland since the 1960s till 2000	867
Mosquito control in France: a socio-technical controversy between environmental preoccupations an (...)	868
Natural resources, valorisation, and co-production in the dynamics of rural-urban relations	869
Nature re-enacted: exploring the dynamics of public participation in environmental monitoring	870
Networking for renewables: local resources and innovative technologies in rural development (A first ca (...)	871
Participation - the missing component of the Romanian environmental NGOs	872
Participation in environmental decision making processes between instrumental and substantial rationality	873
Possibilities for collaborative learning through the establishment of an informal science-policy communi (...)	874
Practice meets community: the role of community-based organisations in stimulating sustainable practi (...)	875
Public Participation in Environmental Decision Making Processes in Israel and the Role of NGO's in Sh (...)	876
Public Participation in UK Land-Use Planning: Empowerment or Social Control?	877
Public support for nature protection: its social and personal dynamics and its role in environmental change	878
Quality of Life and Socioenvironmental Degradation in the Cantareira System Environmental Protected (...)	879

Rebelling against McDonaldization of Agriculture.....	880
Restructuring Food Supply: Food, Sustainability and Supermarkets.....	881
Scientific information and collective action in socioecological conflicts .....	882
Social Choice and Climate Change: An international sociological assessment on climate change public (...) ..	883
Social learning and sustainable water management: evidence from three watersheds in the State of Sã (...) ..	884
Social Perceptions of Chimpanzees in Tombali (Guinea-Bissau, West Africa): a sociological contributio (...) ...	885
Social sustainability and rural bioenergy production in Finland .....	886
Sociological Aspects of the Introduction of Biofuels for Transport.....	887
Stakeholder Consultations in the European Governance of GMO in the Food Chain: A Democratization (...) ..	888
Sustainable Development Strategy and Sustainability Reporting connections with Corporate Governance.....	889
System Theorizing and Environmental Governance in the EU.....	890
The blind game of decentralization in European environmental policies - Community-based institutions (...) ..	891
The conceptual shifts in environmental social sciences after the 1960s onwards.....	892
The Coupling of the Chronic and the Acute: Environmental Problems, Disasters, and Leadership .....	893
The Dog that Could not Bark .....	894
The Ecological Consequences of Neoliberal Urban Politics and the Impact of Mega-Events in the Third (...) ..	895
The energy co-provision in Italy: an irreducible technological asymmetry?.....	896
The German "Tafel" - a sustainable way to deal with food affluence?.....	897
The Impact of EU Sustainable Development Policies on Subsistence Households .....	898
The Making of Finland's Programme on Sustainable Consumption and Production - Rethinking delibera (...) ..	899
The Norwegian Whaling Controversy: Claimsmaking, Framing, and Science in International Environme (...) ..	900
The politics of facts: environmental conflicts and expertise .....	901
The protestant legacy in man´s relationship with nature: from romanticism to ecologism .....	902
The Sustainability Concept in Latin-America Social Theory: a preliminary analysis.....	903
The water flows of island Dugi otok: Governing, managing and using water on the small Adriatic island.....	904
Thinking about future challenges for Finnish natural resource policy .....	905
Towards a Culture of Sustainable Consumption: A Transdisciplinary Approach to Organizational and In (...) ..	906
Understanding Adaptive Capacity as a Dynamic Institutional Process: A Case Study of an Arctic Gatew (...) ..	908
What Can We Learn From the Welfare State? An Empirical Investigation on Climate Policy .....	909
Wildlife-Human Conflict in Guinea-Bissau: how social perceptions can be determinant for successful co (...) ..	910
RN13-Sociology of Families and Intimate Lives.....	911
"Children, a burden or a blessing? Divorce and the mental health of ex-partners" .....	912
"Preference models in social support networks in Spain" .....	913
"We Are Family Too!" Same-sex relational claims in Portugal .....	914
'The Question of Children': Individualization and Voluntary Childlessness.....	915
'You don't get sick of your colleagues' - Workplace and work content in the strategies of work-family co (...) ..	916
(Why) Do lesbian women and gay men (not) want to have children?.....	917
A New Love Affair Life Style? An Empirical Test of Pure Relationship from the Italian Context.....	918
A Theoretical Approach for Work-Family Balance .....	919
Acting up and acting out: encountering children in a longitudinal study of mothering .....	920
Analysing Multiple Perspectives in Qualitative Longitudinal Research with Families .....	921
Are There Class Differentials in the Time Invested in Children and Attitudes towards Parenting? .....	922
Attitudes toward family planning in late adolescence - Hungarian perspective .....	923
Balancing Job Mobility and Family Life: The effects on household division of work.....	924
Bargaining couple's fertility: men's accounts .....	925
Being Alone Mother by Choice .....	926
Beyond motherhood: transforming sexualities and developing intimacies while maintaining transnationa (...) ..	927
Carework as a shared social task and as a key to more egalitarian gender contracts .....	928

Changes in identity and social networks during the transition to parenthood. An empirical assessment i (...) ...	929
Changing family formation patterns in young generation in Russia: State and Legislation Responses .....	930
Children's School Enrolment: How Do Opportunities Within and Outside the Family Affect First Graders (...) ..	931
Configurations of the most intimate relationships and their personal significance.....	932
Conflicting or unified? Couples' response to policy measures related to fertility and family in the Czech (...) ...	933
Conformity and innovation in the relationship to family norms in the gay and lesbian "co-parenthoods" .....	934
Continuity and Change in 20th Century Irish Family Lives: Individualization or Adaptation? .....	935
Coresidence between generations among migrant families in France: The role of cultural norms and ec (...) ..	936
Critical analysis of the indexes and items on gendered violence in heterosexual couples in Spain.....	937
Definitional processes and negotiations in family elderly care.....	938
Development and dynamics of the family in Europe.....	939
Development and dynamics of the gender relationship in Europe.....	940
Divorce in urban and rural areas: Are there regional differences? .....	941
Does the way family is experienced relate to the lifecourse or a social background? .....	942
Don't put all your eggs in one basket! Strategies to cope with unstable work-life balance .....	943
Downward transfers: Financial support for children and grandchildren .....	944
Economic transfers in cash and kind in Andalucian families .....	945
Educational heterogamy: What are the consequences for the rearing of and relation with children in the (...) ..	946
Facing ambivalence: women's narratives about physical and emotional violence in family relations .....	947
Families at stake: childbirth's effects on families' income and parents' participation in labour market wit (...) ..	948
Family and gender in Europe: trends of convergence and divergence comparing countries .....	949
Family Diversity and Individualisation after Socialism - Two Generations of Bulgarian Women Negotiat (...) ...	950
Family instability in the immigration context. The life course of immigrant single-mothers after a conjug (...) ...	951
Fathering in shared residence after conjugal breakup: balancing paternal autonomy and co-parenting.....	952
Fertile minds in infertile bodies: social constraints, procreative wishes and life choices of infertile couple (...) ..	953
Fertility control and improved partnerships? - A discussion of how the possibility to exercise "negative" (...) ...	954
First marriage and marital disruption in Italy: the role of non-family living .....	955
From deliberate choice to forced acceptance: the recourse of parents to health professionals in time of (...) ..	956
From tradition to modernity - Changing family patterns in Spain (1995-2006) .....	957
Gender inequality in time and responsibility dimensions of housework.....	958
Gender, divorce, parental responsibility and children guardianship. A study of cases .....	959
Gender: processes of conjugal conflict and parental power .....	960
Giving and receiving among adult family generations: The balance of intergenerational exchange across (...) ..	961
Have you thought about breaking up your relationship? Intention to divorce from a multi-country perspective ..	962
Health and Well-being of Children of Interethnic Unions in the UK: Evidence from the Millennium Cohort (...) ..	964
Here, now, and then: Grandparenting, time and social exclusion.....	965
How to Combine Mobile Jobs with Family Lives. The Consequences of Job-Related Spatial Mobility on (...) ..	966
Intergenerational transmission of social attitudes in a detraditionalized society.....	967
Intimate relationship transitions, gender, and political participation and interest.....	968
Is a family type based affirmative action needed and possible? Analysis of school situation of lesbian a (...) ...	969
Is New Fatherhood the same as Active Fatherhood? Experiences from Slovenia .....	970
Lithuanian transnational families: how to remain a family?.....	971
Living in couple in Portuguese families.....	972
Lodging forms along life cycles: a comparative view across the Europe.....	973
Lone father families. The relation between work and family .....	974
Lone motherhood- gender, class and welfare in transition .....	975
Mobility aptitudes along the life course: a cross-sectional analysis of the process of becoming spatially (...) ..	976
My Choice or theirs? Work Intentions and Network Members during the Transition to Parenthood .....	977

Obituaries and the rule of genealogical proximity .....	978
Of selection and affinity: rethinking family and family relations in an intergenerational perspective.....	979
Old people families in the city of Lisbon: solidarity networks and social class.....	980
Parenthood and social class in Finland .....	981
Personal values and attitudes towards family, marriage and gender roles - two decades of changes in t (...) ..	982
Rationalised violence in intimate partnership.....	983
Reconciling work and family in Portugal and Spain: two pathways in Southern Europe .....	984
Reflections about doing well. Continuity and Change in the Culture of Parenting from Social Actor's Per (...) ..	985
Researching different stories about family work .....	986
Sex inversion in heterogamy or when the wife is the more highly qualified spouse .....	987
Sociability, sexuality, self: relationality and individualization.....	988
Social relationships and trust in asylum seeking families with children .....	989
Successfully reconciling work and family: Recipes from Portuguese dual-earners .....	990
The absence of the absent father and the presence of the present mother, seen from a child's perspective ....	991
The Division of Labour Among European Couples: The Dynamics of Values and Practices .....	992
The division of paid labour in same-sex couples in the Netherlands .....	993
The division of household labour and patterns of social support in the family.....	994
The influence of the family of origin on the intermarriage attitude: A sibling analysis of the Netherlands .....	995
The making of men and fathers within a qualitative longitudinal study of life transition, masculinities and (...) ..	996
The notion of "culture clash": Difference and belonging in families of mixed racial, ethnic and faith Back (...) ..	997
The restored family - Ambivalent intimacy in post-divorce family configurations .....	999
The Right Thing to Do. How Post-Divorce Fatherhood is Morally Reasoned from the Viewpoint of Every (...) ..	1000
The Timescapes of Personal Lives and Relationships: The Temporal Turn in Social Enquiry.....	1001
The transition to parenthood and well-being.....	1002
There's no example for parenting, We always fail: dilemmas of parenthood in the beginning of the XXI f (...) ..	1003
Time, money and well-being in families with children in Finland .....	1004
Trends of family formation in contemporary Lithuania: reflection in mass-media .....	1005
Turkish divorces in Denmark. Investigating gender and power across transnational spaces.....	1006
Union Disruption: The Effect of Homogamy and the Division of Housework on the Gendered Nature of (...) ..	1007
What does it take to become an adult in Europe: crossnational analysis of norms and attitudes using th (...) ..	1008
What is the use of marriage for lesbians? The challenges of same sex marriage for lesbians in Spain .....	1009
Whats sex got to do with it? .....	1010
Working mothers in Europe: Working time, preferences, gender norms and housework.....	1011
Young people's expectations for the future: gender divisions, identity and social change .....	1012
RN14-Gender Relations in the Labour Market and the Welfare State .....	1013
'Mavericks' and 'Motley Crews' - Careers of Men and Women Working at the University-Industry-Interface.....	1014
Academic career as a gendering process of individual trajectories .....	1015
Barriers to the achievement of women's potential in their working lives: evidence and policy implication (...) ..	1016
Between choice and compulsion - Polish women in the employment structure .....	1017
Between Family and the Labour Market: The Changes in Gender Role Attitudes in the Light of Welfare (...) ..	1018
Compromises between work or family among women in temporary employment.....	1019
Different models of Welfare State, work-life balance public policies and gender equality- the case of par (...) ..	1020
Divergences of French and Spanish women experiences on the labour market: the case of the second (...) ..	1021
Educational expansion, sex segregation and the initial occupational placement of women and men - ch (...) ..	1022
Gender and age as barriers to labour market participation.....	1023
Gender differences and equality issue in Europe: critical aspects of gender mainstreaming policies and (...) ..	1024
Gender discrimination in Italian labour market: results from a national survey.....	1025
Gender segregation in the labour market: the case of ICT employment .....	1026

Gender Wage Inequality in Germany and Great Britain. Results from a Cross-National Comparison bet (...)	1027
Gender, Care and the Labour Market; The Changing Partnership between the State and The Family .....	1028
Gender, Work and Family: Fast forward or replay? .....	1029
Gendered labour market developments in business services. An empirical analysis based on longitudin (...)	1030
Gendered Organisational Cultures for women engineers researcher in gendered societies in Europe .....	1031
Getting on or getting out? The impact of gender on promotion decision-making among older workers in (...)	1032
Glass Ceiling Effect and Wages - The Gender Pay Gap in Management Positions in Germany .....	1033
Global Economic Crisis and the Aggravating Circumstances of Turkish Women Textile Workers.....	1034
Highly educated dual earners - myth or reality? An investigation of cross-national variations in educatio (...)	1035
I'm a mother not a worker ..... for a while (?) Back to the role conflict. An analisys of female paths bet (...)	1036
Occupations in the new service sectors: a portrait of current gender inequalities .....	1037
Parental benefit, fertility and female labour market behaviour .....	1038
PhD, Career and Families - How do PhDs in Switzerland manage family and work life? .....	1039
Public science, private science and S&T gender segregation in Europe.....	1040
Shared physical custody of children after divorce and labour market opportunities of parents .....	1041
Supporting working parents and parenting workers: European welfare states promoting the reconciliati (...)	1042
The "feminisation of poverty" - a study of lone parents in the Republic of Ireland and Northern Ireland.....	1043
The 'invisible army' of domestic workers: women's work in a global recession .....	1044
The Ambiguities of Gender: Nurses and Primary Teachers Professional Identities in Europe .....	1045
The balancing act between work and family life across Europe: Gender differences in perceptions of w (...)	1046
The careers of female aerospace engineers: 'managing like a man'? .....	1047
The Gendered Construction of Technical Self-Confidence: Women's Negotiated Positions in Technical (...)	1048
The influence of the development of the service sector on female employment in Europe: An empirical (...)	1049
Towards the adult worker model? Gender specific employment orientations and constraints within low-i (...)	1050
Who is flexibel in the labour market? .....	1051
Why being a superwoman does not pay: commonly used coping strategies that do not reduce work-fa (...)	1052
Women in Science and Technology: How to make male dominated disciplines attractive for female stu (...)	1053
Women in the Sandwich Generation in Europe: main tensions and new pressures upon recent socio-ec (...)	1054
Work engagement, work family enrichment and gender in Portugal and the UK .....	1055
RN16-Sociology of Health and Illness .....	1056
"Is separation always a reasonable action? Exploring the link between marital quality, divorce and ment (...)	1057
"New" ageing populations: An emerging arena in the interface between ageing and health.....	1058
"Switching and swapping faces": towards emotional literacy within the 'performance' of midwifery.....	1059
"You are free from unwanted side-effects". Alternative medicine acknowledged as a no-risk health regime.....	1060
A new sociological and policy Model for Chronic Disease Management (case Diabetes) in Europe com (...)	1061
A qualitative study of physician perspectives on risk communication in preventive encounters - results f (...)	1062
Accountable for one's sickness. Political and medical transformations of the "sick role" and its implicati (...)	1064
Alternative and Complementary Medicine in Portugal: patterns and logics of consumption .....	1065
Between conservation and transformation: considering the role of patient groups in the regulation of health ....	1066
Care of parents and care regimes .....	1067
Changes in occupational class inequalities in health among ageing employees - The Helsinki Health Study ....	1068
Coherent health politics: A societal and individual challenge! .....	1070
Diagnosis of an urban quarter: data and approaches for heqalth promotion and prevention in a disadva (...)	1071
Differences in Health Seeking Strategies among the Urban Poor: The Turkish Case.....	1072
Diffusion of health-related habits: Changes in gender, educational, and urban-rural inequalities in non-s (...)	1073
Discretionary Death: Its Patterns and Professional, Legal, and Ethical Challenges.....	1074
Divorce, divorce rates, and professional care seeking for mental health problems in Europe .....	1075
Doctor and HIV-POSITIVE Women: Practice of Interaction .....	1076

Doing autoethnography in health research: finding the reflexive "I" .....	1077
DRAFT 2009-02-18 18:09:08.....	1078
Effects of short-term and long-term unemployment on health behaviors. Evidence from a panel study .....	1079
Embodied illness and the problem of the informant's authority.....	1080
Engaging infoscapes in health - a perspectivist outlook on the lay mapping of health and medicines info (...) ..	1081
Experiences of Drug Addicts Regarding the Medicalization of Addiction .....	1082
Exploration of the impact of a large reduction in alcohol prices on hospital admissions related to alcohol .....	1083
Failing bodies, sleep and health .....	1084
Far away or close together? Women's Health Movement and Feminist Associations .....	1085
Fetal subjects: Pregnancy, substance abuse and interventions in Finland .....	1086
Gender and health of French workers: consequences for society and ways for a European policy to mo (...) ..	1087
Gender Equity and Depression in Europe .....	1089
Generational Changes in Ethnic Health Inequalities in UK.....	1090
Health and Life Expectancy Differences: Portugal, Spain; Italy and France.....	1092
Heterosexuality and Gender in HIV Mass Media Public Campaigns .....	1093
How to Mainstream gender policies into healthcare? A comparison of governance in England and Germany... ..	1095
Hybrid knowledge in the mental health field .....	1096
Increasing rates of organ donation among ethnic minorities: community attitudes and challenges for he (...) ..	1097
Increasing sales of selective serotonin reuptake inhibitors are closely related to increasing number of p (...) ...	1098
Inequalities in Self-assessed Health and Chronic Illnesses: A Study of Eleven European Nations .....	1099
Infertile bodies: women's experience and medical discourses.....	1100
Integrated community care and emotional exchange networks: The theory and practice of mental health (...) ...	1101
Interprofessional Conflicts in Home-Care: The Case of The Provincial Health Authority of Cosenza (Italy) .....	1102
Lay knowledge about Malaria in Mozambique.....	1103
Maternity and child health care in transition. Institutional ethnography on Finnish changing care practices .....	1104
Medical Services for Vulnerable Groups: Expectations of MSMs and SWs in Moscow and Orenburg re (...) ..	1105
Mental illness is not always an illness - lay rationalities about mental suffering: a sociological study in th (...) ..	1106
Mood Disorders and the transforming mental health care in Finland: The case of education and guidance .....	1107
Negotiating Madness:Doctors, patients and the construction of gendered insanity in fin de siècle.....	1108
Outsourced Services and Hierarchy in the Finnish Primary Health Care .....	1109
Over-education in Europe: how stable is the impact of education on depression? .....	1110
Paediatric medication: the new European regulations.....	1111
Parental Education and Adulthood Obesity .....	1112
Parental health and social inheritance. The effect of parental disability on sibling correlation among Fin (...) ...	1113
Patient as individual or part of the hospital machinery -tensions in hospital ward .....	1114
Personalised healthy diets and practices of eating. Facing a genetic turn in dietary advise .....	1115
Pets in the context of individual-related services .....	1116
Power and Resistance: Privatising Postcommunist Health .....	1117
Practical knowledge about health: an interplay between lay and science rationalities .....	1118
Pregnancy prevention, reproductive health risk, and morality: a perspective from public sector women's (...) ..	1119
Problems and difficulties of immigrant's access to health care services in Lisbon.....	1120
Professional vulnerability and analysis of the well-being in the nursing profession in Belgium .....	1121
Psychoactive drugs in General Practitioners' and Psychiatrists' medical practice: building a profession (...) ...	1123
Reflections on the History of Medical Treatment of Opioid Addiction in Finland .....	1124
Reorganizing modes of action in community child and adolescent psychiatry .....	1125
Reporting on public health education and research capacity: a pilot.....	1126
Research engagement, dissemination of activism and health governance: the case of rare disease org (...) ...	1127
Risk and ideologies of prevention: contextual rationalities in the consumption of therapeutical resources.....	1128

Risk behaviors and social representations on health among portuguese population .....	1129
Should all citizens be treated with antidepressants? Explanation possibilities to the increasing antidepressant use .....	1130
Social Class and Health Inequalities in Portugal .....	1131
Social inequality in obesity: An exploration of practices related to health and personal bodyweight in cohabiting couples .....	1132
Social networks and the deinstitutionalization of mental patients .....	1133
Sociological and Ethical Aspects of Clinical Trials - From the Nuremberg Code to ICH-GCP Guidelines .....	1134
Struggling to remain independent - How Finnish women told about early retirement in their illness narratives .....	1135
Suffering bodies: an exploration of the missing link between the body and self-identity in the dying process .....	1136
System disintegration, social disintegration and health in the former Soviet Union.....	1137
The "double burden": a qualitative study about unhealthy prisoners in Italy.....	1138
The (opaque) practices of taking care of personal health: empowering laypeople through technology .....	1139
The access to fertility treatments in Portugal: patients' uses and meanings .....	1140
The demand for aesthetic surgery in Italy: a quantitative and qualitative analysis .....	1141
The Impact of Professional Identities, Professional Dialogues and Interaction within the Health, Social and Cultural Context .....	1142
The implementation of medical advances: the constitution of Intensive Care Medicine as new speciality .....	1143
The meanings and the logic of the processes of the new competitive practices in the Finnish primary health care .....	1144
The mutual expectations of GPs and their patients in lifestyle counselling: results of focus group discussions .....	1145
The Pleasures of Nightlife Tourism.....	1146
The Role of Education and Generalized Trust for Psychological Well-Being in West-Europe .....	1147
The Role of Trust for Choices of Additional Health Resources in the Conditions of Educational and Cultural Context .....	1148
The striking stability of disease prestige rankings.....	1149
The Trouble With White Pants: Reconsidering medicalisation through the menstrual suppression debate.....	1150
The universalisation of the access to health care services and the persistence of health inequalities among different social classes .....	1151
Youth's health with respect of migration: finding from Swedish study.....	1152
RN17-Industrial Relations, Labour Market Institutions and Employment.....	1153
Analysing security and flexibility in labour markets: an expanded institutional approach .....	1154
Collective Bargaining, Inter-Sectoral Heterogeneity and Competitiveness: A Cross-National Comparison .....	1155
Collective bargaining: empirical and theoretical approaches .....	1156
Comparison of nine workplace harassment protocols in Spanish companies .....	1157
Determinants of Social Pacting in Western Europe (1974-2005): An Event-History Analysis .....	1158
Employers' organizations and their access to decision-making power at the EU level.....	1159
Employment and Labor Conditions among Highly Skilled Workers, from Flexibility to Precariousness: A Cross-Country Comparison .....	1160
European Urban Public Transport: Towards a single European employment model .....	1161
European Works Councils as Actors in Intra-Company Negotiations .....	1162
EWC and the crisis: new and old dilemma concerning worker participation.....	1163
Explaining Bargaining Behaviour and Outcomes through an Articulation Index.....	1164
Factors and Trends of Work-Related Security in Russia .....	1165
Finnish Trade Union Responses to Labour Migration.....	1166
Globalization and Labour Relations in Portugal.....	1167
Immigrants and the new "Reserve Army of Labour": Public Actors and the Regional Gatekeepers of the Labour Market .....	1168
Institutional Dynamics and Social Dialogue in France and in Europe.....	1169
Interregional Trade Union Councils between Portugal and Spain - a Portuguese viewpoint of an ongoing process .....	1170
Kinship ties, intra-firm and inter-firm relations: empirical insights from small and medium-sized family businesses .....	1171
Labour Relations in Russian Business Organisations .....	1172
Labour, Globalization and Inequality: Are Industrial Relations Institutions Still Redistributive?.....	1173
New regulations on worker representativeness in Luxembourg .....	1174
Overtime regulations of our time - a cross country comparison.....	1175
Preconditions for Pacts on Income Policy: Bringing Structures Back in. A Comparison of Western European Countries .....	1176

Privatisation of public services and the impact on employment and labour relations: the examples of th (...)	1177
Protection and flexi-security: an inquiry on the modernization of Spanish employment public services .....	1178
Restructuring processes in the household appliances industry and worker participation at European level.....	1179
Social Pacting in Times of Crisis.....	1180
Social Pacts: The case of Portugal .....	1181
State and Industrial Relations in Southern Europe .....	1182
Struggles against the closures of companies in boom and crisis of finance market capitalism and new f (...)	1183
Success and pitfalls of a large scale union recruitment strategy: a French variation of the organizing agenda..	1184
The Field of Industrial Relations and the Challenge of NGOs: The Case of the Clean Clothes Campaig (...)	1185
The future of the European level collective bargaining .....	1186
The impact of international labour standards on national rhetoric, regulation and expectations: the case (...)	1187
The impacts of European Works Councils in Portugal.....	1188
The Internationalisation of Enterprises from a Legal Perspective.....	1189
The Paths of Labor: The Unintended Effects of Organizational Change in French Trade Unions .....	1190
The reason for aiming at a system of European Industrial Relations based on a mix of direct and repres (...)	1191
The right to strike: fundamental principle or fetter?.....	1192
Three Worlds of Polish Industrial Relations .....	1193
Transnational Framework Agreements: New Forms of Participation in Multinational Companies?.....	1194
Unions and the Reform of Public Administration and Public Service Employment: The Portuguese Case.....	1196
Women and trade union positions - warm welcome or hitting the glass ceiling?.....	1197
Workplace bullying: a new health risk at work? .....	1198
RN18-Sociology of Communications and Media Research .....	1199
"Cybernaut" Diaspora: Arab Diaspora in Germany.....	1200
'EUconomic' crisis? EU integration and management in the Southern European and Brussels press.....	1201
Bringing up Father: The Italian Habit of Buying Format and the Repercussions in the National Televisio (...)	1202
Communicative acts: analysis of gender relationships today. A theoretical concept to analyse the impa (...)	1203
Construction of the President´s image in the internet: comparative analysis of Russian and USA conditions....	1204
Culture of argumentation and social imaginary: implications for citizenship in European Society.....	1205
Deconstructing contemporary myths: Communications and Mediations .....	1206
Detemporalization and Despatialization - The Radical Transformation of Time and Space by New Medi (...)	1207
Eastern European Internet Networks and the Reception of Social Theory Trends and Topics; on some (...)	1208
Eu e os Outros .....	1209
Euro-English: Problems and Ways Out .....	1210
European elections in Italian media: between second order campaign and the construction of a Europe (...)	1211
European On-line Journalism: A Tension between the "Old" and the "New" Media Profession.....	1212
EUTube: Communicating Europe through online video.....	1213
Exploring the influence of Europeanisation on media in Turkey: Changes and challenges in mediations (...)	1214
Facing the Nation: Creation of Internet Citizenship in the "Glocal" .....	1215
Family interaction surrounding media: between adolescents´ autonomy and paretal control .....	1216
From the backstage into the limelight - Media and justice relationships in contemporary Portugal.....	1217
Good stories and good characters, not good music. A research on music and media in Italy .....	1218
Internal communications against the economic crisis - the case of a financial organization in Portugal .....	1219
Invisible Europe - Patterns in German TV Annual Reviews 1999-2008 .....	1220
Local newspapers in foreign language as a hybrid media of intercultural communication .....	1221
Measuring media concentration for the purposes of ensuring pluralism and diversity .....	1222
Media and Ethnicity - a portuguese magazine for african women .....	1223
Media Use Index, a comparison across 50 countries .....	1224
Music 2.0. Some insights regarding the Portuguese scenario.....	1225

On-line communities and Media social environments.....	1226
Online children in the news: a comparative view on 13 European papers .....	1227
Participation by internet: A Research on the Web Sites of Political Parties in Turkey .....	1228
Political Marketing and Media Politics: Symbols, Spectacle, and Citizens' Apathy .....	1229
Pragmatics of Public Sphere(S) - Mediating Facts on Europe for the National Public .....	1230
Protecting childhood in the digital age. The limits of UK state regulation of the global advertising and m (...) ..	1231
Publicness' Public .....	1232
Restructuring Information and Communication Network in the Public Realm: The Practice of e-governm (...) ..	1233
Symbols of Statehood, Legitimation, and Power in the Depiction of Heads of State in German and US- (...) ..	1234
The Intellectual Labour in the Age of Digital Remix .....	1235
The Media Construction of Europeanization in the Context of Tendentious Modernity .....	1236
Understanding Virtualization Challenges: Identities of "Virtual Worlds" Makers .....	1237
Valuing responsible photography or privileging immediate spectacle? The case of World Press Photo.....	1238
Virtual Communities as a Technological Corollary of the Global Environment.....	1239
RN19-Sociology of Professions .....	1240
'Boundaryless careers'. Polish professionals on the Irish labour market .....	1241
'Making a Difference': A comparative study of UK nurses' work orientation, motivation and commitment .....	1242
A socio-material analysis of the impact of electronic patient information systems on the practice of health (...) ..	1243
All for medicine. Gender, Time and Professional Identity in Hospital Medicine in the UK .....	1244
Autonomy in work in different professional groups: trends of the decade (1998-2007).....	1245
Bringing in gender, class and ethnicity into theorizing about professions.....	1246
Changing Professional Autonomy in the Context of Institutional Change.....	1247
Comparative Perspective about University Professors and Professional Ethics. Research Projects in S (...) ..	1248
Constructing a profession in the contemporary context: a case study of forensic practitioners .....	1249
Contemporary art curators: a nonstop reshaping leading profession in the artworld. Globe trotter curators.....	1250
Deontological and methodological research questions in sociology of professions .....	1251
Determining and Implementing Optimal Skill Mix of Health Professionals: A Comparative Examination (...) ..	1252
Doctors in construction: medical interns in the early stages of their career .....	1254
Drawing Cultural Maps to Professional Parish Diaconal Work .....	1255
Dynamics of intervention of the human resource manager within the context of mobility: risks, challeng (...) ..	1256
Elements for the discussion of the "entrepreneurship movement" in Portugal: the professional group of (...) ..	1257
Employability and professional insertion' paths: characteristics and structuring elements. The case stu (...) ..	1258
Employment and earnings among male nurses and engineers: differences by gender and ethnic backg (...) ..	1259
EU constitutional project and the new "Status Activae Civitatis" of Legal Professions in Europe .....	1260
Expertise-based judgments and individual responsibility in organizations: the case of psychiatrists in prisons..	1261
First Line Managers Conditions of How to Handle Ethical Dilemmas in Social Work and Police .....	1262
Five years in the EU: how does it show in the changing relations within health workforce .....	1263
Gaining specific know-how in teacher education .....	1264
Governing a Health Professional Work Force in Flux: Policy Dynamics and Employment patterns in Me (...) ..	1265
Governmental Control of Professional Work.....	1266
Harmonizing occupational regulation in the EU transport sector: institutions, participants, and outcomes .....	1267
Headmaster leadership in public schools: complexity and change.....	1268
Health professions, the state and the family: a comparison of the governance of home care services in (...) ..	1269
How do social and ethnic background and gender affect the choice of educational field?.....	1270
Human capital of Socio-Professional Groups as a Factor of Modernization of Russian Society .....	1271
Human Resource Management: a professional field of "good people".....	1272
Internal globalization of nursing: flexible professionalism in the second age of modernity.....	1273
Is there such a thing as "universality" in the attempt to sustain professional identities? The case of engi (...) ..	1274

Itineraries of Portuguese Public Prosecutors in the social areas: profession, professionalism and functi (...)	1275
Job satisfaction in social services: The importance of recognition and organizational support .....	1276
Joining professional arenas. Accountants, engineers and HR professionals in Italy and England.....	1277
Key metaphors in the sociology of professions: Occupations as hierarchies and landscapes .....	1278
Knowledge and experience in the "knowledge society" - About the relationship of these categories with (...)	1279
Knowledge Professions between Market professionalism and Professional Autonomy : the adequatio (...)	1280
Learning gaps in a learning organisation - professionals' values versus management values .....	1281
Legal Profession and the Nation-State: What Role for Access to Justice and Guarantee of Rights? .....	1282
Medical decision making and intra-professional negotiation: an analytical model.....	1283
Medicalization in Action: an Ethnographic View on the Profession of Midwife in Italy.....	1284
Migration of Health Professionals - the emergence of transnational professionalism .....	1285
Moral ties and market constraints. On the professionalization within the cultural industries in Germany (...)	1286
Negotiations on intra-professional relations - Cultural categorizations, segmentation and hierarchies.....	1287
New arenas, old arguments - science-practice interplay in care work.....	1288
Nurses in elderly care: Motivation and job satisfaction .....	1289
Open Heart Surgery. The impact of performance data in cardiothoracic surgery.....	1290
Overcoming the double bind of the sociology of professions.....	1292
PhD and Career - How adequate is the job-situation of professionals holding a PhD in Switzerland? .....	1293
Portuguese psychologists in search of the self-regulating monopoly's data from an exploratory approach (...)	1294
Portuguese young psychiatrists and trainees: The creation of new professional frames and social identi (...)	1295
Practice Shock - Empirical and Theoretical Considerations .....	1296
Professional / Vocational Training in Russia: towards new approaches.....	1297
Professional learning trajectories.....	1298
Professionalisation of academic (self)administration and the persistency of doing gender.....	1299
Professionalism as Justification .....	1300
Professionalism patterns in the Internationalization of Information Work .....	1301
Professionalization of Science and Technology Park Management: The Interplay of Globalization and (...)	1302
Professions and Welfare State: The Social Educator and the Social Graduate .....	1303
Professions in transnational health policy making: conceptual and methodological issues .....	1304
Professions on the move, Migration and new Masculinities: The case of Iraqi refugees in Jordan.....	1305
Professions, Leadership and the Public Interest: The Case of Healthcare.....	1306
Public Service Transformation and Changing Professionalism in Finland: Experiences from the Third Sector..	1307
Reconnecting Professional Occupations with Professional Organizations: risks and opportunities.....	1308
Respond strategies to the new logics of the market - further investigation of tourism professional's indiv (...)	1309
Restratification revisited: the changing landscape of primary medical care in England and California .....	1310
Russian Doctors: Social Attitudes and Strategies for Adaptation .....	1311
Science Careers - International Mobility importance .....	1312
Scientific Bureaucratic Medicine (SBM) and Medical professionalism .....	1313
Small fraction jobs - is that what women health care workers want?.....	1315
Social anthropology à la russe: education, scholarly discipline, occupation.....	1316
Social Mobility of Scientists in Russia, Europe and the USA in the XXI Century.....	1317
Social Workers in late modernity - reconstructing a professional practice.....	1318
Space, curriculum and occupational socialization: theoretical perspectives on professional learning and (...)	1319
Standardised communication tools as an aide to facilitating "calling for help" and the escalation of care: (...)	1320
Studying the Role of Professional Associations in the Process of Healers Professionalization .....	1321
The Career of Open Source Software Developers .....	1322
The Coming of the Proto-Professions - A Third Stage of Professionalization? .....	1323
The construction of nurse's professional worlds; Comparing France and Japan evolving conventions .....	1324

The different ways of academic professionalization .....	1325
The emerging of a professionalization process in health: the case of cardiopneumology technicians in (...) ....	1326
The French Stockbrokers between the Market and The State: a Lost Profession.....	1327
The internalization of careers - TRANSMOBILITY in the life-science world .....	1328
The persistent importance of Knowledge in professional projects. A case study from nurses in Portugal .....	1329
The professional divide in the societal reponse to child maltreatment - observations from Germany .....	1330
The Reform of the Auditor Profession in Spain: What must we Study?.....	1331
The role of the Russian business in formation and development of a new professional model (an indust (...) ..	1332
The social standing of new and traditional occupations in Greece: A Weberian approach .....	1333
The Specific Professional Conflicts of Teachers and Doctors within the Portuguese Reform of the Publi (...) ..	1334
The Why and How of Professionalism: Coaching as an Emerging Occupation .....	1335
Trust and collaboration in hybrid home care organization' staff empowerment or subordination .....	1336
Trying to define a profession: the Police.....	1337
Women in the Bar: A Comparative Study of Finnish and Polish Legal Practice From Gender Perspective .....	1338
Women's Ambitions in Post-Soviet Professional Environments. Being a physician, a surgeon, a scienti (...) ..	1339
Working and living as artist: careers and professional paths .....	1340
Young Managers and Their Professional Dispositions .....	1341
RN20-Qualitative Methods .....	1342
"Heshima" - Social interaction and commonsense thinking in cross-cultural interviews.....	1343
"What can you see them doing?" - Notes on video elicited interview .....	1344
"Your tax money at work!" Notes on the ethnography of the state .....	1345
A Method for Exploring the Interaction Between Client and Social Worker .....	1346
A methodological consequence of Foucault's paradox "L'énoncé est à la fois non visible et non cache" .....	1347
An International Perspective on Innovations in Social Science Research Methods: What is in store for (...) ....	1348
Applying ideas from multi-sited ethnography to sociology of culture .....	1349
Archiving Qualitative Data. Polish Practice vs. European Experiences.....	1350
Beyond Visualization: Qualitative Software, Spatially Integrated Social Science and Qualitative Mapping .....	1351
Comparative Data Analysis: Performing, Dancing and Theorising the Data .....	1352
Constructing identities in immigrant life stories .....	1353
Conversation Analysis and Mother-baby Interaction .....	1354
Conversation Analysis and Psychotherapy: Building Bridges between Social Science and Clinical Theory.....	1355
Conversation Analysis as a Tool for Developing Professional Practices.....	1356
Crossroads for ethnography: studying the space between real and virtual experiences.....	1357
Data Visualization in Qualitative Data Analysis .....	1358
Detour towards knowledge - use of interpreter in research .....	1359
Dialogic analysis of discourse dynamics for political and IR research.....	1360
Digital methods: risks, challenges and opportunities for qualitative research.....	1361
Discovering Homo Administrativus - Ethnography from the Armchair .....	1362
Discovering pragmatism, discovering method. Between Grounded Theory and methodology of social s (...) ..	1363
Doing qualitative case study research: a review of the literature and some methodological suggestions.....	1364
Embodiment and observer's gaze. The methods of research on climbing activities.....	1365
Ethnographic deceptions .....	1366
Ethnographically stirred phenomenologies for counter-attacking analytical disregards of common techni (...) ..	1367
Excel Spreadsheet as a Tool for Social Narrative Analysis .....	1368
Finding concepts beyond your plan .....	1369
Focus Groups - rethinking natural interactions in a artificial situation.....	1370
Frame Analysis in Sociological Study of Visual Representations: The "Visual Orders" of Local Activism (...) ..	1371
Gangster, victim, or both? .....	1372

Housing, Materiality and Sociality - an investigation into the social topologies of the Danish single-famil (...)	1373
How metaphorising could make sense of what research interviews are about?	1374
How the Micro killed and rebuilt up the Macro Different Theoretical perspective in the Sociology of Mobility.....	1375
In-depth interviews with patients: dilemmas and possibilities .....	1376
Indications of the Quality of Quality Indicators: The Quality Indicators Movement Seeks Qualitative Mea (...)	1377
Interviewed "for what reason"? Imputed research motives and the production of "deviant" accounts.....	1378
Interviewing on sensitive family issues - the challenges of the researcher's role.....	1379
Interviews with power.....	1380
Intimate Relationships - A Relational View on Couples and their Development.....	1381
Is it worth to reach beyond the obvious? Selected issues of qualitative data analysis .....	1382
Looking into the life through others' eyes: the Cultural Probes (as methodological proposal).....	1384
Lost in translation. The art of data transcription and translation .....	1385
Managing the Quality of Qualitative Research.....	1386
Methodological Difficulties in Studying non-Western Populations in European Societies .....	1387
Methodological Issues of Applying Focus Groups with Children .....	1388
Multi-Perspectivity in Qualitative Research: Children and their Parents.....	1389
Narrative and historical truth in sociological interviewing. An epistemological analysis .....	1390
Narratives and Membership: Combining qualitative methods to examine the biographical accounts of ol (...)	1391
Politicizing the Narrative or Narrativizing the Political? Methods for Reconstructing a Political Life Story .....	1392
Precariousness experiences of the graduates of the University of Porto: empirical results and methodol (...)	1393
Qualitative and mixed methods research for social program evaluation .....	1394
Qualitative Secondary Analysis and Re-using the Original Research Data set of the British Sociological (...)	1395
Quality criteria for mixed methods sociological inquiry across designs .....	1396
Rationalising the Rationale: An ethnographic case study .....	1397
Relationship between fertility and poverty, the influence of representations of pregnancy in the use of (...)	1398
Research on the Researcher's Own University Colleagues, existing of two Academic Groups in Conflict.....	1399
Rigor and Grounded Theory .....	1400
Sociological Research on the Holocaust - in front of the direct testimonies. Some methodological remarks.....	1401
Tell me... Mixed «personal story» and art «to tell story» to understand the lesbians that choose to beco (...)	1402
The challenge of involving children as participants in the research process. Participatory action researc (...)	1403
The construction of stance in social research interviews.....	1404
The gender in the field .....	1405
The mediating document in interviews and observations - capturing value creating processes in rural to (...)	1406
The Only Way is up? Women's Narratives of Class Mobility.....	1407
The paradoxes of communication in the dental clinic: Luhmann's form analysis and the clinical system .....	1408
The Potential and Challenges of Articulation as a Methodological Tool in the Case of an Interview Stud (...)	1409
The qualitative systemic methodology in the context of qualitative research methods.....	1410
The relationship between interviewee and interviewer .....	1411
The role of trust and recognition in field research. Empirical data and theoretical explanations for a negl (...)	1412
The Trifle That Matters. Noticing Unnoticeable in Qualitative Research .....	1413
The use of data suites for the analysis of global cultural trends .....	1414
The vignette technique: advantages and limits of a technique of reconstruction of the real.....	1415
Timeline Stakeholder Analysis (TSA) in innovation projects.....	1416
Towards a holistic understanding .....	1418
Unequal relation of power in the final interpretation.....	1419
Urban studies: methods of data collection and data analysis .....	1420
Using narrative interview and semi-structured interview in research of emotions in organization.....	1421
Using semi-structured interview and focus group interview in research of social stigma .....	1422

Video elicited interview and visual methods in the research of yoga practice. Researching the body and (...)	1423
We, You and I: Interviewing Same Sex Couples Together and Apart .....	1424
Witness, memory and narrative: the journey from experience to recounting .....	1425
Writing across Boundaries: Explorations in Representation, Rhetoric and Writing in Qualitative Research .....	1426
Youth, Risk and Identities: Exploring the Focus Group as a Site for the Positioning of Selves and Others .....	1427
RN21-RENCORE: Methods for Comparative Research on Europe .....	1428
A Comparative Analysis of Individual-Level Determinants of Catholic Belief and Practice in Wider Euro (...)	1429
Crosstalk and Miss Links in Multilingual Networks .....	1430
Direction of Response Sale Format in International Comparison .....	1431
Full score invariance of employee commitment across countries and times .....	1432
Harmonising the Measurement of the Employment Status in the EU-LFS - The "12 Principles" and Beyond ....	1433
Improving the Quality of Background Variables in the International Social Survey Programme (ISSP) .....	1434
Information and Entertainment in Mass Media Systems. The Organization and Use of Television and N (...)	1435
Interviewer voice characteristics and productivity in telephone surveys .....	1436
Nationality, Citizenship, Race, Ethnicity and Migration as Socio-demographic Background Variables in (...)	1437
On Trading Zones, Ecologies of Knowledge and Technological Change: Some Methodological Considerations (...)	1438
Proposal for harmonisation of Slovenian Labour Force Survey microdata .....	1439
Reasons for refusals and their collection: Lessons learned from a content analysis of interviewers' notes (...)	1440
The intercultural dialogue .....	1441
The life-phase as a socio-demographic variable for international comparisons .....	1442
The modified question for the income measurement in the European Social Survey .....	1443
Towards a European comparative multidimensional analysis of collective action .....	1444
Unit-nonresponse - empirical findings of an experiment .....	1445
Value differences and transnational social trust .....	1446
RN22-Sociology of Risk and Uncertainty .....	1447
"European Society or European Societies?" - exploring divisions of age and class through attitudes to risk (...)	1448
"Prevention of Terror", or "Terror of Prevention"? Victimization, Risk and Regulation Amongst Young British (...)	1449
"So What Do You Mean by «Risk», Anyway UK Stakeholder Knowledge of Food Chain Risks .....	1450
'Insurer of last resort' and 'Lender of last resort': exploring continuity and discontinuity in UK government (...)	1451
'No, thanks' or 'Yes, please'? Social Perceptions of Nuclear Power in Lithuania .....	1452
A changing balance between risk management and rehabilitation? A discourse analysis of prison regimes (...)	1453
A Sociology of Risk and Uncertainty .....	1454
An "ideal-type" of trust? Using Schutz to relate trust in systems to trust in individual professionals in the (...)	1455
An Intersubjective Approach to the Social Amplification of Zoonotic Risk .....	1456
Between work and non-work. Risk transitions through life stories and everyday life .....	1457
Changes in Global Strategy of Fighting on Terror from Bush to Barack Obama Strategies .....	1458
Condominiums, Risk and Quality of Life. A discussion (also) about the City - a trip over the contradictory (...)	1459
Coping with Precariousness - Household Strategies between Objective Constraints and Subjective Socio (...)	1460
Dangerous relationships between the autonomy and the nationalism on Upper Silesia (Poland) ? the risk (...)	1461
Dealing with Climate Change Related Uncertainties: Shifts in Flood Protection Policies in the Tisza River (...)	1462
Dealing with Danger - Risk and Security in the Everyday Lives of Aid Workers .....	1463
Drinking like the Guys or Drinking with the Girls? The Role of "Risk-Talk" in British Female University Students (...)	1464
Environmental Risk Governance and Citizen Input: a Analysis of Decision Outcome-Based Arguments .....	1465
Forested commons, community, state and territory? How to limit damage from fire in forested areas, with (...)	1466
HIV infection risk groups - possibilities to integrate into labour market. Latvian example .....	1467
HIV Risks Reduction Strategies among Gay and Bisexual Men and the Production of Risks in Preventive (...)	1468
HIV/AIDS risk perception among HIV positive women .....	1469
How employers construct risk and strategies for risk management in relation to hiring new employees .....	1470

Incentives and Sanctions: Shifting Patterns of Risk Management in the Welfare State .....	1471
Lay attitudes towards nuclear technologies .....	1472
Leaving the city in the face of unemployment and unemployment risk.....	1473
Leaving the city in the face of unemployment and unemployment risk.....	1474
Main Trends and Varieties in Social Security Threats in Siberian Regions .....	1475
Managing risk and uncertainty: the organisational dynamics of early warning systems .....	1476
Mass violence and social insecurity: the case of school shootings in Finland.....	1477
Modernity Risk Dynamics & Social Inequalities: A Case-study on Homelessness in Paris, Lisbon and L (...) ..	1478
Occupational risks in France, the difficulties of an incentive system to encourage prevention .....	1479
Online sexual solicitation of young people: new risk patterns, or old risks in new arenas?.....	1480
Patterns of content in public engagement with zoonotic and other emerging infectious diseases: contin (...) ..	1481
Perception of the Estonian Genome Project: Perceived Risks and Benefits among the Estonian Population ....	1482
Preventing child abuse fatalities: a critical investigation of Dutch child abuse inquiries .....	1483
Protest, justice, citizenship and environmental rehabilitation: the worth of death and the value of life.....	1484
Public Consultations and Democracy: The Case of GMOs in the EU .....	1485
Public Trust and Social Policy: The Experience of the UK .....	1486
Pulling Together? Consensus, Security & Human Rights in the UK.....	1487
Reducing the risk? The operation of a barring and vetting scheme in care services in England and Wales.....	1488
Reflexivity and Deliberative Modes of Governance in the Context of EU Risk Regulation.....	1490
Regulating the uncertainty and risk of technique-centred innovations in healthcare .....	1491
Risk and Health: Epidemiology and the new forms of governance.....	1492
Risk and responsibility in a manufactured world.....	1493
Risk perception and risk behaviour in a heterogeneous society: The impact of basic values and experie (...) ..	1494
Risk perceptions of zoonoses in text vs. images: The impact of the social representations of animals .....	1495
Risk reasoning around pandemic influenza .....	1496
RiskPrint: an exploratory cartography of the spatiality of risks .....	1497
Risks in an interdisciplinary prospective. The advantages of a simulative approach: study-case analysis .....	1498
Risks of health surveillance: the case of mammography screening in Norway .....	1499
Risks of Misunderstanding in Multilingual Networks .....	1500
Risky Identities and the UK Biometric ID Cards.....	1501
Risky solidarity. The limits of insurance as a technology for distributing welfare.....	1502
School-staging and back-watching - teachers strategies in risk-conscious schools.....	1503
Seismic Hazard on the ambit of Sociology of Risk and Uncertainty .....	1504
Setting up the risk society - the rise of the epidemiological risk factor model into Finnish public health re (...) ..	1505
Spatial dimension of risk at major events: the case study of Geneva during Euro 2008 .....	1506
Surveillance, Ambivalence and Public Participation .....	1507
Sustainability and uncertainty of pension provisions in Europe .....	1508
The axioms of Precaution: Precautionary Logic and our Relation to Nature .....	1509
The construction of risks and uncertainties in relation to the avoidable death.....	1510
The implementation of medical advances: the constitution of Intensive Care Medicine as new Speciality (...) ..	1511
The interactive effect of strain and personal resiliency in the explanation of deviant behaviour: age and (...) ..	1512
The phenomenon of preparing for pregnancy challenged by risk: a case study of a woman with epilepsy. ....	1513
The Riskiness of Some Persistent Taxonomies: A Methodological and Ethical Note .....	1515
The role of gender dynamics in decisions on credit and debt in low income families in the UK .....	1516
The Social Dynamics of Rumours in the Age of Risk and Uncertainty: The Relationship between Rumor (...) ..	1517
The Social Organization of AIDS .....	1518
The societal context of individual risk perception - an empirical investigation of the acceptance of dispo (...) ..	1519
The Struggle with Terrorism and Political Authenticity.....	1520

Trans-national risks and the regulation of online gambling in the EU: Exploring Gibraltar as an "online g (...)	1521
Trust in the health care system: The risks of placing confidence in professional communities .....	1522
Vermin, victims and disease: public controversy over badgers and bovine TB in the UK .....	1523
Viewing assisted reproductive technologies´ risks and uncertainties through the lens of ecologies of kn (...)	1524
RN23-Sexuality .....	1525
"Compulsory sexuality": a measure of well-being .....	1526
"I knew I wasn´t like anybody else" - Young men´s accounts of coming out and being gay in Northern Ir (...)	1527
"Little things": Managing homo-eroticism in the work place .....	1528
"My mum wants me to be a 40 year old virgin!": Managing the Active Avoidance and Acknowledgement (...)	1529
"The good life and the good society": queering Strauss and integrating theorizing in the politics of sexu (...)	1530
"We must keep up the fight for democracy": Emotions and collective memory work in the context of pub (...)	1531
"Words Came Much Later": Experiencing Different Sexuality in the Lack of Language, Israel before 1975 .....	1532
'The (In)visibility of Lesbian, Gay, Bisexual and Transgender Issues in Residential Child Care in Scotland' .....	1533
(How) should sexual and family diversity be taught? The substantially but limitedly advanced case of Spain ...	1534
(Im)Personalisation: Reconsidering the Personalisation Agenda in relation to Sexuality .....	1535
A Space for Queer Place in Zagreb: 1970-2009 .....	1536
A traumatic departure: a study of the intimate and emotional relationships of close others with trans pe (...)	1537
Activism, conflict and engagement: the syncretic approach of the Portuguese LGBT movement .....	1538
An Age-Old Story. Lesbian Domestic Violence, Age and Cohort Effects .....	1539
Are boys different from girls? Young people´s practices and representations on sexuality .....	1540
Becoming a john': the emergence of peer socialization of clients in commercial sex .....	1541
Being different - managing and living with state sponsored homophobia: the life course of 6 British olde (...)	1542
Boundary work, sexual passing and hybrid bodies. From Agnes to Cheryl Chase .....	1543
BUTTERFLY´S WINGS: THE LESBIAN COMMUNITY BETWEEN SEXUAL IDENTITY AND GENDER (...)	1544
Changing Times, Changing Lives. Midlife Men and Women Doing Heterosexualities in Italy .....	1545
Demands and strategies of the LGTB-Q movement in Spain: the marriage law .....	1546
Disciplining "dangerous sexualities": new directions in prostitution policy in Italy .....	1547
Early sexual debut and sexual life style reflexivity .....	1548
Family intimacy: making sense of sexuality and intimacy in families .....	1549
Forms of Resistance to Workplaces' Symbolic Heteronormative Order .....	1550
Having sex with words: sexuality, technology and the body. An ethnographic exploration of phone sex .....	1551
Head above the Parapet: Organisational Resistance and Sexualities Equalities Work in the UK .....	1552
HIV/AIDS and risky sexual behaviour of adolescents .....	1553
How the social shapes the sexual: the importance of biographical turning points to the making of sexua (...)	1554
I want to sleep with you: rupture and normative processes in sexuality .....	1555
Ideas and laws affecting sex work: notes about female prostitution in Portugal .....	1556
In the Name of Equality: Sexuality and Social Change .....	1557
Islam and the acceptance of homosexuality: the shortage of socio-economic well-being and responsive (...)	1558
It didn´t "just happen": reflection, intention, deliberation .....	1559
Just like marriage - Young couples´civil partnerships .....	1560
Leaving domestically violent relationships: exploring how barriers to leaving are similar and different a (...)	1561
Living on the "virtual" edge: Researching young people's marginalised sexual and gender identities and (...)	1562
Magnus Hirschfeld, Race and a Twenty-First History of Sexuality .....	1563
Masculinities, Negotiations of Sexuality and the Workplace .....	1564
Naturism and sexuality: Broadening our approach to sexual wellbeing .....	1565
Paper One: BIGS Panel .....	1566
Polyamory as a possibility of feminine empowerment .....	1567
Post Sexual Trafficking in Nepal: Livelihoods, Sexuality and Citizenship .....	1568

Prostitution as a body work and sex work.....	1569
Putting the Interaction back into Sex .....	1570
Queering Homophobic Bullying: Memories, Identities and Strategies .....	1571
Re/searching lesbian families in the Czech Republic .....	1572
Recognition and Regulation: Gender, Sexuality and the Uk Gender Recognition Act.....	1573
Regulated and Racialized Homosexuality in MADtv Skits .....	1574
Regulating sex. Moral panic about gays and lesbians in the public sphere.....	1575
Released from Gender? Heterosexual Couples, Intimacy, and Normativity.....	1576
Sexual beginners. The social construction of the debut of Italian young people's heterosexual biographies.....	1577
Sexual Citizenship Ethics.....	1578
Sexual health: evidence based practice and LGB research .....	1579
Sexualised girlhood. Trend or aberration of socialisation process - Polish and European perspective.....	1580
Sexuality and HIV/AIDS vulnerability: female youths' behaviours, beliefs, myths, taboos and knowledges.....	1581
Sexuality and youth biographies: teenage pregnancy revisited.....	1582
Sexuality, Youth and Sexual Education in Portugal and Europe .....	1583
Social class and contraceptive use among youth. In what ways are emotions and aspects of sexual self (...) ..	1584
Squatting in Brixton: towards a local queer history .....	1585
Teenager's sexual behavior and drinking style in Finland .....	1586
The burden of policy: health risks and exploitation in the prostitution markets of the Low Countries.....	1587
The Changing Landscape of Heteronormativity: the regulation of intimate citizenship in Europe .....	1588
The construction of national identity, gender and sexuality in Cyprus, and the role of European human r (...) ..	1589
The Limits of Sexual Citizenship: The Politics of Sexual Containment.....	1590
The Material Reality of Holidays: Gay Men, Sex and Socio-Economic Class .....	1591
The politics of in/visibility - Public space, collective agency and the creation of "lesbian" space in urban (...) ..	1592
Transsexuality and transgender: Gender identities and expressions of gender .....	1593
Trapped in the wrong body, again. A comparative perspective on transability and transgender personal (...) ..	1594
What matters to prejudice? Attitudes towards homosexuality and their predictors in a sample of Portug (...) ..	1595
Women's spaces in Canadian universities: Gender, sexualities and spatial contestations. ....	1596
RN24-Science and Technology .....	1597
"What should we fear?" Forensic DNA databasing in Portugal and public (un)trust.....	1598
"Yes, we can!", or how citizen participation may revert inequality and vulnerability scenarios: the case o (...) ..	1599
After the linear model: a situated approach to innovation.....	1600
Assessing Scientific Mobility Dynamics and Impact: drawing on the potential of electronic CV databases .....	1601
Career paths, scientific productivity and academic rewards .....	1602
Conceptualising network structures though Assemblages .....	1603
Creative knowledge environments in technoscientifically different European societies: An empirical co (...) ....	1604
DNA technology in the Portuguese tabloid press - CSI Portugal? .....	1605
Embodied Narratives, Participation and Performance in Emergent Technologies: Debating Nanotechnology ....	1606
Enrolling citizens through technology. Laypeople as "junction workers" in new healthcare infrastructures.....	1607
Expert Knowledges and Action-Nets in the Field of Biotechnologies: Studying a Network In-The-Making .....	1608
Exploring Growth and Structure of Biogerontology Research in Portugal .....	1609
Facilitating biomedical research in Austria.....	1610
Governance of Emerging Research Infrastructures in Europe .....	1611
Helping water to flow: institutional context of solutions strengthening permeability.....	1612
Homogenisation of Intellectual Property Rights? The various functional properties of different research (...) ..	1613
Human Embryonic Stem Cells in France : Bioethics law and Dynamics of Research Networks.....	1614
Human Sciences and Surveillance Technologies Pride and Prejudice .....	1615
International joint laboratories, an emerging feature in the internationalisation of public sector research.....	1616

International mobility of researchers and the circulation of knowledge.....	1617
International Scientific Mobility and Knowledge Flows - the Portuguese case .....	1618
Knowledge Transfer Processes in Multinational R&D Networks .....	1619
Leadership styles in biomedical research groups .....	1620
Mapping contemporary technoscientific controversies: the software patent debate in Europe .....	1621
Mapping the European TB Vaccine Research Network: Actors, Structures and Collaboration .....	1622
Materialities and Actors in Knowledge Transfer: Translation in a Portuguese Technology-based Start-up .....	1623
Mediatized science: science and technology has a media issue.....	1624
Mobility, networks and knowledge flows: towards a more comprehensive methodological framework.....	1625
National science policies under transition - analysis of recent trends in ten countries .....	1626
Presentation of Recent SSTNET Publication "Women in Science and Technology" .....	1628
Re-thinking the spaces and flows of science .....	1629
Research Councils and Resource Allocation Committees: A Comparative Analysis .....	1630
Research Politics in Russia: review of reforms in the scientific sphere for the last 17 years.....	1631
Retail Innovation: (In)Success Factors and User's Profile-Types .....	1632
Science and Democracy: from Technocracy to Dialogue .....	1633
Scientific awards and young researchers' careers: the Gulbenkian Prize 'Stimulus to Research'.....	1634
Scientific collaboration within and across research teams.....	1635
Self-monitoring of universities using Social Network Analysis: best practice between research and univ (...) ..	1636
Semantic Interoperability and Biobanking - Setting Standards for European Tissue Economies.....	1637
Systems, networks or spaces: science dynamics revisited .....	1638
Technological dangers and challenges. Science and Technology Professors on the Social Impact of M (...) ..	1639
The Increased Role of Intermediary Structures and Networks in the Recent Processes of Scientific and (...) ..	1640
The organizational structure of research groups in a regional university system .....	1641
The role of negotiations in coordination of actions in small research groups .....	1642
The use of Web 2.0 technologies by the research community: opening up new communication spaces .....	1643
The Weight of Research Systems History in the Construction of the European S&T Space .....	1644
Tracing researchers' mobility. Is human and social capital circulating, being transferred and/or increasi (...) ..	1645
X-radiation exposure in medical imaging .....	1646
RN25-Social Movements .....	1647
"I" encountering another "I": Identity formation and emotions in technology-based activism.....	1648
"Work that Wins": Frame Selection, Resonance and Outcome Determination in 19th Century Civil Right (...) ..	1649
A globalization of localized grievances? Transnational social movements mobilizing towards communit (...) ..	1650
A model of failure and success for organising social movements .....	1651
Act locally act globally, the dilemmas of trans-national social movements.....	1652
Analysis of a Social Movement Transformation and Outcome: The Case of the Grassroots Movement (...) ....	1653
Anarchist Networks in Postwar Europe.....	1654
Assessing Outcome Understanding Impact: The World Social Forum Between the National and the Global ....	1655
Brokers beyond language boundaries? Diffusion, and democratic innovation in transnational publics.....	1656
Civil or uncivil society? Social movements in Central and Eastern Europe .....	1657
Coalition Building and the Formation of a Regional Solidarity Network in East Asia: The Case of the "C (...) ..	1658
Collective Identity and transnationalism.....	1659
Dreams, ideals and hopes in collective action: The contribution of utopia as a new conceptual tool in th (...) ..	1660
Feminism in Sicily. Cultural outcomes, success and failures of a social movement.....	1661
Frames and Symbols in Terrorist Communication.....	1662
From Bargaining to Contentious Politics : Understanding Change within Trade Unions. The Case of the (...) ..	1663
From the Perception of Symbolic Domination to the Symbolic Struggle - The Nation of Islam?s efforts t (...) ..	1664
Hegemonic Breakdown and Worker Protest in Egypt and the Gulf .....	1665

Hegemonic State Crisis and Social Protest in Contemporary Mexico .....	1666
Hidden Threads - Feminist initiatives within the framework of the underground movement of the "Demo (...)" ..	1667
In defence of the local? Urban grassroots movements in the Stockholm Periphery.....	1668
In-between actors and networks: actor-network theory and the prospects for a symmetrical perspective (...)	1669
Karl Planyi and 'The Double Movement' .....	1670
Mobilization under Permanent Crisis: Russian Environmental Movement in 1987-2007 .....	1671
Mobilizing mobile pastoralists: Rural Environmental Movements in Mongolia.....	1672
Moral Business: Changing Corporate Behaviour by "Speaking Their Language" .....	1673
Movement of recovered factories in Argentina .....	1674
New forms of the socialist movement in globalised world.....	1675
New Media and collective action in contemporary Spain (the March 2004 events): new methodological (...)	1676
New Social Movements Supporters: A Southern Europe Analysis.....	1677
New time of civic activity in rural areas? A new perspective on re-organization of services in Finland.....	1678
Opposition and integration ? Movements of the marginalized in a Nordic welfare state .....	1679
Primary Frameworks, Keying, and the Dynamics of Contention.....	1680
Religious identities and political attitude in Italy .....	1681
Right wing activism in contemporary Portugal: Partido Nacional Renovador .....	1682
Serve and Protect - The use of bottom-up online applications by civic groups .....	1683
Social movements and voluntary associations as autopoietic systems.....	1684
Social movements and world society. The genesis of a world political system? .....	1685
State Relationships of the Finnish Environmental Movement.....	1686
Sympathetic media and social movements. Some evidence from the cycle of protest against precarity i (...)	1687
The "Anomalous Wave" 2008 University Movement in Italy: a Self-research case-study in Catania .....	1688
The Access to Knowledge movement: reshaping politics in the information society .....	1689
The Effect of World Society on Local Activism: The Transformation of the Environmental Movement in (...)	1690
The environmental movement and climate change: evidence, campaigns and outcomes in Europe .....	1691
The political mobilisations of Sri Lankan Tamil Diaspora as a transnational social movement .....	1692
The Political Project of the Communist Re-foundation in Italy: Sociology of a Party in movement .....	1693
The problem of using rights as a means to advocate legal reforms: the example of the eviction order an (...)	1694
The Romani Women Movement: Opening Up Spaces.....	1695
The suburb and the event. Depoliticization and new forms of youth subjectivity in Dublin's deprived sub (...)	1696
Turning moral panics into organized actions .....	1697
Ups, Downs and Come-Backs of Social Movements on the Democracy Trail: The Trade Unions in Nig (...)	1698
Urban social movements in/against European Capital of Culture Istanbul .....	1699
Visual methods for protest movement research .....	1700
Women's Transnational Networks .....	1701
RN26-Sociology of Social Policy.....	1702
"Monkeys hang in trees, Ma'am." On the social construction of fear of and among urban youth in The H (...)	1703
A Sociological Approach to Municipal Social Service in Spain .....	1704
Abandoned children in Russia: regional and municipal resources of the control.....	1705
Cash-for-care policies impacting on user-careworker relationships .....	1706
Changes in the gender order - work/family change and policy reform in Scandinavia .....	1707
Community, Social Capital and Housing in Lisbon Neighbourhood.....	1708
Critical Junctions of State and Citizenship: A Case of Early Retirement of Military Personnel in Post-wa (...)	1709
Education must be relevant - Europe's soft channels of influence.....	1710
Fertility and public policies: trends and challenges.....	1711
Fertility Choices and Childcare Availability in Portugal .....	1712
Grey Markets for elder care: Preconditions and ambivalences .....	1713

Incapacitated or unemployed? Welfare and employment policy - The German approach in an internatio (...)	1714
Informational Capital and European Social Policy: Knowledge Production, Accumulation of Symbolic P (...)	1715
Innovation against crisis: supported employment programs for socially excluded people.....	1716
Migration policy in a transnational European context: uses of the Voluntary Return Program among the (...)	1717
Needs in Portugal - Tradition and Emerging Trends. A discussion for the XXIst century .....	1718
Obstacles to gender symmetry - the controversy over parental leave reform in Norway .....	1720
Policies and Public Opinion - An (un)clear Relation .....	1721
Quality of jobs in the sector of elderly care: is there any solution? .....	1722
Rural Social Sphere: Development Processes and Policy Technologies in Russia .....	1723
Social Economy and social enterprises in the European Union. The case of the Spanish region of Aragón .....	1724
Social Intervention and the Financing State:Trick or Treat? .....	1725
Social Policy and Individual Responsibility .....	1726
Spending into poverty. The impact of social assistance schemes on asset accumulation among low-inc (...)	1727
Structural Transformations of Russian Society and Challenges for Social Policy .....	1728
The de-institutionalization of the mental patients and the alternatives for local caring: models of public policy..	1729
The impact of the individualization process on the social policy.....	1730
The lure of the missing asylum-seeking children - A comparative study on policy directed unaccompani (...)	1731
The political economy of social vulnerability. The social and political determinants of new social risks in (...)	1732
The quality of life in Portugal in the European context: main patterns and social determinants.....	1733
Unemployed people towards self-employment: between need and opportunity.....	1734
Welfare regimes in four countries - a pre-comparative proposition .....	1735
Welfare states and quality of later life - distributions and predictions of QoL in a comparative perspective.....	1736
Welfare systems in East Europe: regional variations and explanatory factors .....	1737
Welfare, Employment and Social inclusion: an European perspective.....	1738
RN27-Regional Network on Southern European Societies.....	1739
Albanian Women Immigrants in Greece .....	1740
Balkan Region - An Inseperatable part of European Society.....	1741
Best and Worse in Mixing Associative and Government action in support provision to victims of domest (...)	1742
Bullism as a behavioural way based on new and specific communicative and cultural models of identity' (...)	1743
Career paths of young graduates. Contributions for new (in) visibility of the work .....	1744
Changing welfare mixes and path dependencies: personal social services and the third sector in the Po (...)	1745
Comparative research and construction of identities - the case of European welfare states .....	1746
Cooperation in the Social Sector: Structural Principles .....	1747
Culture participative et identité nationale en Grèce contemporaine .....	1748
Deinstitutionalization of mental patients: when the third sector fills the emptiness.....	1749
European construction through culture, mobility and people circulation: the case of ERASMUS student (...)	1750
Gender relations and employment in the 21st century .....	1751
Governance and youth in local contexts: social policies in front of the challenge of new connections wit (...)	1752
Humanitarian movement, charity and moral imagination.....	1753
Innovation and sustainability: possible links and fragilities in the automobile industry .....	1754
Italian "participated" social policies and active citizenship .....	1755
Latin language, cultural proximities and cultural domination: Southern European Metropolis and immigr (...)	1756
Línguas latinas, Conhecimento Sociológico e Diversidade Social .....	1757
Medium-sized Knowledge Cities as a promoter of regional innovation system: focusing on Coimbra .....	1758
Nationalist voices and the struggle of becoming: The case of native and migrant youths in Greece .....	1759
Passing down family history in migrants' families as an identity resource for children .....	1760
Processes of Change and Social Development in Southern Europe.The Valencian Community (Spain) (...)	1761
Professionalization in third sector: the case of Porto university graduates in Business Administration, H (...)	1762

Public places, collective challenges.....	1763
Rationalization essays for supporting violent demonstrations .....	1764
Religious practices in everyday life. The case of Jehovah Witnesses.....	1765
Self-employment and the southern European social model: a reflection based upon the Portuguese case .....	1766
Social Capital in the Spanish-Portuguese Border: The Model of the Raya Extremeña .....	1767
Structuration of volunteering in the social sector - reproduction and change of practice.....	1768
Subcultures of Football Fans and Violent Hostilities.....	1769
Target Governance and Social Risk: The case of the Portuguese Policy of Social Inclusion .....	1770
The city as a new social question. Heterotopic cities.....	1771
The competitiveness of welfare systems analyzed through equity:a comparison between Italy and France .....	1772
The feminization of occupations in Greece: A sign of egalitarianism or loss of social prestige? .....	1773
The Role of Self-Help Organizations in the Community Health Governance: The Italian Case-study .....	1774
The role of the Church as an organizational institution of intercultural education in contemporary Greece .....	1775
The third sector in Southern Europe. Trends and researches in Italy and Spain .....	1776
Trajectories of Education and Migration between Morocco and Italy: Gender Identities and Agency in F (...) ..	1777
Why Sweden Works Best. A Comparative Research on Some European Countries' Welfare States as (...) ..	1778
Women and welfare in the South.....	1779
RN29-Social Theory .....	1780
A muddle concept: making sense of social capital operationalizations .....	1781
A Seance with Philip Rieff.....	1782
A second modernity: the cosmopolitan vision of Beck.....	1783
A Way out for Europe through the Concept of Societal Community .....	1784
Actors and decisions: can theories help theorists make "rational" choices? .....	1785
Are Norms Limited to Human Beings? A necessary debate between sociology and evolutionary biology .....	1786
Civil Society Debate in Turkey: Discursive Struggles among the Intellectuals attempting at the Construc (...) ..	1787
Cohesion in the new economic and social conditions, new media, new public space.....	1788
Complexity Theories in the XXI Century .....	1789
Contemporary organismic sociology (COS): substantive provisions .....	1790
Contemporary Social Theory: Aesthetics, Social Value and Social Improvisation .....	1791
Cosmopolitanism and social theory, as a contribution to the european sociology.....	1792
Cosmopolitanism and the Sociology of Europe .....	1793
Development and Deployment of Social Network Analysis: a Sociological Overview .....	1794
Dimensions of a civic consciousness: Mechanisms of social solidarity in contemporary Sweden .....	1795
Emergence and Reduction in the Social Sciences .....	1796
Ethical Capitalism and Its Cultural Logic.....	1797
Europe as a part of a world society.....	1798
Europe seen from outside - Current challenges in general sociological theory .....	1799
European Society or European Societies: Methodology of Answer.....	1800
European Society or European Societies? Critical and discursive perspective.....	1801
Existential Analytic and Sociology .....	1802
Experience Revisited: Searching for a critical notion of the concept of experience for the social sciences .....	1803
Formal organisation and public observation .....	1804
From Innovation to Evolution: The Sources of Institutional Change .....	1805
From the disciplinary society to the society of control: surveillance over immigrants from Turkey in Germany ..	1806
How to Perform Theatre by Talking About It: Toward a Cultural Pragmatics of Drama Critics.....	1807
How to Theorize Social Emergence?.....	1808
Ideological exploitation of critical theory .....	1809
Individuality and the formation of Social Rationality: points of critique in Horkheimer and Habermas .....	1810

Is there a European society? A sociological analysis of the theories of European integration .....	1811
Is there a frame-analysis after Erving Goffman? .....	1812
Is there a limit to social theory effectiveness? Environment as a possible way of reshaping sociology .....	1813
Key Invisibles in Visual Discourses: Beyond Castells' "basic thread of our social structure" .....	1814
Marx and the Radical Critique of Antisemitism .....	1815
Methodological nationalism as a tool for interpretation and scientific performance .....	1816
Nihilism and Cultural Cohesion: (Re)considerations of Jean Baudrillard.....	1817
Notes on Bourdieu's Conception of Social Science: Between Positivist and Hermeneutic Knowledge.....	1818
On dialectical materialism and critical theory: between social philosophy (Sozialphilosophie) and social (...) ..	1819
On Habermas's Critique of Castoriadis and its Counter-Critique.....	1820
On the use and critique of Wittgenstein in the social sciences .....	1821
One European Society OR Pluralism? A False Antagonism for Contemporary Sociology .....	1822
Personal Relationships in Luhmann's Theory of Social Systems: A Critical Appraisal.....	1823
Plural Modernity: Changing modern institutional forms: disciplines and nation-states .....	1824
Prospects for a Post-Secular Sociology: Bauman and Habermas in Perspective .....	1825
Psyche as the supplement of Luhmann's social systems theory .....	1826
Reflection on the Textual Foundations of Social Science: Narrative as an Explanatory Scheme of a Soc (...) ..	1827
Scientific Specialization as Utopian Practice .....	1828
Selective interpretations of the social in social theory or "I wished those theorists had looked beyond Br (...) ..	1829
Social action in the context of creativity .....	1830
Social Constructions - Arbitrary and Biased? .....	1831
Social Inequalities in European Society or European Societies? Methodological Nationalism Challenge (...) ..	1832
Social Inequality Reconsidered in the Interface of Phenomenology and Sociology of Knowledge .....	1833
Social ontology and cultural sociology. A appraisal and critique of John Searle's social theory.....	1834
Sociological recoveries of critical theories on technology .....	1835
Sociology of Islam and Muslim Societies in Neoliberal Globalization .....	1836
Sustaining tradition and making a difference: Jane Addams's writing on .....	1837
The 'Case' and the Sociological Imagination: Toward a Critical Reconstruction .....	1838
The End of Good Form: From Sociability to Creative Sociality, and the Consequences of this Transfor (...) ...	1839
The Europe Reflected from Looking-Glass Self and the Others.....	1840
The Limits of Systems Theory .....	1841
The Ottoman Contribution to the Rise of Capitalism and the Modern State .....	1842
The Rise of French Existentialism: A Study in the Sociology of Intellectual Movements.....	1843
The Role of the Intellectual and Creative Class in the Public Sphere.....	1844
The social site approach versus the approach of discourse/practices-formations?.....	1845
The Societal Constitution of Europe: Matching Legal and Social Theories .....	1846
Theorizing Discretionary Informality in Law .....	1847
Toward strengthening democracies and civil society - Freedom as responsibility .....	1848
Unintended Consequences, Old and New: a Typology .....	1849
Unstable Borders: On the Limits of Social Science .....	1850
Violence and Social Theory .....	1851
What Does it Mean to Be Socially Constructed? Ian Hacking's Take on a Mistreated Concept.....	1852
What is Legitimacy? Does it Matter? What happens when the concept of legitimacy is applied to politic (...) ...	1853
Whose Cosmopolism? .....	1854
«Public sociology» in the past and the present: update of coordinates.....	1855
RN30-Youth and Generation.....	1856
"Elite" young Muslims in Britain: Generational location and political participation .....	1857
"Lads, Chavs and Pram-Face Girls": Embodiment and Emotion in Working-Class Youth Cultures.....	1858

"Not that different" - Young people's attitudes to and experiences of contact with people from minority e (...)	1859
'Breakdown' in out-of-home care for young people: incident or process? .....	1860
(Dis)courses to adulthood: Portuguese generational differences .....	1861
A Question of Locality. Young adult's school-to-work transitions in three diverse Swedish municipalities.....	1862
Academic or vocational? Decisions about continuing in education of majority and minority youth in Finland.....	1863
Adolescence risk factors for unemployment in adulthood. A 16-year prospective follow-up study.....	1864
Analysis of drug use patterns among Latvian youth within the framework of risk and protective factors .....	1866
Apaty or protest - Youth, generations and political participation .....	1867
Artistic activity as a source for youth empowerment.....	1868
Attitudes and values of the Finnish youth .....	1869
Authenticity under influence: parents, peers and media behind students' vocational choices .....	1870
Back to the CCCS' Youth cultures, leisure and social class.....	1871
Blurred transitions: revisiting the significance of work and parenthood for young adults in Italy .....	1872
Changes in educational ambitions during lower secondary school among Norwegian youths. Social cla (...)	1873
Choice between staying at school or entering the labour market: disadvantages faced by children from (...)	1874
Citizenship in everyday life - young Romanians' options .....	1875
Civil and political participation of young people on election to European parliament 2009 in Slovak republic ....	1876
Comparing scholastic performance between immigrants' children and natives in Italy: a spatial analysis.....	1877
Detached or involved in public sphere? Biographical trails as catalysts or inhibitors of civic involvement .....	1878
Education and Citizenship in Portugal. Different configurations from the First Republic to nowadays.....	1879
Ethnic Prejudices among Russian Young People.....	1880
Happy-go-lucky young versus aspiring elderly: Determinants of satisfaction with life among three gener (...)	1881
How peer groups create social inequality. Distinctive practices in the context of gender, class, ethnicity (...)	1882
In-between school and work in a post-socialist context: do-it-yourself biographies in search of meaningf (...)	1883
Inequalities among the "Disadvantaged" - Youth with Lower School Qualifications and their Transition (...)	1884
Intergenerational Dynamics and the Formation of National Identity: The Case of the Ukrainian Minority (...)	1885
Intolerance and aggression among Russian youth: "normal" and dangerous manifestations .....	1886
Inventing Adulthoods: A biographical approach to youth transitions .....	1887
It runs in the family? Why youngsters in the vocational tracks participate less in voluntary organisations.....	1888
Job mobility, residential mobility and daily mobility among young: Is commuting a temporary adjustmen (...)	1889
Juvenile school experience: what influence on the construction of sexuality's representations?.....	1890
Leaving the Parental Home in Europe: Cultural Micro Foundations of Welfare Systems .....	1891
Leaving the Parental Home in Hungary and Western Romania before and after the Transformation.....	1892
Living in the state of permanent crisis. Voices of young generation from the former collective state farm (...)	1893
Mobility and spatial identity of young suburbans : what social interactions, patterns and representations (...)	1894
Modern Youth and Working out Social Policy of the Municipal Administration in Russia .....	1895
Negotiating Tensions and Contradictions in Youth Crime Prevention Initiatives in Ireland .....	1896
Networked Youth: generational representation and User Generated Contents in Italy .....	1897
New and old forms of transitions to adulthood: facts from the Catalan Youth Survey .....	1898
Opinions and Attitudes of Modern Russian Youth .....	1899
Parental and Scholl Related Protective Factors for Substance use among Hungarian Adolescents .....	1900
Personal, political and emotional: Subjective experiences of "the political" in the lives of young people .....	1901
Political Socialisation and Participation through Youth Branches of Political Party Organisations in Turkey .....	1902
Postponement of parenthood in the Balkan countries .....	1903
Recreation and Re-creation: Portuguese young people and their leisure activities in Macao .....	1904
Recurrent Poverty: understanding young adults transitions into and out of poverty .....	1905
Researching youth and culture in contemporary Europe: Exploring young people's drinking cultures be (...)	1906
Return to Sender: Exploring Return Migration among European Youth.....	1907

Risk of social exclusion after leaving institutional care .....	1908
Risks of social exclusion among Youth in Latvia .....	1909
Sanctions against Young Welfare Recipients in Germany - Perspectives of Job Placement Officers. Re (...) ..	1910
Second-Generation Immigrants: Prejudice and Relationships with Institutions .....	1911
Second/third generation British-born young (diasporic) Tamils: Discourses of cultural identity and change.....	1912
Sexual activity and school deviant behavior among adolescents: peer influence and homophily interacti (...) ..	1913
Sexuality and religion in transition: A longitudinal study of Croatian college students and sexual risks, 1 (...) ..	1914
Skateboard girls: on power, senses and affective embodiment.....	1916
Social and historical generations - how to draw a line? .....	1917
Social markers and norms on transitions to adulthood: comparing 23 European countries .....	1918
Social representations at crossroads: generations and social division of labour .....	1919
Social settings for drug use: from clubbing to house parties .....	1920
Specificity of Legal Culture of Young Russians .....	1921
Subcultures in Estonia: perception of borders inside and outside subculture.....	1922
Teaching Youth Research in the Web - Experiences from Finland .....	1923
The "degree of political" in youth political consumerism in 4 European countries .....	1924
The Amateur Football Players of Turkish Origin in Berlin and Reconstruction of their Professional Foot (...) ..	1926
The causes of the gender gap in political interest among Flemish youth .....	1927
The consumerism of the street boys in the poor parisian suburb .....	1928
The democratic generation: political and ideological changes in portuguese youth .....	1929
The development of the concept of European Identity in European Youth Research .....	1930
The Doughnut in the Nordic Army. Inner and outer compulsion in the health sense and eating practices (...) ..	1931
The Eastern European model of transition into adulthood - myth or fact.....	1932
The education and socialization sites of youth: Experiences and representations in a non-school context.....	1933
The female presence in the juvenile delinquency: invisible trajectories.....	1934
The gender gap in educational success - Results of a quantitative study in Switzerland .....	1935
The Impact of Local in Two Global Subcultures: Hip-Hop and Metal in Estonia.....	1936
The Importance of Demographic Markers in the Transition to Adulthood in Europe .....	1937
The labour market, the welfare state and the family: Has the focus of the welfare triangle as supporter (...) ..	1938
The Learning System and Young People's Transition from School to the Labour World. The Relation wi (...) ..	1939
The living conditions of youth in Germany and the risk of relative deprivation .....	1940
The long and winding road - exploring transitions of young people 'at risk' .....	1941
The Long Transition to Adulthood in Italy: Parental Help and Youth Autonomy .....	1942
The New Political Culture: Common Characteristics of Political Participation of Youth in Turkey .....	1943
The relationship of self-esteem to body image evaluation in adolescent girls .....	1944
The Social Forge - Cooperation and individual performance among young male climbers.....	1945
The stratification of literacy European space using youth performances in PISA scales: reading, mathe (...) ..	1946
Thirty-Somethings: The First European Generation? A comparison of family and gender attitudes and p (...) ..	1947
Total Capital of the Youth in Latvia .....	1948
Traditional and post-traditional life course .....	1949
Transition to Adulthood and Young's Labour Precarity .....	1950
Trapped in poverty - Labour market mobility of young social benefit recipients in Germany.....	1951
Understanding Poverty From Poor Young People's Experiences: Thinking Over the Reproduction Proc (...) ..	1952
Understanding Trust and Confidence among Young Adults - what can a Life Course Perspective Contri (...) ..	1953
Unemployment and the transformation of uncertainty in youth transitions in the New West .....	1954
Urban transformation due to the urbanization of a peripheral region in Switzerland - an European example.....	1955
Value change at youths in Eastern Europe - a longitudinal and cross-national analysis.....	1956
Work, family and post-graduation: a complex triangle .....	1957

Young men in the borderlines of virtual and material worlds .....	1958
Young people with immigrant background, family life and social positioning .....	1959
Young University graduates: between materialist and post-materialist values .....	1960
Youth & Gambling in Denmark .....	1961
Youth and Their Political Tendencies in Turkey.....	1962
Youth at Risk: on Results of sociological Study in Regions of Russian Federation.....	1963
Youth Leisure Careers during Post-Communist Transitions in the South Caucasus.....	1964
Youth life in secure care .....	1965
RN31-Ethnic Relations, Racism and Antisemitism .....	1966
"I hope I'm not a racist." Racism, antiracism and ethnic absolutism in Britain .....	1967
'As a Jew...' Identity claims and the critique of Israel.....	1968
African immigrants and autochthones in the Northwest of Portugal: interethnic relations of accommodat (...) ..	1969
Anti-Semitism as a religious, social and racial phenomenon - comparative perspective.....	1970
Anti-Semitism as an Instrument of the Last Election Campaign in the Czech Republic.....	1971
Antisemitism and Islamophobia in Italy: some reflections on survey data .....	1972
Antisemitism in Europe: discourses of denial .....	1973
Antisemitism, Islamophobia and European Identities .....	1974
Antisemitism, multiculturalism and European diversity: The British case .....	1975
Assessing Antisemitism - Theoretical Reflections on Criteria.....	1976
Attitudes towards Interracial Marriage .....	1977
Attitudes towards Jews in Polish society, 1967-2007: multifaceted continuity and change.....	1978
Aversion to multi-ethnic schools in the Netherlands: Examining the aversion among lower and higher e (...) ..	1979
Beyond the new racism: the reconfiguration of whiteness in 21st century Britain .....	1980
Challenges for research of ethnicity in Central Europe.....	1981
Changing youth identity at two formerly all-white South African High schools .....	1982
Community Organisations as Spaces for Negotiation: A British Case Study .....	1983
Competing memories and moral claims for recognition: an attempt to build a typology of psycho-politica (...) ..	1984
Conspiracy Theories as Worldviews: the Cognitive Appeal of Biased Constructions.....	1985
Cultural Genocide and its Antidote: The Case of the "Jewish Cultural Reconstruction" .....	1986
Czech Republic: anti-Semitism vs. "anti-Gypsism" .....	1987
Discourses about Islam and Muslims in Spain: dimensions, frames and logics of exclusion .....	1988
Displacement and Reiteration: Europe's Othello, The Merchant of Venice and Gaza.....	1989
Ethnic Segregation in Flemish High Schools: Structure, Homophily, Ethnic Subcultures or Interethnic C (...) ..	1990
Ethnic, Religious and Economic Diversity in the Neighbourhood: Explaining Quality of Contact with Nei (...) ..	1991
Exploring Eurocentrism in Portuguese History Textbooks.....	1992
From conceptualizations (and measures) of racism to strategies of socio-political action for combating i (...) ..	1994
Glamorous Jewishness: Reflections on the Kabbalah Centre and Anti-Semitism.....	1995
Hegemonic Discourse in the Chilean Media: Constructing Narratives on the Mapuches.....	1996
Holocaust Denial and Media Discourse in Moldova.....	1997
Immigrants and the new "Reserve Army of Labour": Segregation in the Construction Sector. A compar (...) ..	1998
Instrumentalising history: on some aspects of the re-nationalisation of Germany's political culture in 2006.....	1999
Integration and Community Cohesion: a critique of the dominant discourse in the UK .....	2000
Intersections of antisemitism and sexism in socio-economic relations .....	2001
Intervention approaches of Civil Society for repelling right-wing extremism in Swiss Municipalities .....	2002
Is the question of racism in the Zionist state so black and white? The case of the Ethiopian Jews .....	2003
Islamophobia and Anti-Semitism in present-day Austria .....	2004
Mosque Debates in Germany: Media Presentations and Right-Wing Propaganda .....	2005
Multicultural Laicity and the Coexistence of Religious Identities: An Educational Experience .....	2006

National Identity and Antisemitism in Germany: Shoa, Antizionism and Antiamericanism.....	2007
Polish Collective Memory of the Holocaust: Social and Education Discourse after 1989.....	2008
Racialization: openings and constraints in sociological research .....	2009
Racism and the Representation of "the racist" in Sweden.....	2010
Right-wing extremism among immigrant adolescents from the FSU in Israel and Germany.....	2011
Schooling the "other": creating European citizens in a multi-ethnic Transylvanian town.....	2012
Symbolic Boundaries and Status Transformation: Explaining the Decline of Post-Civil War Civic Opport (...) ..	2013
The conflict between autonomy and adjustment - a source of intolerance? .....	2014
The Dutch Paradox: antisemitism in a globalising context.....	2015
The Financial Crisis, Anti-Semitism and Racism .....	2016
The Impact of the Arab/Islamic Discourse on Antisemitism on the International Perceptions of Islamoph (...) ..	2017
The Left, the Holocaust and Genocide - on some Problems with not taking Anti-Semitism Seriously (enough)..	2018
The Livingstone Formulation: the defensive counter-accusation that a charge of antisemitism is made (...) ..	2019
The persistence of racial and ethnic taxonomies: pragmatism and risk .....	2020
The Role of the Media in Spreading Prejudice .....	2021
The United Nations, Israel and the Jews .....	2022
Theorising Race, Ethnicity and Racialisation: Changing Research Agendas.....	2023
Tolerance is not enough: Why Ethnic Relations Theory needs a sociological concept of respect .....	2024
Towards a Sociology of Racist Humour.....	2025
Understanding expressions of anti-immigration, xenophobia and racism in observing the changes in th (...) ...	2026
Understanding the expressions of xenophobia and racism in observing the changes in the work field (E (...) ..	2027
Universities, Anti-Semitism, and "Reasonable" Perceptions of Hostility .....	2028
RN32-Political Sociology.....	2029
"The Evil Other": European democracies and the challenge of radical right-wing populism - The Swedis (...) ..	2030
A civil society in an uncivil territory? The participation of French suburban NGOs to local policymaking .....	2031
A Marriage of Reason and Passion? The Co-operativeness of the Representative-Leading Official -Rel (...) ..	2032
A model for failure and success for organising civic actors .....	2033
After the Industrial. Élite and the Governance of Change in the Northern Milan .....	2034
Between European dress and national shirt - EU-correspondents as trailblazers of a European Public S (...) ..	2035
Building the State through the Nation: Dual Citizenship Policies in Central and Eastern Europe .....	2036
Can you afford to stay aside? Socioeconomic status, network position and structure in community invol (...) ..	2037
Changes in euro-scepticism in the Netherlands between 1990 and 2007 .....	2038
Citizens Participation: Practices, Powers, Subjects.....	2039
Citizens, Migrants and Welfare Public Services in Spain: Researching the Daily Practice of Social and (...) ...	2040
Citizenship and nondiscrimination law in Europe: The limits of equality.....	2041
Citizenship Attribution in Western Europe: A Comparative Configurational Analysis (1985-2005) .....	2042
Citizenship today: new challenges in a world of intensified migrations.....	2043
Civil Society, migration and health: successful partnerships .....	2044
Complexity and governance in local partnerships: a case study of mutual observations of state and civil (...) ..	2045
Convergences and divergences in the new local social policies: comparing Brussels and Montréal.....	2046
Cultural and Political Identity of Europe and the Problem of Multiculturalism.....	2047
Cultural Others in European Integration. A Sociological Perspective on New Modes of Governance, the (...) ..	2048
Decent Democracy .....	2049
Discourses of Society and the Politics of Cohesion.....	2050
Ethnography of an Italian Self Managed Social Center: Everyday Forms of Mobilization and Resistance .....	2051
European Integration, Europeanized Equality Rights, and the People's Beliefs: Evidence from Germany .....	2052
Europeanization of the Radical Right?.....	2053
Euro-scepticism in the Digital Public Sphere .....	2054

Framing vs. Deliberation: an Overlooked Challenge for Political Sociology? .....	2055
From boom to bust: the impact of the economy on migration, and consequently integration, into Ireland .....	2056
Gendering Community Elite Structures.....	2057
Globalization and Populist Radical Right Parties in Europe: Austria, Denmark, Germany .....	2058
How About Taking Gender in the Theorizing of Populism? .....	2059
How sport helps to understand the modern system of nation states and modern nationalism. The "sport (...) ..	2060
Intelligentsia in Politics. A Case Study of a Polish Political Party the Freedom Union (panel 5: Govern (...) ..	2061
Jobless and Toothless - The protest of the unemployed and precarious in Europe: Forms, conditions a (...) ..	2062
Justifying in the Local Public Sphere: Newspaper Representations of Encounters between Citizens and (...) ..	2063
Legislative Social Networks - The Case of the Swedish Parliament.....	2064
Legitimacy and representation in the EU. From representative to participative democracy? .....	2065
Local eGovernment in District of Évora (Portugal) 2015: Perspectives from local Actors .....	2066
Making Participatory Governance Work: the case of Radzionkow community in Upper Silesia Region in (...) ..	2067
Nationalism in National Identity: How Strong Identity Remains Nationalistic and Takes Patriotism Down (...) ..	2068
New Dilemmas for Civil Society? .....	2069
NGOisation of Civil Society Sphere in Turkey- An Indication of the Establishment of Global Governanc (...) ..	2070
Organized civil society and its activities of political representation in the EU arena.....	2071
Participation and Environment. The Local Dimension of Governance.....	2072
Picturing Power: Politics, aesthetics and gender in France and Norway.....	2073
Plataforma per Catalunya, the emergence of a successful populist radical right party in the Spanish aut (...) ..	2075
Policies Evaluation and Accountability in the European Union. Repercussions in the domain of educati (...) ..	2076
Policy-making without competences: EU actions in education and training .....	2077
Political involvement and civic participation .....	2078
Political Representation across Europe .....	2079
Public sphere, political field or governmentality? Mapping the new political sociology of European Union.....	2080
Radicalisation and the Discourse of Race and Religion .....	2081
Restoring Democracy from Below: Study of Ethnic Activism in Poland.....	2082
Strained Constitutionalism in New Member States.....	2083
Structural determinants of civic attitudes- a cross-country perspective on the measurement of bridging (...) ..	2084
The Changing Face of Intra-EU Migration after the Union's 2004 and 2007 Enlargements .....	2085
The Feeling of National and European Identity in the Globalization Era .....	2086
The Globalization Debate: A Public Justifications Analysis .....	2087
The nation-buidling process in the West Balcans .....	2088
The policy of scale: social capital and local development in Portugal .....	2089
The political participation of immigrants at institutional level in Italy .....	2090
The social magic of political representation .....	2091
The Swiss migrants' `Integration` agenda and the myth of a depoliticized education: Switzerland and its (...) ..	2092
Translucent social citizenship: Detecting and governing "work ability" in Swedish public employment se (...) ..	2093
Transnationalized Europhiles and Localized Eurosceptics: Attitudes towards European Integration from (...) ..	2094
Voluntary Associations and Local State in Finland and in Lithuania.....	2095
RN33-Women's and Gender Studies.....	2096
"Christian Occident", "Leitkultur" and "Fortress Europe" - challenges to feminist theory and politics.....	2097
"Lazy boys and ambitious girls" - The view of school students from a qualitative perspective .....	2098
"New Maternal Lifestyle" - Analysis of the Changes in Motherhood in Poland .....	2099
"Prevailing Women Ideal(s) in Modern Turkey: Always Honourable, Strong but Manageable" .....	2100
(Re) constituting the past, (Re)branding the present and (Re)imagining the future: Young women's spat (...) ..	2101
A «new man» for a New State: The construction of masculinity within the Mocidade Portuguesa.....	2102
Being a Woman in Prison From Gender Based Sociological Perspective: A case study in Closed Wom (...) ..	2103

Care Strategies and Social Inequality in Spain .....	2104
Caregivers for old people and social class .....	2105
Disable Women: Claiming for Equality.....	2106
Do Gender Disparities Shape Female Decisions?.....	2107
Drop Out of Women Graduates using the Example of Engineers in Baden-Württemberg, Germany .....	2108
Economic restructuring and the nature of things From industry to the care sector, working-class women (...) ..	2109
Excellent (woman) scientist in Estonia: discourses of excellency in science.....	2110
Families and Migrants on the Foundations of the Spanish Welfare State. A Diversion towards Informalit (...) ..	2111
Female Celebrity in Portuguese women's lifestyle magazines .....	2112
Female Contemporary Art Dealers in Chelsea (New York): What Happened to the Glass Ceiling? .....	2113
Female Research Excellence and Academic Migration in Europe .....	2114
Female self employment as a means of avoiding or circumventing the glass ceiling? .....	2115
Femininity, patriarchy and resistance in the postwar Bosnia and Herzegovina.....	2116
Feminism Viewed as the Theoretical and Methodological Basis of Gender Contradictions .....	2117
Freedom as Conformity: Re-veiling of Urban Women in Turkey .....	2118
Gender and heterosexuality: an analysis of visual discursive strategies in women's magazines advertis (...) ..	2119
Gender and Personal Networks in Spain at the beginning of XXI century.....	2120
Gender and Power in Local Politics .....	2121
Gender Empathy Citizenship .....	2122
Gender equality policies and social practices: new developments in Spain .....	2123
Gender Inequality and Female Political Participation in Great Britain .....	2124
Gender made by nutrition. Forms of social reproduction of a difference .....	2125
Gender Narratives and Gay Marriage : Towards Deconstruction of Family Ideology .....	2126
Gender Narratives and Ideological Effect of Patriarchal Protection toward Minorities.....	2127
Gender Representation in Italian Trade Unions.....	2128
Gender, locality and social capital. Studying diversity and (trans)formation of social capital across indivi (...) ..	2129
Gender, Migration, Remittances: Evidence from Germany .....	2130
Gender, Prisons and Drug Abuse .....	2131
Hidden Prostitution: Tendencies, Subcultures, Cultural Mobility .....	2132
How different is the work-life balance satisfaction between men and women in European comparison? .....	2133
How to explain the gender gap in self employment? .....	2134
Infertile women facing catholic morality in Poland. The case of in vitro fertilisation.....	2135
Integration strategies and policies in Italy: the case of intellectual migrant women.....	2136
International Women's Day: from objects to subjects of history.....	2137
Interrogating the Epistemic Status of Gender Research in European Sociology.....	2138
Managerial Gender Discourse, Human Resource Management and Organisational Change .....	2139
Migrant Women's Organizations in Athens: Gender and Social Capital .....	2140
New developments on the Prevention of Violence Against Women .....	2141
New gender inequality in a multicultural society: The dominance of masculine culture in a primary school .....	2142
Paradoxes of citizenship and migrant domestic workers, the case of feminine migration in Italy.....	2143
Personality, Gender and Career in Management .....	2144
Professionals and Mother or Professional Mothers? A Study of Career Paths of Young Women in Latvi (...) ..	2145
Reconciliation of work and family as a new social risk: Child care policies and the politics of inclusion a (...) ..	2146
Responses to Trafficking: law enforcement and women's state agencies in two port-cities.....	2147
School dropouts and the social construction of masculinity.....	2148
Sex and Gender: innate or learned? An analysis of the interplay between biological, evolutionary, psych (...) ..	2149
Sexual and Gender Harassment at University: The Case of the Czech Republic.....	2150
Shifting Gender Relations in Old Age? .....	2151

Social birth of the unborn: ultrasound visualization, consumption and medicalization .....	2152
Socio-demographic characteristics and gender expectations in transition: the case of Bosnia and Herze (...) ..	2153
Subjective representations of gender role-set in southern Italy .....	2154
The age norms of childbearing in European comparison .....	2155
The control measures directed against victims of human trafficking and procured women in Finland .....	2156
The discourse on body and femininity in Romanian women´s magazines: an audience-oriented approach .....	2157
The effect of democratic values and institutions on gender beliefs in nineteen European societies .....	2158
The Multi-Purpose Community Centers: Empowering Southeastern Anatolian Women, Turkey .....	2159
The object women in science in trading zones .....	2160
The parenthood effect: what explains the increase in gender inequality when British couples become p (...) ..	2161
The procedures of identification and of work with trafficked women: involvements for the measurement (...) ..	2162
The Social Construction of Gender Identities in Children: a qualitative study .....	2163
The Social Forge - Cooperation and individual performance among young male climbers.....	2164
The Stigma of Male Infertility: Historical and Contemporary Examples .....	2165
The visual representation of genders: one analysis through the male magazines .....	2166
Times of uncertainty - uncertain masculinities - A critical approach to questions of transforming gender (...) ..	2167
Trafficking in women in the Context of Sexual Exploitation: theoretical and empirical debates .....	2168
Transnational Mobility and the Intersection of Multiple Inequalities in Higher Education .....	2169
When nationality matters: Women´s Labour in Domestic Work and Escorting Services.....	2170
Who earns more? Influences on income distribution in couples - A European comparison.....	2171
Wife Murder: How This Cross European Phenomenun Due to Gender Inequality Continues to Be a Sali (...) ..	2172
Women and men as rural community leaders in Poland: activities, strategies of local cooperation and s (...) ..	2173
Women in the lives of Romanian transnational families .....	2174
Women migrants and care work in the South of Italy .....	2175
Women's Participation and Democracy in the University.....	2176
Women, Family Status and Class Position: Cases of Locally Notable Families in Provincial Turkey .....	2177
RS01-Sociology and Disability .....	2178
"Safe territories": How the special education discourse legitimises the classification of students as "lear (...) ..	2179
A sociological critique of disability commissions and rehabilitation in Russia.....	2180
A Transversal Politics of Accommodation: Toward an Expanded Model of Social Justice for Mothers (a (...) ..	2181
Actors and Power Dynamics in the Struggles of People with Disabilities: A Comparative Study of four T (...) ..	2182
Capabilities for What? Italian Employment Policies for Disabled People between Obstacles and Opportunity ..	2183
Cultural capital of disabled students in the context of meanings constructing the educational and social (...) ..	2184
Disability imagined: heroes and spongers in Soviet visual policy .....	2185
Disability, education and employment in Europe: A comparative study .....	2186
Disabled mothers and child custody in Canada and the UK; Intersections of Discourse, Practice and N (...) ..	2187
Disabled people and edgework: Disability, access and voluntary risk taking .....	2188
Disabled People and Self Directed Support Schemes: Re-Conceptualising Work and Welfare in the 21 (...) ..	2189
Disabling disability or the making and ameliorating of ontological outsiders .....	2190
Does size matter? .....	2191
Education for personnel in the care for persons with disabilities, a sometimes invisible issue.....	2192
Exclusion or integration of social assistance recipients from youth to adulthood .....	2193
From charity to social citizenship: disability policies and the Disabled People's Movement in Portugal.....	2194
Invisible Women: the lives of blind women in the Asylums and outdoor Missions in Edinburgh and Glasgow ...	2195
One Size Fits All? Exploring the lived experiences of women with "mental health problems" in an outre (...) ..	2196
Personal assistance: a gap in Portuguese inclusion strategy for people with impairment.....	2197
Public controversies and social care policies: experts and social movements in the history of care polici (...) ..	2198
Revisiting the "dys-appearing body" through the lens of psycho-emotional disablism .....	2199

The importance of cooperation for the total benefit of children with special needs in kindergarten.....	2200
The Lives and Loves of the She-Devil: exploring poststructuralist feminism as a source of inspiration fo (...)	2201
The problems of disabled people .....	2202
The Significance of FASD - diagnoses in the accounts of professionals in social and health services.....	2203
The Uses and Misuses of Disability Diagnostics .....	2204
When equality meets market forces: anti-discrimination legislation, fairness, justice and "good" busines (...)	2205
RS02-Dynamics and Complexity of Minority Statuses in Plural Societies .....	2206
"Ethnic" Media and Ethno-cultural Media Landscape in the Post-Soviet Russia .....	2207
Between ethnonational and civic national: The Hungarian Minority Identities from Romania, Slovakia, S (...)	2208
Community status of labour immigrants. The process of cultural adaptation and intercultural communic (...)	2209
From 'Race Relations' to 'Super-Diversity': Where does an Individual Immigrant Fit in the British Discou (...)	2210
Identities Gypsies in Portugal, plural identities? .....	2211
Identity of Polish nonbelievers as a patchwork and as a process.....	2212
Immigrant associations: between participation and institutionalization.....	2213
Immigrants and social networks: cultural approach .....	2214
Influences on a sense of 'Britishness' among different ethnic and religious groups in England .....	2215
Minorities within and minorities outside .....	2216
Minorities' situation in a majority Catholic society: a case study of a Polish rural area.....	2217
Multiplication, differentiation, hierarchical integration of identities .....	2218
Muslim pupils and the negotiation of Portuguese postcolonial identity.....	2219
Slums and plans: Poverty and spatial segregation of Roma in Serbia .....	2220
The Construction of the Modern Political Image through Tradition and its Presentation in the Media: Th (...)	2221
The Russian Minority in the Finnish Labour Market and Work Communities .....	2222
Who are we? Where are we headed? The Kashubian ethnicity .....	2223
RS03-East and West in Europe .....	2224
"Free movers" instead of immigrants? Polish migrants in the Irish labour market.....	2225
Basic Human Values on Cultural Level in East and West of Europe.....	2227
Beyond Ethnic Networks - Sociability Patterns of Romanian Students and Workers in London .....	2228
Democracy in a Wider Union: Europeanization as Differentiation .....	2229
EUropean "East" and "Wesr" in terms of Basic Human Values.....	2230
Identities and identity politics along the eastern fringe of the European Union .....	2231
Identity Dimensions: Russia in comparison with China .....	2232
On the representation of "others" at Europe´s borders: the case of Iraqi Kurds.....	2233
Poles-the biggest national minority in Ireland after the enlargement in 2004. Why some people perceive i (...)	2234
Political convergence of Polish peasants with European alter-mondialist movements: a matter of time?.....	2235
Post-communist contentious politics and the social movements in Central Eastern Europe.....	2236
Social and political divisions in Eastern Europe: the case of Poland.....	2237
The declining middle classes - A critical analysis of a new debate about inequality and its relevance for (...)	2238
The moving border between East and West in Europe: indicators, imageries, identities .....	2239
Trends in value orientations in Eastern and Western Europe: a comparative analysis .....	2240
Troubles with transformation of Polish political and cultural space. Antiliberalism in contemporary Poland. ....	2241
Uses of "Europe" - Conflicting Interpretations.....	2242
RS04-Europe and Immigration.....	2243
"Changing teams". Citizenship ceremonies as policies for social cohesion .....	2244
A Comparative Analysis of Variations in Islamic Faith and Practice among Muslim Immigrants in Europ (...)	2245
A Comparison of Internal Mobility of Immigrants and Natives in Turkey .....	2246
A space-sensitive approach to migration: New ways to migrant participation beneath and above the nat (...)	2247
Attitudes and representations of health and illness in immigrants .....	2248

Crossing ethnic lines.....	2250
Do migrants trust? - A multi-level analysis of individual, community, origin and destination effects on th (...)	2251
Ethnic organizations as representation of intra-European immigrants' interests - the case of Polish imm (...)	2252
Europe is my oyster: experiences of Finns working abroad .....	2253
Finnish Voluntary Associations in Europe: Transnational Civil Society Actors in Different Polity Regimes.....	2254
Gender Equality and Women's Rights - Contested Concepts in the Multicultural Nordic Countries.....	2255
How to be European? Denationalized life in the capital of Europe .....	2256
Identifications of Second Generation Muslim "Immigrants" in European Societies - a Comparative Case (...)	2257
Immigrant Integration and Transnational Activities. The Situation of Immigrants in Germany .....	2258
Immigrants' Access to Local Political Spaces: Voters and Elected Candidates in Portuguese Municipalit (...)	2259
Immigrant's integration: comparing migratory policies in Portugal and Spain .....	2260
Impact of migration on social participation.....	2261
In-depth analyses of attitudes towards immigrants in a highly multi-national society. A case study of Lu (...)	2262
Intermarriage among five immigrants communities living in Portugal: the case of Brazilians, Ukrainian, (...)	2263
Labour Mobility of Foreigners and the Role of Ethnic Networks in Germany .....	2264
Migrant Integration Research: Do we need a change of focus? .....	2265
Migrant workers in Latvia: positive and negative aspects in population attitudes.....	2266
Mortality and causes of deaths of foreigners in Italy (1997-2002) .....	2267
Negotiating belongings in transnational social fields: migrants from former Soviet Union in the Czech R (...)	2268
New migrants, new community: Polish nationals in Ireland after the EU enlargement in 2004.....	2269
Not only transnational: family patterns of immigrants in Italy.....	2270
Polish bi-national migrants in Northern Ireland -the study of the division into typically Polish and Northe (...)	2271
Re-Localization of Conflict Dynamics: "Conflict-generated Diaspora Groups and the Transportation of (...)	2272
Receiving Fantasy and Refugee Dream: Reception of Asylum Seekers in Sweden and Italy .....	2273
Regionalization of Social Work: Is there a way to reconcile national integration policy with transnational (...)	2274
Service, intimacy, subjection: three forms of work relationships in the domestic service sector .....	2275
Sources of disadvantage in occupational transition of immigrants in the Spanish labour market .....	2276
The Age Dimension of European Immigration: A New Challenge for European Societies?.....	2277
The networks of foreign immigrants in Italy .....	2278
The political development of origin and host countries: Democratic contributions of the transnational as (...)	2279
The Social Capital of Romanian Migrants: Social Networks, Trust and Association .....	2280
Transnational immigrant religions in Europe: Muslim's links to their home countries .....	2281
Transnational living? The trade-off between sending remittances and integrating in the host society: dat (...)	2282
Turkish migrants and native Germans compared: The effect of inter-ethnic and intra-ethnic friendships (...)	2283
Visible/Invisible: Chinese Diaspora in the Republic of Ireland.....	2284
Well-being of ethnic minority pupils in Flanders.....	2285
Why Do "Good" People Think That Immigrants are "Bad"?.....	2286
RS05-Historical Sociology.....	2287
Electronic ID Cards in the Societies of Control .....	2288
Paradoxical turns and changing horizons. Notes on the current landscape of the project of a cohesive (...)	2289
Social desintegration in the long-term: the possibility of decivilising processes .....	2290
The Emergence of Agriculture - Review of Recent Reseach.....	2291
Welfare beyond Society - What can we learn from the past? .....	2292
RS06-Maritime Sociology.....	2293
From Cardiff Docklands to Europe's Most Ambitious and Exciting Waterfront Development: Social and (...)	2294
Growing up in a seafaring family: recollecting one's childhood with an absent and present father .....	2295
History and future perspectives of Maritime Sociology .....	2296
Legal framework and organizational structure of P&I Clubs .....	2297

Social conditions of transformations in port cities .....	2298
The Quota Hopping Case: Common Fisheries Policy between Market and Law .....	2299
Traditional Ecological Knowledge as an Approach in the Management of Marine Protected Areas (MPAS).....	2300
RS07-Memory, Culture and Public Discourse.....	2301
"Memories of Tamazgha" Berber Identity and Memory Politics in Morocco and the European diaspora .....	2302
"New" images for the "old" countryside - an urban reinvention.....	2303
'Hello, Lenin!': Sensing The Proletarian Past at a Lithuanian Side-Show of Socialism .....	2304
Articulations of Generational Memory within the Post-Communist Context.....	2305
Bridge-memory, Trench-memory: The pragmatics of urban memory in the attitudes towards foreign im (...) ...	2306
Bringing Home the Dead: Bodies Politic in the New Global (Dis)Order.....	2307
Collective amnesia and financial collapse .....	2308
Collective memory in public discours.Internet discussion of neighboring group in Poland.....	2309
Collective Memory, Assemblage and 'Catastrophic Events' .....	2310
Contested images, collective memory and the mediatized public sphere: Abu Ghraib and the cultural c (...) ...	2311
Contested memories. The Vietnam War in American popular culture and civil discourse.....	2312
Convergence Points: Mountain Carvings, Racial Politics, and Contested Memory .....	2313
Cultural Trauma and Memory of the Expelled Peoples in Europe .....	2314
Distorted narratives: The Women's International War Crime Tribunal in 2000 .....	2315
From Memory to History: The Gulbenkian Foundation in Portugal.....	2316
From un-recognized to critically reconsidered past. Public memories about colonialism in contemporary Italy..	2317
In search of the New European. Identity without memory .....	2318
Industrial space and collective memory .....	2319
Literary fiction and public discourse. Reflecting upon the German reunification .....	2320
Maurice Halbwachs' concept of memory: a critical analysis .....	2321
Memorial to the Murdered Sinti and Roma of Europe: hierarchies of victimhood and contests of represe (...) ..	2322
Memory (re)construction: toward the discussion on memory sites renewal .....	2323
Memory and landscape - the unpleasant past in the local context .....	2324
Memory, political culture and revisionism in Spain .....	2325
Memory, time and responsibility .....	2326
Mining the past to manage the present: place, memory and identity in the city and the suburbs.....	2327
Negotiated memory of Second World War in the border city of Narva .....	2328
Polish Collective Memory of the Holocaust: Social and Education Discourse after 1989.....	2329
Postcards and déjà-vu: the "stamped picture" in our memories .....	2330
Public discourse, political accountability and the collective memory of socio-political events: A discours (...) ...	2331
Reflections of a Tragic Hero: How a distant past reconciled a distant future.....	2332
Reflections on Editing the Collective Memory Reader.....	2333
Reflections on the construction of the historical memory of nations: is it just useful or also needed?.....	2334
Remembering the victims of terrorism: A comparative analysis of the commemorative anniversaries of (...) ...	2335
Russian Diaspora in Central Europe: Collective Memory and Identities.....	2336
Selling Death, Remembering Life: Two Social Memory Sites in Budapest, Hungary .....	2337
The 1989 Revolutions and European Commemorative Agendas of 2009: Voids, Fallen Walls, and Mem (...) ..	2338
The city in songs, songs of the city: Lisbon's major role in the lyrics of an urban popular song (1935-2009) .....	2339
The Construction of Memory. History and culture in Italy, among personal, institutional and media mem (...) ..	2340
The Instrumental Uses of Memory in Urban Conflict: Barcelona's Can Ricart Industrial Site.....	2341
The Peaceful Revolution and its Aftermaths. Collective Memory and the Victims of Communism in East (...) ..	2342
The Phantom of Introjected Antisemitism: Hebrew, Yiddish, and the Return of the Repressed.....	2343
The structure and the mechanisms of shaping national historical consciousness in contemporary Russi (...) ..	2344
Transmemory, Identity and the Boundaries of the Portuguese Postcolonial Nation.....	2345

Urban life, city planning and the rebuilding of public discourse .....	2346
War Commemoration in Post-Soviet Russia: ceremonies, symbols and practices .....	2347
What is the meaning of the past for young people? The sociological portrait of the contemporary visitor (...) ..	2348
RS08-Modernization Theory. Dead or Alive in the 21st Century? .....	2349
Digging for Democracy Modernization, Development and Archaeology in Greece .....	2350
Divergence of Transformation Processes in Post-Communist Societies: a Civilization Context .....	2351
From modernity through postmodernity to reflexive modernization. Did we learn anything? .....	2352
From the margins to the centre: Post-modern geographies in the study of gentrification.....	2353
Modernization in the Arab countries of the Mashreq region .....	2354
Networking and self-organising societies: the fields of tension of our modernity.....	2355
Social Development: Unrefined or Undefined? .....	2356
The cultural underpinnings of contemporary modernity: a world-polity perspective on regional mobilisati (...) ..	2357
The modernization framework as a means of justification: the case of medical biotechnology developm (...) ..	2358
Theorizing racialization as modernization: interpreting social change in Russia .....	2359
Towards a New Sociology of Change for the Extended Borders of Europe: An Evaluation of the Revisi (...) ..	2360
Was the Soviet Union modern? .....	2361
World polity theory as a new theory of modernization .....	2362
RS09-Research Methods in Ethnic and Migration Studies .....	2363
A qualitative approach to the study of immigrants: health and care of irregular immigrants in the city of (...) ..	2364
Applying Internet ethnography in a study of transnational practices.....	2365
AUDIOvisual sociology, participation and migrations. An hypothesis of a shift of power .....	2366
Between "objective" and "subjective" quality of life measures. Material living standards and individual p (...) ..	2367
Conducting migration research in transnational social fields .....	2368
Constructing an empirical understanding of globalisation in the everyday lives of asylum-seeking refugees .....	2369
Discursive exclusion of migrants - towards a new concept of social exclusion .....	2370
Dynamics of Migrations Across Time and Space. Multi-Sited Ethnography, Grounded Theory and Histo (...) ..	2371
Escaping methodological nationalism - How migration research can profit of the sociology of space .....	2372
Everyday life - stories from elderly refugees and migrants: "What am I to do?" .....	2373
Following globalization. A grounded approach to pendular migration of Portuguese construction worker (...) ..	2374
Gender, interviews , newspaper and successful migrants.....	2375
Get under Their Skin and in Their Shoes. How to Address the 'Race-of-interviewer' Effect in Qualitative (...) ..	2376
Inheriting the Immigrant Condition - Immigrant Families' Strategies of Social Reproduction in Murcia (Spain) ..	2377
Inside the moment: Negotiating integration through language, identity, and culture in Finland.....	2378
Interrogating the Insider Outsider Binary in Qualitative Research: Insider, Outsider or Both? .....	2380
Investigating the intergenerational solidarity in transnational families. Methodological considerations.....	2381
Measuring the integration of immigrants. Critical notes from an Italian experience.....	2382
Migration Studies and Research Methodological Challenge .....	2383
Mobility of Russian Scientist: the comparative analysis of the historical stages.....	2384
Narrative interviews and participatory methods for researching immigrant children´s educational experi (...) ..	2385
National Identity and Otherness in Greek Speakers. Talk about Immigration: Methodological and Discip (...) ..	2386
Research Methods on Undocumented Migration in Southern Europe.....	2387
Research with and by Migrant Children .....	2388
Researching Ethnicity without Ethnicising Migrant Social Lives .....	2389
Researching migrant prostitution: racism and sexism in the field .....	2390
Social Psychological Considerations of the Use of Participatory Approaches: Ethical and Methodologic (...) ..	2391
Socio-Cultural Diffusion in the Baltic Countries .....	2392
Some reflections about EU funded research on youth of immigrant origin: the politics of subjectivity, eth (...) ..	2393
Survival Guide for Expats in Russia.....	2394

The German Integration Panel - How to measure the influence of integration courses on migrants' inte (...)	2395
The meanings of 'refugee'.....	2396
The online migrants: toward a cosmopolitan turn in migration studies? .....	2397
Understanding Integration by Addressing Complexity: The Study of "a Europe of Fortresses" .....	2398
Visual methodologies and the study of daily life microgeographies of immigrants in public space .....	2399
RS10-Socio-Anthropology of Trans-national Migrations and Migrants' Families .....	2400
(De)constructing family migration: female migrants in Slovenia (a case study).....	2401
Andean Immigration and the Reshaping of Contemporary Madrid.....	2402
Beyond motherhood: transforming sexualities and developing intimacies while maintaining transnationa (...)	2403
British Migration to Mugla-Gökova Region in Turkey: In the Search of Authenticity.....	2404
British Pakistannis: the role of kinship networks in political participation.....	2405
Children Sent Behind: the Dynamics of Transnational Families through the Prism of European Citizens (...)	2406
Constructing a Refugee: The State, NGOs and Gendered Experiences of Asylum in the Czech Republic .....	2407
Could exist a zero (pre-first) generation in migration? Transnational habitus formation and intergenerati (...)	2408
Does communication matter? Transnational communication within transnational family .....	2409
European free movers as an emerging marriageable group: some preliminary findings.....	2410
Family Migration and Transnational Habitus in Post-enlargement Europe: the case of Polish immigrant (...)	2411
Growing up with eagle-eyed neighbors. A study on how tight social networks influence norms and valu (...)	2412
How Young Romanians and Maroccans in Northern Italy use Social Capital .....	2413
Identifications and consumption styles among young people with immigrant origins in Italy.....	2414
Immigrant children imagining and building belonging in a transnational family .....	2415
Informal economies in the informal city: the case of alternative household's incomes found in hindu families ...	2416
Inter-level social processes within multi-sited migrant families.....	2417
Intergenerational solidarity in the context of transnational migration .....	2418
Is Family a Stumbling block to Highly Skilled Migration to Europe? .....	2419
Making new citizens: motherhood and migration.....	2420
Migrants' Families in Portugal: a socio-anthropological approach .....	2421
Objects of Love .....	2422
Return "for good"? : Experiences of Returnees to Turkey .....	2423
State of Imagination: Embodiments of Immigration Canada.....	2424
The effect of migration for labour of parents on school performance: a study of high school students fro (...)	2425
The traces of migration: 'here' and 'there' in the discourses of children of immigrants living in Madrid (Spain) ..	2426
Trans national Europeans? The influence of modern technologies on life strategies of Chechen refugee (...)	2427
Transnational Families.....	2428
Transnational lifestyles of high and low skilled migrants and their families in Luxembourg .....	2429
Transnational Migration of Ecuadorians in Spain and Family bonds (ESA) .....	2430
Transnational Motherhood: The Case of Romanian Women.....	2431
Young descendants from PALOP - ethnic identities .....	2432
RS11-Religion and the Sociology of Religion in Europe .....	2433
Charity in religious institutes: person's identification and social policy.....	2434
Four Approaches to Dealing with the Religious - Secular Divide.....	2435
Legacy and challenges: sociology of religion in Central and Eastern Europe .....	2436
National imaginary and the academic approach of religious phenomena in France .....	2437
On "Cultural Catholicism" and experiments with religion in Slovakia.....	2438
Religiosity in Cyprus: Towards secularization or cementing an ethnicity identity? .....	2439
Sociology of Religion in Germany: The Revitalization of Religion and the Boom of Research on Religion .....	2440
Sociology of Religion in Portugal: a difficult emancipation process .....	2441
Some dilemmas of sociological study of contemporary political dimensions of religion: the case of the C (...)	2442

Strategies of the constructing of credibility of the Roman Catholic Church in Poland in the face of cultur (...)	2443
The disciplinary ambivalence of Scandinavian Sociology of Religion.....	2444
The Function of Religion in Multi-cultural Swedish Society .....	2445
The imperfect secularization. Young people and the Italian way to secularization.....	2446
The Sociology of Religion in Europe.....	2447
RS12-Arts Management: Sociological Inquiries.....	2448
Art and cultural planning in Italy.....	2449
Arts Management and the Practice of Practice.....	2450
Arts management as concise or diffuse activity - value orientations of arts managers between culture a (...)	2451
Arts management as interface between aesthetic and managerial norms -the case of the "manager" for (...)	2452
Arts management, institutional logics and public culture. The case of Umbria Jazz Festival.....	2453
Arts Managers as Interfaces Between Arts and Finances .....	2454
Arts Mangement from the perspective of sociology of professions.....	2455
Cultural Leadership: Emerging the emergent .....	2456
Entrepreneurial agency and the case of a multi-media art director .....	2457
Investing in Mixed Goods: How perceptions of art and artists impact support for funding of the arts in t (...)	2458
Is Arts Policy to the benefit of the Autonomous Artist? The Position of Artists in Flemish contemporary (...)	2459
Marketing Strategies and Efficacies for Nonprofit Cultural Organizations .....	2460
Movie producers and project development .....	2461
On arts initiative and artistic policy: a history of institutionalisation, financing and artistic programming o (...)	2462
Organisations and Arts Organisations .....	2464
Product placement: a new tool to manage for the art sector? .....	2465
Professional development of young art managers in Austria.....	2466
Programming the Long Tail: Docs On-line Digital distribution is revolutionizing our cultural industries.....	2467
Social impact of top managers in the performing arts.....	2468
Sociology in Art Business Studies: the influences of Becker, Bourdieu, and DiMaggio .....	2469
Stimulating Creativity of Original Television Production at the BBC .....	2470
The coping strategies and the new approaches to management in the Russian cultural institutions: wes (...)	2471
RS13-Re-Assessing Class in Contemporary Sociology.....	2472
"We're all ordinary people": perceptions of class and class differences in personal relationships .....	2473
Class Cultures in "Classless" Finland - Preliminary Results from a National Survey .....	2474
Classifying Class in a Context of Crisis: exploring the nature of class in the early 21st Century .....	2475
Cultural and Moral Class Distinctions in a Nordic Context: Findings from a city in Denmark.....	2476
Exterminism and class struggle in E. P. Thompson: preliminary reflections.....	2477
Gender and class composition: A discussion on women's unpaid work in a globalised world in the light (...)	2478
Increasing upper and lower classes - shrinking middle class? .....	2479
Intergenerational social mobility and differentiated social capital: two studies of single-industry communities...	2480
Post-communist Social Structure: The Case of Romania.....	2481
Re-inventing yourself ?: new patterns of working-class youth transition in post-socialist St. Petersburg.....	2482
Similarities and recent differences in the post-comunist world: Social class differentiation and inequaliti (...)	2483
Social Class as Power Play and Status Games at the Local Level: Provincial Businessmen in Turkey .....	2484
Social Class in the Domestic Sphere: Housewives and Unpaid Live-in Servants in the name of "adopte (...)	2485
Social Classes and Individual Pathways: Theoretical Issues and Empirical Research on Higher Educati (...)	2486
Social Classes, Age and Values in Europe.....	2487
Social classes, social capital and political attitudes in Europe.....	2488
The Limits of the Cosmopolitan Vision: Class, Mobility and Mindset.....	2489
The Rise of Class-based Wage Inequality. Results from the German Labor Market .....	2490
Time Use as Indicator for Social Inequality: Social Classes in Comparison.....	2491

Understanding the Dynamics of Class and Class Relations in Contemporary Scotland .....	2492
Urban youth from wealthier families: a way of life.....	2493
RS14-Chronic Regional Conflicts.....	2494
"From the River to the Sea, Humanity will be Free" - The Dynamics of the New Civil Society in Israel .....	2495
Binationalism in the Israeli-Palestinian Conflict .....	2496
Israeli/Palestinian Peace Building as a Social Process .....	2497
Military Rationality in Aerial Bombardment from Kosovo to Gaza - Underpinning Global Securitisation.....	2498
Politics and Violence in Israel/Palestine Past, Present and Future .....	2499
Towards Inner Coexistence: The Long-Term Effects of Jewish-Arab Youth Encounters in Israel .....	2500
Two Peoples in a Shared Ecology: Framing Strategies and Outcomes of a Middle East Environmentalism (...) ..	2501
RS15-Rethinking intergenerational transmission of inequalities .....	2502
Doing interviews on potentially sensitive issues with young people and their parents .....	2503
Economic support by own parents: Does the welfare state assure the basic security among young adults (...) ..	2504
Elements of Inequalities in the Life Course of Young Adults - Comparing the life course of young adults (...) ..	2505
Generational change of personal social space: the case of Estonia .....	2507
Housing for the new economic elite - A case study of Novi Sad in Serbia .....	2508
Inheritance - Extra income or generator of inequality? .....	2509
Literacy and social inequalities in the Portuguese society.....	2510
New models of social representations about the future: short term strategies and social mobility processes ....	2511
On inequality of intergenerational transfers: baby boomers as helpers of their children .....	2512
Primary and secondary effects of family background in the educational decisions of minority and majority (...) ..	2513
Puzzles and evidence on the transmission of social inequality across generations: parenting, emotional (...) ..	2514
Reproduction of Social Inequality in Urban Russia: Investigating the Effects of In-Family Culture Trans (...) ....	2515
Teenage parenthood and intergenerational transmission of social inequalities .....	2516
The income situation of Europe's elderly. A national, an intermediary and a European perspective .....	2517
The Russian Minority in the Finnish Labour Market and Work Communities .....	2518
The transmission of inequality through a professional group: reflections on the reproduction of the dominant (...) ..	2519
Transition to adulthood in Casal da Boba, Amadora .....	2520
Young adults from medium size town in Poland-social mobility and inequality transmission from the life- (...) ..	2521
RS16-Russia and Its European Identity .....	2522
'Make Way to Professional Sociology!' or public sociology in the Russian context .....	2523
A Country of "Well Educated Amateurs" - Interconnections between Employees' Qualification, Exploitation (...) ..	2524
Changes and continuity in mental health policy of post-soviet Russia .....	2525
Civil Society in Russia Facing World Economic Crisis.....	2526
Constructing gender in women's crisis centres - state and NGO units tackling domestic violence in Russia .....	2527
Cultural identity of Russia .....	2528
Cultural identity of Russia .....	2529
Eco-social images and simulacra of transforming societies (Russian and Moldavian examples) .....	2530
Environmental discussion in the world socialist movement in the context of globalization.....	2531
European Education and Russian Universities .....	2532
Internal and External Phobias and Dangers in Russian Mass Consciousness .....	2533
Leveraging Russia - talent abroad in Social Sciences: Evidence from a Survey.....	2534
On the legal monitoring as a sociological means of understanding policy-making process in the Russia (...) ..	2535
Power and Influence in Russian Business Organisations.....	2536
Pre/post Globalization in Today's Russia.....	2537
Problems of physical inability and invalids.....	2538
Public Involvement in Civil Activity: philanthropy in Russia .....	2539
Russian Press: Problems of Terrorism .....	2540

Socio-Cultural Paradigm of Labour Under Globalization and Modernization of Society and Economy .....	2541
Striving for social change: Non-governmental organisations (NGOs) and HIV/AIDS in the Russian Fede (...) ..	2542
Struggling without success? Russian civil society caught between international and domestic demands (...) ..	2543
Tolerance as a Condition of Stable Relations .....	2544
Two Models of Social and Political Communication .....	2545
Visual sources in teaching public sociology .....	2546
Where does Russia's welfare state end? The role of non-governmental actors in disability provision .....	2547
Work Socialization Messages in Late-Soviet and Post-Soviet Schoolbooks: a Content-Analysis of the F (...) ..	2548
Youth of Post-Soviet Russia: Socio-Economic Position, Value Orientations and Living Aspirations .....	2549
RS17-Sociology of Celebration .....	2550
"Celebrating the family" - On the neglected side of family rituals .....	2551
Can a new celebration bring social change? The phenomenon of new street festivals in Poland .....	2552
Celebration in the service of togetherness .....	2553
Crossing Boundaries. The Social Meaning of Celebration in Berlin and Bangkok´s Party Scene .....	2554
Homus eventis: postmodern citizen between cultural experiences and new forms of participation in coll (...) ..	2555
Imaginated Slavery. What happens at sadomasochistic parties .....	2556
Spectacularisation of Faith. The Catholic World Youth Day 2005 in Cologne and the complementarity o (...) ..	2557
The Celebration of Local Identities through Carnival in Cologne and Paris .....	2558
Transformation of the festival calendar in today´s Russia: policies and practices .....	2559
Abstract Index .....	2560

Authors Index

Ávila, Patrícia.....	2510
	1946
Åkerström, Malin.....	1362
Çabuk Kaya, Nilay.....	2103
Çampinari, Tefik.....	2360
Çelik, Kezban.....	1962
Öhman, Susanna.....	1494
Özen, Yelda.....	1072
-, On behalf of the Spanish Group on Quality of Life and Ageing.....	25
Aaltonen, Sanna.....	1941
	2503
Aamot, Ingvild.....	321
Aapola-Kari, Sinikka.....	1923
Aarelaid-Tart, Aili.....	230
Abbas, Andrea.....	1352
	704
Abbott, Pamela.....	1137
Abdul Majid, Marina.....	860
Aboim, Sofia.....	979
Abrahamsen, Bente.....	1289
Abrahamsson, Lena.....	1281
Abreu, Maria José.....	410
Achatz, Juliane.....	1050
	1014
Adami, Roberta.....	1508
Adem, Çigdem.....	807
Adriaenssens, Stef.....	1541
	648
	1587
Afonso, Almerindo.....	2076
Agabrian, Mircea.....	687
Agirdag, Orhan.....	688
Agnes, David-Kacso.....	732
Agostinho, Kátia Adair.....	270
Ahedo, Manu.....	651
	729
Ahlbeck-Rehn, Jutta.....	1108
Ahnlund, Petra.....	2192
Ahrweiler, Petra.....	1636
Ahteensuu, Marko.....	1465
	1485
Aires Mesquita Vieira Ferreira, Ana Inês.....	1756

Aitken, Mhairi.....	877
Akarçay, Erhan.....	622
Akcaoglu, Aksu.....	416
Akerkar, Supriya Akerkar.....	599
Akhtar, Parveen.....	1983
	2405
Akpınar, Aylin.....	1034
Aktan, Oktay.....	1926
	554
Aktas Yamanoglu, Melike.....	1952
	382
Al-Rebholz, Anil.....	1787
	2070
Alanen, Leena.....	261
Alarcão, Violeta.....	2248
Alasuutari, Maarit.....	313
Alasuutari, Pertti.....	2362
Albaigés, Bernat.....	730
Albenga, Viviane.....	164
Alberth, Lars.....	1330
Album, Dag.....	1149
Albuquerque, Paula.....	54
Alcalde, Javier.....	1676
Aleksandrovs, Aleksandrs.....	17
	1866
Alessandro, Bergamaschi.....	498
Alexander, Victoria D.....	127
Alexandre, Helena.....	1020
Alexandre, Sílvia.....	392
Alho, Rolle.....	1166
Alietti, Alfredo.....	1972
Alieva, Aigul.....	1874
	701
Alimi, Eitan.....	1680
Al Jahoub, Mahasen.....	1305
Allaste, Airi-Alina.....	1922
Allen, Judith.....	2399
Allsop, Judith.....	1249
Al Makhmerha, Sahar.....	1305
Alm Andreassen, Tone.....	1679
Almeida, António José.....	1272
Almeida, João Ferreira.....	2488
Almeida, Joelma.....	2387
Almeida, Maria Sidalina.....	1939
Almeida, Maria Strecht.....	1609

Almeida, Paulo .....	1156
Almeida, Sara .....	1718
Almlund, Pernille.....	1419
Altglas, Veronique .....	1995
Altmann, Philipp.....	469
Alvarez-Miranda, Berta.....	2281
Alves, Fátima.....	1106
Alves, Mariana Gaio .....	659
Alves, Natália.....	1960
	735
Amacker, Michèle .....	1735
	1460
Amandio, Ana Sofia.....	1341
	784
Amaro, Fausto .....	1469
	107
	980
Amossé, Thomas.....	1479
Amozurrutia de María y Campos, José Antonio .....	1368
Ampudia, Fernando .....	2325
	2290
Ancelovici, Marcos.....	1185
	1190
Andersen, Anne Holst.....	887
Andersen, Nina Blom.....	598
Anderson, Seonaid .....	342
Andersson, Janicke .....	65
Andersson, Katarina .....	19
Andersson, Kjerstin .....	256
Andersson Cederholm, Erika.....	1406
Anderton, David.....	429
Andrzej, Piotrowski .....	227
Angelescu, Gina .....	1875
Anheier, Helmut.....	1414
Anikin, Vasily .....	1271
Anjos, Cláudia .....	2197
Annandale, Ellen .....	1095
Anne-Cécile, NENTWIG .....	209
Antonini, Erica .....	550
Antonio, Muñoz González .....	1761
Antony, Richard .....	1912
Antunes, Maria João.....	755
Antunes, Ricardo.....	1078
	1131
Apitzsch, Ursula.....	2428

Appell, Jens-E. ....	33
Appelrath, Hans-Jürgen.....	33
Araújo, Emília .....	242
	1957
	1750
	490
Araújo, Helena C. ....	2176
	2148
	1582
Araújo, Marta .....	1992
Araújo, Pedro.....	1484
Aramburu, Mikel .....	2306
Araste, Lii.....	1936
Arber, Sara .....	1084
	51
Arellano Morlas, Fermín .....	1157
Arenas, Miguel.....	1704
Arenas Conejo, Míriam.....	2106
Areosa, João .....	1492
Areoso Feio, Joana .....	2421
Arfini, Elisa A.G. ....	1594
Ariza Segovia, Sergio.....	21
	2105
Armitage, Neil.....	222
Arnett, Stephanie.....	716
Arnoldussen, Tobias.....	1509
Aro, Hillevi .....	1864
Arppe, Tiina .....	750
Arregi, Begoña.....	56
Arriaga, Alicia .....	862
Arriscado Nunes, João .....	1599
Artiaga Leiras, Alba .....	1178
Arturo, Ballesteros Leiner .....	1303
Arun, Özgür .....	80
Asheulova, Nadia .....	1631
	2384
	1317
Ashwin, Paul.....	704
Ask, Torunn A.....	2373
Asrak Hasdemir, Tugba.....	1233
Assis, José .....	1601
Assmuth, Laura .....	2231
Assunção, Fátima.....	1766
Atkinson, Will .....	2489
ATTIAS-DONFUT, Claudine.....	936

Aubert, Adriana.....	694
	1695
Augustinsson, Sören .....	1268
Augusto, Amélia .....	1507
	1100
Augusto, Nuno.....	1929
Aurélie, Hess-Miglioretti.....	1087
Auray, Nicolas .....	1322
Autonen-Vaaraniemi, Leena.....	1000
Avram, Silvia.....	708
	1727
Aybek, Can .....	1884
Bäckström, Åsa .....	1916
Bäckström, Bárbara.....	1120
Bénard da Costa, Ana .....	680
Bühler-Niederberger, Doris.....	1330
	258
Büttner, Sebastian .....	2357
Babenko, Svitlana.....	1832
Bacak, Valerio .....	1536
	1914
Baccaro, Lucio.....	1158
	1173
Bacci, Denise De La Corte .....	884
Bacher, Johann .....	678
Bachner, Yaacov .....	1431
Bacigalupe, Amai.....	56
Backett-Milburn, Kathryn .....	921
Backman, Christel .....	1470
Baert, Patrick.....	1633
	1843
Bagli, Melike Turkan.....	676
Baglioni, Mirella .....	1163
Bagnasco, AnnaMaria .....	2465
Baker, Gus.....	1513
Baker, Sally .....	226
Baker, Stephanie .....	2332
Baker, Stephanie-Alice .....	781
Balázs, Bálint.....	818
Balabanova, Evgeniya.....	1172
	2536
Balland, Ludivine .....	456
Baltzis, Alexandros.....	187
Balzekiene, Aiste .....	1452
	822

Banaszak, Ilona .....	1462
Bandeira, Miguel.....	541
	797
Barberet, Rosemary .....	2335
Barbosa Neves, Bárbara .....	107
Barbulescu, Roxana .....	2277
	92
Barbut, Clélia .....	124
Bardes, Julia.....	902
Barisione, Mauro .....	2055
Barkai, Sigal .....	117
Barnao, Charlie.....	2132
barnao, charlie.....	2051
Barnes, Colin .....	2189
Barnett, Julie.....	1496
	1495
Baron, Stefan.....	91
Barradas, Carlos.....	1992
	1238
Barros, Vitor.....	2020
Barroso, Margarida.....	1055
Barth, Matthias .....	842
Bartholini, Ignazia.....	1743
Bartoletti, Roberta.....	420
	953
	508
Baser, Bahar.....	2272
Bassetti, Chiara .....	486
	145
Basto, Eduardo.....	586
Basto, Maria-Benedita .....	2345
Bauer, Gerrit.....	1436
Bauer, Heike.....	1563
	1566
Bauernschmidt, Stefan .....	1347
Bauschke-Urban, Carola .....	2169
Bauwens, Joke .....	167
	1227
Beat, Muerner.....	2098
Beauzamy, Brigitte .....	1650
	2031
Beccalli, Bianca .....	1047
Bech, Henning.....	1854
Beck, Vanessa.....	1023
Becker, Maya.....	2491

Becker, Patrick .....	804
Becker, Uwe .....	426
Beckers, Tilo .....	1558
Beckfield, Jason .....	1099
Beduschi, Luiz Carlos .....	884
Bee, Cristiano .....	1201
Beetz, Michael .....	1804
Begiristain, JMaria .....	56
Behling, Felix .....	607
Behnke, Christoph .....	2452
Beitnere, Dagmara .....	537
Bekhuis, Hidde .....	371
Bela, Baiba .....	233
Belchior, Ana Maria .....	1677
	2079
Belem, Marcela Purini .....	649
Bellotti, Elisa .....	492
Belluati, Marinella .....	1211
Belova, Natalia .....	2538
Ben-Porat, Guy .....	394
Bendelac, Leticia .....	2497
Bendina, Olga .....	1076
	548
Benedetti, Rachele .....	1738
Beneito-Montagut, Roser .....	772
Bengtsson, Beatrice .....	888
Benski, Tova .....	743
Bento, Sofia .....	1618
	843
	828
Berdysheva, Elena .....	630
Bereswill, Mechthild .....	2167
Berg, Annukka .....	899
Berg, Noora .....	1864
Berghman, Michaël .....	421
Bergman, Jonny .....	2369
Bergmans, Anne .....	814
Berli, Oliver .....	370
Bernad Caverro, Olga .....	711
Bernardi, Laura .....	2154
Bernhard, Stefan .....	1715
	2048
Bernik, Ivan .....	1548
Bershanskaya, Margarita .....	681
Bertasio, Danila .....	475

Bertaux, Daniel.....	1778
Berten, Hans.....	657
	1913
Bertone, Chiara .....	1545
Berzosa, Guayarmina.....	2262
Besnard, Denis.....	566
Bessa Ribeiro, Fernando.....	1556
Best, Henning.....	1436
	836
Beuscart, Jean-Samuel .....	636
Beyl, Joke.....	167
Bezmez, Dikmen .....	2182
Bianchera, Emanuela .....	51
Bianchi, Mariana.....	879
Bielski, Piotr.....	2552
Bifulco, Lavinia .....	2039
Binder, Piotr.....	1893
	1350
Binder, Werner .....	1834
	2312
Binken, Saskia.....	1703
Birgit, Blättel-Mink.....	404
Bittencourt, Bernadete.....	618
Björnberg, Ulla.....	989
	794
Blättel-Mink, Birgit.....	1299
Blatrix, Cécile.....	2031
Bleicher, Alena .....	855
Bloch, Charlotte.....	748
Block, Karen .....	302
	300
	286
Blokker, Paul .....	2229
	2083
Blokland, Talja .....	1703
Bluemling, Bettina.....	808
Blumer, Nadine.....	2322
Bobek, Alicja.....	2269
	2225
Bobylev, Alla.....	859
Bobylev, Sergey .....	859
Boccia Artieri, Giovanni .....	508
	131
	1897
	953

Bode, Ingo .....	1330
Boehm, Stephan.....	113
Boehnke, Mandy.....	2171
Boersema, Jacob.....	1982
	767
Bognar, Eva.....	1683
Boiko, Olga .....	1408
Boje, Thomas P.....	1011
Boklin, Alex.....	402
	504
Boldt, Thea .....	243
Boll, Susanne .....	33
Bonal, Xavier .....	730
Bonito, Jorge .....	702
Boone, Simon.....	668
Bordoni, Carlo.....	482
Borges, Vera.....	1340
Borisenkova, Anna .....	1827
Boron, Aleksandra .....	2329
	2008
Borrelli, Davide .....	1235
Borrelli, Nunzia .....	561
Borsenberger, Monique .....	59
Bos, Eltje .....	189
Bosoni, Marialetizia .....	940
Bossy, Sophie.....	1660
Boström, Magnus .....	820
Bottero, Wendy.....	563
Boudes, Philippe.....	1813
	829
Boudiny, Kim .....	98
	962
Bould, Sally.....	948
Bourgeault, Ivy.....	1252
Bovadilla, Stefania.....	723
Boy, Nina .....	446
Boyne, Roy .....	640
Boyras, Cemil .....	1902
Bozonnet, Jean-Paul .....	858
Bozzini, Emanuela.....	1691
Bråten, Mona .....	1197
Brückner, Gerhard.....	1221
Bracke, Piet .....	1148
	1147
	1075

	1057
	47
	912
	1110
	1089
Braeckman, Lutgart .....	1121
Brak-Lamy, Maria de Guadalupe.....	1581
Bral, Liesbeth.....	98
	962
Brandão, Ana Maria.....	1528
Brandl, Bernd.....	1155
	1176
Brandt, Martina .....	110
Braukmann, Stephanie.....	2151
	68
Brereton, Bernadette .....	666
	1043
Brey, Elisa .....	539
Brian, Heaphy.....	1560
Briebe, Catalina .....	272
Brink, Simone .....	1207
Briska, Iveta.....	2266
Brites, Rui .....	2488
	949
	2487
Brock, Inés.....	793
	271
Brodzinska, Marta.....	1495
Brookes, Michael.....	1055
Brown, Partick .....	1455
Browne, Craig.....	1820
Bruess, Joachim.....	2250
	1224
Bruff, Ian .....	445
Bruhn, Anders.....	759
Bruni, Attila .....	1608
	1544
Bruquetas Callejo, Carlos.....	945
Bryniewicz, Wioleta .....	2296
Brynolf, Margrethe .....	1268
Buß, Eugen.....	673
Buchmann, Marlis.....	931
Budakowska, Elzbieta .....	494
Budil, Ivo.....	1970
Budowski, Monica.....	1460

Budowski, Monica.....	1735
Buehlmann, Felix.....	992
Buffel, Tine .....	28
	44
Bunio, Paulina .....	2516
Bureau, Viola.....	1304
Burdziej, Stanislaw .....	1825
Burgués de Freitas, Ana.....	2006
Burkert, Carola .....	1050
Burnay, Nathalie.....	1121
Burns, Nicola .....	2188
Burns, Tom .....	1515
Burns, Tom R. ....	616
Busch, Anne .....	1033
Butkeviciene, Egle .....	854
Byczkowska, Dominika.....	1344
Byrne, David .....	443
	2475
Célérier, Sylvie .....	1479
Cabaço, Susana.....	1781
	472
Caballero, Chamion.....	997
Cabecinhas, Rosa .....	2137
Cabrera, Pedro José .....	1716
Cabrita, Miguel .....	1785
	1711
Cachado, Rita.....	2416
Caen, Maya .....	556
Caetano, Ana.....	464
Cafruny, Alan.....	449
Caiani, Manuela.....	2081
Cailliez, Julie.....	2256
Cairns, David .....	1907
Calaf, Priscila.....	314
Calca, Patrícia .....	1781
	1721
Caliandro, Christian .....	181
Calnan, Michael.....	1313
	1455
Calvert, Emma.....	1198
Calvo-Borobia, Kerman .....	1546
Campbell, Elaine .....	524
	2310
Campos, Alfredo.....	682
	1160

Can, Neriman .....	2246
Cancio, Teresa .....	90
Cancio Oliveira, Teresa .....	45
Candeias, Adelinda .....	702
Cantó-Milà, Natàlia .....	2554
	754
Capella, Danielle .....	1567
	2149
Capmdepadros, Roger .....	2279
Caporali, Arianna .....	2154
Carballo, Marta .....	2213
Carbone, Luca .....	2300
Cardini, Daniela .....	1218
	503
Cardoso, Daniel .....	1567
Cardoso, Filipa .....	585
Cardoso, Gustavo .....	1216
Cardoso, Inês .....	949
Cardoso, Tânia .....	1037
Carla, Pinto .....	1770
Carmo, Renato .....	2488
	2089
Carneiro, Nuno .....	1595
Carreira, Mario .....	2248
Carreira da Silva, Filipe .....	1824
Carrito, Manuela .....	2148
Carroll, Rachel .....	1352
Caruso, Giuseppe .....	1655
Carvajales Bresque, Huenu Anahi .....	254
Carvalho, António .....	1606
Carvalho, Helena .....	618
	1040
	1946
	1644
Carvalho, Maria João Leote de .....	309
Carvalho, Teresa .....	1329
Carvalho e Silva, Willame .....	679
Carvalho Ferreira, José Maria .....	641
Casado-Aparicio, Elena .....	1206
	937
Casaleiro, Paula .....	1758
Casanova, Catarina .....	885
	910
Caselli, Marco .....	2382
Casey, Mark .....	1591

Caspersen, Joakim.....	1296
Cassián Yde, Nizaiá .....	86
Cassidy, Angela.....	1523
	1450
Castelló Santamaria, Laia .....	2104
Castrén, Anna-Maija.....	999
Cattani, Annalisa .....	146
Cayir, Kenan.....	662
Cea D´Ancona, M <sup>a</sup> Ángeles.....	1994
Cent, Joanna .....	1382
Centemeri, Laura.....	578
Centeno, Maria João .....	518
Cera, Rosália.....	1635
Ceravolo, Flavio Antonio .....	2511
Cerdeira, Maria da Conceição.....	79
Cerqueira, Carla .....	2137
Cerulo, Massimo.....	764
Cervinkova, Alice.....	2160
Cesnuiyte, Vida .....	1005
Cevik, Aylin.....	80
Ceyhan, Cagdas.....	622
Chalari, Athanasia .....	1490
Chalcraft, John .....	1665
Chalvet, Martine .....	600
Chamak, Brigitte.....	1111
Champy, Florent.....	1292
Chaves, Miguel.....	2519
Chen, Hsin-Jen.....	758
	2142
Chirikov, Igor .....	1642
Chomczynski, Piotr.....	1422
Chong, Derrick.....	2469
Choroszewicz, Marta .....	1338
Chorynski, Adam .....	1612
Christensen, Karen.....	1706
Christopoulou, Nadina .....	2140
Chromiec, Elzbieta .....	455
Chromkova Manea, Beatrice .....	982
	933
Chung, Jinwon.....	150
Ciccia, Rossella .....	624
Cid, Marília .....	702
Ciocea, Malina.....	470
Ciofalo, Giovanni .....	2340
Ciornei, Irina .....	2306

Cirakman Deveci, Asli .....	2118
Cisneros-Puebla, Cesar A. ....	1351
Claes, Tom .....	1578
Claeys, Cécilia.....	600
	868
Clamote, Telmo .....	1066
	1081
Claudia, Prof. Dr. Gather .....	2134
Clement, Franz .....	1174
Coêlho, Christiane .....	232
	1717
Coakley, Anne .....	1028
Coelho, Bernardo .....	949
	614
	1029
	1555
Coelho, Manuel .....	602
	2299
Coenders, Marcel .....	1979
Coetzee, Jan K.....	1425
Coffé, Hilde.....	968
Cohen, Jeffrey .....	2246
Coimbra, Artemisa.....	2172
Cole, Nicki Lisa.....	1797
Collizzolli, Stefano .....	2366
Colman, Elien .....	1057
	1075
	47
Colombo, Asher D. ....	2270
	2267
	2275
Colonna, Elena .....	270
Comini Cesar, Maria Eugenia.....	2021
Comsa, Mircea .....	1956
	2240
Comunello, Francesca.....	534
Conde, Idalina .....	138
	2316
Conti, Cinzia .....	2278
Conway, Brian .....	1429
Cook, Matt .....	1585
	1563
Cooney, Adeline .....	1400
	109
Cooper, Barry .....	712

Corbu, Nicoleta.....	470
Corcoran, Mary P .....	2327
Cornelis, Mathieu.....	1615
Correa, Amelia.....	132
Correia, Carina .....	1329
Correia, Carla .....	1567
Correia, Maria da Luz .....	2330
	180
Correia, Sónia Vladimira.....	974
Correia, Secundino.....	755
Correia, Tiago.....	1334
Correia, Zita.....	1635
Corsten, Michael.....	306
Cortes, Maria .....	2248
Cosentino de Cohen, Clemencia.....	674
Coslor, Erica .....	652
	621
Cossu, Andrea.....	474
Costa, Antonio Firmino da .....	1634
	2486
Costa, Dália .....	1742
Costa, Hermes.....	1188
Costa, Juliana.....	755
Costa, Pedro.....	1340
Costa, Rafael.....	468
Costa, Rosalina .....	2551
Costa, Susana .....	910
	885
Costa Araújo, Helena .....	737
Cotta, Diogo.....	1618
	1852
Couceiro, Mariña .....	1737
Coulson, Susan .....	121
Couto, Ana Isabel .....	1257
Coward-Bucher, Carrie.....	160
Crabbé, Ann .....	814
Craveiro, Isabel .....	1398
Crespi, Isabella.....	948
	1024
Crinson, Iain .....	1243
Cristoforetti, Antonio.....	1384
	43
Crnic, Ales .....	2442
Cronin, Ann.....	1391
	87

	1535
Crossley, Nick.....	563
Crouch, Colin.....	1154
Crowhurst, Isabel.....	1588
	2390
	1547
Cruz, Ana Rita .....	472
Cruz, Raquel.....	265
Cruz-Castro, Laura.....	1616
	1602
Csata, Zsombor .....	644
Cuartango Acha, Izaskun .....	13
Cucu, Alina .....	2337
Cukut, Sanja.....	2368
	2401
Culic, Irina.....	2036
	2424
Cunha, Lúcio .....	586
Cunha, Sandra .....	291
Cunha, Vanessa.....	925
Cunha Silvestre, Maria João .....	1742
	1944
Cunningham- Burley, Sarah .....	921
Cuzzocrea, Valentina .....	1277
	1872
Cveticanin, Predrag .....	466
	190
Czarzasty, Jan.....	1193
Dönmez, Funda.....	895
D'Hoore, William.....	1121
d'Ovidio, Francesco Domenico.....	465
Daatland, Svein Olav.....	70
da Costa, Isabel.....	1194
da Cruz Martins, Susana .....	384
Daher, Liana Maria.....	1661
	1911
Dahle, Rannveig.....	1315
Dahmen, Jennifer .....	1031
Dalaibuyan, Byambajav.....	1672
Dale, Angela.....	373
Dallinger, Ursula.....	2238
	1713
Damásio, Manuel.....	1226
Damean, Diana.....	2157
	685

Damelang, Andreas.....	2264
Danilova, Elena .....	2232
	645
Danilova, Nataliya.....	2347
Daoud, Adel.....	655
Dar, Anandini.....	317
Darbaz, Bade.....	268
Darrot, Catherine.....	2235
David Kacso, Agnes .....	2431
Davis, Elise.....	302
Davis, Howard .....	226
Davy, Zowie.....	1573
Davydova, Svetlana.....	1671
Day, Graham .....	226
Dayanova, Elina .....	733
de Almeida Alves, Nuno .....	717
	285
de Benedittis, Mario.....	201
	545
Deblonde, Marian .....	814
De Botton, Lena.....	2006
De Cang, Lien.....	2462
	177
de Cecco, Emanuela .....	159
Decleire, Céline .....	1121
Dede, Kadir.....	1228
De Donder, Liesbeth.....	28
	44
Deery, Ruth .....	1059
Deindl, Christian .....	110
Deindl, Christian Deindl.....	944
De Jong, Mart-Jan.....	2265
De Keere, Kobe .....	483
de Krom, Michiel.....	817
de la Blétière, Vanessa.....	1044
	790
	1187
DELCROIX, Catherine.....	1760
Delibas, Kayhan .....	1517
Delicado, Ana .....	1617
	285
del Negro, Grazia .....	1724
Demanet, Jannick.....	714
	713
Demant, Jakob .....	1370

Demir, Ipek .....	2233
Demir Gürdal, Ayça .....	1840
Demirli Yoraz, Aylin .....	582
Demontis, Claire .....	600
Denaeghel, Kim .....	41
de Nardis, Fabio .....	1693
Deneva, Neda.....	2406
Denissen, Amy .....	2147
Dequirez, Gaelle.....	1692
Derycke, Hanne.....	1121
de Sousa, Marta A. P. ....	828
	1466
	846
Desrues, Thierry .....	1988
Deuffic, Philippe.....	847
de Valck, Marijke .....	2467
de Verdalle, Laure .....	2461
DeVereaux, Constance .....	2450
Devine, Dympna.....	312
Devleeshouwer, Perrine .....	710
De Witte, Nico.....	44
	28
Dias, Hugo.....	1170
Dias, Isabel.....	1393
Dias, Joao Paulo .....	1275
Dias, Mariana .....	705
Dias, Sónia .....	2248
Dias-Sardinha, Idalina .....	889
Dias da Silva, Patrícia .....	1213
Di Bartolomeo, Anna .....	2124
	723
	1877
Di Blas, Nicoletta .....	495
	484
Didry, Claude.....	1169
Diego Gonçalves, Carmen .....	594
	1504
Di Fraia, Guido .....	782
Diogo, Ana.....	677
Di Stefano, Antonio.....	411
Dix, Steffen .....	2441
Dobbernack, Jan .....	2050
Dodd, Nigel.....	626
Doell, Peter.....	2022
Doerfler, Thomas.....	1999

Doerr, Nicole.....	1656
Dolnicar, Vesna .....	31
Domínguez-Folgueras, Marta.....	957
Domaneschi, Lorenzo.....	2414
Domecka, Markieta.....	223
Domingues, Ivo.....	1747
	1768
Domingues, Joana.....	490
	1750
Donovan, Catherine.....	1561
Dores, António Pedro .....	774
	1764
Dornelas, Antonio .....	1181
Dornette, Johanna .....	1714
Dorrer, Nika .....	274
dos Santos, Élida.....	1282
Dowd, Timothy.....	160
Dr. Barth, Matthias.....	906
Dr. Betz, Tanja.....	311
Dr. des. Haberkern, Klaus .....	1067
Dr. Kauppert, Michael.....	477
Dr. Troendle, Martin.....	2464
Dr. Wolfram, Andrea.....	2114
Draganova, Mariana .....	241
Drago, Kos.....	873
Drahokoupil, Jan.....	444
Drake, Michael.....	2498
	2307
Dreher, Jochen .....	1833
	478
Dremelj, Polona .....	994
Drewes, Jochen.....	1468
Dronkers, Jaap .....	708
	1991
Duarte, Alexandra.....	1026
Duarte, Madalena .....	2168
Duarte, Vera .....	1934
Dubois, Michel .....	1614
Duckett, Dominic .....	1456
Ducourant, H��l��ne.....	638
Ducu, Viorela .....	2174
	2431
Dugulin, Lorenzo .....	2136
Dulsrud, Arne.....	345
Dur��o, Susana.....	1337

Durakbasa, Ayse .....	2177
	2484
	2485
Durant, Lesley .....	1242
Dury, Sarah .....	28
	44
Dutozia, Jérôme .....	600
Dyhr-Nielsen, Reidun .....	549
Dykstra, Pearl .....	1002
Dziuban, Agata .....	481
Eberle, Thomas S. ....	557
Ebert, Thomas .....	1358
Eckmann, Monique .....	1984
Edling, Christofer .....	2057
Edmondson, Ricca .....	115
Edmunds, June .....	1857
Edwards, Kathy .....	1901
Edwards, Rosalind .....	997
Eeckhaut, Mieke .....	946
Efendiev, Azer .....	1172
	2524
Efthymiou, Ilias .....	1773
	1333
Egreja, Catarina .....	1635
Ehrs, Camilla .....	293
Eichelberg, Marco .....	33
Eide, Solveig Botnen .....	1346
Eigmüller, Monika .....	2292
Einarsdottir, Anna .....	1424
	1560
Eisner, Beate .....	64
Ejrnaes, Anders .....	1011
Ekbrand, Hans .....	938
Elboj, Carmen .....	439
Elchardus, Mark .....	727
	1949
	1927
	491
	483
Elcheroth, Guy .....	992
Elena, Nedelcu .....	2086
Elley, Sharon .....	2514
	1529
Ellingsæter, Anne Lise .....	1720
Ellingsen, Dag .....	991

Elstad, Jon Ivar.....	1073
Emília, Araújo.....	1312
Emmel, Nick.....	965
Emond, Ruth.....	274
Endrissat, Nada.....	1274
Engelage, Sonja.....	1039
	1293
Engels, Dietrich.....	11
Engels, Laura.....	694
Engelstad, Fredrik.....	521
Engström, Sofia.....	938
Eräranta, Kirsi.....	2146
Erdinast-Vulcan, Daphna.....	2343
Erdmann, Birte.....	33
Erel, Umut.....	2420
Ergin, Murat.....	473
Ergin, Nezihe Basak.....	1699
Eric D., Widmer.....	977
Eriksen, Sissel H.....	1359
Eriksson, Maria.....	339
Eriksson, Susan.....	2203
Erokhina, Kira.....	1317
	2384
Erola, Jani.....	1113
Errahj, Mostafa.....	843
Ertugrul, Gokcen.....	2404
Escobedo, Anna.....	984
Eser Davolio, Miryam.....	2002
Espanha, Rita.....	1216
Especial, Luísa.....	1250
Esposito, Maurizio.....	1138
Estanqueiro, Marco.....	755
Estrela, Elsa.....	722
Ettorre, Elizabeth.....	1077
Evetts, Julia.....	1308
Exworthy, Mark.....	1290
Eyckmans, Johan.....	1541
	1587
Ezzeddine, Petra.....	2422
Fàbregues Feijóo, Sergi.....	1396
Fabian, Andrea.....	316
Fabre, Damien.....	566
	573
Fachinger, Uwe.....	33
Fadil, Nadia.....	775

Fadini, Almerinda.....	903
Fairhurst, Eileen .....	108
Faje, Florin.....	2337
Falcão Casaca, Sara .....	1037
Falcinelli, Daniela .....	1047
Fanizza, Fiammetta .....	2346
Faria, Margarida .....	680
Faria, Sérgio .....	2078
Farina, Fatima .....	1036
Farinha, Cristina .....	179
Farinha, Isabel.....	381
Farkas, Gergei.....	2064
	2057
Farkhatdinov, Nail.....	529
Fassa, Farinaz.....	1015
Favell, Adrian.....	2080
Faysse, Nicolas .....	843
Fazlioglu Akin, Zulal .....	193
Fedyuk, Olena .....	2403
	927
Fedyukin, Igor.....	2534
Feiring, Marte .....	1096
Felber, Juliane .....	33
Fen, Ekaterina .....	2323
Ferguson, John-Paul .....	1158
Fernández, Manuel.....	1641
Fernández, Mercedes.....	913
Fernández-Carro, Remo.....	1630
Fernández-Reino, Mariña.....	656
Fernández Rodríguez, Carlos J.....	1178
Fernandes, Ana .....	63
Fernandes, Diana .....	194
Fernandes, Emília .....	1093
Fernandes, Lúcia.....	824
Fernandes, Natália .....	260
Fernandes, Natalia .....	257
Fernandes, Paulo .....	1156
Fernandez-Mayoralas, Gloria .....	25
Fernandez Suarez, Belen.....	2260
Fernandez Zubieta, Ana .....	1645
Ferraresi, Mauro .....	414
Ferreira, Ana Cristina .....	2263
Ferreira, Claudino.....	682
Ferreira, João Pedro.....	433
Ferreira, Manuela .....	277

ferreira, marianela .....	9
Ferreira, Nuno .....	696
Ferreira, Silvia .....	1745
	2045
Ferreira, Tatiana .....	2432
	1223
Ferreira, Vitor Sérgio .....	1918
Ferreira da Silva, Luisa.....	1118
Ferreira de Almeida, João .....	2487
Ferrero Camoletto, Raffaella .....	1545
	1577
Ferrie, Joanna .....	2205
Ferrinho, Paulo .....	1398
Ferro, Lígia .....	199
Fialho, Isabel .....	702
Fialho, Joaquim .....	2066
Fici, Anna.....	1498
Fidrya, Efim .....	628
Fietze, Simon.....	2144
Filimon, Nela.....	536
Filipe, Ângela Marques.....	1606
	1127
Filipe, Ana Sofia .....	1219
Filipe, José António .....	2299
	602
Filippakou, Ourania .....	704
Fine, Robert.....	1973
	1815
Finlay, Susan.....	1491
Firmino da Costa, António .....	384
Fischer, Daniel.....	906
Fischer, Wolfram .....	243
Fisher, Pamela .....	1059
Flam, Helena .....	771
	787
Flecha, Ainhoa.....	2141
Flecha, Ramon .....	1784
	439
Flemmen, Anne Britt.....	1359
Flesher Fominaya, Cristina.....	2335
Fleury, Charles .....	59
Flick, Uwe .....	1386
Flynn, Matt.....	48
Fonseca, Laura da.....	1582
Fonseca, Susana.....	849

Fontaine, Anne Marie .....	990
	1595
Fontes, Fernando .....	2194
Fontes, Margarida .....	1601
Fordham, Maureen .....	599
	569
Forjaz, Maria Joao .....	25
Formadi, Katalin .....	1309
Formby, Eleanor .....	1579
Fornos Klein, Stefan .....	1819
	697
Fortuna, Carlos .....	551
	1758
Foss Linblad, Rita .....	1045
Fröhlich, Christian .....	2543
Fracalanza, Ana Paula .....	884
Frade, Fátima .....	1469
France, Alan .....	1231
Francesco, Giudici .....	977
Franchuk, Victor .....	523
	1790
Francis, Sabil .....	816
Francisco, Maria Luísa .....	171
Freestone, Peta .....	1622
Freire, João .....	1251
Freire, Susana .....	519
Frerichs, Sabine .....	1846
Fretel, Anne .....	1479
Friedman, Sam .....	528
Frommert, Dina .....	76
Frostig, Karen Frostig .....	129
Fryklund, Björn .....	2030
Fuchs, Stefan .....	1014
Fucik, Petr .....	933
Fylling, Ingrid .....	2186
Góis, Pedro .....	1717
Gómez, Victoria .....	647
Gómez-Esteban, Concepción .....	937
Götz, Susanne .....	1910
Gövercin, Mehmet .....	33
Gürses, Didem .....	264
Gürtuna, Oksan .....	2103
Gabb, Jacqui .....	1549
Gabe, Jonathon .....	1290
Gadecki, Jacek .....	352

Gadomska, Magdalena .....	1472
Gaffney, Michael.....	250
Gafijczuk, Dariusz.....	204
Gagliardi, Adele Stefania.....	2364
Galdona, Nerea .....	13
Galego, Carla .....	720
Galesi, Davide .....	1752
Ganga, Deianira .....	231
Gans, Evelien .....	2015
García Álvarez, María Ercilia.....	186
García-García, Antonio A. ....	937
García-Selgas, Fernando J. ....	937
García Gómez, Andrés.....	580
	587
Garcia, Albert.....	1621
Garcia, Ernest.....	882
Garcia, Inaki .....	2426
	2377
Garcia, José Luís.....	2334
Garcia-Alvarez, Maria Ercilia .....	536
Garcia Burgos, Jorge.....	2213
Gardawski, Juliusz.....	1180
Garibaldo, Francesco .....	1191
Garin, Patrice.....	843
Garreffa, Franca .....	2175
	1701
Garreta Bochaca, Jordi.....	711
Garsten, Christina.....	2093
Garthwaite, Kayleigh .....	1905
Gasior, Katrin.....	6
Gaspar, Sofia.....	2410
Gather, Claudia .....	2115
Gato, Jorge.....	1595
Gauthier, Jacques-Antoine .....	1015
Gautun, Heidi.....	39
Gebauer, Ronald .....	2342
Gemini, Laura .....	1897
	953
	131
	508
Gennai, Francesca .....	1384
	43
Geoghegan, Martin.....	1896
Georgiu, Grigore.....	470
Gerhards, Jürgen.....	2052

Gerris, Jan .....	946
Gherghel, Ana .....	2418
	2381
	951
Ghigi, Rossella .....	1025
	1141
	409
Giacone, Marta .....	1674
Giarelli, Guido .....	1774
Gibbs, Lisa .....	300
	302
	286
Gibek, Krzysztof .....	608
Gibson, Barry .....	1408
Gidley, Ben .....	1980
Giesecke, Johannes .....	1027
Gijsberts, Merove .....	493
Gilad, Noga .....	1392
Gilbert, Nigel .....	1348
Gill, Bernhard .....	1613
	632
Gillan, Kevin .....	1673
Ginn, Jay .....	52
Giorgi, Alberta .....	1681
Giubboni, Stefano .....	1192
Given, John .....	240
Glaesser, Judith .....	712
Glauser, Andrea .....	182
Glinkowski, Paul .....	137
Globisch, Claudia .....	2053
	2016
Goedemé, Tim .....	2517
Goessens, Lieselotte .....	2462
	177
Golczynska-Grondas, Agnieszka .....	308
Gold, Lisa .....	302
Goloseyeva, Anna .....	664
Gomes, Ana Virgínia .....	1187
Gomes, Carina .....	551
Gomes, Cristina Sousa .....	1712
Gomes, Inês .....	63
Gomes, Jorge .....	641
Gomes, Miguel .....	1609
Gomes, Rui Telmo .....	212
Gonçalves, Albertino .....	746

Gonçalves, Ana .....	2294
	2339
González Rodríguez, Benjamín.....	580
	581
Goode, Jackie.....	1516
Gornostaeva, Maria .....	1830
Gorshkov, Mikhail .....	642
	2533
Gorshkova, Irina .....	1105
Gosling, Jonathan.....	2456
Goszczyński, Wojciech.....	819
Gough, Orla .....	1508
Gouveia, Ricardo.....	2102
Gouvias, Dionysios.....	1333
Goyon, Marie .....	1894
Grácio, Rita.....	195
Grødem, Anne S.....	1480
Grüning, Barbara .....	2320
Graça, João .....	618
Gracia, Pablo.....	922
Grandjean, Nathalie.....	1615
Grasser, Gerlinde .....	1126
Gray, Jane .....	935
Graziosi, Mariolina.....	800
Greco (Dr.), Silvana.....	798
Gregersdotter Höglund, Lina .....	583
Gregory, Helen .....	220
Gretzinger, Susanne.....	643
Griffin, Christine.....	1906
Grigoleit, Annette.....	512
Grinberg, Lev Luis .....	2499
Griswold, Wendy .....	560
Grivins, Mikelis .....	699
Gronow, Antti.....	1831
Gronow, Jukka.....	393
	2361
Gross, Matthias .....	855
Grosse, Julia.....	1953
Gruenewald-Huber, Elisabeth .....	2098
Gruszczynska, Anna.....	1531
Gruszka, Anna.....	174
Gstrein, Michaela.....	1054
	2107
Guarneri, Antonella.....	723
	1877

	2278
Guedes, Joana .....	106
Guedes, Mafalda .....	1357
Guerra, Isabel.....	1718
Guerra, João.....	864
Guerreiro, Ana .....	1167
Guerreiro, Maria das Dores .....	1055
	1733
Guha-Sapir, D.....	589
Guibentif, Pierre.....	1044
Guilat, Yael .....	173
Guillaume, Cécile .....	1184
Guiraudon, Virginie.....	2041
Guizzardi, Luca.....	918
Gulalp, Haldun.....	1842
Gulcubuk, Bulent .....	650
	328
Gulyás, Emese .....	419
Gunina, Alina .....	533
Gunkel, Jennifer .....	1416
Gunson, Jessica .....	1150
Gurdala, Agnieszka .....	227
Gusmano, Beatrice.....	916
	1550
	928
	943
Hämäläinen, Hans-Mikael .....	225
Hämäläinen, Kati .....	297
Hämäläinen, kati.....	1379
Häyrinen-Alestalo, Marja .....	1626
Hödl, Klaus .....	2004
Hülksen-Giesler, Manfred.....	33
Haanpää, Leena .....	293
	834
Haas, Barbara .....	1035
Haas, Joachim.....	1267
Haavio-Mannila, Elina.....	2512
Hadfield, Lucy .....	920
Hadjar, Andreas.....	1935
Hagelund, Anniken .....	2244
Hagen, Kåre .....	39
Hagen, Trever.....	559
Hagestad, Gunhild.....	53
Haikkola, Lotta.....	2415
Halas, Elzbieta.....	476

Haldar, Marit.....	326
Halkier, Bente.....	354
Halley, Jeanne.....	198
Halliday, Jennifer.....	302
Halperin, Dafna.....	78
Halutz, Doron.....	399
Hamann, Linda.....	2024
Hammer, Torild.....	2193
Hancer Odabas, Yonca.....	2159
Hanquinet, Laurie.....	388
Hansen, Thomas.....	776
Haragus, Paul.....	685
Harambam, Jaron.....	555
Harari, Yuval.....	1532
Harayama, Tetsu.....	1324
Harden, B. Garrick.....	1817
Harden, Jeni.....	921
	305
Hardman Smith, Louise.....	1132
Harnisch, Svetlana.....	1500
	1430
Harrikari, Timo.....	294
Harris, Jennifer.....	2189
Harris, Jess.....	1488
Hartung, Anne.....	2283
Hasselhorn, Hans-Martin.....	1121
Hatos, Adrian.....	2425
	2037
Hattatoglu, Dilek.....	2478
Hatzipetrou-Andronikou, Reguina.....	175
Haugen, Leif Martin.....	1685
Haunberger, Sigrid.....	1445
Hautamäki, Lotta.....	1107
Haux, Reinhold.....	33
Haydock, Will.....	460
Haynes, Paul.....	1603
Haywood, Paul.....	163
Heald, Karen.....	136
	163
Heaphy, Brian.....	1424
Hegna, Kristinn.....	1873
Heien, Thorsten.....	76
Heikell, Thomas.....	2295
Heikkilä, Riie.....	350
Heikkinen, Riitta-Liisa.....	81

Hein, Andreas.....	33
Heinich, Nathalie .....	214
Heires, Marcel .....	613
Heiskala, Risto.....	2352
Helland, Håvard.....	1270
Helle-Valle, Jo .....	366
Hellesund, Tone .....	1588
Hellmann, Kai-Uwe.....	412
Hemlin, Sven .....	1604
	1628
Hemmerman, Louise .....	965
Hendrickx, Jef.....	1541
	1587
Hendrix, Ulla .....	1030
Hennala, Lea .....	15
Henriques, Sara.....	1226
Henriques, Susana.....	1209
Henriques, Vera.....	1879
Henwood, Karen.....	996
Herbots, Sarah .....	1927
Herbrand, Cathy .....	934
Herlofson, Katharina.....	53
Hermann, Christoph .....	442
	1177
Hermansen, Jens Christian .....	1821
Hernández, Aitor.....	2306
Hernández, Nuria .....	1641
Hernández Carr, Aitor.....	2075
Herrera, Paloma .....	374
Herrero, Marta .....	463
Herrschaft, Felicia.....	172
Hertlein, Julia.....	1803
Herttua, Kimmo.....	1083
Hertwig, Markus.....	1162
Herzog, Benno.....	2370
Hespanha, Pedro.....	1729
Hester, Marianne .....	1561
Heuten, Wilko .....	33
Heylen, Leen .....	58
Higgins, Vanessa.....	373
Higgs, Paul .....	1058
Higo, Masa .....	48
Hilario, Ana Patricia .....	1136
Hines, Sally.....	1573
Hinz, Holger.....	643

Hirsch, Anita .....	1248
Hirsch Adler, Anita.....	1325
Hirschle, Jochen.....	1049
Hirsh, David.....	2019
Hirshiaho, Anu.....	2378
Hirtz, Natalia.....	1674
Hirvonen, Helena.....	778
Hitters, Erik.....	509
Hitzler, Ronald.....	2556
Hjelmar, Ulf.....	358
Hlebec, Valentina.....	1548
Hobbs, Sandy.....	342
Hockey, Jenny.....	1564
Hoeffel, João Luiz.....	903
	879
Hoelscher, Michael.....	510
	1414
Hoemke, Maik.....	1955
Hofaecker, Dirk.....	76
Hoffman, David.....	2378
Hoffmann, Frédérique.....	6
Hoffmeyer-Zlotnik, Jürgen H.P. ....	1442
Hoffmeyer-Zlotnik, Jürgen HP.....	1443
Hoffmeyer-Zlotnik, Juergen H.P. ....	1437
Hohmann, Volker.....	33
Hoikkala, Tommi.....	1931
Holland, Dionne.....	302
Holland, Janet.....	1887
Holm, Lotte.....	1132
Holmes, Mary.....	786
Holmesland, Anne-Lise.....	1142
Holst, Elke.....	2144
	1033
	2130
Homanen, Riikka.....	1104
Hopfenbeck, Mark.....	773
	1101
Hordila - Vatamanescu, Elena - Madalina.....	1239
Horn, Laura.....	438
Horta, Rosário.....	2248
Hoskova, Lucie.....	926
Houlberg Salomonsen, Heidi.....	1247
Hrubos, Ildikó.....	661
	661
Huber, Andreas.....	830

Huber, Manfred.....	6
Huber, Rainer .....	33
Hugh, Jennifer .....	631
	1471
Hughes, Bill .....	2190
Hughes, Kahryn.....	965
Huijnk, Willem.....	995
Huijts, Tim.....	1089
Huiu, Diana.....	532
Humer, Ziva .....	970
Humphrey, Robin.....	1426
Hunkler, Christian .....	619
Hussein, Shereen .....	1488
Husso, Marita .....	778
Husu, Hanna-Mari .....	1664
Huttunen, Suvi.....	845
	886
Hurre, Taina.....	1864
Huxhold, Oliver .....	69
	84
Huyge, Ellen .....	727
Hyman, Laura .....	745
Hysjulien, Liam .....	900
Iannone, Roberta.....	550
Iarskaia-Smirnova, Elena .....	1316
	2546
	2185
	245
Ibanez-Angulo, Mónica.....	2170
Ieracitano, Francesca.....	2555
Igel, Corinne Igel .....	944
Ihsen, Prof. Dr. Susanne .....	2108
Ikonnikova, Nataliya .....	2218
	827
Ilkka, Pietila .....	2525
Imhof, Karen.....	434
Impicciatore, Roberto .....	955
Ioannis Baganha, Maria.....	2421
Iosifidis, Petros .....	1222
Iovu, Mihai .....	685
Irina, Popova .....	1245
Ironico, Simona.....	298
	355
Irvine, Janice .....	1536
Irvine, Laura.....	569

Irwin, Sarah .....	2514
	1012
Isabelle, Maillard.....	1125
Isakovic, Smiljka .....	2468
Isengard, Bettina .....	93
Ivan, Pedrazzini .....	2090
Ivanova, Elena.....	930
Ivanova, Maria N .....	427
Izzi, Carla.....	2300
Izzo, Marina .....	1269
Jäger, Johannes .....	434
Jäppinen, Maija .....	2527
Järvelä, Marja .....	845
Jaakkola, Maarit .....	208
Jablonska, Barbara.....	1801
Jackson, Stevi .....	1570
Jacobi, Pedro Roberto.....	884
Jacobs, Amber.....	1563
Jacobs, Mark D.....	2308
	558
Jacobsson, Katarina .....	1378
Jacobsson, Kerstin .....	1795
	2093
Jacoby, Ann.....	1513
Jacoby, Ben.....	432
	363
Jagudina, Zaira.....	777
Jakobsen, Turf.....	1860
Jakoby, Nina.....	751
Jakubowski, Marek.....	2241
Jallinoja, Riitta .....	978
Jamieson, Lynn .....	921
Jansova, Eva .....	701
Janssen, Susanne .....	526
	192
Japp, Klaus P. ....	1520
Jarty, Julie .....	1021
Jasiewicz, Joanna .....	2082
Jaspers, Eva.....	993
	2038
Jauho, Mikko .....	1505
Jean-Paul, FOURMENTRAUX .....	125
Jeanrenaud, M.A., Yves .....	2108
Jedlowski, Paolo.....	2317
Jelaska, Nika .....	1914

Jeleva, Rumiana.....	241
Jenkins, Claire .....	1537
Jensen, An-Magritt .....	310
Jensen, Hanne Cecilie.....	2200
	1418
Jensen, Iben .....	354
Jensen, Mette .....	887
Jentges, Erik.....	2091
Jerónimo, Helena .....	826
Jerónimo, Paula.....	1721
Jessen, Jorunn Theresia .....	1276
Jikeli, Gunther.....	2257
	1976
Jobert, Annette .....	1169
Joffe, Helene .....	1481
Johannes, Giesecke .....	2490
Johansson, Roine.....	584
John, René .....	2125
	749
Johnson, Peter .....	324
Johnston, Hank.....	1680
Jokinen, Kimmo .....	1958
Jokinen, Pekka .....	845
	813
Jolanki, Outi.....	24
	18
Jonas, Michael.....	1845
Jones, Roger .....	1097
Jonkers, Koen.....	1616
Jorge, Ana .....	2112
Jorge, Ana Margarida .....	960
Jorge, munoz.....	1087
Jorge, Nuno .....	406
	1254
Joshi, P.C. ....	589
Joutsenniemi, Kaisla.....	1864
Judit, Acsády .....	1667
Jung, Gowoon .....	2445
Juul Jørgensen, Cecilie .....	1373
Jyrkämä, Jyrki.....	16
Kähäri, Outi.....	2222
	2518
König, Alexandra .....	258
Körs, Anna.....	530
	760

Kühner, Angela.....	1468
Kümbetoglu, Belkis.....	1034
Künemund, Harald.....	961
Küsters, Ivonne.....	2454
Kacperczyk, Anna.....	1365
Kahma, Nina.....	2474
Kahri, Mikko.....	1354
Kaidesoja, Tuukka.....	1808
Kain, Andreas.....	1416
Kaiser, Claudia.....	62
Kalaycioglu, Sibel.....	111
Kalmus, Veronika.....	1881
Kaltchev, Ivan.....	1741
Kamenou, Nayia.....	1589
Kankainen, Tomi.....	2095
Kantola, Anu.....	747
	514
Kantola, Ismo.....	2553
Kantzara, Vasiliki.....	736
Kaplan, Dana.....	527
Karadag, Meltem.....	2177
	2484
Karel, Yon.....	1663
Karhunen, Anja.....	299
Karklina, Ieva.....	17
	1909
Karlsen, Hilde.....	1259
Karlsen, Saffron.....	2215
Karlsson, Martin.....	113
Karpenko, Olga.....	681
Karpova, Galina.....	2526
	540
	2559
Karrouche, Norah.....	2302
Karu, Marre.....	1038
Karvonen, Sakari.....	1113
Kasearu, Kairi.....	60
Kaskiharju, Eija.....	102
Katainen, Anu.....	398
Katartzi, Evgenia.....	1759
Katharina, Maul.....	919
Katriel, Tamar.....	753
Katz, Christine.....	861
Katz, Ruth.....	78
Katz-Gerro, Tally.....	407

Kaufmann, Vincent .....	976
Kavadias, Dimokritos.....	727
Kaya, Nilay .....	2159
Kayhan, Alper .....	1171
Kazmierska, Kaja.....	235
	227
Kehily, Mary Jane .....	920
	1858
Keim, Wiebke .....	1735
	1799
Keizer, Renske .....	1002
Keler, Karolina.....	1382
	2348
Kelha, Minna.....	981
Kelle, Udo .....	1412
Keller, Margit .....	387
Kelly, Berni .....	250
Kelly, Yvonne.....	1090
Kels, Peter .....	1274
Kempff, Andreas Oskar .....	2417
Kenis, Anneleen .....	848
Kenten, Charlotte.....	1523
Kern, Thomas .....	1805
	1690
Keskin, Tugrul.....	1836
Keskinen, Suvi.....	2255
Kessler, Oliver .....	611
Kestilä, Laura.....	1864
Ketokivi, Kaisa .....	932
Keunen, Gert .....	562
Keyvanara, Mahmoud .....	1082
Khlevnyuk, Daria .....	2321
Khoury, Alexandros .....	1490
Kianpour, Masoud .....	1082
Kierans, Ciara.....	1513
Kilanowski, Marcin.....	1848
Kilpi, Elina.....	2513
	1863
King, Andrew .....	1391
	87
	1535
King, Michael .....	1565
Kingma, Sytze .....	1521
Kings, Lisa .....	1668
Kirchberg, Volker .....	2451

Kirdina, Svetlana .....	1800
Kirejczyk, Marta .....	2135
Kirschner, Rafael .....	1416
Kivelä, Päivi .....	2129
Kiviruusu, Olli.....	1864
Kiy, Matthias .....	33
Kjaernes, Unni .....	396
Klaff, Lesley .....	2028
Klavs, Irena.....	1548
Kleiner, Tuuli-Marja .....	1446
Kleinert, Corinna.....	1022
	1014
Klekotko, Marta.....	2067
Klemelä, Juha.....	2032
	785
Klemencic, Eva.....	725
Klendauer, Ruth.....	1416
Kleres, Jochen.....	766
	1518
Kley, Stefanie .....	1473
	1474
Klinkisch, Eva .....	673
Klintman, Mikael .....	888
	857
Kliucharev, Grigory .....	1297
Klvanova, Radka .....	2268
Knoblauch, Hubert.....	2447
	522
Knudsen, Lisbeth B. ....	954
Koçer, Banu.....	1653
Kobin, Maarja .....	1936
Kochegarova, Tamara .....	2392
Koeller, Regine .....	11
Koenen, Felix.....	112
Koerner, Thomas.....	1433
Koff, Harlan.....	2398
Kohl, Manuela.....	2466
Kohli, Martin.....	961
Koikkalainen, Saara.....	2253
Kojima, Hiroshi .....	2245
Kokkonen, Marja.....	2378
Kolehmainen, Marjo.....	1574
Kolodziej-Durnas, Agnieszka.....	2296
Kolokitha, Magdalini .....	669
Kolosova, Elena.....	322

Komarova, Nataliya .....	485
Komp, Kathrin.....	8
	1442
Konecki, Krzysztof .....	1423
Koniordos, Sokratis .....	615
Konle-Seidl, Regina.....	1714
Kononykhina, Olga N.....	2539
Konstantinovskiy, David .....	2532
	707
Konstantoni, Kristina.....	253
Konttinen, Esa .....	1686
Konzelmann Ziv, Anita.....	770
Koos, Sebastian .....	415
Koppel, Ross .....	1377
Korolainen, Kari .....	120
Koroleva, Ilze.....	1866
	17
Koronaïou, Alexandra.....	1740
Kortleven LL.M, W.J. ....	1483
Korts, Külliki.....	1482
Kosma, Yvonne-Alexia .....	497
Kosmider, Anna .....	689
Kosonen, Pekka .....	610
Kostres, Milica .....	2508
Kosunen, Elise.....	1586
Kosyaeva, Tatyana.....	2336
Kotelnikova, Zoya.....	634
Kotilainen, Juha .....	835
Kotilainen, Sirkku.....	1868
Koutidou, Evagelia.....	1775
Kovács, Ilona .....	79
Kovács, Ma, Eszter.....	923
Kovacev, Asja Nina .....	761
	507
Kovacs, Eszter.....	1900
Kovacs Ma, Eszter.....	288
Kovalainen, Anne .....	639
Kowalewski, Maciej .....	2296
Kowalska, Marta .....	226
Kozłowska, Urszula .....	2298
Kröger, Teppo.....	18
	24
	1042
Kraatz, Susanne.....	85
Kragh Jespersen, Peter.....	1247

Kramer, Melanie .....	2509
Krapf, Hanna .....	821
Krase, Jerome .....	236
	237
Kravets, Olga.....	349
Krebs, Dagmar .....	1431
Kreil, Linda.....	1189
Krekula, Clary .....	49
Krell, Claudia .....	917
Kriesi, Irene .....	931
Krijnen, Tonny .....	509
Krikorian, Gaëlle, Pascale .....	1689
Krings, Torben .....	2225
Krivy, Maros.....	2319
Krnic, Raseljka.....	118
Krogstad, Anne.....	2073
Krossa, Anne Sophie.....	1822
Kruetli, Pius .....	1519
Kruythoof, Marie .....	1041
Krzaklewska, Ewa .....	1382
	1932
Krzyzowski, Lukasz .....	2371
Kubczak, Anna .....	756
	1421
Kubicki, Pawel .....	1730
	67
Kucia, Marek.....	1811
Kuckartz, Udo .....	1358
	841
Kucukural, Onder.....	2435
Kuehner, Angela.....	2391
Kuenemund, Harald.....	33
Kuhar, Metka .....	1903
Kuhlmann, Ellen .....	1095
	1252
	1265
	1304
Kuhn, Theresa .....	2094
Kuipers, Giseline .....	151
	456
Kulpa, Anna .....	637
Kunz, Alexa Maria .....	1279
Kupferberg, Feiwei .....	153
	221
Kupsala, Saara.....	813

Kurakin, Dmitry .....	501
Kurczewska, Joanna .....	2216
Kurczewski, Jacek .....	2216
Kutsar, Dagmar .....	60
Kuzmics, Helmut.....	765
Kuznetova-Moreno, Irina .....	2434
Kwiecinska-Zdrenka, Monika.....	1878
Lähteenmäki, Minna .....	259
Lämmerhirt, Miriam.....	2114
Lämsä, Riikka .....	1114
Lämsä, Tiina .....	304
Lévy, Clara .....	168
Líbano Monteiro, Teresa .....	815
López-Sintas, Jordi.....	186
López Gómez, Daniel .....	86
	2198
Lõhmus, Maarja.....	1844
Lück, Detlev .....	966
Lützelberger, Therese .....	1891
Laaksonen, Helena.....	1947
Laaksonen, Mikko T .....	1068
Laborgne, Pia .....	830
Laermans, Rudi .....	515
Laferté, Gilles .....	646
Lagneau-Ymonet, Paul.....	1327
Lahelma, Eero .....	1068
Lahusen, Christian Lahusen.....	2062
Lai, Chia-Ling .....	157
Lakunina, Liana .....	1165
Lalaki, Despina .....	488
	2350
Lalanda-Gonçalves, Rolando .....	1410
Lallukka, Tea .....	1068
Lambelet, Alexandre.....	27
LAMINE, Anne-Sophie .....	2437
Lammi, Minna .....	851
Lammi-Taskula, Johanna .....	1004
Lampropoulou, Sofia .....	1404
Lancee, Bram .....	2283
	1991
Landripet, Ivan.....	1914
Langa Rosado, Delia .....	2105
	21
Langenohl, Andreas .....	653
	1838

Langer, Phil C.....	2391
	1468
Langumier, Julien .....	590
Lankauskas, Gediminas .....	2304
Lapa, Tiago.....	1216
Lapa da Silva, Tiago.....	1008
La Parra, Daniel.....	1151
La Parra Casado, Daniel .....	22
Lappalainen, Pertti.....	1651
	2033
Lapucci, Enrica .....	723
Larisa, Vdovichenko .....	2535
Larivaara, Meri.....	1119
Larkins, Cath .....	292
La Rocca, Gevisa .....	1402
Larrañaga, Isabel.....	56
Larsen, Christa .....	1265
Larsson, Bengt .....	840
Lascaux, Alexander .....	1522
Laskibar, Iker .....	13
Latniak, Erik.....	1161
Laurie, Nina .....	1568
Lauristin, Marju.....	2239
Lauterbach, Wolfgang .....	2479
Lavie, Noa .....	191
Lavikainen, Hanna.....	1586
Law, Alex .....	2492
Le Bianic, Thomas.....	1261
Leccardi, Carmen .....	2326
Lee, Nick.....	267
Lee, Phyllis .....	885
Lee, Soyoung .....	2126
	2127
Le Gall, Josiane.....	2381
	2418
Lehto, Juhani.....	1746
Lehtonen, Turo-Kimmo.....	1502
Leinonen, Anu .....	18
	24
Leira, Arnlaug .....	1707
Leitgöb, Heinz.....	678
Leitner, Andrea .....	1053
Lekakis, Eleftheria .....	395
Lekovic, Milica .....	2220
Lemaire, Xavier .....	823

Lemel, Yannick.....	385
Lenaers, Steven .....	2285
Lendaro, Annalisa.....	1168
	1998
Lengersdorf, Diana.....	516
Lengfeld, Holger .....	2052
Lenz, Thomas.....	369
Leonard, Madeleine.....	336
Leontsini, Mary .....	2140
Leonzi, Silvia .....	2340
	411
Leopold, Thomas.....	61
Le Pape, Marie-Clémence.....	1415
	956
Leppo, Anna .....	1086
Leszczynska, Katarzyna.....	2443
Letzmann, Doerte .....	1974
Levy, Clara .....	119
Levy, Daniel.....	2333
Lewis, Suzan .....	1055
Lezhnina, Julia.....	73
Li, Ying-Zi .....	2142
Lidia M., Kurakina.....	1921
Lidskog, Rolf.....	865
Lidström, Lena.....	1862
Liebe, Ulf .....	880
Liebel, Manfred.....	275
	332
Liefbroer, Aat.....	995
Lievens, John .....	542
	556
Liggett, Dr Susan.....	163
	136
Liikkanen, Mirja.....	401
Likic_Brboric, Branka.....	435
Liljegren, Andreas.....	1278
Lillrank, Annika .....	1135
Lima, Ivar.....	1112
Lima, Ivar A .....	70
Lima e Silva, Mellissa .....	410
Lin, Mei-Ling .....	32
Lindberg, Boel .....	161
Lindberg, Odd.....	759
Lindblom, Taru.....	368
Lindemann, Gesa .....	1798

Lindgren, Lena.....	1853
Lindqvist, Per.....	1503
Linkova, Marcela .....	2160
Lintonen, Tomi.....	1586
Lisboa, Manuel .....	625
Liskova, Katerina .....	1576
Lito, Ana .....	2131
Liukko, Jyri.....	1502
Liversage, Anika .....	1006
Llopis-Goig, Ramon.....	408
	471
Lloyd, Katrina.....	337
Loïc, TRABUT .....	1722
Lobet-Maris, Claire .....	1615
Loch, Dietmar .....	2058
Loots, Ilse .....	814
Lopes, Alexandra.....	55
Lopes, Daniel Seabra .....	617
Lopes, Noémia .....	1251
Lopez-Sintas, Jordi.....	536
Lopez Pardo, Ivan .....	856
Lordon, Frederic .....	451
Lorenz, Stephan .....	897
Lourdes, Gaitan .....	278
Lovtsova, Natalia .....	1705
	2526
Lowenstein, Ariela .....	78
Lowton, Karen .....	1058
Lubanov, Carmit .....	876
Lubbers, Marcel.....	493
	2038
	371
Lucas, José João.....	1992
Ludes, Peter .....	1814
Luhtakallio, Eeva .....	1371
	2063
Lukasiewicz, Karolina .....	2427
Lumme-Sandt, Kirsi.....	81
	42
Lunat, Ziyaad.....	2495
Lundeby, Hege .....	283
Lupatsch, Judith .....	1935
Lyyra, Anna-Liisa.....	81
Lyyra, Tiina-Mari.....	81
Mäkelä, Johanna .....	375

Möller, Kolja.....	447
Müller, Jörg.....	1045
Müller, Jan.....	1234
Müller, Torsten Müller.....	1194
M. Ferreira, Manuel Alberto.....	602
	2299
Ma, Ai-hsuan.....	690
MacArthur, Jude.....	250
Macchi, Luigi.....	573
MacDonald, Robert.....	1905
MacDougall, Colin.....	302
	286
Macedo, Eunice.....	737
Macedo, Lurdes.....	1783
Macfarlane, Susie.....	302
	300
Machacek, Ladislav.....	1876
Machado, Fernando Luís.....	2520
Machado, Helena.....	1605
	1598
	1217
	960
Machado, Nora.....	2020
	1074
	1515
Machado, Paulo.....	72
	1763
Maciel, Diana.....	972
	2121
	2131
Mackintosh, Nicola.....	1320
	1510
MacLean, Alice.....	921
Madeira, Rosa.....	255
Mademlis, Ilias.....	1748
Madureira, Cristina.....	273
Maeder, Christoph.....	1345
Maes, Francis.....	165
Maeso, Silvia.....	1992
Maestriperi, Lara.....	1300
Magalhães, Dulce Maria.....	423
Magalhães, Maria José.....	2172
Magano, Olga.....	2211
Magaraggia, Sveva.....	1872
Magaudda, Paolo.....	424

Magdalenic, Sanja.....	1246
Magun, Vladimir.....	2230
Mahne, Katharina.....	69
Maia Silva, Sofia.....	10
Majamaa, Karoliina.....	1938
	2504
Majstorovic, Danijela.....	2153
	2116
Makela, Pia.....	1083
Malacrida, Claudia.....	2187
Malafaia, Carla.....	1366
Malgorzata, Melchior.....	1401
Mali, Franc.....	1640
Maliepaard, Mieke.....	493
Malinen, Kaisa.....	304
Malli, Gerlinde.....	1062
	1145
Manatos, Maria João.....	1619
	606
Mandic, Maja.....	2116
Mangone, Emiliana.....	553
Manolache, Konstantin M.....	2530
Mansurov, Valeriy.....	1311
Mantescu, Liviu.....	891
Manthorpe, Jill.....	1488
María Teresa, Algado Ferrer.....	1761
Marôpo, Lidia.....	329
Marada, Radim.....	2305
	672
Marchand, Dorothée.....	830
Marchetti, Maria Cristina.....	2065
Marchi, Riccardo.....	1682
Marciniak, Lukas T.....	1413
Marcu, Afrodita.....	1495
Marcuello Servós, Chaime.....	1368
Marhankova, Jaroslava.....	3
Maria, von Bredow.....	278
Marin, Bern.....	6
Marinho, Sofia.....	952
Marinopoulou, Anastasia.....	575
	1810
Marivoet, Salomé.....	1769
Markham, William.....	900
Markström, Ann-Marie.....	327
Marontate, Jan.....	154

Marques, Ana .....	1540
Marques, Ana Cristina .....	1003
Marques, Ana Paula .....	1744
Marques, Emília Margarida .....	347
Marques, Fátima.....	720
Marques, Rafael .....	617
	618
Marques da Silva, Sofia.....	1357
Marschollek, Michael .....	33
Martínez Buján, Raquel.....	2111
Martínez López, David.....	2105
	21
Martín Martín, María Paz.....	1178
Martín Pérez, Alberto.....	2040
Martens, Lydia .....	389
Marti-Costa, Marc .....	2341
Martikainen, Pekka .....	1083
Martin, Peter .....	1967
Martin, Unai .....	56
Martineau, Stephen .....	1488
Martinelli, Alberto.....	616
Martinelli, Monica.....	1771
Martinez-Iglesias, Mercedes.....	838
	882
Martinez-Martin, Pablo .....	25
Martinez Perez, Alvaro .....	1007
Martino, Simone .....	2446
Martins, Ana Isabel.....	1201
Martins, Marta.....	1459
	1718
Martins, Moisés .....	140
	541
	1205
Martins, Paula Cristina .....	318
Marx, Daniela .....	2097
Marzano, Marco.....	1284
Masanet Ripoll, Erika.....	22
Mascheroni, Giovanna.....	1211
	1227
Maslauskaite, Ausra .....	971
Massa, Ilmo .....	892
Masso, Anu.....	2507
Masullo, Ana.....	400
Masuy, Amandine.....	88
Matczak, Piotr.....	863

	1462
	1612
Mateeva, Liliana .....	1054
	2107
Mateus, Samuel.....	1232
Mateus, Sandra .....	686
Mateus Jeronimo, Helena.....	1633
Mathias, Matthew .....	147
Mathijs, Erik .....	848
Matias, Marisa .....	990
	1599 1127
	1606
Matiaske, Wenzel .....	643
Matos, Ana Raquel.....	1599
Matos, Frederico.....	658
Matos Fernandes, Ana .....	2303
Matthews, Ralph.....	908
Mattoni, Alice .....	1687
Matulionis, Arvydas Virgilijus.....	176
Matysiak, Ilona.....	2173
Mauerer, Gerlinde.....	1085
Maule, John .....	1450
Maunu, Antti .....	801
Mauritti, Rosário .....	384
	973
Mavridis, Iraklis.....	1850
Mayer, Peter .....	1309
Mayerl, Jochen .....	595
Maylor, Uvanney.....	671
Mazzoli, Lella.....	953
	508
Mazzucchelli, Sara .....	939
	940
Mazzucotelli Salice, Silvia .....	184
McDermott, Elizabeth .....	1562
McDonald, Ruth.....	1310
McFarlane, Hazel .....	2195
McGhee, Derek .....	1487
McGuinness, Martina.....	1451
McIntosh, Ian .....	274
McKechnie, Jim .....	342
McLean, Monica .....	704
McMahon, Naoimh .....	362
McNulty, Ann .....	1552

	1557
McSorley, Kevin.....	1851
Medeiros, Nuno .....	546
	525
Mehin, Ibragimova.....	1809
Meier, Lars.....	496
	228
Meil, Gerardo.....	924
Meis, Markus .....	33
Meleghy, Tamás.....	1786
Melkas, Helinä .....	15
Mellet, Kevin.....	636
Melnikova, Anna.....	2209
	2394
Melo, Benedita.....	1870
Melo, Daniel.....	2089
Mena Martínez, Luis.....	2162
Mendes, Hugo .....	2519
Mendes, José .....	1484
	682
	586
Mendes, Luís.....	2353
Mendes, Madalena.....	511
Mendes, Maria Filomena.....	1092
Mendonça, Helena .....	479
Mendoza Morteo, Marlen.....	210
Menendez Alarcon, Antonio V.....	462
Meneses, Paula.....	1992
Menezes, Filipa .....	1478
Menezes, Marluci .....	2399
Menezes, Paulo.....	126
Menold, Natalja.....	1440
Menshikov, Vladimir .....	1948
Menz, Dr. Wolfgang.....	1183
Meredith, Elly.....	1335
Meredith, Jo.....	1231
Merkulova, Anastasia .....	605
Merryweather, Dave .....	1427
Mersiaynova, Irina V.....	2539
Mesner Andolsek, Dana .....	1432
Meulemann, Heiner .....	1435
Meuser, Michael .....	2139
Meyer, Jochen.....	33
Michailakis, Dimitris.....	1064
Michalak, Andrzej.....	2298

Middlemiss, Lucie .....	875
Midtsundstad, Tove .....	96
Mieg, Harald .....	1302
Mihai, Ioana-Alexandra.....	2280
Mijic, Ana .....	763
Mijic, Ivana.....	118
Mikalayeva, Liudmila .....	1360
Mikawa, Makoto.....	143
Mikiewicz, Piotr.....	706
Milan, Stefania.....	1648
	1361
Mileti, Francesca Poglia .....	2026
Miller, Robert .....	223
Milne, Sue.....	330
Miranda, Patrícia .....	2163
Mircea Alexiu, Teodor.....	694
Misiak, Wladyslaw .....	2298
Misztal, Barbara.....	1837
Misztal, Barbara A. ....	2049
Mlodawska, Agata .....	2099
Moen, Bjørg .....	30
Mol, Arthur P.J.....	808
Molina, Oscar .....	1164
	1182
Mols, Sandra .....	1438
Monago Lozano, Francisco Javier.....	1767
Moniz, António.....	1754
Monk, Daniel.....	1563
	1571
Monllau Jaques, Teresa .....	1331
Monostori, Judit .....	2483
Monro, Surya .....	1552
	1557
Monteiro, Bruno .....	2374
Monteiro, Paulo Filipe.....	211
Monteleone, Raffaele .....	2183
Mooney, Gerry .....	2492
Moore, Sarah.....	1464
Moravcová, Lucie .....	105
Moreau, Marie-Pierre.....	671
Moretto, Evandro Mateus .....	884
Morgan, Myfanwy .....	1097
Moriarty, Elaine.....	2225
Morosanu, Laura .....	2389
	2228

Mortara, Ariela .....	417
	2465
Mortelmans, Dimitri.....	58
	98
	962
	1041
	41
Moser, Corinne .....	1519
Moskal, Marta .....	2411
	2385
Moskovskaya, Alexandra.....	1332
Mossakowski, Karin.....	1071
Mosse, Philippe .....	1324
Mossige, Svein .....	1480
Mosteiro Molina, Sergio.....	391
Mota-Ribeiro, Silvana .....	2119
	1093
Motakef, Mona.....	516
Motel-Klingebiel, Andreas.....	69
	84
	1736
Mourão, Vitória .....	1770
Mozzana, Carlotta .....	2183
Ms. Boronenko, Vera.....	1948
	2145
Muccitelli, Paola.....	1877
Mucha, Janusz .....	1639
Mueller, Klaus.....	430
	2242
Mulgaria, Simone.....	534
Muller, Ricardo .....	576
	2477
Muller-Camen, Michael.....	48
Murdock, Graham.....	1231
Murgia, Annalisa.....	1457
Murinkó, Livia .....	1892
Murinko, Livia .....	1937
Murphy, Raymond .....	893
Musarò, Pierluigi.....	1753
Muszel, Magdalena .....	2409
	2234
Muttarak, Raya .....	964
Muukkonen, Martti.....	2291
	1670
Myers, Greg.....	1404

Myers, Misha .....	219
Myllyniemi, Sami.....	1869
Mythen, Gabe .....	1449
Näsman, Elisabet .....	323
	296
Németh, Sarolta.....	871
Nölke, Andreas .....	613
Nadai, Eva .....	1345
Nagel, Ineke .....	385
Nagel, Ulrike .....	217
Nagode, Mateja .....	31
	104
Nalkur, Sonal .....	2458
Nam, Sang-hui.....	2315
	1658
Narbut, Nikolaj.....	2117
Nascimento, Susana .....	1835
Nash, Catherine.....	1596
Natale, Luisa.....	723
Nathalie, Ortar .....	942
Naukkarinen, Ossi .....	135
Naumanen, Päivi .....	2505
Nave, Joaquim.....	849
Navidi, Ute .....	1448
Nawojczyk, Maria .....	608
Nayak, Anoop .....	1858
Nazio, Tiziana.....	38
Nazroo, James .....	1090
	2215
Neale, Bren.....	1001
Nebel, Wolfgang .....	33
Neckel, Sighard .....	139
Nedbalkova, Katerina .....	1572
Nedelcu, Mihaela.....	2408
	2397
Nedeva, Maria .....	1638
Neely, Brooke .....	2313
Nees, Sarah-Elisa.....	1220
Neiterman, Elena.....	1252
Nemnich, Claudia .....	906
Nergaard, Kristine.....	1197
Neuber, Anke.....	2167
Neumann, Robert .....	2084
Neves, Bárbara.....	980
Neves, Daniel .....	1599

Neves, Dulce Morgado .....	1555
Neves, Tiago .....	1366
	1726
Newerla, Andrea .....	1412
Neyer, Franz J. ....	33
Nico, Magda .....	1861
Nico, Magda Lalanda.....	1010
Nicolaisen, Heidi.....	1175
Nicoli, Nicholas .....	2470
Niedenzu, Heinz-Jürgen .....	1786
Nielsen, Jens Christian.....	1961
Nielsen, Malene Molding .....	552
Nielsen, Margrethe .....	1098
	1130
Nielsen, Torben Hviid .....	1849
Nieminen, Paula .....	1288
Nieminen, Suvi .....	1287
Nies, Sarah.....	1183
Nigris, Daniele .....	1080
	1390
Nikander, Pirjo .....	1385
Nikiforova, Elena .....	2328
Nikodem, Krunoslav .....	2436
Nikolaeva, Uliana.....	440
Nikutowski, Oliver .....	632
Ni Leime, Aine .....	1032
Nilsen, Ake .....	1945
	2164
Nilsen, Ann Christin .....	2200
	1418
	991
Nilsen, Randi Dyblie .....	249
Niro, Fabiana .....	1765
Nistor, Laura .....	872
Niva, Mari .....	375
	1115
Niza, Claudia .....	618
Nogueira, Cláudia.....	1734
	1133
Nogueira, Claudia.....	1749
Nordänger, Ulla Karin .....	1503
Nordstoga, Sigrid.....	1266
Norocel, Cristian .....	2059
Notko, Marianne .....	947
Novelskaite, Aurelija.....	1339

November, Valérie.....	1497
Novozhilov, Roman .....	831
Nowosielski, Michal .....	2252
Nugin, Raili .....	1917
Nuland, Bjørn Richard .....	50
Nulens, Gert .....	547
Nunes, Ângela.....	319
Nunes, Catia.....	1918
Nunes, Cristina.....	1167
Nunes, Flávio.....	535
Nunes, João Arriscado .....	1127
	1606
Nunes, Madalena .....	1725
Nunes, Nuno.....	2488
	1444
Nunes de Almeida, Ana.....	285
Nuvolati, Giampaolo .....	156
Nylander, Per Ake .....	759
O'Brien, Charlotte .....	1192
O'Brien, Sarah .....	1352
O'Carroll, Aileen .....	935
O'Riain, Sean .....	935
O'Shea, Eamon .....	100
Obermeier, Uwe .....	1636
Oblak Crnic, Tanja.....	1212
Obono, Daniele.....	1698
Obradovic, Daniela.....	1186
Ochkina, Anna .....	2515
Offerhaus, Dr. des., Anke .....	2035
Oinonen, Eriikka .....	1947
Ojamäe, Liis.....	224
Okken, Petra Karin .....	33
Okolskaia, Lidia .....	2548
Oksanen, Atte.....	1477
Olafsdottir, Sigrun.....	1099
Olcon-Kubicka, Marta.....	1730
Olesen, Thomas .....	1662
Olga, Shek.....	2525
Olgiati, Vittorio .....	1260
Olick, Jeffrey.....	2333
Olid González, Evangelina .....	945
	2105
	21
Oliveira, Isabel Tiago de.....	1712
	1092

Oliveira, Lída.....	755
Oliveira, Luísa.....	614
	1628
	1040 1644
Oliveira, Luisa.....	1251
Oliveira, Maria Madalena.....	1205
	541
	140
	318
Oliveira, Pedro.....	2197
Oliveira Silva, Lída.....	1643
Oliver, Esther.....	1784
Olli, Johanna.....	290
Olofsson, Anna.....	1494
Olofsson, Gunnar.....	1323
	161
ONeill, Maggie.....	219
Onorati, Maria Giovanna.....	465
Oosterveer, Peter.....	881
Op de Beeck, Hanne.....	1512
Oper, Jaanika.....	224
Orabona, Giusi.....	1544
Orkin, Martin.....	1989
Orta Jacinto, Fátima.....	335
Ortega Bayona, Berenice.....	1666
Ortega Gaspar, Marta.....	2120
Osanami, Sayaka.....	1977
Osborne Verdugo, Raquel.....	1009
Osti, Giorgio.....	896
Otterlei, Jill Beth.....	832
Ottosen, Mai Heide.....	985
Overland, Gwynyth.....	244
Ozaki, Ritsuko.....	379
Ozalp, Yesim.....	386
Ozbay, Ferhunde.....	2485
Ozbilgin, Mustafa.....	1244
Ozen, H. Ege.....	1943
Ozsan, Gul.....	2177
	2484
Ozyasar, Ferzan.....	582
Pärnänen, Anna.....	1051
	12
Pérez Caramés, Antia.....	2111
Pérez Castro, Judith.....	1325

Pérez Rubiales, Elena .....	186
Pólvora, Alexandre .....	1367
Pöyhönen, Sari .....	2378
Paadam, Katrin .....	224
Pacheco, Pedro .....	1946
Padilla, Beatriz .....	2044
	2393
Padovan, Dario .....	1972
Pahor, Majda .....	1263
Paju, Petri .....	1869
Pajvancic, Ana .....	833
Paksi, Veronika .....	2155
Palhares, José .....	698
	1933
Palma Saleiro, Sandra .....	1593
Palukka, Hannele .....	1144
Palz, Werner .....	856
Panagiotopoulou, Roy .....	1788
Pantzar, Mika .....	346
Paolini, Paolo .....	495
	484
Paone, Sonia .....	122
Pape, Simone .....	356
Pape, Ulla .....	2542
Pappamikail, Lia .....	1870
Parding, Karolina .....	1281
Pardo, Ignacio .....	1394
Parente, Cristina .....	1762
Parra Saiani, Paolo .....	2367
Parthenay, Kevin .....	1659
Pascale, Meriot .....	1087
Pasieka, Agnieszka .....	2217
Pasteels, Inge .....	962
	98
Pato, João .....	883
Patrick, Guiol .....	1087
Pattyn, Elise .....	1110
Patulny, Roger .....	799
Pavesi, Nicoletta .....	1405
Pavluytkin, Ivan .....	693
Pavolini, Emmanuele .....	1732
Pawlowska, Beata .....	1421
	783
Payne, Heather .....	1244
Pazarzi, Eleni Nina .....	1751

Pazarzis, Michalis.....	2297
Pearce, Susan .....	2338
Pechtelidis, Yannis .....	269
Pedercini, Claudia .....	1776
Pedersen, Inge Kryger.....	1060
Pedreno, Andres.....	2426
	2377
Pegado, Elsa .....	1065
Peist, Nuria .....	130
Pekkarinen, Elina.....	320
Pekkarinen, Satu .....	15
Pelkonen, Antti .....	1626
Pellizzoni, Luigi.....	901
	1493
Peltola, Marja.....	1959
Pelzel, Frank.....	543
Penalva, Clemente .....	1221
Penelas, Marion.....	1497
Peräkylä, Anssi.....	1355
Perälä, Riikka .....	1307
Pereira, Anabela.....	144
Pereira, Helder .....	604
Pereira, Inês .....	1652
Pereira, Ines .....	1444
Pereira, Irina .....	1196
	1334
Pereira, Maria .....	1770
Pereira, Maria do Mar.....	2138
Pereira, Patrícia.....	413
Pereira, Sara .....	281
	318
	276
Pereira, Tiago Santos.....	1623
Pereira Puga, Manuel.....	593
Perez-Castro, Judith.....	1248
Perez Rubio, José António.....	1767
Perino, Maria .....	2367
Pernigotti, Elisabetta.....	2109
Perrotta, Manuela .....	1364
	1600
Peshkova, Vera .....	2207
Pessoa, Inês.....	1904
Peterson, Helen.....	915
	1048
Petrella, Andrea.....	2072

Petric, Gregor .....	1212
Petropoulos, Nicholas.....	591
	592
Petrovici, Carmen.....	97
Pfadenhauer, Michaela.....	2557
	1279
Pfaff, Nicolle .....	1882
Pfahl, Lisa.....	2179
Philipps, Axel.....	1700
PhL Logrén, Anne.....	1409
Piazza, Gianni .....	1688
Pichler, Florian.....	2068
	2286
Pieri, Elisa.....	1501
Pierobon, Chiara.....	203
Pietiläinen, Olli.....	1068
Pietro Paolo, Guzzo.....	1102
Piga, Maria Lucia.....	1755
Piko, Bettina .....	1900
Piko, Bettina F. ....	288
	923
Pilch Ortega, Angela.....	239
Pilitowski, Bartosz.....	635
Pinkney, Sharon .....	757
	289
Pinto, Carla.....	1318
Pinto, Hugo.....	1623
Pinto, Manuel.....	276
	281
Pinto, Maria Luís Rocha .....	1712
Pinto, Paula .....	2181
Pinto, Teresa .....	1718
Pinto-Coelho, Zara .....	1093
	2119
Piotrowski, Grzegorz .....	2236
	1657
Piras, Enrico Maria .....	1607
	1139
Pires, Heldemerina.....	702
Pires, Helena .....	1093
Pires, Maria Helena .....	797
	410
Pires de Lima, Marínús.....	1167
Pirralha, André.....	1601
Pirkanen, Henna.....	788

	1379
Piteira, Margarida .....	641
Pizanias, Caterina .....	185
Plagnol, Anke .....	1046
Planella Ribera, Jordi .....	2198
Platero Méndez, Raquel .....	1009
Pleios, George .....	1201
Plischke, Maik .....	33
Pochic, Sophie .....	1184
Poder, Poul .....	805
Podolinská, Tatiana .....	2438
Podvoyskiy, Denis .....	1855
Poelman, Marcia .....	1041
Poglia Miletì, Francesca .....	2027
Pohjola, Kirsi .....	1958
Pohlheim, Katja .....	1116
	802
Pohn-Weidinger, Maria .....	218
Pokrovsky, Nikita .....	2537
	853
Policarpo, Verónica .....	815
	1554
Pollack, Joseph Richard Yves Gaston .....	596
Pollock, Gary .....	1964
Polomski, Krystian .....	2324
Ponnet, Koen .....	962
	98
Ponte, Cristina .....	1227
Poortman, Anne-Rigt .....	1002
Popescu, Mihaela .....	466
Popov, Dmitry .....	2534
	1237
Popova, Irina .....	1297
Popp, Sandra .....	1940
Poppe, Christian .....	396
Porrello, Antonino .....	475
Portugal, Sílvia .....	1779
	1749
	1133
Poudel, Meena .....	1568
Poutanen, Seppo .....	639
	1374
Powell, Fred .....	1896
Powell, Justin J.W. ....	2179
Poyraz, Bedriye .....	2221

Pranka, Ieva .....	1467
Pranka, Maruta .....	229
Prata, Ana.....	2147
Preston, John .....	669
Pretto, Albertina.....	1411
Preuß, Maren.....	95
Prideaux, Simon .....	2189
Priest, Naomi .....	286
Pringle, Keith .....	323
Procacci, Giovanna .....	2043
Prof. Schouten, Maria Johanna.....	2145
Prokic-Breuer, Tijana.....	726
Pron-Nowak, Natalia.....	1017
Pronina, Elena .....	1899
Prosser, Lauren .....	286
Prpic, Katarina .....	1604
	1628
Pryke, Sam .....	431
Psarikidou, Katerina .....	810
Puaca, Goran .....	655
Puch, Katharina.....	1433
Pugh, Stephen.....	1542
Puigvert, Lidia.....	2141
	694
Pulido, Cristina .....	1203
	2141
Punch, Samantha.....	274
Punzo, Valentina .....	1498
Purhonen, Semi.....	393
Pushkareva, Tatiana.....	2344
Put, Bart.....	1823
Puthussery, Shuby .....	997
Puuronen, Vesa.....	1880
Puzanova, Zhanna .....	796
Pyykkö, Raija.....	1255
Quartiani, Diana.....	353
	263
Queirós, João .....	2374
Queiroz, Aleksandra.....	960
Quemin, Alain .....	2113
	168
	119
Quintas, Carla.....	1312
Quintela, Pedro.....	166
Räsänen, Pekka .....	1477

Rönkä, Anna.....	304
Rössel, Jörg.....	356
Røn, Katrina .....	1562
Rückert-John, Jana .....	2125
	397
Raúl, Ruiz Callado.....	1761
Raab, Marcel .....	75
Raaen, Finn Daniel.....	1296
Rabusic, Ladislav .....	982
Radaev, Vadim.....	612
Rahkonen, Keijo .....	393
Rahkonen, Ossi.....	1864
	1068
Raimundo, Alexandra.....	1583
	1890
Raluca, Petre.....	1208
Ramalho, Joana .....	506
Ramos, Irene .....	1641
Ramos, Madalena .....	1026
	2263
Ramos, Rui.....	318
Ranci, Costanzo .....	1732
Randhahn, Solveig.....	738
	1710
Rando, Belén.....	2197
Rantala, Kati.....	1694
Rapaport, Joan.....	1488
Rapetti, Elisa .....	1919
Rapoliene, Grazina.....	83
Raposo, Hélder.....	1128
	1492
Raposo, Rita.....	1852
Rasell, Michael .....	2547
	2180
Ratcliffe, Peter .....	2000
Ratecka, Anna .....	1569
Ratiu, Dan Eugen .....	149
Ratiu, Mara .....	123
Ratner, David.....	453
Rauch, Angela .....	1714
Rautalin, Marjaana .....	692
Rautio, Susanna.....	1379
	986
Ravn, Signe .....	1920
Reba, Darko .....	2508

Rebelo, Hugo.....	702
Rebughini, Paola .....	2414
Recchi, Ettore .....	2085
Reegård, Kaja.....	2244
Rees Jones, Ian.....	1290
Reeve, Donna.....	2199
Regev, Motti .....	513
Rego, Raquel.....	1294
Rehfeldt, Udo Rehfeldt .....	1194
Reibling, Nadine .....	103
	1099
Reich, Wendelin .....	2024
Reichenpfader, Ursula.....	1062
	1145
Reicher, Dieter.....	795
	2060
Reichert, Timo .....	112
Reigadinha, Tânia .....	1223
	1632
Reijnders, Lucas.....	889
Reinbacher, Gunnar Scott.....	1130
	1061
	1070
Reis, Jussara Christina.....	903
Reis Jorge, Ana .....	1957
	959
Reisz, Robert D. ....	675
Reiter, Herwig.....	1954
	629
Rek-Wozniak, Magdalena .....	2505
	2521
Remmers, Hartmut .....	33
Rensujeff, Kaija .....	183
Revet, Sandrine.....	570
Reynolds, Paul .....	1590
Ribeiro, Raquel.....	365
Ribeiro, Rita.....	489
Ribeiro da Silva, Pedro.....	1093
Riccioni, Ilaria .....	458
Richard, Elvi .....	1262
Richard-Ferroudji, Audrey .....	843
Richardson, Diane .....	1557
	1552
	1568
Ridge, Tess .....	251

Rieckmann, Marco.....	842
Riepe, Anna.....	152
Rimaite, Ausra.....	854
Rinaudo, Jean-Daniel.....	843
Rinken, Sebastian.....	2282
Rinkevicius, Leonardas.....	822
	854
	1452
Rinnawi, Khalil.....	1200
Rios, Diego.....	1796
Riska, Elianne.....	1339
Ristic, Dusan.....	833
Rita, Bertozzi.....	2388
Rittersberger-Tilic, Helga.....	2423
	1699
Riva, Angelo.....	1327
Roßmann, Simon.....	1014
Roberge, Jonathan.....	1807
Roberts, Ken.....	1964
Robinson, Victoria.....	1564
Rocha de Jesus, Cerise.....	903
Roche, Maurice.....	1793
Rodeschini, Giulia.....	43
Rodríguez-Giralt, Israel.....	1669
	2198
Rodríguez Pascual, Iván.....	284
Rodríguez Teijeiro, Ariadna.....	574
Rodrigues, Carla F.....	1103
Rodrigues, Eduardo.....	1055
	1733
Rodrigues, Elisabete.....	1010
	2166
Rodrigues, Maria Eugenia.....	870
Rodrigues, Miguel.....	890
Rodrigues, Ricardo.....	6
Rodriguez Avila, Nuria.....	1331
Roeder, Antje.....	2251
Roets, Griet.....	2201
	2196
Rogge, Benedikt.....	789
Rogge, Benedikt G.....	1079
Roggemans, Lilith.....	1949
Rojo-Perez, Fermina.....	25
Rokicka, Ewa.....	2521
Rolim Patriarca, Madalena.....	1295

Rollin, Dominique .....	843
Romão, Ana.....	1757
Romão, José Eustáquio .....	511
Romano, Onofrio .....	538
Romanos, Eduardo.....	1654
Romanov, Pavel .....	2546
	1316
	2185
	245
Romanova, Maria .....	359
Romeu Gordo, Laura.....	1736
Ronkainen, Suvi .....	791
Roos, Gun .....	364
Roos, J.P. ....	246
Roos, J P .....	2512
	225
Roose, Henk.....	380
Roque Dantas, Ana .....	625
	779
Rosenberger, Katharina .....	1264
Roseneil, Sasha .....	1588
	988
Rosenmund, Moritz .....	691
Rossi, Emanuele .....	550
Rossi, Giovanna .....	940
	939
Rostgaard, Tine .....	82
Roth, Maria .....	685
Roth, Silke .....	1463
Rother, Nina .....	2395
Rotkirch, Anna .....	2512
Roudil, Nadine .....	830
Roulstone, Alan .....	2189
Roussel, Sandrine .....	1121
Rowland, Jussara .....	603
Roysamb, Espen .....	1584
Ruano, Juan de Dios.....	571
Rubegni, Elisa .....	495
Rubio, Felipe .....	2402
Rudnev, Maksim.....	2230
Rufino, Annamaria.....	561
Rui, Brito Fonseca.....	1624
Ruiner, Caroline.....	1381
Ruiz Ben, Esther.....	1301
Ruland, Michael.....	75

Rummert, Sonia.....	735
Rungule, Ritma.....	17
Runte, Eduardo F. A.....	566
Ruokonen-Engler, Minna.....	742
Ruppenthal, Silvia.....	966
Rusu, Dan Octavian .....	316
Rusu, Horatiu.....	1956
	2240
Ruuskanen, Petri.....	633
Ruzza, Carlo.....	2071
Ruzzeddu, Massimiliano.....	1789
Ryan, Lorna.....	1611
Rydgren, Jens .....	2057
Ryen, Anne.....	1343
Ryner, Magnus .....	449
Rynkänen, Tatjana .....	2378
Rzeznicka-Krupa, Jolanta.....	2184
Sánchez Barricarte, Jesús Javier .....	2354
Sánchez Criado, Tomás.....	86
São José, José .....	46
Süß, Waldemar.....	1071
Saúde, Sandra.....	1258
Saadi, Iven.....	275
Saastamoinen, Peppiina.....	1068
Sabre, Clothilde .....	148
Sacco, Muriel.....	2046
Sacco, Pier Luigi.....	181
Sadaba, Igor .....	1676
	1621
Saenger, Eva.....	2152
Safipour, Jalal.....	1152
Sagebiel, Felizitas .....	1031
Sagen, Line Melboe.....	279
Saint-Blancat, Chantal.....	2413
Saint-Jacques, Marie-Christine .....	951
Sairinen, Rauno.....	905
	588
Saks, Mike .....	1306
Salamonska, Justyna .....	1241
	2225
Salanterä, Sanna.....	290
Saldová, Katerina .....	2150
Salmela, Mikko .....	768
Salmi, Minna.....	1004
Salmieri, Luca.....	916

Salminen, Veli-Matti.....	2480
Salo, Elena .....	1321
Salzbrunn, Monika.....	2558
Salzer, Heike .....	1352
Samitca, Sanda .....	94
Samolyk, Justyna .....	2271
Sandall, Jane.....	1510
	1320
Sandberg, Sveinung.....	1372
Sande, Allan .....	832
Sandikci, Özlem.....	349
Sandstedt, Eva .....	1795
Sandvin, Johans .....	2186
SantaCruz, Iñaki.....	439
Santa Cruz, Iñaki .....	2279
Santamaría, Elsa.....	1950
Santangelo, Federica .....	2267
Santero, Arianna.....	1777
Santiago, Elvira .....	572
Santoro, Marco .....	361
	2453
Santoro, Monica .....	1942
Santos, Alexandra .....	2334
Santos, Ana Cristina.....	1538
	914
	1588
Santos, Anderson.....	879
Santos, Filipe.....	1605
	1217
Santos, Hélia .....	2219
	1992
Santos, Maria .....	627
Santos Pereira, Tiago.....	1643
Sanz-Menendez, Luis.....	1602
Sapin, Marlène .....	929
Saraceno, Chiara.....	38
Saragoça, José.....	2066
	702
Sarmiento, Manuel Jacinto.....	277
Sassatelli, Monica.....	457
Sassatelli, Roberta .....	361
	1543
Satta, Caterina.....	343
Sauer, Prof. Dr. Dieter .....	1183
Scalabrin Coutinho, Ângela Maria .....	270

Scanlon, Margaret .....	1896
Schömann, Klaus .....	91
Schönemann, Sebastian .....	1985
Schönpflug, Karin .....	2107
Schütze, Fritz.....	223
Schaan, Barbara.....	114
Schaefer, Andrea.....	2130
Schaffrin, Andre.....	909
Schall, Carly Elizabeth.....	487
Scharf, Manuela Scharf.....	599
Scheibelhofer, Elisabeth.....	2372
	2247
Schels, Brigitte.....	1951
Schenk, Niels.....	37
Scherrer, Regina .....	931
Scherschel, Karin .....	2396
Schiebel, Martina.....	238
Schief, Sebastian.....	1460
Schierbaum, Anja .....	306
Schifirnet, Constantin .....	1236
Schilling, Meinhard .....	33
Schirmer, Werner .....	1064
	2024
Schmauch, ULrika .....	2010
Schmaus, Gunther.....	948
Schmid, Veronika .....	2014
Schmidt, Anja .....	2011
Schmidt, Christopher .....	75
Schmidt, Filip .....	2237
	467
Schmidt, Luísa.....	883
Schmidt, Luisa .....	843
	839
Schmitz, Stefan .....	450
Schneider, Marie .....	2429
Schneider, Michael.....	1416
Schneider, Thorsten .....	61
Schnell, Christiane.....	2455
	1286
Schnettler, Bernt.....	2440
Schober, Pia .....	2161
Schoenfeld, Stuart .....	2501
Scholtz, Jennifer .....	282
Scholz, Evi.....	1434
Scholz, Roland W. ....	1519

Schouten, Maria Johanna.....	1556
Schröder, Anja.....	223
Schramme, Annick .....	2459
	169
Schroeder, Anja.....	217
Schroeder, Heike.....	48
	20
Schrooten, Mechthild.....	2130
Schubert, Frank .....	1293
	1039
Schubert, Johannes.....	852
Schubotz, Dirk .....	1859
	1527
Schuetze, Fritz.....	217
Schulze, Gisela C. ....	33
Schunck, Reinhard .....	2258
	1079
Schuppers, Nanette.....	2056
Schutter, Sabina .....	295
Scott, Jacqueline .....	1046
Scott, Sue .....	1570
Seabra, Teresa.....	709
Seabra Santos, Aline.....	682
Sebastião, João.....	663
Sebastião, Sónia .....	1229
Sebastiao, Sonia .....	520
Sebok, Csilla.....	958
Sedas Nunes, João .....	2519
Sedmak, Suzana .....	372
Seebach, Swen .....	754
	2554
Segers, Katia .....	177
	169
	2459
	2462
Seim, Sissel.....	1679
	1403
Seitsamo, Jorma.....	71
Seixas, Ana Maria .....	682
Seixas, Paulo.....	689
Seixas Barbosa, Sônia Regina.....	879
Sekula, Elisabeth Anne .....	1461
Selin, Jani .....	1124
Selmi, Giulia .....	1551
Semenova, Anna .....	2540

Semi, Giovanni .....	361
Senkane, Silva.....	1909
Seppälä, Pauliina.....	1349
Serban, Monica .....	2261
Sergiyenko, Aliye.....	1475
	1723
Serra, Helena .....	1283
Serracant, Pau.....	1898
	502
Serradell, Olga.....	2006
	2279
Serrano Pascual, Amparo .....	1178
Setien, Maria Luisa.....	2430
Sevastyanova, Katerina.....	379
Shafir, Gershon .....	2496
Shaik, Farah .....	2092
Shamir, Omri .....	394
Shani, Maor .....	2500
Shapiro, Roberta .....	214
Sharpe, Sue.....	920
Shavit, Nimrod.....	753
Shildrick, Tracy.....	1905
Shipman, Alan .....	1633
	2356
Shirani, Fiona .....	996
Shkaratan, Ovsey.....	2351
Shortell, Timothy.....	237
Sibilla, Gianni.....	1218
Sicher, Efraim .....	1975
Sidorina, Tatiana .....	2541
	1728
Sigala, Evangelia.....	1201
Siilak, Kristel.....	224
Siipi, Helena .....	1485
Siisiäinen, Martti .....	1684
	2095
Siivonen, Katriina.....	1868
Silius, Harriet .....	2375
Silva, Alexandre.....	2520
Silva, António.....	2248
Silva, Carlos .....	2066
Silva, Manuel Carlos.....	960
	1969
Silva, Marta.....	1044
Silva, Pedro .....	695

Silva, Susana.....	1140
	1524
Silva Cruz, Isabel.....	351
Silvast, Antti.....	579
Silvestre, Agostinho.....	1726
Simões, Maria João.....	1507
Simbuerger, Elisabeth.....	1829
Simionca, Anca.....	1883
Simitis, Marilena.....	2069
Simon, Richard.....	1828
Simone, Maura.....	723
Simonen, Mika.....	1356
Simonyan, Renald.....	2545
Simpson, Bob.....	1426
Simsek, Leyla.....	2100
Sineaeva-Pankowska, Natalia.....	1997
Singh, Arjun.....	437
Singleton, Carrie.....	1352
Sinisgalli, Paulo Antonio.....	884
Sinkovic, Matija.....	2165
Siongers, Jessy.....	967
	491
	727
Sirkeci, Ibrahim.....	2246
Sivak, Elizaveta.....	684
Skjøtt-Larsen, Jakob.....	2476
Skowronska, Marta.....	188
Slavtcheva-Petkova, Vera.....	331
Slesingerova, Eva.....	499
Smart, Carol.....	1424
	1560
Smeby, Jens-Christian.....	1298
Smietana, Marcin.....	969
	1534
Smith, Christi.....	2013
	1649
Smith, Glenn.....	1290
	1565
Smith, Merryn.....	1244
Smith, Neil.....	1090
Smits, Wendy.....	1888
Smolej, Mirka.....	762
Smolej, Simona.....	104
Smrekar, Tomaz.....	1439
Snellman, Marie-Louise.....	29

Snikere, Sigita .....	1866
Soboleva, Irina.....	1165
Soh, Damir.....	1709
	1914
Sohl, Lena .....	1407
Sokka, Sakarias.....	158
Sokolova, Elena.....	1210
Solaroli, Marco.....	2311
	2453
Solbjør, Marit .....	1499
Soldà, Monica.....	2128
Soledade, Ana Filipa .....	1209
Soler, Marta .....	1203
Soler, Roger .....	1898
Soler Gallart, Marta .....	1784
Solomos, John.....	2023
Solvang, Per Koren .....	162
Somel, R. Nazli.....	670
Soneryd, Linda .....	865
Soo, Kadri.....	315
	983
Sordé Martí, Teresa.....	1695
Sosunova, Irene .....	2530
Sousa, Cláudia .....	910
Sousa, Isabel.....	2131
	265
Sousa, Sofia .....	1329
Sousa Ribeiro, Joana .....	1285
	2421
Souto Otero, Manuel .....	2077
Spännäri, Jenni.....	5
Speder, Zsolt .....	1937
Spencer, Philip .....	2018
Spross, Cornelia .....	85
Spyridonidis, Dimitri.....	1313
Squillace, Francesco .....	769
Stø, Eivind .....	383
	403
Støkken, Anne Marie .....	1266
Stadler, Sabine .....	2088
	1441
Staiger, Petra.....	302
Stanek, Mikolaj .....	2276
Stascheit, Andreas Georg .....	505
Stasieniuk, Zaneta.....	2296

Stauffacher, Michael.....	809
	1519
Stazio, Marialuisa .....	1235
Stebe, Janez.....	1439
	1432
Stec, Katarzyna .....	1382
	2348
Stefanelli, Laura.....	2143
Steiber, Nadia.....	1035
Steinhagen-Thiessen, Elisabeth.....	33
Steinkopf, Leander .....	1436
Stella, Francesca.....	1592
Stenborg, Emelie .....	866
Stephenson, Svetlana .....	894
Stevens, Martin.....	1488
Stewart, Janet.....	128
Stewart, Simon .....	531
Stigliano, Giuseppe .....	414
Stock, Manfred .....	675
Stoegner, Karin.....	2001
Stoilova, Mariya.....	1588
	950
Stojisic, Milica.....	568
Stokowska, Anna.....	459
Stoleroff, Alan .....	1334
	1196
Stoller, Robin .....	2007
Stoop, David.....	2005
Storm-Mathisen, Ardis .....	376
Storvik, Aagoth .....	2073
Strandbakken, Pål .....	383
	405
Strandell, Harriet.....	334
Stratti, Ingrid .....	2136
Strazisar, Urska .....	904
Strelnikova, Anna .....	1420
	2493
Stretmo, Live .....	1731
Stroeing, Miriam .....	2509
Strugut, Alina .....	898
	780
Stulhofer, Aleksandar .....	1914
Stypinska, Justyna.....	77
Suenker, Heinz.....	338
Suglobova, Valeria .....	1631

Sulek, Antoni .....	1978
Sulkunen, Pekka.....	377
Sumbas, Ahu .....	1228
Sundback, Susan .....	2444
Suokas, Anu .....	1476
Susen, Simon .....	1818
Sutela, Hanna.....	1019
Sutherland, Allan .....	1791
	205
Sutherland, Ian .....	197
	2456
Sutherland, Mike.....	1533
Svab, Alenka .....	970
Swirak, Katharina .....	1896
Syltevik, Liv Johanne.....	975
Symoens, Sara .....	1057
	1075
	912
Symons, Katrien .....	731
Syväterä, Jukka .....	2358
Szahaj, Andrzej .....	2047
Szakacs, Judit .....	1683
Szakacs, Simona.....	2012
Szaló, Csaba .....	1816
Szalma, Ivett.....	2155
	2133
Szanyi, Agnes.....	133
Szathmari, Milan.....	623
	1134
Szczepanikova, Alice.....	2407
Szerszynski, Bronislaw.....	810
Szi-Ferenc, Zsófia .....	874
Szmeja, Maria.....	2309
Sznaider, Natan.....	1986
Szydlik, Marc .....	93
	1067
Törnquist-Plewa, Barbara.....	2314
Törnqvist, Maria.....	744
Törrönen, Jukka.....	801
Tai, Yun .....	2460
Tainio, Matti .....	202
Takeda, Naoko .....	1395
Talves, Kairi.....	2110
Tanatova, Dina .....	2544
Tanatova, Dina K.....	480

Taner, Mehmet Ümit.....	895
Tanschus, Nele Marie.....	23
Tapio, Tarja .....	89
Tarabini, Aina .....	730
Tarant, Zbynek .....	1987
Tarnanen, Mirja .....	2378
Tart, Indrek .....	2227
Taru, Marti .....	1924
Tarvenkorn, Alexander .....	2479
Tasheva, Gallina.....	1802
Tavares, Alexandre .....	586
Tavares, David .....	1326
Taylor, Yvette .....	1559
	2101
Taylor-Gooby, Peter .....	1486
Tchouikina, Sofia.....	2471
Tegtbur, Uwe .....	33
Teixeira, Berta .....	564
Tejerina, Benjamín .....	1950
Telesiene, Audrone .....	822
Telljohann, Volker.....	1179
	1194
Teltemann, Janna.....	718
Temple, Bogusia.....	247
Teodoro, António.....	720
Teräväinen, Tuula.....	1626
Terlica, Sofia.....	614
Terpe, Sylvia.....	787
Terragni, Laura .....	348
Tervonen-Gonçalves, Leena .....	1746
Tessarolo, Mariselda .....	213
Testenoire, Armelle .....	987
Tettamanti, Manuel.....	992
Thoben, Wilfried .....	33
Tholen, Jochen .....	1964
Thomas, Nigel .....	340
Thomas, Sauvadet .....	1928
Thome, Helmut.....	792
Thomson, Rachel .....	920
Throne-Holst, Harald .....	403
Thuesen, Frederik .....	1380
Thwaites, Ebru.....	428
Tiilikka, Tiina.....	1109
Tileaga, Cristian.....	2331
Timmers, Paul .....	99

Timonen, Päivi.....	375
	851
Titton, Monica.....	418
Tobío, Constanza.....	2123
Tobsch, Verena.....	2144
Todd, Megan.....	1539
Toews, David.....	1839
Toikka, Arho.....	2474
Toivonen, Timo.....	368
Tolkki, Helena.....	1109
Tolonen, Tarja.....	1871
Tomás, Catarina.....	260
	252
Tomás, Licínio Manuel Vicente.....	40
Tommarchi, Enrico.....	475
Tonsberg, Knut.....	1399
Topak, Ozgun Erdener.....	2288
Topal, Cagatay.....	1806
Torbenfeldt Bengtsson, Tea.....	1965
Torres, Anália.....	265
	972
	1029
	949
	1003
Torres, Analia.....	2131
Torres, Leonor.....	1256
	698
Tortell, Lisa.....	1187
	1044
Toschi Maciel, Carolina.....	812
Tosi, Simone.....	2034
Tota, Anna Lisa.....	517
Tovey, Hilary.....	869
Townsend, Janet.....	1568
Townsend, Mardie.....	302
	300
Tröndle, Martin.....	155
Trajtenberg, Graciela.....	206
Trancart, Danièle.....	987
Trapenciere, Ilze.....	1908
Trasforini, Maria Antonietta.....	196
Traue, Boris.....	454
Traxler, Franz.....	1155
	1176
Trenz, Hans-Joerg.....	2054

Treufeldt, Indrek .....	1230
Triandafyllidou, Anna.....	2085
Trienekens, Sandra .....	189
Trifiletti, Rossana.....	943
	928
Trofimova, Irina.....	1963
Trotsuk, Irina.....	1886
Trujillo-Barbadillo, Gracia .....	1546
Truninger, Mónica.....	839
Truninger, Monica.....	367
Tsobanoglou, George.....	837
Tsouroufli, Maria.....	1305
	1244
Tuñón, Jorge .....	539
Tubadji, Annie.....	543
Tucci, Enrico.....	2278
Tuija, Mononen.....	1678
Tuohela, Kirsi.....	1108
Tuominen, Terhi .....	1626
Tuorto, Dario.....	1025
	1867
	955
Tupá, Barbora.....	2150
Tupasela, Aaro .....	1637
Tupitsyna, Irina N. ....	1210
Turek, Konrad.....	1363
	2318
Turjacanin, Vladimir.....	2153
Turkoglu, Didem .....	1215
Turmel, André.....	262
Turner, Charles.....	1782
Tutalar, Laçin.....	360
Tutenges, Sébastien.....	1146
Tvorogova, Svetlana.....	2534
Tydlitátová, Vera.....	1971
Tyrala, Radoslaw.....	2212
Tysiachniouk, Maria.....	825
Tyurina, Irina.....	2549
Tyutyundzhi, Ivan .....	1204
Uggla, Ylva .....	865
Ulbricht, Susan .....	2134
	2115
Ullberg, Susann.....	597
Unutulmaz, K. Onur .....	2210
Uotila, Hanna.....	42

Urban, Michael .....	1826
Urbano, Claudia Valadas.....	721
	1129
	406
Urdaneta, Elena.....	13
Urraco, Mariano.....	1889
Urze, Paula.....	606
	1619
Urzha, Olga .....	1895
Usacheva, Olga.....	1671
User, Inci .....	1034
Ussawarakha, Sirima.....	2383
Utriainen, Terhi.....	2457
Uzzell, David.....	1495
Vabø, Mia .....	1336
Vakhshayn, Victor.....	1812
Valarino, Isabel.....	2154
Valderrama, M.Jose .....	56
Valeeva, Rania .....	1147
	1148
Valente, Susana .....	839
	883
Valentova, Marie.....	2262
	1018
Valle, Ann K.....	1584
Valle, Trinidad.....	1996
Valles Martínez, Miguel S.....	1994
Van Breda, John.....	809
Vandekinderen, Caroline .....	2196
Vandenbroucke, Anneloes .....	731
Van Den Buys, Christine .....	177
	2462
Van den Cruyce, Nele .....	325
Van de Putte, Bart .....	620
	1052
	946
van der Eerden, Maya .....	142
van der Velden Lyons, Vera .....	666
van der Weijden, Inge.....	1620
Van de Velde, Sarah .....	1089
	1110
Vando, Borghi.....	2355
	2289
van Eijck, Koen.....	200
	421

van Eijk, Gwen.....	2473
van Gaalen, Ruben.....	37
Vangoidsenhoven, Gjuido .....	491
Vangoidsenhoven, Guido .....	727
Vanhecke, Gust.....	380
Van Houtte, Mieke .....	713
	714
	688
	719
	668
Van Kerckem, Klaartje.....	2376
	2412
van Koppen, Kris .....	878
Van Maele, Dimitri .....	719
Van Rossem, Ronan .....	1990
	657
Van Tuyckom, Charlotte.....	657
Van Wassenhove, Wim .....	566
Vargiu, Andrea.....	390
Varjonen, Sirkku .....	1353
Vasconcelos, Lia .....	2399
Vasconcelos, Pedro.....	979
Vasecka, Michal .....	1981
Vasile, Marian.....	2481
Vatta, Alessia.....	1159
Veenstra, Marijke.....	1112
	70
Vega, Judith.....	207
Vehmas, Simo .....	2204
Veira Ramos, Alberto .....	2276
	2354
Velikaya, Nataliya.....	2531
	1675
Veloso, Luisa .....	1393
	1251
Venn, Susan.....	51
	1084
Veranda, Marta.....	843
Vera Zambrano, Sandra.....	456
Verbakel, Ellen .....	993
Vercruyssen, Anina .....	1052
Verdi, Laura .....	2449
Veres, Valér.....	1892
	2483
	2208

Verga Matos, Pedro.....	889
Verhaeghe, Pieter-Paul .....	620
Verpraet, Gilles.....	1792
	1280
Verté, Dominique.....	28
	44
Verwiebe, Roland .....	2490
	1027
Verwohlt, Betina .....	1070
Vesala, Kari Mikko.....	2457
Vianello, Mino .....	2122
Vicente, Michael .....	1322
Vicente, Trinidad.....	2430
Vicente Baptista, Luís.....	1757
Videira, Pedro.....	1625
Viegas, José Manuel Leite .....	2078
Vieira, Jorge .....	1225
Vieira, Maria .....	1870
Vierimaa, Sanna-Mari.....	2254
Vihalemm, Peeter .....	2239
Vihalemm, Triin.....	387
Vik, Kari .....	1376
Villaplana, Laura.....	2306
Vincent, Stéphanie .....	811
Vincenti, Alessandra.....	1036
Vinci, Fiorella .....	1772
Vingelli, Giovanna.....	1701
	2175
Vinitzky-Seroussi, Vered .....	2333
Vink, Maarten .....	2042
Vinnari, Markus.....	813
Viorela, Ducu-Foamete.....	732
Viot, Pascal.....	1506
	1497
Virkama, Anna .....	2365
Viry, Gil .....	976
Vitale, Tommaso.....	2034
Vitsilakis, Chryssi.....	1773
Viuhko, Minna .....	2156
Vlegels, Jef .....	1990
Vlerick, Peter .....	1121
Vogel, Claudia .....	74
	961
Vogel, Mary .....	1847
Vogl, Susanne .....	307

	1388
Vogt, Kristoffer Chelsom.....	234
Vohlídalová, Marta.....	2150
Voicu, Bogdan .....	2261
Voicu, Malina .....	2158
Voiron, Christine.....	600
von Bonsdorff, Monika.....	71
von Scheve, Christian.....	803
Voorpostel, Marieke.....	968
Vorona, Mariya .....	665
Vosyliute, Anele.....	2202
Vramo, Lill.....	345
Vratusa, Vera.....	441
Vryonides, Marios.....	2439
	1333
	1773
Vysotskaya, Volha.....	2419
Wästerfors, David.....	1369
Wærdahl, Randi.....	326
Wójtewicz, Anna .....	1580
Wagner, Björn.....	436
Wagner, Izabela .....	1328
	1375
Wahl, Friedrich Michael.....	33
Wahlen, Stefan .....	357
Walker, Charlie .....	2482
Wall, Karin .....	94
	984
Wallace, Claire .....	1137
Walsh, Kieran .....	100
Waltari, Suvi-Tuuli .....	1626
Wanderley Junior, Bruno .....	2021
Wang, Ya-Hsuan .....	758
	2142
Wang, Ying Yun.....	2284
Wangler, Alexandra.....	1885
Waniek, Katarzyna Waniek .....	227
Warde, Alan.....	378
Warming, Hanne.....	266
	333
Warminska, Katarzyna .....	2223
Warner, Uwe.....	1443
	1437
Wastian, Monika .....	1416
Watarai, Tomoko .....	2274

Waters, Elizabeth .....	286
	302
Watson, Nick .....	2205
	2188
Watson, Peggy .....	1117
Watt, Sal .....	1397
Weaver, Simon .....	2025
Webber, Michelle.....	1596
Weber, Beat.....	450
Weber, Christoph.....	715
Webman, Esther.....	2017
Webster, Colin .....	1905
Wehlau, Diana .....	821
Weil, Shalva.....	2003
	1387
Welland, Trevor T D .....	1530
	1319
Weller, Ines.....	821
Welz, Frank .....	1841
Westberg Broström, Anna .....	280
Wettergren, Åsa.....	2273
	741
Wetzel, Dietmar J. ....	740
	609
Wickham, James .....	1161
	2225
Widding, Steinar .....	2191
Widmer, Eric D. ....	976
	929
Wieseneder, Elisabeth.....	1126
Wieser, Bernhard.....	1610
Wihstutz, Anne , Germany.....	341
Wilinska, Monika.....	7
Willems, Helmut.....	2429
Wilska, Terhi-Anna .....	422
Winclawska, Maria.....	2061
Winkelbach, Simon.....	33
Winterbottom, Janine B. ....	1513
Wintzerith, Stéphanie .....	155
Wittendorff, Nina.....	1961
Wittrock, Manfred .....	33
Wlodzimierz, Chojnack.....	1458
Wolf, Christof .....	700
Wolf, Klaus-Hendrik.....	33
Wolf, Lars .....	33

Wollman, Howard .....	1968
Wolmesjö, Maria .....	1262
Woodiwiss, Jo .....	1526
Woolley, Richard .....	1629
Worek, Barbara .....	1382
Wouters, Cas .....	752
Wray, Sharon .....	2380
Wrede, Sirpa .....	1273
	1252
Wroblewski, Angela .....	1053
Xavier, Beatriz .....	1511
	1143
Xenitidou, Maria .....	1348
	2386
Xerez, Romana .....	1794
	1708
Yaish, Meir .....	407
Yalçinkaya, Ayhan .....	2221
Yamada, Atsuhiko .....	48
Yanardagoglu, Eylem .....	1214
Yanguas Lezaun, Javier .....	13
Yanitsky, Oleg .....	1671
Yardimci, Sibel .....	2182
Yarskaya, Valentina .....	2528
	2529
Yastrebov, Gordey .....	2515
	2351
Yeandle, Sue .....	4
	1016
Yearley, Steve .....	850
Ylä-Anttila, Tuomas .....	2087
Ylönen, Marja .....	867
Ylilahti, Minna .....	66
Yndigegn, Carsten .....	1930
Yokoyama, Keiko .....	660
Yonay, Yuval .....	1532
Young, Brigitte .....	448
Young, Christopher .....	1453
Ytterhus, Borgunn .....	283
Yudkevich, Maria .....	684
yvonne, Guichard-Claudic .....	987
Zózimo, Joana .....	1123
Zagalo, Nelson .....	746
Zagato, Alessandro .....	1696
Zahner, Nina Tessa .....	134

	544
Zakharov, Nikolay .....	2359
	2009
Zaleska-Beyersdorf, Joanna.....	101
Zamora-Monge, Gerardo.....	13
Zampachova, Marketa.....	1553
Zanatta, Sara.....	1202
Zanutto, Alberto .....	1139
	1607
Zapf, Ines.....	112
Zartler, Ulrike .....	1389
	941
Zborowska, Natalia.....	1521
Zdravomyslova, Elena .....	2523
Zembylas, Tasos .....	170
	2466
Zemp, Helena .....	577
Zhianpour, Mehdi.....	1082
Zhou, Mei.....	1646
Zielinska, Iwona.....	1575
	1697
Zielinski, Aleksander Milosz .....	734
	609
Zilinskaite, Viktorija.....	141
	500
Zimenkova, Tatjana .....	667
Zimmermann, Ann.....	2080
Zinn, Jens .....	1454
Znidarsici, Erika .....	1439
Zobel, Clemens .....	2259
Zohar, Asaf .....	2501
Zrinscak, Sinisa .....	2214
	2436
Zuell, Cornelia .....	1440
Zwick, Detlev .....	386