The impact of migration on the familial stability is a topic still under-researched (Hyman et al. 2008, Le Gall 1996). Even if the majority of immigrants live in a familial household both in America and Europe, the study of family migration was developed only recently, since the mid-1980s, particularly in Asian Pacific and American contexts (Kofman 2004, Vatz Laaroussi 2001). Considering migration as a familial project that aims to improve one's life conditions, this body of research focuses on the familial dynamics of migrants. This paper analyzes the factors that influence the familial instability in immigrant families by examining the life course of certain immigrant single-mothers experiencing a conjugal separation. The redefinition of parental roles, the reorganization of familial and professional projects, the economic vulnerability caused by the loss of socioeconomic status, and the social isolation represent the main factors related to the post-migratory adaptation that determine importantly the familial dynamics where a separation can occur. How separation inserts in various familial dynamics and life paths represents the main question at the core of this presentation. Therefore, a closer look aims at the factors related to the life course in itself: the family history, the episodes preceding the migration and the contexts where multiple or serial transitions occur. As a multi-dimensional transition, immigration implies many changes regarding the professional, residential and social status, as well as the adjustment of family roles. Conjugal separation can be a turning point in the family dynamics of migrants who emphasize immigration as a family project, implying though many risks. The juxtaposition of the two transitions can result in a precarious situation: as studies show, living many transitions during a short period of time can increase the risk of developmental difficulties. In order to highlight the most important findings related to these questions, examples are drawn from a postdoctoral research (2006-2008) based on 10 biographic interviews with immigrant single-mothers of various ethnic origins, established in Quebec city (Canada), for more than 3 years. This analytical model can stand as a comparative example for other similar researches conducted in a European context.

Fathering in shared residence after conjugal breakup: balancing paternal autonomy and co-parenting

Marinho, Sofia

*PHD student, Instituto de Ciências Sociais - University of Lisbon
Lisbon, Portugal*

Keywords

fathering, co-parenting, shared residence

Nowadays, in Portugal, as in almost all over Europe, joint custody with shared residence with the child is emerging as a new family context for the construction of social practices and norms of fatherhood.

Being a father with shared residence implies constructing a daily social and family life with the child and becoming responsible for the child's care and education autonomously; fathers must define their own fathering goals, meanings and practices, aside from the previous family project. But it also implies to continue to co-parent with the mother of the child, through negotiation of parental cooperation and division, and to do this in the absence of a conjugal relationship.

Our purpose in this presentation is to discuss fatherhood construction within shared residence, by addressing the interrelations between fathering and co-parenting norms and practices.

The analyses draw on in-depth interviews carried out with 12 fathers who share the residence of their children with the mother. They live in Lisbon, have children under 16 years old, and almost all are highly educated.

Fathering is observed through men's self-perceptions as fathers, paternal practices and father-child bonds. Co-parenting is examined by looking at forms of parental division, boundaries of parental actions and spaces, and the flexibility of norms regarding: the time of residence with the child, childcare and education practices and costs, decisions and communication about the child.

The results revealed four patterns of fatherhood: assertive, complementary, shared, and supported. In each one the forms of perceiving and doing fatherhood are linked to the way in which paternal autonomy is negotiated in the context of co-parenting norms and practices.

Fertile minds in infertile bodies: social constraints, procreative wishes and life choices of infertile couples in Italy

Bartoletti, Roberta

*Communication Sciences, University of Urbino
Urbino PU, Italy*

Mazzoli, Lella

*Communication Sciences, University of Urbino
Urbino PU, Italy*

Boccia Artieri, Giovanni

*Communication Sciences, University of Urbino
Urbino PU, Italy*

Gemini, Laura

*Communication Sciences, University of Urbino
Urbino PU, Italy*

Keywords

procreation choices, family images, women identity, infertility

The paper focuses on the results of several researches conducted from 2004 to now by the Laboratory of social research LaRiCA at the University of Urbino. The topics of those researches are the experiences, wishes and choices of infertile couples and individuals in Italy who decided to undergo a medical treatment of infertility in a private or public structure in the cities of Bologna, Abano Terme, Udine, Milano and Napoli. The empirical data has been collected through individual interviews and focus groups with men and women who are living a story of infertility. The last phase of the research (2008-2009) was financially supported by the Italian Ministry of Health.

In our presentation in Lisbon we would focus on the contradictory process of identity construction of this couples in the current Italian society, where the social values of "family" and "children" are very important in the public discourses (media, politics, Church). On the other hand, this different form of family (wishing children but failing in achieving children) is marginalised, despite the fact that its members are culturally integrated: they have correctly interiorized the prevailing image of family, they have "fertile" mind despite their infertile bodies.

We can indeed assert that infertility in Italy is socially constructed as a private problem. The social lack of concern for the problem of infertility is strongly perceived by the infertile couples.

More precisely the status of infertility seems to be associated with a social stigma, despite the social roots of the problem in developed western societies.

This merging of indifference and stigmatization produces several important effects in the patterns of behaviour, of intimate life and in the construction of social network of the investigated couples. There are risks of auto-segregation and isolation in order to reduce the suffering caused by the impossibility to satisfy a desire for parenthood, excluding "normal" families from their every day lifes.

Another results of the research concern the role of Italian media in the construction of social reality of infertility and of social identity of infertile couples (based on a content analysis of media discourses).

Fertility control and improved partnerships? - A discussion of how the possibility to exercise "negative" fertility control influences relationships, family formation and childbearing

Knudsen, Lisbeth B.

Sociology, Social Work and Organisation, Aalborg University Aalborg, Denmark

Keywords

family formation, fertility control, life biographies

In the late modern society, family formation and childbearing are considered to be subject to couples' joint decisions and to their reflective constructing and maintaining of reflective life biographies. This view implies that individuals must make a number of choices as well as deselections regarding their lives, including their intimate lives, depending on their actual options, living conditions and their notions of the future. Both the choice of partner, of co-parent and the decision to have a child are subject of these conditions.

Women in Denmark are able to deselect having a child at a given time and with a partner who they do not want as co-parent, by using contraceptives and with pregnancy interruption as a last resort. Induced abortion within the first 12 weeks of pregnancy has been available on request in Denmark for 35 years and some recent studies have focused on familial and ethnic characteristics of women, who have an induced abortion.

Results based on register data have shown an almost constant decline in the general rate of abortion (women 15-49 years) in Denmark since the peak in 1976 and that both the levels and trends vary according to the woman's age, family situation, number of children, ethnicity, place of living (urbanisation) and educational attainment. Questionnaire data have documented that the quality of the relation to the partner, if any and the woman's ideal number of children also influences whether she chooses induced abortion. The knowledge about and use of contraceptive has also been shown to vary according to e.g. age and ethnicity. The finding that the first birth probability increases among women who have an abortion, and that this is almost entirely seen among single women, points at an interesting mix of societal and biological influences.

In this paper I will present and compare the various findings based on different sources and discuss the meaning of the possibility to control fertility in the 'negative' way and how this possibility influences relationships, family formation and childbearing.

First marriage and marital disruption in Italy: the role of non-family living

Impicciatore, Roberto

Economics, Business and Statistics, University of Milan Milano, Italy

Tuorto, Dario

Sciences of Formation, University of Bologna Bologna, Italy

Keywords

Adulthood, multi-process models, marital disruption, first marriage, non-family living

The phase preceding union formation belongs to the crucial process of individual development and it usually involves several transitions such as leaving formal education, entering the labour market, leaving parental home. The existing literature predicts that both the timing and the sequencing of these events are expected to have an impact on the following careers (Waite et al., 1986; Beets et al., 1999). In particular, Zeman (2002) shows that adults who lived alone after leaving their parental home also present a higher propensity to disrupt marriage. This can be the result of different mechanisms. First is selection: living alone can simultaneously be associated to a stronger attachment to individualistic values that might lead to higher propensities to union dissolution as well. Second, living alone may cause the development of attitudes that make success in marriage more difficult. For example, those who have experienced a period of independence will value their autonomy to a higher degree, therefore a period of non-family living may be more likely to dissolve a marriage (Berrington and Diamond, 1999). Using micro-level data from ISTAT Multipurpose Survey 2003 and developing multi-process duration models, we will try to understand how premarital behaviors, and in particular living alone, may influence the transition to first marriage and the subsequent marriage stability. It is particularly interesting to study the impact of different patterns of transition to adulthood in the Italian case, characterised by strong peculiarities, such as a latest-late transition to adulthood, low diffusion of independent living arrangements as well as cohabitation.

From deliberate choice to forced acceptance: the recourse of parents to health professionals in time of crisis

Le Pape, Marie-Clémence

Observatoire Sociologique du Changement - OSC, Institut d'Etudes Politiques de Paris France,

Keywords

education, risks, Family, delegation

When a teenager endangers his life, taking risks that threaten his physical and mental integrity, parents are incredulous and helpless at first. Then comes what parents themselves often describe as the time of reaction. Among the resources mobilised in this time of reaction, parents usually turn to their family network and friends, but also to specialists. Based on 24 monographs, and using the discourses of both parents and children (a total of 94 semi-directive interviews) this analysis seeks to study how parents delegate part of their educational prerogatives to tiers, and more specifically to health professionals. Meeting with a health professional is rarely the consequence of the teenager's asking, and this option is diversely apprehended by the parents. Three different conceptions of this option can be identified: delegation, cooperation and resistance. The identification of these three conceptions underlines social clivages which reveal heterogeneous values and educational practices in contemporary France.

From tradition to modernity - Changing family patterns in Spain (1995-2006)

Domínguez-Folgueras, Marta

*Political and Social Sciences, Universidad Pompeu Fabra
Barcelona, Spain*

Keywords

LAT, Cohabitation, divorce, Second Demographic Transition

The main objective of this paper is to study the evolution of non traditional family patterns in Spain, analysing whether there is convergence with other European countries and with the predictions of the Second Demographic Transition. We are interested mainly on shedding some light on consensual unions, LAT relationships and divorce. The Spanish case is interesting as an example of a Southern European country, with its paradoxical co-existence of traditional families and lowest low fertility. In the nineties, public opinion polls pictured a society with quite tolerant attitudes towards new family forms, but according to previous studies, these living arrangements remained marginal and highly selective. However, those studies are based on outdated information (longitudinal analyses use the 1995 Family and Fertility Surveys and cross sectional evidence from the 2001 Census). Our hypothesis is that Spanish families are undergoing a process of individualisation and that less traditional behaviours are becoming more widespread and less selective.

We try to test it using a new dataset with retrospective information, which is the most updated source available (Centro de Investigaciones Sociológicas, 2006). We use descriptive techniques and a cross sectional regression analysis to study the characteristics of current unions, combined with longitudinal analyses to study first union formation and union dissolution, and compare the results with those from previous studies. Our preliminary results show that Spanish family patterns are indeed changing, and that more than half of first unions for young cohorts are now non marital and less selective. Nevertheless, several structural limitations continue to play an important role as barriers to the diffusion of innovative family behaviours in this Southern European country.

Gender inequality in time and responsibility dimensions of housework

Sebok, Csilla

Department of Welfare Statistics, Hungarian Central Statistical Office Budapest, Hungary

Keywords

Family Roles, gender inequality, housework, comparative research

The presentation shall discuss the main attributes of division of housework within the family from international comparative point of view. At first we investigate the differences between the amount of time spent on housework and division of responsibilities on household chore by composition of household and type of day. The second part of the analysis only focuses on those people who live with spouse/partner during the workdays.

The Hungarian research results show that women still do the lion's share of household activities, although the ratio decreases in certain situations or family life-cycle phases. In Hungary female spouses carry less of the responsibility for household tasks and share more housework with their partner when they earn a bigger proportion of household's total income, or when there is a small child in the family. In the latter case, male spouses devote more time to household chores too, at the same time performing on the labour market. The decreasing pattern (ie. reduce of traditional division of housework) is also visible with the retirement of males in the family.

The objective of the international comparison is to validate whether these tendencies existing in Hungary are specific, or generally prevailing in Europe. Also it is analysed if certain categorisations of the countries (for example geographical, date of EU accession or historical/political similarities) has any effect to the tendencies. The analysis is based on "European Social Survey" data collection; the analysis based on the Hungarian data is to be published in near future.

Gender, divorce, parental responsibility and children guardianship. A study of cases

Reis Jorge, Ana

*Centro de Investigação em Ciências Sociais, Universidade do Minho
Braga, Portugal*

Keywords

Gender, divorce, parental responsibility

Portugal met, particularly after April 1974, a reduction of gender inequalities, mainly by the action of social movements of women and certain political forces. Despite the relative progress in law and policy in the defense of gender equality, several national studies show the permanence of important asymmetries in many dimensions of social life, including in the judiciary (Silva 2005; Machado 2005). Several authors show that the binary stereotypes about male-female are often marked in the law and in the administration of justice (in Smart Abbott and Wallace 1991).

As in many sectors, also in processes of separation / divorce and subsequent custody of children, this weighs negatively on women, which requires them to use defensive strategies are often only detectable in 'hidden records' (Scott 1990 ), without excluding minority cases where men can feel aggrieved in their rights as parents.

The poster that will be presented has for base some preliminary results of Phd project "Gender inequalities: processes of marital disruption and guardianship of the children" and also other project entitled "Gender (in)equalities in work and private life: the law to social practices". The central hypothesis of these projects is that the forms of inequality and domination based on gender, are tributaries of macro-economic and institutional mechanisms but is also playing at the micro level (family, business, public and private institutions), involving both variables, namely the presence / absence of certain level of empowerment on resources and rewards from the social actors. Based on official statistics and cases of divorce and guardianship of children, collected in three Portuguese courts, this poster presents an analysis of the motivations for/ in divorce and regulation of parental responsibility and children guardianship, as well as trends in the judicial decision in these cases, in a gender perspective.

Gender: processes of conjugal conflict and parental power

Silva, Manuel Carlos

*Centre of Research in Social Sciences - Institut of Social Sciences, University of Minho
Braga, Portugal*

Machado, Helena

*University of Minho, Centre of Research in Social Sciences - Institut of Social Sciences
Braga, Portugal*

Jorge, Ana Margarida

*University of Minho, Centre of Research in Social Sciences - Institut of Social Sciences
Braga, Portugal*

Queiroz, Aleksandra

*Centre of Research in Social Sciences - Institut of Social Sciences, University of Minho
Braga, Portugal*

Keywords

guardianship, parental responsibility, inequalities of gender

Despite the relative advance, in legal and political terms, of the defence of egalitarian principles within the relation between men and women, recent (inter)national studies confirm the persisting social borders and inequalities of gender in many contexts (work, daily interactions, values and symbolic regulations, institutional frames).

In this paper, after a revisitation, in a synthetic and critical way, of some theoretical paradigms, we propose a convergence of the Marxist model with the feminist one and, indirectly, a fruitful crossing between (neo)Marxism and Weberianism, being this one also articulated with symbolic interactionism.

In a research project about gender (in)equalities in work and private life (PTDC/SDE/72257/2006) and in a doctoral project over "Conjugal rupture and subsequent garde of children" (SFRH/BD/41950/2007), we try, on the basis of quantitative (official statistics) and qualitative methods (the judicial sentences), to we try, on the basis of quantitative (official statistics) and qualitative methods (the judicial sentences), to gather empirical data about administrative justice in divorce processes and in the regulation of parental responsibility and guardianship in the northwest of Portugal. We assume the hypothesis that, beyond the inherent interests to the macro-economic and institutional domination's mechanisms, the control of the feminine force of labour and subsequent phenomena of labour segregation and wage discrimination are whether reproduced or countered at different levels: socio-structural, organizational/institutional and interactive. At the micro and meso-social levels, the power of the woman differs according to different factors, such as: available resources and rewards; participation in the productive process; presence of an hierarchical ranking of sexual roles in the division of labour; place occupied in the organization of the corporation or institution; place in the (re)productive sphere of the family unit; place in the interactions and negotiations of roles.

Giving and receiving among adult family generations: The balance of intergenerational exchange across Europe

Kohli, Martin

*Social and Political Sciences, European University Institute
San Domenico di Fiesole, Italy*

Künemund, Harald

Zentrum Altern & Gesellschaft, Universität Vechta Vechta, Germany

Vogel, Claudia

*Zentrum Altern & Gesellschaft, Universität Vechta
Vechta, Germany*

Keywords

reciprocity, intergenerational transfers, European family regimes, multigenerational family

Transfers of money and time among parents and their adult children are an important source of social protection and complement to the public "generational contract". In our previous research, we have shown that the usual direction of these transfers is downward, from parents to children, and that they vary systematically across welfare and family regimes in Europe. In the present paper, we create a unified account of transfer balances between parents and children in order to show (1) to what extent transfers are unidirectional or reciprocal, and (2) to what extent monetary transfers (inter vivos) and time transfers (practical help and support) balance or complement each other. We also analyze the factors that determine transfer balances both at the level of parent-child dyads and at the level of country-specific contexts. To this end we compute a net balance outcome measure by converting the value of time transfers into wage equivalents. The analysis is based on the Survey of Health, Ageing and Retirement in Europe (SHARE).

Have you thought about breaking up your relationship? Intention to divorce from a multi-country perspective

Ponnet, Koen

*Research Centre for Longitudinal and Life Course Studies (CELLO), University of Antwerp
B-2000 Antwerp, Belgium*

Pasteels, Inge

*Research Centre for Longitudinal and Life Course Studies (CELLO), University of Antwerp
B-2000 Antwerp, Belgium*

Mortelmans, Dimitri

*Research Centre for Longitudinal and Life Course Studies (CELLO), University of Antwerp
B-2000 Antwerp, Belgium*

Bral, Liesbeth

*Research Centre for Longitudinal and Life Course Studies (CELLO), University of Antwerp
B-2000 Antwerp, Belgium*

Boudiny, Kim

*Research Centre for Longitudinal and Life Course Studies (CELLO), University of Antwerp
B-2000 Antwerp, Belgium*

Keywords

partnership, intention to divorce, Gender

Over the past decades, an increasing amount of research that spans the boundary between psychology and sociology is devoted to the study of marital satisfaction. It is widely accepted that a prerequisite for a thorough understanding of marital satisfaction is to take into account (a) the interpersonal processes that operate within marriages as well as (b) the contexts within which the marriages operate (Bradbury, Fincham, & Beach, 2000).

The aim of this paper is to investigate which variables affect partners' thoughts about breaking up their relationship. Therefore, different domains of variables were of interest in the current study. The first domain involves individual variables, such as socio-demographic characteristics of the subject or the extent to which partners adapt to challenges posed by the marriage. The second domain involves partner-related variables (e.g. the disagreements couples have). The final domain involves contextual factors, i.e. those that are unique to particular couples as well as those that are common to many couples.

The analyses in this study are based on the first wave of the Generations and Gender Program Surveys (GGPS). GGPS is a cross-nationally comparative survey containing data from 5 European countries with standardized questioning. The sample of individuals is representative of the population in each of the participating countries.

The results suggest that several individual and partner related variables play a significant role. For instance, we found that more women than men tend to think about breaking up their relationship and that less legally married persons have thoughts to do compared with unmarried ones. Furthermore, the way partners cope with the disagreements they have in their relationship seems to matter. The interplay between the different domains will be further discussed in this paper.

Health and Well-being of Children of Interethnic Unions in the UK: Evidence from the Millennium Cohort Study

Muttarak, Raya

Political and Social Sciences, European University Institute Florence, Italy

Keywords

Health, Interethnic Union, Second Generation Children

Drawing on social capital theory, this research hypothesises that interethnic partnership enhances bridging social capital of children of immigrants, which in turn facilitates their access to socioeconomic resources in a destination country. Previous studies on labour market outcomes of intermarried immigrants found that those who are intermarried have higher earnings and achieve better socioeconomic positions than their non-intermarried counterparts (Meng and Gregory 2005; Meng and Meurs 2006; Muttarak 2007). Here we raise a further question whether this intermarriage premium also applies to their offspring.

In this study, "interethnic partnership" refers to partnerships (marriage or cohabitation) between a native spouse and an immigrant. "Native" refers to a member of the majority population in a country with non-immigrant background. "Immigrant" refers to a first or second generation immigrant whose parents were born abroad.

The empirical analysis is based on the Millennium Cohort Study 2000 - 2006, which is a longitudinal survey of approximately 18,800 children born in 2000 in Britain. Assuming that a native parent can provide access and information for their children in a host country, health (e.g. health care usage and health status) is used as an indicator of well-being. We aim to compare whether children of interethnic unions have better health outcomes than second generation children whose parents have immigrant background.

We focus on the outcomes of children rather than adults to tackle causality problems in two ways. First, being born in and living in a destination country, the children presumably should have equal access to destination country institutions as the native population. Then, we can observe whether any ethnic inequalities are due to differences in social capital and cultural practices. Secondly, we can avoid the endogeneity problem of children's well-being affecting social capital. Generally, an individual's attributes such as socioeconomic attainment or health can also influence their social capital accumulation. Yet, in case of children, their characteristics are unlikely to influence parental social capital except in some extreme cases. Longitudinal data are therefore appropriate for this analysis because of their longitudinal nature and comprehensive information on parental inputs and interactions with children that is available.

Here, now, and then: Grandparenting, time and social exclusion

Hughes, Kahryn

*School of Sociology and Social Policy, University of Leeds
Leeds, United Kingdom*

Emmel, Nick

*School of Sociology and Social Policy, University of Leeds
Leeds, United Kingdom*

Hemmerman, Louise

*School of Sociology and Social Policy, University of Leeds
Leeds, United Kingdom*

Keywords

time, Grandparenting, Social exclusion

The data drawn upon for this paper were gathered in a study titled "Intergenerational Exchange: Grandparents, Social Exclusion and Health", part of the ESRC funded Timescapes: Changing lives and times. Our study population are mid-life grandparents (35-50 years), drawn from low income estates in a city in the North of England, with differing responsibility for grandchildren ranging from mild and local intervention to legal custody and long-term residency. A key focus has been to interrogate what grandparents do for their grandchildren in order to shape their grandchildren's futures, and who and what services are required in order to do so. We observe that in providing for their grandchildren now, and working towards producing particular futures for them, grandparents are engaged in managing what we term "localised economies": economies within and across extended families; business economies; formal and informal health, social care and other statutory and third sector provision; and informal economies at play in the locality. This paper will consider theories of time in exploring grandparents' ongoing management of these localised-economies. In particular, we will consider participants' accounts of timings within and across families, how time as resource flows through these and broader social and formal networks, and participants' understandings, expressions and meanings of 'times', with especial reference to how they consider they are (or not) producing 'futures' for their grandchildren. In doing so, we will consider how these analyses help us to extend and refine theories of social exclusion, developed through this and previous research in these localities.

How to Combine Mobile Jobs with Family Lives. The Consequences of Job-Related Spatial Mobility on Parenting and Family Planning

Ruppenthal, Silvia

BiB, Bundesinstitut für Bevölkerungsforschung Wiesbaden, Germany

Lück, Detlev

FB 02, Institut für Soziologie, Johannes Gutenberg-Universität Mainz Mainz, Germany

Keywords

job mobility, Cross-national Comparison, Family, Social Mobility, Work-Life-Balance

As recent research shows, an increasing number of Europeans is highly spatially mobile for their job, either to bridge a large distance between home and the workplace, or because the occupation itself requires mobility. Affected are especially young adults, in a life stage in which family formation usually takes place. The long travel between home and the workplace takes away extra family time. So, mobile parents are less able to take care of their children's needs or to take over housework. Job mobility also further reduces the already restricted flexibility of full-time employees to take care of the children during the day when unforeseen emergencies occur. All in all, it is presumable that job mobility aggravates the difficulties to combine a job with active parenting.

How severe is this aggravation? Does it rather lead to childlessness or does it lead to a traditional division of work within couples? Do various forms of being job mobile offer better or worse opportunities to be an active parent? Do certain circumstances, such as flexible work hours, moderate the difficulties? Do mobile parents have possibilities to compensate disadvantages of being mobile, like support from social networks, professional help, or work days at home? Does job mobility at least provide advantages that make up for the restrictions in parenting, such as better job opportunities?

The presentation gives answers to these questions by analysing data from the project "Job Mobilities and Family Lives in Europe". These representative data were collected in a survey in 2007 in six European countries (Germany, Switzerland, Spain, France, Poland, and Belgium). They allow distinguishing between various forms of being mobile, between various family situations, and they offer several options to evaluate the consequences of job mobilities for family lives.

Intergenerational transmission of social attitudes in a detraditionalized society

Siongers, Jessy

Sociology, Vrije Universiteit Brussel Brussels, Belgium

Keywords

attitudes, adolescents, parents, detraditionalization, intergenerational transmission

The family was once considered to be the main socialization agent. But due to demographic and social evolutions, doubts arose whether parents still have an influence on their children and on their values in particular. The loss of parental influence is supported by the individualization thesis as formulated by Beck. Parents have lost impact on their children, and this will certainly be the case in broken families. In this paper, we want to confront the individualization thesis with a thesis that postulates the rise of a more "symbolic" society. This thesis states that we experience a shift in the forms of social control, in which traditions, explicit rules, external authority and the disciplining function of scarcity lose importance. However, this increasing freedom to choose is paralleled by increasingly advanced attempts of social institutions to influence the decision-making process from the inside. In this new modus of control different socializing agents are involved, and all operate via symbolic mediation. Powerful socialization agents are therefore education and mass media. This does not mean however that parents have lost their impact. Attitude similarity can according to this theory partly be ascribed to the fact that parents guide their children towards these socialization channels that are relevant in the development of attitudes.

We will therefore test the impact of parents on their children's attitudes in a broader way than is usual. Not only will we look at the similarities in attitudes between parents and their children or study how socio-economic conditions influence the attitudes of both parents and children, but we will also study cultural mechanisms: how do parents influence their children's attitudes by guiding them towards specific educational and media "choices"? The transmission of four attitudes (attitudes towards ethnic minorities, attitudes towards criminality, attitudes towards democratic institutions and principles, and individualism) will be analyzed by means of structural equation modeling. A comparison will be made between intact and broken families. This will be done on the basis of a survey held in Flanders (Belgium) in 2000, containing information on 6.974 youngsters of approximately 16 to 18 years old and one of their parents.

Intimate relationship transitions, gender, and political participation and interest

Voorpostel, Marieke

*Swiss Foundation for Research in Social Sciences, Swiss Foundation for Research in Social Sciences
Lausanne, Switzerland*

Coffé, Hilde

Sociology/ICS, Utrecht University Utrecht, Netherlands

Keywords

political participation, political interest, life course transitions, partner relationships

Following from theories on social connectedness and social capital, transitions into and out of marriage can be expected to have an impact on people's societal engagement. Although it is known that married individuals tend to be more politically involved than unmarried individuals, there has not been much attention for the impact of the transition into marriage, nor has there been any attention for changes in political involvement following the transition into separation or divorce.

This study takes a life course perspective, focusing on marriage and separation as events that alter one's structural position in society and enhance social connectedness and social capital. We hypothesize that the transition into marriage or cohabitation increases people's political interest and participation, whereas the transition into separation goes together with a decrease in political interest and participation.

Furthermore, gender differences are anticipated. Women are socialized toward a role that is more private, whereas men are socialized more strongly toward public roles. Becoming a wife and mother intensifies the pressure on women to specialize in the private sphere. This leads to the expectation that after marriage women's political participation might increase less, or even decrease, compared to men.

Using longitudinal data from Switzerland (Swiss Household Panel, waves 1999 and 2007), we tested whether the transition into and out of marriage and cohabitation changes political interest and voting frequency. Preliminary findings confirm our expectation that a transition out of marriage negatively affects political interest and voting frequency. A transition into marriage does not affect political participation or interest. Yet, gender interaction models confirm our ideas about the transition into marriage for women, showing a decrease in political interest and voting frequency after marriage or cohabitation. An increase in political interest and voting frequency was not found among men after marriage or cohabitation.

Is a family type based affirmative action needed and possible? Analysis of school situation of lesbian and gay men's children in Spain and a tentative comparison with Poland and Europe

Smietana, Marcin

*Sociological Theory, Philosophy of Law and Methodology of Social Sciences, Universitat de Barcelona
Barcelona, Spain*

Keywords

Spain, affirmative action, families, LGBT, Poland

This paper analyses the process of social inclusion of families of lesbian and gay parents with children, the specific scope of research being their interactions with the school.

The first part reports on 15 communicative life stories carried out with members of families in question in the Spanish Autonomous Province of Catalonia in 2008, with a view to identifying if, why and how the processes excluding this non-traditional family type persist even in one of the European countries with the most progressive family legislation. Following on from the state of the art's contributions on the key role of communication in LG families' exclusion, the analysis is realised within the interactionist and communicative framework as formulated by J. Habermas (1984) theory of communicative action and J. Butlers (1990) theory of performative acts, operationalised as communication acts drawing on J. Searle and M. Soler (2004). The findings reveal that LG families are distinguished by assuming different communication strategies related to managing information about the parents' identity, with the selective and non-communication strategies generating conflict between the children's personal and social identities and limiting their social capital. The strategies are negotiated by all the family members and may evolve over time. They are linked to the family members' ideas about their social inclusion, to context factors such as the family structure and its social capital, as well as to the dominant cultural discourses, the national legislation and its correspondence to the national school curriculum.

The second part of the paper, drawing on the aforementioned study and on comparative secondary data, tentatively investigates the hypothesis that, given the present relationship between the European and the national law, it is the Spanish national law that opens the possibility of the full inclusion of LG families. This possibility is not present in countries whose national legislation and school curriculum exclude those families, as e.g. in Poland. Still, apart from the national legislation factor there are starting to operate increasingly convergent European cultural values, forming an inclusive and mobilising point of reference for LG families, especially ones in countries such as Poland.

Is New Fatherhood the same as Active Fatherhood? Experiences from Slovenia

Svab, Alenka

Center for Social Psychology, Faculty of Social Sciences, University of Ljubljana Slovenia,

Humer, Ziva

/, The Peace Institute Slovenia,

Keywords

gender roles, family life, childcare, fatherhood, fathering

The paper will deal with the phenomenon of the new fatherhood which is usually defined by more active involvement of men in family labour, especially in child care and related activities. Based on empirical evidence (focus groups, interviews), the authors claim for Slovenia that new fatherhood only partly means also active fatherhood and fathering. First of all, fatherhood is a plural phenomenon, including various paternal identities and fathering practices. In Slovenia, two models of fatherhood with regard to the active involvement of fathers in family life seem to prevail: the complementary (based on traditional complementary division of family labour with mainly passive involvement of fathers, but not based on the traditional notion of father as a bread-winner) and the supportive model (with active involvement of fathers in family labour, however based on the notion of fatherhood as assistant/supportive parental role and motherhood as primary parental role). Fatherhood in Slovenia is new in a sense that it is significantly different from traditional notion of fatherhood as a distant paternal role (e.g. men do not identify with the typical traditional bread-winner role; they also hold modern views on gender roles etc.). Yet, it seems that changes occur mainly on the level of paternal identity and to a much lesser extent on the level of fathering practices. The slowest process towards active fathering can be observed with middle class fathers. The authors will discuss the social contexts, subjective and structural factors/obstacles that influence the way in which new fatherhood in Slovenia is evolving, among others, the structural gender inequalities and persistence of traditional division of family labour, strong female family networks (providing important support in everyday life, e.g. daily child care), persistent ideology of motherhood as primary parental role on the one hand and ideology of new fatherhood on the other, process of individualisation, intensified employment and working conditions, influence of family policy etc.

Lithuanian transnational families: how to remain a family?

Maslauskaite, Ausra

Demographic Research Center, Institute for Social Research Vilnius, Lithuania

Keywords

intergenerational relations, Transnational migration, Family

Lithuania's political integration into the European Union catalyzed the process of transnational migration and brought to life a completely new form of family life to our society. Families with their members living in host countries both in Europe and outside became a new social reality.

The aim of this presentation is to discuss the effects of transnational migration on the intergenerational family relations between parents and non-adult children in Lithuanian society. I focus my analysis on different aspects of transnational communication considering the gender and class as two social forces that shape the process of transnational communication. I define transnational communication as a process in which family members exchange emotions, ideas, material goods and money and throughout this process maintain family relations and intimacy.

The research results reveal that transnational communication proceeds through various practices including an active use of modern technologies and visits home. Considering the intergenerational relations it is important to stress that not the duration but the regularity and frequency of home visits by migrant family member helps to minimize the emotional strain and other negative behavioral outcomes for the children. The next important finding proves that there is an intergenerational gap in attributing the symbolical value to the different aspects of transnational communication. For parents' generation money and material goods are understood as a main tool for the sustaining of intimacy in the family while for children and especially pre-school-age children this has the least value. The different symbolical value that respectively is shared among parents' and children's generations and is not articulated by parents consolidates the challenges for the development of intimate intergenerational relationships in transnational families.

The presentation is based on the study commissioned by the International Organization of Migration (Vilnius Office) and implemented under my supervision in 2008. The data gathered applying the qualitative and quantitative research methodology, i. e. national survey and in-depth interviews with transnational family members in Lithuania and three host EU countries.

Living in couple in Portuguese families

Maciel, Diana

CIES, ISCTE

Lisboa, Portugal

Torres, Anália

CIES, ISCTE

Lisboa, Portugal

Keywords

Gender, identity, Family, conjugality

This paper is about living in couple in Portuguese families, and seeks to analyse the importance of conjugal relationships to individuals, how they perceive conjugality in its best and worst moments and its influence in their identity construction. Since modernity, profound transformations occurred in contemporary society, like individualization, reflexivity and importance of love and meaningful relationships for the individual. Those cultural transformations contributed to social transformations, like reduced number of marriages, increased number of cohabitation, higher rate of divorces and lower number of children per marriage. These cultural and social transformations changed conjugalities. To have a relationship is no longer being married during a lifetime, perceived as a status and a sacrifice of individuals' personal identity for the sake of family well-being. Nowadays, having a conjugal relationship is being linked by love and passion to a person, with whom the individual wants to share his life, while preserving his self identity. It's in this relation between living the love and preserving the individual personal identity that lays conjugality, its problems and ambiguities. The results presented are based on in-depth interviews (83 heterosexual couples, interviewed separately, with at least one child, in total of 166 individuals) done in Lisbon (72), Oporto (54) and Leiria (40), to individuals living in couple, at different moments of their life cycle and with different social backgrounds. We will try to answer some central questions: How individuals see their conjugal relationship? What changes the conjugality brought to the individual? How conflicts are managed within relationship? And what are the changes they wish to occur in their relationship in the future? Answering these questions we have identified a double trend or two different ways of perceiving and feeling the conjugal relationship. First, the feeling of living in love and feeling the love, in which each individual share ideas and concerns, and life in itself, leading to a fulfilment of the self. The second, the perception of the relationship as a struggle or a conflict, an overburden of work and responsibilities, this leads to an identity reconstruction in the sense of a more nervous and depressed individual.

Lodging forms along life cycles: a comparative view across the Europe

Mauritti, Rosário

CIES-ISCTE, CIES-ISCTE

Lisbon, Portugal

Keywords

family forms, economic and educational recourses, household, life cycles, social recomposition

This presentation intend to develop a comparative perspective on a European scale, looking at the changes observed in housing forms along life experiences, and ascertaining how they interact with social and economic conditions, cultural differences, and institutional contexts. Social recomposition is a fundamental element of these processes of change. It includes very important aspects of recomposition from the geographical and age-group points of view: longer life spans, alterations in the relative weight of the various age brackets, urbanisation, and national and international mobility and migration. It also includes profound and comprehensives educational, occupational, socio-economic and socio-cultural recompositions that are taking place, with great intensity, in the different European countries and in the EU as a whole. By crossing indicators regarding household units, family forms and economic and educational recourses, we attempt to construct a sociological "portrait" of lodging organization throughout life cycles. One of the main evidence points out is that reversibility and uncertainties of housing conditions are experiences that are drawn out even during later phases of life.

We based our analyses on the assumption that housing is one of the key dimensions of an individual's material position and quality of life. Just think that the in the dominant ideas on the "family" and "family living", the household unit emerges as a key descriptive, from which we represent all the social imagery that is - to override itself as fact - the social reality of those elements. In the social perceptions connection to a residence or a "home" or "having a home" determines the very possibility of intimacy and private life - at least in its more permanent form in time.

This communication elapses from a study undertaken within CIES-ISCTE, supported by The Portuguese Foundation of Science and Technology, during preparation of a PhD degree.

Lone father families. The relation between work and family

Correia, Sónia Vladimira

*Sociology, Instituto de Ciências Sociais da universidade de Lisboa
Portugal,*

Keywords

Lone father families, childcare, relation between work and family

This presentation is about lone father families and how they reconcile childcare with working demands. This is a preliminary work, developed in a PhD thesis context, which tries to draw a first picture of several reconciliation profiles. The analysis of in-depth interviews points out five different types of relation between work and family: "Self-managed", where the father adjusts different timetables; "Bi-parental", where both parents have child custody and try to manage the daily needs; "Multiple delegation", being the main characteristic the adjustment between different carers (informal or formal, paid or unpaid); "Charing with grandmother" the father seeks for his mother support on a daily basis; and finally "Difficult caring" where the strong difficulty to manage work and care leads to an absent caring situations.

Lone motherhood- gender, class and welfare in transition

Syltevik, Liv Johanne

Department of Sociology, University of Bergen Bergen, Norway

Keywords

Gender, class, lone mother, transitional allowance

The experience of lone motherhood has been found very different for women from working class backgrounds compared with other women. This classed dimension of lone motherhood has been largely absent in the debate about welfare benefits for lone mothers in Norway. The main aim of this paper is to discuss how class is relevant for understanding lone motherhood and welfare state support in the 21st century, and the discussion draws mainly on a postal survey study with lone mothers with transitional allowance made in 2002 and the policy debates about these issues the last thirty years. The policy change in the Norwegian welfare state from the mid 1960s till today entailed an altered conception of the interrelations between gender, the labour market and the welfare state - basically shrinking the period it was possible to stay at home with your children as a lone mother. While lone mothers at the start of the period unquestionable was seen as a social category in need of support, it is not longer thought appropriate at the end of the period to support lone mothers in what is now seen as their old fashioned role as carers. In addition the emergence of the ideology of the involved caring father makes it seem unlikely/ unnecessary that lone motherhood should involve particular demands regarding care. However at the same time the dominance of two earner adult families has made the situation as a one earner household more economically demanding (as the one earner households have to compete with the two earner households on the housing market for instance) and in addition the increased dependency of the market highlights that lone mothers face different condition in the labour market. The paper concludes that the dynamics of family status, class, gender, labour market and the welfare state is important to understand lone motherhood today.

Mobility aptitudes along the life course: a cross-sectional analysis of the process of becoming spatially mobile

Viry, Gil

Department of Sociology and Laboratory of Urban Sociology, University of Geneva and EPFL Lausanne Geneva, Switzerland

Kaufmann, Vincent

Laboratory of Urban Sociology, EPFL Lausanne Lausanne, Lausanne

Widmer, Eric D.

*Department of Sociology, University of Geneva
Geneva, Switzerland*

Keywords

life course, spatial mobility, motility

In highly advanced societies, propensity for movement within the geographical, social and economic spaces has become a central aspect of professional careers and social integration. If mobility allows people to combine and conciliate situations which were spatially incompatible, it also contributes to the creation of new forms of strain on family dynamics. In a context where the increase of travel time budget and geographical distances is a challenge to family life organisation, motility, i.e. the set of aptitudes that allow one to be mobile, may be used as a resource to deal with those spatial and temporal incompatibilities that actors and families must contend with. Motility is then defined as factors such as: physical capacity, financial means, aspirations towards sedentary or mobile way of life, accessibility to transport and telecommunications systems, acquired skills like driving licence or international English for travel.

The project "Job Mobilities and Family Lives in Europe" is the first large quantitative European survey studying the interactions between family life, professional career and spatial mobility. Of special interest are all forms of job-related high mobility (long distance commuting, bi-residential, migration, etc.). On the basis of this new data, the presentation will show to which extent family life course influences motility, as well as the implications of both dimensions on the process of becoming mobile. National differences across five European countries will be in particular presented.

My Choice or theirs? Work Intentions and Network Members during the Transition to Parenthood

Francesco, Giudici

Laboratory of Life Course Study, University of Lausanne Lausanne, Switzerland

Eric D., Widmer

*Department of Sociology, University of Geneva
Geneva, Switzerland*

Keywords

transition to parenthood, Configurational Perspective, Cumulated Advantages, Work Intentions

The transition to parenthood is a turning point for the differentiation of men's and women's occupational careers. This is especially true in Switzerland where a majority of new fathers continue to work full time while a majority of new mothers interrupt or drastically reduce their participation to the labor market. Using a three wave panel study done in Switzerland, this paper analyzes how social networks shape the occupational intentions of 228 men and 233 women in 233 couples expecting their first child. Based on Elisabeth Bott's perspective on conjugal networks, it shows that high density networks are associated with gendered occupational intentions (reduced work participation for women and full-time participation for men). Moreover, densities depend on the composition of networks: Networks in which relatives are overrepresented are denser than networks in which friends and coworkers are also present. Overlap of networks between spouses or partners, and network heterogeneity (according to age, sex, occupation, spatiality) are also considered. Overall, the results support the hypothesis that the way in which women's and men's career plans are negotiated during the transition to parenthood is not a privatized matter but significantly depends on the amount and structure of social capital available to them. Results are discussed in the light of cumulated dis/advantage theory.

Obituaries and the rule of genealogical proximity

Jallinoja, Riitta

*Department of Sociology, University of Helsinki
Helsinki, Finland*

Keywords

Family, obituary, family assemblage, family configuration

The aim is to explore family formation through the rule of genealogical proximity and by grounding the analysis on obituaries as the data. Obituaries correspond with other familial assemblages, which, while getting family members and kinfolk together, work visibly at boundary maintenance and reaffirming unity. Assembling in obituaries is of a special kind; it does not occur face-to-face but under names and kin categories, as they are marked on the lists of mourners. The data consist of 1490 obituaries, published in Helsingin Sanomat, a Finnish newspaper with the widest readership in Finland, on Saturdays and Sundays, August - December 2008. Kin categories were unravelled for 59 percent of the obituaries. The ranking orders of the mourner lists are thought to give evidence of the rules that more generally organize family formation in its making. The findings derived from the data show that at a general level and most commonly, the surviving are ranked in accord with genealogical proximity, but the stands reserved for spouses witness that this rule is modified by another rule which invites people to perform family-wise in obituaries. However, the family of origin and the family of procreation are discerned from other families and individual relatives; obituaries organize the relationship between these two major families and revive the family of origin. In addition, obituaries reveal that the mourners also perform as an entity, sometimes extensive, sometimes the lists of mourners are short, but they nevertheless indicate the remnants of what used to be called clan. Death unites intermittently and obituaries are too mute to tell about how warm or cool or cold the relationships of mourners actually are, but obituaries are nevertheless rich in information about the logics of family formation and maintenance.

Of selection and affinity: rethinking family and family relations in an intergenerational perspective

Aboim, Sofia

*Institute of Social Sciences, University of Lisbon
Portugal,*

Vasconcelos, Pedro

*Department of Sociology, Lisbon University Institute (ISCTE)
Lisbon, Portugal*

Keywords

family lineages, family relations, affinity, individualization

Family affinity and selectivity may be contemporary categories emerging from individualization processes. However, the processes that underlie the making of affinities and the selectivity criteria within the family are not just modern. Traditional families had their own mechanisms of selection. Moreover, institutional families had selection as one of their basic procedures. Paradoxically, although the idea of selective affinity is a modern one, modern family ideology prescribes equal treatment and non-selectivity in parent-child relationships. The purpose of this paper is to analyse the complexity of affinity as a concept suitable to account for the specific dynamics of family relations in an intergenerational perspective.

On the basis of 60 in-depth life narratives of 10 male and 10 female three-generation lineages from urban Lisbon and rural, semi-industrialized, Mondim de Basto (northern Portugal), we analyse two main processes of making family relationships. First, we focus on the building up of close relationships by looking at the ways through which individuals establish social affinities and are selective in the choice of their intimates, even when dealing with their parents or offspring. Men and women from different generations and social milieus may have different patterns of individualisation and family institutionalism, but they are always selective in family relationships, albeit using different criteria for selectivity. Secondly, we not only analyse these modalities of selectivity, but also examine them in terms of intergenerational reciprocity. The narrative method with which intimate relationships were reconstituted allows us to see if the three generations include each other in their specific social network, thus identifying the motivations and roles that underlie their inclusion or exclusion. Overall, we observe that in older and more traditional generations, family selectivity is more dependent upon the fulfilment of certain normative expectations regarding material/daily support/availability and role conformity. In younger and more individualized generations, selectivity is further expressed through the emphasis on specific individual and relational characteristics.

Old people families in the city of Lisbon: solidarity networks and social class

Amaro, Fausto

*Centre for Public Administration and Policies, Institute of Social and Political Sciences/Technical University of Lisbon
Lisbon, Portugal*

Neves, Bárbara

*Centre for Public Administration and Policies, Institute of Social and Political Sciences/Technical University of Lisbon
Lisbon, Portugal*

Keywords

network, old people, Social Class, Solidarity, Lisbon

This paper presents findings of a study on solidarity networks of the elderly and their interaction with their families. Five hundred senior individuals (one per family), living in Lisbon, Portugal, were interviewed. The participants were selected through a stratified sample of Lisbon residents, where women represent 60% of the total sample. The survey was also complemented by semi-structured interviews.

Results show the importance of the family network in all social classes. Some specific dynamics and differences noticed between lower and upper class are discussed.

Parenthood and social class in Finland

Kelha, Minna

*Department of Education, University of Helsinki
Helsinki, Finland*

Keywords

parenthood, Social Class, resources, parental practices, networks

In this paper I present my ongoing post doctoral study 'Parenthood and social class in Finland'. The purpose of this study is to gain knowledge about the resources and networks of Finnish parenthood and about the relationship between those resources and networks and practices of parenthood (upbringing and education of children, economic responsibility and housework among others). In the centre of the study is how class differences and cultural practices are constructed in the family and how different kinds of social, economic and cultural positions frame the life of families in contemporary Finnish society. The main questions are what kinds of social networks, as well as social, cultural and material resources do Finnish parents have at their disposal? How do these networks and resources produce and maintain their experience of being fortunate or underprivileged? Additionally, I am interested in the construction of everyday practices within families in relation to local institutions (day care, schools, health service, social service). The study is mainly based on an interview data of Finnish parents from different social backgrounds in two research localities. This study is part of a larger research project 'Cultural and Material Formation of Social Class within Families' and it is a continuation to my doctoral dissertation in which I have discussed the motherhood of different-aged women from the viewpoint of social class and citizenship.

Personal values and attitudes towards family, marriage and gender roles - two decades of changes in the Czech Republic and Slovakia

Chromkova Manea, Beatrice

IVRIS, Faculty of Social Studies MU Brno Brno, Czech Republic

Rabusic, Ladislav

Department of Sociology, Faculty of Social Studies MU Brno Brno, Czech Republic

Keywords

values, EVS, Family, attitudes, marriage

This paper examines the variations in personal values and attitudes towards the family, children, marriage and gender roles in the Czech Republic and Slovakia. The Czech and Slovak societies have been characterized by intensive transformation process since 1989. The political and economic transformation was followed by intensive demographic change (some even talk about the second demographic transition) that was similar in both societies. These changes have been accompanied (some even argue that they have been brought about) by changes in values and attitudes concerning the family, marriage, children and gender roles. Interesting question arises whether in both societies, which since 1993 had been separate and independent states, the demographic change was supported by similar or different values concerning the family, children, marriage and gender roles. To answer it, data from three waves of the European Value Study (EVS) for these two countries will be analyzed. Further analyses will also focus on the possible factors of changes in values and attitudes in these two countries.

Rationalised violence in intimate partnership

Soo, Kadri

Institute of Sociology and Social Policy, University of Tartu Tartu, Estonia

Keywords

Narrative Analysis, violence against women, intimate partnership violence, rationalisation of violence

The current paper analyses the narratives of women's experiences of intimate partnership violence (IPV) in Estonia. Women's constructions of the meaning, nature, and effects of violence are in focus. During the Daphne project GVEI 12 in-depth qualitative interviews were carried out with women who have suffered from IPV.

Women in our sample had the targets of intimate terrorism and violent resistance (see Johnson, 2008). The coercive control committed by husband or cohabitant played the main role in women's everyday life. The control together with physical and psychological aggression shaped not only women's behaviour but also their ways of interpretation of violence. It appeared from interviews that women tended to deny or minimize the seriousness of violent incidents and effects. In addition, some women use mild terms reflecting partner's violence toward them (i.e. cruelty, punishment). Such a way of rewording may decrease the possibility of intervention because the description is for a listener "not alarming" and gives wrong impression. The women's excuses and justifications of partner's aggression are also discussed.

That kind of denial, diminishing and rationalisation of violence can be considered as acquired coping strategy of women in the painful and hopeless situation. In fact, women's attempts to "forget" or rationalize violence are similar to violent partners one; however, the objectives are different. The reasons of justification and rationalisation of violence by both parties of IPV are also argued in current paper.

Reconciling work and family in Portugal and Spain: two pathways in Southern Europe

Wall, Karin

-, ICS - University of Lisbon
Lisboa, Portugal

Escobedo, Anna

Sociology, Autonomous University of Barcelona
Barcelona, Spain

Keywords

Southern European welfare regimes, Work and family, Leave policies, comparative analysis

Much about the welfare state and family policy in Southern Europe has been analysed, but there has been no systematic effort to look in historical context at the evolution of policies and to understand the paths taken in some countries but not in others. As in other European countries, Spain and Portugal have moved away from policies focusing on the "traditional" male breadwinner model. However, family policies, and "leave" policies in particular, have not necessarily shifted at the same pace or in the same direction. Our main aim will be to compare the particular routes taken by parental leave policies in Spain and Portugal since the transition to democracy. Analysis will be carried out along three main lines: identifying the main aims and turning points in leave policies since the 1960s; focusing on the actors and political processes that sustained or influenced these policies; analysing the linkages between leave policy and major shifts in other related policies (development of childhood services; family and employment policies; gender equality policies). Against this brief historical backdrop, we will compare current policy models and discuss commonalities and differences in these two countries.

Results show that the move away from male breadwinning and female caring is undoubtedly strong in both countries, but policies and practices have developed in different directions over the last few decades. Whereas in Portugal there seems to be one fairly stable and consensual leave policy model - based on an early return to full-time work, with strong linkages to gender equality and service provision policies - in Spain the policy model is more diverse, and certainly more choice-orientated than in Portugal. It is based on the promotion of some early return to work after a short well-paid leave, while also emphasizing the advantages of longer leave, part-time options and unpaid reductions in work. Low government commitment to service provision with long opening hours and strong devolution of funding and services to employers and regional governments have also built up varied linkages between service provision and the leave system, with higher expectations on families to organize their own care arrangements.

Reflections about doing well. Continuity and Change in the Culture of Parenting from Social Actor's Perspective

Ottosen, Mai Heide

Department for children, youth and families, The Danish National Institute of Social Research Copenhagen, Denmark

Keywords

Social Class, Culture of parenting, Youth, Expectations, Transmissions of values

Social theorists have suggested that democratisation of family relationships have emerged over the past decades. One aspect of this democratisation process may be changes in the culture of parenting. Today, the parent-child-relationship is said to rely less on discipline and control for its own success, and more on a dynamic, bi-directional model of control that allows for children's resourcefulness and skillfulness in the face of new and demanding challenges. Such changes tend to remove parents from an authoritarian position and place them instead in an authoritative position in the roles as advisors, coaches, and consultants.

The paper explores how changes in aspects of the culture of parenting are experienced and articulated over time from a social actor perspective: How has the process of modernization been experienced from the perspective of everyday life and through the lenses of now middle-aged parents from different socio-economic segments of the Danish population, and once youth, themselves? The paper focuses in particular on accounts on parental expectations/aspirations and the possible outcome: Social meanings of 'doing well' in life. How do parents think about their own socialization experiences regarding this issue and how do they select which values to pass on, abandon, or modify when they come to socialize their own children?

The empirical analysis draws upon a qualitative study, gathered among middle-aged informants from the working class, middle class and upper-middle classes. Most informants had children who were teenagers or young adults. Methodology was inspired by French sociologist Daniel Bertaux's development of cases histories of families.

Researching different stories about family work

Rautio, Susanna

*Family Research Centre, University of Jyväskylä
Jyväskylä, Finland*

Keywords

family professionals, narratives, interviews, Keywords, early support

In Finland most of the families with small children get along well. Nevertheless the cost of child welfare and the need for preventive family services is growing. Different projects to support families with children have become general in Finland. For example some municipalities have begun to model a new family service based on early intervention to support families with small children in order to support parenthood in the early stage. Such early interventions include, for example, family workers' consultation at families' homes. My qualitative and sociological PhD study focuses on family work of this kind. I am studying how do different social actors experience this early intervention model by interviewing family professionals such as family workers and client families.

The data for my qualitative case study consists of interviews and written diaries. I interviewed families and several family professionals (17 informants in 12 interviews altogether) who were all participating this working model. Besides this interviewed data there will be second data which consists of family professionals written diaries. These diaries will be analyzed at the later stage of my research. Interviews with the family members bring out important aspects of parenting, daily life in the family, and the importance of family support from the family professionals and other services. The data from the family professionals also reveals important qualitative information about working with families by using this particular working method. The data is handled by using the method of narrative analysis.

In this presentation I will concentrate on my analysis and the preliminary results with the interview data from the family professionals. I'm interested in researching how professionals working with the families with small children experience this working model of early support. The questions, among others, are how professionals perceive the families' needs for this kind of early support and what do these demands reveal about the wellbeing of the families in today's society.

On the basis of the data I created narratives about the experiences of the professionals and these narratives will be discussed more precisely in my presentation.

Sex inversion in heterogamy or when the wife is the more highly qualified spouse

yvonne, Guichard-Claudic

AES, Université de Bretagne occidentale Brest, France

Trancart, Danièle

sciences de l'éducation, Université de Rouen Mont Saint Aignan, France

Testenoire, Armelle

sociologie, Université de Rouen Mont Saint Aignan, France

Keywords

Gender, Qualification, heterogamy

Sex inversion in heterogamy or when the wife is the more highly qualified spouse

Previous founding studies (Girard, 1964) (Bozon, Heran, 1987, 1988) (Singly, 1984) have shown that heterosexual couples are structured according a double logic, that of social homogamy and sexual heterogamy thereby ensuring the reproduction of social order and gendered order. This paper aims at reexamining the issue of couples' configuration, focusing on cases of woman's hypogamy (where the woman is more qualified than her partner). How do these situations of atypical heterogamy affect the reproductions of social and gendered order within the family? This study is based on the findings of the « Families and employers » INED study carried out in 2004 on 2719 couples ages 25-49 and follow up interviews on a sample of couples in which the woman is significantly more highly qualified than the man.

The findings do not show major changes but changes in emphasis. First, heterogamy, and femal hypogamy, will be measured. Heterogamy is slightly on the increase, but women are more often hypergamous than hypogamous, even if the latter shows a slight increase. Moreover, the sex inversion of heterogamy (female if the diploma is taken as criterion or male if the social category is) proves how difficult it may be for women to find a job which really corresponds to their diploma and qualifications. The interviews focused on situations of woman's hypogamy and confirm that the sexual division of work (domestic work especially) is only slightly affected, even in a configuration that may have been deemed much more favorable for women. We nevertheless noticed some specific features (which distinguish hypogamous women more from other women than from men): overqualified women (compared to their partner) tend to be more stable in their jobs and more involved in their work. The interviews revealed a greater autonomy of these women as regards their work, but their career does not necessarily have priority within the couple. These findings are congruent with the research carried out in other countries (Tichenor, 2005) (Bittman and alii, 2003) (Mac Rae, 1986).

Sociability, sexuality, self: relationality and individualization

Roseneil, Sasha

*Birkbeck Institute for Social Research, Birkbeck, University of London
London, UK*

Keywords

Subjectivity, queer, psycho-social, psychoanalysis, personal life

This paper proposes a new way of understanding recent social change in intimacy and personal life, focusing on three dimensions of personal life - sociability, sexuality and self - the relationship between them, and transformations in their social organization. Its central argument is two-fold: ontological and socio-historical. Firstly, I suggest that an adequate understanding of intimacy and personal life must be psycho-social, not just sociological or psychological, as most work on the subject has been. Drawing on psychoanalysis and feminist philosophy, I propose a model of subjectivity as both fundamentally relational and individually unique and particular. Secondly, I argue that a set of counter-heteronormative relationship practices are emerging amongst those at the cutting edge of social change: the prioritization of friendship, the de-centring of sexual/ love relationships and the forming of non-conventional sexual partnerships. I call this process queer individualization. Significantly revising existing theories of social change, I counter the triptych of "patriarchal pessimists" - Zygmunt Bauman, Richard Sennett and Robert Putnam - whose versions of the contemporary condition of individualization currently dominate public discourse and the social sciences. Far from being the isolated, solitary individuals depicted by Bauman, Sennett and Putnam, those who are "most individualized" are largely embedded in networks of intimacy and sociability which provide friendship, love, care and support. The queer qualification of my use of the concept of individualization is bivalent. It suggests that the relationship practices of this group can be understood as queer, in that they destabilize the modern sexual and gender order (with its distinctions between homosexual and heterosexual, and male and female, subjectivities and ways of life), and it proposes a queer (in the sense of contrary to the norm, odd, peculiar) re-theorizing of individualization, which disrupts the binary categories of individual/ society on which individualization theory rests, and which holds the relational nature of human life as central. The paper therefore explores the potential of two relatively undeveloped analytical approaches within sociology - psychoanalytical psycho-social research and queer studies - for understandings of contemporary formations of intimacy and care.

Social relationships and trust in asylum seeking families with children

Björnberg, Ulla

Sociology, Gothenburg University Gothenburg, Sweden

Keywords

resilience, transnational kin relationships, social capital, asylum, children

The point of departure for my paper is the assumption that social relationships with kin and local contexts are important for the well being of asylum seeking children. For asylum seeking children and families social networking might be hard to accomplish due to constraints linked to social and legal contexts in the host country. Constraints can also be linked to the family situation and the circumstances that they have to cope with in every day life before and after the flight. In the paper I draw on results from an ongoing study on the experiences of asylum seeking children and their families in Sweden. The main focus is on families who have waited for decisions regarding permanent residence for several months and sometimes more than a year and the ways in which kin relationships are developing during transition from the country of origin to the host country. The empirical data are based on qualitative interviews with children from 9 years and with one parent for each child. The over arching research objective is to identify factors that are important for well being of children seeking asylum and to study how they cope with their experiences as asylum seekers. The tension between excluding experiences and expectations regarding how the situation of the child and it's family should improve or deteriorate after the flight is for a child a constitutive reference for how coping strategies are developed. In the analysis I draw on theoretical concepts of resilience, empowerment and social capital as conditions for well-being. Results suggest that both parents and children seem to find themselves in a social vacuum - they have weak social relationships with transnational members of kin as well as local neighbours and friends. This is interpreted as a coping strategy due to lack of trust. Lack of trust is both a consequence of but also a response to the liminality during the transition. Individualism and independence also appear as coping strategies of adult asylum seekers and children.

Successfully reconciling work and family: Recipes from Portuguese dual-earners

Matias, Marisa

*Differential Psychology Centre, Faculty of Psychology and Education - University of Porto
Porto, Portugal*

Fontaine, Anne Marie

*Differential Psychology Centre, Faculty of Psychology and Education - University of Porto
Porto, Portugal*

Keywords

Gender, reconciliation strategies, dual-earner couples with children

As families increasingly need two salaries to be economically viable and as men's and women's roles in both the workplace and at home have changed, questions have been raised regarding how best individuals and couples can balance family and work. Traditionally, research has been focused in the conflict and strain dual-earner couples experience. More recently the interest has shifted to the analysis of the adaptive strategies they use. Following this trend, this study aims to analyse strategies used by Portuguese couples in the balance of work and family roles. Since work and family are highly gendered domains, the study also takes into account gender differences.

Women and men responses (n=217) to an open-ended question about personal recipes to balance work and family responsibilities were qualitatively analysed. Results showed 8 main reconciliation categories comprising 20 different types of strategies: individual; couple; familial; family-work articulation; professional; resources and support; daily life planning; and geographic. Globally, both men and women tend to rely on familial strategies and on resources and support to deal with multiple responsibilities, nevertheless women tend to refer more reconciliation strategies than men. Regarding gender differences, men emphasize more individual characteristics than women do, and women emphasize more daily planning than men do. Within each main category some gender differences were also observed: i) in the family domain, women tend to use more strategies related with household tasks management; ii) in the individual domain, women are the only to refer the need to maintain free time for themselves; iii) in the professional domain, men endorse more strategies related with workplace flexibility and women compromise more their professional goals. Another important result is that emotional factors are perceived as crucial for balancing work and family roles. Such is evident in the importance given by both genders to the promotion of family well-being.

The absence of the absent father and the presence of the present mother, seen from a child's perspective

Nilsen, Ann Christin

*Welfare Research, Agder Research
Kristiansand, Norway*

Ellingsen, Dag

*Welfare Research, Agder Research
Kristiansand, Norway*

Keywords

paternal images, life-form interview, children of divorce, absent father

In this paper we discuss some findings from a research project on children in families where there is none or little contact between the father and the children. Research on children of divorce has shown that these children are more exposed to develop problems related to for instance health and school-adjustment. The risk factors are reduced, however, according to the level of conflict between the parents and the amount of parental involvement in the daily lives of the children. Children with an absent parent are consequently in a vulnerable situation. In most cases, by far, it is the father who is absent.

The project-approach is explorative and qualitative, generating data from individual, "life-form" interviews with mothers and children from 8 families. Our primary interest in the project is to gain knowledge about how this situation is experienced by the children.

The discussion in this paper will concentrate on (1) how the relationships between the children and the mother and father respectively are constructed, (2) how their roles are negotiated, and (3) how the children construct paternal images. As the title indicates we find that the absent father leaves a void which "content" is a matter of concern for the mothers. The relationship between the mother and the child is very close and intimate in the particular families, which might be regarded as a compensation for the paternal void. Hence the children construct alternative paternal images to their own fathers.

The Division of Labour Among European Couples: The Dynamics of Values and Practices

Buehlmann, Felix

*Centre for Research on Socio-Cultural Change, University of Manchester
UK,*

Elcheroth, Guy

*MISC, University of Lausanne
Lausanne, Switzerland*

Tettamanti, Manuel

Centre Pavie, University of Lausanne Lausanne, Switzerland

Keywords

Division of Labour, life course, Welfare State

Even though egalitarian gender values are increasingly spreading among younger Europeans, division of labour does not always comply with this trend. Gender Practices and Gender Values are historically only loosely coupled. Traditional theories of familial behaviour (rational-choice theories, resource-bargain theories or theories of role trade-offs) struggle to explain the paradoxical simultaneity of egalitarian values and inegalitarian practices that seems to be typical for our time. In this presentation, we propose an approach based on the ideas that (1) practices are the translation of values moderated by specific social structures and (2) incoherencies between values and practices are biographically unstable. Therefore, the biographical stage and welfare policies support or hinder couples in realising their values in the form of specific divisions of work. Based on multi-level regression analyses of data from the European Social Survey 2004, we compare the values and practices of couples in 20 European countries. We show that, while most of the European heterosexual couples live in coherent egalitarian configurations of values and practices in their pre-parental phase, they shift to a situation of tension between egalitarian values and gendered practices following the births of their first child. Our findings show that in order to overcome these tensions, some couples adapt their values to the practices and accommodate to a coherent gendered organisation. Others are able to readapt their practices and to return to more egalitarian organisation of work, in particular following the enrolment of their children in school. An examination of these shifts in values and practices according to the welfare type reveals that the magnitude and the reversibility of these shifts are strongly moderated by welfare policies. In liberal and conservative regimes, the shift to a combination of gendered practices and egalitarian values is stronger than in socio-democratic regimes. In addition, especially in liberal regimes the tension between values and practices is transformed into an enduring accommodation to inequality whereas in socio-democratic regimes, change to unequal practices is reversible.

The division of paid labour in same-sex couples in the Netherlands

Jaspers, Eva

Sociology, Radboud University Nijmegen, The Netherlands

Verbakel, Ellen

Sociology, Tilburg University Tilburg, The Netherlands

Keywords

gender roles, same-sex couples, working hours, division of labor

When it comes to the division of paid labour within couples, two theoretical perspectives dominate the field. One stresses the importance of gender roles in explaining the difference in working hours between men and women, the other explains differences in working hours with earning potential. Both predict men working full time, since they generally are older and higher educated than their female spouses, and their gender role is to provide. Research has almost exclusively focused on opposite-sex couples. We aim to test the limits of these two perspectives by testing them on same-sex couples. We consider "doing gender" for male same-sex couples to be both working full time, whereas for female same-sex partners, the gender expectation would be to work both part time. The economic perspective predicts for all couples that the highest educated partner will work the most. The Netherlands is exceptionally suited for studying the division of paid labour within same-sex couples. First, since its unusually tolerant stance towards same-sex relationships gay couples sharing households in the Netherlands are more easily accepted. Second because of its conservative morals concerning working women, Dutch women in opposite-sex couples still work far fewer hours than their male counterparts, as well as on average less than women in other European countries.

We merged 13 waves of the Dutch Labour Force Surveys to test our hypotheses on, and use information available on the position within household to identify same-sex couples. Only those households with exactly two members that are of the same sex and wherein both respondents indicate that they are one half of a couple are coded as same-sex couples. We analyze 1800 gay men and 1500 lesbians, and test whether they are "doing gender", or whether they divide working hours according to earning potential. Results show that gay men are indeed doing gender and work both full time in a majority of cases, whereas lesbians show a wide variety of working time allocations. For both same-sex couples we find that they are more likely to divide working hours equally, which is partly explained by more educational homogeneity.

The division of household labour and patterns of social support in the family

Dremelj, Polona

Research department, Social protection institute of the Republic of Slovenia Ljubljana, Slovenia

Keywords

Gender, Family, social support, division of labour

The presentation focuses on the importance of family and kin relationship in the conditions of late modernity and stems to prove that family and kin relationships still play an important role in individual's personal and social life. The importance of kin relations is operationally defined in terms of social support and division of labour. I anticipate that kin relations are important in sense that they offer the social support as a resource for receiving certain forms of help. Additionally, it is expected that the patterns of social support are dispersed and relatively equally distributed among kin members due to assumed lower division of labour. The gender-induced division of labour is so less intensive than in the past, since gender assumingly does not put limits on the processes of individualisation. It is claimed that this process will amount on one hand to "disburdening" of traditional women roles, and on the other hand to the disburdening of traditional men roles. Due to the individualisation, especially in form of higher participation of women on labour market, it is claimed that the opportunities for offering kin support will shrink. On the basis of above said it is thus expected that the patterns of kin support in late modernity are more diverse and more equally distributed among various social circles.

On empirical level I will try to answer the following research questions: To what extent (if any) is the division of labour in family (different forms of families) structured by gender? And is the exchange of social support in the family embedded in the responsibilities, which are tied to gendered division of labour in the family?

These questions are analyzed in two parts. In the first part, the data from "Survey on time consumption in Slovenia" (Statistical office of Slovenia, 2000) is used to access the intensity and nature of division of labour between gender in terms of time consumption for various activities in the family and household. In the second part the data "Social support networks of Slovenian inhabitants" (Ferligoj et al, 2002) serves to analyze the supportive interpersonal relations in family and household.

The influence of the family of origin on the intermarriage attitude: A sibling analysis of the Netherlands

Huijnk, Willem

Interdisciplinary Social Sciences, Utrecht University Utrecht, The Netherlands

Liefbroer, Aat

Social Demography, VU University Amsterdam & Netherlands Interdisciplinary Demographic Institute Den Haag, The Netherlands

Keywords

Family, socialization, Intermarriage, ETHNIC ATTITUDES, SIBLING ANALYSIS

The present study examines the influence of the family of origin on Dutch people's attitudes towards having ethnic minority members as kinsmen through marriage, using models of sibling resemblance estimated on a large-scale multi-actor survey. Although the family is traditionally seen as an important context for the development of attitudes, it is surprisingly how little we know about the role of the family for ethnic attitudes. A sibling analysis makes it possible to estimate the total influence of the family, based on the similarity in attitudes between siblings in later life. In this study we also set out to explain this influence. The family is believed to be of importance for attitudes through socialization and the intergenerational transmission of social positions. In addition to these general mechanisms, we test whether also current family characteristics relate to the intermarriage attitude, and therefore may account for the influence of the family of origin. First, close and tight families might foster the preference to interact with persons who are culturally similar, because people from a different cultural background can be seen as threatening the cultural identity and solidarity of one's own group. Second, warm and supportive family relations might relate to less resistance to intermarriage via a higher generalized sense of trust or psychological well-being.

Analyses (N=1,792) show that more than a quarter of the variance in the intermarriage attitude can be attributed to the family of origin. A substantial part of the family influence can be explained by the parental intermarriage attitude, and the transmission of social positions, such as educational attainment and religiosity. In addition, the results reveal that also current family characteristics are relevant for the intermarriage attitude, and therefore account for the family variance. On the one hand, tight family ties expressed through family interaction and the adherence to family norms, are related to less acceptance of ethnic intermarriage. On the other hand, warm and supporting family relations appeared to be related to more acceptance of ethnic intermarriage.

The making of men and fathers within a qualitative longitudinal study of life transition, masculinities and fatherhood

Henwood, Karen

*School of Social Sciences, Cardiff University
Cardiff, UK*

Shirani, Fiona

*School of Social Sciences, Cardiff University
Cardiff, UK*

Keywords

Masculinity, transition, fatherhood

In recent years men's role within and outside the family has been subject to much public debate in the UK and beyond, with expectations apparently increasing in terms of fathers' involvement or participation in family life. The socio-political context in which such debates about the practices and meanings of fatherhood, and their associated masculinities, are taking place is characterised by widely voiced concerns about the implications of changing family configurations for the resourcing of families with dependents (especially children). Widespread cultural discourses circulating about the need for responsible fathering/parenting also potentially serve to intensify the idea that there is a lack of commitment to relationships of caring for, and sharing with, others, that needs to be rectified. From a contrasting perspective, though, such debates about contemporary fathering can be a way of questioning aspects of masculine subjectivity, so that it is no longer assumed to be valued over and above femininity in respect of the cultural ideals they signify and express (independence, separation and detachment from others over relationships and connection, for example).

In our presentation, we report on a study in which both perspectives on fatherhood, masculinities and questions about change inform our efforts to investigate what it means to be a man and a father in (British) society today. Our central research question is "to what extent are men's identities being refashioned within transforming gender relations, family relationships, and socio-cultural change?" Data comes from qualitative interviews with men before they became fathers, twice during the first year afterwards and a recent follow-up eight years later as part of the Timescapes network. The longitudinal design means that the men have passed through a major period of life transition, and reached a different time and place in their life trajectories.

Our aim is to work through the implications of these inquiries for understanding the social and psychological effects, in and through time, of a situation in which involvement, participation, and responsibility have been set up as a nexus of contemporary ideas that are considered to represent aspirational and/or normative identities for men and fathers.

The notion of "culture clash": Difference and belonging in families of mixed racial, ethnic and faith Backgrounds in Britain

Puthussery, Shuby

*Research and Policy Division, Family and Parenting Institute
London, UK*

Edwards, Rosalind

*Families & Social Capital Research Group, London South Bank University
London, UK*

Caballero, Chamion

*Families & Social Capital Research Group, London South Bank University
London, UK*

Keywords

ethnicity, parenting, Britain, Mixed families, faith

Background:

Families headed by parents from different racial, ethnic and religious backgrounds are increasingly visible in many European countries. Families with mixed parentage are often thought to be inherently prone to a problematic family dynamics, and the notion of "culture clash" is commonly used to explain the supposedly transient and problematic nature of relationships in these families. Very little is known, however, about how parents in mixed families negotiate cultural differences and create a sense of identity and belonging for their children. This paper describes a British study on parents' every day negotiations of cultural differences and their approaches to fostering children's sense of identity and belonging.

Methods:

Qualitative individual in-depth interviews were conducted with 35 mixed parent couples (35 mothers and 30 fathers) who had at least one child between 7-12 years. We also carried out interviews with parents, children and both sets of grandparents in three inter-generational family case studies. An inductive analysis of the transcribed interviews was done.

Results:

Parents often described their families as "ordinary" and "normal". Irrespective of race, ethnic or religious backgrounds, they adopted a range of approaches to deal with difference and to pass on a sense of belonging to their children. Three "typical" approaches were identified as "individualised open", "collective mix" and "collective single". Though different approaches between parents or across generations within the family were observed, these were usually complementary and accommodative. "Mixedness" may be insignificant for some, compared to other issues. Often, the most difficult issue for mixed families was the response of others to their mixedness.

Conclusion:

We found little evidence of inherent culture clashes in mixed families as is often suggested. How parents viewed difference and approached giving their children a sense of belonging cut across the idea that there is one "best" way that parents in mixed relationships can understand their children's identity. It is important that policy makers and practitioners do not make stereotypical assumptions about mixed families. Mixed families, as with minority ethnic families generally, would benefit from policies and practices that focus on further tackling negative assumptions, discrimination and prejudice based on race, ethnicity and faith.

The restored family - Ambivalent intimacy in post-divorce family configurations

Castrén, Anna-Maija

Department of Sociology, University of Helsinki

Helsinki, Finland

Keywords

configurations, intimacy, post-divorce family, social network

Family relationships are expected to be emotionally close, to offer support and shelter, and to be a "haven in a heartless world". But how are these expectations carried into post-divorce life? The paper analyses the ambivalence found in the post-divorce family forms, especially step-family, linked to the expectations of intimacy between family members, and it presents results of a study of 34 Finnish post-divorce family configurations. Family relationships are analysed from three perspectives: conceptions concerning the family, emotional closeness of relationships, and the structural embeddedness of relationships. Qualitative interview data, systematic questionnaire data and structured information about everyday social networks of divorced women and men are used to enlighten the dynamics. The results show that even though the respondents aim to restore the family by remarrying, the relationships in the following family form often fail to meet the expectations of intimacy. The structural embeddedness of relationships points out the particularity of step-families regarding this ambivalence.

The Right Thing to Do. How Post-Divorce Fatherhood is Morally Reasoned from the Viewpoint of Everyday Life

Autonen-Vaaraniemi, Leena

Department of Social Work Research, University of Tampere Tampere, Finland

Keywords

everyday life, moral reasoning, post-divorce fatherhood

In the Nordic countries as in Finland, policy development and ideological support for post-divorce parenting have been promoted. However, authorities have strongly been criticised of discrimination against fathers in custodial decisions. Divorced men themselves have also become more active in demanding their rights. The voices of men's activism have been heard in public debates, but little is known about average divorced men's opinions.

Moral reasoning, which is connected to norms, values and evaluation of social situations, has a central position in contested family situations like the divorce. This study aims to capture the moral codes that divorced men themselves give to post-divorce fatherhood. Moral reasoning deals with questions of right or wrong, good or bad. What kind of processes of moral reasoning are being used in talking about post-divorce fatherhood? What aspects and issues is the moral reasoning anchored to? The focus is on moral norms, values and rights and the possible plurality of moral reasoning related to post-divorce fatherhood.

The research data was preliminary gathered as a part of a home study, which aims to capture the meanings of a home to divorced men. The data consists of interviews by Finnish non-activist divorced fathers, who were interviewed several times. The data also includes photographs taken by the men themselves and men's home life history lines. Fathers' moral reasoning was analysed from the viewpoint of gender, focusing to the ways that masculinities intersect with other social divisions such as age, ability, social class and local culture.

The study shows that post-divorce fatherhood was ambiguously reasoned in the context of societal and cultural moral codes as well as moral conclusions based on personal life. Instead of advocating men's rights, the divorced fathers shed light on moral norms from the viewpoint of everyday life. Moral reasoning was connected with ordinariness and continuity. The best interest of a child was a basic element of men's argumentation. Fathers' moral reasoning was intertwined with the micropractices of everyday life, such as decisions about things and spaces after divorce.

The Timescapes of Personal Lives and Relationships: The Temporal Turn in Social Enquiry

Neale, Bren

*School of Sociology and Social Policy, University of Leeds
Leeds, UK*

Keywords

biography, life course, history, Timescapes, temporal family research

The value of taking a dynamic or "processual" approach to understanding family lives and intimate relationships is increasingly recognised; temporal family research that is qualitatively led has the potential to uncover new insights into the immediacy of real lives as they unfold and the interaction of human agency with wider processes of social change. This paper will explore the theme of temporality in family and relationship research that is being developed in the UK within the ESRC funded Timescapes study. Timescapes is a scaled-up qualitative longitudinal study of personal relationships and identities and how these unfold through the life course. The seven projects that make up the study span the life course, from childhood, through parenthood and grandparent, to the oldest generation. The methods of enquiry reflect a deeper conceptual enterprise, that of establishing the authenticity of personal lives and human agency, and the significance of the temporal as a key dimension of social experience. This paper will explore varied ways of theorising the temporal and how these might be harnessed to enrich our understanding of families and intimate lives. In particular it will explore three timescapes that are at the heart of the study: the interlinking of biography, history and generations through the life course.

The transition to parenthood and well-being

Keizer, Renske

*Social Demography, Netherlands Interdisciplinary Demographic Institute
The Hague, The Netherlands*

Dykstra, Pearl

*Social Demography, Netherlands Interdisciplinary Demographic Institute
The Hague, Netherlands*

Poortman, Anne-Rigt

Sociology, Utrecht University Utrecht, Netherlands

Keywords

parenthood, childbearing, intentions, well-being, transition

With the ambiguous results of previous investigations as the starting point of our inquiry, we examine the impact of the transition to parenthood on people's feelings of well-being. We extend on previous work in 3 different ways; we incorporate multiple indicators of well-being, we take the influence of changes in the marital and occupational domain into account and we examine whether differences in childbearing intentions explain differences in the way becoming as parent affects well-being. We make use of fixed effect panel data models to assess whether making the transition to parenthood affects well-being. Our results show that the impact of entering parenthood is weaker than we had expected. Many initial effects of the transition to parenthood were attributable to related changes in the occupational and marital domain. Furthermore, childbearing intentions had little explanatory power, and when it had, it only concerns daily mood measures of well-being. More importantly, the direction of the impact of childbearing intentions is in contrast with our initial expectations. People with short-term childbearing intentions experience a weaker, rather than a stronger, positive effect of becoming a parent on their feelings of well-being. Theoretical and societal implications of our findings are discussed. Our analyses are based on data from both waves of the Netherlands Kinship Panel Study (NKPS), a nationally representative panel study, conducted between 2002 and 2007, from which we selected 344 female and 260 male respondents who were continuously partnered between both waves.

There's no example for parenting, We always fail: dilemmas of parenthood in the beginning of the XXI first century

Marques, Ana Cristina

sociology, CIES/ISCTE

Lisboa, Portugal

Torres, Anália

Sociology, CIES/ISCTE

Lisboa, Portugal

Keywords

childcare, parenthood, Gender

The aim of this paper is to assess the transformations of parenthood and child care in the beginning of XXI first century. We intend to analyse the significance parenthood has for mothers and fathers and the ways Portuguese families take care of their children.

Parenthood is considered something wonderful. However, both men and women recognize the difficulties of parenthood: the greatest responsibilities; greatest work, greatest worries; financial problems; the problems with children growing up. At the same time, it seems to have been a greatest participation of parents in children education. The narratives point out to the wish of parents spending more time with their kids, but practices still show a bigger participation of mother's in childcare.

What is the importance of children for men and women? What are the implications of having a child in the individual's lives? What is the meaning of being a father/mother? Who takes care of children? These are some central questions we intend to answer, based on the results of in-depth interviews, done in Lisbon, Porto, Leiria and Faro, to individuals which live in couple and are at different moments of their life cycle and come from different social backgrounds.

Time, money and well-being in families with children in Finland

Lammi-Taskula, Johanna

*Division of Welfare and Health Policies, THL (National Institute for Health and Welfare)
Helsinki, Finland*

Salmi, Minna

*Division of Welfare and Health Policies, THL (National Institute for Health and Welfare)
Helsinki, Finland*

Keywords

Gender, Poverty, well-being, work-family reconciliation, time-use

A majority of parents with young children are in paid employment in Finland. Full-time employment is the main pattern also among women, and unemployment is less common among parents than among the general population. Childcare and unpaid housework are however not equally shared by parents. Family practices in the division of labour and time-use are gendered as well as related to socio-economic resources.

The balance between work and family is a crucial part of well-being of mothers, fathers, and children. Employment is necessary as a source of income, but it also takes time away from care relations. Previous studies have shown that a majority of parents with full-time work experience frequent lack of time with their children and their partners. On the other hand, families with young children are over-represented in the lowest income groups and struggle with financial woes. The risk of divorce or separation is highest among parents of young children.

In the paper, we analyse the well-being of families with children from the perspective of work-family reconciliation. We look at the relationship between time and money from gender and class perspectives. How are the combinations of economic resources and time resources divided across social groups? What kinds of consequences are related to the unequal division of breadwinning and care responsibilities in families?

The analysis is based on a survey material with 1102 fathers and 1762 mothers with children under 18. The survey was conducted in Finland by Stakes in 2006.

Trends of family formation in contemporary Lithuania: reflection in mass-media

Cesnuiyte, Vida

Department of Social Policy, Mykolas Romeris University Vilnius, Lithuania

Keywords

life course, habitus, Social Class, matrimonial behaviour

Research goal was to describe images of matrimonial behaviour in contemporary Lithuanian society. Therefore, qualitative document analysis method was used. Articles and messages from most popular daily and two journals were analysed.

The central research object was partnership. Research tasks concerns variety of partnership formation/dissolution models and its trends. The hypotheses were formulated based on P. Bourdieu' s theories on habitus and capitals that state: persons with different amount and structure of capitals have own habitus that could be observed from the tastes, attitudes, behaviour models.

Research results showed that registered marriage in mass-media still has image of the basic family formation strategy in the country. Meanwhile, alternative models of family formation usually are showed as practiced in particular situations during the life course and are not internalized as habitus. As most conservative advocates of traditional family model represented: (1) communities of villages and small towns, where social control of natural order is applied to a lesser degree only for older people and for people who choose an alternative family model after divorce; (2) men from the middle and the higher social strata, who usually hold an attitude that registered marriage is indispensable and children have to grow in full families. As initiators and promoters of new family models presented: (1) young people, especially from the middle and the higher social strata, who pursue careers outside Lithuania or/and travel abroad frequently; (2) youth who seek career in Lithuania; (3) women from the higher social strata whose matrimonial behaviour is dictated not so much by their own choice but rather by subconscious rationality, which arises from the intersection of demographic-social asymmetry in the society and internalized traditional value sets, as well as the remaining strict social control.

Turkish divorces in Denmark. Investigating gender and power across transnational spaces

Liversage, Anika

Employment and Integration, SFI - the Danish National Centre for Social Research Copenhagen K, Denmark

Keywords

divorce, Turkish immigrants, transnational spaces, power, Gender

Much recent research has focused on immigrant family formation practises, revealing how home-country norms and networks may shape marriages across transnational spaces. Little attention, however has been paid to family dissolution&nbsp; to divorce.

Using Turkish immigrants as a case, the paper investigates divorces among Turks in Denmark. While divorce is common in Denmark - 40% of married couples dissolve - it is both rarer and much less accepted in Turkish society. We have, however, no knowledge on divorce patterns on any immigrant groups in Denmark, and little international knowledge on immigrant divorces is available at all. This study addresses this lack.

Among immigrant descendants, a marriage between one spouse raised in Denmark and one raised in Turkey predominated until 2002. In such marriages, the arriving migrant spouse, regardless of gender, is in a relatively weak position due to lack of Danish language skills, local networks, and due to the risk of expulsion if the marriage ends within the first seven years.

Since 2002, Danish legislative changes have strongly curbed marriage migration, making marriages between two spouses raised in Denmark predominate in the Turkish community. One consequence of this change seems, interestingly, to have been a recent hike in divorce rates.

This study thus compares similarities and differences in divorces that terminate three distinct types of marriages: Transnational marriages where 1) the man, or 2) the woman arrived from Turkey for the marriage, or 3) marriages between two descendants raised in Denmark. This comprises most marriages/divorces as less than 10% of Turkish descendants in Denmark marry native Danes or other ethnicities.

The study combines first, register data analysis on all marriages and divorces involving Turkish migrants and descendants in Denmark. Second, drawing on the author's ability to speak both Turkish and Danish, it uses biographical interviews with male and female divorcees raised in Denmark as well as in Turkey.

The study thus uses divorces as a lens to investigate how men and women variably negotiate the contradictions between individualization processes and more collective home-country ideals, and how gender and power structures in these processes affect each other across transnational spaces.

Union Disruption: The Effect of Homogamy and the Division of Housework on the Gendered Nature of Divorce

Martinez Perez, Alvaro

INSTITUTE FOR SOCIAL AND ECONOMIC RESEARCH, UNIVERSITY ESSEX/JUAN MARCH INSTITUTE COLCHESTER, UNITED KINGDOM

Keywords

gender differences, divorce, couple relationships, homogamy, division of housework

The paper investigates the effect of assortative mating and the share of housework over marriage on the gendered nature of divorce using Discrete-Time EHA applied to the sample of couples drawn from the BHPS. Several competing theories and models are reviewed and discussed which connect the division of the chores in the couple and educational homogamy with the stability of the relationship. Since the main interest of the chapter lies on unrevealing whether the spouses are affected differently by the patterns of assortative mating and the division of housework over marriage in their decision to end the union a especial attention is paid on the mechanisms that may explain a different propensity of breaking up for wives and husbands. Results suggest that there are, indeed, clear gender differences in the likelihood of divorce when educational homogamy and the (un)equal share of housework are considered. Wives appear to be more sensitive to the division of housework over marriage while men attach more importance to a high quality match measured by the educational attainment of the spouses. Interestingly, gender differences are mitigated when the conditional effect of partners' education on the division of housework is explored. In this case, both wives and husbands seem to benefit from assortative mating. These results confirm, on one hand, that partners have different expectations from the relationship, and, on the other hand, that assortative mating patterns extend their influence over the course of marriage shaping the quality of life of the spouses and affecting the stability of the union.

What does it take to become an adult in Europe: crossnational analysis of norms and attitudes using the European Social Survey

Lapa da Silva, Tiago

Sociology, CIES/ISCTE

Lisboa, Portugal

Keywords

Gender, life course, Generation, transition to adulthood, European societies

Factors that characterize the "Second Demographic Transition" (SDT) of Western societies (Lesthaeghe and van de Kaa, 1986; van de Kaa, 1987) such as the dissociation between procreation and sexuality, the downfall of fertility rates and the postponement of marriage might be changing the timing and sequencing of the transition to adulthood. Furthermore, in the context of "late" modernity, the process of individualization might be altering the social representations of what characterizes the adult person. This paper examines social norms regarding the timing and sequencing of the transition to adulthood and attitudes towards the events that are regarded as important in the definition of the adult. Secondary, cross-sectional data from the third round of the European Social Survey was used in order to compare the attitudes and norms regarding adult life between seven European countries. It is shown that Europeans share common expectations regarding the sequencing of life course. However, the normative timetables associated with the transition to adulthood vary across countries, reflecting different demographic patterns within Europe. It is also demonstrated that there are gendered double standards in social norms and attitudes: women are expected to enter adulthood earlier than men; and Europeans consider that being autonomous from others is more important for male adult life than for female adulthood. Concerning generational differences, the age norms of younger generations reflect the demographic trend to postpone marriage and parenthood. Younger individuals tend to give less importance to family formation as a marker of adulthood than the oldest ones. The findings suggest that new social representations of the "adult" might be emerging. The adult person might be increasingly defined by his or her autonomy from others and not by his or her commitment to the familial institution. Nevertheless, there are persistent differences between European countries regarding the importance attributed to certain life course markers of transition to adulthood.

What is the use of marriage for lesbians? The challenges of same sex marriage for lesbians in Spain

Platero Méndez, Raquel

Departamento de Ciencia Política y de la Administración II, Universidad Complutense de Madrid Pozuelo de Alarcón, Spain

Osborne Verdugo, Raquel

*Departamento de Sociología III, Universidad Nacional de Educación a Distancia
Madrid, SPAIN*

Keywords

lesbianism, divorce, gender analysis, same sex marriage, Spain

Spain has captured international attention with the approval of the legislation allowing same-sex couples to marry (Law 13/2005), which has caused large controversy along with positive recognition. Law 13/2005 has been portrayed as the symbol of equality for gay and lesbians, but has also shown that designing neutral legislation has negative impact on lesbians. No concrete remarks were included for lesbian women which have resulted in discriminatory implementation. Some of the most negative side effects were legally corrected later on. At the same time, a new law on divorce (15/2005) popularly called of "divorce express" was approved, so making easier the decision to marry. In addition, it is still necessary for a lesbian couple to marry if both of them want to be mothers of the same baby, and same sex marriage seem to have legitimised the option to be a mother. In spite of all these factors, lesbians marry less than gays, so a gender gap is present. Some critical questions call for the analysis: What is the use of marriage for lesbians? How can we explain the low rates on same sex marriage, especially those concerning women? Are there economical, social and psychological arguments that could be called upon? These are some of the questions that this paper will try to discuss, bringing a complex analysis to the debates, data and impact of same sex marriage in Spain.

Whats sex got to do with it?

Rodrigues, Elisabete

Sociology, CIES-ISCTE

Lisbon, Portugal

Nico, Magda Lalanda

Sociology, CIES-ISCTE

Lisbon, Portugal

Keywords

power, household labour, Homosexuality, Gender

Combining contributions from sociology of family and of gender, this paper presents the results of a research conducted among homosexual couples, aiming to understand the dynamics of power embedded in their division of household labour.

The main goal is to identify factors, beyond the ones enclosed in the heteronormative frameworks, which define the strength or weakness of the power relations in the domestic sphere. To meet this purpose, 30 semi-structured interviews were conducted separately, to gay and lesbian couples, living in conjugality for at least one year in an urban location (Lisbon).

Unlike the majority of the researches done on the division of household labour in Portugal, in this one the dichotomy man/woman was deliberately excluded from the analysis of power dynamics that are produced in the domestic and intimate relations sphere. There are always power relations within couple members, whether heterosexual or homosexual. Thus, these power relations are activated and structured according to diverse situations, timings and resources (scholars, economics, symbolic...) of each couple member. In this sense, the patterns of power fluctuation must be analysed through the comprehension of all the context features and resources that are used in negotiation, and not only the ones related to the construction and reproduction of gender roles.

Working mothers in Europe: Working time, preferences, gender norms and housework

Ejrnaes, Anders

Department of Society and Globalisation, Roskilde University Roskilde, Denmark

Boje, Thomas P.

Department of Society and Globalisation, Roskilde University Roskilde, Denmark

Keywords

working time, gender norms, family policy, working mothers

The aim of this paper is to examine how different working time / caring regimes in Europe influence women's choice of working time schedule and how these decisions are influenced by the gender norms prevailing among working mothers in the individual European countries.

It is intensively debated whether women actively are choosing part-time or housework or whether their choices of working time are institutionally constrained. Some authors argue that women's gender role attitude and life style preferences explain the high proportion of women who prefer part-time or in some countries even to take up full-time care ( for example Hakim 1996, 2002). Hakim argues that a majority of women are family centred and committed to child rearing and therefore prefer part time / full-time caring. Others have a much more critical view on the reasons for women's choice of labour market involvement. They claim that part-time or full-time caring are structurally constrained by the incompatibility of full-time employment and family responsibilities. According to this perspective the high level of female part-time workers is a consequence of lack appropriate leave programmes or child care facilities (for example Crompton et al 2007 & Wallace 2002).

The article will examine the relationship between actual working hours, preferred working hours, house work and the prevailing gender norms among employed women with depended children in Europe. The analysis will be structured around a number of country clusters based on an index for gender norms, women's time spend on house work, and women's actual and preferred working hours. The central question is to what extent women's choices of reducing working are institutionally constrained or whether women choose to reduce working time because of gender norms or because they are less committed to paid work. The empirical data are from the European Social Survey and includes 24 European countries.

Young people's expectations for the future: gender divisions, identity and social change

Irwin, Sarah

*Sociology and Social Policy, University of Leeds
Leeds, UK*

Keywords

employment expectations, Family, Gender, identity, young people

One of the most profound social transformations of recent decades has been the shift in women's relations to employment, repositioning them in the labour market relative to men and manifesting changes in the kinds of occupations to which many women aspire. Young boys and girls expectations for the future have long been the subject of research interest in the UK, and recent decades have revealed an opening up of gendered expectations about work, career and family commitments. In particular there has been a shift in girls' educational ambitions and a loosening of the grip of anticipated family and childcare commitments on young women's employment expectations. This raises interesting questions about the link between wider societal changes and young people's identities, values and expectations.

The paper draws on data collected for the Young Lives and Times study (YLT), a project run as part of the UK's ESRC Timescapes project. YLT is a qualitatively led longitudinal study, which has also entailed a questionnaire survey of 13 and 14 year olds (N=489). The Young Lives Survey data reveals important gendered differences in expectations about the future but also points to gender de-differentiation in occupational expectations when compared with comparable survey data from the past. In respect of youngsters' anticipated roles in family, work and childcare the data reveals much more liberal gender role attitudes than one might expect on the basis of current divisions of labour amongst parents of young children. This is complemented by the YLT qualitative research data. It is well known that gender liberal attitudes relate to generalised expectations and desires, and there is no guarantee that such attitudes will translate into new patterns of behaviour. However, there are important questions to address regarding how these historically "opened up" expectations relate to young people's current gender identities and educational ambitions, which themselves have profound consequences for gendered divisions of labour in future. The paper analyses a range of evidence on identities, values and expectations in analysing the reproduction, and reshaping, of gender at a point when young people are about to start making important decisions about their future lives.

RN14

Gender Relations in the Labour Market and the Welfare State

'Mavericks' and 'Motley Crews' - Careers of Men and Women Working at the University-Industry-Interface

Fuchs, Stefan

Institute for Employment Research, IAB Germany,

Achatz, Juliane

Institute for Employment Research, IAB Germany,

Kleinert, Corinna

Institute for Employment Research, IAB Germany,

Roßmann, Simon

*Forschungsgruppe Wissenschaftspolitik, WZB
Berlin, Germany*

Keywords

Technology Transfer, Gender, Careers

While the transfer activities of scientists have received increasing attention in research we know little about the careers of women and men working at the university-industry interface. To close this gap our research examines their careers, how they define and present their careers, and how they cope and prevail in the field of technology transfer. Drawing on expert interviews with 40 CEOs and employees of technology transfer organizations in Germany we ask (1) how the occupational field is structured, (2) what the building blocks of a 'career' in technology transfer are, and (3) whether there are gender differences in the career accounts of men and women.

We show, first, that technology transfer as an occupational field in Germany is characterized by many entry and exit points, and the incorporation of people with diverse occupational backgrounds and experiences. The field displays a near perfect gender balance on the surface but marked differences between and within organizations. There are more men than women at prestigious and professionalized transfer units and almost all decision-makers are male.

Second, technology transfer offices are usually staffed with a mix of highly qualified employees, experts who are not engaged in research and development itself but support and manage the commercial science marketplace. The career accounts of these men and women were perforated with traces of the 'nomadic', 'boundaryless' or 'portfolio' career typical for the service or ICT industry. Finally, men and women alike drew on the transitory nature of transfer work and evoked pictures of the staff as a 'motley crew', teams of diverse people, coming from various disciplines with different backgrounds and careers - but all highly motivated by the autonomy and opportunity space provided in the field. Men were stressing aspects relating to choice, self-realization, and independence. Women were generally more reluctant in their accounts and reporting their motifs. They often considered their work temporary in nature and 'second best', in particular when compared to a career in science. In contrast, men scripted their careers in entrepreneurial 'maverick' spirit, often explicitly acknowledging that the career path was taking them 'away from the laboratory bench'.

Academic career as a gendering process of individual trajectories

Fassa, Farinaz

*Center for life course studies (Pavie), University of Lausanne
Lausanne, Switzerland*

Gauthier, Jacques-Antoine

Research center Methodology, inequalities and social change (MISC), University of Lausanne Lausanne, Switzerland

Keywords

academic career, gendering process, sequence analysis

Academic careers are supposed to follow objective and meritocratic criteria based exclusively on individual skills and their adequacy to job requirement. To this end, equality commissions that are integrated in most universities for decades work at minimizing any kind of discrimination when selecting or promoting individuals for specific positions. Still, persistent unequal distribution of (tenured) academic positions between women and men at the time being cast doubt on this claim. Identifying possible gendering processes is a difficult task as it often involves discreet factors combination of different natures and at different levels. Drawing from gender studies and sociology of work, this paper aims to discuss the structural and normative models that prevail in Academic Science and their consequences for academic careers. Based on a mixed mode approach combining optimal matching and qualitative analyses our results show in an integrated manner that gender differences, social origin, disciplinary specificity, organizational choices and time related structural opportunities act as cumulative disadvantages in the trajectories of individuals. More specifically, the positions women are meant to apply for are not only more precarious, but also less central in the academic working networks and less associated with future tenured positions.

Barriers to the achievement of women's potential in their working lives: evidence and policy implications from English "Gender and Employment in Local Labour Markets" research programme

Yeandle, Sue

CIRCLE, School of Sociology and Social Policy, University of Leeds Leeds, UK

Keywords

Gender, recession, local labour markets, job change

This paper highlights the diversity of women's situations in the labour market in England, based on a unique mix of qualitative and quantitative data about women in a wide range of labour market settings and on detailed analysis of 12 English local labour markets.

Drawing on the findings of the Gender and Employment in Local Labour Markets study 2003-6 (the detailed evidence from this study was presented in the GELLM report series published in 2006), and on a new analysis presented in a recently published edited collection of contributions by members of the study team [S. Yeandle (ed.) Policy for a Change: local labour market analysis and gender equality, Bristol: Policy Press, 2009], the paper: - highlights some of the pervasive myths about women and employment which have influenced policy; - draws attention to aspects of women's labour market situation which remain poorly understood; and - challenges some of the "received wisdom" about women and work.

Reflecting on the challenges faced - in very different local labour market contexts - by local policy-makers in overcoming barriers to the achievement of women's potential in their working lives, the paper highlights key policy recommendations from the GELLM studies, considers the theoretical significance of the diversity and inequality which the study exposed, and reflects on the likely consequences of the current recession for women's labour force participation and employment progress, in different policy scenarios.

The discussion is contextualised in the evidence of labour market restructuring and patterns of job change presented in the GELLM reports, and in detailed labour market projections for 2007-17, recently undertaken at sectoral and occupational level for different parts of the UK for the UK Commission for Employment and Skills (and prepared by the University of Warwick by Wilson et al in December 2008).

Between choice and compulsion - Polish women in the employment structure

Pron-Nowak, Natalia

Institute of Sociology, Nicolaus Copernicus University Torun, Poland

Keywords

aid paradox, employment structure, social welfare, unemployed women

Because of a specific socio-historical context it is worth to give some thought to the fact to what extent the condition of Polish labour market and women's participation in the employment structure is different in comparison to countries from Western Europe? In years 1990-1997 Poland was characterized by the passive forms of support which were directed towards unemployed. Polish government tried to ease the effects of unemployment through shorten of the work time, pre-retirement benefits, early retirement or unemployment benefits with other supplementary benefits. From the one side they were to be a kind of support that should enable people to cope with difficult living conditions, while from the other one it was suppose to be a helping hand that would result in changing the status of unemployed into employed.

However, there are many examples of women's involvement for improving standard of living of their families, at the moment women in Poland are not as vocationally active as men (it can be connected with still remaining traditional model of a family) and the situation is being more and more alarming - labour market research shows that professional activity of women is significantly lower than among men even though Polish employment bureaus have to adhere to the egalitarian policy as far as vocational courses, reskilling and helping with getting back to the labour market is considered.

This paper raises the important issue whether the policy of Polish welfare institutions gives equal chances to unemployed men and women on the one hand, and refers to the matter of an aid paradox on the other.

Between Family and the Labour Market: The Changes in Gender Role Attitudes in the Light of Welfare and Labour Market Developments in Luxembourg

Valentova, Marie

PSELL, CEPS/INSTEAD

Differdange, Luxembourg

Keywords

attitudes, gender roles, Welfare State

Question on how to reconcile family and professional life seem to be more and more common for people in reproductive and productive age and their answers depend not only on their particular personal situations and preferences but also on a cultural and institutional setting within which they operate. In the present paper I examine the linkage among the institutional, behavioural and attitudinal aspects of reconciliation of family life and paid work in Luxembourg. Despite the fact that the country can be considered as a country with a rather corporatist welfare structures (especially at the level of family welfare provisions) based on stereotypical division of labour between men and women and consequent relatively low engagement of women in the labour market, during past decades Luxembourg has undergone demographic, social and economic changes which have undermined the traditional division of gender roles. Thus, the main aims of the article are: in a first step, to examine whether the above changes including increasing participation of women in the labour market, changes in welfare state provisions and public family support strategies, diversification of the family life and parental behaviour resonate in people's attitudes toward gender roles and in a second step to uncover whether men and women in different age categories and life course stages exhibit significantly different attitudes toward the issue and whether these differences diminish or increase over time. Analyses are based on the European Value Study data from 1999 and 2008.

Compromises between work or family among women in temporary employment

Sutela, Hanna

*Work Research Unit, Statistics Finland
Helsinki, Finland*

Keywords

women, temporary working, compromises

Finland is a country with a dual breadwinner model and relatively high fertility rate. Well-established family policy schemes are targeted to support the reconciliation of work and family as well as gender equality. However, drastic structural and economic changes, which have taken place in the labour market since 1990s, have made the reconciliation of work and family challenging for young employees.

The highest peak in the proportion of fixed-term employees was achieved in 1997, after which the proportion has, admittedly, decreased - but mainly among men. Today, temporary working is more common among women in Finland than in the EU27 at large, while the opposite is true as regards men. The voluntariness of fixed-term employment tends to vary according to the general labour market situation. While the situation seemed to improve to some extent during the good employment development in the 2000s, in the current economic situation may change the picture once again.

The growing pressures of work as well as the increase in insecurity and competition are in evidence when people make their choices between work and family. Earlier research suggests that the gendered structure of temporary employment in Finland is connected to both nativity and employment rate. The type of employment contract also seems to be connected to other kinds of compromises made in favour of work or family in situations where the two interests have been difficult to fit together.

In my paper I will study compromises, which women with temporary contracts have made between work and family, and the changes which have taken place in these choices due to the changing labour market situation in the past couple of decades.

The results are based on the Finnish Quality of Work Life Surveys 1990, 1997, 2003, 2008.

My study is a part of the research project The consequences of work insecurity on work - family relations and well-being , coordinated by the National Institute for Health and Welfare.

Different models of Welfare State, work-life balance public policies and gender equality- the case of parental leaves in Portugal and Sweden

Alexandre, Helena

Research & Consultancy Unit, National Institute for Public Administration Oeiras, Portugal

Keywords

Gender, parental leaves, Welfare models

This paper addresses how different welfare state models - Nordic and Continental / familiaristic (Esping-Andersen, 1990,2002) - may provide different type of work-life balance public policies and impacts on gender equality.

We analyse and compare the work-life balance and gender equality promotion public policies framework and the specific case of parental leave systems, in Sweden and Portugal.

Portugal and Sweden are integrated in different welfare systems based on different responsibilities towards welfare provision. The consistency and gender mainstreaming of social policies are different, so are parental leave systems. In Sweden there is a high and permanent presence of women in the labour market and a significant share of parental leaves between parents. In Portugal, women employment is high but decreases with the number of children and the share of parental leaves between parents is residual.

Different fundamentals of welfare provision and family public policies appears to impact on gender equality regarding the share of childcare responsibilities by men and women's and the presence in the labour markets. Nevertheless either in Sweden or in Portugal remains gender inequalities: women are more likely to work part time, face occupational and vertical segregation and gender pay gap. Also are seen as the main care member in the family and they spend more hours on household activities

The results suggest the need of a profound reflection about the fundamentals of the provision models of welfare state towards a gender relations framework analyses and inclusion regarding an active role of the state on gender equality promotion.

Divergences of French and Spanish women experiences on the labour market: the case of the secondary education

Jarty, Julie

Sociology, Toulouse Le Mirail University

Toulouse, France

Keywords

Gender, public policies, teaching workforce, cross national comparison

This paper proposes a comparative analysis of gendered experiences of women secondary school teachers in two European countries characterized by different modes of governance and societal "gender arrangements": France and Spain. This approach is in keeping with the general pattern of feminization of the labour market and the progressive transformation of gendered activity patterns in western societies. Despite the development of the gender equality policies in Europe, discrimination against women still persists and the difficulty in combining professional ambition with private life explains, at least in part, the difficulties that affect women's professional careers. In practice, while the gendered structure of the teaching profession is characterized by a high rate of feminisation, French and Spanish women's teachers are still concentrated in the less well paid and lower graded positions

However, French and Spanish women teachers don't have the same experiences and expectations in their working life. The different Welfare State regulations, as well as the particularities in the exercise of the teaching profession in the two contexts and the different work/life conflict, with regard to time pressure at home, made diverging French and Spanish women's teachers experiences on the labour market. Hence this paper attempts to explore the impact of three dimensions having an impact on gendered professional trajectories in this sector: societal contexts, structure of the teaching profession and individual or collective practices. This perspective leads us to work within the "gendered regime" framework, which stresses the dynamic aspect of European gender relations (Connell, 1987, Pfau-Effinger, 1999, Le Feuvre & Andriocci, 2005). Based on the first results of a doctoral dissertations in sociology, this communication will be enhance by about a sixty interviews conducted with women and men teachers in the secondary education in the two national setting studied.

Educational expansion, sex segregation and the initial occupational placement of women and men - changes in gender specific entry wages in Germany 1980-2003

Kleinert, Corinna

Education and Employment over the Life Course, Institute for Employment Research (IAB) Germany, <http://www.iab.de>

Keywords

gender wage gap, employment entry, segregation, education

In Germany, the system of vocational training and higher education is characterized by persistent sex segregation. Due to the high acceptance of formal vocational certificates it is transmitted stronger into the labour market than in other countries. Research has shown that segregation has a strong negative effect on women's initial occupational placement, in particular on their earnings. However, these disadvantages may be disappearing increasingly due to recent structural changes: Like in many industrialized countries, one of the ongoing effects of educational expansion has been the enormous rise in the educational attainment of women. This trend was accompanied by structural changes in the labour market, namely occupational upgrading to highly qualified knowledge intense jobs and occupations in the "female dominated" tertiary sector.

To assess the extent of stability and change in gender inequality at the time of first labour market entry, this paper analyzes the trend in the gender wage gap between consecutive cohorts of West German employment entrants for the years from 1980 until 2003. The analyses of the effects of gender, educational attainment, and occupational segregation on the gender wage gap are based on process-produced data from the IAB employment sample (IABS). This unique database includes exactly dated employment histories of a two percent sample of all employees covered by social security in Germany in the years from 1997 until 2004. To estimate the trend in the gender entry wage gap and its effects single-year OLS regressions and different wage decomposition methods are used.

The results show that the gender wage gap in employment entry has indeed sharply declined in the observation period. For the years 1999 and later it is completely explained by the controlled factors. In part, this trend is due to the improved educational attainment of women. Occupational segregation is far less relevant in explaining wage inequalities than expected, in particular for the period since the 1990s. However, the most important factor in explaining the diminishing gender wage gap is a reduction of unobserved differences between men and women and/or discrimination.

Gender and age as barriers to labour market participation

Beck, Vanessa

Centre for Labour Market Studies, University of Leicester Leicester, England

Keywords

labour market participation, learning, age, Gender

Recent and continuing demographic shifts have led to the expectation that older workers will need to form an increasing part of the labour force, highlighting the need to address issues relating to older people and their labour force participation (Warr et al 2004). At the same time, mature age individuals in the labour force face discriminatory practices including discrimination within employment interviews (Morgeson et al 2008), with regards to promotion, training opportunities, general attitude and instances of redundancy (Duncan and Loretto 2004). Women tend to face dual discrimination in these respects. In contrast, there are also indications of positive attitudes towards older workers and perceptions that they are very productive employees who are more reliable than younger workers (McNair et al 2007, Walker and Maltby 1997). Whilst there has thus been valuable research into employers' attitudes towards older workers (Walker and Maltby 1997, Loretto and White 2006a/b), little is known about the role of learning within this relationships, employers rewards of such potential investment and employees work satisfaction as a result of involvement with learning. This paper questions the role that gender and age have on learning experiences and how this can influence the length of working lives and what role employers play or could play in providing such learning contexts.

The paper is based on recent research carried out on behalf of the East Midlands Learning and Skills Council (LSC) that investigated the relationship between involvement in learning and participation in the labour market by older workers (Beck 2009). Despite the lack of policies specifically on age and learning, the research revealed the existence of practices and policies that could be adjusted to benefit women and older workers including flexible working; assessor and mentor roles; adult apprenticeships; and structured and tailored learning programmes to address specific skill gaps. Employers and workers, especially in small and medium sized organisations had thus found individually tailored solutions to the ageing of the workforce in their sectors.

Gender differences and equality issue in Europe: critical aspects of gender mainstreaming policies and of European social model

Crespi, Isabella

Dept. Education, University of Macerata Macerata, Italy

Keywords

GENDER EQUALITY, European social model, gender policies, family policies

The Lisbon Council invited the Commission and Member States to promote all aspects concerning equal opportunities in the field of employment policies, including the reduction of occupational segregation and the possibility to balance work and family life and to solve some of the increasing problems affecting several countries, such as lower and later fertility and the ensuing ageing of the population. Further, the basic idea of the ESM is that economic and social progress must go hand in hand; economic growth, in other words, is to be combined with social cohesion.

If gender mainstreaming is the major global strategy for the promotion of gender equality, clear intergovernmental mandates for gender mainstreaming have been developed for all the major areas of the work of the United Nations and European Commission, including disarmament, poverty reduction, macro-economics, health, education and trade. The evaluation of equal opportunities mainly focus on qualification measures for unemployed women and improvements for childcare facilities, on the consideration of gender mainstreaming in other policy areas as well as macro economic effects on employment and unemployment of women. It shows, that the promotion of qualification measures and childcare facilities increases the activity rate of women, although there remain doubts about the quality and sustainability of many measures and the impact on families. Although some significant improvements have certainly been made - especially in terms of women's emancipation, gender equity and maternity policies - it should however be noticed that some fundamental issues still remain unresolved and continue to cause problems. Such framework - equal opportunities on the one hand and female emancipation on the other, in a competitive and little-regulated market - seems to lead to a potential contraposition, or trade-off, between equal opportunity and family (or family-friendly) policies. In particular this paper focuses on the relation between gender mainstreaming and equality issue to stress if and how the debate on the topic is a real way to improve equality without missing gender differences and women's rights.

Gender discrimination in Italian labour market: results from a national survey

Tuorto, Dario

*science of education, university of bologna
bologna, italy*

Ghigi, Rossella

*science of education, university of bologna
bologna, italy*

Keywords

labour market, Gender, discrimination

The paper aims to explore the main dimensions of the sex discrimination in Italian labour market. Recent surveys (Eurobarometer 2008) have highlighted that perception of gender discrimination is particularly high in Southern European countries (particularly in Italy and Spain) where it intersects with a hard-employment condition for women. Our paper analyzes some unpublished national survey data collected from 2005 to 2007 (sample of about 7.000 cases). The final aim is to study the spread of female employment discrimination, its different contexts (education, research and labour market), the various forms it takes (focusing on exposure to sources of stress, such bullying situations, physical discomfort, and so on) and some of its consequences (mainly, desired or actual exit from labour market). These outcomes will be integrated with an analysis of factors, at individual, family and work level, crucial in the perception of having suffered discrimination. Moreover, the paper will investigate different forms of multiple discrimination, where gender disadvantage intersects with other discrimination-related variables (age, disability, race, sexual orientation).

Gender segregation in the labour market: the case of ICT employment

Duarte, Alexandra

*Sociologia, ISCTE
Lisboa, Portugal*

Ramos, Madalena

*Métodos Quantitativos, ISCTE
Lisboa, Portugal*

Keywords

gender segregation, ICT employment, ICT qualifications

In this paper we will explore the conventional statistical concepts used by OECD to define ICT professionals and develop an analysis based in other statistical sources which show the heterogeneity of the professional profiles which are behind that designation. Also, this operation enabled us to analyse the ICT labour market segment.

This analysis gives visibility to the anatomy of the Portuguese employment in this sector both in terms of academic qualifications and gender.

Taking as a starting point the idea of the stratification of the labour market, our main hypothesis is that gender segregation in the ICT segment would be visible through the distribution of men/women workers according to their academic qualification.

A Multiple Correspondence Analysis was conducted to explore the relationships between gender, academic qualification, profession and age, and to identify whether there is heterogeneity in the ICT segment, how it is characterised, which profiles of ICT professionals can be defined and what is the relative position of women in each.

Further we analysed the employment evolution in the ICT segment in a ten year period (1991-2001) by gender and the evolution of gender education (ISCED 5-6) gaps in the scientific areas which are predominant in the ICT sector, during the same period.

Based on these three elements of analysis we came to a portrait of the gender segregation in this sector.

Gender Wage Inequality in Germany and Great Britain. Results from a Cross-National Comparison between 1991 and 2007

Giesecke, Johannes

*Presidential Department, Social Science Research Center Berlin
Berlin, Germany*

Verwiebe, Roland

*Institute of Sociology, University Vienna
Vienna, Austria*

Keywords

Germany, UK, gender wage gap

In this paper the changes in gender wage difference in Germany and Great Britain between 1991 and 2007 will be investigated. The starting point of the analysis is provided by the research on labour markets and welfare states, in which it is suggested that wage differences between man and women are based on the gender specific segmentation of labour markets. As welfare and labour market institutions can be expected not only to influence the extent of overall gender wage inequality but also the way changes in the wage distribution are socially structured, cross-national comparisons are needed to investigate the impact institutional arrangements exert on social inequality. A comparison of Germany and Great Britain is especially useful in this context, since these countries represent different labour market and welfare state regimes.

In the empirical part of the paper, data from the German Socio-Economic-Panel and the British Labour Force Survey are used. The analyses are firstly based on descriptive measures of the development of gender wage inequality. In a second step we use regression analyses of individual and structural determinants of wages for women and men in the years 1991 to 2007. First results show a very high level of the gender wage gap in Germany and Great Britain in the observational period. As Eurostat-data show it is one of the highest in Europe and much higher than, for example, in Southern European welfare states or in Scandinavia. Moreover, we find a relatively clear decrease in gender wage inequality in Great Britain between the early 1990s and 2007, whereas in Germany the gender wage gap remained stable and even slightly increased starting in 2000. We will try to show that those different developments over time are due to different labour market dynamics (e.g. a high gender specific segmentation of the labour market in Germany) and specific regulatory features of the liberal and conservative welfare states in Great Britain and Germany (e.g. the low level of child care in Germany), which influence the earning chances of men and women in characteristic ways.

Gender, Care and the Labour Market; The Changing Partnership between the State and The Family

Coakley, Anne

Social Studies, Carlow college

Carlow, Ireland

Keywords

Gender, Family, childcare, partnership, public investment

Anne Coakley

Gender Care and the Labour Market; the Changing Partnership between the State and the Family

Framing the analysis in the context of the changing economic landscape, this paper explores the transitions now occurring in gender care and the labour market.

The social investment trajectory has been rolled out in individual EU countries. To this end, EU funded investment in childcare from the 1990s aimed to promote gender equality in the labour market in particular to facilitate women's participation in paid work.

Unlike the high investment public provision model found in Nordic countries, Ireland belongs to a group of countries including Australia and Canada where the private market model is the focus of state funding on childcare together with direct cash subsidisation for parents.

This paper provides a framework for understanding the current transitions in employment losses, care, migration and consequences for gender relations in the family. Over a decade of extensive economic growth, the lack of public investment in childcare as an investment in children represents a lost opportunity. It also means that in these uncertain economic times the Government can further distance itself from a childcare service that is largely located in the private market. The most recent Irish figures show unemployment rising steeply for immigrant groups and for men and women.

In many European countries a state partnership with the family has evolved sharing the responsibility of childcare. Indeed in Scandinavian countries there was a defamilising of childcare into the public sector from the 1970s (Leira, 2006). Care must be respected as a practice of democratic citizenship (Sevenhuijsen, 2002). It is important to examine the changing partnership between the state and the family in the context of rising unemployment and further changes in migration patterns across Europe. At a comparative level it is timely to compare different models of childcare investment and the outcomes for gender and care relationships.

Gender, Work and Family: Fast forward or replay?

Coelho, Bernardo

CIES-ISCTE, CIES-ISCTE

Lisboa, Lisbon

Torres, Anália

Sociology, ISCTE, CIES-ISCTE

Lisbon, Portugal

Keywords

Family, work, dynamics of change, gender order crises, Gender values

In the contemporary European and global context - economic downturn and its social effects - becomes pertinent to reassess previous analysis based several research projects developed in recent years assessing the interplay between gender values, the sphere of work, and family life by exploring data from ESS (2002, 2004 and 2006) as well EB 2003.

In moments of uncertainty the reflexive character of European societies promotes not only debate around the economic and financial grounding of the social world, but also provides a scenario for questioning some established regimes structuring social life, as the gender regimes. Is our aim to open the analytical and theoretical hypothesis that the financial crises carry a particular gender order crises. With the breakdown of an economic rationality based on the free market also partially crashed gender regimes based on the flows of the apparent gender neutral language of economics.

That is, the determinant relation between gender normativity and power somewhat lost is symbolic supply. Because, hegemony in the contemporary gender order is connected with patterns of trade, investment, concentration of economic and cultural power; these new resources for dominance lost one fundamental provider.

Since family and work as gendered institutions not only circulate definitions of masculinity and femininity, but create conditions for specific patterns of practice, they are permeable to these movements of change: fast forwarding a scenario of passage from more traditional gender values towards gender equality and, paradoxically, replaying older gender inequalities.

Gendered labour market developments in business services. An empirical analysis based on longitudinal employment data

Hendrix, Ulla

Fachbereich G - Bildungs- und Sozialwissenschaften, University of Wuppertal Wuppertal, Germany

Keywords

gender segregation, labour market segmentation, business services, service sector

Women's service sector employment has been largely analysed concerning the household and care related labour market. But what about the growing and dynamic branches of business services, emerging from structural changes in the industrial sector, e.g. outsourcing processes, during the last decades? At the "high end" of occupation, this set of branches includes qualified, knowledge intensive service work in research and development, consultancy, advertising, engineering services and information technology. At the "low end", there are precarious, low paid jobs in new service branches as security services, industrial cleaning and the growing number of temporary employment agencies. In recent market and employment prognoses, business services are predicted to be the future of European labour markets in quantitative and qualitative respect - but oddly, in those prognoses gender relations do not appear.

This contribution aims at that "gender gap" in attention and will enlighten the gendered labour market developments in business services. Two rival theoretical orientations claiming to explain gendered labour market differences will be tested here. Human capital theories are focusing individual investments and decisions, while structurally oriented approaches focus segmentation and segregation in labour markets and organisations.

These competing perspectives are the background of following empirical questions treated here: What did women gain during the last decades in the growing business service branches - looking at earnings, management positions, job security? How are these achievements related to their "human capital" invested, in terms of qualification, further education, occupational interruptions because of family commitments? In a structural perspective - what part does labour market segmentation combined with gender segregation play? Is there any broader access of women to higher positions of knowledge intensive, well paid service sector occupations? Or are quantitative gains in employment paid by precarious, underrated jobs for women?

The presented research results are based on a secondary analysis of German longitudinal data on occupational field developments during the past 20 years. The selected data allow international comparisons as well as estimates of recent developments and their impacts on women.

Gendered Organisational Cultures for women engineers researcher in gendered societies in Europe

Sagebiel, Felizitas

*Educational and Social Sciences, University of Wuppertal
Wuppertal, Germany*

Dahmen, Jennifer

*Educational and Social Sciences, University of Wuppertal
Wuppertal, Germany*

Keywords

europe, Gender, organisational cultures, engineering research

The issue of the paper is the European Commission Project PROMETEA "Empowering Women Engineers in Industrial and Academic Research" (website: www.prometa.info) (2005-2007). Aim is to give an overview about state of the art, hypotheses, methodology and results of work package four, dealing with effects of gendered organisational cultures on careers in engineering research.

Different research and theoretical fields will be presented for understanding gendered career of women engineers: Gender studies, gender in academia, critical men studies, studies on feminist technology, organisational studies and studies on gendered career and profession.

The question was in what ways and to what amount social structures and cultures of engineering research organisations are traditionally male oriented dominated by hegemonic masculinity and men's networks. The qualitative methodological design included interviewing women engineers and doing focus discussion groups with men and women engineers separately.

Results focus first on genderedness of organisational cultures, analysed by gendered division of labour, gender stereotypes and gender awareness. Second, networks will be described from the perception of women and men engineers in research. Genderedness of networks are analysed by definition, functions, processes, activities and evaluation and women's integration or exclusion in different engineering research organisations (industrial, academic and governmental). Characterisation and function of men's networks will be presented in the perception of women and men engineers in research. They will be described and analysed in a comparative perspective of different cases (industrial, academic and governmental) as well as different partner countries. By this way norms and values of gendered organisational cultures will be characterized as they influence especially careers of women engineers.

As conclusion a dilemma of women engineers in research between reification and tabooing of gender differences is posted which reduces chances for changing genderedness of organisational cultures in engineering research.

Getting on or getting out? The impact of gender on promotion decision-making among older workers in Ireland

Ni Leime, Aine

Department of Social Work and Social Policy, Trinity College Dublin Galway, Ireland

Keywords

promotion, decision-making, life-course, Gender, Older workers

This paper is based on an empirical study of older workers (men and women aged 50-64) in the Irish civil service. The study forms part of a PhD thesis in progress. It explores the work-related decision-making of 105 civil servants working at various positions in the civil service hierarchy. A qualitative methodology is employed, using semi-structured interviews with participants telling the story of their working lives to date. This offers an opportunity to uncover workers' own perceptions of how they negotiate their working lives. The study investigates recruitment, promotion and future career and/or retirement intentions.

This paper focuses on the choices workers make around promotion - one of the central work-related decisions with which they are faced. In so doing, it considers the role that work plays in relation to identity-formation for older workers.

This paper critically appraises the usefulness of a rational choice theory approach (which emphasises the role of preferences as the main determinant of decision-making and behaviour) in interpreting the decision-making of these workers. It suggests that applying a life course approach allows offers a more comprehensive and nuanced way of analysing the complexities of work-related decision-making in Ireland in the twenty-first century. Specifically, it allows the space for workers to uncover the various constraints and enabling factors that they have encountered throughout their career and shows how this feeds into decision-making. It also highlights the restricting effects that lack of opportunities and resources earlier in life may have on career progression in later life.

It considers whether there are differences in terms of gender and age in relation to the centrality of work in the lives of the research participants. While there are obvious gender differences in relation to promotion decision-making, there is some evidence that these differences are becoming less pronounced over time. Further, it appears that it is not any one factor such as gender alone, but a complex mixture of ingredients including experience in the work-place, legislation, policy, socio-economic context, stage in the life-cycle and the normative environment that feed into a particular work-related decision for an individual at a particular time.

Glass Ceiling Effect and Wages - The Gender Pay Gap in Management Positions in Germany

Holst, Elke

German Socio-Economic Panel Study (GSOEP), DIW Berlin, University Flensburg Germany, http://www.diw.de/english/the\_institute/staff/27338.html?uid=eholst

Busch, Anne

German Socio-Economic Panel Study (GSOEP), DIW Berlin, Berlin Graduate School of Social Sciences (BGSS) Germany, <http://www.bgss.hu-berlin.de/docpro/promovierende/anne-busch>

Keywords

Oaxaca/Blinder decomposition, managers, Gender Pay Gap, segregation, Heckman correction

Although there exist a variety of studies on the gender pay gap, only few relate to management positions. The present study attempts to fill this gap. Managers in private companies in Germany are a highly selective group of women and men, who differ only marginally in their human capital endowments. The Oaxaca-Blinder decomposition shows that the gender pay gap in the gross monthly salary can hardly be explained with the human capital approach. Adding variables on gender-specific labour market segregation and dimensions of the household and family to the model allows more than two-thirds of the gender pay gap to be explained. However, taking selection effects into a management position into account (Heckman correction), the portion explained decreases to only one-third. This reveals the real extent to which women are disadvantaged on the labor market. In addition, we observe not only that the wages in typical women's jobs are lower than in typical men's jobs but also that women are paid less than men in typical women's jobs (allocative discrimination). The two-thirds of the gender pay gap that remain unexplained represent the unobserved heterogeneity. This includes, for example, general societal and cultural conditions as well as structures and practices on the labour market and in companies that subject women to pay discrimination and hinder them from breaking the glass ceiling.

Global Economic Crisis and the Aggravating Circumstances of Turkish Women Textile Workers

Kümbetoglu, Belkis

*Sociology, Faculty of Science and Letters
Istanbul, Turkey*

User, Inci

*Sociology, Faculty of Science and Letters
Istanbul, Turkey*

Akpinar, Aylin

*Sociology, Faculty of Science and Letters
Istanbul, Turkey*

Keywords

textile sector, Turkish women workers, Key words: global crisis, gender inequality, unsecure working conditions

Cyclical crises of the economy of the last decade and the impact of the global economic crisis have rendered the circumstances of women workers in Turkey more difficult than before. Labour rights have become greatly circumvented by the compartmentalization of production, specifically in the textile sector.

This presentation will be based on a part of the findings of an ongoing field study about women workers in five industrialized provinces of northwestern Turkey. The study is concerned with different types of unrecorded and unsecure employment in textile and food industries and in the services. These sectors have been chosen due to relatively high concentration of women workers therein. In this study, qualitative method is used in order to understand how women are drifted to this type of employment and how they perceive and interpret their own circumstances.

The presentation will cover the preliminary data from the textile industry which is most heavily influenced by the global crisis and will discuss the ongoing process of "flexi-unsecurity" of the employment. Most women workers are initially employed on an irregular basis as unqualified "errand girls" and only a few of them obtain the chances for getting trained on the job and being considered sufficiently qualified for a little more stable and better paid positions. Many women work with high turnover rates and in their work histories there are frequent returns to the domestic sphere. Under these circumstances, they seldom become "indispensable" workers. This situation is also reinforced by the existence of a huge reserve army since the country's population is relatively young and unqualified. This situation is considered worth analysing, because Turkey is going through a period signified by the rise of an ideological discourse that encourages women to embrace traditional gender roles.

While decreasing the public revenues, unrecorded employment deprives workers of health insurance and retirement benefits. For women, it constitutes a marginal status as well as a work experience which does not really empower them and which they do not consider as a significant aspect of their identities. In other words, it is a problem that consolidates the gender inequalities.

Highly educated dual earners - myth or reality? An investigation of cross-national variations in educational effects on household employment patterns

Steiber, Nadia

*Institute for Sociology and Social Research, Vienna University of Economics
Vienna, Austria*

Haas, Barbara

*Institute for Sociology and Social Research, Vienna University of Economics
Vienna, Austria*

Keywords

life course, women's employment, education, household, care

Economic theory predicts that more highly educated women are more likely to be employed due to their higher earnings power and thus opportunity costs of non-employment. Using data from two waves of the European Social Survey, we find this pattern to hold across different European countries. Yet, we do find marked cross-national variations in education effects. To date, there is surprisingly little work aimed at the investigation and explanation of cross-national differences in education effects on women's employment patterns. This paper aims to fill this gap. To gain a better understanding of national differences, we investigate the effects of women's and their partners' education on household employment patterns across different phases in the family life-cycle (according to the presence/age of dependent children). Most interesting cross-national variations emerge when a life course perspective is taken and when the focus of the analysis is shifted from the individual level (women's employment) to the household level. The paper contributes to important debates on future trends in men's and women's employment and the polarisation into rich dual earner households, on the one hand, and workless households, on the other. It discusses cross-national differences against the backdrop of employment regimes and the associated variations in the labour market chances of the lower skilled parts of the population and of welfare state regimes and the associated variations in work incentives for the lower skilled as well as in state support for continuous female employment. The paper ends with a discussion of the implications of the current economic crisis on household employment patterns in the light of the fact that the lowest skilled tend to be most at risk of job loss in times of economic turn-down.

I'm a mother not a worker ..... for a while (?) Back to the role conflict. An analysis of female paths between work and life: results from the field

Farina, Fatima

DISSPI, Università degli Studi di Urbino "Carlo Bo" Urbino, Italy

Vincenti, Alessandra

DISSPI, Università degli Studi di Urbino "Carlo Bo" Urbino, Italy

Keywords

work-life balance, female employment, Gender inequalities, local welfare, molecular capitalism

By international comparison, Italy continues to show a significant gender gap that distinguishes the different local labor markets. Two are the main sources of imbalance around which the design of gender inequality in Italy: the continuing low participation of women in the labor market and the low contribution of men in domestic work and care.

In the background persists a model of "familistic" welfare that delegates widely women the task of balancing work and life and that in a broader process of territorial fragmentation and reduction of resources will further reduce the already low services in support of women, men and families.

This paper presents the results of a field research conducted in 13 municipalities in the province of Pesaro, region Marche (Center Italy), area representative for the Italian production model of the Third Italy or the so-called molecular capitalism.

In recent years this model has shown its weaknesses, first through the internationalization of markets, and now in consequence of a severe economic downturn that is profoundly changing the local employment structure putting under risk the weakest part of labor force, especially women, whose participation in the work in this area is higher than the Italian average.

Indeed, for a decade, the rate of female employment, which had grown more than men since the mid 90s, has been in decline: the more recent data show a significant decrease the employment of women as well as an increase in unemployment.

The collection of 1086 interviews and questionnaires with women (about three quarters of them employed) has enabled us to reconstruct a picture of a local context that has seen a gradual reduction of employment opportunities in response to an increasingly educated female. The characteristics of demand for local labor is an obstacle for women who want to develop their work ambitions, both for women who seek a satisfactory balance between working time, time for the care and time for themselves. The model for development of small and medium enterprises - which today is confronted with the crisis - is a model for some time a lack of complaint inclusion of women.

Occupations in the new service sectors: a portrait of current gender inequalities

Falcão Casaca, Sara

Sociology / Social Sciences, ISEG-UTL /SOCIUS

Lisbon, Portugal

Cardoso, Tânia

Sociology, Socius - Centro de Investigação em Sociologia Económica e das Organizações

Lisbon, Portugal

Keywords

Gender, occupational structure, services, inequalities

The paper aims to provide a portrait of the complex puzzle of inequalities brought about occupational and employment restructuring in Portugal and Europe in general. A gender perspective is to be followed with regard to the analysis of the development of the so called new occupations in the service sector, complemented by an overview of the mechanisms of segregation which cross different age cohorts. Therefore, the ageism effect is also brought to the discussion.

Besides the revision of the theoretical debate on the topic, the proposed paper is based on statistical figures provided by official national and European databases (Labour Force Surveys). Data will be presented and discussed in order to stress trends and dynamics in the labour market, the labour force composition and in the occupational structure, from a diachronic angle. The period under analysis covers the last ten years, starting with the year of the implementation of the European Employment Strategy (EEE) and the debate on its core objectives, such as to promote a more cohesive society, rooted on full employment, improved job quality, gender equality in the labour market and active ageing strategies.

Parental benefit, fertility and female labour market behaviour

Karu, Marre

*Department of Sociology, University of Tartu
Tartu, Estonia*

Keywords

fertility, Parental benefit, labour market behaviour of mothers

When discussing the position of women in the labour market, fertility, motherhood and care work rise as accompanying issues which are influencing and being influenced by the labour market. Social policies are often planned as tools for influencing the behaviour of the population in the direction which would meet the aims and purposes of the policy makers. Decreasing population and employment of women are considered as key challenges in European countries.

Estonia as one of the smallest EU member states is particularly concerned over becoming extinct and has established one of the most generous parental benefit systems in 2004 with an aim to put an end to period of low fertility. Recent developments show indeed an increase in fertility. The question is - has it really been the impact of parental benefit which insures parent's full income for a period of childcare? Who are the parents whose behaviour has been changed most? Are these changes in line with the expected changes and economic logic which lies behind these schemes? What happens to the labour market behaviour of women who are paid for caring their child at home? How about fathers' participation in sharing care work?

To shed a light into the possible effects of one very strong policy measure, the presentation will have a close look into recent developments in fertility behaviour, but also labour market behaviour of parents of small children. Registry data is used to analyse the changes in fertility, the structure of women giving birth and labour market behaviour of women before and after the birth.

PhD, Career and Families - How do PhDs in Switzerland manage family and work life?

Engelage, Sonja

*Dept. of Sociology of Education, University of Bern
Bern, Switzerland*

Schubert, Frank

*Dept. of Sociology of Education, University of Bern
Bern, Switzerland*

Keywords

career, children, partnership, PhD, professional success

Western civilisations are characterised by demographic changes. Difficulties in keeping the contract between generations led to the question why women become few children, how they manage family and labour market career and what price they have to pay. Especially women with academic background attract the attention with the lowest fertility rates and the highest opportunity costs. The reasons are twofold: on one hand female academics have a biographical Problem. Their timeframe of getting a baby is comparatively short because of their long educational pathway and late job entry. Having a secure employment is a precondition for starting a family. On the other hand the combination of children and career seems to be a problem for many women. They still bear the main responsibility at home and expect career setbacks with subsequent income losses.

We describe and analyse the situation in Switzerland and answer the following questions for male and female PhDs:

1. In which phase of life and in which age do PhDs start a family?
2. How do PhDs solve the problem of compatibility of family and work? How do they organise housework and childcare?
3. Which impact do children have on the professional success of PhDs?
4. Overall, what effect has the constellation of the couple concerning their educational backgrounds (heterogeneous vs. homogeneous).

The calculations are based on a unique dataset of 1330 Swiss PhD graduates with their complete educational and professional pathways five to ten years after getting their PhD. The data allows differentiated analyses of the family situation with detailed information on the allocation of housework and childcare. Economic and sociological theories of time allocation in households are tested. First results show that PhDs start their families only two years after the average Swiss. They are more likely to live non-traditional partnerships concerning the division of labour and housework and to employ external child care. Contrary to assumptions, children do not have negative effects on the careers of female PhDs. This result is partly due to the fact that female PhDs tend to have partners, who are also well educated and successful securing the financial background.

Public science, private science and S&T gender segregation in Europe

Carvalho, Helena

*Department of Sociology, Lisbon University Institute - ISCTE
Lisbon, Portugal*

Oliveira, Luísa

*Department of Quantitative Methods, Lisbon Institute University - ISCTE
Lisbon, Portugal*

Keywords

Public science, S&T gender segregation in Europe, private science

This paper has two main goals. The first is to analyse how European countries differ, or not, in terms of a dominant pattern of public/private science. The second is to analyse if and how those patterns are related with gender discrimination in S&T.

The implicit hypothesis is that dominant patterns of private and/or public science are related with the stratification of S&T European Space and that different types of gender discrimination existing in European Higher Education systems (Oliveira & Carvalho, 2008) can be extended to the private and public science sectors as well.

In the pursuit of the first goal, methods of multidimensional analysis are applied in order to identify configurations of European countries based on indicators, namely the employment distribution of researchers across the four sectors (Government, business enterprise sector, private non profit sector and Higher Education) and S &T expenditure by country. Five patterns were identified that distinguish groups of countries from each other, revealing the existence of different situations among EU countries. One group consists of central and northern European countries. The eastern European countries belong to two different groups. One also include Spain and Greece and another Portugal and Italy. Luxembourg and Bulgaria present two other different patterns, consequently defining each as a cluster.

We therefore analysed gender discrimination in the four above mentioned sectors by country. Finally, we evaluated to what extent the previously identified five European private/public patterns are distinct from each other in relation to gender discrimination indicators.

Shared physical custody of children after divorce and labour market opportunities of parents

Poelman, Marcia

PSW, University Antwerp Antwerp, Belgium

Kruythoof, Marie

PSW, Antwerp University Antwerp, Belgium

Mortelmans, Dimitri

PSW-Cello, Antwerp University Antwerp, Belgium

Keywords

Gender, labor, co-parenting

In Belgium, the law of July, 18th 2006, requires a judge to investigate the possibility of shared physical custody after relation dissolution when at least one parent requests this. The law implies an explicit preference for an equally shared physical custody of the children between both parents. The aim is to ameliorate the parent - child relationship but also to create equal job opportunities for both parents. The question remains whether the co-parenting settlement appears to be manageable on the long term and whether the formulated goals are indeed attained. Do co-parents succeed in realizing their intentions in the long term? And what are the financial and organizational consequences in respect to labor market activity? Is the financial burden indeed equally shared by both parents? And are the assumed effects of the co-parenting settlement on labor market opportunities real and if so, evenly distributed over both parents ? An extensive literature study in preparation of an empirical research provides some preliminary answers. Interviews with experts from different fields of expertise and with co-parents allow us to develop a first view on co-parenting as a daily practice. The obstacles and the impact of the settlement on the work-life balance are looked at. The success of the arrangement is intertwined with both the socio-economic profile of the parents, other life transitions and the co-parenting relation they engage in. Social structures and institutions can facilitate this when carefully deployed. The physical placement of the children however often differs from the settlement that was agreed upon at the time of the break-up.

Supporting working parents and parenting workers: European welfare states promoting the reconciliation of work and care

Kröger, Teppo

*Department of Social Sciences and Philosophy, University of Jyväskylä
Jyväskylä, Finland*

Keywords

childcare, fathers, mothers, Welfare State, work

This paper analyses childcare policies of the EU Member States looking at whether and how they support parents of under-school-age children to combine working and parenting. Previous research has often used conceptual dualisms like mothers vs. workers or carers vs. earners. The paper however suggests that these dichotomies cannot capture the full variety of social policies that are practised in different European countries and brings up a two-dimensional notion of working parent/parenting worker that could be included in the conceptual frameworks of comparative analyses. In addition to policies that are promoting either working or caring, a considerable and increasing number of social policies aim to promote the combination of work and care, a challenge that a major part of citizens in every EU Member State face in their everyday lives. However, reflecting national priorities, even when promoting the combination of these two roles, welfare states may focus their support more on the parental caring role (supporting 'working parents') or on the work role (supporting 'parenting workers').

The paper will use this conceptualisation to analyse childcare policies of different European welfare states. The main question is: which roles or role combinations do childcare policies, including care service provisions as well as parental leave and payment schemes, of different European welfare states promote? The data come primarily from European and OECD statistics that are used to cluster EU Member States into four groups (countries supporting "working parents", countries supporting "parenting workers", countries supporting both and countries supporting neither). Country examples from each cluster are then taken into more detailed examination. The analysis is done taking into account the deeply gendered character European labour market structures and welfare policies, looking separately at reconciliation policies focusing on mothers and fathers of under-school age children.

The "feminisation of poverty" - a study of lone parents in the Republic of Ireland and Northern Ireland

Brereton, Bernadette

Centre for Education and Diversity Research (CEDAR), Dundalk Institute of Technology

Co. Louth, Ireland

Keywords

Gender, Poverty, Welfare State

In the Republic of Ireland, women have experienced significant social and political changes since the 1960s. The increased secularisation of Irish society, the industrialising economy and gender equality reforms have increased women's participation in the labour force. However, many challenges remain. This is because, despite national and international gender equality commitments through legislation, policies and laws, the traditional assumption of female dependence on men, is still the underlying factor which translates into women's structurally unequal position in society today. What should also be questioned is the focus of British and Irish welfare regimes on the public world of employment. Research has shown that gender discrepancies in the labour market continue to reflect the value that is placed on a woman's work. Furthermore, unpaid work is an area greatly overlooked and undervalued. Women who take up most unpaid responsibilities such as caring for their children or elderly parents (responsibilities which are vital to any healthy society) do not enforce greater legal, economic, or decision-making power. In fact, women's responsibilities lead to unequal time poverty compared to their male counterparts. Therefore, the author suggests that promoting gender equality is about more than focusing on gender inequality based on poverty and income or access to resources. To address the "feminisation of poverty", social policies must be reflective of social relations.

The 'invisible army' of domestic workers: women's work in a global recession

de la Blétière, Vanessa

Sociology, DINÂMIA - (Centro de Estudos Sobre a Mudança Socioeconómica)
Lisbon, Portugal

Guibentif, Pierre

Sociology, ISCTE - Instituto Superior de Ciências do Trabalho e da Empresa
Lisbon, Portugal

Silva, Marta

History, DINÂMIA - (Centro de Estudos Sobre a Mudança Socioeconómica)
Lisbon, Portugal

Tortell, Lisa

Law, DINÂMIA - (Centro de Estudos Sobre a Mudança Socioeconómica)
Lisbon, Portugal

Keywords

legal regulation., economic recession, gender relations, domestic work

Paid domestic workers are an "invisible army of workers" (Ramirez-Machado; 2003) estimated by the ILO (2008) at 100 million worldwide. Based on 25 interviews of domestic workers and employers in Lisbon and the Azores Islands, we will consider gender relations within a highly gendered sector of the Portuguese labour market, in the context of the economic downturn. Domestic work is precarious employment. This vulnerability is enhanced in a recession, when domestic workers may be considered expendable 'luxuries'. At the same time, there is a surprising suggestion that the affective nature of domestic work means that some domestic workers continue to work despite not being paid. The legal vulnerability of domestic workers is linked with its private workplace and the way in which it is defined strictly as "women's work": most obviously, the formal definition of domestic workers in Portugal is solely in the feminine form. There is an impact on societal expectations, with interviewees being unprepared for male domestic workers, seeing this as the preserve of women or gay men. This is linked with the lack of professionalization in this sector; the majority of immigrant women do not have prior experience of domestic work despite this job permitting them entry to the labor market. New political and social movements and changes to forms of employment and recruitment may reduce the social devaluation and begin a process of socialization resulting in increased legal regulation, societal recognition, and gender equality in the sector.

The Ambiguities of Gender: Nurses and Primary Teachers Professional Identities in Europe

Müller, Jörg

IN3 - Internet Interdisciplinary Institute, Universitat Oberta de Catalunya (UOC) Castelldefels, Spain

Foss Linblad, Rita

Department of Education, University of Gothenburg Gothenburg, Sweden

Keywords

Gender, europe, welfare restructuring, nurses, primary teachers

The following contribution is based on the international research project Profknow - Professional Knowledge in Education and Health. (EU 6th Framework Programme, <http://www.profknow.net>). The overall ambition of this three year research project was to gain an understanding of the relations between the changing organization of work and professional knowledge in primary education and health (nursing) across 7 Europe countries (England, Ireland, Sweden, Finland, Greece, Spain, Portugal). The methodologies employed included postal surveys, ethnographic observations at work, and life-history interviews. The results juxtapose analysis of global and national policy discourses with individual teachers' and nurses' worklife narratives.

The fact that education and nursing are heavily feminized professions across Europe offer a prime opportunity to study the impact of welfare restructuring for gender relations at work. Both professions have been affected by restructuring measures by varying degrees. Concrete worklife experiences vary highly between countries and professions, contrary to a certain hegemony of neo-liberal rhetoric across all countries.

The objective of our presentation is thus two fold: on the one hand to sketch the variations in how female teachers and nurses experience policy- but also wider social transformations in their work. What are the common and diverging concerns in terms of work-life balance, professional careers and status? We will also explore how restructuring - as a situation of profound change and transformation - confronts teachers and nurses with a highly ambiguous redistribution of power, competences and knowledge. Many teachers and nurses testify to the flattening of hierarchies at work and new scales of autonomy and responsibilities towards their "clients" and superiors. However, at the same time, the redefinition of their professional identity often draws upon very traditional scripts of "naturally" male/female qualities, aptitudes and capacities. Restructuring thus appears as both breaking traditional work arrangements in favor of more egalitarian scenarios but at the same time forcefully re-inscribes gendered dichotomies that ultimately block women teachers and nurses from controlling the gains that their newly won responsibilities and skills generate.

The balancing act between work and family life across Europe: Gender differences in perceptions of work life conflict

Plagnol, Anke

*Department of Sociology, University of Cambridge
Cambridge, UK*

Scott, Jacqueline

*Department of Sociology, University of Cambridge
Cambridge, UK*

Keywords

labour force participation, Gender, Cross-national ccomparison, work life conflict

The study of work-life conflict is a very timely topic which has recently gained increased attention from policy makers, partly because of the conflicts that mothers often face in reconciling employment with family responsibilities.

In the present study, we use data from the second round of the European Social Survey (ESS) to explore the impact of policies on work-life conflict in four countries; Germany, France, Ireland and the UK. We focus our analysis on individuals who live with a partner and specifically consider the partner's contribution to paid and unpaid work within the household. This is of particular interest as the division of labour within households has recently undergone remarkable changes. We compare several categories of paid work strategies, ranging from the dual income model to the traditional male breadwinner model. Similarly, we assess whether unpaid labour within a household is mostly done by the female, male or both partners.

We find that, on average, men report higher levels of work-life conflict than women, but women who work full-time have perceptions similar to men's. However, women still do more household chores than men, even when both partners are working full-time. Whether people perceive an imbalance between family and work partly depends on their attitudes towards traditional gender roles, and thus, perhaps, whether the within household division of labour is considered to be fair.

We further observe country-specific differences in work-life conflict, and hypothesize that these differences can be explained, in part, by policies which influence labour market participation and gender attitudes. Previous studies tend to compare work life conflict across countries based on current policies. In contrast, we hypothesize that the policies that are in place when individuals are first becoming parents and are making decisions about the gender division of paid and unpaid labour are likely to be more relevant. We investigate this hypothesis by a cross-generational, cross-country comparison of factors that influence work-life conflict.

The careers of female aerospace engineers: 'managing like a man'?

Beccalli, Bianca

*Department of Labour and Welfare Studies, University of Milan
Milan, Milano*

Falcinelli, Daniela

*Department of Labour and Welfare Studies, University of Milan
Milan, Milano*

Keywords

gender differences, aerospace engineers, Careers, non-traditional jobs, dilemmas and choices

This paper presents an analysis of gender relations in a specific male-dominated field - that of aerospace engineering - examining data on the 'pioneer' women who entered the field in Italy, graduating from 1962 to 2005. Its aim is to explore gender differences in career choices and enduring patterns of sex segregation despite the equivalent educational credentials and similar life trajectories of men and women. The paper looks at an old question - what are the reasons for the barriers to the advancement of women? - in a particular high-tech area of applied science, and revisits earlier literature on women working in non-traditional jobs in the 1970s and 80s drawing on the concepts and hypotheses put forward therein, while at the same time contextualizing them within the general framework of theories of gendered organizations as they have been redefined in recent years.

The Gendered Construction of Technical Self-Confidence: Women's Negotiated Positions in Technical Work Settings

Peterson, Helen

Department of Technology and Social Change, The Tema Institute Linköping, Sweden

Keywords

Double-bind dilemma, Gender-appropriateness, Self-Confidence, Technical Competence

This paper draws on a study on gender relations in the Swedish IT-business. The analysis is based on semi-structured interviews with women and men working as technical experts and IT-specialists in two Swedish IT-consultant companies. The main findings of this paper concern the (negative) impact of the gendered construction of technical self-confidence on women's careers. The results show that in order to become a successful technical expert it was important to gain the trust of both customers and managers as well as the respect of the colleagues. This was achieved through self-promotion and by the display of technical self-competence, competitiveness and ambition. However, the women found it difficult to adjust to this work ideal and were not comfortable in the role as self-confident, technical expert. Rather than promoting themselves they choose to understate their technical competence when interacting with colleagues and customers, by that reducing their chances of career progression. While the women understated their technical competence the men exaggerated their own expertise and never admitted any lack of technical competence.

The paper argues that women's lack of self-confidence did not reflect any actual lack of technical knowledge. Instead it is proposed that the display of low technical self-confidence was a strategy used by the women in order to become accepted in a work setting dominated by men and permeated by a technical work culture. When trying to conform to the work ideal women were namely met with disapproval and provoked for example pejorative epithets such as 'bitch'. The paper suggests that these manifestations of disapproval indicate a double-bind dilemma for women. Women, who expressed technical self-confidence, failed to perform in accordance with gender-appropriate behaviour. This also explains why a gender-mix often is preferred at work. The positive effects of a gender-mix on the work culture should be attributed to the fact that women's career ambitions are obstructed. Hence, women are not allowed to contribute to the otherwise very competitive work culture.

The influence of the development of the service sector on female employment in Europe: An empirical analysis on the level of European NUTS regions

Hirschle, Jochen

Department of Sociology, FernUniversität in Hagen Hagen, Germany

Keywords

women's employment, service sector development, Welfare State, job opportunity structure

The analysis of women's employment has recently mainly been discussed from the perspective of welfare state measures and the 'costs' for women (with and without children) for being gainfully employed: countries with a good public childcare infrastructure support women's constant participation on the labour market while countries with short supply and extended parental leave support the male bread winner model.

In the shadow of this discussion two other causes have been somewhat neglected: First, cultural differences between regions (Pfau-Effinger 2001; Hummelsheim 2009) and second, economic demand. The latter mainly concerns the question whether women's employment is merely the consequence of the size and the development of the service sector - which is the main source of job opportunities for women (Pettit & Hook 2005).

In order to test the genuine influence of job opportunities on female employment, the service sector has to be decomposed in its sub-units. This is because the state itself can take the role of an employer by providing jobs in the public services (administration, education, health). In the case that differences in women's employment would mainly be the result of the size and development of public services the effect would have to be attributed to the welfare state rather than to the dynamic of the private sector economy out of itself (Shire and Gottschall 2007).

Empirically, female employment rates and the development of the sub-branches of the service sector are examined. The analysis thereby draws back on information from the sub-national level (branch development on NUTS2) and on macro-information on welfare state measures (national level). Multilevel regression models are conducted in order to determine the influence of the size and development of different service sector domains on women's employment when controlling for other factors.

Results most notably show that the size and the development of the finance sector has the strongest effect on female employment thereby supporting the argument that economic forces per se are a major source of social change. However, results also confirm that the welfare state is both significantly involved in terms of allocating time to paid work as well as a provider of job opportunities.

Towards the adult worker model? Gender specific employment orientations and constraints within low-income households in Germany

Achatz, Juliane

Joblessness and Social Inclusion, Institute for Employment Research (IAB) Germany, <http://www.iab.de>

Burkert, Carola

Migration and Integration, Institute for Employment Research (IAB) Frankfurt, Germany

Keywords

gender role orientation, adult worker model, low-income households, labourmarket reform

Our research addresses employment orientations and labour market behaviour of recipients of basic income support for needy job-seekers in Germany. To date very little is known about gender specific implications of the "activating" labour market policies implemented in the course of the German labour market reform in 2005. Within the new means-tested benefit regime incremental change in direction of an individualised adult worker model can be assumed. While work obligations have been extended to all employable members of a household exemptions from work obligations for family carers are allowed also. In our research we focus on gender role orientations as well as opportunities and constraints of labour supply due to gender, experience of migration and living conditions of the household.

As the basic income support for needy job-seekers is a social benefit granted at the household level, the situation of benefit recipients has to be analysed in a household context. A question that can hardly be answered without recourse to the internal social and economic structures of households is the significance of women's and men's work and employment orientation for overcoming the need to rely on benefits. In general migrants find themselves in precarious living situations more often than other parts of the population, and that for those of them that have a poor command of the German language this will most likely set an additional hurdle to finding a job.

We use the first wave of the panel study "Labour Market and Social Security" (PASS), established by the Institute for Employment Research (IAB), which is a new dataset for labour market, welfare state and poverty research in Germany, creating a new empirical basis for the scientific community and political consulting. The panel collects additional or significantly more detailed data on relevant characteristics such as attitudes, employment potential or job-seeking behaviour.

Who is flexibel in the labour market?

Pärnänen, Anna

*Work Research Unit, Statistics Finland
Helsinki, Finland*

Keywords

labour market flexibility, recession, women's employment

Who is flexible in the labour market?

The general assumption is that during the economic recessions women are the ones in the labour market who are flexible by moving outside the labour markets, becoming unemployed or by cutting down hours worked. But is this still true? Finland offers an interesting case with respect to women's labour market flexibility. The country has a long tradition of female participation in paid work and mostly women work on a full time basis. Besides this long tradition, the trend during the last decades has been for women to tend to stay longer at home after having children.

Finland experienced a harsh economic recession in the beginning of the 1990's. A good indicator for describing the hardness of the recession is the unemployment rate, which increased from around three percent in 1990 to 18 percent in 1993. By using labour market statistics I have examined what happened to female employment during the recession years of the 1990's. On the basis of my findings I argue that labour market flexibility was not so much gender-dependent as it was age-dependent. The employment rates of both men and women decreased, but men's more than women's. Thus women's and men's employment converged during the recession years. At the same time the employment of the youngest and the oldest age groups decreased significantly.

These phenomena are partly explained by the segregation of the labour markets, as the recession hit some branches harder than others, but they cannot be fully understood without taking into account the role of welfare institutions and the family and the pension and education policies followed. The concepts of gender contract and generational contract are used in order to explain why it was not women as a group, but rather the aged and the young, who acted as the flexible labour reservations in Finland during the recession in the 1990's. This looking back approach gives a view on how welfare institutions affect female employment during the economic recession.

Why being a superwoman does not pay: commonly used coping strategies that do not reduce work-family conflict or alleviate its' consequences for well-being.

Vercruyssen, Anina

Sociology, Ghent University

Belgium,

Van de Putte, Bart

Department of Sociology, Ghent University

GHENT, BELGIUM

Keywords

coping, well-being, Work-family conflict

The effect of work-family conflict (WFC) on the well-being of working mothers is repeatedly demonstrated in international research. Nevertheless, research into the effectiveness of coping strategies for WFC is rather scarce. This paper investigates the effectiveness of strategies for coping with WFC and consequences of WFC for well-being. Regressions on data of 491 Flemish working mothers were performed, taking both directions of WFC into account by distinguishing work-interfering-with-family (WIF) and family-interfering-with-work (FIW). Reducing working hours turns out to be the only effective strategy for reducing WFC: working mothers who adapted their work hours in function of their children score significantly lower for WIF. However, adapting work hours does not alleviate the effect of WFC on well-being, neither do paid and unpaid household help. Sacrificing sleep or rest in order to facilitate the combination of work and family, which is called the superwoman strategy, does have a mediating effect. Although superwoman strategies (slightly) moderate the effect of WIF on stress, of FIW on depression and life satisfaction, and clearly undo the effect of WIF on anxiety and of FIW on stress and anxiety, some superwoman strategies are themselves significantly associated with a rise in stress and depression symptoms and a decrease in life satisfaction. Superwoman strategies thus show to have detrimental side-effects on well-being.

Women in Science and Technology: How to make male dominated disciplines attractive for female students?

Leitner, Andrea

Sociology, Institute for Advanced Studies (IHS)

Vienna, Austria

Wroblewski, Angela

Sociology, Institute for Advanced Studies (IHS)

Vienna, Austria

Keywords

gender sensitive vocational counselling, gender specific choice of school type or field of study, women in engineering

Within gender equality policies in Austria measures to increase girls' or women's interest in non-traditional occupations have a long tradition in active labour market policy or in the educational sector. In the latter the aim is to increase girls' interest in maths and sciences in order to tackle gender specific choice of school type or field of study. In Austria, FIT "Females into Technology" is a concrete example for such measures that has been implemented in 1993 at one university and is meanwhile available all over Austria. FIT provides information, counselling and hands-on-workshops to increase girls self-confidence in their abilities and to motivate girls to study engineering or natural sciences at universities. However, the effect of such measures seems to be limited because of the moderate increase of female students in engineering or natural sciences.

In the paper we will describe the concept of FIT and discuss its limitations. To increase the share of women in engineering several levels have to be addressed simultaneously at different stages in girls' educational career. Our analysis is based on a comprehensive evaluation of FIT including case studies at schools and qualitative interviews with girls from 15 to 19 years.

Women in the Sandwich Generation in Europe: main tensions and new pressures upon recent socio-economic trends

Mateeva, Liliana

*Economics and Finance, Institute for Advanced Studies
Vienna, Austria*

Gstrein, Michaela

*Economics and Finance, Institute for Advanced Studies
Vienna, Austria*

Keywords

employment, ageing, care, sandwich generation

Women in the sandwich generation face multiple tasks to be performed at the same time. How do women in Europe cope with the multitude of demands?

While in former times "breadwinner model" women covered household and family obligations, i.e. care for children and older relatives, their growing labour market activeness reduced the time available for such tasks. Various socio-economic developments affect the load of responsibilities for women and the challenges for the welfare states. Prominent in this respect are changes in family structures, the rising number of single parent families (mostly headed by women) as well as population ageing, which on the one side reduces the pool of available family help while on the other creates rising needs for formal and informal old age care. Recent economic developments creating insecure situations on labour markets add further pressures on families and welfare states.

In the present paper we investigate the situation of women in the sandwich generation taking into account former traditions and recent socio-economic developments across an enlarged Europe. Using cluster analysis (with input such as employment, the current labour market situations, care for children/older relatives and ageing), we develop a country classification in order to reveal diversities and main tendencies related to these main tensions and new pressures for the sandwich generation.

On the basis of the country classification results, challenges and orientations for future family policy, but also for labour market and pension policies, may be drawn.

Work engagement, work family enrichment and gender in Portugal and the UK

Lewis, Suzan

*Organisational Psychology, Middlesex University Business School
London, UK*

Guerreiro, Maria das Dores

*Sociology, Centre for Research and Studies in Sociology (CIES-ISCTE)
Lisbon, Portugal*

Brookes, Michael

*Finance, Economics, Accounting and Marketing, Middlesex University Business School
London, UK*

Barroso, Margarida

*Sociology, Centre for Research and Studies in Sociology (CIES-ISCTE)
Lisbon, Portugal*

Rodrigues, Eduardo

*Sociology, Centre for Research and Studies in Sociology
Lisbon, Portugal*

Keywords

Gender, quality of life, work engagement, work to family and family to work enrichment

This paper examines factors associated with positive work and work-family experiences, specifically work engagement, work to family and family to work enrichment and satisfaction with various life spheres in two EU countries: the United Kingdom and Portugal.

Much research on quality of working life focuses on occupational stress, burnout, work-family conflict and other negative outcomes. Yet, under optimum conditions, involvement in work as well as family or other roles can interact and contribute to personal growth and quality of life in very positive ways. It is important to identify and understand such optimum conditions in order to facilitate win-win situations which enable employees to benefit from greater satisfaction, enjoyment and self-esteem at work and beyond and organisations to benefit from highly engaged and motivated employees.

A central aim of this paper is to examine work and non work factors that contribute to positive work engagement and facilitate mutually enriching rather than conflicting work and non work roles, in two contrasting national contexts.

The quantitative analysis will be based on questionnaires returned by 2261 employees in eight organisations belonging to different sectors in each country, data gathered in the Quality of Life in a Changing Europe Project. This innovative project has the general aim of mapping out and understanding the well-being and quality of life patterns of European workers in the service sector.

RN16

Sociology of Health and Illness

"Is separation always a reasonable action? Exploring the link between marital quality, divorce and mental health"

Symoens, Sara

*Sociology, Ghent University
Ghent, Belgium*

Colman, Elien

*Sociology, Ghent University
Ghent, Belgium*

Bracke, Piet

*Sociology, Ghent University
Ghent, Belgium*

Keywords

mental health, divorce, marital quality, adjustment, service use

Research on divorce or separation and mental health has, until now, mainly focused on the mediating impact of stressors and moderators ex-partners face after the brake-up. Problems of financial hardship, loneliness, and diminished social networks lead most researchers to conclude that being divorced means being worst off. But is separation always an (in)reasonable action? Because, if so, why do people divorce anyway? In this paper we try to make a more nuanced picture by, first, investigating the mediating impact of (prior) marital quality in the relation between marital status and mental health. For it is reasonable that being divorced might mean being better off for people in high conflict relationships. Second, we also want to clear out the link between mental health, (prior) marital quality, and professional health care seeking: Do people who saw a good marriage end seek more often professional care than people who have terminated a less harmonious marriage? And why? Research on marital status and professional service use is only in its preliminary phase and often limited to sociographic descriptions. This study is a first attempt to look more into depth which factors facilitate or hamper effective use by those who need it, and why.

We use the data of "Scheiding in Nederland" (SIN - Divorce in the Netherlands). 906 men and 1253 women were selected following two criteria: they had to be married/cohabiting or divorced/separated, and aged 28-65years. Feelings of depression was measured using the CES-D20. Gender specific analyses were carried out, and all analyses were done using multiple regression analysis within SPSS-15. First results indicate that the divorced do have an overall weaker mental health than the married or cohabiting, but that there are substantive differences within both groups. Further analyses question the impact of differences in (prior) marital quality, and the link with professional care seeking: Do people who live(d) in less harmonious relationships seek more or less often help than people who live(d) in a more harmonious marriage? What kind of help is generally sought? And are there gender differences in this? Results are discussed.

"New" ageing populations: An emerging arena in the interface between ageing and health

Lowton, Karen

*Institute of Gerontology, King's College London
London, UK*

Higgs, Paul

*Division of Research Strategy, University College London
London, UK*

Keywords

New ageing populations, Ageing and health, ageing

There has been considerable interest in the impact of ageing populations and increasing longevity on both developed and developing societies. While these impacts have mainly been studied in demographic and epidemiological terms, changes in the social contexts in which health interventions are delivered have also enabled many people to live a healthier later life than was possible just a few decades ago. This has brought into existence what could be termed "new" ageing populations, whereby those born with serious health conditions who did not previously survive to early adulthood, alongside those developing previously life-limiting conditions in early or mid-life, are now routinely reaching mid- to late-adult life. The numbers of individuals in these groups are growing in terms of the types of conditions involved, the numbers becoming adults and the length of their lives. These developments have occurred through the intended, as well as unintended, consequences of biomedical intervention as well as being responses to social change. While these developments have enabled longer life spans for those with these conditions and have led to many improvements in the quality of life of these groups, the shift into older age means that new primary disorder-related conditions are being clinically recognised and treated only when a new age milestone has been reached for a significant number of that group.

In this paper we explore how biomedicine, technology and social change have led to the emergence of "new" ageing populations whose circumstances open up a new field of study of the experience of "ageing" with a "life-limiting" illness or disability. These populations are rapidly going beyond the conventional understandings of conditions used by health and social care practitioners, but equally they are exceeding the knowledge base of sociology and gerontology. We use cystic fibrosis, thalidomide impairment and Down's syndrome as exemplars of this process, although many other "new" populations exist. What we hope to outline is the importance to medical sociology of these "new ageing populations" for the continued relevance of the sub-discipline.

"Switching and swapping faces": towards emotional literacy within the 'performance' of midwifery

Deery, Ruth

Midwifery, University of Huddersfield Huddersfield, UK

Fisher, Pamela

Department of Behavioural and Social Sciences, University of Huddersfield Huddersfield, UK

Keywords

wellbeing, performance, emotion, practice, midwives

Managing and performing emotions or 'switching and swapping faces' to support child bearing women and colleagues can leave midwives feeling emotionally drained. The necessity to 'perform' emotion, associated with endless reorganisations in the National Health Service (NHS), have contributed to a dominant understanding of practice as essentially performance-based.

This paper is based on an action research study undertaken in the North of England that explored community midwives' support needs. Eight in-depth interviews with midwives were conducted and subsequently analysed using a voice-centred relational methodology. Four different, but interrelated aspects of the midwives' roles relating to emotional work were identified. Crucially, the study provided insights into two types of emotional work within midwifery, 'emotional work' and 'emotional labour'. Borrowing our interpretation of the latter from Hochschild, we nevertheless felt that her use of this term did not allow for the positive dimensions of emotionally challenging work. To capture the rewarding aspects, we have used the term 'emotional work'. Whilst cautioning against a binary understanding of 'emotional labour' and 'emotional work', we argue that the latter tends to remain unacknowledged and undervalued within midwifery. We suggest that this has negative repercussions for the quality of the service provided whilst also undermining the development of an emotionally and intellectually sustaining working environment for midwives.

Our theoretical analysis draws on key ideas taken from Goffman's Presentation of the Self which we relate to different models of work, 'economies of performance' and 'ecologies of practice'. While the former is related to the pressure of excessive organisational demands and limited resources which require midwives to calibrate and control their performances, the latter opens up opportunities for greater emotional literacy and creativity. We suggest here that good practice in midwifery is more likely to develop in an environment in which authentic emotional engagement is validated alongside the imperatives of the performance culture. Unless this happens, professional commitment is likely to diminish within an increasingly instrumentalised and de-energising working environment.

"You are free from unwanted side-effects". Alternative medicine acknowledged as a no-risk health regime

Pedersen, Inge Kryger

Dep. of Sociology, University of Copenhagen Copenhagen K, Denmark

Keywords

alternative medicine, trust, risk management, health regimes, client strategies

Consumer interest in complementary and alternative medicine (CAM) has grown noticeably in the Western world since the 1960's. Based on a random sample of 14,566 Danish citizens aged 16 years or above, the most recent (2005) representative national Health Interview Survey in Denmark estimates that 45.2% respondents have drawn on the services of alternative practitioners, 22.5% within the preceding year, compared to 10.0 % in 1987. The most popular CAM treatments are reflexology and acupuncture.

This paper explores the ways in which clients attending acupuncture and reflexology experience the "effects" of CAM and how a "no-risk" health regime emerges from their experiences. Within a phenomenological approach this paper draws on 90 qualitative in-depth interviews conducted with 30 clients in acupuncture or reflexology clinics.

It will be argued that local trust is an important "effect broker" for treatments within CAM, the effects of which are not evidence-based. How clients respond to health risk and how they are challenging experts, requiring of them that they win their trust will be evolved in order to discuss how growing consumerism in health care affect patterns of building trust in the changing field of welfare services and health care. A positive client image can be produced in opposition to traditional, passive images of clients in conventional medicine. However, attempts to establish some control on the one hand and passive acceptance of CAM treatments on the other lead to contradictions in clients' strategies.

A new sociological and policy Model for Chronic Disease Management (case Diabetes) in Europe compared to Vietnam and UAE, Dubai, in the 21 century, based on theory and methodology of governmentality

Reinbacher, Gunnar Scott

*Department of sociology, Aalborg University
Aalborg, Denmark*

Keywords

chronically diseases, diabetes management, Governmentality

The paper has three options, first to present the results of a research project, named TANDEM, Training Alternative Networking Skills for Diabetes Management, Patient-Centered Networks for Chronic Disease Management (Author is the European project leader and coordinator), second, on base of the results to exhibit a new sociological and policy model for chronic disease management, a comparative study.

Third to criticize conventional theories in the field and to develop new theoretical approaches based on historical contributions developed by Michel Foucault as well as biomedical approaches developed by Nicolas Rose.

The theory of governmentality throughout four hundred years will be the key issues for the new approaches to understand the relationship between state and citizen, between health professionals and patients.

Europe, UAE and Vietnam have very different concepts of the state and we can see that in the way they treat chronically diseases and disease management.

It is interesting to see, that there are close connections between state and health management. This is here illustrated as huge differences in Europe, Uae and Vietnam.

So we need more than a sociological theory to explain that, we have to move to policy analyses to complete the understanding.

The basic elements in the new model was the empirical findings from theoretical, methodological and empirical research done at four European universities and university hospitals on different groups of patients during 1999-2002. It was interesting, that it was the sociological framework for the research both theoretical and empirical which actually demonstrated the strength of the sociological framework in medicine.

The new model to be presented in this paper demonstrates, that a new treatment method in chronic disease management must be multidisciplinary, integrating medical, technological, social psychological and sociological treatment methods in a holistic context.

A qualitative study of physician perspectives on risk communication in preventive encounters - results from focus group discussions in the context of the Austrian periodic health examination

Reichenpfader, Ursula

Health Services Research Methods and Program Evaluation, Institute of Health Promotion and Prevention Graz, Austria

Malli, Gerlinde

Health Services Research Methods and Program Evaluation, Institute of Health Promotion and Prevention Graz, Austria

Keywords

risk communication, focus groups, physician perspective, cancer screening, clinical prevention

Background

Utilized by 821.655 participants (12,2% of those eligible) in 2007, the Austrian Periodic Health Examination (PHE) is available free of charge annually to adults aged 18 and older irrespective of insurance status. Three-quarters of all PHEs are delivered by general practitioners (GPs) in private practice. Program content focuses on evidence-based interventions with lifestyle counselling and individual risk appraisal as well as cancer screening advice. Physicians are encouraged to assess participants' readiness to screening participation and provide information on benefits, risks and uncertainties of these examinations. Also, GPs are supposed to assess individual global cardiovascular risk by means of a predictive risk tool.

Aims

To identify the experiences and views of a group of primary care physicians engaging in risk communication in clinical preventive encounters, exploring barriers and opportunities. Particularly, to get a better understanding of GP perspectives on cancer screening discussions and their role in cardiovascular risk assessment and lifestyle counselling.

Methods

Based on a review of the literature and consultation with experts, focus groups checklists in semi-structured interview format were constructed. Five focus groups of primary care physicians with longstanding experience in PHE delivery were audio-taped, transcribed verbatim, and qualitatively analyzed. MAXqda was used for analysis.

Results

Beliefs about the legitimacy and effectiveness of lifestyle counselling were mixed, depending on the type of intervention. Positive attitudes were expressed with respect to risk calculator utilization, with physicians using these tools particularly for patient education. With respect to cancer screening, physicians appeared less at ease in discussing benefit and harm "fairly" and completely so that participants were well informed. Physicians expressed fear of discouraging screening participation by disclosing risks.

Conclusion

Physicians recognise the importance of discussions enabling fully informed decision making; however, GPs express uncertainty in cancer screening communication and in appropriately framing risk information. Cardiovascular risk calculators appear to be used as educational tools rather than assessment or screening tools. Implementation should focus on professional efforts supporting physicians in risk communication. Also, patients' views on risk communication, particularly with respect to cancer screening and prevention should be explored.

Accountable for one's sickness. Political and medical transformations of the "sick role" and its implications for European Healthcare Systems

Schirmer, Werner

Department of Sociology, Uppsala University Uppsala, Sweden

Michailakis, Dimitris

Department for Caring Sciences and Sociology, University College of Gävle Gävle, Sweden

Keywords

Medical sociology, healthcare policy, sickness, sick role

Public health care systems in Europe are undergoing profound transformations due to advances in medical technology, demographic ageing, and neoliberal economic policies. While the bulk of sociological research on health care policies focuses on changes at the institutional level, we claim that, in order to fully comprehend current transformations, it is necessary to shed light on the interplay between medical and political conceptions of sickness and their impact on (1) the socially determined expectations toward patients, and (2) the legitimate claims to medical treatment patients can raise. The starting point for our analysis is Parsons' classic conception of the sick role. According to Parsons, sickness is linked to a social role with specific rights and duties. Implicitly, the patient in Parsons' concept appears as a victim of her disease. Recent developments in health care policy challenge this view. The current medico-political debate quite explicitly frames the sick as an active agent who by the right choices can influence her current or future health condition. Seen in this light, the specific rights and duties involved by Parsons' sick role are now about to be redefined. In order to analyze the underlying mechanisms, we introduce the distinction between "being sick" and "being counted as sick". While the former refers to physical or mental deviations observed by medical theories, the latter is the outcome of politically motivated decisions on the eligibility for being counted as sick. In medical theory and practice, a biogenetic conception of sickness has been replaced by a more extensive conception of sickness that includes psycho-social criteria for making diagnoses. This redefinition has led to a drastic increase of claims for medical treatment, which account for many of today's challenges public health care has to face. As a feasible response to the medical expansion, European health care policies are about to re-conceptualize the "sick role" - understood as a political observation of sickness, not as a medical one - by holding the patients accountable for their sicknesses, welfare state agencies can regulate the amount of people eligible to compensation without giving up the principles of socially just health care.

Alternative and Complementary Medicine in Portugal: patterns and logics of consumption

Pegado, Elsa

CIES-ISCTE, CIES-ISCTE

Lisboa, Portugal

Keywords

Alternative and Complementary Medicine (CAM), health controls, health conceptions

This communication intends to approach the patterns and logics of consumption of complementary and alternative medicines (CAM). These are understood as a diversified set of therapies and therapeutic practices which share the fact of presenting an alternative or a compliment to 'conventional medicine' or 'biomedicine'. They claim to have a systematised body of knowledge about health and illness guiding the therapeutic practices, distinct from traditional or folk medicine and from other systems that can constitute therapeutic resources, such as religion or esotericism.

In Portugal the use of CAM has a lower expression when compared to other European countries, according to data from European Social Survey 2004. However, it is a phenomenon with growing social visibility. The recognition of its expansion has not been, nevertheless, followed up by the production of sociological knowledge concerning the underlying logics of their use. Since it is a non-regulated field, there are no available systematized data about the demand and supply of these therapeutic resources.

Based on the results of a project of sociological research which is being carried out in Portugal, within CIES-ISCTE, about therapeutic consumption, we intend to contribute to fulfil this gap in four levels. First, quantifying the extent of the use of these medicines. Second, producing a sociography of the users-consumers, based upon sociodemographic, socioeducational and socioprofessional indicators. Third, analysing the patterns of consumption of CAM, on the grounds of indicators such as time and frequency of use, the identification of the therapies used, health problems and therapeutic aims guiding to the use. Last, exploring the logics of consumption, strongly connected to a set of indicators suggesting styles of health controls and investments in health. We intend to question the specificities that the users-consumers present, not only in terms of perceptions and practices related to health, but also in terms of conceptions about health and illness (which can be more activist-oriented or more fatalist-oriented), when compared to non-users.

Between conservation and transformation: considering the role of patient groups in the regulation of health

Clamote, Telmo

*Faculdade de Economia, Universidade de Coimbra
Coimbra, Portugal*

Keywords

patient groups, health regulation, social movements in health, welfare society

The literature on patient groups, stemming from a grassroots portrayal of self-help groups as possible alternative systems of care (returning opportunistically with the shadow of impending doom of the welfare state), has known recent attempts at revitalization through frameworks derived from the field of social movements. While that offers valuable conceptual tools to grasp the contextual formation and strategic deployment of patient groups to provide social change to normative and institutional structures which define the management of illness, and illness itself, it may fail at comprehensively addressing the multiple phenomenology of the field as an overarching approach. Granting it such theoretical status may unwittingly coalesce a multiplicity of social forms within the field, which won't be addressed in its phenomenologically diverse reality and consequence subsumed by the projective banner of a presumably unified emancipatory horizon. Therefore, we propose to take a step back from such theoretical momentum and grasp how, as institutional actors with generally clearly defined and identified constituencies, patient groups are fraught with tensions arising from a potential divide between their transformative possibilities and a perceived need to provide for its particular constituencies. What the return of the political issue of the place of patient groups in health care systems reminds us of precisely is the double bind that curtails any unidirectional conceptualization of their role in the regulation of health: while they may constitute a force of transformation of institutional and cultural frameworks of managing and experiencing illness, their transformative projects are also liable to be systematically caught up in the need to provide for a community of sufferers which commands for conservation strategies for its own, and for its own institutional existence, for instance through systematic strategic (and unholy, social movements-wise) alliances with other regulatory actors. A priori forms of theoretical coalescence of what their potentials for social change may or should be does analytical violence to the effective projection of their action over the regulation of health. Based on an ongoing master's dissertation, it is an analytical and empirical exploration of the tensions inherent to the regulatory import of patient groups that we propose here.

Care of parents and care regimes

Dr. des. Haberkern, Klaus

Institute of Sociology, University of Zurich
Switzerland, <http://www.suz.uzh.ch/haberkern>

Szydlik, Marc

Institute of Sociology, University of Zurich
Switzerland, <http://www.suz.uzh.ch/szydlik>

Keywords

elderly care, institutions, culture, international comparison, europe

Elderly people are predominantly cared for by family members. However, not every parent in need is cared for by family members, and family care varies widely across Europe. A number of studies have focused on care regimes to explain these differences. However, family care has never been traced back directly to the welfare state provision of care, legal obligations towards family members and norms of responsibility. Our presentation, therefore, deals with individual and family structures on the one hand, and welfare state regulations and cultural norms on the other. Which factors influence the provision of care? Do European countries differ in regard to intergenerational care, and what are the reasons for these differences? Logistic multilevel models are applied to answer these questions. The empirical analyses, based on the Survey of Health, Ageing and Retirement in Europe (Austria, Belgium, Denmark, France, Germany, Greece, the Netherlands, Italy, Spain, Sweden, and Switzerland), show that various factors influence care by children: individual characteristics of parents and children, family structures and cultural-contextual factors, including welfare institutions and cultural norms. Intergenerational help occurs more often in family-based care regimes, e.g. Southern and Central European countries, where children are legally obliged to support parents and norms of family responsibility in elderly care are strong. At the same time, in service-based care regimes, e.g. Northern welfare states, professional home care services enable adult children to pursue their personal plans beyond care obligations.

Changes in occupational class inequalities in health among ageing employees - The Helsinki Health Study

Rahkonen, Ossi

*Department of Public Health, University of Helsinki
Helsinki, Finland*

Pietiläinen, Olli

*Department of Public Health, University of Helsinki
Helsinki, Finland*

Laaksonen, Mikko T

*Department of Public Health, University of Helsinki
Helsinki, Finland*

Saastamoinen, Peppiina

*Department of Public Health, University of Helsinki
Helsinki, Finland*

Lallukka, Tea

*Department of Public Health, University of Helsinki
Helsinki, Finland*

Lahelma, Eero

*Department of Public Health, University of Helsinki
Helsinki, Finland*

Keywords

changes over time, Gender, health inequalities

There are several studies on trends in health inequalities. These show that health inequalities have been persistent or even increased in most of the countries studied. We know less how socioeconomic differences change over the lifecourse among ageing people. The aim of this paper was to examine a) whether socioeconomic inequalities in health change over time among ageing women and men and b) whether there are differences in the changes between those who remained employed and those who retired.

The participants are women and men who were employed by the City of Helsinki in 2000, 2001 and 2002, and were born between 1940 and 1962 (40 to 60 yrs at baseline). The response rate of the baseline survey was 67%. The follow-up survey was made in 2007 to 8794 persons who had responded to the baseline survey (response rate of 83%). Occupational social class was divided into four hierarchical groups: managers and professionals, semi-professionals, routine non-manuals, and manual workers. The health outcome was self-rated health (SRH) as below good (?poor health?).

At baseline 19% of female managers and professionals reported poor health as compared to 32% of female manual workers. Five to seven years later the corresponding figures were 20% and 41%. Occupational class inequalities in SRH among women had markedly increased. In men, SRH deteriorated evenly in all occupational classes. Among those who still were during the follow-up employed, inequalities in SRH increased in both women and men. Among those who had retired after the baseline study, SRH was clearly poorer than among those who remained employed. Among retired women the class inequalities in SRH increased, among men decreased.

Socioeconomic inequalities in health increased among employed women and men as well as among retired women but decreased among retired men. In line with previous cross-sectional studies health inequalities are less robust among retired. The contribution of work- and home-related factors as well as healthy lifestyles to changing health inequalities should be examined.

Coherent health politics: A societal and individual challenge!

Verwohlt, Betina

*Department of Sociology, Aalborg University
Aalborg, Denmark*

Reinbacher, Gunnar Scott

Department of History, International and Social Studies, Aalborg University Aalborg, Denmark

Keywords

new paradigm, Public, Health

Nowadays there is a massive focus on the Danish peoples health through public health programs, although these all have in common, that the primary focus is on the individual citizens lifestyle and the citizens own responsibility. As a result the public health programs only have a limited impact, because they don't capture the dualities and conflict of interests between health and society. Several Danish research studies criticize this individual approach, while they stress, that although the citizens desires a healthy lifestyle, the free and personal choice is an unrealistic ideal, because the structure of the society complicates this in the every day life.

This article provides a twofold contribution to the health debate, because it first of all queries the fact, that we in Denmark and Europe address the health problems as the citizen's individual responsibility and don't focus on the structural barriers, which on the societal level complicates a healthy lifestyle. The present challenge, that the lifestyle diseases account for, in Denmark as well as the rest of the Western World, is being handled in the way, that the government through 'governmentality management' informs the citizens of the right health behavior, and then leaves the responsibility for the citizens health to each individual. If we continue this narrow-minded focus on the health problems, and fail to be aware of the societal barriers, which it isn't just the individual citizen's but just as much the governments responsibility to suppress, we contribute to a continuous distortion in proportion to the health, and we will never suppress the lifestyle diseases.

Secondly the article contributes with a proposal to a brand new sociological and societal way of comprehending health and health promotion. In this perspective the responsibility for the citizens health doesn't only lay with the individual citizen, but is just as much a responsibility for the government, the industry and the relevant institutions. Only if we take a broader view on the public health, where we include all these relevant levels, will we be able to locate and problematize all the barriers that inhibit the public health.

Diagnosis of an urban quarter: data and approaches for health promotion and prevention in a disadvantaged quarter in Hamburg, Germany

Süß, Waldemar

Department of Medical Sociology, University Medical Center Hamburg Hamburg, Germany

Mossakowski, Karin

Department of Medical Sociology, University Medical Center Hamburg, Germany

Keywords

Migration, social urban development, local health reporting, local prevention programme, evaluation

Background:

The local health authority Hamburg-Eimsbüttel has developed a prevention programme for the disadvantaged quarter 'Lenzsiedlung' (Lenz residential area). This programme is implemented together with the 'Round Table for Health'. As part of the main focus on 'Prevention research' funded by the German Federal Ministry of Education and Research (BMBF), the department of Medical Sociology of the University Medical Centre Hamburg-Eppendorf has taken on the accompanying analysis in a joint scientific-practical project.

Objectives:

The research project has two basic objectives: firstly, the development of local health reporting for further development of the local prevention programme and health promotion. Secondly, the programme is to be evaluated regarding its effectiveness. Here, the instrument 'Capacity Building in the Quarter' is applied, which was especially designed for this project.

Results:

The research project has provided a 'Diagnosis for the Quarter', which describes the health and social situation in the 'Lenzsiedlung' and maps structures and capacities for health promotion and prevention. The 'Diagnosis for the Quarter' provides data from secondary statistical analysis regarding population and social structure and from two primary field researches: a survey of residents asking about utilisation and evaluation of offered services as well as a survey interviewing stakeholders about the development process of structural improvements and capacity building.

Conclusion:

The complex approach of the 'Diagnosis for the Quarter' provides helpful and necessary findings for the stakeholders of local health authorities and their cooperation partners regarding the local social and health situation as well as the development status of activities and procedures. The results of the project were made available to the 'Round Table for Health'. Currently, stakeholders are discussing the findings with regard to a continued implementation of the prevention programme. However, it is still questionable whether the public health sector has enough resources to implement such a complex approach to establish an empirically sound basis for local health promotion and prevention.

Differences in Health Seeking Strategies among the Urban Poor: The Turkish Case

Özen, Yelda

Department of Sociology, ÇANKIRI KARATEKIN UNIVERSITY ÇANKIRI, TURKEY

Keywords

Bourdieu, habitus, forms of capital, Health Seeking Strategies, Health capital

In the academic and public discussions frequently one often comes across the argument that poverty is interlinked with ill-health. In such a sense, the poor are lumped into a sort of homogenized mass in which all in question are prone to health experiences. However, their health experiences may differ according to their status in the field. This study, as a part of PhD. thesis, aims to investigate the different patterns of health seeking strategies in the case of illness and protection from illness among the urban poor according to different forms of capital. Theoretically, the study follows Bourdieu's theory based on the concepts of habitus, field and the forms of capital, namely economic, cultural, social capital. In addition, health capital operationalized as self-perceived health/illness and medically diagnosed disease was used in order to understand the experience of the sick. In this framework, this study was conducted in two neighborhoods in Altındağ, Ankara, Turkey via face to face interviews with 40 individuals. A main finding has been that different forms of capital had an influence on and differentiated urban poor's health seeking strategies. Health care access, strong informal social capital, being regular income earning poor or benefit dependent poor, having cultural capital belonging to rural or urban field and having chronic illness shape their health experiences. In general, the urban poor tend to distinguish illnesses according to "seriousness" of illness and they decide to seek professional help, traditional or popular methods. On the one hand, benefit dependency and formal social capital is influential in health care access, informal social capital become important in coping with illness experience and non-access to health care. In addition, cultural capital plays role in distinguishing illnesses into those which necessitate traditional or scientific medicine and they categorize illnesses to be treated accordingly in relation to related habitus from the rural field. Lastly, being chronically ill necessitates following the medical advices, instead of other strategies.

Diffusion of health-related habits: Changes in gender, educational, and urban-rural inequalities in non-smoking, leisuretime exercise, and alcohol use in Norway

Elstad, Jon Ivar

Health and social inequality studies, Norwegian Social Research (NOVA), Oslo, and Department of sociology and human geography, University of Oslo Norway,

Keywords

health behaviours, diffusion, social inequalities, time trends

Background/objective. The diffusion approach suggests that social inequalities may emerge because social categories differ in their rate of adoption of new practices. Health behaviours may spread via personal networks which are structured by social divisions, thereby generating changes over time both in overall levels and in inequality patterns. Health promotion campaigns and impulses from international lifestyle trends have engendered an increase in non-smoking, leisuretime physical activity, and frequent alcohol consumption, in Norway during recent decades. This paper analyses how the diffusion of these practices varied by gender, education, and place of residence, and shows how inequality patterns were affected. Methods. Data were obtained from Statistic Norway's Health Surveys, conducted in 1975, 1985, 1995/1998 and 2002/2005. The samples (34,000 men and women aged 22-69) are analysed by age-adjusted prevalence rates, logistic regression, and measurements of rate of adoption. Preliminary results. Around 1980, non-smoking occurred more among women, highly educated, and rural residents. Physical activity was more prevalent among women, highly educated, and residents of the Oslo capital area. Frequent alcohol consumption was more prevalent among highly educated men in the Oslo area. Generally, physical exercise and alcohol use increased similarly in all subcategories. Non-smoking had a more complex pattern, increasing more among men than women, more among high than low education, and more in the Oslo area than elsewhere. Among low educated women in rural areas, non-smoking actually decreased, while low educated men in the Oslo area adopted non-smoking at a relatively high speed. Preliminary conclusions. Health-related behaviours are relatively volatile phenomena, and inequality patterns may change considerably over a few decades. In line with previous studies, these results suggest that emerging practices first become prevalent in privileged strata in urban centers and later on spread in the population. Diffusion patterns do not differ between health-beneficial habits (non-smoking, exercise) and more doubtful practices (frequent alcohol consumption). The rate of adoption seems not primarily associated with material deprivation, but rather with the social/geographical distance to change agents; thus, in this study, the rising practices spread particularly slowly among low educated women in remote areas. Various interpretations and implications are discussed.

Discretionary Death: Its Patterns and Professional, Legal, and Ethical Challenges

Machado, Nora

*CIES Centro de investigação e estudos de sociologia, ISCTE - Lisbon University Institute
Lisboa, Portugal*

Keywords

futility, assisted suicide, end of life, euthanasia, palliative care

Debates about end of life decisions such as withdrawal and withholding of life support, euthanasia and assisted suicide revolve around notions of natural deaths contrasting to unnatural deaths. The paper identifies an alternative in-between class of situations entailing neither natural death nor unnatural death characterized as discretionary death, where legitimized human discretion in allowing or precipitating death is exercised. The discretion concerns the moment of death, and the way death is brought about (by withholding or withdrawing life support, by regulating the dosage of opiates or by other "double effect" actions).

These developments concerning death and dying challenge the notion of stable boundaries between "letting nature run its course " and "ending life" through human agency.

It is argued that the emergence of discretionary death and its normative regulation are of profound social and cultural significance in contemporary history, since they imply the formation of new conceptions, understandings, and representations of death. These developments, while initially set in motion in modern medicine through technological innovations ("life support systems"), now have a momentum of their own in the context of increased patient autonomy and initiative -- and this sets the stage for the increasing considerations of voluntary euthanasia and assisted suicide. New and difficult professional, legal, and ethical challenges and controversies have been emerging -- although unevenly across the European landscape.

Divorce, divorce rates, and professional care seeking for mental health problems in Europe

Bracke, Piet

*Sociology, Ghent University
Ghent, Belgium*

Colman, Elien

*Sociology, Ghent University
Ghent, Belgium*

Symoens, Sara

*Sociology, Ghent University
Ghent, Belgium*

Keywords

comparative research, divorce, professional care seeking

Background. Little is known about differences in professional care seeking based on marital status. The few existing studies show more professional care seeking among the divorced or separated, compared to the married or cohabiting. The aim of this study is to determine whether the divorced or separated seek more professional mental health care regardless of their self-reported mental health problems. We further examine both individual and country level concomitants of marital status differences in professional care seeking behavior.

Methods. We use the data from the Eurobarometer 64.4 on mental well-being collected via telephone interviews. The unweighted sample includes 29,248 respondents (12,748 men and 16,500 women). Poisson hierarchical regression models were estimated to examine whether the divorced or separated had a higher professional health care use for emotional or psychological problems, after controlling for mental and somatic health, socio-demographic characteristics, and support from family and friends. Country level divorce rates and indicators of the supply of mental health professionals were also taken into account. Design and population weights were applied.

Results. Professional care seeking is strongly need based. Apart from that the divorced or separated more often consult health professionals for mental health problems compared to people who are married or cohabitants. Also, women and those out of work are more frequent professional care seekers. In addition, we find that the gap between the divorced/separated and the married/cohabitants is highest in countries with low divorce rates.

Conclusions. The higher rates of the professional care seeking for mental health problems of the divorced/separated can only partially be attributed to their more severe mental health problems. Moreover, in countries where marital dissolution is more common, the marital status gap in professional care seeking is narrowed to a large amount because professional care seeking among the married/cohabitants is increased.

Doctor and HIV-POSITIVE Women: Practice of Interaction

Bendina, Olga

Social Work and social anthropology, Saratov state technical university Saratov, Russia

Keywords

practice, Doctor, HIV-POSITIVE Women

Epidemic HIV/AIDS carries global character, but at study of questions connected to interaction of the doctor and the patient, the regional specificity is most clearly traced. Practice of interaction of the doctor and HIV-POSITIVE women were studied in Saratov. The research of doctor&HIV-POSITIVE women interactions took place in Saratov. The uniqueness of the data practice is adaptation of tactics of communication doctor and patient under needs of the man with the certain diagnosis. Such adaptation of tactics helps to receive the certain rights and freedom, in particular, to overcome an inequality in access to medical services. There is a daily knowledge of interaction of the doctor and woman with HIV that is the basis of ways of relations ?improvement?: illegal payment, gifts, reference to the doctors on acquaintance, forming-up of the confidential relations. The market of medical services in representations at researched group to be reduced to two segments: the not specialized medical establishments - "usual" (polyclinic, hospital, maternity home) and AIDS-CENTRE. Similar differentiation automatically to be transferred to the relation and perception of the medical employees. The given division of medical services comprises not only institutional attributes, but also derivates the whole spectrum practices of interaction of the doctor and patient. The analysis practices in the not specialized clinics and AIDS-CENTRE has allowed to reveal following practices. For the not specialized clinics are characteristic of practice Not specialized clinics are characterized by practices of: 1) escaping organizational rules and development of social networks with "the necessary" doctor; 2) open conflict; 3) partnership relations. Each several practice has certain models of interaction and the concept of medical services' "quality". The practice of the relations at the AIDS-CENTRE represents patient-centred model of medical system. The basis of this practice is not the national headpiece, but the partnership relations between the doctor and woman with HIV.

Doing autoethnography in health research: finding the reflexive "I"

Ettorre, Elizabeth

Sociology & Social Policy, University of Liverpool Liverpool, UK

Keywords

Reflexivity, Health, autoethnography

The aim of this paper is to explore the usefulness of autoethnography for health researchers. The paper is divided into 3 parts: 1) I look specifically at doing autoethnography in the field of health research and how autoethnography needs to be evaluated through the lens of science and art. Autoethnography is a way of telling stories about health and illness events with people in time, their social shaping, evolutions, etc. and how these events reflect cultural meanings. 2.) I ask two questions, "How do health researchers "collect" autoethnographic "data" and what do they do with "it"? Here I demonstrate the evidential value of autoethnographic material for both the autoethnographer and reader of "the research text". I will also draw on my experience of constructing my "research text" when I was suffering from an acute illness. 3.) I look at the way autoethnography contributes to an overall analysis of particular kinds of problems related to the issue of reflexivity and make some conclusions.

Antunes, Ricardo

CIES, ISCTE - CIES

Algés, Portugal

Keywords

Social Class, death, Illness

The main objective of this investigation is to analyse the effects of the social structure on the unequal patterns of morbidity and mortality in Portugal. The inequality distribution of the diseases and the causes of death, reveals a structure of social inequalities based in the differentiated possibilities in the access and in the use of health resources. For this purpose, the present research is already placed in two different and heterogeneous regions of Portugal. One, in an urban and developed region (Lisbon), and the other, in a poor and rural region (Alentejo). Alentejo has the lowest life expectation in Portugal. The objective is to compare different social structures, under the hypothesis that the geographical inequalities in health are also a reflex of geographical social inequalities. The methodology is based in a complementary of quantitative and qualitative approaches. Empirical investigation is located on the individual level, based on the reading of the 'Hospital Individual Clinical Process' of people who died in 2004, from two hospitals. One located in Lisbon and the other in Alentejo. In each 'Clinical Process' social and health dimensions are being collected and analysed. Social dimensions based on indicators like professions, education skills or housing conditions, and health dimensions based on type of diseases, hospital admissions, causes and age of death. Currently, the first part of the investigation is almost finished with the reading of approximately 1100 cases from Alentejo, and 1200 from Lisbon. So far the analyses of the information confirmed the central hypotheses. People located in a higher social class have a higher expectation of life and different types of diseases.

Effects of short-term and long-term unemployment on health behaviors. Evidence from a panel study

Schunck, Reinhard

*Bremen International Graduate School of Social Sciences, University of Bremen
Bremen, Germany*

Rogge, Benedikt G.

*Bremen International Graduate School of Social Sciences, University of Bremen
Bremen, Germany*

Keywords

health behaviors, stress, smoking, BMI, unemployment

This study deals with the effects short- and long-term unemployment has on health behaviours. Using data from the German Socio-Economic Panel (2002-2006), we investigate the effects of short-term and long-term unemployment on smoking behavior and BMI from a stress-related perspective.

The negative effects of unemployment on diverse health outcomes have been extensively documented in the literature. However, evidence on how unemployment affects health behaviors, in particular smoking, exercise and dieting, is rather scarce. Specifically, the causal direction of this relationship is subject to debate and besides, we know little about the effects of unemployment duration on health behaviors.

Applying zero-inflated negative binomial regression models and fixed effects linear regression models and controlling for socio-economic background characteristics, we find that unemployment causes a significant increase in smoking probability as well as a significant increase in a person's BMI. However, the findings differ depending on unemployment duration and gender. The likelihood of smoking increases considerably stronger in men than in women while long-term unemployment of two years and longer increases the number of cigarettes smoked in women but not in men. Furthermore, unemployment duration exacerbates the effects on smoking probability in a non-linear way. With respect to BMI, long term unemployment significantly increases a man's BMI, while women's BMI is not influenced by unemployment.

Our study delivers evidence that health risks accumulate within the group of the unemployed also with regard to health behaviors. In the discussion, however, we argue that this effect is mediated by cognitive, emotional and behavioral processes occurring in the respective actors and their social environments.

Embodied illness and the problem of the informant's authority

Nigris, Daniele

Sociology, University of Padova Padova, Italy

Keywords

Narrative, experience, Subjectivity, embodiment, interview

What anthropologists call 'ethnographic authority' becomes for sociologists the problem of the 'informant's authority'. To know who it is that speaks, and the limits of his/hers legitimacy in speaking, is a general problem in narrative research; but of the highest importance in a field -illness narratives- where people are often deprived of their voice by disease. An epistemological analysis is proposed, which takes into account the necessity to distinguish among three different kinds of (narrated) experience: direct, mediated and imagined.

Embodied experience of illness is a peculiar turning point that brings us to change the way we conceive our body. When we experience illness our own body shifts from making part of a world of objects to becoming part of the 'Ego' dimension. So, when we are the narrating subject, the informant about our own experience of illness, we talk both 'about' a body and 'from' that same body: our own is the only 'direct' experience that can be made of our illness.

Other people's accounts about our illness are different under several aspects -be they friends or relatives, rather than medical operators. They do not share our body, and their experiencing our experience cannot be an embodied one. Clearly, it is possible for another person to make experience 'of the same disease'; but illness is a personal dimension.

So, when we are object of experience for others, they can legitimately talk about their 'direct' experience of living with us, or of taking care of us. In other moments, they can talk about something we told them, so giving voice to 'our' cognition, and 'our' feelings. In that case, it is legitimate to assume that they are merely representing our authority, and that they are mere repetitors of our discourse. But there are also moments in narratives where people talk about what they merely 'imagine' our experiences are.

The discussion of this frame of analysis will be exemplified using narratives taken from researches in the haemodialysis and ophthalmologic fields.

Engaging infoscapes in health - a perspectivist outlook on the lay mapping of health and medicines information

Clamote, Telmo

CIES-ISCTE, CIES-ISCTE

Lisboa, Portugal

Keywords

modes of engagement with information, lay mapping of media/information, lay rationales, health infoscapes, informational awareness

The status of information in the constitution of relatively autonomous lay universes in health appears to have been consistently subdued, either by a culturalist closure of such universes as impervious realms of autochthonous beliefs, or by a behaviorist cognitive engineering concerned with feeding effectively those universes with public health information. Substantially fomented by conceptualizations of reflexivity, sociological research on lay practices and rationales theoretically surpassed such reductionisms. However, the phenomenological novelty associated with an 'information age' might threaten such efforts. Its token medium, the internet, sustains crucial dynamics of increasing availability of information, but by that fact it seems paradoxical to conflate renewed research interest in lay engagement with such diluvial information dynamics to one medium. And while critical literature has engaged the potencial naïveté or normative deception of tales of autonomy and empowerment of patients granted at face value by supposedly widespread internet access to information, this conflation of contemporary infoscapes may facilitate the persistence of two reductionisms: it narrows the scope of sources of information people relate to, which might curtail the larger apprehension of how the juggling and landscaping by lay actors of diverse information sources and media in different health circumstances and trajectories constitutes an inherent mechanism of relating to, accessing and assessing health information; and it may also limit the scope of lay modes of engagement with information, and its sources, to its active pursuit. We would suggest the lay perspective on infoscapes perceptively organizes its outline juxtaposing different informational reliefs through different stages of awareness of the health conceptions and therapeutic possibilities therein depicted through different media, liable to be brought to the fore in changing health circumstances, thus providing multi-layered dynamic backgrounds for the incorporation or rejection in lay rationales of a multiplicity of therapeutic artifacts which commands for a lay ordering of its normative fragmentation. It is, therefore, an analytical exploration of the different modes of lay relation with the multiplication of health information and its sources that is here intended, sustained by data from an ongoing project following patterns and rationales of lay engagement with therapeutic consumables in Portugal.

Experiences of Drug Addicts Regarding the Medicalization of Addiction

Keyvanara, Mahmoud

Health management- Health Humanities Resaerch Center, Isfahan University of Medical sciences Isfahan, Iran

Kianpour, Masoud

Department of Sociology, Memorial University of Newfoundland Newfoundland, Canada

Zhianpour, Mehdi

Department of Sociology, University of Isfahan Isfahan, Iran

Keywords

medicalization, addiction, qualitative methodology

Background: Medicalization is a process by which non-medical problems are defined and treated as medical problems, usually in terms of illness or disorder. While drug addiction has generally been seen as a form of deviant behaviour, new approaches tend to look at it as an illness in need of medical treatment. In fact, by way of medicalizing addiction a second chance may be given to addicts to identify themselves as patients and use medical support to make changes in their lives. This paper investigates the medicalization of drug addiction in Iran.

Methods: A purposeful sample of nine male addicts, admitted to a treatment center at the Isfahan Welfare Organization, were interviewed. We used Coaizzi's phenomenological approach to examine (1) their self-experiences of addiction, (2) the attitudes of medical-treatment institutions toward addiction (3) and the attitudes of the larger society toward addiction.

Results: The results of the study show that while addiction is medicalized at both institutional (medical-treatment centers) and personal (addict) levels, Iranian society still applies a moral-criminal approach toward addiction.

Conclusion: Addicts suffer from the prevailing social attitudes towards addiction, they become stigmatized as a result, entrapped in a paradox in which they see themselves, on the one hand, as patients in need of medical treatment and, on the other hand, as criminals who are often severely punished.

Exploration of the impact of a large reduction in alcohol prices on hospital admissions related to alcohol

Herttua, Kimmo

*Department of Sociology, University of Helsinki
Helsinki, Finland*

Makela, Pia

*Alcohol research, National Institute for Health and Welfare
Finland,*

Martikainen, Pekka

*Department of Sociology, University of Helsinki
Helsinki, Finland*

Keywords

natural experiment, time series, Price of alcohol, hospital admissions, alcohol drinking

In 2004 there was a large reduction in the price of alcohol in Finland due to a reduction in alcohol taxes by one-third, on the average, and due to the abolition of travellers' duty free allowances from the EU. The Finnish natural experiment is a good opportunity to study what happens in alcohol-related problems when prices go down. We examined to what extent the observed changes affected hospital admissions related to alcohol. Time series intervention analysis with auto-regressive integrated moving average modelling was applied to the monthly aggregations of hospital admissions in Finland for the period 1996-2006 to assess the impact of the reduction in alcohol prices. Analyses were carried out for men and women aged 15-39, 40-49, 50-69 and >69 years. The impact of the price reduction on hospital admissions related to alcohol varied according to sex and age. The rate in chronic hospital admissions increased in every age-group under age of 70 years in men. Among men aged 50-69 years, the increase was largest: the impact parameter of 0.20 indicates an increase of 22% in mean rate of hospitalizations which implies an increase of 18.0 monthly hospitalizations per 100,000 person-years. In other age-groups the increase varied from 13-16% (4.8-13.0 hospitalizations). Among women aged 50-69 years, the rate in chronic causes increased by 25% (4.3 hospitalizations) while among women under age of 40 years, the rate decreased. Among men, the rate in acute hospital admissions increased in every age-group under age of 70 years. The increase was largest by 18% and 20% (7.2 and 6.2 hospitalizations) among men aged 40-49 and 50-69 years. Among women aged 50-69 years, the rate in acute causes increased by 38% (2.3 hospitalizations) while in other female age-groups, an increase was not statistically significant. These results suggest that a reduction in alcohol prices led to increases in hospital admissions related to alcohol in certain population subgroups in Finland even when trends and seasonal variation had been taken into account. Particularly, persons aged 50-69 years were affected.

Failing bodies, sleep and health

Arber, Sara

*Sociology, University of Surrey
Guildford, UK*

Venn, Susan

*Sociology, University of Surrey
Guildford, UK*

Keywords

ageing bodies, sleep, Health, Gender

Sleep is increasingly being shown to be important for health and well-being. However, ill-health and disability also lead to sleep disruption and poor sleep quality. Sociologists of health have hitherto paid little attention to the interconnections between sleep, health and well-being. With increasing age, bodies begin to fail leading to a greater potential for sleep disruption.

This paper draws on qualitative interviews with 62 men and women aged 65-95 in the UK who had poor sleep quality, collected as part of the SomnIA project on Sleep and Ageing<sup>1</sup>. The interviews focused on self-perceptions of what influenced interviewees' quality of sleep, and their attitudes towards sleep disruption.

With increasing age, a key factor influencing sleep quality was chronic ill-health, disability and associated pain, for example from arthritis. In addition, virtually all participants recounted how their sleep was disrupted through getting up to go to the toilet, often several times a night. These aspects of sleep disturbance can be characterised as related to older individuals' failing bodies. Daytime sleep was also associated with failing bodies. Many older people could not prevent their ageing bodies from falling asleep during the day, for example, drifting off in front of the television or while reading a newspaper, symbolising a lack of control over their body and for some representing a marker of 'deep' old age.

The paper examines gender differences in participants' discourses about how their failing bodies interrupt and restructure their sleep. We explore what underlies why some older people normalised these disruptions, accommodating them within their everyday lives, while others resisted and resented the ways in which their failing bodies adversely impacted on their sleep quality, well-being and daytime activities.

1. The SomnIA Collaborative Research Project is funded by the Cross-Council New Dynamics of Ageing initiative, a multidisciplinary research programme supported by AHRC, BBSRC, EPSRC, ESRC and MRC (RES-339-25-0009)

Far away or close together? Women's Health Movement and Feminist Associations

Mauerer, Gerlinde

Institute for Sociology, University of Vienna 1090, Austria

Keywords

Women's Health, Gender Medicine, Feminist Research, Male Bias in Medicine

In my research I want to examine the results of the project 'Women's (Health) Studies and Feminist Theory' conducted by the feminist association 'Frauenhertz' in Vienna in 2008 (a feminist organization founded in 1991).

The project's intention is to analyze common goals of feminist theory and women's health research in the past 30 years and today. Whereas in the past at least parts of the Women's Health Movement in Europe have been linked to Feminist Associations, in their further development a more distant and critical relationship can be observed. Furthermore research results in Gender medicine contribute to an increasing turbulence in marking a clear generative connection between results and achievements of women's health movements and feminist theory. Though the reduction of women's health to female bodily functions belongs to the past, social aspects in analyzing women's health and living situation (Doyal 1995) are not in the foreground of at least research in gender medicine. In conclusion feminist research and women's health movement are linked together in their intention to highlight aspects of women's life in a still patriarchal dominated society. As both of them follow historic pathways in analyzing and ameliorating female living conditions, they are in close relation and acting in contrast to research streams which still 'and reduced' look only 'inside women' to find reasons and answers for gender differences (in health).

The main aim of my presentation is to discuss the close relation and moreover distant development of and between women's health movements and feminist associations in Europe.

Fetal subjects: Pregnancy, substance abuse and interventions in Finland

Leppo, Anna

*Department of Sociology, University of Helsinki
Helsinki, Finland*

Keywords

Gender, substance abuse, maternity care, pregnancy

Women's increased consumption of alcohol and drugs has resulted in a growing concern for prenatal substance abuse. Heated debates have recently taken place in the Nordic countries about the mother's vs. infant's rights and the justification for coercive treatment on the basis of prenatal substance abuse. This paper analyses the process by which prenatal substance abuse has, in the last thirty years, become a widely acknowledged problem in Finland. The data for this qualitative study consists of expert articles in professional journals, policy and legislative documents and newspaper articles. The paper is a part of an ongoing PhD study.

Since the late 1970's the medical profession has had a central role in drawing attention to foetal alcohol syndrome (FAS) in Finland. A controversial political debate started in the mid-1990s about whether Finland should follow Norway's example and introduce coercive treatment for pregnant women who continue their substance abuse. The idea was, however, heavily criticised and it was claimed that what is actually needed is voluntary, not coercive, treatment services. New resources were subsequently given to specialised maternity care services for pregnant women with substance abuse problems, and these services expanded significantly at the turn of the century. This expansion of voluntary treatment services took place in the wake of a 'moral panic' around an increase in drug problems in the Finnish society at large. In 2009 the idea of coercive measures took new wind and a ministerial task force has recommended the introduction of coercive treatment for pregnant substance abusers in cases when voluntary measures have failed.

The paper provides a nuanced account of how prenatal substance abuse has been debated and dealt with in Finnish maternity care during the last 30 years. The paper ends by discussing the ideas of feminist scholars according to whom the 'fetal subjects' constructed in 'foetus-centred' discourses tend to unjustly displace the interests and rights of pregnant women with substance abuse problems. Is this anglo-american criticism justified in the Finnish context?

Gender and health of French workers: consequences for society and ways for a European policy to modernize the company

Patrick, Guiol

CRAPE, IEP - Université de Rennes 1 Rennes, France

Aurélie, Hess-Miglioretti

*MSHB, CNRS
Rennes, France*

Pascale, Meriot

Faculté des Sciences économiques, Université de Rennes 1 Rennes, France

Jorge, munoz

ARS, Université de Bretagne occidentale Brest, France

Keywords

Health, employees, management, Gender

Does the exercise of managerial power in the company has an impact on the health of employees ? An initial research, carried on French general practitioners and occupational physicians, led to the conclusion that the management of human resources ("authoritarian" versus "participatory") intervenes, indeed, on the health status of employees. The research was continued with the collaboration of the "Caisse Régionale d'Assurance Maladie de Bretagne", which provided a database on a set of employees of selected companies from the previous survey.

From selected indicators, this database gives us the health consumption for 30 255 workers, observed over a period of two years. The data are the volume of six types of prescription drugs (anxiolytics, psychotropics, analgesics, antidepressants, nonsteroidal anti-inflammatory drugs, hypnotics and sleeping drugs), visits to doctors (general practitioners, rheumatologists, and kinesiotherapy sessions), stoppage of work due to illness and those due to occupational accidents. Age and sex are also included.

Analysis of this database has highlighted a clear effect of gender on the consumption of drugs, on work stoppages and on consultations together.

A higher consumption of health for women

The gender distinction is significant for all types of drugs taken : women consume always more drugs than men except for psychotropics.

Women stop work for illness significantly more often than men. However, men are more concerned by work accidents.

Women consult significantly more than men, whatever the speciality observed.

Sensitivity to power more pronounced for men

The impact of the mode of power exercised in the firm is more evident and stronger among men than women. In some cases, the lowest sensibility of women to the effects of participative management reverse the effects. The explanations are certainly multiple.

Socio-economic impact of this over ? consumption

From the calculation of average expenditure for health, national extrapolations are made. The impact of management type and gender on the cost to society is estimated.

If consumption patterns in health are already well known as the type of people (employed / unemployed), or differences in life expectancy, however, few scientific studies that show the impact functions as a kind of management.

Gender Equity and Depression in Europe

Van de Velde, Sarah

*Sociology, Ghent University
Belgium,*

Bracke, Piet

*Sociology, Ghent University
Ghent, Belgium*

Huijts, Tim

Department of Sociology, Radboud University Nijmegen Nijmegen, The Netherlands

Keywords

gender equity, depression, europe

The gender gap in depression is one of the most consistent findings in the social study of mental health, with a prevalence of depression among women approximately twice that found among men (Piccinelli & Wilkinson, 2000). However, there has been little quantitative cross-cultural research on the topic with only a few researchers studying society-level determinants. Resonating with the recent recognition of the importance of the social context in determining (mental) health (Diez-Roux, 1998), society-level determinants point to the gendered social, economic and political arrangements within society in generating gender equity and offer a useful framework for examining women's preponderance in depression. Previous research did indicate a positive association between gender equity and (self-assessed) health (Backhans et al. 2007; Kawachi et al., 1999; Stanistreet et al., 2005; Torsheim et al., 2006). However, only two studies have tested this hypothesis on depression and their conclusions were contradicting; Chen et al. (2005) found that feelings of depression are more prevalent in low gender equity societies, while Hopcroft and Bradley (2007) concluded that the gender gap in depression is larger in high equity countries. It thus remains unclear how gender differences in depression are associated with society's gender equity. Additionally it is not unlikely that a society that tolerates gender inequalities is also more likely to be an unhealthy place to live for both women and men, therefore not only affecting the relative gender difference but also the absolute depression levels of both genders. In the current study we will make use of the third Round of the European Social Survey, covering women and men aged 18 to 75 in 23 European countries (N = 36.752). We will explore to what degree gender equity is associated with levels of depression in both genders, accounting for transitioning countries and degree of national welfare. To the best of our knowledge, the present study is the first to present highly comparable data on the association between gender equity and depression in women and men in Europe.

Generational Changes in Ethnic Health Inequalities in UK

Smith, Neil

*Epidemiology & Public Health, University College London
London, UK*

Kelly, Yvonne

*Epidemiology & Public Health, University College London
London, UK*

Nazroo, James

*Sociology, University of Manchester
Manchester, UK*

Keywords

Socioeconomic, ethnic minority, intergenerational, health behaviours

The United Kingdom's long history of migration from the Commonwealth, and more recently from Europe, has given rise to a significant UK-born population of migrants. While previous research strongly suggests that ethnic minority groups are more likely to experience a poorer health profile compared to the overall population, it is not clear whether these inequalities persist over generations.

Objectives: To investigate whether ethnic health inequalities are transmitted across generations, and to determine the extent that intergenerational changes in socioeconomic status and health behavioural factors might explain any variation that exists.

Methods: Data from 2,232 mothers from the UK Millennium Cohort Study investigated the prevalence of fair/poor general health, limiting illness and overweight/obesity in the UK-born and overseas-born generations of seven ethnic minority groups (Indian, Pakistani, Bangladeshi, Black Caribbean, Black African, White European and Other). A white population was selected as reference (n=14,882). The risk of poor health outcome was assessed using logistic regression models and stepwise inclusion of socioeconomic and behavioural variables standardised for age. Cross-generational changes in smoking, drinking, exercise and dietary behaviours, as well as socioeconomic status were estimated in individual ethnic groups relative to the white population.

Results: There were no significant differences in the reporting of fair/poor health, having a limiting illness or being overweight/obese in UK-born mothers compared to foreign-born. Adjusting for socioeconomic position increased the rates of ill health in the UK-born for all outcomes, whereas health behaviours had little effect. Individual ethnic minority groups demonstrated significant acculturative convergence to the rates of smoking, drinking and dietary behaviours observed in the white reference population with the greatest changes taking place in migrants from outside of Europe. Similarly there was strong upward socioeconomic mobility in all groups with exception to those from Europe who were more likely to be downwardly mobile over generations.

Conclusion: Ethnic inequalities in health in the UK are persistent across generations, despite the health benefits associated with upward socioeconomic mobility. These health inequalities are unaffected by changes in health behaviours. Understanding these intergenerational pathways will have important public health policy implications as the migrant population not only ages, but also reproduces.

Health and Life Expectancy Differences: Portugal, Spain; Italy and France

Mendes, Maria Filomena

Sociologia, Universidade de Évora Evora, Portugal

Oliveira, Isabel Tiago de

*Métodos Quantitativos, ISCTE
Lisboa, Portugal*

Keywords

healthcare, Life Styles, Life Expectancy

In the 50?s the difference between the life expectancy in Portugal and the mean value in Europe was about 9 years; this discrepancy had gradually narrowed to 2 years in the mid 80?s. Since then, this difference had remained almost the same. We will focus our analysis in this period, after 1980, to get a closer look concerning the differences between Portugal and the other European countries as Spain, Italy and France.

The observed differences in life expectancy will be decomposed: in the infant and child mortality, adult mortality and elderly mortality contributions. These specific contributions are associated both with the healthcare systems and also with the people attitudes and life styles.

The Portuguese female life expectancy is the smaller one comparing to the other countries in study. In nowadays, the most important source of the differences in life expectancy is the elderly mortality. The mortality above 60 years old is the source of approximately 75% of the observed differences in life expectancy between Portugal and Italy and Spain and, 95% of the difference between Portugal and France.

As for the male life expectancy, the Portuguese values are also the worse, but unlike for women, adult mortality is the major source of the observed discrepancies in the male case: almost 70% of the difference with Italy, almost 55% of the total difference with Spain and only 30% regarding France.

We propose to discuss the adult and elderly contributions to the observed differences in life expectancies within the context of individual health related behaviours and national health systems.

Heterosexuality and Gender in HIV Mass Media Public Campaigns

Pinto-Coelho, Zara

*Communication Sciences, University of Minho
Braga, Portugal*

Mota-Ribeiro, Silvana

*Communication Sciences, University of Minho
Braga, Portugal*

Pires, Helena

*Communication Sciences, University of Minho
BRAGA, PORTUGAL*

Fernandes, Emília

*Economy, University of Minho
Braga, PORTUGAL*

Ribeiro da Silva, Pedro

*Direcção Geral de Saúde, Direcção Geral de Saúde
Lisboa, Portugal*

Keywords

Gender, hiv public campaigns, heterosexuality

This talk aims to present a research project focusing on the relationship between the gendered societal structures of Portuguese society and mass media public campaigns to prevent the heterosexual transmission of HIV. It hypothesises that multimodal discourses that are part of campaigns play a role in the (re)production of a gendered power system which has a significant negative effect on the influence of campaigns. As a number of studies demonstrate, preventive policies and political and biomedical rationales at work in different stages of the AIDS epidemic worldwide have failed to move beyond rationalist approaches, "the heterosexual matrix" and medical models of the body and human sexuality, to acknowledge and address the social and emotional complexity of heterosexual practices and the diversity of women's experiences and needs. But how are they being factored into the equation in Portugal?

Theories of gender and of sexuality and contemporary social-cultural studies of advertising, public health and biomedicine provide a set of relevant issues that give direction and coherence to our study, and that we will relate to the picture emerging from our empirical work.

Three focuses map the key sites of meaning making, each requiring a different approach. In the 1st site, we focus on mass media materials of campaigns sponsored by the Portuguese state (2007-2010), that is, on the way linguistic and visual resources are deployed, and on how they work in tandem to construct particular versions of heterosexuality and of representations of their relationships to HIV transmission. The 2nd site involves examining campaigns design: who gets to participate, in what, under what criteria and circumstances; how materials are produced; the labour division involved, the rationales their participants provide; why a particular campaign was launched; campaigns location within larger HIV government-sponsored programs and institutional frameworks and their historical evolution. The 3rd site involves the analysis of the ways in which "audience types" talk about sexuality and relationships, campaigns and about HIV/AIDS, aiming to examine the extent to which discourses of campaigns are accepted and taken up, negotiated, resisted or ignored, and how this talk varies according to the social categories of the targets.

How to Mainstream gender policies into healthcare? A comparison of governance in England and Germany

Annandale, Ellen

*Sociology, University of Leicester
Leicester, UK*

Kuhlmann, Ellen

Social and Policy Sciences, University of Bath Bath, UK

Keywords

Gender, healthcare, comparative

How to mainstream gender policies into healthcare? A comparison of governance in England and Germany

Ellen Annandale, University of Leicester, UK and Ellen Kuhlmann, University of Bath

Address for correspondence:

Ellen Annandale Department of Sociology, University of Leicester, Leicester LE1 7RH, United Kingdom, Email: eca7@le.ac.uk

Abstract

Across the globe the concept of gender mainstreaming is indicative of substantive political and social change, and healthcare is a particularly important policy arena. Existing research reveals however only meagre success in the implementation of gender policies in national contexts, despite clear supranational guidelines. This paper aims to map out the spaces for gender policies within a fluid environment of the changing governance of healthcare by using cross-country comparison. We choose England and Germany as case studies that will serve to develop a robust methodological framework for an expanded cross-country comparison. Both countries have introduced extensive modernisation agendas with new managerial regimes as a particular facilitator towards improved performance of providers and quality of care. We use National Service Frameworks in England and Disease Management Programmes in Germany for an in-depth analysis of the diffusion of gender approaches into new policies. The analysis draws on key documents and expert interviews with a range of institutional players and policy entrepreneurs in both countries to develop a conceptual approach that links different levels of governance.

Our results highlight that changes in the governance of healthcare do provide opportunities for integrating gender sensitive approaches. However, opportunities are heavily shaped by national configurations of the 'healthcare state' and the specific intersections between institutional, organisational and professional governance practices. Our comparative study also raises more general questions on health policy convergence and the tensions between supranational policies and national healthcare states.

Hybrid knowledge in the mental health field

Feiring, Marte

*Demos, Norwegian Institute for Urban and Regional Research
Oslo, Norway*

Keywords

, mental health, hybrid knowledge, knowledgetypes

This paper discusses the development of a new type of knowledge ? hybrid knowledge. Knowledge is culturally specific and socially constructed. It comprises symbolic and structural elements; and it is logical, contextual, relational and collective. In this paper I understand knowledge as all of the following: (1) collective representations held by all members in society ? i.e. lay knowledge; (2) competence and skills held by some specially trained professions ? i.e. professional knowledge; and (3) scientific knowledge held by persons working with abstract and logical procedures (i.e. biomedical knowledge, social science etc).

Hybrid knowledge may be added as a fourth category (4). I argue that the different types of knowledge often express themselves in mixed forms. For example lay knowledge is always an aspect in professional as well as scientific knowledge. Political knowledge is a hybrid form, based on lay knowledge although applies what ever knowledge they find suitable in solving social problems. Administrative knowledge is a combination of political and technical forms. Thus, hybrid knowledge is an amalgamation of politico-administrative, lay and professional types of knowledge.

In this paper I ask whether hybrid knowledge can be found in the public health field related to mental health issues. First, I look into the text production of participants in self help organisations and the main goal is to see how they differ from other texts in the field. Second, I examine new professional texts in order to capture how the mental health clients are diagnosed and treated. I am interested in how terms like "psychiatry" is shifted out with "mental health"; "patient" is replaced with "user" etc. Finally, I analyse the main political documents (Reports to the Storting) in the mental health field and ask how they include the new terminology of the main professional and civil actors. The paper concludes that professional, civil and political texts intermingle, and the texts from the different fields are filled with concepts and rhetoric from the two other actors.

Increasing rates of organ donation among ethnic minorities: community attitudes and challenges for health care systems

Morgan, Myfanwy

Public Health Sciences, King's College London London, England

Jones, Roger

Department of General Practice, King's College London London, England

Keywords

ethnicity, inequality, donation, culture, communication

Rates of deceased organ donation and transplantation vary substantially between European countries. There is also evidence that ethnic minorities across Europe have lower rates of donation and transplantation compared with the majority population but a similar or higher level of need.

This paper first examines organ donation in a European context. It then focuses on the specific situation of ethnic minorities and draws on our survey of ethnic minorities in south London to present data on knowledge and attitudes to organ donation among South Asian (from the Indian subcontinent), Black Caribbean and Black African ethnic groups. This indicates that although supporting the 'gift of life', ethnic minorities have less knowledge about becoming a donor and more negative attitudes to donation. We then draw on qualitative studies of South Asian groups together with our indepth study of the beliefs and concerns of people of Caribbean origin, to examine the religious and cultural beliefs that shape attitudes to donation among ethnic and faith groups. For people of Caribbean origin we identified a key influence as feelings of marginalisation, with significance for trust in doctors and the medical system. This was combined with an idealised desire to retain their body 'whole' and return home to the Caribbean for burial to reconcile at death what has been a divided identity in life. Secondly, we critique the emphasis on community beliefs and attitudes and present an alternative perspective. This identifies a major influence on donation rates as arising from interactions with bereaved relatives and the consent discussion in hospital settings, with evidence that a key influence on consent rates is health professionals' competence in communicating at this time of considerable emotional distress. Such communication is however more challenging and may be avoided or more perfunctory when taking place across an ethnic divide. This points to the importance of a research and policy shift, with greater attention given to cross-cultural communication and support for bereaved relatives. These issues are considered in the context of current debates regarding the future organisation of organ donation in a European context.

Increasing sales of selective serotonin reuptake inhibitors are closely related to increasing number of products on the market

Nielsen, Margrethe

Rigshospitalet afsnit 3343, The Nordic Cochrane Center Copenhagen, Denmark

Keywords

antidepressants, Medicalisation, pharmaceutical

Abstract

Background: During the last 20 years, the usage of antidepressants, especially selective serotonin reuptake inhibitors (SSRIs), has increased dramatically.

Objective: Our primary aim was to compare the usage of benzodiazepines and SSRIs within the primary care sector in Denmark, and to relate changes in usage to number of indications and number of products on the market.

Methods: We used data from a number of sources to get an overview of usage of psychoactive drugs in the period 1970 to 2007. The data were based on the anatomic therapeutic classification (ATC) system and defined daily doses (DDD). We sought data about change in indications and information about products on the market in The Danish Pharmaceutical Catalogue

Results: The sales and usage of psychoactive drugs fluctuated over time in a way that cannot be explained by disease prevalence or by the number of doctors. The fluctuations were mainly caused by changes in usage of benzodiazepines and SSRIs. We found a decline in the usage of benzodiazepines after a peak in 1986, likely because of the recognition that they cause serious dependency and by initiatives on a national level to curb their use. From a low level of usage in 1992, we found that the usage of SSRIs increased almost linearly, and by a factor of 18, up to 44 DDD per 1000 inhabitants, which was closely related to a similar increase in the number of products on the market (a factor of 16 in the same period). In 2007, the sales of psychoactive drugs were so large that almost a fifth of the population could be treated with either an anxiolytic, a hypnotics or an antidepressant continuously.

Conclusions: The sales of antidepressant drug are mainly determined by marketing pressures. The current level of use suggests overtreatment.

Inequalities in Self-assessed Health and Chronic Illnesses: A Study of Eleven European Nations

Reibling, Nadine

*Sociology, Graduate School of Economic and Social Sciences
Mannheim, Germany*

Olafsdottir, Sigrun

Sociology, Boston University Boston, United States

Beckfield, Jason

Sociology, Harvard University Cambridge, United States

Keywords

health inequalities, chronic illness, Welfare State

While the role of social inequalities in health outcomes is well-established, fewer studies investigate cross-national variation in inequalities instead of in overall population health. The existing empirical work on health inequalities has largely focused on mortality and self-assessed health as the central outcome measures. While previous research established robust relationships between these measures and an individual's social position, it stopped short of theorizing diverse causal pathways of how socioeconomic status translates into differences in physical health.

We argue that the debates about theoretical mechanisms can advance by shifting the focus from a general concept of health (as it is measured by self-assessed health) to the diversity of facets which constitute a person's health. This analytical strategy yields the existence of many different pathways, demonstrating that not all illnesses are influenced by the same social conditions to the same extent.

We focus on person over 50 whose health status is very much determined by chronic illness. Using data from the Survey of Health, Ageing and Retirement, collected in 2004, we compare inequality levels for self-assessed health, different types of chronic illnesses as well as the number of chronic illnesses (as a measure for co- and multimorbidity). The results reveal substantial variation in health inequalities across different medical conditions. While a higher level of education or wealth buffers against certain conditions (e.g. diabetes, high blood pressure), we find almost no effect on others (e.g. cancer, asthma). Inequalities also vary dramatically across nations. We find that this variation in the socioeconomic gradient can be partially accounted for by cross-national differences in economic development and welfare state activity. Inequalities are highest for the existence of co- and multi-morbidity which indicates that health inequalities might not so much relate to the existence of certain conditions but to the severity of these illnesses. Consequently, the influence of social and societal effects on health inequalities in old age seems to rely not only on the prevention but also on the effective management of chronic illnesses.

Infertile bodies: women's experience and medical discourses

Augusto, Amélia

Sociologia, Universidade da Beira Interior ? UBI_CES Covilhã, Portugal

Keywords

Body, identity, infertility, embodiment, self

The sociology of the body brought in important contributions to the sociology of health and illness. The proclaimed critic to the biomedical model and to its mechanistic notion of the body redeems the sociological importance of meaning, feelings, emotion and phenomenological interpretation of illness. The relevance of the body raises, though, from issues that are brought upon people by health and illness.

We already know that the experience of sickness can impact upon the sufferer daily life, upon his or hers social relations, identity and sense of self. The body plays a significant role on the identity building process; the construction of the self is inevitably constraint by the limitations that are placed upon the body and that the body places upon us. The rupture caused by sickening, pain or medical care episodes emphasises this dynamic embodiment process and its connexions with the identity of whom experiences them, as well as the social contexts in which they are experienced. Therefore the welcome of the sociology of the body by the sociology of health and illness, understood as a way of promoting the discussion and offering alternatives to overcome dualisms between body and mind, culture and nature, self and society.

Pursuing this line of argumentation, this communications seeks to illustrate the ties between body, self and society, having as analytic focus the experience of women undergoing infertility treatment.

This is a very medicalized arena, of difficult access to lay people, with a social construction deeply rooted in valued cultural assumptions, an arena in which the contact with the medical sphere is mediated by invasive technologies that enhance the medical gaze upon women's bodies.

The subjective perceptions of these women concerning their infertile body and their exposition to reproductive technologies are here confronted with the readings that reproductive medicine specialists make of that same experience. This communication also aims to analyse to which extend the biomedical notion of the body serves as a foundation not only to the discourses and readings of doctors, but also to the discourses and experiences of women.

Integrated community care and emotional exchange networks: The theory and practice of mental health interventions within complex adaptive systems

Hopfenbeck, Mark

Health and society, Gjøevik University College Gjøevik, Norway

Keywords

care, mental, Health, emotions, community

Community-based mental health interventions are by their nature complex: they often involve a large number of actors involved in networks of multiple relationships; system behavior is usually non-equilibrium and non-linear; boundaries are often diffuse and dynamic; conflicts are normal; individual behaviors are generally adaptations to other actors' behavior leading to self-organization; local interaction is fundamental to understanding emergent collective behavior.

Based in part on this realization a project aimed at developing a robust system for integrated community mental health care has been initiated in Eastern Norway. The model is a further development of the open dialogues in network meetings approach originating in Finland (Seikkula & Arnkil 2006). In this form for collaborative home-based social network therapy special emphasis is given to the sharing of emotionally-laden experiences and collective reflections on these experiences.

As part of a larger evaluation project, the author is conducting research on the interactional processes in these meetings using a framework based on recent work on the social networks, exchange and emotions. Results indicate that one of the primary factors influencing successful community mental care is the relational competence of the professionals, including an intuitive understanding of their involvement in complex adaptive systems.

Interprofessional Conflicts in Home-Care: The Case of The Provincial Health Authority of Cosenza (Italy)

Pietro Paolo, Guzzo

Law Science (Calabria University)- Learning Science (Palermo University), University of Calabria- University of Palermo Arcavacata di Rende- (Cs) Italy, Italy

Keywords

Interprofessionality, conflicts, Sociology of Health, Sociology of Law, Integrated homecare assistance in South of Italy

The Health Care and Social Service Professions (Freidson , 1970; Jhonson, 1972; Abbott, 1988; Tousijn, 2004; Venneri, 2003; Edman, 2001) are always at the core of intense transformation processes. Interprofessionality is a principle that should guide the processes of learning between social and health professionals but more often it is the weak point of the welfare systems (Hudson, 2005). I see the usefulness of putting beside studies in international literature about IP (D'Amour and Oandasan, 2005) also a sociological analysis of the conflicts in the IP-work of treatment (Tognetti - Bordogna, 2008). Often they are conflicts mediated by the law (Tomeo,1981), and that on a daily basis debate the diverse social and health professions (doctors, nurses, social workers, therapists, etc.) who are involved in treatment that is dispensed through team work. I will present in heuristic key a theoretical model of Sociology for interprofessional conflicts that intertwine between cycles of institutional integration/ disintegration professionals and intermediation/ disintermediation of knowledge and professional systems. I outline four phases of interprofessional conflict: irreversible; segregating; integrating; transforming. Ultimately I use this model to conduct a case study that I carry out in a particular social health setting: the service of integrated assistance at home (Assistenza Domiciliare Integrata A.D.I.) of the Provincial Health Authority of Cosenza. The study reflects on the recordings of possible situations and dynamics of conflicts between professionals that carry out treatment at home. I interview privileged witnesses from different professions (doctors, nurses, social workers, etc.) in the ADI -teams on the themes circumscribed through a previous in situ observation of the participants. In this direction to identify profiles and phases of the interprofessional conflict in a Health Authority of vast geographical dimensions and with a large number of users, in a region like Calabria that answers to the description of having a welfare which is fragile and divided up. In this specific direction the essay is an experiment, halfway between Sociology of Law and Sociology of Health with particular reference to the theme of the health professions involved in the conflicts that arise from assistance and treatment.

Lay knowledge about Malaria in Mozambique

Rodrigues, Carla F.

*Sociology, CIES/ISCTE - Centre for Research and Studies in Sociology
Lisbon, Portugal*

Keywords

Health, Lay knowledge, Malaria, Mozambique

The discussion on Lay knowledge in health has assumed an increasingly important place not only in sociology, but within social sciences in general. Despite the global recognition of the importance of the lay referral system as an analytical category, it is possible to identify two different approaches regarding to the conception and the status given to lay knowledge. One establishes the division between of lay and expert spheres, reducing the first one to the category of beliefs or "traditional" knowledge. The other tends to focus on the relationship between both spheres, aiming to uncover the structure of power that submit the rationalities and types of knowledge that are of a different nature.

The lay knowledge is acquired, perceived, interpreted, and applied in different ways. The appropriation of knowledge, which was until recently exclusive of expert systems, its construction and legitimacy through the various sources of information, introduce changes in the meanings and uses of various therapeutic resources, and in the relationship between doctors and patients.

The ongoing research claims to discuss the status conferred on lay knowledge in health. The research was supported by semi-direct interviews to mothers with children five or less years old, held in the city of Chókwè, Province of Gaza, Mozambique. These interviews were focused on the lay knowledge and practices concerning to Malária. It was possible to see how the interviewees discourses, as well as their perceptions regarding Malaria and other frequent diseases in the region, are shaped by experiences and through different sources. These discourses and practices are forms and types of knowledge, not reducible to beliefs, that result from a reflective appropriation of expert referrals, as well as from the mobilization and management of various resources of knowledge, which are articulated with their individual and socially shared experience.

Thus, the recognition of the coexistence of a variety of forms of knowledge makes it possible to study health and disease issues in a comprehensive and holistic way, aiming to contribute towards a better understanding of their patterns in the contemporary societies.

Maternity and child health care in transition. Institutional ethnography on Finnish changing care practices

Homanen, Riikka

*Department of Social Research, University of Tampere
Tampere, Finland*

Keywords

work practices, organizational change, Finnish maternity and child health care, agency

The Finnish maternity and child health care (MCH) system is undergoing a vast organizational change that stems from challenging prevailing policy guide-lines. It has been recommended that instead of focusing on medical screening and children already born, care work should direct attention to the social and psychological environment of the child(-to-be), in this case the social unit of 'the family', to prevent future problems. Furthermore, increasing emphasis has been placed on the benefits of multi-professional team work. That is, pooling together experts from the fields of early social and health care of children. Various interventions have been developed and implemented in an effort to bring about change in the existing work practices of MCH.

This paper examines the various ways in which the idea of a family-oriented and multi-professional care is realized in the work practices of MCH by focusing on one specific intervention. The purpose is to explore, from the viewpoint of the clients' agency, the implementation of the so-called family-oriented MCH clinic in one large city in Finland. In the model in question the changes that the MCH system has been subjected to include: the integration of the so-far separate clinics of maternity and child health care, the utilization of the expertise of multi-professional teams in solving the problems of families, and other new working methods to focus on psycho-social support.

The methodological orientation of the study is institutional ethnography, and the primary data analyzed are transcribed video tapes and observations from MCH clinics. Analysis of the data shows that that care work in general is organized in terms of temporality, practicality and taking into account the differences amongst clients. This further suggests that the implementation of new working methods is equally as complex in practice. These kind of multiple 'logics' produce multiple 'clients', who are granted different kinds of agency in accordance with a given situation and site. For example, clients may be produced as mere bodies in a medically defined natural process in some instance, and more like consumer clients with citizen rights or a social family context in another instance.

Medical Services for Vulnerable Groups: Expectations of MSMs and SWs in Moscow and Orenburg region (Russia)

Gorshkova, Irina

*The Institute of Inservice Training for Lecturers in Arts and Social Studies, Lomonosov Moscow state University
Moscow, Russia*

Keywords

SW, qualitative research, MSM, medical services

MSMs and SWs with IDUs have the maximum behavioral risk indicators at this (mainly concentrated) stage of the HIV epidemic development in the Russian Federation.

In April-May of 2008 the author conducted the qualitative research among MSMs and SWs in 3 Russian cities (Moscow, Orenburg, Orsk) . The main research goal was to study the target population attitudes of towards services, interventions and referral systems. The methods: semi-structured focus group, mini-group discussion, in-depth interview, questionnaire. 20 MSMs and 20 street SWs took part in the research.

The research has confirmed that MSMs, SWs have low motivation to testing and treatment in connection with STI and a HIV-infection. One of the main reason: the «official» medicine personnel have no enough counseling skills, including doctor-patient communication and counseling in risk reduction and behavioral change.

What characteristics should have clinics that the target population come there? What is the difference of MSMs, SWs expectations toward medical services in Moscow and Orenburg region?

The respondents expectations consist of two groups: primary and additional. The primary expectations are equal for both groups (the medical personnel? well intentioned/tolerant attitude, professionalism; anonymity/confidentiality). But the rating depends on region. In Moscow the main are tolerance and professionalism. For smaller cities more important is anonymity.

The lists of additional expectations are different for MSMs and SWs. Also Moscow lists are wider. For street SWs is very important the affordable prices (for Orenburg region ? free). Moscow SWs add: doctors? understanding of their employment context ; comfortable clinics location; efficiency of service. For MSMs: safety, understanding aspects of this group/sub-groups. Moscow respondents add comfort and variety of services.

Thus, today?s basic barriers for Russian MSMs and SWs t?ward medical services are: not enough personnel?s tolerant attitudes, insufficient professionalism, uncertainty in anonymity observance.

Mental illness is not always an illness - lay rationalities about mental suffering: a sociological study in the north of Portugal

Alves, Fátima

DCSG, Universidade Aberta - CEMRI

Porto, Portugal

Keywords

sociology of health and illness., Lay rationalities, mental health

Societies relate to madness in accordance with their dominant concepts about the world. Modern rationality has created mental illness as an 'object' controlled by medicine. In lay knowledge the concepts, attitudes and practices associated with mental illness are culturally distant from the scientific representation of body, disease and patient. The semi-periphery condition of Portuguese society allows us to believe that mental illness here contains modern and traditional elements.

This study focus lay knowledge about mental suffering and mental illness. How do people identify, conceive, explain and deal with mental suffering and with mental illness? Data is gathered from interviews with a sample of sixty eight men and women in the north of Portugal.

Results show that the concept of mental illness includes the one of illness (there are ill people) but it always refuses it (mental suffering is not illness). Lay narratives refer to 'ill people' and not to 'illnesses', placing the nosologic holistic entity before the disease. This rationality categorises people in three kinds: the 'ill-people', the 'week-people' (these may turn into ill-people) and the strong-people (these ones succeed in the combat with mental suffering, a normal event during life). Illness clearly is inscribed in the body and its causes can be organic or moral.

In lay knowledge psychiatry has a control role via treatment and exclusion. Social representations emphasize biomedical instead of psychodynamic model. 'Talking' is the most valued therapeutic resource and is the attribute of other dominant professions (psychologists) or professions from the alternative systems. This represents a culture of resistance to psychiatrisation (medicalisation) of mental suffering. And gives relevance to the individual agent ('talking' reinforces individual strength to combat the tendency for turning ill).

Mental illness narratives (concerning 'the others?') and mental suffering narratives (concerning the self) represent a confrontation with the self and its identity. Illness and non-illness are entities allowing individual construction or destruction.

Briefly, this research found that lay relationship to mental illness (in medical language) is made of diverse, complex and multiple logics. It proposes the concept of lay rationalities, in plural, about mental suffering and illness.

Mood Disorders and the transforming mental health care in Finland: The case of education and guidance

Hautamäki, Lotta

*Department of Sociology, University of Helsinki
Helsinki, Finland*

Keywords

education, Welfare State, mood disorders, mental health

Mood Disorders (Depression and Bipolar Disorder) are among the most common and disabling mental disorders. World Health Organisation estimates that by the year 2020 Depression will be the 2nd leading contributor to global burden of disease (DALY). Furthermore, Mood Disorders epitomise a cultural climate, where a wide range of feelings, behaviours and traits of a human being have become to be understood as something that can and must be treated as illnesses. This situation has challenged the mental health policy and care both nationally and EU-widely.

This paper takes a perspective into these transformations and challenges of European mental health care through the analysis of education and guidance provided on Mood Disorders in Finland. The paper reports the preliminary findings in an ongoing PhD study analysing mood disorders in the Nordic welfare state of Finland from 1970's to the present. The aim of this paper is to take into consideration the ways psychiatric knowledge and mental health policy reach the layman through education. The analysis is based on a diverse array of qualitative data: printed and Internet based guides, manuals, questionnaires and mood charts, as well as lay experiences and perspectives on a discussion forum. The perspective of the analysis takes its inspiration from the writings of Michel Foucault and his followers, as well as the Actor Network Theorists.

The paper will first introduce the problematisation of Mood Disorders as inadequately diagnosed and treated public health problems in Finland. Then, the paper will go more deeply into one of the preventive means to meet this challenge: education and guidance directed to laymen. It is suggested that the practice of education forms a technique of mood control. As a technique of mood control, education provides ways to manage daily life with Mood Disorders and more profoundly creates the spaces of possibilities to become the subject of one's own life. Moreover, it is shown how the practice of education reflects the transformations in the dynamics of the different actors in the field of mental health care and psychiatry in Finnish society.

Negotiating Madness: Doctors, patients and the construction of gendered insanity in fin de siècle

Ahlbeck-Rehn, Jutta

Women's Studies, Åbo Akademi University Åbo, Finland

Tuohela, Kirsi

*Department of Cultural History, University of Turku
Turku, Finland*

Keywords

Gender, history of psychiatry, women's history, history of mental illness

The paper explores who or what "owns" or legitimizes the story of mental illness. In so doing, it aims at critically examining how knowledge of illness is produced by particular subjects and discourses, thereby putting who/what the subject of the story is under scrutiny. The paper focuses on female patients in the late nineteenth and early twentieth century, using various historical materials. Gender and its relations to patient subjectivity, the psychiatric discourse and illness are addressed. In this paper we point to different discourses and narratives produced both by patients and psychiatrists.

One of our interests lies in exploring how female mental patients were (re)presented in the Finnish psychiatric rhetoric of the early twentieth century; hereby examining how women's mental disorders were narrated in powerful discourses. Psychiatric texts are here regarded as collections of different narratives, several voices, and various representations of the "insane". Secondly, we draw upon women's self-written stories of their mental illnesses; more specifically we examine some female writers from the late nineteenth century. Women writers we discuss lived with mental illness, but expressed their suffering very differently: some of them described it in intimate diaries whereas some of them wrote in public. These women struggled to be acknowledged as knowing subjects of mental misery and as narrators of their illness. Based on this autobiographical material we suggest that illness can be seen as a disease of the Self; something which is integrated to subjectivity and identity through writing and narrating. It can also be the focus of a social drama where the borderlines of normality and abnormality, health and sickness are negotiated.

By contrasting and discussing both authoritative and personal accounts of mental illness, we wish to broaden the notion of knowledge production in regard to madness and mental suffering. Our paper points to power and gender relations in particular encounters - some narratives and voices become heard, whereas others are being marginalized and silenced.

Outsourced Services and Hierarchy in the Finnish Primary Health Care

Tiilikka, Tiina

*Department of Social Research, University of Tampere
Tampere, Finland*

Tolkki, Helena

*Department of Social Research, University of Tampere
Tampere, Finland*

Keywords

Hierarchy, outsourcing, primary health care

This paper is concerned with the hierarchical changes in public health centres after outsourcing. We analyse the significances and connotations that the staff gives to the change of inter-employee relationships after outsourcing. The paper is a part of ongoing research about competitive practices in public health care.

The research data consists of group interviews of general practitioners and nurses conducted in three outsourced health centres. The interviewees have experience working on both private and public sector. The approaches used in analysing the data are sociological cultural studies and narrativity.

How does the low organisation structure of outsourced health care services influence the hierarchy between different groups of medical staff? The results indicate that there has been a change both in division of labour and in the hierarchy between nurses and doctors after the outsourcing. The professional borderline between nurses and doctors is less clear than before and there seems to be a growing tendency towards equal partnership. Our goal is to deepen the understanding of health centres' transition to privately provided services from the employees' viewpoint. This is done in the context of the changing organisational practices that lay behind the new order of hierarchy.

Over-education in Europe: how stable is the impact of education on depression?

Pattyn, Elise

*Sociology, University of Ghent
Ghent, Belgium*

Bracke, Piet

*Sociology, University of Ghent
Ghent, Belgium*

Van de Velde, Sarah

*Sociology, University of Ghent
Ghent, Belgium*

Keywords

depression, education, cross-national comparative research, multilevel

Objective: The beneficial effect of education on mental health is a consistent finding in social epidemiology. Question is whether this effect has changed with the further expansion of higher education in Europe, following the baby boom. This paper focuses on the effect of education on depression, over and beyond value orientations -self-determination and achievement- and present job characteristics -insecurity, stress and decision control-. Additionally, we study if the effect of education on depression varies according to the mean education level of each country's population.

Method: The sample exists of the working population of 21 European countries between 25 and 60 years old (N=17.770), based on data of the European Social Survey, Round 3 (2006-2007). Depression is measured using an 8-item version of the Center of Epidemiological Studies-Depression scale. A multilevel model was estimated by means of the Mixed Model procedure in SPSS.

Results: Each additional year of education attained reduces the amount of depressive complaints reported. The beneficial effect of education persists when current value orientations and job characteristics are considered, adjusted for confounding factors such as gender, age and income. Self-perceived job insecurity, stress and pursuing achievement increase the number of depressive complaints, while job decision control and self-direction reduce them. Moreover, the cross-level interaction between education and aggregated level of education turns out to be significant, taking economic development and unemployment rate into account. The positive effect of education on mental health erodes as the general education level of the population rises.

Conclusion: This study confirms the importance of education in explaining the social gradient in mental health. Even when current job characteristics and value orientations are taken into account, the direct effect of education persists. Nevertheless, our study shows that the acquired educational credentials have diminishing returns on mental health. Hence, over-education seems to limit the ameliorating effect of education on mental health.

Paediatric medication: the new European regulations

Chamak, Brigitte

*CESAMES, INSERM, Université Paris Descartes
Paris, France*

Keywords

paediatric medication, European regulation, American model, psychotropic drugs, conflicts of interest

The new European regulations in favour of paediatric medication, adopted in June 2006, used the same arguments as the Food and Drug Administration (FDA) in the 1990s, namely that imposing clinical trials to check the effects of medication on children makes it possible to improve the efficiency and safety of these paediatric products. In the USA, the FDA Modernization Act (1997) granted 6 months additional exclusive marketing rights to pharmaceutical companies which conducted FDA-approved paediatric studies. Since 2006, the same incentive has been granted, in Europe, to the pharmaceutical companies which conduct paediatric studies. To better understand the possible consequences of this incentive, we analyzed the American experience since they have already adopted this regulation a decade ago. At the end of the 1990s, clinical trials involving children increased substantially. At the same time, the broadening of the diagnostic criteria of numerous disorders, such as hyperactivity, bipolar syndrome, autism and phobia, was introduced in the new international classification of diseases. The new regulation and classification both contributed to increase the prescription of psychotropic drugs to children and adolescents in the USA after 1999. The number of drugs put on the market with new indications for the use on children's psychiatric disorders has grown enormously in the last decade. The 1997 Act led the industry to make a big profit thanks to the blockbusters, such as Prozac, but do not favour innovation. The FDA acknowledged that 76% of the new therapeutic agents are only slight innovation compared to the existing treatments whereas the mean price is twice as much. The results are disappointing: paediatric research for therapeutic agents which are no interest to the companies are conducted by the Foundation for Paediatric Research. At the same time, companies take advantage of the legislation and minimize the huge side effects of psychotropic drugs for children and adolescents. Furthermore, the conflicts of interest between the renowned psychiatrists who participate in redefining the mental pathologies and the pharmaceutical industry, have been given large media coverage, especially since the investigation carried out by the American Congress last summer.

Parental Education and Adulthood Obesity

Lima, Ivar

*Ageing, Norwegian Social Research
Oslo, NORWAY*

Veenstra, Marijke

*Ageing, NOVA
Oslo, Norway*

Keywords

life course, education, parental education, obesity

Background: Obesity is increasing in Norway, similar to the rest of the world where it has reached epidemic proportions. Less physical activity in daily life and easy access to cheap high energetic food are among the main general causes. In most countries obesity is more prevalent among people of lower than high socioeconomic status. To gain understanding of obesity as a social phenomenon it is important to distinguish between the effects of own educational level versus parental educational level.

Objective: To evaluate the effect of parental versus current educational attainment on obesity in Norwegian men and women between 26 and 49 years.

Methods and materials: Cross-sectional survey data from the Norwegian Lifecourse Generation and Gender study (LOGG). Overall response rate of the study was 60 % (N = 15,156). The analyses in the present paper are based on 10,700 respondents with valid answers to the postal part of the survey. Reliable data on own and parental educational attainment is available through official registers, with few missing cases.

Results: Preliminary findings indicate that educational level of the father has a strong association with adult obesity for women, but not for men. When we control for own educational attainment we find that parental education has both a direct and an indirect association with obesity for women. In Norwegian men only own education has an effect on obesity. We also find that mother's educational attainment has a stronger effect for men than fathers education, while the opposite is true for women. In general both parental education and own education are better predictors for obesity in women than in men.

Obesity leads to many health risks. In addition, obesity is socially stigmatized. Educational attainment is connected both to social status, life chances, psychosocial resources, and culture. We use theories of education and lifestyle to discuss our findings. Why does father's educational attainment influence the risk of obesity among adult women, even after controlling for own education? Why is educational attainment in general a better predictor for obesity among women than among men?

Parental health and social inheritance. The effect of parental disability on sibling correlation among Finnish young adults

Erola, Jani

*Turku Institute for Advanced Studies, Turku School of Economics
Turku, Finland*

Karvonen, Sakari

Social and Health Policies Unit, National Institute for Health and Welfare Helsinki, Finland

Keywords

Health, Siblings, Social Class, social inheritance

The effects of parental status on children's health and further, to children's own adult social status have been extensively studied during the recent years. The consistent finding is that part of the influence of parental status is transmitted to children's status through health. However, social mobility itself is largely unaffected by health differences and it may be that the link between parental status and the health differences of children is weakening in societies that become more equal.

Less is known of whether the health of parents affects health related social mobility and inheritance. Health of parents can have an impact on the children's social status in many ways. It may be that some parental positions are worse than others because they are associated with poorer health. Also, health can have effect independent of status e.g. because of its impact on incomes and social connections in the long run. Poor parental health can also have psychological effects that may, for example, have an impact on the educational choices of the children.

We employ Finnish census panel data, to analyse the effect of parental disability pension on the sibling correlation in early adulthood social class for the children born in 1966-70. The occupational data covers around 16.000 children in 1995 and 2000, who are matched with their parents.

The analysis revealed that even in a relatively equal society such as Finland, where social inheritance was generally weak, parental health problems had an impact on the inheritance of social status. For the siblings among those families in which at least one of the parents had been on disability pension during youth the sibling correlation was weaker than for the children in other families. In our paper we analyse the extent to which the effect is explained by parental status differences (before disability pension), the length of pension, differences in the permanent income accumulation among the parents and educational choice of the children.

Patient as individual or part of the hospital machinery -tensions in hospital ward

Lämsä, Riikka

*Department of Social Policy, University of Helsinki
Helsinki, Finland*

Keywords

patient, hospital ethnography, contradictions

The social situations and practices of the hospital ward are determined and build by different human, social and technological elements. Situations and practises constitute multidimensional processes and hybrids where different kind of agents, interests, ways of thinking and acting, and logics of action encounter. I focus on especially those situations and practises where tensions, contradictions or conflicts emerge. What kind of different ways of thinking or logics of action are found behind the contradictions and why they are contradictory?

The ethnographic data was collected by participant observation on three internal wards in southern Finland in 2006 and 2008. The data includes episodes written down by the researcher, sickroom observations, interviews and documents like patients' files.

The data shows the principal difference between the logics of actions is localized between the ideal of the patient's individuality and a need for the hospital to be productive and effective. This tension appears especially 1) in way how hospital governs the patient's time, 2) as the alternation of privacy and publicity and 3) in discharging practices. In my presentation, I will focus on privacy and publicity in the hospital ward and show for example how hospital machinery considers textual as private whereas verbal as public.

Personalised healthy diets and practices of eating. Facing a genetic turn in dietary advise

Niva, Mari

-, National Consumer Research Centre
Finland,

Keywords

practices of eating, personalised diets, nutrigenomics, healthy eating

The bioscientific discourse on food and health is increasingly focusing on what is termed as nutrigenomics, nutrigenetics or nutritional genomics ? a field that studies the interaction between nutrients and gene expression and investigates the role of diet and genetic variation as risk factors for chronic disease. The new field is envisioned to facilitate the development of new foods, services, diets and technologies to prevent, mitigate or cure disease as well as to make possible individually tailored health-optimising diets that are based on the genetic makeup of individuals.

In recent social debates on nutrigenomics attention has increasingly been drawn to the ethical, legal and regulatory issues relating to the study of human genes. However, the applications of nutrigenomics also have a potential to transform the meanings of food and eating as well as to further individualise and medicalise the ways that people eat. So far the study on the social and cultural implications of the new technology on the level of everyday life is still in its infancy.

The aim of this paper is to discuss the possible encounters of nutrigenomics and the everyday practices of eating, and to develop the theoretical basis for an empirical study that focuses on the social and cultural conditions for nutrigenomics in the context of everyday life. The starting point of the paper is the notion of practices of eating as both individual and collective modes of doings and sayings, thought and activities. Through the use of a practice theoretical approach to the study of food and health the paper discusses the potential changes in everyday eating, in lay notions of genes, food and health, and in people?s ways of promoting and maintaining their health that may result as a consequence of nutrigenomic information and its dietary applications.

Pets in the context of individual-related services

Pohlheim, Katja

Faculty of Sociology, Bielefeld University Bielefeld, Germany

Keywords

care, interaction, individual-related services, human-animal-relation, pets

Pets in the context of individual-related services

Pets in the context of care are not rare anymore. In Germany more than three-quarter of all retirement homes own pets and most of them allow the inhabitants to bring their pets along. But there are no sociological studies on the influence of pets on aging. The medical and psychological studies explore the effects of pets on patients. In Germany one can find two different types of animal service in care-organisations: pet visiting services and organisation-owned pets. A third possibility is that inhabitants bring their pets along. Finally, we find pets that live in homes of outpatients.

Patient-caregiver interactions are an important part of care work. Objects of care-labour are not material things but human beings with feelings and needs. So this kind of work cannot follow only learned and specified rules, but instead calls for quite a bit of intuition and the ability to forge links to patients. With specific patient categories - people with dementia or mentally disabled - communication in a normal way is mostly impossible. Yet it is very important for caregivers to develop contact with these patients. Increasingly, pets are perceived as very helpful in this respect. It is already well-known that pets exercise a positive influence on our health as well as being social catalysts and a resource of communication. These properties are used in the context of care and so pets are also a kind of service provider.

The main topic of my research is if and how interactions in care change because of the presence of pets. There is not only the intended interaction between patients and pets but also between caregivers and pets. This changes also the interaction between caregivers and patients, so my thesis. Questions connected to this are: How is it possible to establish such "new methods" in care? Do working-conditions change for caregivers in the presence of pets? Does this establish a new job market?

Power and Resistance: Privatising Postcommunist Health

Watson, Peggy

Sociology, University of Cambridge
UK, <http://www.nowhutastudy.info>

Keywords

Poland, Capitalism, hospitals, DEMOCRACY, health protests

It has become almost axiomatic among some international policy experts that one source of support for the current global shift in favour of the liberalisation of health care and the formation of two-tier health care systems is the widespread repudiation, after communism, of all things associated with that regime. Yet of all the momentous changes that have taken place in postsocialist Europe over the last two decades, perhaps the most contentious have been in the field of health care. Nowhere has this been more obvious than in Poland, where the struggle over the privatization of health services has lasted around ten years, in fact, ever since the introduction in 1999 of major health care reform. This paper puts forward a framework within which to analyse health care transformation in postcommunist Europe, highlighting the way in which such transformations differ from the liberalisation of health care in the West. Rather than erasing the frictions which have become an integral feature of health care transformation within Poland, the paper examines what lies behind them, and why they remain relatively invisible to transnational health policy discourse. The aim is to gain insight into the social processes health care transformation has involved in practice. Why has it provoked such resistance, and what is the relevance for a European health discourse which currently emphasises empowerment, the preservation of equity and the importance of trust? In addressing these questions the paper draws on interviews and on official and media reports collected before, during and after health care reform.

Practical knowledge about health: an interplay between lay and science rationalities

Ferreira da Silva, Luisa

Social Sciences, Cemri - Universidade Aberta

Porto, Portugal

Keywords

Health, lay rationalities, well-being

Background

Health promotion aims the enlargement of individuals' ability to make healthy choices. Scientific knowledge about risks for health is nowadays well disseminated. However several studies confirm there is a big hiatus between about "healthy" knowledge and healthy practices (D'Houtaud e Field 1989; Calnan and Williams 1991; Blaxter 1998).

This paper is about the interiorisation of "healthy" as a norm for life, namely, the norms of food and exercise and the promotion of health in old age.

Methods

A qualitative study through in-depth interviews with a sample of 81 Portuguese adults. Material analysis is referred to "grounded theory" (Glaser e Strauss cit by Gerhardt 1989): interviewee's discourses are the basis for analysis without previous categories; analysis is interpretation authorised by previous social theory that is systematically reviewed. Facts are viewed in the context of symbolic context and social structure in order to enlight what is being transmitted by them in the process of communication (Geertz 1989).

Results

The lay meaning for healthy contains the essential knowledge of medical information about healthy lifestyles. But lay healthy meaning is a subjective meaning where cultural values, popular concepts, living conditions and modern ideology are associated to rational norms in order to adapt knowledge to practical life; individual choice is fashioned by structural conditions and social values; popular ideas about health and the body together with modern ideals of youth and body construction prevent from the logic expectation of ageing and illness; experience supports popular beliefs against epidemiology.

Conclusion

Results show that lay rationalities are different from scientific rationality. This allows some conclusions as regards public health policies. From the individual point of view, education for health needs to take in account the way people think and live and their reasons for living those ways: health is a support for happiness and not its equivalent. From the collective point of view health promotion must consider the importance of changes in social environment.

Pregnancy prevention, reproductive health risk, and morality: a perspective from public sector women's clinics in St. Petersburg, Russia

Larivaara, Meri

Health and Social Welfare Services, National Institute for Health and Welfare (THL) Helsinki, Finland

Keywords

russia, Risk, reproductive health, gynaecologist, Contraception counselling

Use of reliable contraception remains lower and rates of induced abortion higher in Russia, when compared to Western Europe, even though reliable contraception has been better accessible for nearly two decades. Due to the organisation of women's health services in Russian cities, gynaecologists could have a major influence on women's contraceptive choices, but little is known about their attitudes and practices that are related to contraception promotion. This study draws on qualitative observation and interview data of gynaecologists (all women) in public sector women's clinics in St. Petersburg, Russia's second largest city, in order to investigate their perceptions of various birth control methods and contraception counselling. Clinical counselling practices are also examined. The results reveal that gynaecologists had up-to-date knowledge of the most recent contraception methods and they were willing to promote their use. Gynaecologists' ideal of counselling and doctor-patient interaction can be best described as maternalistic. This is very close to what is traditionally termed paternalistic interaction pattern, but gynaecologists emphasised their role as caring, warm, well-meaning maternal figures, who are willing to accept full responsibility of the clinical decision-making and focus on patients' individual interests. In practice, gynaecologists took active role in counselling, although the coverage was not wall-to-wall. The depth of counselling varied considerably and counselling practices were mainly paternalistic. Maternal warmth could be seldom observed. Yet in about one-third of observed cases, interaction pattern differed clearly from paternalism and patient preferences were incorporated into clinical decision-making. Gynaecologists perceived reliable contraception essentially as a means of avoiding harmful health consequences of induced abortions and fostering future fertility. Using reliable contraception was equated with being a responsible and morally respectable woman. The results suggest that links between health, risk, and morality are vividly present in contraception counselling in St. Petersburg, and reliable contraception has become a powerful source of new moral demands for individual women to foster their reproductive function.

Problems and difficulties of immigrant's access to health care services in Lisbon

Bäckström, Bárbara

*DCSG, Universidade Aberta / Cemri
Portugal,*

Keywords

Health Office, Immigration, Access to health services, Integration

This text results from an undergoing study which seeks to understand some of the migrant health problems and more suitable ways to better invest in the improvement of immigrants access to health care through the information collected at the health office of the National Immigrant Support Centre (CNAI), by identifying major health problems, main difficulties and obstacles related to the use of health services, and the solutions that are found for each situation.

A qualitative study was conducted, covering the analysis of documentation available and the observation of the situations visiting the health office with the registration of the history and the narratives of each case observed and analysed.

The 148 cases analysed are of citizens coming from 18 different countries, mainly from three different regions: Palop, Brasil and Eastern Europe. One preliminary analysis shows that some of the problems are connected with family reunification and the obstacles met by the members of the family on the use of the health services. There are also persons coming for treatment in Portugal who need financial and social support or are irregular and wish to have the health card. Some services refuse to treat them or ask them to pay the highest rates even when dealing with pregnant women and children, sometimes because they are undocumented or only because they never contributed to the social security.

The study will permit the intervention within the areas where the problems are identified, the improvement of the health care services, the achievement of a better model of integration, and the articulation between the different institutions involved. It will also result in recommendations for the public health sector and health policies, with impact on the improvement of migrants' health and resolution of some of their major problems.

Professional vulnerability and analysis of the well-being in the nursing profession in Belgium

Decleire, Céline

*Département de sciences politiques, sociales et de la communication, Facultés universitaires Notre-Dame de la Paix (FUNDP)
Namur, Belgium*

Burnay, Nathalie

*Département de sciences politiques, sociales et de la communication, Facultés universitaires Notre-Dame de la Paix (FUNDP)
Namur, Belgium*

Derycke, Hanne

*Department of Public Health, Ghent University
Ghent, Belgium*

Braeckman, Lutgart

*Department of Public Health, Ghent University
Ghent, Belgium*

Vlerick, Peter

*Department of Personnel Management, Work & Organizational Psychology, Ghent University
Ghent, Belgium*

Hasselhorn, Hans-Martin

Institute of Occupational Health, Safety and Ergonomics, University of Wuppertal Wuppertal, Germany

Roussel, Sandrine

Ecole de Santé Publique, Université Catholique de Louvain Woluwe-Saint-Lambert, Belgium

D'Hoore, William

Ecole de Santé Publique, Université Catholique de Louvain Woluwe-Saint-Lambert, Belgium

Keywords

work conditions, professional vulnerability, intent to leave, nursing profession, work intensification

Since the beginning of the 80's, the health care's modernisation took up a predominant place in the reforms carried out in Belgium. These current transformations are characterized by a rationalisation's will of the material and management (De Troyer, 2000; Durant, 2006). The technological progress, the emergence of new pathologies, the demographic evolution and the budget cost-containment contributed to a structures' revitalization, a healthcare's area organisation and thoroughly new management methods coming from the industrial field.

These managerial changes lead to redefine the nursing profession. The transformations of the working conditions weaken the subjects and produce vulnerabilities at work. Even if the nurse profession in Belgium is characterized by a relative employment security, professional vulnerability is not absent of working conditions.

Cross-sectional self-report survey data collected in a large sample of Belgian nurses were analysed. Indeed, based on the European NEXT-study (Nurses' early exit survey), where close to 4300 nurses have been surveyed in Belgium, this communication will attempt to underline the existing relationship between nurses' vulnerabilities in their work conditions and their intent to leave their present employment or their profession. Therefore, different vulnerability's indicators will be analysed: financial conditions, professional competences' recognition, relationship with hierarchy, relationship with colleagues, the meaning given to the work, stress, professional autonomy and work intensification. These indicators come partially from the Paugam's theory which job insecurity is defined through two dimensions: the 'employment' axis and the 'work' axis. If the professional vulnerability can not be analysed through the job insecurity for the nurses' future, it is though really present inside the nurse practice, in the work axis. (Paugam, 2000).

This communication will show how much the current changes in the nurse profession in Belgium encourage some of them to leave definitely their profession in order to start a different career. These professional transformations are partly due to the importance given to the work well-being and to the professional recognition. Results will be presented at the time of the conference.

Psychoactive drugs in General Practitioners' and Psychiatrists' medical practice: building a professional legitimacy

Zózimo, Joana

Sociologia, ISCTE

Lisboa, Portugal

Keywords

psychiatric drugs, prescription, psychiatrists, general practitioners

This presentation will be based on a research work which I recently began within my Master Degree in Sociology of Health and Illness with the aim to consider both theoretically and methodologically the extreme importance psychoactive drugs can have to legitimate the work of the medical specialties that prescribe them most. Although research on psychopharmacs is a well developed area in social sciences, mostly on their addictive effects and on the effectiveness of this kind of therapy compared to others, our aim is to assess in what conditions these type of medicines are prescribed, to understand the logics of prescription and its social meaning within the medical specialties that prescribe them more frequently. Two specialties stand out in this field: general practitioners (GP) and psychiatrists (P), as the main prescribers of psychoactive drugs. If the latter have historically taken care of the mentally ill, the first have worked on very different domains, mostly oriented to Public Health. Therefore, we believe that these two specialties ? being so different in their practice ? are of major interest for research in Sociology of Health and Illness if we notice their point of convergence: the prescription of psychoactive drugs. If we take into account, when analysing this matter, the importance given by our society to technology in general, but particularly in the medical profession, since technology (at least theoretically) allows better diagnosis and therapeutics, and allows health practitioners to assert its professional knowledge and skills, we would understand that GP and P have little technological apparatus to work with. This work aims, therefore, to point out how psychopharmacs, being one of the most developed areas of the pharmaceutical industry, can constitute a technological apparatus capable of professionally legitimise those medical specialties before their patients eyes and the eyes of society at large. We hope, thereby, to demonstrate the significance of psychoactive drugs prescription in the daily practice of these actors.

Reflections on the History of Medical Treatment of Opioid Addiction in Finland

Selin, Jani

*Department of social sciences and philosophy, University of Jyväskylä
Jyväskylä, Finland*

Keywords

genealogy, Apparatus, opioid addiction, substitution treatment

The Finnish drug addiction treatment system has experienced transformation from domination of psychosocial approach to drug addiction to a more medically-orientated approach during the past two decades. This is the case especially in relation to the treatment of opioid addiction and substitution treatments have become integral part of the treatment of opioid addiction. The prevailing explanations of this transformation have emphasised the process of medicalisation through which social problems are recoded as medical problems, the emergence and adoption of harm reduction policy alongside traditional Finnish control-orientated drug policy, and the progress of medical sciences with their new findings with regard to addiction. In this paper the aim is to problematise and contextualise these general explanations. This aim is attained through careful analysis of medical writings in two Finnish medical journals between 1965 and 2005. The analysis is based on the theoretical perspectives of genealogy and archaeology of knowledge developed by Michel Foucault. From this perspective the focus of the analysis is on the different levels of change in the apparatus of addiction that consists of treatment techniques, ways of knowing and conceptualising addiction, and aims of addiction treatment. Starting point of the paper is that it is on these different levels of change that the causes contributing to the acceptance of substitution treatment can be found.

Reorganizing modes of action in community child and adolescent psychiatry

Isabelle, Maillard

Université Paris V - René Descartes - Faculté de sciences humaines et sociales, CESAMES (Centre de Recherche Psychotropes, Santé mentale et Société ? CNRS UMR 8136, INSERM U611, Paris 5) FRANCE,

Keywords

policies, mental health, psychiatry, adolescence, network

In less than one half-century, french psychiatry has undergone deep institutionnals transformations. Since the sixties, the vertical logic which characterized the closed institution has become horizontal with the multiplication of services in the community. In the last fifteen years, mental health and psychic suffering in teenagers and young adults have become major social issues. To adress them, new public policies (since 1990) were designed which redefine psychiatry?s perimeter of action. The aim of this thesis is to analyse these transformations in France, where very few studies by social sciences exist. The hypothesis is that new public policies of mental health and psychic suffering in teenagers (and young adults) operates a reconfiguration of action in mental health and psychiatry (and not a psychologisation of social problems according to the theory of social control), in two mains directions : first, the system of action in mental health implies a multiplicity of professionnals and institutions who have no used to work together, until short while ; second, the action in psychiatry turn towards autonomy (self-governement, and not social control, moralisation or emancipation in accordance with educational ideal until sixties in disciplinary society) by accompaniment of personnal trajectories and developpement of capabilities (empowerment). It is examined through the analysis of national and local public policies, of the lines of tensions that they create among professionals, and of how they reframe action and its modes. I propose to present the mains results of this research and to develop one aspect like ajustements of action in community psychiatry concerning teenagers far away from mental health institutions (and professionals), without demand of care, and for which the face to face meeting is not adapted. The analysis of the speeches of professionals of psychiatrie and their partners shows that two mains registers of action are invested by the actors. The first one is situated between ?to make with? teenagers without demand of care and ?arouse to make (it)? ; the second register consists ?to make with? the circle of acquaintances, professional or family, of the teenager rather than ?make nothing? with teenagers remote from institutions of care.

Reporting on public health education and research capacity: a pilot

Wieseneder, Elisabeth

Health Management in Tourism, FH JOANNEUM Bad Gleichenberg, Austria

Grasser, Gerlinde

Health Management im Tourismus, FH JOANNEUM Bad Gleichenberg, Austria

Keywords

public health report, professional workforce, Health capacity

Background

Due to complex transformations and reforms in health care systems, it is important to be capable to manage new arising public health challenges. In some countries (like Austria) public health capacity - as described by the Australian New South Wales Health Department (NSW, 2001) ? is considered to be low. Consequently it is important to provide policy makers with information on capacity to encourage actions. Since public health reporting is supposed to be the basis for policy decisions, public health reports should also include information on public health capacity. Therefore the aim was to identify and test indicators to be used in public health reporting to describe public health capacity with a main focus on education and research on a provincial level.

Method

Based on the concept for capacity mapping of Mittelmark et al adequate indicators from the Health Research System Analysis Initiative were chosen and adapted to reflect public health education and research capacity. In a second step relevant institutions were identified via an internet based research. Telephone based interviews with representatives of the selected institutions were conducted. The data was finally analysed in qualitative and quantitative ways.

Results

To describe public health educational capacity indicators like the number of educational organisations, the number of lecturers and their qualification and number of students were used. In terms of research capacity following indicators were identified and adapted: the number of research institutions, of employed researchers, of publications and ways of financing research.

Conclusion

An extensive mapping analysis is according to Mittelmark et al ? especially in public health reporting - not possible. The method used in our study enabled us to give a rough indication of the public health capacity. For instance it was shown, that public health capacity is limited, since there was only one lecturer and researcher trained in public health identified in the analysed education and research institutions. However, the final quantity and quality of public health education and research capacity remains to be clarified. Indicators need further development and testing, especially in terms of getting a more complex insight into the contents of the curricula.

Research engagement, dissemination of activism and health governance: the case of rare disease organizations in Portugal

Filipe, Ângela Marques

*NECTS, Centre for Social Studies, University of Coimbra
Coimbra, Portugal*

Matias, Marisa

*NECTS, Centre for Social Studies, University of Coimbra
Coimbra, Portugal*

Nunes, João Arriscado

*NECTS, Centre for Social Studies, University of Coimbra
Coimbra, Portugal*

Keywords

patient organizations, Research, rare diseases, Governance, activism

Over the last decades, new patient organisations have emerged in several parts of the world, contributing to the opening up of spaces of participation and governance in the fields of health policy, health care and research. An increasing number of these organizations are of the type described by V. Rabeharisoa and M. Callon as related to the 'war on diseases'. They have put scientific, cognitive and therapeutic activism at the core of their action at the political and social levels. The EPOKS (European Patient Organizations in Knowledge Society) project, funded within the EC Science and Society Program, seeks to investigate the contribution of patient organizations to the production of knowledge and to the governance of knowledge production through a comparative approach of the situation concerning four health conditions, including rare diseases, with a focus on the emergence and the role of European coalitions in this field.

These new collective actors have often engaged in new forms of intervention, acting as mediators between heterogeneous actors, promoting coalitions at the national and transnational - namely European - levels, and entering domains, such as research, previously regarded as the territory of medical and health professionals.

Within this collaborative project, empirical work was carried out in France and Portugal by researchers from CSI (Ecole Nationale Supérieure des Mines, Paris) and CES (University of Coimbra), characterizing and comparing rare and/or orphan disease organizations' modes of engagement in research and dissemination of scientific activism and the implications of these processes in health governance. Preliminary results based on a survey and interviews carried out in Portugal are presented and discussed.

Risk and ideologies of prevention: contextual rationalities in the consumption of therapeutical resources

Raposo, Hélder

*Ciências Sociais e Humanas - Área de Sociologia, Escola Superior de Tecnologia da Saúde de Lisboa
Lisboa, Portugal*

Keywords

Risk, lay rationalities, prevention, Therapeutical Resources

The notion of risk is underpinned by a rationalist approach and understanding of reality that presupposes the control of uncertainty through the development of statistical procedures and mathematical probabilities. Its disseminated use reflects a trajectory of success in its diffusion throughout several domains of employment, and it is today part of the way how we came to see and act upon reality, inasmuch as the world as turned increasingly numerical and yields gradually sophisticated modalities of statistical measure and categorization.

One of the fields in which is visible the relevance of statistical quantification as a privileged policy strategy is that of public health, namely by means of an epidemiological approach that highlights the idea of prevention. Through a population focus which encompass large numbers of people that may not necessarily have symptoms, rather 'risk factors' that may lead to illness, it is becoming progressively evident the reconfiguring of the notions of health and illness, which are changing from being dichotomized as categories to being ever more diluted in a continuum marked by different levels of risk. Therefore, by identifying certain social groups as being 'at risk?', the preventive strategies look for determining 'using measure, modelling and classificatory instruments' causation patterns that make less relevant the idea of randomness in illness and in death. By doing this the preventive strategies direct the risk diminishing discourse not only towards changes in life styles of the population but also towards prevention logics in face of a new category of pre-problems increasingly sustained by epidemiological criteria and statistical evidence.

Based on a research being undertake in Portugal over therapeutical consumptions, the proposed presentation tries to underline the social inscription of risk, discussing the ways in which the syncretic and conjunctural nature of the lay knowledge is defined by concrete circumstances that relate to contextual rationalities moulding the attribution of meaning towards risk and towards the role played by therapeutical resources as a strategy of its potential prevention.

Risk behaviors and social representations on health among portuguese population

Urbano, Claudia Valadas

*CesNova - Sociology, Faculty of Human and Social Sciences - New University of Lisbon
Lisbon, Portugal*

Keywords

risk behaviors, social representations, Health

Opinions about specific topics are summaries or even examples of social representations about these issues and the cultural models that they represent. Issues such as those related to the consumption of psychoactive substances, and that are associated to risk behaviour, speaking in health as well as in social terms, can produce a diversity of opinions and practices.

The drug use or drug abstinence - as of those substances that can cause harm to each one's health, such as alcoholic drinks, tobacco and drugs without medical prescription -, is an example of the way people act against health issues. According to many researches, use depends on the social characteristics of individuals: prevalences differ by gender, age, region, substance and other socio-economic and socio-cultural variables.

How people reconcile representations and practices in health matters? Healthy behaviours correspond to social condemnation of unhealthy practices or opinions can be different from practices? Healthy behaviours are compatible with addictives behaviours? How can health-living cultural models be managed?

We will try to answer some of these questions using data from the national survey on the use of psychoactive substances in Portugal, in 2001 and 2007, to a representative sample of 15,000 individuals. Our approach will focus on the concept of risk, trying to understand the social representations on risk behaviours and the way they affect one's health and health practices.

Should all citizens be treated with antidepressants? Explanation possibilities to the increasing antidepressant treatment. Antidepressant treatment in a modern society

Nielsen, Margrethe

*Rigshospitalet, department 3343, The Nordic Cochrane Centre
Copenhagen, Denmark*

Reinbacher, Gunnar Scott

*Department of sociology, Aalborg University
Aalborg, Denmark*

Keywords

Governmentality, Medicalisation, antidepressant treatment

Background: Since the late 1980s sales and prescribing of newer antidepressants have increased dramatically in most European countries. We will use usage development in Denmark as an example. (Rose, MN). However the prevalence of depression is expected to be rather constant.

Objective: The primary aim is to analyse possible explanations factors that could add knowledge about the increased usage of antidepressants.

Methods: We will describe the development in usage of newer antidepressants in the European countries in the light of the socio-economic societal development with the ideal of self-realisation and emphasising individual characteristics as flexibility, mobility, innovation, enterprise, willingness to change and adaption and vigourousness. The period we focus on is from 1988 and up to today, which correspond to the period characterised by increase of antidepressants.

The societal development in this period also encompass change in the way the depression diagnose is made, with respect to the criteria for the disease but also the development of diagnostic tools. The pharmaceutical industry have improved their marketing of the products and through disease aware campaigns a special picture of the disease and its treatment is communicated throughout society.

Further we will through three different sociological explanations, identify the explanations with the strongest explanation sturdiness.

First the concept of medicalisation. Throughout many years there has been a discussion on how powerfull groups in society such as the government, the industri, the professionals and many other groups are influenzing the citizens and make them use drugs much more than needed. The article will redefine this concept to a more narrow definition used in this paper.

Second the biopolitical concept focusing on the modern medical science, molequalar biopolitics, the experts in social life and the capitalization of life itself.

Third the concept of governmentality in modern societies, how relationship between government and citizens, as well as health professionals and patients are changed throughout new theories of power.

Social Class and Health Inequalities in Portugal

Antunes, Ricardo

CIES, ISCTE-CIES

Algés, Portugal

Keywords

Illness, death, Social Class

The main objective of this investigation is to analyse the effects of the social structure on the unequal patterns of morbidity and mortality in Portugal. The inequality distribution of the diseases and the causes of death, reveals a structure of social inequalities based in the differentiated possibilities in the access and in the use of health resources. For this purpose, the present research is already placed in two different and heterogeneous regions of Portugal. One, in an urban and more developed region (Lisbon), and the other, in a poorer and more rural region (Alentejo). Alentejo has the lowest life expectation in Portugal. The objective is to compare different social structures, under the hypothesis that the geographical inequalities in health are also a reflex of geographical social inequalities. The methodology is based in a complementary of quantitative and qualitative approaches. Empirical investigation is located on the individual level, based on the reading of the Hospital Individual Clinical Process of people who died in 2004, from two hospitals. One located in Lisbon and the other in Alentejo. In each Clinical Process social and health dimensions are being collected and analysed. Social dimensions based on indicators like professions, education skills or housing conditions, and health dimensions based on type of diseases, individual knowledge of the disease, hospital admissions, causes and age of death. Currently, the first part of the investigation is almost finished with the reading of approximately 1100 cases from Alentejo, and 1200 from Lisbon. So far the analyses of the information confirmed the central hypotheses. People located in a higher social class have a higher expectation of life and different types of diseases.

Social inequality in obesity: An exploration of practices related to health and personal bodyweight in contrasting everyday lives

Holm, Lotte

Department of Human Nutrition, Copenhagen University Frederiksberg C, Denmark

Hardman Smith, Louise

Department of Human Nutrition, Copenhagen University Frederiksberg C, Denmark

Keywords

Keywords: Obesity, social inequality, everyday life.

To deepen the understanding of the impact of social inequality on obesity, the reported study compared the ways in which understandings of health and personal body weight are enmeshed in the everyday lives of people with different social background. Drawing on practice theory, the study asks how perceptions and enactments of health and personal body weight are related to social structures and practices in work, spare time and family life. Qualitative interviews focusing on life history and current everyday life were conducted with two groups of individuals. One group contained highly educated individuals of normal weight. The other contained individuals with less education and body weights above the obesity threshold. Recommended healthy body protocols complied more readily with established practices and internalized ideas of those in the highly educated group than they did with practices of those in the less educated group. Work environments and conditions connected with work carried over into spare time and family life further promoted the integration of healthy lifestyles in the daily habits of the highly educated normal weight group. In the less educated group with high BMI the opposite occurred.

Social networks and the deinstitutionalization of mental patients

Portugal, Sílvia

*Centre for Social Studies / School of Economics, University of Coimbra
Coimbra, Portugal*

Nogueira, Cláudia

*Centre for Social Studies, University of Coimbra
Coimbra, Portugal*

Keywords

Family, Social Networks, mental health care, deinstitutionalization, formal and informal health care

Portugal is experiencing a process of deinstitutionalization of mental patients which needs to be studied and evaluated in what concerns its effects. The 1998 Mental Health Act establishes that care is primarily provided at the level of the community and that local services constitute the base of the national system of mental health. But the fact is that local services of mental health have not been created, rehabilitation units are scarce, socio-occupational and residential programs are inadequate. Thus, there is an urgent need to study the effects of this inconsistent process of deinstitutionalization on patients and their families.

This paper focuses on this question, addressing the impact of deinstitutionalization on the lives of patients, the relations between healthcare institutions and citizens with mental illness, the role of families and social networks in providing care to patients, and the articulation of formal and informal mental health care.

The paper presents the preliminary results of a qualitative research on this matter, analyzing interviews to mental patients and their formal and informal carers. The study shows that: 1) state action is characterized by weakness and inefficacy; 2) deinstitutionalization policies show a discrepancy between premises and outcomes; 3) healthcare policies have been following the model of deinstitutionalization, but have not actually put it into practice; 4) the action of the family and primary social networks is characterized by flexibility and efficacy; 5) deinstitutionalization entails a burden for families.

Sociological and Ethical Aspects of Clinical Trials - From the Nuremberg Code to ICH-GCP Guidelines and Beyond

Szathmari, Milan

Institute of Sociology and Social Policy, Corvinus University of Budapest Budapest, Hungary

Keywords

ethics, clinical trials, patients? rights, pharmaceuticals

My purpose is to lay down the basics of interpreting and analyzing the rapidly growing phenomena of clinical trials. In my interpretation the spread of clinical trials is the fulfillment of empirism in medicine. Patients are treated in a standardized way according to the protocol of the trial. The results of tests on individual patients are connected in one single database. Only by this it is possible to detect rare adverse events (lack of adverse events=safety) and to evaluate efficacy (efficacy= heals the illness) of the investigational medical product (IMP). Pharmas are constantly controlling each other by double-blind, randomized, active- and placebo-controlled trials in which they compare their own IMP with a registered medication of another pharma and with placebo. Mandatory reporting to competent authority ensures that a product inferior to placebo or of bad safety profile cannot stay on the market.

Just a foretaste of the wide range of ethical considerations: It is not proven empirically yet that the IMP is safe and effective. To find out, the IMP has to be tested on many patients ? who all seek treatment when turning to the physician. This brings us to the issue of ?therapeutic misconception? of patients, the validity of the Patient Informed Consent, patients? trust in their physicians, the ?recruiting doublespeak? and the (financial) conflict of interests of investigators. Being randomized to the placebo arm per se means not receiving treatment. Randomization and blindness means that the physician does not know what substance his/her patient is getting. Early phase trials often do not have any therapeutic intention. Clinical research on special populations like people with cognitive impairments, children, captive populations needs special attention. Trials in emergency situations (e.g.: stroke, heart attack) cannot be conducted with prior consent of patients. Shall they be conducted at all?

On the other hand, access to clinical trials (once exclusively conducted on vulnerable populations) became a privilege, especially for patients suffering from incurable diseases. The current exclusionary practice toward women and racial minorities will result in medications biased towards white males, the dominant group in the society and in the clinical research.

Struggling to remain independent - How Finnish women told about early retirement in their illness narratives

Lillrank, Annika

*Swedish School of Social Sciences, University of Helsinki
Helsinki, Finland*

Keywords

independence, illness narratives, Early retirement

This paper tells the story of what and how Finnish women diagnosed with chronic back pain told about early retirement in their illness narratives. Early retirement was experienced as a biographical disruption, because their identity and life-course expectations were strongly embedded in wage work. They belong to an after war generation of Finns who have internalized ideas of wage work as central to their identity and citizenship.

Narratives are defined as identity performances. The performance approach asserts that narrative identity is a continuous but fragmented process. Narrative identity means that the identity of the self is discovered and created through storytelling. Narrators tell themselves and others about who they are - and who they would like to be, in the stories they tell and how they tell them (Andrews 2007).

The data were collected through an autobiographic writing competition, organized in 1999 by the Department of Social Policy at the University of Helsinki, Finland. From the entire data, consisting of 165 individually written narratives, 26 female narratives telling about early retirement were selected. These protagonists are between 28-56 years of age. By emphatic reading as an analytic strategy, my aim was to try to understand the protagonists' illness related experiences. Three different ways of performing narrative identity were discerned; "The disability paradox", "Struggling to survive", and "Ambivalence in relation to self, and society", highlighting how chronic back pain and early retirement were processed.

The protagonists jointly struggled to remain as individually independent as possible and emphasized their ability to control their painful bodies. The Finnish cultural norm tends to emphasize mental independence and ignore the fact that individuals cannot be truly independent from their bodies. On the contrary, chronic illness means losing one's bodily independency. In the health care practices the norm of individual independency are stronger than a bodily impairment. The protagonists jointly acknowledged this cultural split between mental independency and bodily dependency. Also this made explicit that the Finnish culture and the health care system lack practice to discuss bodily dependency with dignity.

Suffering bodies: an exploration of the missing link between the body and self-identity in the dying process

Hilario, Ana Patricia

Health and Social Care, Royal Holloway-University of London, CIES-ISCTE

Portugal, <http://www.cies.iscte.pt/en/investigadores/ficha.jsp?pkid=256&a=-2014553570&subarea=licenciados>

Keywords

deteriorating bodies, social identity, dying process, personhood, terminal illness

In this paper I propose to discuss the extent to which the decrease of the body's ability to act as the agent of one's embodied actions leads to the disintegration of self-identity. The relation between body and self-identity appear to be problematic for chronically ill patients especially for those who are nearing death since they tend to suffer lastly bodily losses. The comprehension of how the lack of corporeal capacity of self-containment affects patients' self-identity involves an understanding of the meaning attributed to these bodily experiences and the social context in which they occur. The literature (e.g. Armstrong-Coster, 2004; Charmaz, 1995; Lawton, 2000) suggests that patients are confronted with a loss of self and social identity when their bodily boundedness and integrity became impossible to restore. By examining central themes of reference, arguments and examples of how the process of change and loss is experienced by chronically ill patients over their dying process I intend to explore the ways in which the deterioration of the physical body and lack of self-containment leads to a loss of personhood and social identity or what one may call a form of social death.

System disintegration, social disintegration and health in the former Soviet Union

Abbott, Pamela

Social Sciences, University of Aberdeen aberdeen, UK

Wallace, Claire

*Social Sciences, University of aberdeen
Aberdeen, UK*

Keywords

Poverty, lifestyles, Health, disintegration, disempowerment

The collapse of the former Soviet Union was marked by a rise in mortality and morbidity with the rise in mortality amongst men in mid-life due to cardiovascular disease being especially striking. Epidemiological and sociological explanations have focused on lifestyles which included heavy smoking, drinking, lack of exercise and poor diets as the primary causes while acknowledging that stress, the decline of the public health services and the rise in poverty are also likely contributory causes. Less attention has been given to exploring the causes of increased morbidity which has been especially noticeable in women. In this paper we test three hypotheses: that the decline in health in the former Soviet Union was due to poverty; was due to health lifestyles, and; to system and social disintegration. We do so utilizing data from a survey carried out in eight post-Soviet countries: Russia, Belarus, Ukraine, Moldova, Armenia, Georgia, Kazakhstan and Kyrgyzstan. We found contrary to common opinion, smoking and drinking were not strongly correlated with subjective health and nor was diet. Poverty was an important factor however, but most important of all was social disintegration and a sense of disempowerment and control over daily life. We conclude that under circumstances of rapid social change, the breakdown in social integration and, malaise and anomie becomes more important than the usual determinants of poor health. We develop this explanation in terms of a theory of system and social disintegration arguing that subjective health can be used as an indicator of the effects of social and economic change.

The "double burden": a qualitative study about unhealthy prisoners in Italy

Esposito, Maurizio

Human and Social Sciences, University of Cassino Cassino (Fr), Italy

Keywords

communicable disease, Health, prisoners, qualitative

Background: Several international studies, confirmed in Italy too, show a hard presence of communicable diseases inside the prisons and the jails. This paper deals in particular with the "living" and impact of imprisonment on the health of prisoners with Hcv, Hiv virus and with acclaimed Aids.

Methods: Qualitative study involving adult male prisoners in three Italian prisons (Secondigliano-Napoli, Rebibbia-Roma, Dozza-Bologna). 60 individual semi-structured interviews were conducted.

Results: Life in the prison for persons with serious communicable disease is conducted inside a sort of "double burden", given by a limitation of liberty connected to a limitation of wholesome aspects of life. Illness and sickness inside the prison seem to imply above all: fatalism toward the future, a deep sense of guilt, a clear fear, a feeling of alienation and self-marginalization. Donald Clemmer defined "prisonization" as the taking on in greater or lesser degree of the folkways, mores, customs, and general culture of the penitentiary; in this sense, it seems that disease in this context is no more a specific fact, but "disease in the prison" exists as a sui generis fact.

Conclusion: This paper has the main aim to give voice to persons who often have none, despite the right to health is sanctioned as a fundamental right by the Italian Constitution, as stated in Article 32 Clause 1: "The Republic safeguards health as a fundamental right of the individual in the interests of the public and guarantees free medical treatment to the needy"; this is the only section where the word "individual" - and not "citizen" - is used, suggesting treatment should be as general, equal and integrated as possible. The health of prisoners is not only a specific problem of the inmates but regards all the society: problems linked with the social cost in the health system of prisons cannot - and must not - be contained inside the world of confinement, but concern the wider context of public expense and social/cultural environment, as well as the model of treatment of the National Health Service in its entirety.

The (opaque) practices of taking care of personal health: empowering laypeople through technology

Piras, Enrico Maria

eHealth Unit, Fondazione Bruno Kessler Trento (Povo), Italy

Zanutto, Alberto

*Dipartimento di Sociologia e Ricerca Sociale, Università degli studi di Trento
Trento, Italy*

Keywords

Narrative Analysis, medical narratives, Personal Health Record (PHR)

We present a reflection on the growing role of laypeople in their own care through the analysis of a new ICT, the Personal Health Record (PHR). According to Medical Informatics, PHR is a web-based technology that will allow everyone to manage, share and access medical records, a tool to create and keep active a personal network of formal/informal caregivers but also an instrument to help creating a new doctor-patient relation. We conducted a preliminary study to identify the health-related needs of ordinary citizens so to create a PHR to be implemented at a regional scale (500.000 people roughly) in northern Italy.

We elicited medical narratives, revolving around the existing health records kept at home, to study how people manage their health. We conducted 50 in-depth interviews focusing on a) how people manage their medical record and b) how the records are used to build shared account between patients and doctors. The analysis show that people, even the non-ill, are implicitly asked by the healthcare system to carry on some tasks to keep the service provision running smoothly. This work, unrecognized as such (opaque), is mainly the information management needed to keep all doctors on the same page and the coordination work needed to make doctors job easier. The analysis of the health record keeping patterns led us to identify three different strategies: ?minimalistic practices? ? when there is a simple unstructured record repository-; ?erratic practices? ? when health issues require a highly tailored constant rearrangement of data to sustain the medical interventions; ?network practices? ? when the health problems of an individual are managed by an ad hoc constituted network of caregivers.

We argue that the rhetoric of patient empowerment underestimates the responsibility of patients/citizens, progressively charged with the burden of being constantly accountable to healthcare professionals.

We also argue that while often considered as results of larger scale decisions, technologies do reshape social roles and redistribute responsibilities among the networks they are part of. The study of the making of health-related technologies, though, can provide a thought-provoking perspective on the healthcare sector and its policies.

The access to fertility treatments in Portugal: patients' uses and meanings

Silva, Susana

*Department of Sociology, University of Minho
Portugal,*

Keywords

Portugal, Access to fertility treatments, infertility, social inequalities

This paper is about the infertility patients' accounts of the access to fertility treatments in Portugal. Its main objective is to contribute to the debate around the social, economic and geographic inequalities on the access to these treatments. The empirical research involves 15 semi-structured interviews with patients undergoing fertility treatments in Portugal.

There is no insurance coverage of assisted reproductive technologies in Portugal. In 2007 the Portuguese Government has announced the intention of expanding the access to fertility treatments through a set of economic measures. In order to fulfill this purpose, the Government established partnerships with the private health sector.

The interviewees' choices between public or private IVF clinics depend on economic, social and organizational elements, namely the following ones: the financial costs involved in the treatment; when the couple expects to start the treatment (some Portuguese public IVF clinics have a long waiting list); the kind of medical care they wish; and their place of residence. The interviewees report practices which they have developed to minimize the inefficiencies of the Portuguese health system concerning the fertility treatments' domain, such as: buying medication in Spain (where the fertility drugs are cheaper); benefiting from a health professional subsystem that finances fertility drugs or treatments; or choosing a clinic with ethical guidelines which are seen as more adequate to their own values.

The political and social mobilization of the interviewees depends mainly on their individual motivations, claiming the access to more health care resources, which should be cheaper, faster and friendlier. However, these motivations are also associated with the interviewees' views on broader social, cultural, ethical, political and economic problems, for instance the debates about social equality, political priorities and the privatization of the health system.

I conclude that it is important to conceive local and global interventions in order to prevent the marketing of reproductive health. In the case of Portugal, this means to guarantee an equal accessibility to fertility treatments; to resist to the privatization of reproductive health care and to assure its quality and efficacy; and to promote affordable simplified reproductive technologies methods.

The demand for aesthetic surgery in Italy: a quantitative and qualitative analysis

Ghigi, Rossella

Education Sciences, University of Bologna

Bologna, Italy

Keywords

survey, depth interviews, commercialization of medicine, aesthetic surgery

This paper focuses on contemporary aesthetic surgery market in Italy. Even if its history is longer than one could imagine, since it was practiced already at the beginning of the twentieth century, it has reached an unprecedented dimension in last twenty years. Media usually attribute its major change to the fact that it now involves people more and more differentiated: men as well as women, younger as well as older people, lower as well as higher classes. This paper, tries to reassess this change, cutting it down to size. For this purpose, after making a brief comparison among different European countries about the way aesthetic procedures are taken into account by health care and insurance systems, an integrated analysis has been developed using both quantitative and qualitative data collected in Italy in 2005-2006.

More precisely, the quantitative analysis based on the outcomes of an original survey conducted on a sample of 5060 individuals, tries to evaluate at what extent people of different ranks, classes, educational levels, age and gender take aesthetic surgery into consideration.

Qualitative interviews I made in three Italian cities to patients as well as to aesthetic surgeons, have been gathered in order to understand at what extent aesthetic surgery is accepted and legitimated by public and professionals as something relevant to 'health and wellbeing?', and how practices and discourses differ from the stereotyped imagine media offer of cosmetic surgery even when trying to legitimate it. These results also contribute to an assessment of discourses about the hypothesis that health care systems take cosmetic surgery into account.

The Impact of Professional Identities, Professional Dialogues and Interaction within the Health, Social and Educational Services

Holmesland, Anne-Lise

Unity for research, Soerlandet Hospital Trust P.O. Box 26, Vindern, Norway

Keywords

dialogue, professional identity, network intervention

Objective: To explore the effect of how professional identities and professional dialogues are being negotiated when professionals working in the health, social and educational services are invited into the therapy room in order to contribute to a better health for persons in different kinds of crises or with mental health problems.

Method: Two focus groups consisting of professionals with experience of network meetings with adolescents were conducted. One group consisted of professionals working in the healthcare sector; the other group consisted of professionals working in the social and educational sector. Each group met twice. Topics related to interdisciplinarity, multi-agency work, dialogues, reflection, professional expertise and identity within network meetings were discussed.

Results: During the project the professionals revealed different knowledge and perceptions of the concept of dialogue. This may have implications and create problems in order to provide a better health care service for young people with mental problems. By including professionals from both the municipality and the national special health care sector it became possible to explore the dynamic interaction regarding their different work background and education in the focus groups dialogues. Problems connected to communication patterns and professional identity seemed to be especially important.

Conclusion: It seems apparent that network intervention involving different professional groups may shed light on both limitations and benefits for the professional dialogues that are created. An approach focusing much upon interdisciplinary dialogues and multi agency participations seems to be appropriate in exploring how different professional groups consider their therapeutic dialogues and their contribution to provide a better health for persons in need of mental health treatment.

Abstract for the 9th European Sociological Association Conference, RN 16 Sociology of Health and Illness. Lisboa, Portugal
September 02-05 2009

Anne-Lise Holmesland, Research fellow.

In cooperation with:

Jaakko Seikkula, Professor, University of Jyväskylä, Finland,

Berit Grøholt, Professor, University of Oslo, Norway,

Tom Erik Arnkil, Professor, University of Helsinki, Finland

The implementation of medical advances: the constitution of Intensive Care Medicine as new speciality in a central hospital

Xavier, Beatriz

*Departament of Sociology / PhD student, Faculdade de Ciências Sociais e Humanas da Universidade Nova de Lisboa
Lisboa, Portugal*

Keywords

medical advances, Medical sociology, hospital work

Medical work is mediated by sophisticated technological means. The 'transformative power' of technological innovation regarding health, illness and the body, and even the concept of human life, can be illustrated by the case of Intensive Care Units.

In the last half of the twentieth-century, we have witnessed the emergence and development of one of the most technologically significant areas in the field of Medicine - Intensive Care Medicine. This is a differentiated and multi-disciplinary area in the field of medical sciences whose primary goal is the support and recovery of life functions in order to treat an underlying illness, generating, in this way, opportunities for better quality of life in the future to come.

The number of Intensive Care Units has been increasing steadily by various technological, medical and social reasons. Equality and the universality of citizenship rights, scientific development and improvement in the services, exert constant pressures with regards to the treatment of patients in intensive care, originating ethical and medical controversies.

Beyond the discussions held by institutional actors, which kind of participation do patients, their families, and society in general, have in debates regarding notions of death and quality of life? How is that distinct cultural assessments materialize in the care of patients with a life threatening condition? How can we encourage the public participation of the common European citizen in decisions regarding complex medical and scientific questions?

Thinking in different views of risk and uncertainty among medical staff, patients and families, we intend to know how they are negotiated and applied in a hospital work unit.

In Portugal, the creation, organization and development of Intensive Care Units does not depend on specific norms or the strategic planning of health. Rather, intensive care is established in view of local needs and perceptions, financial constraints, and the 'will' of particular health institutions, which has resulted in a detachment of the general public from such debates and issues.

The meanings and the logic of the processes of the new competitive practices in the Finnish primary health care services

Palukka, Hannele

*Department of Social Research, University of Tampere
Tampere, Finland*

Keywords

competition, cultural studies, health care services

The aim of the presentation is to unravel the meanings and the logic of the processes of the new competitive practices that have been adopted by primary health care during the last two decades in Finland. Adopting a cultural studies perspective, the presentation sets out to explore the way in which the municipal officials make sense of their own position and their own actions in a given historical situation, which is characterised by a pronounced of individualism and competition. The aim is to understand how the municipal officials see the recent shift to the competition oriented policies in the primary health care.

The material for the presentation consists of five interviews with municipal officials who were liable for the subscribing of the primary health care services during the years 2005-2008 in three Finnish municipalities. The material is a part of the larger data for the ongoing research project concerning the outsourced health care services in Finland. The research data is qualitative and the approach exploits viewpoints of sociological cultural studies and narrative analysis. The study will enter the debate on the recent change in values and organization of the health care system and achieves an understanding of the change in the welfare state from the perspective of individual actors.

The mutual expectations of GPs and their patients in lifestyle counselling: results of focus group discussions in the context of the Austrian Periodic Health Examination

Malli, Gerlinde

Health Services Research Methods and Program Evaluation, Institute of Health Promotion and Prevention Graz, Austria

Reichenpfader, Ursula

Health Services Research Methods and Program Evaluation, Institute of Health Promotion and Prevention Graz, Austria

Keywords

focus groups, physician, lifestyle counselling, physician-patient relationship

Background

Since 2005 the program of the Austrian Periodic Health Examination (PHE) has reinforced the role of physicians in lifestyle counselling. In addition to routine clinical examinations, physicians intervene in modifying lifestyle behaviours like alcohol consumption, smoking, exercise or nutrition.

Aims

The responsibility for individual health care has shifted from a physician-oriented approach to a patient-centred one. We focused on general practitioners' role perceptions as 'lifestyle mentors' and on perceived implementation difficulties. We were particularly interested in perspectives on effectiveness and self-efficacy of physician lifestyle interventions.

Methods

Focus group interviews were carried out with five discussion groups of general practitioners. The qualitative method obtained in-depth information on the topics mentioned above. Two facilitators made a group of about 5 members discuss the topics. The collected data were audio-taped, transcribed and analysed by means of MAXqda.

Results

GPs view lifestyle advice and communication with their patients as essential. Their attitude towards the effectiveness of lifestyle intervention is rather realistic, though. They are aware of the multi-factorial nature of illness. Their patients rarely change their unhealthy habits. On the other hand, patients expect too much of PHE as an "all-inclusive"-health check-up. Doctors rate conditions for lifestyle counselling not particularly favourable.

Conclusion

GPs perceive themselves as lifestyle counsellors differentiating themselves from their colleagues in other medical disciplines and from commercial lifestyle counsellors. They have to cope with a variety of problems and conflicts in PHE implementation. They do not succeed in a substantial lifestyle-modification of their patients.

The Pleasures of Nightlife Tourism

Tutenges, Sébastien

Centre for Alcohol and Drug Research, Aarhus University Copenhagen, Denmark

Keywords

effervescence, nightlife tourism, Youth

Vacations at international nightlife resorts form an important and valued element in the lives of youth in many countries. Resorts are located throughout the globe in places such as Cancun in Mexico, Had Rin in Thailand, Ibiza in Spain and Sunny Beach in Bulgaria. All kinds of risky behavior have been associated with these tourist destinations including immoderate drinking, drug use, fighting, and sexual promiscuity. This dubious reputation does not scare away young tourist, perhaps quite to the contrary.

The paper will shed light on the behaviour and experiences of young Danish tourists at the nightlife resort, Sunny Beach. Focus is on youth in the ages between 15 to 30 years. It is argued that the notion 'effervescence' captures some of the essence of what young Danes strive for and occasionally experience at Sunny Beach. The young deliberately let go of their self-control and indulge in systematic transgressions of norms and rules. Relatively few of the tourists use drugs, but the majority engage in heavy binge drinking. Sexual experimentation is also common. The paper will draw on various thinkers who have written about effervescence including Emile Durkheim, Georges Bataille and Michel Maffesoli.

The paper is based on fieldwork at Sunny Beach during the summers 2007 and 2008. The author of the paper and four assistants collected the data. Various methods were used including surveys, field observations and tape-recorded interviews.

The Role of Education and Generalized Trust for Psychological Well-Being in West-Europe

Valeeva, Rania

*Sociology, Ghent University (Belgium)
the Netherlands, <http://www.psw.ugent.be/HeDeRa/>*

Bracke, Piet

*Sociology, Ghent University (Belgium)
Belgium, http://www.psw.ugent.be/HeDeRa*

Keywords

personal education, generalized trust, welfare state regimes of West-Europe, psychological well-being

The present paper aims to empirically investigate the role of an actor's generalized trust and education for an actor's psychological well-being under the conditions of several West-European welfare state regimes. The state of psychological well-being means in this study how happy and satisfied person is. To answer the study questions we analyze actors' production of psychological well-being through developing models based on the insights and concepts from several sociological theories (Lindenberg, 2001; Coleman, 1990). The main proposition in this study is that an actor's education and generalized trust have a beneficial influence on the psychological well-being. Recent empirical studies have shown the presence of positive effects of personal education on the psychological well-being: people have reduced psychological well-being if they are lower educated (Helliwell & Putnam, 2005). The effects of personal education on psychological well-being can be either direct or indirect. Generalized trust, which means the belief that others around you can be trusted, could well be a mediator here, because on the one hand generalized trust facilitates psychological well-being (Helliwell & Putnam, 2005), and on the other hand it is determined by the years of education (Helliwell & Putnam, 1999). Our study model predicts that the effect of personal education on the psychological well-being is mediated by the actor's generalized trust. Subsequently, we hypothesize that less educated persons are less trusting than their more educated counterparts, and that those actors who are less trusting are more likely to have reduced psychological well-being. Moreover, we consider the possibility that people's perceptions of well-being and generalized trust could also be influenced by certain characteristics of the environment in which an actor is embedded, some of which could facilitate or hinder actors' well-being and trust (Coleman, 1990). To test the study hypotheses the data are employed from the cross-national European Social Survey performed in 2004/5. The countries included in the present analysis are Austria, Belgium, Denmark, Finland, France, Germany, Greece, Ireland, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Portugal, Spain, Sweden and the United Kingdom. The statistical analyses of the data, using multilevel analyses, provide support for a number of the study predictions.

The Role of Trust for Choices of Additional Health Resources in the Conditions of Educational and Contextual Constraints in West-Europe

Valeeva, Rania

*Sociology, Ghent University (Belgium)
Amersfoort, The Netherlands*

Bracke, Piet

*Sociology, Ghent UNiversity
Ghent, Belgium*

Keywords

generalized trust, health resources, personal education, welfare state regimes of West-Europe

The present paper aims to empirically investigate whether an actor's personal education, generalized trust and contextual embeddedness influence his or her choice to mobilize additional health resources. Additional health resources mean in this study private or public resources which are able to provide health support. To answer the study questions we analyze actors' choices of health resources through developing models based on the insights and concepts from several sociological theories (Lindenberg, 2001; Coleman, 1990). The main proposition in this study is that the choice of additional resources is facilitated by personal education and generalized trust. Recent empirical studies have shown the presence of positive effects of education on the mobilization of health resources (Ross & Wu, 1995). The effects of personal education on the mobilization of resources could be either direct or indirect. Generalized trust, which means the belief that others around you can be trusted, could well be a mediator here, because on the one hand it is determined by the years of education (Helliwell & Putnam, 1999), and on the other hand it facilitates the mobilization of resources and plays an important role in personal interactions (Barrera, 2005). Our study model predicts that the effect of personal education on the mobilization of additional health resources is mediated by the actor's generalized trust. Subsequently, we hypothesize that persons are more trusting if they are more educated, and that those actors who are more trusting are more likely to mobilize additional health resources. Moreover, we consider the possibility that people's decision or choice to mobilize additional health resources could also be influenced by certain characteristics of the environment in which an actor is embedded, some of which could facilitate or hinder actors' choices (Coleman, 1990). To test the study hypotheses the data are employed from the cross-national European Social Survey performed in 2004/5. The countries included in the present analysis are Austria, Belgium, Denmark, Finland, France, Germany, Greece, Ireland, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Portugal, Spain, Sweden and the United Kingdom. The statistical analyses of the data, using multilevel analyses, provide support for a number of the study predictions.

The striking stability of disease prestige rankings

Album, Dag

*Department of Sociology and Human Geography, University of Oslo
Oslo, Norway*

Keywords

Prestige, symbolic capital, Disease, Priorities, Medical culture

Investigations have shown that the prestige of diseases is ordered hierarchically. These results have been attributed to characteristics of the diseases, their typical treatment and their typical patients. Diseases associated with technologically sophisticated, immediate and invasive procedures in vital organs located in the upper parts of the body are given high prestige scores, especially where the typical patient is young or middle-aged. At the other end, low prestige scores are given to diseases associated with chronic conditions located in the lower parts of the body or having no specific bodily location, with less visible treatment procedures, and with elderly patients. Prestige differences is of sociological interest in itself as an aspect of medical culture, and also because prestige can affect informal decisions on allocation of resources in health care systems.

The paper discuss data from two cross-sectional surveys of disease prestige done in 1990 and 2002 with the same type of sample of Norwegian doctors and using the same questionnaire. Outcome measures were ratings on a 1-9 scale of the prestige these respondents believed most health personnel would accord to a sample set of 38 diseases. There were only minor differences in results between the surveys. This stability was unexpected, as there have been some changes in therapeutic practice over these years.

The paper aims at explaining the found stability. Findings in the first survey were much discussed in Norwegian medical settings, and it is necessary to ask whether this may have influenced answers in the second. Another question about research methods concerns the validity of data given by the opinion poll research design. Results are further compared to those of other studies of informal evaluations of medical practice and linked to theories of prestige and related concepts such as symbolic capital, cultural status and stigma. Changes in treatment in the period between the surveys are taken into account. The paper's conclusion is that the pattern of informal evaluation of diseases is so solidly ingrained in medical culture, that only major changes in medical practice can affect it.

The Trouble With White Pants: Reconsidering medicalisation through the menstrual suppression debate

Gunson, Jessica

Centre for Research on Families and Relationships, University of Edinburgh

UK, <http://www.cfr.ac.uk/>

Keywords

agency, Gender, Medicalisation, Reproductive Technologies

This paper revisits the concept of medicalisation and considers its value as a framework for understanding the ongoing development of new reproductive technologies, and their impact on women's reproductive decision-making. In particular, this evaluation is couched within a qualitative discourse analysis of the public debate about the use of extended cycle oral contraception (ECOC) to suppress menstruation in the United States of America in 2003/4. Firstly, this debate is broadly mapped to illustrate the usefulness of thinking of medicalisation as a contest within and across different fields. It is posited that medicalisation occurs in a particular social and cultural moment, and is a dynamic process where dominant social relations can be both reproduced and challenged. Secondly, the online narratives of women discussing ECOC on an Internet message board are used to explore the productive nature of agency in this particular medicalisation contest. Specifically, the ways in which these women engage with the discourses of 'risk' and 'choice', as canvassed by menstrual suppression advocates, are shown to reveal accommodation and modification as much as resistance and contradiction. Thus, it is argued that agency is evident in the ways women transform the publicly contested meanings of ECOC through their narratives of experience. This paper suggests that if the concept of medicalisation is to have ongoing traction as a frame of analysis, such a critique must incorporate a generative discussion of agency. It is posited that instances of medicalisation, such as the take-up of ECOC for suppression of menstruation, be understood as complex contestations of meaning where agency is produced through the transformation of discourses in everyday narratives.

The universalisation of the access to health care services and the persistence of health inequalities among Spain's Roma population

La Parra, Daniel

Instituto Universitario de Desarrollo Social y Paz, University of Alicante Alicante, Spain

Keywords

Roma, health status, health services, health inequalities

Spain's National Health System has since 1986 become a universal health care system. This process has allowed the non-working population and those living in worse socioeconomic or legal circumstances (foreign population, people with scarce economic resources, ethnic minorities) to access health services. This paper explores the access to health care of Spain's Roma population using data provided by the first national health survey of the Roma community (2006; 993 respondents) and comparing the results with data from the National Health Survey for Spain 2003 and 2006 (29,478 cases).

Methods

A comparative analysis between the levels of access to health care services (general medicine, hospitalisation, emergency care, preventive practices among women, dental and oral health, use of medicines) and the state of health of Spain's Roma population, and the rest of the population using data from the national health survey by social class and sex.

Results

The universalisation of health care has promoted patterns of access among the Roma community similar to the rest of the population regarding general medicine services, hospitalisation, emergency care services and access to medicines. However, the Roma population show a worse state of health, particularly in older age groups, which in some cases means that they use these services more frequently than the general population. As for services not provided by the national health system or those services addressed to disease prevention (rather than services dealing directly with diseases), the levels of access are insufficient or inadequate: dental and oral health, preventive practices among women, access to aids to improve the patients' sight or hearing.

Discussion

A higher level of access to the health care system is a contributing factor to the reduction of health inequalities. Nevertheless, social factors (economic situation, discrimination, etc.) play a more important role. A better understanding of the cumulative effect on the lifecycle of the social determinants of health and a follow-up of the health situation of the Roma population would be necessary to improve the interpretative framework of the impact of inequality on the health of the Roma.

Youth's health with respect of migration: finding from Swedish study

Safipour, Jalal

Neurobiology, Caring Sciences and Society, KAROLINSKA INSTITUTET STOCKHOLM, SWEDEN

Keywords

Youths, Sweden, Migration, Health

This study is a part of larger study entitled "social alienation and health status among Swedish youths, 15-19 years old. Adolescence is ages between childhood and adulthood that lots of physical and psychological development and the major mental changes acquire. In recent years in Sweden young people have been emerged as a new vulnerable group in term of poor mental health. Several studies have shown that youths with migration background are more vulnerable in term of general health particularly mental health and emotional reaction. Youth's health is one of the important concern of health researcher and policy maker, this study aimed to analysis heath status of Swedish adolescents with respect to migration and socio-economical background.

Method:

Participants

Sample size is 446 and participant of this study are Swedish youths who study at Stockholm high schools. Main characters of participants are students aged 15 to 19 years old (SD=1.01, Mean=17), 59% female and 41% male, 86% of them born in Sweden, 14% are first generation of immigrant, 25% second generation and 61% Swedish native.

Measurement

This study applied survey method with predesigned questionnaire for measuring health status of youths. Nottingham health profile was used in this study to measuring health status of youths. Version two of NHP that has been used in this study contains 38 in six groups. NHP cover 1: Physical Mobility, 2: Pain, 3: Sleep, 4: Social Isolation, 5: Emotional Reactions and 6: Energy Level

Results:

Results show that 10.5% of study population is not feeling healthy, and high number of them complained about Energy level 50%, emotional reaction 30%, social isolation 14%, and sleep 23%. It is also significant difference of feeling ill/health between first generation of immigrant, second generation of immigrant and Swedish native students. Result also show male students feel healthier than females.

Conclusion:

Migration has important role on feeling ill health among youths.

RN17

Industrial Relations, Labour Market Institutions and Employment

Analysing security and flexibility in labour markets: an expanded institutional approach

Crouch, Colin

Professor of Governance and Public Management, University of Warwick Business School Coventry, United Kingdom

Keywords

workers, capitalist market, labour markets, consumers

As the balance between security and flexibility replaces inflation as a major preoccupation of the sociology and economics of labour markets, it becomes necessary to expand the framework of institutional analysis used in research beyond the market, the industrial relations system and specific public social policy. It is also necessary to recognise that the dynamics of the capitalist market itself require people to be at once confident consumers and insecure workers. Analysis therefore needs to include such factors as the separation of consumers from workers, whether by class, gender and ethnicity separation; and the separation of workers' consumption capacity from their wage-earning through mortgages and other forms of debt. In all, 14 different modes of resolving the paradox between confident consumers and insecure workers are proposed, including those from familiar social policy.

Collective Bargaining, Inter-Sectoral Heterogeneity and Competitiveness: A Cross-National Comparison of Macroeconomic Performance

Traxler, Franz

*Industrial Sociology, University of Vienna
Vienna, Austria*

Brandl, Bernd

*Industrial Sociology, University of Vienna
Vienna, Austria*

Keywords

industrial relations, Cross-national Comparison, collective bargaining

Research in the performance of bargaining has remained inconclusive, especially with regard to intermediately centralized bargaining. Compared to centralization and decentralization, alleged effects range from inferior to superior performance. This has spurred research in the conditionality of bargaining effects, namely interactions with monetary policy. Accordingly, intermediate bargaining performs well, when strategically interacting with monetary conservatism. However, this synthesis fails to explain why the performance of intermediate bargaining has not declined under EMU. This puzzle points to a general weakness of the literature: neglect of heterogeneity of the bargainers. This paper argues that the performance of bargaining depends on its interaction with competitiveness imperatives rather than monetary policy. These imperatives link to inter-sectoral heterogeneity of bargainers: Since the effects of bargaining on competitiveness depend on coping with productivity differentials between the exposed and sheltered sector, the paper discusses how distinct bargaining structures interact with these differentials. Intermediate coordination by exposed-sector pattern-setting is predicted to be the only bargaining structure which is sensitive to productivity differentials. This hypothesis is tested on time-series data for 18 countries. The findings show the expected impact on labour costs and the current balance, whereas no employment effects are discernible.

Collective bargaining: empirical and theoretical approaches

Fernandes, Paulo

*DGERT, MTSS
Lisbon, Portugal*

Almeida, Paulo

*Sociology, LISBON UNIVERSITY INSTITUTE/ISCTE
Lisbon, Portugal*

Keywords

Unions, collective bargaining, agreements, employers

Collective bargaining: empirical and theoretical approaches

Nowadays, industrial relations in several countries are in change and Portugal is no exception. The collective bargaining in Portugal has now a new legal framework, the "hold" one in the beginning appear to be the end of negotiation, but after one or two years the dynamic of the collective bargaining put the numbers (agreements) near to the ones of the old legal framework.

The unions and the employer's organizations made some efforts and they have reached new agreements. This dynamics is present in some process that we will depict in this paper.

Some of the challenges that this social actors face aren't new, but others appear to be new problems: the globalization and the European market integration bring new and more complex challenges than in the past. This will be the key issue of this paper: more than solutions, we will discuss these problems with some practical examples and results of recent research on the subject in Portugal.

Comparison of nine workplace harassment protocols in Spanish companies

Arellano Morlas, Fermín

Escuela de Estudios Sociales, Universidad de Zaragoza Spain,

Keywords

workplace harassment, dignity, corporate social responsibility

In recent years workplace harassment protocols have been negotiated in Spanish companies which are generally medium or large sized and in the service sector. From the study of nine workplace protocols negotiated between the management of the companies and the unions representing the workers in nine savings banks we have found certain similarities.

In this work we intend to show how acts of harassment in the workplace represent an assault on human dignity. This attack focuses on isolating the victim, denigrating them as a person, debasing their working conditions and submitting them to an atmosphere of fear.

These acts of harassment are conditioned by the organization of work and we will show how these workplace harassment protocols attempt to modify certain aspects of this organization to prevent and in this instance solve the cases that may arise.

Finally, we establish the relationship between the growing concern for personal dignity in the workplace and the social responsibility of firms.

Determinants of Social Pacting in Western Europe (1974-2005): An Event-History Analysis

Baccaro, Lucio

*Sociology Department, University of Geneva
Geneva, Switzerland*

Ferguson, John-Paul

Institute for Work and Employment Research, MIT Cambridge, USA

Keywords

Social Pacts, corporatism, Event-History Analysis

In this paper we address the conditions (economic, political and institutional) in which European governments decide to share their policy-making prerogatives with employer and worker organizations.

We identify several problems with prior work and draw out those problems' methodological implications. First, most research has drawn primarily on country case studies; as a result, it has produced several theoretical explanations of the phenomenon at hand, but very few systematic tests of hypotheses. Second, prior quantitative research has relied on a time-series cross-sectional methodology, i.e., on a methodology which due to its assumptions is ill-suited to a quintessentially dynamic phenomenon like social pacting. Third, prior research has focused on the determinants of pacts by examining successfully concluded agreements. Doing so ignores that many theorized determinants of pacts should produce a process of negotiation but that negotiations can (and often do) fail. By selecting on successful cases, such work introduces sample bias. Finally, much attention has been paid to the initial pact signed in a country, but in many countries social pacts become institutionalized through the very mechanisms, such as planned re-negotiations, included in the agreement. Ignoring the inherently repeat nature of these events exaggerates the impact of economic and political forces and downplays the resulting organizational routines.

We address these problems with a unique dataset that codes on a monthly basis both for the beginning of formal pact negotiation and for any agreements reached. We use an event-history statistical methodology. We also model the repeat nature of pacts explicitly by using conditional frailty models, which control both for unobserved heterogeneity across countries and for event-dependence between subsequent negotiations and pacts. We find no support for effects of party composition or the electoral cycle once these corrections are made. While some economic phenomena, such as debt and inflation, still help predict pact negotiation, such economic effects are dwarfed by what we call 'institutional inertia' effects, i.e. by the fact that these practices often become institutionalized independently of the particular conditions that bring them about.

Employers' organizations and their access to decision-making power at the EU level

Vatta, Alessia

Department of Political Sciences, University of Trieste Trieste, Italy

Keywords

interest representation, EU policy making, business organizations

Abstract: The paper deals with the role of employers? (and more generally business) organizations in their relationships with the European Union institutions and their decision-making processes. It should be the starting point of a further research project in this field. After the Single European Act (1986), EU policy-making has become more and more important, both in terms of legislation and of policy areas covered by its intervention. This process has intensified after the Maastricht Treaty (1992), whose Social Protocol led to the extension of the European Social Dialogue to new sectors of enforcement. Even though they had been active well before the mid-1980s, business groups were induced by EU-related political developments to move further in a supranational direction. Besides the national level, the EU level grew significant also in industrial relations. The paper intends to review the literature related to the search for access to decision-making at the European level by entrepreneurial organizations since the late 1980s. The aim is to explore the strategies chosen by such actors, and possibly relate them with policy outputs. It should also be possible to find details regarding the broader model of interest intermediation, since both pluralist and neocorporatist traits have been observed by experts. A longer-term goal is that the analysis of business organizations? experiences could offer a clearer insight into EU governance procedures and into the conditions for gaining specific results.

Employment and Labor Conditions among Highly Skilled Workers, from Flexibility to Precariousness: A case study on research workers

Campos, Alfredo

Centre for Social Studies - Associate Laboratory, University of Coimbra Coimbra, Portugal

Keywords

participation, precariousness, skilled work, research professionals

This paper intends to present the results of a research recently developed, regarding precariousness of the employment market for highly skilled segments of the workforce.

Sociological theorization has been studying the development of employment markets and work conditions, relating their increasing flexibility to globalization of markets and the competitiveness needed by companies. The workforce has often been addressed as increasingly divided in two segments: one precarious, unskilled with low wages, reduced chance of mobility, weak bargaining power and possibility of participation; another flexible, highly skilled with high wages, high potential for mobility, and able to negotiate good working conditions. However, it is argued that the development of the capitalist system, further aggravated by its crisis, is leading to an increased insecurity for all workers, independently of their skill, towards a qualified proletariat.

Thus this research constitutes a case study, addressing a group of highly skilled professionals: research workers in Portugal. Indeed, a large part of scientific work is done by researchers with 'scientific research scholarships', which are granted for a specific research unrelated to any degree acquisition. As such, lacking an employment contract, these workers are in a precarious condition, without any labor rights and low social rights.

It was found that a large number of research workers maintain a precarious situation for long periods, without ever obtaining a contract, working conditions being as diverse as the areas of scientific research. Still, generally, research workers consider their working conditions satisfactory, albeit the dissatisfaction with the precarious employment.

Paradoxically, given their precarious situation, research workers show very little participation, or initiatives of negotiation for changes in the scientific employment policies. This is explained namely by lack of a union, for there is only an association with weak bargaining power, with which workers show little identification. Furthermore, the degree of satisfaction at work and cultural factors arising from status inconsistency and high-class habitus adverse to protest, are also factors for low participation.

Concluding, this research contributes to a better understanding of the development of employment markets, regarding highly skilled workers, shedding light on their expanding precarious employment and other challenges it faces.

European Urban Public Transport: Towards a single European employment model

Wickham, James

*Department of Sociology, Trinity College Dublin
Dublin, Ireland*

Latniak, Erik

Institut Arbeit und Qualifikation, University of Duisberg-Essen Duisberg, Germany

Keywords

public transport, employment quality, national employment systems

Public transport in European cities has traditionally been provided by publicly owned enterprises. Public transport was an example of 'good bad jobs': unskilled, but with job security and high informal autonomy, and above all, unionised. Recent changes in the governance of urban public transport have ensured that public transport enterprises are being privatised and/or exposed to competition. This paper uses a comparative study of urban public transport in five European countries (Austria, Germany, Hungary, Ireland and Italy) to address two inter-related questions. Firstly, are these changes resulting in a single European employment model in the sector, or do national employment models continue? Secondly, are changes in employment related to changes in service quality: is there a trade-off between service quality and employment quality?

The first part of the paper outlines the emergence of what we term a 'New European Public Transport Model' shaped by European competition policy. We show how changes in the regulation of public transport have facilitated the emergence of new actors, most obviously international companies.

The second part of the paper analyses the changes in employment and industrial relations. Although there has not been any massive destruction of jobs, overall employment is declining. Despite union fears, there has been no wide spread casualisation. There has also been no direct onslaught on trade unions, but especially in Germany unions have effectively engaged in concession bargaining, trading continued job security for wages and conditions. Crucially, national differences in bargaining patterns have if anything become greater. A common European regulatory framework has not produced a common pattern of employment or industrial relations.

The third part of the paper uses this diversity to explore the relationship between employment quality and service quality. Trade union advocates argue that service quality and employment quality are linked, but some advocates of the NEPTM argue that strong trade unions ensure that employees benefit at the cost of transport users. Our evidence suggests that neither thesis is correct: there is no necessary relationship between the quality of employment and the quality of public service. Here too national institutional systems remain decisive.

European Works Councils as Actors in Intra-Company Negotiations

Hertwig, Markus

Fakultät für Sozialwissenschaft, Ruhr-Universität Bochum Bochum, Germany

Keywords

Automotive Industry, European Works Councils, Organization Theory, Intra-organizational Bargaining

Due to the increasing intensity of cross-border integration of economic activities, European Works Councils play an important role in the regulation of interests in international companies. By now, there is a substantial number of studies dealing with different aspects of EWCs. Previous research has often dealt with the potential of EWCs to influence management decisions and to participate in joint negotiations. It was pointed out that EWCs vary extremely regarding their activities and their ability to effectively influence company decisions (see, for instance, Lecher and Platzer 1997; Waddington and Kerckhofs 2003; Kotthoff 2005). While some EWCs operate on a low level (as simple 'tools' for the distribution of selected information), some others - especially in the automotive sector - have developed astonishing competences regarding the ability to participate in and influence company decisions. Some EWCs, for instance at GM or Ford, are engaged negotiation processes with management, thereby exceeding the provisions of the EWC Directive. However, in a theoretical perspective, previous EWC research has paid only little attention to conceptualise those processes systematically. Instead, previous studies were often based on an 'extended' industrial relations model, which traditionally emphasizes the inter-action between management and employee representatives in a capital and labour relationship.

With respect to the empirical field of the automotive industry, the aim of this paper is to present a systematic approach to the understanding of how EWCs become relevant actors in the company's interest regulation processes. Therefore, a concept is developed which comprises findings from EWC research, industrial relations, and the sociology of organizations. It is argued that 'besides other influencing factors like trajectories, cultural traditions or national legislation' three factors can be analytically distinguished which affect the chances of EWCs to become 'negotiating actors': organizational need, organizational ability, and management strategies. The theoretical approach will be exemplified by case studies of six automotive companies.

EWC and the crisis: new and old dilemma concerning worker participation

Baglioni, Mirella

Department of Economics, University of Parma Parma, Italy

Keywords

Living apart together, Ewc members, union structure

The aim of this paper is to analyse the role played by EWC in dealing with the many problems of companies? restructuring. The focus of this analysis is on the national/European dimension of workers? representation within the EWC.

In order to develop this focus the paper will proceed from the main conclusions of a research conducted one year ago among the members of EWC in the engineering and chemical sector*.

The investigation upon the modes of operation of EWC allowed focusing on the loose interaction between the EWC and national trade unions. The research demonstrated that the EWC members did not find a way for transferring their information and corporate know how to their union officials. The consequence was that the national collective bargaining and the European representation proceeded along two parallel roads and did not enrich /influence each other even in case of corporate restructuring.

The difficult coexistence of national and supranational interests already present at the time of my research will now be explored by a second phase of interviews in order to understand how the crisis is influencing the worker participation in the European work councils.

Explaining Bargaining Behaviour and Outcomes through an Articulation Index

Molina, Oscar

*Sociology, Universitat Autònoma de Barcelona
Cerdanyola del Valles, Spain*

Keywords

centralization, articulation, trade unions, coordination, collective bargaining

For many years industrial relations scholars have focused on the degree of centralization and coordination as the most important indexes explaining the configuration and outcomes of collective bargaining structures. Notwithstanding the theoretical and empirical significance of these variables there are some problems which haven't been properly addressed in quantitative analyses. On the one side, centralization only refers to the predominant locus of negotiation among social partners, hence providing little information about the type of relations among levels. Similarly, the coordination index refers mostly to the particular mechanism underlying the negotiation of wage agreements in the economy. As a consequence it doesn't provide information about the effective impact these agreements have once they're signed, i.e., the degree to which coordination at one level replicates at all levels in the bargaining structure. This paper explores the significance and explanatory capacity of an articulation index that could complement existing indicators and overcome some of their limitations. The concept of articulation has been used by many authors as a variable that explains the configuration of multi-level bargaining systems by looking at the relations linking different levels within a bargaining structure or organization. Notwithstanding its theoretical importance, articulation has been seldom used in cross-country comparative studies due to operationalization / quantification problems. An attempt is made here to construct an articulation index that not only incorporates the distribution of tasks within multi-level bargaining systems (external dimension), but most importantly it also contemplates the mechanisms driving decision-making within organizations (internal dimension) within a synthetic index. It accordingly echoes the recent calls made by some authors to consider the behaviour of agents as well as the configuration of bargaining structures in order to explain its outcomes.

Factors and Trends of Work-Related Security in Russia

Soboleva, Irina

and State University ? Higher School of Economics, Institute of Economy Russian Academy of Sciences Moscow, Russia

Lakunina, Liana

*Centre for Social Studies, State University ? Higher School of Economics
Moscow, Russia*

Keywords

differentiation, work-related security, employee perceptions

The paper deals with evaluation of socio-economic security in the world of work in Russia. The research is grounded upon multi-dimensional methodology for measuring and comparing people's security designed by ILO. The empirical base is formed by two rounds of People's Security Survey carried out in three Russian regions by our research team in 2002 and 2007 complemented by statistical and other relevant data available from official and independent sources.

To begin with, two sets of indices reflecting seven different aspects of work-related security are discussed. It is demonstrated that macro level indices are ill-suited for measuring outcome, they are mainly contextual. Moreover, they tell us nothing about distribution of work-related security among different categories of population and of factors impacting this distribution. Therefore, the emphasis is made upon micro level indices constructed on the basis of household survey data which allow grasping subjective perceptions of socio-economic security within different groups of employed population.

The main results obtained are as follows.

1. The key factors determining the work-related security level in Russia ? age, gender, place of living and health ? are absolutely or to a large extent out of control of the workers themselves.
2. During the period of economic stability (in between the two survey rounds), a considerable strengthening in 5 out of 7 aspects of work-related security was observed. The most prominent loss was in representation security reflecting protection of collective voice in the labour market, through independent trade unions and other bodies able to represent the interests of workers.
3. Public sector employees experienced the largest gains in work-related security with those employed by privatized enterprises falling slightly behind and employees in the new private sector being the main losers.

Additional hypothesis (to be tested by focus-group approach in three Russian regions in June 2009) are as follows. In the period of economic recession

- the relative importance of different security aspects as perceived by people shifts from ensuring decent income to labour market and employment security;
- demands and expectations of different categories of employed population in the field of work-related security become more differentiated and more strongly articulated.

Finnish Trade Union Responses to Labour Migration

Alho, Rolle

*Social Policy, University of Turku
Helsinki, Finland*

Keywords

trade unions, working conditions, Regulation, labour migration

It is often stated that the position of trade unions vis-à-vis immigration is ambivalent. On the one hand, unions world-wide have expressed solidarity with migrant workers and defended their labour and social rights, and made efforts towards their social integration. On the other hand, certain unions have seen immigration as an external element of competition for jobs and social services, and have therefore called for a protection of the domestic labour market.

With regards to the Finnish context, a measure to control and regulate immigration was the enforcement of a transitional period between 2004 and 2006, during which a work permit was required for EU-8 nationals in order to work in Finland. At the turn of the millennium Finland was a country of high unemployment, and there was a fear ? elaborated by the mass media ? of an exodus of workers from the neighbouring low-wage country Estonia to the Finnish labour market, in case Estonia joined the EU. The transition period was strongly rallied for by fractions of the Finnish trade union movement. Nevertheless, the transition period actually diminished state and union control regarding the labour market, and the consequences on the working conditions of individual migrants were in many cases harmful.

A more proactive response by the Finnish trade union movement to labour migration however, was the establishment of an information centre in the capital of Estonia in 2002. The rationale of the centre has been to inform prospective labour migrants from Estonia to Finland regarding working life in Finland, in order to prevent the use of Estonians for social dumping. My aim is to present these two union responses towards immigration, and argue that control and regulation should rather be put on working conditions of migrants than on cross-border mobility.

Globalization and Labour Relations in Portugal

Pires de Lima, Marinús

*Sociology, Instituto de Ciências Sociais da Universidade de Lisboa
Portugal,*

Guerreiro, Ana

*Sociology, Instituto de Ciências Sociais da Universidade de Lisboa
Lisboa, Portugal*

Nunes, Cristina

*Sociology, Instituto de Ciências Sociais da Universidade de Lisboa
Lisboa, Portugal*

Keywords

Social Dialogue, Labour Relations, Globalization

The deterritorialisation of the economic processes which accompanied the progress in new production and information technologies created new forms of work based on liberalization and flexibility. This gave rise to profound changes in the system of the labour relations.

Using the deep-rooted changes triggered by the new conjuncture in the global economy in the field of labour as our starting point, the aim of our research is to study the impact of these transformations on the labour relations system in Portugal and their different repercussions in the various sectors of economic activity. On one hand, the liberalization of the global economic markets has led to the relocation of industries from Portugal to countries with lower production costs, which has resulted in increasing unemployment in some economic sectors, notably the textile, footwear and automobile sectors. On the other hand, the development of transport and telecommunications has created new jobs in the service area, particularly in new technologies and the tourist industries and led to the technological and organizational restructuring of the banking sector.

As a result of these changes, there have been some shifts in the organization and conditions of work. Jobs have become more flexible and unstable and this has segmented and individualized labour relations, weakening the ties of solidarity among workers. The rise in part-time and temporary jobs, precarious work contracts and decreasing social protection of workers are just some of the effects of the new socio-economic model, emerging with globalization.

Portuguese trade unionism has therefore been facing new challenges and, like other trade unions world wide, has seen its membership decline. Employers, on the other hand, have also had problems adapting to the new realities particularly the so called Traditional Employers.

The aim of this study is to analyse the trade union's responses, employers' attitudes and also the behaviour and expectations of workers in this context of change. We apply the sociological intervention method conceived by Alain Touraine in the sphere of Sociology of Action in order to confront the social actors and reflect on these questions together.

Immigrants and the new "Reserve Army of Labour": Public Actors and the Regional Gatekeepers of the Construction Sector. A comparison between France and Italy

Lendaro, Annalisa

Université de Provence-Département de Sociologie, Laboratoire d'Economie et Sociologie du Travail (LEST-CNRS) Aix en Provence, France

Keywords

immigrants, public actors, gatekeepers, construction sector, comparison

Modern society became a wage earning society; to be integrated into the labour market means to have a paid job and the rights attached to it to benefit from the social security system (Castel, 1995). However these benefits are frequently proportional to the status of the employee, and therefore the matrix of integration in society (Schnapper, 1989; Demazière, 1998).

The French republican model of integration functioned so long as employment and social protection were controlled by the Keynesian convention of full employment (Tripiet, 1991). The irruption of mass unemployment completely put out of order the ?integration machine?.

The role and intervention capacity of local public actors, on the labour market, is increasingly confronted with new issues that are questioning their effectiveness and legitimacy, both on the level of their capability to promote new models of professional inclusion and on the level of social integration of the immigrant workforce. What are the relevant categories of the public action? Are there specific categories such as first generation immigrants, or do policies address other general groups on the labour market such as seniors, women, people with low job skills? Do these categories fit with the real functioning of the construction labour market, where private actors are supposed to solve pragmatically the problems related to the workforce supply?

At the methodological level, this research will refer to a "revisited" (Verdier, 2000) societal analysis (Maurice, Sellier, Silvestre 1982), useful to compare the societal coherences of the two national cases.

We propose to explore the negotiation mechanisms between actors, concerning the conventions (Eymard-Duverney, 2002 and 2008; Boltanski and Thévenot, 1991) that regulate the access of the immigrant workforce to the labour market in the construction sector.

One of the comparison dimension focus on the role of networks and of qualification standards as instruments that can at the same time weaken and accentuate the segmentation of the local labour market.

Institutional Dynamics and Social Dialogue in France and in Europe

Didry, Claude

*Institutions et Dynamiques Historiques de l'Economie IDHE - CNRS UMR 8533, IDHE France
Cachan Cedex, FRANCE*

Jobert, Annette

*Institutions et Dynamiques Historiques de l'Economie IDHE - CNRS UMR 8533, IDHE France
Cachan Cedex, FRANCE*

Keywords

negotiation, consultation procedures, concertation dialogue, and participation)

Collective bargaining and, more generally, the series of devices that constitute social dialogue (information and consultation procedures, concertation dialogue, negotiation, and participation) are strongly influenced by the institutions which frame them: the legislation and the collective agreements. For a long time, over half a century, these institutions were marked by national dynamics. Today, they are for a significant part of European origin. The result is a complex dynamics articulating the national level and the European level. In France this is particularly the case as regards the information and the consultation of the workers and their representatives but also as regards social dialogue governance. In our communication we will examine the cross influence of the European and French legislations concerning these two topics as well as the ways in which they contribute to worker participation in Europe and Europeanization of worker participation.

Interregional Trade Union Councils between Portugal and Spain - a Portuguese viewpoint of an ongoing process

Dias, Hugo

*Center for Social Studies, School of Economics University of Coimbra
Coimbra, Portugal*

Keywords

interregional cooperation, trade unions, industrial relations

History tells us that the implementation of industrial relations systems was an effort to regulate the use of labour, one of the fictitious commodities, so that it did not keep totally under the arbitrary rule of self-regulating market mechanisms. Unions are an integral part of this double attempt to struggle, on one hand, for the institutional de-commodification of labour, and on another, for the social, economic and political inclusion of workers in society.

Notwithstanding the mounting transformations, trade unionism maintained itself strongly anchored to the Nation-States' sphere of regulation and to a national organizational praxis. Although one can say that Unions have been having difficulties in dealing with the new challenges put forward by this new self-regulating market global dystopia, it cannot be denied its capacity as a reflexive social actor, in attempting to develop new organizational, political and ideological perspectives so as to keep its role representing salaried workers.

The purpose of this paper is to study a specific kind of international solidarity and trade union transnational cooperation ? The Interregional Trade Union Councils (IRTUC). Being the first ones created during the seventies under the auspices of ETUC, only during the nineties was there a renewal of interest in these structures of trade union cross-border cooperation. I will focus on the four existing IRTUC's between Portuguese and Spanish trade unions: Galicia/Norte Portugal (1985), Extremadura/Alentejo and Andalucia/Algarve (both in 1994) and Castilla-León/Beiras Nordeste (1995).

Some attention will be given to the creation of the different IRTUC's: the problems and issues addressed, and the trade union partners? involved in order to emphasize the diversity of these processes. There are in fact important differences in socio-demographic and economic structures in all of these four regions, but also dissimilar levels of integration and cooperation between trade unions.

Through documental analysis and interviews to trade union leaders and activists in these councils, I will try to identify as far as these processes amount to significant transformations in the Portuguese trade union's organization, allocation of resources, and political discourse and the outcomes of this cooperation with the Spanish counterparts.

Kinship ties, intra-firm and inter-firm relations: empirical insights from small and medium-sized family businesses in Turkey's textile and clothing industry

Kayhan, Alper

South-East European Research Centre (SEERC) & Management School, University of Sheffield Thessaloniki, Greece

Keywords

industrial relations, Turkey, family businesses, kinship system, textile and clothing industry

Family businesses have been important actors on the business scene of all countries' economies worldwide but it is only during the last one and a half decade that they started attracting increasing scholarly attention. As a relatively young research area, it continues to suffer from serious shortcomings. This study has been designed as an enquiry into the family businesses that operate in the textile and clothing industry in Turkey, which aims to explore and conceptualise the similarities and differences that are observed in their structure, functioning, and the industrial relations therein through an empirically grounded and analytically interpretive methodological perspective. As such, it questions the widespread use in the family business literature of a single, one-size-fits-all definition of the family and puts emphasis on the need to take into account the particularities of family and kinship systems that are observed across different contexts. In so doing, the study aims to call into attention the necessity to duly study the family aspect of these businesses, through sociological perspectives, and with at least as much as the scholarly effort and attention that have been spent so far for studying their business component. Particular attention will be paid to fictive kinship forms (Ebaugh and Curry, 2000) ? ?quasi-kinship ties? as they are named by Holy (1996), or as ?parakinship? by Suzuki (1966) ? in the Turkish society that extend the circle of kinsmen to include those with whom one does not share genealogical ties. The central focus of the paper will be on the implications of fictive kinship ties and relations for employer-employee (intra-firm) relations and for inter-firm relations in the Turkish textile and clothing industry. Such an endeavour is expected to underline and spread the word for the need in future research to question the taken-for-granted structure of the family as a presumable one.

Labour Relations in Russian Business Organisations

Efendiev, Azer

*Faculty of Management, State University - Higher School of Economics
Moscow, Russia*

Balabanova, Evgeniya

*Faculty of Management, State University - Higher School of Economics
Moscow, Russia*

Keywords

Labour Relations, business organisation, Qualification, exploitation, Authoritarianism

The paper is going to present some results of the research project "Human Resource Management in Russian Business Organisations: Realities, Problems, Perspectives" carried out in 2007-2008 in State University - Higher School of Economics, Moscow. The fieldwork included 80 in-depth interviews with workers and professionals in 4 business organisations in 2007 and survey conducted on 80 private sector enterprises and organisations representing 19 sectors of economy in 9 Russian regions in 2008. The survey sample included 2550 respondents (workers, professionals, managers, and HRM specialists).

The analysis of labour relations in Russian business organisations was focused along three dimensions:

- 1). Achievement versus non-achievement criteria of personnel recruitment, remuneration and promotion. We revealed sharp contradictions between high formal level of education of employees and low value of professionalism, qualification and improving professional skills in Russian organisations. Another finding is that "good" workplaces imply "clannish" types of social organisation, high importance of kinship, social networks and informal ways of job placement.
- 2). Humanistic versus instrumental orientation towards employees. We found that vast majority of Russian business organisations are sharply divided into two sectors: 1) "paternalistic" (low salaries combined with moderate working load, job security, work-based benefits, and good working conditions), and 2) "exploitative" (medium and high salaries that imply workers' vulnerability, 46-hour and longer workweek, short or no yearly vacations, black salaries, bad working conditions).
- 3). Authoritarianism versus democratism. Organisation is a micro model of the society, and our study provides empirical evidence of high level of authoritarianism in Russian business organisations. Both workers and professionals, with rare exception, are excluded from decision making in their organisations, demonstrate high rates of acceptance of situations of bullying, superior's personal sympathies, worker's loyalty and obedience as criteria of remuneration and promotion. Workers' bargaining power and their protest potential remains very low. "Formal" participation such as memberships in trade unions does not really contribute to involving workers into decision making. We found that loyalty and obedience combined with "workaholism" is obligatory condition for career promotion in Russian business organisations.

Labour, Globalization and Inequality: Are Industrial Relations Institutions Still Redistributive?

Baccaro, Lucio

Sociology, University of Geneva

Geneva, Switzerland

Keywords

industrial relations, trade unions, centralized bargaining, Globalization, inequality

Based on a newly-developed dataset combining information on industrial relations and labour law (freedom of association and collective bargaining), various dimensions of globalization, both trade- and finance-related, and controls for demand and supply of skills, this paper engages in an econometric analysis of trends in income inequality in 51 Advanced, Central and Eastern European, Latin American and Asian countries between the late 1980s and the early 2000s, followed by a more in-depth analysis of 16 Advanced countries over a longer time frame (from the late 1970s to the early 2000s). The main purpose of the analysis is to ascertain the extent to which the generalized decline in union density, as well as the erosion in centralized bargaining structures, has contributed to rising within-country inequality in the current globalization era, controlling for various economic determinants. The paper finds that differences in labour institutions are the most robust predictors of cross-sectional (i.e. long-term) differences in inequality: on average, an institutionally-dense labour market is associated with a more egalitarian society. In contrast with previous research, however, the paper finds that recent trends in trade unionism and collective bargaining structure (late 1980s-early 2000s) are no longer significantly associated with the within-country evolution of inequality, except in the Central and Eastern European countries where the collapse of unions after the fall of the Berlin Wall seems to have contributed to a dramatic increase in economic inequality. The paper concludes that industrial relations institutions currently operate under more stringent structural constraints than in the past (partly as a result of globalization trends), which reduce the space for earnings compression: they face more elastic labour demand curves, particularly for the low skilled, and greater wage premia demanded by the high-skilled as a result of skill-biased technical change. The paper also finds that despite much talk about welfare state crisis, large welfare states (historically the result of labour's power and mobilization capacity) still play an important redistributive role, at least in advanced countries.

New regulations on worker representativeness in Luxembourg

Clement, Franz

REPREM (Professional Relations and Employment), CEPS/INSTEAD DIFFERDANGE, Luxembourg

Keywords

regulations, representation, workers, institutions, dialogue

On April 29th 2008, the House of Representatives of Luxembourg voted a bill concerning the 'single status' that started its effects on January 1st 2009. Around 275.000 employees are concerned by the single status in the private sector. The words, 'worker' (blue collar worker) and 'employee' (white collar worker), have disappeared from the Labour code and have been changed to 'wage earner'. In general, the single status decreases the non-wage labour costs; decreases the administrative expenses; creates by fusion a single health insurance, a single pension fund, implements equal net wages for equal gross wages; offers the same overtime payments for all wage earners in the private sector; every wage earner in the private sector pays the same insurance amount; the mutual insurance system for employers has been declared obligatory.

But, this new status also creates a single professional chamber for all wage earners in the private sector instead of the two actual chambers (one for blue collars and one for white collars). Briefly, this new status abolishes the most important differences between blue collars and white collars.

On last November 12th, 'social elections' were organized in Luxembourg. These elections have delivered the opportunity to elect the new representatives of the workers in the professional chambers, existing in the country and in the enterprises. Thus, it was the first time for the application of the new rules and criteria concerning the representativeness of the workers and the elections for the new chamber for all wage earners. Crossborder workers had the opportunity to take part in the vote.

This situation is ideal for an analysis of this topic: does this common application of new rules change something in the field of industrial relations?

The statement will focus on the following precise questions:

- Have the new rules of representativeness really changed anything for trade unions in comparison to the former situation of representativeness?
- How did trade unions present their electoral campaign to catch the voices of the wage earners, in particular to obtain the necessary strength within the new professional chamber? On which topics? With which methods?

Overtime regulations of our time - a cross country comparison

Nicolaisen, Heidi

*Department of sociology and human geography, University of Oslo
Oslo, Norway*

Keywords

Overtime, banking, institutional change, flexibility

This is a comparative study investigating the evolution of overtime regulations in the bank sector in 3 countries, Ireland, Norway and Sweden, from 1980-2008. Data are collected from statutory legislation and national collective agreements. Because of a decentralisation taking place in all three countries during the 1990's, the company level had to be included as well in terms of cases from each country. Interviews at both levels are conducted to help the interpretation of the changes taking place.

Since 1980 there have been increased international competition and market-orientation and many scholars discuss how national labour standards are affected by pressure from these changes (Traxler et al 2001, Hall & Soskice 2001). Overtime is normally not seen as a mean of working-time flexibility meeting the requirements in the post-industrial period. It is argued that overtime is replaced by arrangements such as annualised hours working, averaging and flexible scheduling which adapt to variable market demands in a more flexible way (Rubery & Grimshaw 2003). However, overtime still is an important regulative issue (Freyssinet & Michon 2003) and it is not proved that functional alternatives are replacing it in any large scale (Arrowsmith 2007).

The potential outcomes of the evolvement of overtime regulations are stability, de-regulation or re-regulation. In the study, Ireland is the country where overtime regulations are expected to be most subject to de-regulation because it liberal-model regime roots. Despite Ireland's recent development towards a more coordinated economy and a more hybrid regulative model, it is a contrast to Norway and Sweden, which are traditional examples of highly coordinated regimes. Norway and Sweden are critical cases because deregulation is less likely due to the regulative traditions in the Nordic countries. Moreover, the countries are suitable for comparison because of size and because they are all small open economies.

Factors that can explain the patterns of stability and change will be discussed. Can cases of deregulation be explained by increased international competition? Are cases of stability explained by institutional inertia, strong trade unions or simply by a making of functional alternatives to overtime?

Preconditions for Pacts on Income Policy: Bringing Structures Back in. A Comparison of Western Europe, 1980-2003

Brandl, Bernd

*Industrial Sociology, University of Vienna
Vienna, Austria*

Traxler, Franz

*Industrial Sociology, University of Vienna
Vienna, Austria*

Keywords

Concertation, corporatism, Cross-national Comparison, European Integration

The spread of social pacts has cast doubt on corporatist theory which assumes a close association between centralized structures of interest intermediation and policy concertation. As a consequence, the analytical focus of the debate has shifted to the relevance of processes for the emergence of pacts. This paper brings structures back into the debate. Its key thesis is that there is one certain bargaining structure which systematically provokes tripartite pacts on income policy: This is multi-employer bargaining whose pay policies are not coordinated by exposed-sector pattern setting. Along with other hypothesized factors, such as government partisanship, associational properties and the economic context, this thesis is tested on time-series data for 14 countries and the period from 1980 to 2003. Empirical findings confirm the pre-eminent role of the bargaining structure in the spread of pacts. The paper concludes by discussing the implications of these findings for the future of pacts.

Privatisation of public services and the impact on employment and labour relations: the examples of the electricity industry and postal services

Hermann, Christoph

---, FORBA - Working Life Research Centre
Vienna, Austria

Keywords

industrial relations, privatisation, public services

Public services such as electricity and postal services have been liberalised and privatised across Europe. The paper will examine the impact of liberalisation and privatisation on employment and working conditions and labour relations. It will do so by using empirical evidence from 13 company case studies carried out in the two sectors and in six different countries (as part of the EU funded research project 'Privatisation of public services and the impact on Quality, Employment and Productivity' - www.pique.at).

The company case studies themselves are based on interviews with management, workers and works council or trade union representatives.

The case studies show that liberalisation and privatisation has led to an overall fragmentation of employment conditions and labour relations, in many cases coupled with a deterioration of working conditions. However, while in the electricity industry differences emerge within former monopoly providers with different regulations applying to 'old' and 'new' staff, in postal services differences are particularly pronounced between post incumbents and new competitors. In countries such as Germany and Austria new competitors on the postal markets pay considerably lower wages and employ their workers mainly on marginal part-time jobs (Germany) or as self-employed mail deliverers (Austria). Yet while liberalisation and privatisation led to a transformation of the traditional public sector employment system, the comparison also shows that there are important differences between countries depending not least on the national industrial relations systems.

Protection and flexi-security: an inquiry on the modernization of Spanish employment public services

Fernández Rodríguez, Carlos J.

*Sociology, Universidad Autónoma de Madrid
Madrid, Spain*

Artiaga Leiras, Alba

*Social Psychology, Universidad Complutense de Madrid
Madrid, Spain*

Serrano Pascual, Amparo

*Social Psychology, Universidad Complutense de Madrid
Madrid, Spain*

Martín Martín, María Paz

Centro de Ciencias Humanas y Sociales, Consejo Superior de Investigaciones Científicas Madrid, Spain

Keywords

Activation, flexi-security, Spain, employment agencies, individualization

The last decades have witnessed a growing individualization of employment relations in most of Europe, influenced by the hegemonic neo-liberal policies, the effects of the globalization of the markets and the restructuring of the economies towards a service-oriented model. This has led to the erosion of certain collective rights -traditionally associated to a regulated industrial relations- and the rise of new moral representations of a 'good worker', the 'flexible worker', who must be ready to adapt him/herself to the ever changing conditions of the markets.

Nevertheless, competitiveness and flexibility have also implied new inequalities among the labour force. The EU policies have been aware of the problem of uncertainty and security and have tried to deal with it while remaining unquestioned the free market principles. During the last decade flexi-security has appeared as the cornerstone to deal with the problems of vulnerability and social exclusion. In order to preserve the adaptation to the taken for granted need to change and the capacity to re-define competences and skills of the different employees, the regulatory frames of the labour markets have undertaken a deep political and axiological transformation.

This has been shaped as the modernization of the employment services in order to enhance a more individual focussed approach with regard to the citizen/client and in which the new forms of new public management, partnership or contractualization have played a key role. The public powers have emphasized the need for an empowerment of individual worker whose security would be organized around the notion of activation. Activation means that the worker must take the responsibility of his own employability, with the help of a huge diversity of tools from the employment services and agencies.

While since the seventies Spain has been one of the most affected countries by the general trend of de-regulation of industrial relations, few studies have been made on the flexi-security measures applied in the last fifteen years. This paper 'based on an ongoing research project- will explore these new models of governance in the Spanish context focusing on how flexi-security has been translated and developed by the public employment agencies.

Restructuring processes in the household appliances industry and worker participation at European level

Telljohann, Volker

*IRES Emilia-Romagna, IRES Emilia-Romagna
Bologna, Italy*

Keywords

European Works Councils, Restructuring processes, trade union coordination, revision of directive 94/45/EC

The paper looks at the nature and extent of restructuring processes and its significance for industrial relations in the European household appliances industry. The contribution will present the results of a research project on restructuring processes in the household appliances industry that was carried out in 2007. The research project was based on case studies that included the four major producers of large household appliances: Whirlpool, Electrolux, Indesit Company, and Bosch-Siemens Hausgeräte.

In the paper the different approaches to restructuring in the cases of the four major white goods manufacturers will be examined. Although there is a generalised trend towards relocation in the context of broader restructuring strategies the analysed cases show that there are substantial differences in the way to managing change processes. These differences regard, in particular,

- the strategy of restructuring chosen to increase competitiveness,
- the actors involved and their role in the context of restructuring processes as well as
- the form and level of social regulation.

The analysis of the four cases contributes to identifying new and innovative experiences of collective bargaining capable of reaching negotiated solutions in the context of restructuring processes. In this context the role of the various actors and the interaction between different regulatory levels will be examined in depth. The paper will look in particular at the role of EWCs with regard to the social regulation of restructuring processes at transnational level. The paper will analyse the limits and contradictions that were experienced by EWCs in the context of restructuring processes. The contribution will analyse the shortcomings of the directive 94/45/EC and try to show to what extent the revised EWC directive might contribute to improving the premises for a more effective action of EWCs. Furthermore, the paper will analyse the factors having impeded so far a successful application of the European trade union coordination strategy in the context of the restructuring processes in the European household appliances industry. In the conclusions the paper will try to identify the prerequisites for a higher efficacy of EWC action in the context of transnational restructuring processes.

Social Pacting in Times of Crisis

Gardawski, Juliusz

*Department of Economic Sociology, Warsaw School of Economics
Warsaw, Poland*

Keywords

Social Dialogue, Crisis, social pact

In early 2009 a dramatic change is occurring in Polish labour market. After a brief period of prosperity, economic conditions are now quickly deteriorating, which is reflected in increasing unemployment rate. As crisis is unfolding and numerous (often contradictory) scenarios for the near future are being written, there is a sudden change in climate surrounding social dialogue. While in times of prosperity social partners proved incapable of reaching any substantial agreement, their propensity towards compromise and, ultimately, concluding a social pact is likely to increase in the era of crisis.

Social Pacts: The case of Portugal

Dornelas, Antonio

*Sociology, ISCTE - Lisbon University Institute
Lisbon, Portugal*

Keywords

collective bargaining, Social Pacts, industrial relations

During the last century, Portugal lived 48 years under a dictatorship, reached democracy in 1974, became member of EEC in 1986 and has institutionalized its industrial relations system between these two dates and set up social concertation since then.

The paper is based on a hypothesis that establishes a correspondence between the main characteristics of the actual industrial relations system and the main transformation episodes of this system in the last quarter of century.

According to that hypothesis, the system of interests´representation would mirror the conflicts and results of the institutionalisation of democracy and the attempt to create a social and economical counterpart for public powers; the structure and content of collective bargaining would reflect the economical transitions crises around the 70´s and 80´s and the consequences of the policies used to control and reduce the public debt; the model of social concertation in use would reflect the conflicts and commitments related with the preparation for Portugal´s accession to the European Communities and the subsequent challenges raised by EU´s membership, namely the need to meet the Maastricht criteria and the recent budgetary and debt crisis in a context of economic downturn and growing unemployment.

A hypothesis to the explanation of the unevenness of social pacts in Portugal is submitted to debate. According to that hypothesis, governments are the key neocorporatist player but social partners play a relevant role on agenda setting and on public policy design, but not on its implementation.

State and Industrial Relations in Southern Europe

Molina, Oscar

*Sociology, Universitat Autònoma de Barcelona
Cerdanyola del Valles, Spain*

Keywords

state, industrial relations, autonomy, Southern Europe

Industrial relations systems of Southern European economies have been subject in the last three decades to significant challenges and transformations. This paper analyses changes in the role of the state as regulator and coordinator. The starting point is the acknowledgement of contradictory forces regarding the direction of this change. Whilst there are strong pressures towards less direct and indirect state regulation, the new macroeconomic framework of EMU imposes new coordination requirements, especially on industrial relations systems of Southern Europe. This paper analyses the causes, forms and consequences of changing state involvement in four Southern European countries. In spite of being clustered under the same typology, industrial relations in these countries exhibit different degrees of state intervention. The analysis of developments in four areas shows some convergence towards a model of state monitored autonomy. However, differences between countries and areas remain and perpetuate. In order to explain these differences, a model of state change in industrial relations is outlined that not only considers the source of change, but also the type and sequence of transformations.

Struggles against the closures of companies in boom and crisis of finance market capitalism and new forms of workers' participation - a challenge for consensus-based industrial relations

Menz, Dr. Wolfgang

--, Institut for Social Science Research, ISF München e.V.
Germany, <http://www.isf-muenchen.de>

Nies, Sarah

--, Institut for Social Science Research, ISF München e.V.
München, Germany

Sauer, Prof. Dr. Dieter

--, Institut for Social Science Research, ISF München e.V.
Germany, <http://www.isf-muenchen.de>

Keywords

participation, closures of companies, finance market capitalism

Under the conditions of finance market capitalism, the shutdown of plants ? in the past primarily the consequence of economic crisis and structural change ? have become a regular instrument of corporate restructuring. Not only corporations in difficult economic situations decide to close plants, but flourishing corporations pursuing strategies of cost cutting, market shake-out and adjustment and international offshoring and outsourcing as well. This applies to the decade of boom of the finance markets. Against the background of the recent developments ? the crisis of the international finance markets ? a new constellation shows up: crisis-driven and finance market orientated corporate strategies of firm closures and relocations superpose each other.

Workers and their representatives previously are responding more and more with protest and resistance. We can differentiate between four strategies:

- 1) a strategy of negotiation and public involvement combined with alternative economic concepts,
- 2) a strategy of striking for collective agreements, which is fostered by new developments in the german labour legislation,
- 3) a participatory strategy of mobilizing protest where new actors of participation and resistance enter the arena,
- 4) a strategy of international networking in global corporations.

The new forms of protest and participation challenge the consensus-based system of industrial relations and the conventional settings of actors (i.e. the workers, the work councils, and the unions) and leads to new forms of the ?politics of struggle? but also to new antagonisms and distortions between these actors.

In a first step, we sketch different types of corporate strategies concerning the closure of firms in a historical perspective and describe the current constellations in the context of boom and crises of finance market capitalism. In a second step we outline the differentiation between the four types of strategies and conflict handling in the struggles against firm closures. Our emphasis lies on the different actor relations and dynamic change. In our conclusion we draft a political perspective on innovative strategies of workers' participation which combine the dimensions of resistance and appropriation of economic strategies.

Our contribution is based on an empirical study on struggles about firm closures in Germany which is financed by the Hans-Böckler-Stiftung.

Success and pitfalls of a large scale union recruitment strategy: a French variation of the organizing agenda

Guillaume, Cécile

University of Lille 1, CLERSE - CNRS Villeneuve d'Asq, France

Pochic, Sophie

ENS - EHESS, CMH - CNRS
Paris, France

Keywords

professionalization, organizing, Social Class, revitalisation, trade union career

For the last 20 years, most studies on French Trade Unions have been quite pessimistic regarding their ability to prevent membership decline and to find new ways of revitalization, in a context of historical low union density. Contrary to other European countries, the American organizing agenda per se has not been discussed within unions or in the industrial relations academic field.

However, some unions as the CFDT have promoted strong policies of recruitment since the late 1980's, with a participatory orientation embedded in a militant tradition, that could be related to the organizing grass-roots philosophy. This action has sustained a continuous growth of its membership, particularly in the private and service sector. In 2000, after years of membership regression, this general trade union has managed to get back to its 1976 highest density level (600.000 members), becoming the second biggest confederation in the country.

Using the CFDT archives (1978-2008), we will first show the genesis and evolution of this strategy, from a class-based ideology of emancipation (?autogestion?) to a more pragmatic and moderate approach, focused on collective bargaining. Drawing on quantitative (2002 CFDT Congress survey, 900 answers, 66% response rate) and qualitative data (54 ?life story? interviews) on activists and officials, we will then analyse the contrasted effects of this offensive policy. We will highlight the conditions of its success (sectors, periods, actors) but also the limits of this participatory union model facing the selective appropriation by local leaders and the oligarchic nature of the organisation.

Above all, we will insist on the strength of union internal selection for the access to formal participation and full-time positions and the difficulty for trade unions to change their organisational culture. It seems that union careers within the CFDT are not only linked to personal dedication and activism, but require a wide range of skills and aptitudes, sustained by an intensive internal training program. We will suggest that this process of professionalization in the labour movement can be quite detrimental for low-qualified members. From this example, we will point out the class and gender issues lying behind union organizing and revitalization strategies.

The Field of Industrial Relations and the Challenge of NGOs: The Case of the Clean Clothes Campaign in France

Ancelovici, Marcos

*Sociology, McGill University
Montreal, QC, Canada*

Keywords

industrial relations, Field, NGOs, Unions, Bourdieu

This paper builds on Pierre Bourdieu's field theory to analyze the growing intervention of NGOs in matters of labor rights and working conditions.

The concept of field refers to a social topography, an organization of forces, and a battlefield. According to Bourdieu, each field is characterized by a particular hierarchy of forms of capital and rules of the game. Fields are not only spaces of social positions but also symbolic spaces of position-takings by actors. Participants in the field are engaged in an endless struggle for the accumulation of forms of capital specific to this field, the modification of the rules of the game, and the exclusion of current or potential participants, in order to improve or maintain their relative position and authority in the field.

The field of industrial relations is normally composed of three primary actors: organized labor, employers, and the state. This paper contends that it is structured around three primary forms of capital: economic capital, representational capital, and statist capital. Whereas firms try to accumulate economic capital, unions aim at representational capital, that is, the capacity to legitimately represent a given group and act in its name. Finally, the state has its own form of capital--statist capital--that allows it to both write the rules of the game and act as a referee that ratifies the outcome of labor-capital interactions. In contrast, NGOs are endowed with different forms of capital (moral capital and informational capital) accumulated in other fields

This paper claims that NGOs have progressively spilled over from the different fields in which they normally operate and were pulled into the field of industrial relations as a result of (1) the depreciation of the representational capital accumulated by unions, (2) a realignment of the space of position-takings in favor of private or market-based regulation, and (3) the growing transnationalization of industrial relations.

In order to ground and substantiate these claims, this paper focuses on the role and struggle of NGOs and unions in the Clean Clothes Campaign in France. It is based primarily on semi-structured interviews with labor leaders and NGO staff members.

The future of the European level collective bargaining

Obradovic, Daniela

Faculty of Law, University of Amsterdam Amsterdam, The Netherlands

Keywords

European level social partners, European social dialogue, European collective agreements

The European level collective bargaining was prompted in 1992 by the incorporation of the social dialogue into the framework of the Treaty based decision-making procedures operating in the European Union (EU). The social dialogue procedure stipulates that collective agreements concluded by European level representatives of labour and management can be implemented either through EU law or by the social partners themselves in accordance with respective national procedures. During its formative stage the European social dialogue resulted in the conclusion of several intersectoral collective agreements. Subsequently, it became confined to sectoral bargaining. In recent years it experienced rapid decline since no intersectoral agreement has been concluded for a long period of time and the implementation of successfully negotiated ones is quite patchy.

The paper aims at exploring the impact of the current EU law developments upon the future of European collective bargaining. The European Court of Justice has in 2007 ruled that EU law, in principle, supersedes national collective agreements. Those judgements can potentially have significant implications for the European social dialogue. Since European collective agreements are being increasingly implemented through national arrangements and seldom through EU law, it is questionable whether such practices will be sustainable in future when national accords putting into operation European ones can be displaced by EU law.

The impact of international labour standards on national rhetoric, regulation and expectations: the case of the ILO and paid domestic work

Gomes, Ana Virgínia

*Law, Catholic University of Santos
S. Paulo, Brazil*

Tortell, Lisa

*Law, DINÂMIA (Centro de Estudos Sobre a Mudança Socioeconómica)
Lisbon, Portugal*

de la Blétière, Vanessa

*Sociology, DINÂMIA (Centro de Estudos Sobre a Mudança Socioeconómica)
Lisbon, Portugal*

Keywords

domestic work, International law, decent work, social expectations.

In March 2008, the issue of standard setting for domestic work was put on the agenda of the 2010 International Labour Conference, starting a process expected to end with the adoption of a new convention or recommendation, aiming to protect the rights of what is estimated to be 100 million domestic workers around the world. Accordingly, the legal regulation of domestic workers will become a matter of relevance to national-level legislators and policy-makers in the coming years. At the same time, support for an ILO domestic workers convention has been largely created by international trade unions and NGOs. In turn, discussion of the sector at the international level is likely to lead to increased attention from trade unions and civil society at the regional and national level, as well as individual workers and their employers. This communication will canvas the ILO's actions in relation to domestic workers, considering why the issue has only now been seen as important despite what amounts to obvious 'decent work deficits' in the sector. It will then consider the ways in which the discussion at an international level – in addition to any actual legal instrument eventually adopted – may impact upon the rhetoric, the regulation and the societal expectations concerning domestic workers at a national level. In doing so, it will identify, as major conduits for social and legal change in European industrial relations, international labour standards and civil society.

The impacts of European Works Councils in Portugal

Costa, Hermes

*Sociology, Centro de Estudos Sociais
Coimbra, Portugal*

Keywords

Portugal, European Works Councils, workers participation in multinationals

Based on a research on the impact of European Works Councils (EWCs) in Portugal (under the research project 'Information and consultation of workers in multinationals: the impact of European Works Councils in metallurgic, chemical and service and finance sectors?') in order to understand the role of these institutions that are both challenging industrial relations not only in a transnational scale, but also in a national one. Four main topics will be analysed in the paper:

- a) the quantitative dimension of the constitution of EWCs in Portugal, especially because in this country the small and medium size companies represent around 90 per cent of the companies activity;
- b) the formal contents of the agreements involving Portuguese representatives in order to find out what kind of correspondence between the texts of the agreements and reality really exist;
- c) the 'voices' of the Portuguese representatives in EWCs. Here the idea is to testimony what the members of EWCs really think about the real forces and weaknesses of these European institutions;
- d) the opinion of the Portuguese employers vis-à-vis the EWCs, once it frequent the opposition of the capital to the EWCs

The Internationalisation of Enterprises from a Legal Perspective

Kreil, Linda

Institute of Austrian and European Labour Law and Social Security Law, Wirtschaftsuniversität Wien Vienna University of Economics and Business (WU) Austria, <http://www.wu-wien.ac.at/ar>

Keywords

Code of Conduct, International Groups of Companies, Employees' participation, German and Austrian Law, Workers' Council

My contribution is intended to deal with the Internationalization of Enterprises from a legal perspective, which is a special focus on the 2nd sub-topic of RN17: "Industrial relations and multinational enterprises".

The German and the Austrian laws know special provisions on Industrial relations, which had been grown and developed by legislation as well as by numerous court decisions over decades. Recent decisions of Austrian and German Courts of Justice and experts' discussions show new legal questions arising in connection with the Internationalization of Enterprises. Here are some examples:

- Code of Business Conduct: International Group of Companies intend to introduce codes of business conducts, which include special employees' duties touching their private sphere and unfamiliar to German and Austrian law traditions. Additionally, the employees' participation as known in these countries is tried to be circumvented.
- Employees' participation within international groups of companies: The works council system as known in Germany and Austria is not applicable (to a full extent) to branches of international companies. Provisions by the European Union may give some support, but do not help for a lack of information about the structure of the enterprise, which is typical only for international cases.

These topics mainly concern employees' participation and the role of works councils. The structure of these legal questions and the way they are - more or less - solved show us that the internationalization of enterprises causes management decisions and procedures that do not harmonise with our legal provisions. Such measures seem to be not only the result of "bad practise", but sometimes they simply do not match with the German/Austrian traditions.

The final conclusion seems to be that the internationalization creates a need for international provisions, because the differences in national laws and traditions make them less effective dealing with international cases.

The Paths of Labor: The Unintended Effects of Organizational Change in French Trade Unions

Ancelovici, Marcos

*Sociology, McGill University
Montreal, QC, Canada*

Keywords

Unions, France, organizational change, Conversion, Layering

The revitalization efforts of the American labor movement since the mid 1990s have injected some fresh air in the study of trade unions as an increasing number of scholars draw on social movement theory and neo-institutionalism to explain organizing tactics and mobilization patterns. This focus on revitalization has spread to European scholars who now attempt think about European labor in similar terms. Most of these studies try to explain why certain unions rather than others engage in revitalization strategies and to account for variation in strategies across sectors and countries. Put briefly, they are concerned with the conditions and direction of change. However, in spite of their contribution, they have neglected the difference that the process of organizational change makes. How--and not just why or under what conditions--change takes place matters for the outcome.

This paper contends that different pathways of organizational change generate different unintended effects. Building on the work of Streeck and Thelen (2005), it claims that change through conversion has the unintended effect of fostering counter-mobilization and renewing competition, whereas change through layering has the unintended effect of feeding internal contradictions according to a logic of differential growth. In order to substantiate this claim, this paper traces the transformation of the two leading French labor organizations--the CFDT and the CGT--since the 1970s. While the CFDT changed through conversion and today has to face a new spin-off union that competes against it, the CGT changed through layering and has, as a result, experienced growing internal contradictions between its new institutional goals and its contentious legacy. These unintended effects have contributed to shaping the decisions and strategies of these two labor organizations over time.

This paper aims thus at bringing back in the temporal or processual dimension of labor transformations and showing how solutions to a problem at t1 can become a source of new problems at t2. It relies on a process tracing method and is based on more than a hundred interviews with labor leaders in France as well as archival research at the national headquarters of the CFDT and the CGT.

The reason for aiming at a system of European Industrial Relations based on a mix of direct and representative participation at firm level

Garibaldo, Francesco

*Fondazione Istituto per il Lavoro, Fondazione Istituto per il Lavoro
Bologna, Italy*

Keywords

DEMOCRACY, collective bargaining, faked participation, autonomy

One of the new managerial trend in Europe is the implementation of scheme of direct participation. Direct participation is a very ambiguous concept as well as practice. Different models of participation have to be understood in their historical and sociological context and in this historical phase the initiator is the management and its interest is to mobilise the human potential of the work force ? creativity, ingenuity, flexibility, etc. ? but, at the same time, to reduce the role of Unions at the plant level. This is a faked kind of participation. There are still different situations based on the possibility for employees, normally through collective action and means, of regulation over employment rights that may otherwise be restricted or denied to them in a free market system. In these cases there are experimental models of a mixed participation. Direct participation aims to mobilise the human potential, letting the work force to have a say on the way the work process is designed and implemented; and the representative participation aims at the definition of the social regulation of work. These situations don't represent the mainstream in Europe today notwithstanding a clear empirical evidence on the success of these models. The paper will discuss which kind of obstacles prevent the spreading of this positive trend and which strategies of the different social actors can help to overcome its and to establish a new European model.

The right to strike: fundamental principle or fetter?

O'Brien, Charlotte

Law School, University of Liverpool Liverpool, United Kingdom

Giubboni, Stefano

Law, University of Perugia Perugia, Italy

Keywords

Right to strike, national constitutional rights, economic freedoms, constitutional asymmetry

The intersection of EU law and national labour rights has typically been presented, both academically and judicially, as a battleground, in which supranational market liberalisation is pitted against national social traditions. Those defending social rights from the infiltration of economic freedoms tend to entrench this opposition. The emphasis on national 'traditions' pushes consideration of social policy diversity to the forefront; diversity in turn consigns social policy to the ambit of Member States.

The effect of this economic/social 'division of labour' is twofold; although the EU ostensibly avoids interference with social policy, nor can it be expected to protect or promote it. Social policies, due to national diversity, will be sufficiently different that the protection of one such policy is not considered to be the interest of most Member States.

When dealing with apparently conflicting free movement provisions and social rights, the ECJ is increasingly adopting a balancing approach, partly attributable to the growing political and social reach of the Union, as exemplified in the case law on Union citizenship. However, the presumption is that free movement is the ultimate priority, as economic goals being shared by Member States, are goals that will satisfy the greater number when compared to diverse social goals.

We will look at the national models of the right to strike in both Italy and the UK - scenes of two very different labour rights movements - and consider the effects of Viking and Laval. This paper will then challenge the model by which the economic and the social are considered as opposite poles of European and national. 'Protectionism' is no longer an inherent national constitutional default, but conversely liberalisation is not necessarily the ultimate European virtue.

While 'balancing acts' within the ECJ are in general to be welcomed, it is suggested that constitutional asymmetry can only be redressed if the balance is less skewed at the outset, i.e. by not presuming that economic freedoms are 'fundamental' while social rights are parochial 'fettters'. Social rights may instead be presented a facet of freedom of movement.

Three Worlds of Polish Industrial Relations

Czarzasty, Jan

*Department of Economic Sociology, Warsaw School of Economics
Warsaw, Poland*

Keywords

MNCs, private sector, public sector

Throughout 1990s and 2000s once homogenous Polish industrial relations had been gradually decomposing. As of 2009, empirical data suggests that Polish industrial relations are divided into three different worlds, which appear not to have much in common. The parallel worlds of public sector, domestic private sector and private enterprises with foreign capital (MNCs) vary in sociodemographic terms, pay conditions, HRM policies and presence of trade unions and other forms of employee representation. In each of the three worlds there are distinctive patterns of industrial relations observable.

Transnational Framework Agreements: New Forms of Participation in Multinational Companies?

Telljohann, Volker

*IRES Emilia-Romagna, IRES Emilia-Romagna
Bologna, Italy*

da Costa, Isabel

Institutions et Dynamiques Historiques de l'Economie IDHE - CNRS UMR 8533, CNRS-IDHE Cachan Cachan Cedex, FRANCE

Müller, Torsten Müller

European and Global Industrial Relations Research Group (EGIRRG), University of Applied Science of Fulda Fulda, Germany

Rehfeldt, Udo Rehfeldt

*Institut de Recherches Economiques et Sociales (IRES), Paris, Institut de Recherches Economiques et Sociales (IRES), Paris
Noisy-le-Grand cedex, FRANCE*

Keywords

trade union coordination, European Framework Agreements (EFA), International Framework Agreements (IFA), transnational enterprises (TNE), Europeanisation/internationalisation of industrial relations

The paper is based on the results of a research project carried out in 2007 and 2008 on behalf of the European Foundation for the Improvement of Living and Working Conditions. It will argue that when analysing transnational framework agreements (TFAs) it is necessary to distinguish between European Framework Agreements (EFA) and International Framework Agreements (IFA) as they show different characteristics with regard to scope, signatories, content and the processes of implementation and monitoring. It will then concentrate on the strategies of the employer and union organisations involved in signing the agreements. The analysis of the IFA-related strategies of the different Global Union Federations (GUFs) shows that their approaches vary depending on the specific situation of the sector in which they operate, on the evaluation of previous experience with IFAs and on the internal constellation of interests and power among their national affiliates.

EWCs play a crucial role in the growing number of EFAs. Some EWCs developed their internal working, communication and networking capacities in ways which enabled them to go beyond a mere information and consultation role by initiating European-level negotiations. Also management increasingly discovered European-level negotiations as a tool to facilitate the introduction of transnational policies and as a tool to avoid conducting multiple negotiations in each individual country. The European Industry Federations increasingly see the need to develop effective mechanisms of coordinating company-level activities involving EWCs as well as national trade unions and structures of interest representation.

With regard to the contribution of TFAs to the Europeanisation and/or internationalisation of industrial relations the paper argues that TFAs are a qualitatively new instrument for industrial relations at the global level that instils recognition of social partnership across national borders, and yields entirely new forms of social regulation at the global level. The number of TFAs is, however, still very limited and they are clearly concentrated in TNCs whose headquarters are located in social market economies characterised by collective interest representation as the basis for the regulation of work and the labour market.

Unions and the Reform of Public Administration and Public Service Employment: The Portuguese Case

Stoleroff, Alan

*Centro de Investigação e Estudos de Sociologia, ISCTE
Lisbon, Portugal*

Pereira, Irina

*Centro de Investigação e Estudos de Sociologia, ISCTE
Lisbon, Portugal*

Keywords

public employee unions, public sector employment relations, public employment reform

Until recently, employment relations in the Portuguese public and civil service were regulated by a statute that provided significant employment security, service and seniority-based promotions, standardization and uniformity in treatment. Since 2001-02, a 'Reform of Public Administration' has incrementally implemented measures of general spending reduction, focusing on reducing expenditure with public employees through containment of salaries and promotions and reducing employment, as well as basic measures of administrative reform and the introduction of human resource management into the public sector: these encompass organizational rationalization on the basis of elimination of redundant services and employee mobility, the conversion of civil service status to a generic employment contract for the majority of public employees, management flexibilization and performance-based evaluation and uniformity of the career and promotion structure. These reforms present 'revolutionary' challenges to the public and civil service unions, the majority of whom are committed to the defense of the traditional public service model. Given the importance of employment in this sector in Portugal and of public sector unions to the overall Portuguese labor movement, the outcomes of these reforms will influence the evolution and restructuring of Portuguese industrial relations more generally. The unions have reacted to the successive governments' proposals not only by demanding to be an interlocutor participating in the conception of institutional and organizational improvement but also by drawing defensive lines to protect a pattern of service born from an earlier period's 'effort bargain'. They have nevertheless had distinct approaches to the negotiation of the Reform measures in accordance with their ideological-political and strategic profiles. In this paper we will present and analyze the measures of Reform of public employment relations in articulation with an analysis of the perspectives and positions of the Portuguese public employee unions - which will be presented as union profiles. We will finally examine the possible consequences of the diverse union profiles for bargaining outcomes, for trade unionism in the public services and for the Portuguese labor movement as a whole.

Women and trade union positions - warm welcome or hitting the glass ceiling?

Nergaard, Kristine

*Institute for Applied Social Research, Fafo
Oslo, Norway*

Bråten, Mona

*Institute for Applied Social Science, Fafo
Oslo, Norway*

Keywords

shop stewards, gender equality, trade unions

The paper will discuss women's representation and gender equality politics in Norwegian trade unions. Is the trade union movement mirroring the entry of Norwegian women into most political positions? Or are these traditional organisations still more male-dominated than would be expected in the Nordic labour markets with high female labour market participation? The paper is based on several quantitative studies on women's representation in trade union positions combined with qualitative interviews.

The blue collar trade union movement (LO/affiliated unions) was for a long time regarded as a man's domain. Over time women have not only entered the labour market but also joined trade unions - including many of the LO-affiliated unions - where the number of female members was more than doubled over the last 30 years whereas the number of male members actually decreased. Still the trade union movement also mirrors the gender divided Norwegian labour market, and the percentage of women varies from 2 percent till nearly 90 percent among the 21 LO-unions. The relevant questions are therefore not only how the most traditional of the Norwegian union confederations meets its increasing number of female members and potential union representatives, but also how gender representation and gender issues are handled in a confederation where the number of women varies from almost not present till a strong majority.

Our main research questions are:

Have the increasing number of female union members led to more women in the top positions of the union movement, or do we see a glass ceiling where men still dominate the top positions?

What are the gender equality policy and ambitions of male-dominated unions compared to female-dominated unions? Are a female majority taking better care of their male members when it comes to representation than vice-versa? Is gender representation still an issue in organisations where women make up a majority?

What do unions do to recruit women as union representatives? and to keep them? Do unions need to adapt to a more family-friendly organisation not only to recruit women as shop stewards, but also to meet the priorities of their younger male members?

Workplace bullying: a new health risk at work?

Calvert, Emma

Dept. of Sociology, Trinity College Dublin Dublin, Ireland

Keywords

workplace bullying, job intensification, Organisational Change, public sector, health and safety

Workplace bullying has been established as a significant issue for contemporary organisations, with prevalence ranging from approximately 8-10% of workers across Europe. Part of the mounting attention given to workplace bullying can be understood in light of the increasing consideration, particularly from the EU, of the risks posed by the workplace on the total well-being of workers, for example, the issue of work-related stress.

Since at least the 1989 European Directive, health and safety issues have gained new impetus amid concerns about a potential 'race to the bottom' and referred to 'every' aspect related to work, therefore including psychological, as well as physical, impact of work. Research has found that lower skilled workers and those on non-standard contracts are more at risk from physical dangers at work (Bendavidis & Benach, 1999; Guadalupe, 2002); a key research question therefore relates to factors associated with the 'new' health risks at work, including workplace bullying.

Workplace bullying is often perceived as an interpersonal conflict and not a 'normal' industrial relations issue and is often dealt with through non-legislative mechanisms including mediation. However, this paper argues that it is imperative to situate complaints about workplace bullying against the backdrop of organisational restructuring and change, as well as the displacement of collective disputes by individual grievances (Bacon & Storey, 2000): it may be possible to conceive bullying as a new 'signifier of distress' (McCarthy, 2003) used by employees in order to limit the scale of pressures exerted by management (Lee, 2000). Recent research highlights the relationship between factors like job intensification and organisational change and bullying (Hoel & Salin, 2003; O'Connell & Williams, 2002). Another key finding from Ireland, and elsewhere in Europe, is that somewhat counter-intuitively, those working in the public sector and those with higher education levels are more likely to report bullying. Given that the public sector is more often associated with better working conditions and employment protection, this runs somewhat against the grain.

This paper explores these research questions using a cross-sectional, nationally representative survey of workers in Ireland conducted in 2007, specifically addressing the issue of workplace bullying.

RN18

Sociology of Communications and Media Research

"Cyberonaut" Diaspora: Arab Diaspora in Germany

Rinnawi, Khalil

Department of Social Behavior, College of Management

Rishon Letzion, Israel

Keywords

Germany, , Diaspora, Satellite Channels, McArabism

Abstract

Some European governments were concerned that cross-border connections could be subversive and prove unsettling to immigrant groups. When Arabic-speaking households in France started to install very large satellite dishes, the French authorities were alarmed, interpreting this as an affront to the country's policy of cultural assimilation. Similar concerns about integration in host communities were expressed in Denmark and Sweden, where researchers charged with assessing the impact of Arab satellite channels on Arab immigrant households likened satellite dishes on rooftops to ears listening out for news of 'home'.

This presentation reports the results of a field study examining media consumption among members of Berlin's Arab community. The study considered factors including gender and generational differences, their implications, and most importantly the effect of new media technology on the relationship between Arabs in the Diaspora and the Arab world. Results from the study suggest that consumers of Arab transnational media among Berlin's Arab community have been transformed into 'cyberonauts'-engaging in a virtual nationalism (pan-Arabism) which has been coined what Rinawi (2006) 'McArabism'.

For refugee communities, satellite broadcasting has become an important tool to overcome barriers of distance and time, and has considerably broadened the scale of Arab cross-border interaction. The news channels like al-Jazeera contribute to fragmenting the one-time national German news audience while, at the same time, creating a pan-Arabic and Muslim transnational public sphere, where people feel connected to their countries of origin wherever they might be. Thus, for exiled and refugee communities, satellite TV stations like al-Jazeera open up possibilities for what Robin Cohen (1997) calls 'multiple affiliation of associations', and are giving rise to a 'diasporic allegiance'- a 'proliferation of transnational identities that cannot be contained in the nation state system.'

'EUconomic' crisis? EU integration and management in the Southern European and Brussels press

Martins, Ana Isabel

*Journalism, University of Coimbra
Coimbra, PORTUGAL*

Bee, Cristiano

*Department of Sociology and Social Research, University of Trento
Trento, ITALY*

Pleios, George

*Department of Communication and Media Studies, University of Athens
Athens, GREECE*

Sigala, Evangelia

*Department of Communication and Media Studies, University of Athens
Athens, GREECE*

Keywords

Southern Europe, Press, EU, discourse analysis

This paper seeks to explore the manner in which Southern European press and Brussels based media reported on the current worldwide economic-social crisis. Our focus will be newspaper articles centered on the management of this critical period by European Union (EU) institutions, in comparison with that of non-EU entities (e.g. G8?, G20?, amongst others).

More specifically, we will observe the visibility and prominence assigned to this topic in the news, as well as the way newspapers framed the debate (for instance, economic, social, cultural and/or political dimensions). The potential adoption of national, European or supranational perspectives by the publications may also provide us with important data concerning media framing of these issues.

In light of this, we will analyse the newspapers' insights not only in the context of the above-mentioned crisis and corresponding press editorial attitudes, but also of EU integration in general. Equally, we will undertake enquiries to find out whether the sampled media favour or oppose EU deepening and enlargement, and to clarify Europe's relationship with other countries and organisations.

Drawing on content and discourse analysis of Greek, Italian, and Portuguese newspapers, as well as Brussels based media, it is our objective to provide an overview of both crisis management and EU perceptions in Southern Europe.

Bringing up Father: The Italian Habit of Buying Format and the Repercussions in the National Television Industry

Zanatta, Sara

Department of Sociology and Social Research, University of Trento (Italy)

Trento (Italy), Italy

Keywords

national creativity, series' format, productive work, television industry

In this paper I will explore the productive world that creates Italian television serials. My focus is on the interactional contexts of work, the relationships between the actors engaged in this "cultural industry system" (Hirsch, 1972), and the organizational strategies that regulate the creation and circulation of this "artefact" that is becoming more and more widespread in the Italian programming schedule. I want to discuss, above all, how buying formats from abroad to re-adapt for (expected) Italian tastes can impact productive work, national creativity and the skills required of the writers, and how it can generate a new "struggle" between the main poles of this cultural "field", in particular, creativity and power.

To address these questions, my discussion will draw upon three main lines of research:

- an historical overview of the television industry system;
- the description of the social organization for constructing a story for the small screen in the contemporary industry;
- the analysis of the different points of view among the persons involved in this work for the case of adapting format instead of improve an original made in Italy production.

My theoretical background includes the production of culture perspective (Peterson and Anand, 2004), that has been applied to a range of quite different realms by now (such as music, cinematography, fashion industry, publishing, etc.), in order to understand how the expressive symbols of culture come to be; my study also draws on the key concepts of "field" and "world", according respectively to Bourdieu (1992) and Becker (1982), that clearly outline the collective work that characterizes a cultural production.

I will present the first findings of my PhD research that is empirically based on a qualitative analysis which adopts multiple techniques: participant interviews (approximately forty) of screenwriters, producers, network executives, story-editors, and directors; participant observation of brainstorming sessions among the authors and official syndicate meetings; and, document analysis of concepts, "bibles", scripts, notes and related materials. My empirical considerations will also draw upon a historical analysis of a database I constructed that includes production details about serial programs broadcast in Italy in the last ten years.

Communicative acts: analysis of gender relationships today. A theoretical concept to analyse the impact of the media on European ways of life

Soler, Marta

*Sociological Theory, Philosophy of Law and Methodology of Social Sciences, University of Barcelona
Barcelona, Spain*

Pulido, Cristina

*Sociological Theory, Philosophy of Law and Methodology of Social Sciences, University of Barcelona
Barcelona, Spain*

Keywords

Gender, communicative acts, European values and new media.

The analysis of the impact of the media today is more focused on user interactions and content media they create (Livingstone & Lievrouw 2006). The impact of social networks and interaction in this public sphere are crucial in order to understand our society. A concept is required to carry out this analysis more in depth and to better understand what kind of interactions promote equality and freedom (European values) and what kind promote violence through the media.

Communicative acts respond to this theoretical need. There are significant authors in this area, such as Habermas (1984), Austin (1955), and Searle (1969). The speech acts theory has proven to be a useful tool for the study of speakers' intentions and the effects of their utterances, however, links between these analyses and real-life situations of social inequality are yet to be established. Communicative action theory has provide us with a series of elements that help us define an ideal speech situation, but still fails to address certain aspects of the context of the interaction. The research presented here aims to deepen our knowledge of "communicative acts" (Soler 2004), including both verbal and non-verbal communication, while also covering dialogic and power relations in speech situations. This analysis has allowed us to gain a better understanding of the connection between communicative acts, on the one hand, and freedom, power and equality (or the lack thereof), on the other. Which communicative acts are more likely to be associated with situations of freedom and equality? Which are more usually linked to situations of domination and unfairness? Our research deals with the communicative context of interaction, which, amongst other things, allows us to tell a free speech act from one entailing some degree of psychological "pushing around." Non-verbal acts in communication were analysed as well, and so were the dialogic/power interactions inherent to societal contexts, in order to get as exhaustive a picture as possible of the situation surrounding interaction. Applying communicative acts to the analysis of the impact the media has on gender relationships promotes a better understanding of this impact on European ways of life.

Construction of the President's image in the internet: comparative analysis of Russian and USA conditions

Tyutyundzhi, Ivan

Sociology, RSUH

Ramenskoe, Russia

Keywords

communication, internet, image, President

Construction of the President's image in the internet: comparative analysis of Russian and USA conditions.

In the modern world, any government needs to communicate with its society any way it can. On the one hand, people want to know how the authorities work, on the other government tries to keep power as long as possible. Internet isn't latest invention, of course, but people, heretofore, have heard politicians very distinctly. Now day internet communities, social networks became a real part of social life of ordinary citizens. As we think, the first powerful attempt to use internet as one of the major part of political communication was the Mr. Obama's election: video and text blogs, news, on-line donate system and even sounds and pictures for mobile phones! It's a small revolution indeed.

Russian President Mr. Medvedev didn't use something like this in his election, but he has started his video blog too. He has official web site with news and a lot of media content. Ordinary Russians discuss political problems in internet forums, blogs and comments to the news. And as we think, there is place to build particular new perception of usual problems. So, we try to understand and analyze image of president in the internet: what it is; how it built-up; what is the ways and instruments to change it.

Our methodology is the content analysis of the internet resources and secondary analysis of internet communication earlier researches by Russian, European and USA research centers.

This research is a part of my thesis work in Russian State University for the Humanities (RSUH), Moscow.

It is comparative analysis: we explore Russian President Mr. Medvedev and USA President Mr. Obama's images, try to find general and individual. We put forward hypothesis: President's internet image is a cross point of two ways of image building. The first way is the official one: official president's web site and other resources, any official information like news, press-releases etc. Another way is the social one, vox populi: forums, comments, social networks, blogs, unofficial web sites etc. Accordingly, cross point of these two streams is our 'image'.

Culture of argumentation and social imaginary: implications for citizenship in European Society

Martins, Moisés

*Department of Communication Sciences, University of Minho
Braga, Portugal*

Oliveira, Maria Madalena

*Department of Communication Sciences, University of Minho
Braga, Portugal*

Keywords

argumentation, citizenship, social imaginary, influence strategies, uses of language

The topics of citizenship and promotion of critical skills are transversal in social and human sciences. Equally transversal are the topics of imaginary and social memory. The exercise of citizenship is tightly associated with argumentative practices and skills, i.e., with the know-how involved in the way people deal with discourses and through them interact argumentatively in different contexts. In fact, it is through argumentative interaction that people, on the one hand, manage conflicts within the community, while on the other hand, take hold of social imaginary and reconfigure the collective memory. Besides the argumentative interaction in different contexts, argumentative practices and skills deal, at a more specific level, with the rhetorical function of discourse; in other words, its typical argumentations which carry out persuasive purposes. In addition, this persuasive plan of discourse plays a fundamental role in the shaping of public opinion and in the configuration of collective identities and places.

Considering the hypothesis, according to which argumentative activity is crucial for individual citizenship, with rights and duties in the democratic State of Rights, and for the citizen participation in social issues, this paper aims to reflect on the relationship between the use of language and the exercise of citizenship in the context of a so-called culture of argumentation.

This proposal also intends to discuss the complex network of discursive domains, such as political, legal, scientific, mediatic and advertising. In addition, this proposal will reflect on the discursive genres, namely on debates, interviews, editorials, reports and features, political events, pamphlets, posters and ads.

Here is the summary of the ongoing project that we wish to submit to discussion. This project involves nine researchers of the Centro de Estudos Comunicação e Sociedade (CECS), of the University of Minho (Braga, Portugal).

Deconstructing contemporary myths: Communications and Mediations

Casado-Aparicio, Elena

*Sociologia V (Teoria Sociologica), Universidad Complutense de Madrid
Madrid, Spain*

Keywords

Theoretical perspectives, NTICs, communication

Departing from the two classical paradigms on communication, communication as transmission of information or as ritual recreation of a community (Carey, 1989), this paper explores some of the new challenges posit by the contemporary, defined in the crossroads of informationalism and globalization. The aim is to analyse some of the causes of resistance to think theoretically on communication (Wolton, 1999) and their links with the success of technological discourses, trapped once more in the tension between the technological sublime and the nostalgia for what seems to be lost. In short, the technical aspects and consequences of these new forms of communications are shaping the problematic, as it happened with the media some decades ago, making invisible or at least leaving unattended once more the theoretical reflection on communication itself.

The stakes for a theoretical account of communication are built on the basis of:

- A critical analysis of the unpredicted consequences of the classical distinction among face-to-face interactions, mediated interactions and media quasi-interaction (Thompson, 1998) in terms of the consideration of the mediated character of communication itself, as we have learned from Pragmatism to Symbolic Interactionism.
- A review of some modern pre-notions in our understanding of communicative practices, specifically its representationalism, its humanism and its embeddedness with the rhetoric of exchange (Chang, 1996), in contrast with the contemporary notions of articulation, artefactualism, translation, etc.

Thinking of communication as mediations, connections (Lash, 2005) impels us to revisit the inherited conceptual framework, to analyse what is really new and what is its theoretical scope. The notions of 'diffusion' and 'the diffuse', suggesting some links between the spread of NTICs and inhabiting spaces and processes of objectification and subjectification (Simmel, 1986), this is, focusing on the -space instead of just limiting our analysis to the dimensions and dynamics of the cyber-, will be used as an example.

Detemporalization and Despatialization - The Radical Transformation of Time and Space by New Media in Globalization

Brink, Simone

*Social Sciences, City University
London, United Kingdom*

Keywords

time, space, Globalization, New Media

Time and space are supposed to lie at the heart of those sciences which aim at analyzing the social. However, this presupposition about social sciences and about sociology in particular disappoints. I argue that social sciences have historically advanced a uni-dimensional and therefore restricted view on time and space. The crucial points are consequently two. First, due to this uni-dimensional perspective, postmodern research on globalization and media suffers from a spatial bias neglecting temporal aspects. Second, this is all the more intolerable since time and space have been experiencing radical transformations by globalization. They have become ever more significant dimensions.

To confront these two points, I propose the interconnected concepts of detemporalization and despatialization. They elaborate the interdetermining processes which emancipate time and space from former linkages (e.g. culture) by reason of globalization. They analyze the impact of globalization on social concepts and practices of time and space. They look at how time-space practices are being transmogrified by external factors (e.g. by global flows), but more importantly how they are reconfigured from within. They centre on the striking intensification of typically modern processes such as rising acceleration and spatial shrinking as well as on typically postmodern processes of increasing desynchronization, fragmentation and multiplication of time and space. They implicate physical, but more notably mediated mobility in time and in space.

Particular focus will thus be addressed on the causality of new media. Detemporalization and despatialization examine how new media transcend tempo-spatial limitations such as progressive duration and geographical distance. On the other side, the concepts also imply complementary retemporalization and respatialization which grasp the parallel/simultaneous use of new media for the creation of new confined borders (e.g. nationalist, localist, fundamentalist, ethnical). Thereby, the involvement in forming new hybrid identities on the one hand and new reactionary identities on the other hand shall be explored. Further emphasis lies on the reciprocal permeation of private and public space ? and time ? by the omnipresence of new media and by the potential omnipresence of the individual facilitated by new media: the incessant recipient as globalization?s archetype.

Eastern European Internet Networks and the Reception of Social Theory Trends and Topics; on some American and European master topics

Raluca, Petre

Journalism, "Ovidius" University of Constanta Constanta, Romania

Keywords

Eastern Europe, social theory, internet, Reception, networks

In this paper I raise the issue of whether the patterns of emergence and circulation of social theoretical ideas have been fundamentally altered by the emergence of Internet. While some institutions have been a constant transmission belt for concepts or theories, like the universities, other forms have faded, like one-to-one correspondence, and still others have emerged, like the internet groups; that represent the many-to-many type of information transmission and sharing. The potential of transmitting new data and ideas has been technologically enhanced in the last years in Europe. Nevertheless, the issue that I want to address refers to the potential of these Internet groups to generate new structured social theory. On a first glance, it is rather that circulation of ideas is enhanced by thematic groups, rather than the emergence of new ones. The site of generation of sound social theoretical ideas is still somewhere else; thus what has emerged in the last years is rather the democratization of sharing, than the democratization of production.

In the second part of the paper I attempt at illustrating with some theoretical topics that have made their way to Eastern Europe in the last two decades, either from Europe, but more soundly from the United States: like ?nationalism?, ?migration?, ?ethnic minorities? and the way they have been taken over by young scholars of the region in order to fit in the real life networks of conferences and research grants. The potential for generating new topics has been fairly low in the region, the choices ahead being either of embracing the already set agenda, or to occupy a marginal position in the on-going process.

I believe that the network society theorized by Manuel Castells and its flat perspective of networks and nodes has explanatory power in terms of the circulation of ideas, but not on their generation. It might be hypothesized that the agenda-setting effect of classic media holds its accuracy well into the new media. Thus, media old and new does not necessarily impose what to think but what to think about, including the main topics and approaches of social sciences.

Eu e os Outros

Soledade, Ana Filipa

Ciências Sociais, IDT, IPL-CIID Leiria, Portugal

Henriques, Susana

*DEED, UAb
Lisboa, Portugal*

Keywords

Youth, Playful, Reflexive Debate, Media Literacy, communication

This paper comes in the sequence of the one presented in the last meeting of this Network (last October, in Lisbon), we intend to present and discuss a case study which results from the application of this game to a particular group of students.

‘Eu e os Outros’ is a personal and social skills training project, adopting the form of an interactive game that is based on eight different online narratives and presume the group exploitation driven by a technical team, from a set of instructions worked out in training settings. The scholar environment is a privileged area for prevention approaches with its education and information role which develops the reflection and the ability to make choices that drive to wise decisions and promote well being. This Project is based in the global communication process in nowadays ‘network societies’, showing us that Internet is a precious tool helping the teaching / learning process, where teenagers play an active role in their training. This way, in a reflexive, active and critical perspective, we develop civic participation abilities, because the action-reflection methodology, in association to the game theory, distinguishes and stimulates the critical debate, stresses out the construction of knowledge and attitude and highlights the fact that all of them have abilities to solve problems.

This is an interactive multimedia online game designed for young students which intends to meet their references, interests, problems? Through the playful, this game, and its stories, stimulates creativity, learning and the reflexive debate of the youngsters? daily themes (eg. adolescence, growth, friendship, expectations and fears, doubts?). With this game it’s also possible to develop the media literacy, on one hand through the skills to play an online game and on the other and through the oriented and supervised research that they have to do in order to exploiting the themes as they appear.

The case study to be presented was developed with a group of students who are at risk of scholar abandon. In this paper we discuss the results of the game with this particular group ? difficulties, changes, their own perceptions of the experience.

Euro-English: Problems and Ways Out

Tupitsyna, Irina N.

*Department of Foreign Languages, Russian State Social University
Moscow, Russia*

Sokolova, Elena

*Department of Foreign Languages, Russian State Social University
Moscow, Russia*

Keywords

Euro-English, a written language, eurojargon, the outside world

In this paper I'll talk about the English variant, so-called Euro-English. Linguists are usually tolerant about the way languages change and develop. They accept both all types of regional accents and accept and even celebrate all variants in written language. The differences between them lie in the fact that when speaking you can see immediately if your listener doesn't understand and re-phrase your statement or adjust your accent immediately; when writing, you can't get that instant feedback. We should observe some rules 'to stay anchored in the reality of a real language?.

'Euro-English' is a label sometimes given nowadays to the kind of English being used by French, Greek, Italians, etc. in the European Union, especially belonging to the professional elite who prepare papers in English and for whom English is a foreign language. These papers are often full of Eurojargon and bad English.

There are some reasons of this problem:

- Preparatory work is usually done by non-native speakers and because of interference in vocabulary and syntax words are often misused and their real meaning is lost.
- English has taken over from French as the main language used for communication inside the EU institutions.
- English grammar has not been taught in British schools for the past forty years, so most native speakers can't explain grammar rules to their non-native colleagues.
- Specialized language, or jargon, aids communication between specialists. But if it spills over into the wrong context, it is irritating and sounds ridiculous.

There is a simple cure for this disease called Eurospeak. Let people speak it in the interests of cooperation and internal communication with each other. But encourage them not to write it, if they want outsiders to get the message. Such a language is not good for the outside world. Prevent jargon spilling over into general writing; resist the tendency to be pompous; retain overall responsibility for the structure and logic of a document; allow enough time for drafting, translation and editing by outside consultants.

European elections in Italian media: between second order campaign and the construction of a European public sphere

Belluati, Marinella

*Political Studies, University of Torino
Torino, Italy*

Mascheroni, Giovanna

*Political Studies, University of Torino
Torino, Italy*

Keywords

media coverage, European elections, local media, web 2.0, online participation

European elections tend to be framed as a pretext to keep discussing national and local issues. This feature is seemingly shared by the majority of the EU members, and represents a common topic in the literature. One reason for this attitude is that the European integration has long been perceived as a transnational process, hardly affecting the political contexts of each nation-state. Moreover, cultural differences among the member states, and the challenges posed by the enlargement of the Union, did not help the formation of a common European public sphere. Rather, the existence of a European public sphere is a matter of a wide and articulated debate. The 2009 elections provide a chance to assess to what extent this process has developed or whether it has changed its shape. On the one side, the trend towards a 'nationalization' of European issues, both in political strategies and news making rhetoric, and to reduce European campaigns to a minor role, is still persistent. Europe often represents more a frame, than a true issue. On the other, there is a consistent process of 'europeanization' of public opinion. Though European issues are often combined with and disguised as national problems, nonetheless movements in public opinion, which involve active European minorities and localized identities, seem to emerge.

Drawing on this perspective, the study of the media coverage of the European elections can improve the knowledge of this topic highlighting the shifting and conflicting trends, and identifying possible future scenarios. This paper is aimed at discussing how the Italian media system has represented the European political campaign through: 1) the analysis of the coverage in the news, the visibility of the campaign in the press, on tv and internet, and which are the issues and actors represented as crucial for the competition; 2) an analysis of local press, in order to investigate to what extent local identities participate in the process of europeanization; 3) the analysis of the web as a possible new space for the emergence of a European public sphere, with a focus on social networks and UGC (YouTube).

European On-line Journalism: A Tension between the "Old" and the "New" Media Profession

Oblak Crnic, Tanja

Department of Communication, Faculty of Social Sciences, University of Ljubljana Ljubljana, Slovenia

Petric, Gregor

Department of methodology and informatics, Faculty of Social Sciences, University of Ljubljana Ljubljana, Slovenia

Keywords

the Internet, print and online journalists in Europe, online journalism as a profession, survey

This paper deals with the question of how the journalists perceive the implementation of the Internet in the context of their profession. The results of the empirical survey »The European Journalist and the Internet«, which includes 239 print and on-line journalists from 11 European countries (UK, Ireland, Sweden, Finland, Lithuania, Estonia, Spain, Italy, Cyprus, Greece and Slovenia), show that journalists could be divided into two opposing groups: the critics of on-line journalism on the one hand and the defenders of it on the other. Journalists, who either use the Internet daily or work mainly as on-line journalists, or both, tend to be in favour of on-line journalism. Journalists, who work exclusively in print media and do not use the Internet on a daily basis, are the strongest critics of on-line journalism. The country, from which these journalists come, plays an important role as well. UK, Finland, Lithuania and Sweden are the countries, where the attitude towards on-line journalism is a positive one. Journalists from Italy, Slovenia and Greece tend to be more critical or scared of on-line journalism. This extreme positioning of journalists in their attitude towards the Internet gives the picture of a rather black-and-white logic in their understanding of the new media. However, this division speaks in favor of the thesis that, from the journalistic point of view, the Internet is everything but a merely technical actor. It is a social and cultural phenomenon, which arouses conflicting perceptions. The analysis also shows that the division between the »real« and the »fake« journalism is in part created by journalists themselves. The problem that the journalistic community now faces is one of the redefinition of the currently questionable professional niche. As long as on-line journalism is treated separately from the classical journalistic profession, the Internet will be perceived as a challenge or a potential threat to the profession. If, within the journalistic community itself, on-line journalism is to become equally treated as the profession, then either a readjustment of the journalistic profession is required, or a thorough change is needed in the way the on-line journalism is supposed to work.

EUTube: Communicating Europe through online video

Dias da Silva, Patrícia

*PhD Candidate, Instituto de Ciências Sociais da Universidade de Lisboa (ICS-UL)
Lisboa, Portugal*

Keywords

YouTube, engagement, internet, participation, EUTube

In just four years, YouTube became a household name in networked video, aided by the exponential growth in broadband access, with increased speed and falling prices. However, it did more than that: to a significant extent it shaped the characteristics of online video sharing and even affected traditional media, who now feature YouTube videos and interview celebrity YouTubers.

One of its most publicized impacts was on governmental online communication strategies, with politicians and institutions logging in to share information and to engage citizens (e.g. the Portuguese President and the British Prime Minister). In this presentation, I will discuss the role of EUTube in communicating Europe through the analysis of the videos posted, focusing mainly on topics addressed and genres used (humor, cartoons, interviews with Commissioners or citizens). In addition, I will present my findings regarding the use of comments made by channel viewers. This comprises a review of the messages' content and interaction between participants, as well as a synthesis of users' profile information.

The channel EUTube was launched by the European Commission (EC) in June 29, 2007, in its English version. It resulted from the presentation of a political framework concerning the use of the Internet as a communication tool, which also included the establishment of the online discussion forum 'Debate Europe' and the creation of blogs by Commissioners and Heads of Commission Representations. By October of the same year, Margot Wallström, Vice-President of the EC and Commissioner for Institutional Relations and Communication Strategy, praised the success of EUTube. According to a press release by the EC, at this time the channel's homepage had reached a million hits and the German and French channels had been added, introducing videos in these languages. In February 2009, the English channel featured 175 videos, it counted nearly two million channel views and close to eight thousand subscribers. Yet, except for one particular video, comments are not made in heavy numbers.

In sum, I propose to trace both a profile of EUTube as part of the Commission's online communication strategy, and also of citizen response, namely through commenting on this YouTube channel.

Exploring the influence of Europeanisation on media in Turkey: Changes and challenges in mediations of cultural diversity

Yanardagoglu, Eylem

*Eurosphere Project, Sabanci University
Istanbul, Turkey*

Keywords

cultural diversity, Europeanization, European Union, Turkish media, Journalists

In the European context, the member states of the Council of Europe and current and future members of the European Union are obliged to protect pluralism in their media systems in order to ensure expressions of cultural diversity in the public sphere. In Turkey enhancing media pluralism and mediation of cultural diversity gained increasing prominence starting with the Europeanisation reform period which began after Turkey's candidacy to the European Union in 1999. Europeanisation process has been significant firstly because it dramatised the tension between the national and transnational (European) perspectives on issues of diversity, minorities, cultural and human rights. Secondly, it crystallised the struggle between status-quo and change in a number of policy areas, one of which pertained to mass media. This paper aims to explore the influence of this process on the mediation of diversity in the media in Turkey. It draws upon data gathered through in-depth interviews conducted with a number of media professionals between 2004-2009 in Istanbul and Ankara. The media professionals have always been an organic part of the modernisation and westernisation process in Turkey, therefore this paper holds the view that an insight into their reflections can shed light on the particular logic that operates in the public sphere on the acceptance and acknowledgment diversity issues. The data draws partly upon my doctoral research and partly upon the preliminary findings of Eurosphere project, a large scale international collaborative research effort, which is being conducted simultaneously in sixteen European countries and aims to document the impact of Europeanization on cultural diversity and political institutions in Europe.

Facing the Nation: Creation of Internet Citizenship in the "Glocal"

Turkoglu, Didem

Ataturk Institute for Modern Turkish History, Bogazici University Istanbul, Turkiye

Keywords

New Media, Internet Citizenship, Turkish Nationalism, participation, Facebook

This paper will focus on one manifestation of the virtual: the Facebook. I took it as a new popular medium that enables the mimicry of the 'real' lives. Facebook is the most visited site after Google in Turkey and membership exceeds two million people from Turkey. The profile of the users seems to be young (between 15 and 30), mostly educated and predominantly middle class. Based on this profile, I will emphasize the construction of the Internet citizenship based on virtual practices and self-declaration and perception of Turkish nationalism.

The Internet as a symbol and enhancer of globalization may have cut across the physical boundaries of the nation-states yet in this case, it also contributes to redrawing of virtual maps. When the discourse of Facebook users is considered, a certain mixture of Orientalism and Occidentalism embodies the term 'crazy' which is in fact shaped by the concerns of the present. This paper argues that the dichotomy lies in many points of the discourse swinging between Orientalism and Occidentalism, the 'virtual' and the 'real,' past and future, conservation and transformation, militarism and civil politics, action and passivism, pessimism and optimism. As will be seen in the discussion of these dichotomies The sphere of the popular is, in fact, a sphere of consent and contestation for the nationalist discourses to reproduce themselves. Yet this contestation is reshaped by a new medium, the Internet, in the 'glocal' social networking sites.

Family interaction surrounding media: between adolescents' autonomy and parental control

Lapa, Tiago

Sociology, CIES/ISCTE

Lisboa, Portugal

Cardoso, Gustavo

Sciences and Technologies of Information, CIES/ISCTE

Lisboa, Portugal

Espanha, Rita

Sociology, CIES/ISCTE

Lisboa, Portugal

Keywords

Media, adolescence, family interaction, parental control

The image of family interaction around the TV, or "electronic fireplace" seems, nowadays, been gradually giving place to the convivial network, real or virtual, allowed by the emergence of new media and new information and communication technologies. New generations have been growing up amidst changes in interactivity of communication and in the context of multiple media producers and distributors. New competencies seem to be acquired intuitively by youngsters as a way to explore the interconnection between various media realities. The appropriation of media and new technologies by children and adolescents suggests that there might be occurring transformations in family interaction around the media and ICTs. Therefore, the main aim of this presentation is to access those transformations that may include the occurrence of specific conflicts surrounding media consumption - for instance, related to the time of use and content of certain media. With come up the hypothesis that new fields of family negotiation and tension might be emerging. Moreover, this topic concerns tensions surrounding the autonomy of adolescents, parental authority, rules and control over the media.

From the backstage into the limelight - Media and justice relationships in contemporary Portugal

Santos, Filipe

*Centre for Social Studies, University of Coimbra
Coimbra, Portugal*

Machado, Helena

*Department of Sociology, University of Minho
Braga, Portugal*

Keywords

Justice, Media, Public Sphere, Interpretive communities

The increasing mediatisation of the courts and the justice system in the late 90s of the XXth century in Portugal has carried several tensions between the justice system's operators and the media's professionals, particularly due to high-profile judicial cases. In this paper we will focus the probable conflicts between the Portuguese media and the justice system by exploring how both journalists and legal operators constitute what may be called 'interpretive communities' that produce shared discourses and collective interpretations of the contemporary interrelationships between the media and the justice system.

Drawing on data proceeding from a set of semi-structured interviews conducted with journalists, judges and public prosecutors, we discuss the ways by which cultural assumptions about the justice system in Portugal are co-constructed by legal and media professionals. The results obtained reveal that there are distinct perspectives and discursive practices, conditioned by local contingencies related to those social actors' professional positioning, status and self-evaluation of their roles in society.

In addition, the interactions and relationships between judges, public prosecutors and journalists are characterized by cumulative processes of negotiation, as well as by boundary work practices which may contribute to the preservation of a status quo that is reflected in the shaping of the public sphere. Insofar as most citizens' perspectives and knowledge of the justice system are bound to be conveyed by the media, these relationships can also produce repercussions in public representations of justice and citizenship.

Good stories and good characters, not good music. A research on music and media in Italy

Cardini, Daniela

Istituto di Comunicazione, Università IULM Milano, Italy

Sibilla, Gianni

*Dipartimento di Scienze della comunicazione, Università Cattolica
Milano, Italy*

Keywords

Media, New Media, popular music, cultural industry

The 'remediation' (Bolter, Grusin 1999) of the music cultural industry from the old media to the new ones has reshaped not only the presence of artists and their songs on the media and the way they are built and promoted as 'stars', but also sets clear some questions that are now crucial for the whole cultural production system.

As for media production in general (Tunstall 1998, Hesmondhalgh 2003), for music too there is quite little sociological empirical research on production. The proposed paper will analyze the changes in the production, distribution and communication of music since the coming of the 'digital age', and how these changes are perceived by Italian professionals of music and media.

The paper will present and discuss the findings of a qualitative research (25 in-depth interviews to Italian music professionals such as journalists, A&Rs, music tv and radio managers, artist managers, publicists conducted from June to December 2008).

The main results can be summarized as follows:

1. Eight years after the closing of Napster and four years after the launch of iTunes, the internet and the digital evolution are still perceived by most Italian professionals as a threat and not as an opportunity.
2. The scouting seems to be better carried out by 'traditional' television, that takes the place of new technologies in the finding of new artists.
3. On the other hand, the press seems to undergo a process of trivialization, from the news to the gossip.

In general, the research findings stress the more and more relevant process of narrativization of music: A&Rs, publicists, managers and media operators co-operate in building stories, thus proving to be the 'hidden narrators' of music (Sibilla 2003), to the extreme of thinking that a good story (even a good gossip) works better than a good song, provided that it is properly told by tv, newspapers and the internet.

Internal communications against the economic crisis - the case of a financial organization in Portugal

Filipe, Ana Sofia

CAPP, ISCSP

Sintra, Portugal

Keywords

network, television, intranet, organization, communication

Effective internal communications in an organization can range the economic crisis. 53 interviewees in a financial organization demonstrate that internal communications (television channel and intranet) have a positive impact on their engagement in the organization. Live broadcasts with in-the-moment Q&A successfully links everyone in real time to an interactive network for sharing information and knowledge. Webcasts and on line videos facilitate interaction: creating sense of community among employees as well as sense of connection with the organization by providing clear line of sight between individual and business goals. Employees tend to value the importance of communication during a crisis. This study demonstrates the strategic value of internal communications to the organization also preventing misinformation about the economic downturn.

Invisible Europe - Patterns in German TV Annual Reviews 1999-2008

Nees, Sarah-Elisa

School of Humanities and Social Sciences, Jacobs University Bremen Bremen, Germany

Keywords

Key Visuals, Annual TV Reviews, europe, Germany, USA

With the two European Union enlargements in 2004 and 2007, the European economic space and interconnectedness has increased; however, the strengthened political and economic ties do not translate into an increase in the prominence of European issues in German public broadcaster's annual TV reviews. Annual TV reviews allow for a longitudinal assessment of trends in television programs as they visually summarize the major events of a year. To assess the hypothesis that the EU is mostly invisible despite Europe's increased political and economic importance, the distribution of German, European, US American and other foreign topics in the annual reviews of the ARD (German public TV broadcaster) is quantified by manually coding of the material from 1999 to 2008 using an internationally standardized coding scheme. The process is complemented with the usage of the beta version of the Key Visual Candidate Identification Software, which extracts Key Visuals - image sequences of about 6 to 14 seconds, which condense the essence of events similar to key words - using Computer Science technology, thereby permitting the tracking of patterns unnoticed by the human observer. Next to the analysis of the material, qualitative interviews with the producers and editors-in-chief responsible for the ARD annual reviews are used to address the consciousness of choices regarding European topic selection. Further, the German material is compared to US annual reviews from CBS, NBC and ABC, which undergoes the same coding and analysis process. All results are contrasted to the patterns observed in Ludes' research on TV news in the United States, West and East Germany from 1952 to 1998, which identified the following trends: renationalization, depolitization, Americanization and visualization (Ludes, Multimedia and Multi-Moderne: Schlüsselbilder, 2001). In addition, the paper discusses the significance of the results in light of the necessity of a European democratic public sphere.

Local newspapers in foreign language as a hybrid media of intercultural communication

Brückner, Gerhard

Instituto Universitario de Desarrollo Social y Paz, Universidad de Alicante San Vicente, Spain

Penalva, Clemente

Instituto Universitario de Desarrollo Social y Paz, Universidad de Alicante San Vicente, Spain

Keywords

local foreign newspaper, Intercultural Communication, transculturation, Hybrid media

Our research focuses on local newspapers in foreign languages for German and English audiences. The papers are distributed in the tourist areas along the Mediterranean Coast of Spain with a high percentage of foreign resident population, most of them pensioners. In this research paper we perform a comparative analysis between local newspapers in Spanish, English and German. We assume that intercultural communication leads to cultural change along the boundaries of cultural spaces. The newspapers under study are published in this overlapping space between the domestic and the foreign culture, where the process of cultural hybridization (Canclini) is produced and reproduced. The hybridity can be seen in the ongoing cultural change taking place in many locations in the immigration areas along the coast through the contact of local, regional, national, transnational and global elements; the local papers in foreign languages are themselves the result of intercultural communication and considered as hybrid media.

Through the analysis of these papers we tried to gain insights, in an indirect way, into the guidelines of cultural interaction between foreign and native communities in Spain. In a global context that determines the local strategies of communication (glocalization), the contents of the media show the vision of both the local and the foreign cultures, and the efforts to reduce uncertainty and to increase cross-cultural competence in a new transcultural space. The structure of the contents presents, for example, the foreign papers under study as mediators in an intermediate space between two cultures, and as performers of the social realities in an asymmetric system of interchange of meaning, where the hegemony is important to understand the operation of the cultures in contact with one another.

The theoretical frame of this investigation is, among others, communication theory as introduced by Jesús Martín Barbero (Communication, Culture and Hegemony) and an adaptation of Nestor García Canclini's conceptualization about hybridization. The prior concept of "Transculturation" by the Cuban anthropologist Fernando Ortiz is also reviewed to define the process of cultural hybridization.

Measuring media concentration for the purposes of ensuring pluralism and diversity

Iosifidis, Petros

*Sociology, City University London
London, United Kingdom*

Keywords

pluralism, Media concentration measures, diversity

Growing media concentration is being driven by technological convergence, the escalation in the costs of acquiring attractive contents and regulatory relaxation. Alongside being market reality, media concentration is a public concern because high levels of concentration can undermine social and cultural ideals such as political pluralism, cultural diversity, integrity and editorial freedom. There has been a great amount of literature about concentration, ownership and pluralism and this provides a strong academic reference basis in order to analyze the complex questions related to media concentration. Yet surprisingly, there is little real research, academic review or agreed measurements on concentration (and diversity) and there are no universal measuring methodologies. To be sure, there are several US-originated market concentration indexes which are mainly adapted to a quantitative description of the intensity of market power and are therefore indicators of the intensity of competition on a given market (for example, Herfindahl-Hirschman concentration index; diversity index; the Lorenz Curve). In Europe any measurement is applied on a case-by-case basis by the regulator or government and the analysis is based on ownership in one industry or cross-industry companies.

But the above are classic economic measures of market power and arguably fail to capture the influence exerted in the market-place for ideas and opinions. The tension between the pursuance of economic and cultural values is reflected in the current debates as to how to measure concentration in media markets and test media pluralism. The phasing out of sector-specific rules, which were largely based on normative ideals, has been accompanied by the development of new mechanisms of measuring economic and cultural power: the formal public interest or plurality test in the UK; the three-step approach of weighting the influence of various media by the German authorities; and a system to define the total integrated media and communications market in Italy. This research explains the reasons for this shift to an integrated new schema in assessing market power and pluralism, evaluate their effectiveness for meeting economic and social objectives, and assess whether ownership patterns remain critical for the elucidation of the nature and extent of market power.

Media and Ethnicity - a portuguese magazine for african women

Ferreira, Tatiana

*Sociology, ISCTE
Lisboa, Portugal*

Reigadinha, Tânia

*Sociology, ISCTE
Lisboa, Portugal*

Keywords

Ethnic Minority Representations, Media Content Analysis, Social Identity Theory

Media can often create a specific image and representation of communities, groups or individual persons. The following paper has as main purpose understanding the representations of ethnic minorities women in a new Portuguese magazine. To answer this goal, the research looked to identify the reasons that lead, from the publisher side, to the creation of the magazine, as well as understand the steps taken by the publisher to evaluate this market opportunity. The Portuguese magazine chosen as case study for this research is the AFRO magazine created by the Impala Group that targets African women readers, namely from PALOP ? Portuguese Speaking African Countries, since the magazine is sold not only in Portugal but also in Angola and Mozambique. According to the publisher this is the first Portuguese magazine that meets African women needs. The main purpose of the AFRO magazine is to reflect the universal values of African culture in a modern context. The magazine main topics include portraits of successful African men and women, in Portugal and the world, beauty and fashion advises, representations of all forms of African art, sexuality and African recipes and food culture. The data collection techniques used were the structuralized interview, applied to the magazine?s editor and the content analysis of all magazine editions issued in order to explore the privileged topics and actors. Since the magazine is very new to the market, this constitutes the first analysis of a magazine specially designed to an ethnic minority in Portugal.

Media Use Index, a comparison across 50 countries

Bruess, Joachim

Research and Analysis, InterMedia Washington DC, USA

Keywords

New Media, gender gap, ICT, audience research

Quite often media market research is driven by a top-down approach that focuses very much on programming and broadcasting of news and information. In contrast, the bottom-up perspective is audience driven and will help understand how recipients of news and information use media and communication technology. This paper will introduce a Media Use Index that will help compare more traditional versus modern approaches of making news and information available.

Based on random representative audience surveys from 50 countries the analysis will compare results from European and non-European audiences and explore differences according to gender, age, education, and location (urban/rural). In essence the findings will provide fresh insights in the subtleties of the old versus new media divide across European and non-European countries.

Music 2.0. Some insights regarding the Portuguese scenario

Vieira, Jorge

*Research, OberCom - Portuguese Observatory for the Media
Lisboa, Portugal*

Keywords

network society, web 2.0, Music 2.0, Digital Culture, ICT's

The presentation aims to provide an overview of emergent music consumption patterns in Portugal, paying special attention to the relationship between new information and communication technologies (ICT's), network interoperability of media and contents and the increasing trend for digitization.

To put music into an historical perspective, the presentation first notes the key moments in the field of reproduced music more generally in order to indicate specific ways in which the experience of music has changed over time.

After that the presentation charts how music consumption patterns are changing towards a greater degree of multiplicity and complementarity of practices, between offline and online worlds (crossmedia). Based on digitisation and networking, music is becoming more fluid and part of everyday life in a multitasking mode.

These are the main features of a paradigm shift to a new musical era, the so-called Music 2.0, based on wider background that we can call Web 2.0.

The empirical approach to Portuguese consumers has been made possible by data analysis of "Network Society" study from 2008 (OberCom - Portuguese Observatory for the Media) and was complemented with statistical information provided by entities in the Portuguese music field, including the AFP (Portuguese Phonographic Association) and the IFPI (International Federation of the Phonographic Industry).

But data also shows that these new forms of music consumption are not distributed evenly across the entire Portuguese population. The adoption and domestication of such dematerialized consumption in daily life is felt with greater degree in the younger population. That is to say, the social agents that grow currently involved in a network system of digital media (the internet generation or digital natives) characterized by social representations, practices (diets media) and mediation technologies radically different from the radio generation or the television generation.

On-line communities and Media social environments

Damásio, Manuel

*Communication and Information Technologies, Universidade Lusófona
Lisbon, Portugal*

Henriques, Sara

*CICANT, Universidade Lusófona/CICANT
Lisbon, Portugal*

Keywords

Media, internet, Communities, sense of virtual community, media use

The ways communities are being reconfigured through the uses people make of media technologies is a key aspect to understand how contemporary experience is evolving in a changing media environment. Communities and associated activities constitute a key element of such experience. An essential feature of community life is the sharing of common symbols, conventions and references to external things acquired through social contact within the community. Sense of community (SOC) (community behaviours and sharing feelings) is described as a feeling of membership, influence, integration and emotional support that defines a real community and characterizes the relations and bonds between members. Complementary, sense of virtual community (SOV) intends to validate these same measures in the context of virtual on-line communities. The present study presents and discusses the results of an ongoing work on the adaptation of SOC to virtual communities in order to quantify both SOC for different face-to-face communities and its relation with SOV when media sharing and production is introduced amongst these groups.

Our work intends to discuss the relations between face-to-face and on-line communities when members pertaining to both communities are the same, in order to evaluate how the uses of on-line media and applications promotes both social linkage and media consumption, namely that related with communitarian life. The following operational studying communities are considered (all communities are based in Portugal): children between 8 and 10 years old (different school classes), older women (mean age 46 years) enrolled in an alphabetization class and a community of people who were involved in radio production back in the seventies in the former Portuguese colony of Mozambique.

Main contributions discussed are: the concept of SOV and its validation for different communities in relation both with face-to-face and virtual experience; the role communities have in informing media consumption and sharing options; the consequences on-line communities have for the behaviors and media use patterns depicted by existing face-to-face communities; development of SOV scale for mix face-to-face and virtual communities.

Online children in the news: a comparative view on 13 European papers

Ponte, Cristina

*Ciências da Comunicação, FCSH-Universidade Nova de Lisboa
Lisboa, Portugal*

Bauwens, Joke

Dept of Media and Communication Studies, Free University of Brussels Brussels, Belgium

Mascheroni, Giovanna

*Department of Political Studies AND OssCom, Università of Torino | Università Cattolica of Milano
Milano, Italy*

Keywords

Journalism, internet, Journalists, Quality press, children

Media and European diversity debate: theories and realities

Online children in the news: a comparative view on 13 European papers

There is some material on comparing media systems within Europe but there appears to be little cross-national comparison of specific fields, reflecting on the media processes at work as well as exploring what is news and how it is framed in different geo-cultural contexts. This paper compares news from different countries focusing on children's risks associated with the Internet and online technologies, which have been given great emphasis in news media discourses across Europe.

The paper draws on the work carried out by the EU Kids Online Project, a 21-country network aimed at investigating the social, cultural and regulatory patterns that affect both research and children's experiences of online technologies and the associated risks and opportunities. This three year long project (2006-2009) charting and comparing studies included an analysis of the media coverage associated with children and the internet.

The media analysis focused on newspapers was conducted in October-November 2007 in Austria, Belgium, Bulgaria, Denmark, Estonia, Germany, Greece, Ireland, Italy, Norway, Portugal, Slovenia, Spain and the UK. From a total of 1055 items, 517 were in the so-called quality press, including El Pais, The Independent, Corrière de la Sera, Frankfurt Allgemeine Zeitung Irish Times, De Standaard and Público, to name but a few. Regional, popular and free daily press such as Metro were also included.

Considering journalists as an 'interpretative community' (Zelizer, 1993), the paper focuses on quality papers from 13 countries, searching if there is a common pattern of topics and narratives or if the different cultural contexts provides particular news coverage.

Participation by internet: A Research on the Web Sites of Political Parties in Turkey

Sumbas, Ahu

political science and public administration, hacettepe university Ankara, Turkey

Dede, Kadir

political science and public administration, Hacettepe University Ankara, Turkey

Keywords

participation, Political Parties, e-Democracy, web sites

The main aim of this study is to examine the subject of the democratic participation on the role and effect of the web sites of political parties in Turkey. The current discussions on democracy show that representative democracy is in a crisis. The resolution efforts to this crisis offer new kinds of democracy models as 'deliberative democracy', 'communicative democracy', 'e-democracy' and so forth. In this theoretical framework, the study assumes that internet will be an important tool to enhance the ways of political participation in a democratic process. The web sites of political parties in Turkey will be included to the research in order to investigate the role and position of them in the democratic participation by comparing them with each other. For this aim, the existence of the forums, e-mail contact, discussion boards and the other communication channels in the web sites and their activeness will be analyzed and compared. All the political parties' web sites will be included in the research with disregarding their quantitative and qualitative status, because it is believed that the concept of 'participation' admits all kind of ideas and ideology have the equal value.

Political Marketing and Media Politics: Symbols, Spectacle, and Citizens' Apathy

Sebastião, Sónia

*Communication and Media Studies, Superior Institute of Social and Political Sciences - Technical University of Lisbon
Lisboa, Portugal*

Keywords

Citizenry, Media Politics, Spectacle, Symbol

The present paper states the evolution of political communication and the Political Marketing contribution to understand citizens' behaviour and beliefs in politics (Michel Bongrand; Philip Kotler). As much as political discourse is understood in a marketing approach more easily acts and promises will suit voters' needs.

Political arenas have become more heterogeneous and fragmented. So candidates have to face widely divergent opinions and a huge diversity of lifestyles, motivations and interests. On the other hand, voters are not the only public and preoccupation in a political campaign. Besides the organized interest groups, activists and constituencies, contributors and party organization, the candidate must face negative advertising and personal attacks from opposition, public attention «catchers» (voters occupations both professional and leisure) and Media. Politics have several markets that should be considered but the media market is far behind the most powerful, because it decides which candidates are to be highlighted or shadowed.

The new political man is a mass media politician, so he must be as a mass media spectator/consumer. Campaigns became manipulated shows where the mediated capacity of the candidate is intensely explored.

Supporting the thesis that political campaigns are more a spectacle produced by Media market than citizens' choice (Murray Edelman), we have to alert to the incapacity of New Media ? Internet ? to diverge from this dominant fact (Dennis Johnson). Because: Internet users are a minority; Internet users seek for the information they want in the Web; politics is not a main topic in their preferences and if everyone can use Internet so the most powerful players in political arena. Therefore, New Media are only one more tool for their predominant position, used to protract the imposition of their interests. Internet gives voice to everyone, but in the middle of so many voices the same will still be heard.

Pragmatics of Public Sphere(S) - Mediating Facts on Europe for the National Public

Treufeldt, Indrek

*Institute of Journalism and Communication, University of Tartu
Tartu, Estonia*

Keywords

journalistic practice, representation of facts, public sphere

The news media deliver descriptions of reality as a representation of facts. Journalistic "fact-world" with specific features is constructed, based on competence which is uniformly distributed in the public sphere. Construction of "fact-world" comprises specific constraints set by interaction between the institutions of journalism and public sphere. Typically, the fact construction mechanism supposes the existence of the objects and events about which it makes statements. The news media also constantly reproduce contexts in which understanding of current events is possible. It is supported by usage of different forms of reference such as deictic expressions of space and time, and by different discursive strategies (Wodak). News discourse is built around belief fixation i.e. socially shared presuppositions, which are also products of the public sphere. Common beliefs are exploited for grounding and anchoring information. In such a process, fact construction activity can be analysed in the universal pragmatic framework i.e. first of all fact construction should represent (Gricean) maxims of adequacy and relevance. Production of "fact-world" is determined in terms of the demand for reaching a rational public consensus. Facts cannot be facts without recognition as such by the public. Journalistic texts can be analysed as a representation of a specific situation between institutions of journalism and the public sphere, and analysis of news texts can help identify some basic features of the public sphere.

It can be seen that any given object domain is structured by particular interconnections between language, journalism practice and the public sphere. Those interconnections are explained on the basis of qualitative analysis of journalistic texts. Comparison of British, French, German and Estonian newspaper coverage of EU-related events gives an opportunity to describe variations of interpretation of said events. Differences can be handled as particular national modality of journalistic fact construction. The European public sphere is, to a great extent, an idealistic construct as evidenced by the news media of different EU member states as their news coverage reflects their respective national interests and as well as the intergovernmental dimension of EU decision making.

Protecting childhood in the digital age. The limits of UK state regulation of the global advertising and marketing industries

Meredith, Jo

*Centre for Research in Social Policy, Loughborough University
Loughborough, UK*

France, Alan

*Centre for Research in Social Policy, Loughborough University
Loughborough, UK*

Murdock, Graham

*Social Sciences, Loughborough University
Loughborough, UK*

Keywords

Social Policy, marketing, Advertising, citizenship, Regulation

Recent UK social policy focused on children and young people has emphasised the importance helping them to be active and participating citizens free from exploitation and being safe. In aiming to achieve this, one of the most challenging areas for the UK government has been around the expansion of new media and digital technology such as the internet, multi channelled TV, and on-line gaming. While a major focus of policy has been towards protecting children from risks such as sexual exploitation on the internet there has also been a growing concern about the role advertising and marketing can undermine children and young people's wellbeing. For example, a recent government enquiry was set up to explore the impact this is having on childhood in contemporary society. As a result, questions are being asked about how effective is the regulation of children and young people's exposure, in the digital age to commercial messages that emerge from the marketing and advertising industry. In this paper we explore how the present media regulation system works and how it is responding to the challenges it is facing. Historically, regulation emerged out of the need to regulate mainstream television and is built upon a form of self regulation by the industry and its partners. What we suggest in this paper is that the growth of new digital technology and the limited focus and powers of regulation is leaving gaps and creating new opportunities for the marketing and advertising industries to exploit children and young people in their search for access to sell their products. In the final section of the paper we argue for a cross cutting and inclusive form of regulation that crosses international and media boundaries as a way on increasing protection for children and young people in the future digital age.

Publicness' Public

Mateus, Samuel

Communication Sciences (Phd student), Universidade Nova de Lisboa Portugal,

Keywords

Publicness, Public Sphere, Public

Public Sphere, Public Opinion and Public stand between the most influential concepts that modernity has offered to contemporary societies. Although the critical-rational public sphere model of 18th century has suffered a process of decline with the transformation of a culture-debating to a culture-consuming society, the Public maintains a central place in contemporary discourses.

This paper considers Public's contemporary relevance questioning if it is still possible to see in it its bourgeois political function. Is there really a Public that debates civil society's issues in a critical way? When we mention the Public are we referring to an audience? How the Public may function in a rational way when public sphere has been mediatised and media work in a more pathetic (pathos) than ethical basis? We may draw the conclusion that the Public is dead.

We analyse today's Public searching for a third-way of viewing it: neither the Public is just a rational-critical agency of public sphere nor has it vanished. We argue the concept has experienced a mutation and it has to be seen in accordance to contemporary publicness.

The Public may be regarded as the result of individuals joined together sharing common emotions in publicity. Seen within a publicness theory, the Public is a set of subjectivities who look publicly for a feeling of belonging. It has the power to build communities and provide collective identities. So, in this perspective, the Public still exists although in a different manner: it performs a social narrative able to give individuals a sense of security. Publics are public communities disseminated through society carried out in new processes of communication that use media to obtain a worldwide relevance.

Restructuring Information and Communication Network in the Public Realm: The Practice of e-government and Turkey

Asrak Hasdemir, Tugba

Public Relations, Gazi University Faculty of Communication Ankara, Turkey

Keywords

e-government, political public sphere, democratic governance, information network and public administration

Restructuring Information and Communication Network in the Public Realm: The Practice of e-government and Turkey

In recent years, the policy of e-government has important part in the overall policies of European Union on the information and communication. As in the different part of the world, information and communication technologies develop with vertiginous speed in Europe. The impact of the developments of information and communication technologies on the flow of information from government to citizens is one of the important subjects which should be elaborated to understand current developments in the arena of communication. In that sense, the issue of e-government could be analyzed to understand the changing nature of relationship between citizens and state and also to elaborate restructured pattern of information and communication network. As recently introduced practices, the practice of e-government has certain defenders as well as opponents. Defenders of the e-government propose the applications of e-government could serve for government's transparency and accountability. In general, it is added that a government theoretically moves more towards a true democracy with the proper application of e-government. But opponents of this practice emphasize that e-government could create false sense of transparency and accountability since information can be added or removed from public eye with or without public notice. And discussion goes on.

In the study, the first part is dedicated to the discussion on e-government in the literature. Turkey will become locus of the analysis of e-government in the second part. The practices of e-government in Turkey will be treated in reference with the system in EU, by also regarding the differences between these system, especially related with being a part of different levels as national or supranational level. The main question in the study is whether and how e-government practices contribute to communication between citizens and state in the public sphere.

Symbols of Statehood, Legitimation, and Power in the Depiction of Heads of State in German and US-American Annual Reviews

Müller, Jan

School of Humanities and Social Sciences, Jacobs University Bremen, Germany

Keywords

Germany, representation, Visual, USA, statehood

The depiction of heads of state in the media offers a good opportunity to study symbols of statehood, legitimation, and power. Depictions of heads of state are usually carefully staged and use a set of symbols to underline their claim for representation, legitimation, and leadership.

Examples of these symbols are national flags, arrangement of persons, clothing (formal / informal), and setting (like military parades, state visits, or interview situations). Televised annual reviews summarize the most important events of the year. They are well-suited to study the structure of these representations and to study changes over time and across nations. Depictions of stateheads in annual reviews from 1999 to 2008 from the USA (ABC, CBS, NBC) and Germany (ARD) are selected and qualitatively analyzed with regard to the representation of statehood, legitimation, and power. A quantitative content analysis of the material reveals differences in representations over time and across Germany and the USA.

An innovative aspect of the project is the modelling and analysis of the visuals with the help of techniques from computer science, specifically from the field of automatic image recognition.

Based on prior research, the author expects a) a convergence of the representation of statehood, legitimation, and power in the USA and Germany over time and b) a development over time away from traditional formal settings towards informal settings.

The project will test these hypotheses.

The Intellectual Labour in the Age of Digital Remix

Borrelli, Davide

Scienze Sociali e della Comunicazione, Università del Salento Lecce, Italia

Stazio, Marialuisa

Scienze Umane e Sociali, Università di Cassino Napoli, Italia

Keywords

audience labour, mass media and interactive media, general intellectual activity, Production and Consumption, digital remix

The paper starts by the hypothesis that, in the industrialised West, in so called post fordist society, the areas of production of value includes free time, as an area of consumption. Production time includes free activities aiming not at remuneration or career gains but rather at defending and improving one's existence, identity and sense of belonging, that converts all the people into active population and the lifetime into labour time. This paper specifically looks at the inter-relations between production and consumption and at the field of productivity traditionally identified as 'consumption'. We consider the field of the general intellectual activity concerning the consumers: the work that enriches, promotes and enhances products, when it comes to both making them socially 'exchangeable' in 'word-of-mouth marketing' involving interpersonal interactions and designing new products in the communicative interaction of needs and desires. In this field, the consumer's general intellectual activity creates positive externalities to productive system.

Consumption is evidently linked to discursive and informative practices of the cultural industries and to public and private policy-making, organizing the supply. The general intellectual activity works hand in hand with mainstream communication and production system, by providing it with the reservoir of topics, subjects, languages and forms available for being manipulated. This process becomes partially visible and 'identifiable' in on-line communication, in the social network and in mass self-communication (Castells 2006), and can be identified (although proper investigation of the phenomenon is undoubtedly called for) in the continuum between interpersonal interaction, whether face to face or mediated by cell phones and personal computers, and the many to many communication found in the social web of blogs and You Tube. Generally, at the onset of digital communication technologies we can observe a shift from the production of contents in the age of its mechanical reproduction (Benjamin, 1936) to generation of contents in the age of its digital remix (Lessig, 2008).

The Media Construction of Europeanization in the Context of Tendentious Modernity

Schifirnet, Constantin

Communication and Public Relations, National School of Political Science and Administrative Studies Bucharest, ROMANIA

Keywords

identity, Mass Media, Europeanization, tendentious modernization, society

The Media Construction of Europeanization in the Context of Tendentious Modernity

Professor Constantin Schifirnet

Faculty of Communication and Public Relations

National School of Political Science and Administrative Studies,

ROMANIA

e-mail cschifirnet@yahoo.com

Abstract

The goal of this paper is to broaden the knowledge of the process of Europeanization through media in a society which has had a different modernization trend than many of EU member states. This is what has come to call tendentious modernity.

Focusing the Romanian case, the paper discusses how the relation between modernization and Europeanization has changed till today.

In the first part it is analyzed the Europeanization in relation with the requests of citizens regarding the construction of the European space in every country and at EU level. The object is identifying Romanians' requests regarding Europeanization and the channels to transmit and acknowledge these requests.

In the second part I study the mass media as an important agent in expressing citizens' problems related to the Europeanization process, to the degree in which mass media reflect the projects, governmental or other social actors' projects regarding the Romanian society's Europeanization.

The third part examines mass media as an agent of Europeanization in the process of transition from the tendentious modernity of Romanian society to structural modernity of the European community.

The example of Romanian society shows that the construction of European identity can succeed through the national identity, and that the mass-media reflect various images, conceptions and points of view about the Europeanization.

Key words: Europeanization, identity, mass media, society, tendentious modernity

Understanding Virtualization Challenges: Identities of "Virtual Worlds" Makers

Popov, Dmitry

*General Sociology Department, Higher School of Economics
Moscow, Russian Federation*

Keywords

virtualization of society, intellectuals, social communications

Virtuality is a space where real objects are replaced by simulations. Researchers of virtualization see surrounding world as set of the "layers" forming difficult multidimensional space. Logic of virtuality penetrates into traditional institutes of society such as economics, politics or family and changes them dramatically.

The main task of our research is to extend our scientific knowledge concerning virtualization of society. There are several questions to answer. Who creates virtuality? What is the world-view of these people? What are their most important distinguishing features? To answer these questions we started the study of intellectual professional groups which are directly connected to virtuality making. Intellectuals become founders and "ideologists" of the virtual worlds, special zones of symbolic and value concentration in virtuality. These parallel virtual worlds are appearing in every subsystem of society. We may say after Walter Benjamin that the reality entered into a new era of technological reproduction.

In 2006-2007 we conducted a retrospective study of virtual worlds makers in Russian Soviet and Post-Soviet mass-media. We were using two arrays of published images as basis for sociological visual analysis. The results of this study were presented at the 8th ESA Conference.

At the second investigation phase, which is under way in 2008-2009, visual aspects give way to verbal, text aspects. Focused interviews become the main research method. We analyze intellectual professional groups connected with virtual worlds developing, journalists, PR-advisers, actors, etc. This makes it possible to take a look at societal transformation through the eyes of people, who make this transformation.

The latest results reveal important shifts in self-consciousness and day-to-day practices of virtuality creators and consumers. In the current paper we concentrate on several focal points, exposing the most important changes. These changes are in time and space perception, in extended role of a game (as social communication and profession), in attitude towards simulation and simulacra.

Valuing responsible photography or privileging immediate spectacle? The case of World Press Photo

Barradas, Carlos

CES, Centre for Social Studies

Coimbra, Portugal

Keywords

World Press Photo, responsibility, Photography, perceptions

During the last 54 years, the World Press Photo (WPPH) Foundation has been one of the most important institutions in promoting high professional standards in press photography from all around the world to the general public. As one of the WPPH activities, the contest brings together the social and cultural relevance of its themes with the aesthetics in picture making, therefore valorising the photographer's work beyond the traditional use in newspapers and magazines. The itinerant exhibition, composed by the award winning photographs, is visited by two million people over 45 countries worldwide annually (www.worldpressphoto.org), an estimate that mirrors its relevance at a popular level.

As widely discussed, nowadays photography is more than a means to document an event, rather it is an instrument to expose and generate intense debates over specific subjects, such as poverty, war, immigration, gender issues, environment, science, etc. The winning photo of the 2001 WPPH Edition, 'The Uncounted' by Lara Jo Regan, which brought to light the situations of thousands of Americans, is just one of the multiple examples. Photography's ambivalent role, at a time regulatory and/or oppressing, possesses an undeniable influence in today's society. This undefined character demands some questions to be asked, such as: as a global cultural actor, does the WPPH lead to the establishment of relevant articulations between photography and social critique? Do the awarded photographs appeal to reflection on a specific subject? Can photography in general and the WPPH in particular have practical effects in denouncing suffering and social injustice?

The purpose of this paper is to expose the perceptions/assumptions/convictions/ideas that become embedded in WPPH's awarded photographs and following exhibition, considering its hypothetical practical utility in valuing social justice and human rights. To that intent, interviews to visitors of the exhibition will be analysed, as well as the commentaries left in the exhibition's guestbook, the testimonials of the awarded photographers, staff from the WPPH and the selected jury from one edition.

Virtual Communities as a Technological Corollary of the Global Environment

Hordila - Vatamanescu, Elena - Madalina

Communication and Public Relations, College of Communication and Public Relations, The National School for Political Sciences and Public Administration, Bucharest Bacau, Romania

Keywords

Globalization, social media, virtual community

It has become obvious that starting with the end of the last century, humanity had passed into a new period ? the informational era. The reality of the past centuries can be characterized by ubiquity, by instantaneity, by technological development in the communication field. The former realities have been changed by the ideal of emancipation based on oscillation, on plurality and on the tendency of unification and global interaction. In this perspective, it is likely to state that every act of communication in the contemporary society implies the existence of a worldwide potentiality which may come to surface at any moment.

Moreover, the representation of a global environment has brought to light a multiple system of approaches liable to re-define and re-configure the perception of similarity or of alterity. The world seems wide open as Internet users contact or participate in virtual communities and the growth in membership and usage is expected to continue. The popularity of virtual communities reflects the fact that individuals from different corners of the world are using new technologies, such as the Internet, to discuss shared interests (communities of interest), to develop social relations (communities of relationships) and to explore new identities (communities of fantasy) at a global scale.

At this point, a certain question is liable to become a veritable object of interest: which attributes may account for the approach of a virtual community as a technological corollary of a global community, which are the major premises of an effective virtual community as a particular form of global community.

The central objective of this paper is to propose a typology, a classification system that would be useful to researchers from various disciplinary perspectives as a foundation for theory construction. Moreover, this paper is intended to attach the proper importance to several aspects which define the ?participatory architecture? of the modern society, the strengths and weaknesses of social media in a global environment.

RN19

Sociology of Professions

'Boundaryless careers'. Polish professionals on the Irish labour market

Salamonska, Justyna

*Department of Sociology, Trinity College Dublin
Dublin, Ireland*

Keywords

migrant professionals, 'boundaryless careers', European labour market

After Ireland opened its labour market to nationals from the new EU member states (NMS) in May 2004, it became an important destination for many Central and Eastern Europeans. The debate on this East-West European migration, however, tends to mainly focus on NMS migrants who work in low skilled positions in Western European economies. Relatively little is known about NMS migrants in more skilled occupations. Hence, this paper will focus on those migrants who work in more skilled positions in construction, IT, financial services and hospitality sectors.

Using data from an ongoing qualitative panel study, the presentation will look at Polish migrants in Ireland who are working as middle-level professionals. The paper will endeavour to sketch how those migrants construct their careers beyond states' and organisations' boundaries. Migrants' working lives will be analysed in terms of what Arthur (1994) described as 'boundaryless careers' concept. Analysis will investigate whether the freedom of movement within the European labour market has opened up new career opportunities for this group of migrant professionals. It will also explore whether we can currently observe the emergence of new international career trajectories in the middle of the European labour market. Finally, through examination of choices related to acquisition of qualifications and professional associations' membership it will focus on how migrant professionals perceive their working lives, in regional, European or global terms.

References:

Arthur, M. B. (1994). "The boundaryless career: a new perspective for organizational inquiry." Journal of Organizational Behavior 15: 295 - 306.

'Making a Difference': A comparative study of UK nurses' work orientation, motivation and commitment

Durant, Lesley

*Sociology, University of Surrey
Guildford, UK*

Keywords

work, commitment, UK, nurses

A shortage of nurses has been reported globally (Lynn and Redman 2005) and in developed countries in particular (Aiken et al 2004). The situation in the UK is no different, with the NHS and care homes continuing to struggle with high staff turnover rates and low morale evidenced by difficulties with nurse recruitment and retention (Finlayson et al 2002). This raises concern within the nursing profession and the UK government as to whether the current number of trained nurses will be adequate for the future needs of the NHS and other health and social care providers, especially given the ageing population of the UK (Shields and Ward 2001).

This research study used in depth, qualitative interviews to explore with 50 qualified women nurses (38-56 years) why they chose to stay in nursing and to investigate their future career intentions. The study contrasts 25 nurses working in the UK NHS and 25 nurses working in the UK care home sector (in nursing and residential homes), focusing on the concepts of work orientation, commitment and motivation, work-life balance and the structural opportunities and constraints within their work organizations.

The results of the study indicate that nurses' motivations to stay are complex, yet one crucial element is that these nurses still have a passion for nursing and that this passion can be conceptualized as nursing 'vocation' in the 21st century. The results are framed in terms of the applicability of work orientation, motivation, commitment and Becker's (1960) 'side bet' theoretical model (the option of leaving the occupation is perceived as too costly), for example, economic ties such as pension accumulation or social costs in the form of friendship bonds with colleagues outweigh the option of leaving the job or career.

Whilst the results are particular to nurses working in the South East of England, this study may have policy implications for policy makers - nurse employers, the UK and other European governments, who are seeking ways to retain qualified, experienced nurses.

A socio-material analysis of the impact of electronic patient information systems on the practice of healthcare professionals within the U.K : Beyond a socio-technical systems approach

Crinson, Iain

*Community Health Sciences, St Georges, University of London
London, U.K*

Keywords

socio-material analysis, electronic patient records, realist evaluation

This paper utilises a socio-material analytical framework in order to assess recent developments in the interaction of healthcare professionals with patient Information systems in the U.K.

The background to this paper is the rolling-out of the National Programme for Information Technology (NPfIT) within the U.K National Health Service. One of the key policy objectives for this programme is the construction of an 'Extended Choice Network' (ECN) designed to facilitate the commissioning of services from a much wider range of healthcare providers than hitherto in the U.K, in order to achieve the goal of wider patient choice and value-for-money.

Drawing upon case study research conducted both in the public and private healthcare sectors, the paper seeks to examine the impact on professional practice of these new forms of patient information flow which utilise electronic patient records, and extend across traditional healthcare organisational boundaries and between divergent groups of health and social care professionals.

In assessing these developments, the paper seeks to move beyond traditional forms of STS analysis. Although the STS approach raises questions about the role and implications of new technologies in organisational life, in application this analytical approach has a tendency to either inadvertently reify technology or alternatively minimize its role due to an overdetermination of the social and cultural elements within professional practice in organisations. The socio-material approach outline in this presentation focuses on how the demands of working with information systems impact upon, and in turn are reconfigured themselves by the material practices of healthcare professions within both public and private sector healthcare organisations. The research utilises a realistic evaluative methodology in the analysis of these material practices in order to give due prominence to the specificity of the contextual conditions in which this IT programme is being rolled out.

All for medicine. Gender, Time and Professional Identity in Hospital Medicine in the UK

Tsouroufli, Maria

*School of Medicine Health Policy and Practice, University of East Anglia
Norwich, UK*

Ozbilgin, Mustafa

*Norwich Business School, University of East Anglia
Norwich, UK*

Smith, Merryn

*Sociology, University of Bristol
Bristol, UK*

Payne, Heather

School of Postgraduate Medical and Dental Education, Cardiff University Cardiff, UK

Keywords

UK, Hospital medicine, professional identity, time, Gender

Discourses of gender equality in medicine are constructed upon the numerical feminisation of the profession and the availability of flexible approaches to medical training and work. However, we demonstrate in this paper that gendered constructions of time regulate identity of medical professionalism, rendering female doctors and their temporal patterns of work problematic and risky for the status of the profession and the quality of patient care.

Drawing on narrative analysis of 20 interviews with senior National Health Service (NHS) hospital doctors, this paper discusses the way gendered discourses of time serves to inform the meaning and value that hospital doctors give to medical professionalism.

Informed by post-structuralist theory, this paper makes visible the normalisation of gendered conceptions of time, and as such reveals that gendered discourses of time are implicit but yet important sources of gendered inequalities which remained resistant to critique.

Autonomy in work in different professional groups: trends of the decade (1998-2007)

Irina, Popova

*Centre of studies of social structure, department of social mobility, Institute of Sociology RAS
Moscow, Russian Federation*

Keywords

flexibility, self-dependence at work, autonomy at work, flexible employment in different professional/occupational groups

Autonomy in work is linked in this paper to the issues of flexible employment (flexibility). In Russia's conditions, flexible employment, that is, its size, roles and institutionalization - is insufficiently researched so far. Meanwhile, Russian situation makes for actualizing not only resources and potentialities of the flexible forms of work organization, but also for character of this flexibility, its impact on various social processes, including evolving socio-professional structure.

My research of some trends in work autonomy as a characteristic of flexible employment in different professional/occupational groups has been made on the basis of the international monitoring survey "Social differences in contemporary Russia" (1999 and 2007 surveys have been made by the Institute of Sociology, Russian academy of sciences using comparable methods in an All-Russian representative sample). Three types of autonomy were analyzed (basing on self-estimates of workpeople) - in the contents of work, in its organization, and its full autonomy. Analysis thus made permitted to conclude that evolution of the autonomy types is changing during the recent ten years in characteristics of workpeople of different professional/occupational groups, as well as in conditions of their work and workplaces. Overall character of the changes in the structure of autonomy may be defined, as some traits demonstrate, as a transition from a state of crisis(1998) to a more regulated situation (2007) basically determined by the situation in the production units of government-owned property forms. Its various forms in different professional/occupational groups have been differentiated. Generally, full autonomy, a leading type during the 1990th, shrinks not only in numbers, but also qualitatively. In the meantime, autonomy in the work contents is on the increase. Autonomy in work organization remains stable in many parameters.

Bringing in gender, class and ethnicity into theorizing about professions

Magdalenic, Sanja

Department of Sociology, Stockholm University Stockholm, Sweden

Keywords

ethnicity, Gender, class, Professions, theory

On the whole, the professions literature has paid rather modest attention to how gender, class and ethnicity operate in the realm of professions. Some empirical evidence, even though fragmentary and culled from different professions and national contexts reveals how the notions of gender, class and ethnicity impact upon the structure of, and individual career trajectories in particular professions. What still needs to be done, however, is to integrate gender, class and ethnicity into theorizing about professions. Drawing on own research and secondary sources, in this paper I argue that an analytical model that combines macro, meso and micro levels of analysis can improve our knowledge about the ways in which gender, class and ethnicity shape, and are shaped by inter- and intraprofessional relations. Instead of studying gender, class and ethnicity separately and viewing them as social categories, we need to examine how these social distinctions interrelate and how they operate on different analytical levels. Applying such a multi-dimensional approach poses a challenge to the sociology of the professions. To reach a better understanding of how gender, class and ethnicity influence continuity and change in the professions we need to examine how professions are structured, how power relations are formed in their different organizational arenas and how individual professionals deal with the structural possibilities and constraints they encounter.

Changing Professional Autonomy in the Context of Institutional Change

Kragh Jespersen, Peter

*Economics, Politics and Public Administration, Aalborg University
Aalborg, Denmark*

Houlberg Salomonsen, Heidi

*Economics, Politics and Public Administration, aalborg University
Aalborg, Denmark*

Keywords

Medicine, civil service, institutional change, autonomy

Professions act in strongly institutionalized contexts which affect and regulate their rights, duties, roles and autonomy but are at the same time institutional actors affecting the institutional context (Scott 2008) in order to protect professional autonomy. Because of this changes in professions and their autonomy are partly explained by influence from changing institutional contexts and partly by deliberate and strategic professional reactions. This is well known in the literature on professions and institutions (Kuhlmann 2006, Leicht & Fennell 2008). What haven't received sufficient attention is how different types of institutional contexts and changes within these affect different professions autonomy? And how these changes are affected by different types of professions? We will address these questions by exploring: how changes in different institutional contexts affect the autonomy of two different types of professions. And secondly explain the reactions by the two professions in general, and reactions in order to preserve their autonomy in particular. These questions are explored empirically by a comparative historical case-study of Danish medicine and civil service

The paper is based on Hargrave and Van de Ven's recent typology of institutional changes (2006), supplemented by the concept of institutional logics (Friedland & Alford 1991). The general idea is that initial institutional change will affect the autonomy of the professions, causing professions to react in order to preserve their autonomy and affect the institutional changes in favour of their profession.

The paper has an explanatory ambition using a comparative case-design, designed to identify the causal mechanism(s) whereby institutional changes affect professions' autonomy (Gerring 2004; Tsoukas 1989). The causality suggested in the model are complex, as the causal relation between professions' autonomy and institutional changes is reciprocal as changes in professions' autonomy also potentially affect the institutional changes, as professions act strategically in order to preserve their autonomy. Hence a main expected theoretical contribution of the empirical analysis is not the identification of an expected co-variation between various types of institutional change and autonomy, but the identification of different roles of the professions in the process of institutional change, when explaining how different types of institutional change affect professions' autonomy.

Comparative Perspective about University Professors and Professional Ethics. Research Projects in Spain and Mexico

Hirsch, Anita

Research Institute about the University and Education, National Autonomous University of Mexico Mexico Distrito Federal, Mexico

Perez-Castro, Judith

Division Academica de Educacion y Artes, Universidad Juarez Autonoma de Tabasco Villahermosa, Mexico

Keywords

Spain, Mexico, professional ethics, University Professors

The Spanish research project was developed by Dr. Juan Escámez, Dr. Rafaela García López and Dr. Gonzalo Jover in three universities: Jaime I, Valencia and Complutense of Madrid. The sample was of 250 professors. The second project is from the National Autonomous University of Mexico (UNAM), coordinated by Dr. Anita Hirsch, with a sample of 719 professors.

In both countries the principal objective was to find out the attitudes of professors towards the ethical education in the university. In both the relevance of the professors is central, especially for promoting the value of responsibility in professional work.

The principal methodological strategy was the construction and application of an attitude scale. The instrument is not the same in both projects, but part of it used the same issues. We compared some of the results and conclusions.

In UNAM, the questionnaire also required the answer to open questions. One of them is if the professors considered important to include a compulsory subject about professional ethics in all the university careers. Even if the majority (75%) indicated that all the educational institutions should include this type of subjects, some of them indicated that it is more the obligation of the institution and not especially of the academics. In Spain 74% considered that the institution should attend the training about professional ethics. The professors in the sample did not feel the necessity to address it directly.

Another dimension in both projects is about the classification of the answers in relation to the scientific field of the professors. In both countries the Health Sciences were the highest in promoting the ethical training of students and the lowest was from the academics in Humanities and Arts. The percentages from the professors in Physics were also low in Spain and Mexico and Social Sciences was high in both.

We consider that the comparative perspective between the two countries is very interesting and useful and that the differences and similarities in the information gathered can become an important part in the design of a strategy about ethical formation for university students.

Constructing a profession in the contemporary context: a case study of forensic practitioners

Allsop, Judith

*Health and Social Care, University of Lincoln
London, UK*

Keywords

forensic practitioners, Regulation, professional governance, public interest

In 2000, a new non statutory council for the registration of forensic practitioners (CRFP) was established in the UK. The initiative came from within the science community but was supported by the government Justice Minister, and by judicial elites. It has been funded by the Home Office and in terms of institutional structure. follows the ten-plate for professional regulation in the UK. For sociologists, the council provides a useful case study of the creation of a new professional governance body, largely in response to a perceived need within the justice system for a body to accredit practitioners and uphold standards. Over recent decades, new technologies for assessing forensic evidence used in court and other settings, have developed rapidly, creating a market for new forms of expertise. Expert evidence has to be credible, otherwise. institutions as well as practitioners of a skill or technique are brought into disrepute. In the wake of high profile cases contested within court and professional regulatory systems involving the use of new technologies, new regulatory governance systems have developed, including CRFP. The paper will: 1) describe how governmental and interested professional regulatory bodies have defined the field of forensic expertise, who comes within the remit and how the problem of 'expertise in evidence' has been framed:

2) outline the regulatory model adopted for CRFP and how this draws on models for professional regulation within the UK and may differ from other systems;

3) The governance issues encountered by CRFP to date and how these relate to shifts in thinking about regulation.

Drawing on sociological theories of the professions, the paper will take a public interest perspective but also identify competing institutional interests and the impact of wider market forces on professionalisation. In terms of method, it will draw on documentary sources and collect data from CRFP office holders. The analysis will pay particular attention to competing discourses in the policy process, the institutional architecture of governance and the practical problems of topdown regulation within the market for these expert services.

Contemporary art curators: a nonstop reshaping leading profession in the artworld. Globe trotter curators

Especial, Luísa

DEPARTMENT OF SOCIOLOGY, ISCTE
PORTUGAL,

Keywords

Careers, mobility, art curators, arts sociology

This paper refers to a PhD research in progress regarding contemporary art curators. It aims to explore the inherent complexities of a sociological comparative study on the curator. Studying curators as a sociological object presents interesting and never-ending problems. This profession or activity, depending on the countries and contexts considered, varies locally in its level of development. Its creative nature as well as the lack of a general code establishing its rules, results on highly individualized practices and different ways of understanding the role, reshaping itself not only when one focuses diverse countries but also when considering curators of a same country.

One of the most revealing questions is the difficulty of self definition, which conveys interesting perspectives to analyze the institutionalization of curating. In Portugal, for instance, few are the curators that define themselves exclusively as curators, but combine it with several other activities more easily recognizable. Other useful comparative data being observed: 1) the number of positions available for curators in institutions; 2) job vacancies and job descriptions for different positions; 3) the existence of associations of curators; 4) degree of internationalized careers.

Fourteen years have passed since Nathalie Heinich interviewed famous Swiss curator Harald Szeemann. Since then, there has been an immense growth of post graduate courses, workshops, seminars, awards, grants and literature devoted to curating. And a spreading sum of tasks or patchwork duties. One major change has been transnational mobility: it has profoundly increased, demanding from curators a worldwide knowledge that must cross national borders, when working abroad, including social, political, economic aspects. In fact, those curators who nowadays easily navigate from one country or continent to another are labeled as "globe trotter curators" or "nomadic curators".

This paper will pursue to show different processes of curating, working conditions, hierarchies, and bonds to institutions towards a European perspective. Comparative methodology helps us encompassing a broader analyze of a more than ever cross borders activity.

Deontological and methodological research questions in sociology of professions

Freire, João

CIES, ISCTE

Lisboa, Portugal

Oliveira, Luisa

CIES, ISCTE

Lisboa, Portugal

Lopes, Noémia

CIES, ISCTE

Lisboa, Portugal

Veloso, Luisa

CIES, ISCTE

Lisboa, Portugal

Keywords

Research ethics, methodology, Professions, Professional Associations, Social conditions of research

Taking into account the social conflicts and the several forces present in the field of professions, it is aimed to reflect upon some ethical and methodological questions of the scientific research when studying the dynamics of professions and its associations. Taking as empirical support a research developed on the health sector and the main objectives of a future research project in this field, the authors propose a critical reflection upon the research activity and the social pressure to which researchers are submitted when focusing on social fields where conflicts of interests and antagonist positions within professions prevail. It is intended to discuss the limits and the statements that researchers must define taking into account the ethic principles of research activities, the accurate methodologies of inquiring and the pressure to which the former ones are submitted. This discussion also aims to be developed taking as a broaden field the social conditions of knowledge production taking into account, namely, the fact that researches are developed, either with public funding (national and/or international), having been approved within a public contest and submitted to a scientific evaluation, either as a private demand and, therefore, private funding. This relates to different clients and their different objectives concerning research and stresses the general question of State versus Market or, in another hand, the private interests (of professional groups) versus the general interest (of the community, national or other large one). It is an issue that can be discussed in parallel with the professions and the professional associations? dynamics. Reality dynamics, social conditions of scientific knowledge production upon reality and the social uses of the research results is the main issue of this presentation.

Determining and Implementing Optimal Skill Mix of Health Professionals: A Comparative Examination of Finland, Germany, Spain, the Russian Federation and the U.K.

Bourgeault, Ivy

Health Sciences, University of Ottawa Ottawa, Canada

Kuhlmann, Ellen

*Social and Policy Sciences, University of Bath
Bath, U.K.*

Neiterman, Elena

Sociology, McMaster University Hamilton, Canada

Wrede, Sirpa

*Swedish School of Social Science, University of Helsinki
Helsinki, Finland*

Keywords

skill mix, health professionals, comparative research

Skill-mix initiatives focus on changing professional roles directly or indirectly. Direct initiatives look at enhancement (by extending roles or skills), substitution, delegation and innovation (by introducing a new type of worker). Indirect initiatives, however, modify the interface between services ? that is, where care is provided; they consider transfer (by moving the provision of a service from one health care setting to another), relocation (by shifting the location of a service without changing the people who provide it) and liaison (by using specialists in one health care sector to educate and support staff working in another sector). In this paper, we report on a comparative examination of skill mix initiatives in Finland, Germany, Spain, the Russian Federation and the U.K. undertaken for the European Observatory of the WHO.

We found that the optimal skill mix has been determined in different ways in different European contexts and has been implemented in diverse ways, according to the context. Skill-mix initiatives have sometimes been driven by the need or desire to change the professional roles of established professions or to introduce new professional roles. At other times, the initiatives have been driven by the need or desire to pursue a new strategic direction for health systems that required a shift in existing professional roles. Among five European countries that represent different types of welfare and health care systems ? Finland, Germany, Spain, the Russian Federation and the United Kingdom ? the most extensive deployment has taken place in the United Kingdom, followed by Finland; in Germany, Spain and the Russian Federation, it has taken place to a much lesser extent. Across all five countries, the initiatives that targeted changes in professional roles typically included modifications to structural factors ? particularly, legislation, regulation of the scope of practice, certification, education and training (usually the first to be modified), and often also collective financing and the public provision of services.

Doctors in construction: medical interns in the early stages of their career

Jorge, Nuno

Social and Organizational Sciences, Polytechnical Institute of Santarém Santarém, Portugal

Keywords

Integration, Medical career, Internship, Online forum

With this paper we aim to understand how recent graduates in Medicine (Interns) build their decisions regarding their career, and which strategies they adopt towards it.

In order to do it, we mobilize contributions from the sociology of professions, with the concepts of socialization, integration and professional identity, among others, and the sociology of employment, using the concept of employability.

Internship is a very interesting, and less studied part of medical formation; it combines post-graduate formation and vocational training, compulsory to enter the profession, and it represents the transition from formal education to working life, defining ways of integration and choices, towards a new social identity.

In this research, we try to assess the Interns' ability to search for jobs and manage their professional mobility. Starting from the association between employability and citizenship (which includes the participation of individuals in social life, and a dimension of interactivity), we reviewed a sample of messages posted in an online discussion forum (Medical Intern Forum), where recent graduates get information and discuss with their colleagues about many aspects of their integration on the medical career.

Drawing Cultural Maps to Professional Parish Diaconal Work

Pyykkö, Raija

TAMPERE SCHOOL OF PUBLIC HEALTH, TAMPERE UNIVERSITY
HELSINKI, FINLAND

Keywords

parish diaconal work, Occupation, boundary-work

Parish diaconal work within the Evangelical Lutheran Church of Finland has same kinds of roots and methods than health and social work. However, diaconal work has developed both historically and culturally in a distinct context whose regularities influence work within the Church. The Church's diaconal work serves to supplement the public welfare services. Diaconal workers are part of the division of labour with public social and health care occupations and as well as the division of labour of the church's occupations.

In my research, I study the jurisdiction of parish diaconal work. The analytical perspective I have used in my study lies on the concept of boundary-work, which was originally developed within the sociology of science by Thomas F. Gieryn (1983;1999). Although Gieryn (1983:791-792) examines boundary-work of science he identifies also profession's or occupation's occasions for boundary-work. Previously, I have studied inter-professional boundaries of professional parish diaconal work. I have used the concept boundary-work to describe those processes creating boundaries between different occupations. I have showed the battles when different actors draw different kinds of boundaries to the professional parish diaconal work. (Pyykkö 2004, 2007, 2008).

In my presentation I am asking if there is some kind of common features or landmarks to the professional parish diaconal work. Are all the boundaries disputed or is it possible to find some kind of agreement? The data comprise the report of the Post Structure Committee "Ordained to Serve" (2002) and the comments to the report.

Dynamics of intervention of the human resource manager within the context of mobility: risks, challenges and opportunities

Torres, Leonor

*SOCIOLOGY OF EDUCATION AND EDUCATIONAL ADMINISTRATION, UNIVERSITY OF MINHO
BRAGA, PORTUGAL*

Keywords

profile training, occupational profile, labor and employment, human resources management

The process of economic transnationalization and the unprecedented level of internationalization of financial markets brought about, not only the renewal and emergence of new occupational profiles, but also a profound stratification and fragmentation of the work reality. Organizational loyalty has been shaken and organizational identity building has lost momentum and consistency, both being replaced by a feeling of insecurity, transitoriness and general disengagement.

The human resource professional is both the face and the mask of the new values and practices that characterize the global economy. While playing out his role, this professional tends to reproduce global management models, embodying the principles of flexibility, relocation, mobility, insecurity, job instability, risk and competitiveness. Moreover, putting these values to practice calls for the adoption of cultural recontextualization strategies, disguising the dominant models with trappings that evoke grassroot professional identities developed at the workplace. To uncover this two-faced structural facet of the activities undertaken by the human resources professional, one needs to reflect on the risks, challenges and opportunities that the current context of mobility poses to this professional group.

Using the employment postings/ads published in the Portuguese weekly newspaper 'Expresso' during the period from 2006 till 2008, as our research object, we seek to identify the most fundamental structural requirements of occupational profiles publicized by employers seeking candidates for job offerings in the field of human resources management and training. We identified a total of 410 employment postings/ads over this three years period. It is believed that the understanding of the professional profile requirements most searched for by employers allows us, among other things, to more fully comprehend the form and nature of the job functions required for this field of work as well as debate the type of knowledge and skills most relevant to the carrying out of those functions. Based on this data, we strive to critically reflect upon the political and strategic role of professionals who work in the Human Resources Department and, in all likelihood, are quite aware of the inexorable globalized trends towards the consolidation of flexicurity, downsizing, (mega)merges, closure, dislocation and relocation, among other sociologically relevant dimensions.

Elements for the discussion of the "entrepreneurship movement" in Portugal: the professional group of SMEs entrepreneurs

Couto, Ana Isabel

CIES-ISCTE, CIES-ISCTE

Lisboa, Portugal

Keywords

entrepreneurship, Small and medium-sized enterprises (SMEs), SMEs Entrepreneurs

Entrepreneurship has gained particular importance in recent years and is recognised as a mean of reducing the growing trends of unemployment and as a mean of mitigating the effects of the saturation of the dominant employee work model.

Indeed, by awarding different kinds of support and incentives, a set of public policies - particularly the modern active employment policies, closely connected in our country with policies targeted to the creation and development of SMEs - has attracted a considerable number of workers, non-active people and young people who finish their studies into launching small businesses or enterprises, giving force to an entrepreneurship movement able to boost a reinvigoration and emergence of many small businesses and giving new shape to the professional group of micro, small and medium-sized enterprises (SME) entrepreneurs.

In this context, it is important to assess and discuss the existence of changes related to professional paths, social trajectories and qualification's profile of this professional group.

This paper follows an on-going doctoral thesis about the reality of micro, small and medium-sized enterprises in Portugal and its relation to the so-called entrepreneurship movement. The study has two main analytical axes: SME entrepreneurs and the concrete entrepreneurial units. The key goals of this project, presented here in broad strokes, are to identify and to analyse trends of change and persistence permeating these two analytical axes. Regarding the first axis, which should be deepened under this Research Network, the methodological design of the research includes carrying out comprehensive interviews to a limited but diverse group of SME entrepreneurs. These biographical in-depth interviews will allow us to rethink social inequalities regarding this profession.

The aim of this paper is, therefore, to share and discuss relevant issues arising from possible theoretical and empirical advances made in this specific dimension and to present a brief statistical and comparative portrait of the attitudes and representations towards entrepreneurship. Analytical priority will be given to the Portuguese context, always bearing in mind the European context which we are part of.

Employability and professional insertion´ paths: characteristics and structuring elements. The case study of higher education graduated students

Saúde, Sandra

Escola Superior de Educação, Instituto Politécnico de Beja Beja, Portugal

Keywords

skills, competences, Employability, Professional Insertion Paths

The paper that I intend to present is based on a study about the characteristics and the structuring elements of the professional insertion? paths and the employability profiles of higher education graduated students .

The results achieved indicate that employability is conditioned by individual and contextual determinants. In what concerns to the individual determinants, the dimension ?path of professional insertion?, duly contextualised by the family locus and by the training trajectory, is the one that presents more interactions with the individual?s potential to find and keep a suitable job. The experiences carried out by the individual?s trajectory help them not only to (re)build the image of job and labour markets? preferences, but also to (re)define the self-concept of knowledge, skills, abilities and personal qualities owned and/or developed by the degree. The results till now collected show that more successful professional insertion? paths tend to correlate with more pro-active job search attitudes and with higher levels of self-evaluation in what concerns the abilities and qualities needed to the professional performance.

Regarding contextual determinants, we conclude that the expectations and demands of the labour market have a strategic weight, but two key conclusions should be highlighted as far as employers? preferences are concerned: i) emphasis on the abilities and personal qualities in the ideal competences profile, associated to areas of ?knowing how to be?, ?knowing how to stand?, ?knowing how to evolve? and ?knowing to and how to act?; ii) the difference between the desired profile and the one owned by the graduates with whom employers have already carried out or are carrying out work experiences.

The results leads us to the conclusion that employability must be associated, in an operational way, to ?new? forms of ?being and acting? in a professional environment. In fact, the results suggest that professional insertion? paths and the employability profiles are structurally influenced and defined by the individual ways of ?acting and acting with competence? and by the specific evaluation done by the labour market.

Employment and earnings among male nurses and engineers: differences by gender and ethnic background

Karlsen, Hilde

*Centre for the study of the professions, Oslo University College
Oslo, Norway*

Keywords

sex-atypical, Gender, ethnicity, earnings, attrition

This paper's focus is on men in sex-atypical occupations. The aim of the study is to explore gender- and ethnic differences in attrition from nursing and engineering, and moreover, to investigate differences in earnings among individuals who leave the profession and individuals who remain employed in the profession.

Although contributors to theory on masculinity have explicitly noted that men differ greatly in the amount of social status and power they are ascribed by a society, the importance of ethnicity on men's likelihood of leaving stereotypically "feminine" professions is generally ignored in empirical studies. This paper therefore contributes to increase our knowledge on the significance of ethnic background on male attrition from the nursing profession. As it is interesting to know whether there are in fact differences between native born Norwegian men and women in the probability to leave nursing in Norway, gender differences are however explored firstly. To enable comparisons with a male-typical field, the importance of gender and ethnic background is also explored in attrition from engineering. Furthermore, gender- and ethnic differences in earnings are investigated. Analyses are based on a large census data material.

Findings suggest that native born Norwegian men have a higher likelihood of leaving positions which are primary to the nursing profession than have native born Norwegian women and non-Western male immigrants. Moreover, the two latter groups have a higher likelihood of not being employed in positions which are primary to the engineering profession.

EU constitutional project and the new "Status Activae Civitatis" of Legal Professions in Europe

Olgiati, Vittorio

Dipartimento di Studi su mutamento sociale, Istituzioni iuridiche e comunicazione, Law Faculty, University of Macerata Macerata, Italy

Keywords

Legal Profession, Organic Intellectuals, EU constitution

In accordance to a century-old tradition, European legal professions have been granted in the course of Nation-State building process with a particular institutional qualification: i.e. as veritable "boundary-agents" and "gate-keepers" between law and society: a unique qualification - the so-called "Status Activae Civitatis" - that still distinguishes them from any other professional and/or occupational group due to the special social and political value ascribed to their knowledge and know-how as necessary devices to provide a regular functioning of public order and social justice. In the last decades, however, EU constitutional process and policy not only challenged the normative contours of such State-oriented "Status Activae Civitatis" (not to be confused with the notion of "active citizenship" recently recognised to those ordinary people that take part in "deliberative democracy" proceedings or in socio-economic "subsidiarity" activities) but set up an opposite strategy in order to re-frame the everlasting professional mandate of legal professions in Europe in accordance to the same EU constitutional imperatives. In sum: the need of EU institutions to assess and protect "organically" EU super- and trans-national values and interests at constitutional level, is now leading to the creation of a new (EU-oriented) type of European legal professionals, acting as veritable EU "organic" intellectuals.

Expertise-based judgments and individual responsibility in organizations: the case of psychiatrists in prisons

Le Bianic, Thomas

IRISSO, Université Paris-Dauphine

France, <http://shadyc.ehess.fr/document.php?id=101>

Keywords

judgment, Expertise, Professions, psychiatry, responsibility

The functioning of modern and complex organizations increasingly relies upon expertise-based judgments performed by professionals. These expertises can be directed either towards objects (material or immaterial), processes or, increasingly, individuals. When their skills and formal knowledge are applied to individuals, professionals are expected to assess, evaluate and categorize people in order to give them access to specific treatments within the organisation. Once realised, these judgments circulate in organisations, and can sometimes be detrimental to the professionals or experts who have produced them. In the classical approach of professions, individual responsibility (e.g. in case of expertise failures) was collectively taken in charge by the professional community, in the frame of professional ethics. More and more, professionals are made individually accountable of the expertise-based judgments they produce. Are we assisting to a transfer of responsibility from the organisational level to the professional level (because of increasing organisational demands addressed to professionals), and secondly, from the professional level (collegial discipline) to the individual level?

An ongoing fieldwork on the role played by psychiatrists in French prisons, will serve as an illustration of this general trend in the role fulfilled by professionals in organisations. Mental health professionals in prisons are increasingly solicited by the penitentiary administration in order to deliver 'certificates' to prisoners attesting, for example, that a given inmate can be left alone in his prison cell, is not likely to commit suicide or will not be violent with his co-inmates. The wave of suicides that recently occurred in French prisons has shown that, in case of unintended problems, psychiatrists can be made individually responsible of the certificates they have produced and can be individually sanctioned by the penitentiary administration. We can also observe various forms of professional resistance to these increasing demands of expertise by organisations, professionals trying to delineate more strictly their area of competence. These expertise-based judgments, located at the frontiers of medical care and organisational needs, will be used as a case study in order to shed light on these new processes of responsabilisation of professionals in organisations.

First Line Managers Conditions of How to Handle Ethical Dilemmas in Social Work and Police

Wolmesjö, Maria

Växjö University, School of Health Sciences and Social Work Växjö, Sweden

Richard, Elvi

*Växjö University, School of Social Sciences
Växjö, Sweden*

Keywords

profession, social work, Police, first line managers, ethical dilemmas

First line managers in the Social work organisation and in the Police organisation, both have to handle ethical dilemmas in their daily work. They have a freedom of action in many situations and their decisions thereby can affect other people's life in different ways. First line managers in these chosen professions are both interesting to study of their own, but in some issues - when taking children, youths or adults into temporary custody or when there are threats and violence - social workers and policemen have to interact with each other and that makes them interesting to study together. The aim of this study is to compare what kind of ethical dilemmas first line managers in these two professional fields have to handle and their formal conditions of possibilities how to handle ethical dilemmas.

A specific reason to focus upon first line managers is the ongoing transition in management that can be shown, from leadership towards management. First line managers in the welfare sector seem to be confronting new, higher demands which often are contradictory. Some explained by New Public Management taking over these fields.

Theoretical perspectives in this paper are professional theories of autonomy and jurisdiction and theories of public ethos, democracy and economy values, attitudes and ethics. Concepts as professional work cultures, as well as concepts as set of rules and regulations and role identity are central. In this first study (which is part of a larger project) we focus upon comparing formal documents as laws, regulations and ethic codes in document analyses. Depending on how they are formed it can affect the way first line managers choose to, or have to handle. An interesting question is when there are differences, which profession will take command and make the decision? And what consequences will there be for the individuals involved?

Five years in the EU: how does it show in the changing relations within health workforce

Pahor, Majda

College of Health Studies, University of Ljubljana Ljubljana, Slovenia

Keywords

relations, Slovenia, health workforce, EU-related changes

Sociological research in the field of health professions in Slovenia is relatively recent. However, it is possible to discuss changes of structure and agency of health care work in the last 15 to 20 years, covering the period when Slovenia separated from Yugoslavia and then joined European Union in 2004. The aim of the paper is related to the main theme of the Lisbon ESA conference: Is there a European society or European societies? It is obvious that regarding health care, national level is much more important than EU directives and recommendations, yet it is possible to track changes that could be interpreted in relation with the increased involvement of policies, institutions, professional groups and individuals on the European level.

The paper is based on several research projects which had looked into changes of health care workforce education, its characteristics and collaboration patterns since 1993. The author discusses some findings from those projects in the light of the broader European context. She reviews results of several studies on basic and advanced nursing education. Also, characteristics of nursing and medical workforce as shown by several surveys and qualitative studies are reinterpreted from a comparative point of view. Special attention is paid to inter professional collaboration between nurses and doctors and inter professional education for future health care professionals. Main feature of the actual health care in Slovenia is the central position of doctors and their dominant role in relation to other health professionals, public/health care users and the state. EU health policy fosters different and more equal power relations and is therefore a drive to change the existing situation. This shows (slightly) on the state level, (partly) on institutional level and very much so on the level of professional groups, especially nursing. Conclusions drawn from the existing studies remain hypothetical. More research, focused on European dimensions of the health workforce changes is needed in order to understand the dynamics of changes and its trends.

Gaining specific know-how in teacher education

Rosenberger, Katharina

Standort Strebendorf, University College of Teacher Education Vienna/Krems Vienna, Austria

Keywords

teacher training, teaching to diversity, qualitative research

Dealing with heterogeneity (learning abilities, cultural background, gender etc.) requires from teachers in compulsory schools a number of specific qualifications. In order to realise in a pedagogical fruitful way the potential of pupils as well as to overcome difficulties in communication and integration they need knowledge about certain obstacles in the process of learning (i.e. difficulties in learning and communicating) and about pedagogical and pragmatic options (i.e. teaching techniques).

The paper will present a three-year research project (start 2008) which aims to analyse how students of a University College of Teacher Training cope with the challenges of their teaching practice. We assume that only by means of a special training in the perception and understanding of particularities one is able to act pedagogically in such a way to do justice to the demands of individual pupils. We understand thereby the dealing with heterogeneity as a cross-section task, which means it is seen as a basic competence in the profession which therefore cannot be limited to specific fields of teaching. For that reason we address the question at what point heterogeneity becomes a crucial factor in teaching. The focus is therefore on the process by which specific differences become relevant in the concrete teaching situation.

The study thus focuses on two main topics:

- 1) the ability of students to identify certain differences as relevant to a teaching/learning situation,
- 2) the ability of making on-the-spot-decisions in concrete diversity situations which require instantaneous action.

The qualitatively oriented research project combines a number of methods which analyse and describe the perceptive, the interpretative and the practical skills which enable students to perceive and to professionally react to the relevant differences of the pupils. The results of the picture and text vignettes (perceptive and interpretative skills) as well as the cognitive test (knowledge of the topic of heterogeneity) of the introductory phase (beginner students) will be presented at the conference. As the data collection will not be ready before the end of the course there can be no results yet concerning the longitudinal analysis (comparison with these students at the end of their studies).

Governing a Health Professional Work Force in Flux: Policy Dynamics and Employment patterns in Medicine and Nursing

Kuhlmann, Ellen

*Social and Policy Sciences, University of Bath
Bath, United Kingdom*

Larsen, Christa

Institute for Economics, Labour and Culture, Goethe University Frankfurt/Main Frankfurt, Germany

Keywords

employment trends, medicine, health policy, workforce governance, nursing

Workforce governance is increasingly recognised as a key issue of health policy and a source for innovating healthcare systems. New health policies attempt on changing the skill-mix of the workforce and improving the management of professional performance. Dynamics also arise from bottom-up changes in the health professional workforce, such as professionalisation and new emerging professional groups, increasing labour market participation of women, migration and mobility. This paper sets focus on the professions as backbone of the healthcare systems and key of workforce governance. Analysis of employment patterns and workforce trends in medicine and nursing in Germany in the last decade serve as case studies to explore how policy matters. In terms of methodology we use document analysis and public data files. We will highlight two conclusions drawn from the analysis: first, our data reveal new inequalities in the German health workforce between medicine and nursing and private and public provider organisations and their gendered effects; second, the findings highlight that blockades towards more effective workforce governance are not only an outcome of "boundary work" and "tribalism" of professions but embedded in the regulatory structure of healthcare systems. Finally, we will place our results in the context of an emerging European health workforce and discuss some suggestions for future research into comparative health workforce governance.

Governmental Control of Professional Work

Støkken, Anne Marie

*Faculty of Economics and Social Sciences, University of Agder
Kristiansand, Norway*

Nordstoga, Sigrid

*Faculty of Economics and Social Sciences, University of Agder
Kristiansand, Norway*

Keywords

child welfare, quality assesment, competetion

This paper deals with the effects of creating a new system for quality assurance for residential care in the Norwegian child welfare service. From January 2004, what may be regarded as a new 'control regime' was established. Then the responsibility for and the control of child welfare institutions was transferred from the county authorities to five regional authorities which had been established by the Ministry for Children and Family Affairs. In addition to running a set of governmental institutions, the regional authorities also are buying a number of places in private institutions. After January 2004 contracts between the child welfare authorities and private institutions should be established on the basis of competition, while previously they were established as bilateral agreements, often based on long-term co-operation. At the same time, all the institutions had to go through a quality evaluation process. A set of indicators were given by the Ministry and the regional authorities assess the institutions according to these indicators. In the paper we will focus on the implications for the professional social work in a context of quality assessment and competition. The main purpose is to examine to what extent formal quality indicators may grasp the vital aspects of daily life and professional work in residential care and to what extent the daily routines and professional judgements are influenced by the indicators. With reference to Abbot (1988), among others, we will analyse the position and the development of the social work's jurisdiction in this new control regime. The discussion in the paper is based on empirical data from the project 'A control regime in transition?', supported by the Ministry for Children and Family Affairs. The project work started at the end of 2004 and has been following the new control regime for a period of three and a half years. The data are collected by qualitative interviews and document analyses as well as by observation of negotiations between regional authorities and private actors.

Harmonizing occupational regulation in the EU transport sector: institutions, participants, and outcomes

Haas, Joachim

LIRHE-CRM Toulouse University, CEREQ Toulouse, France

Keywords

transport sector, occupational regulation, Occupational licensing, europe

Since the 1990's entry requirements of a growing number of transport occupations are subject to harmonization at European level (air traffic controller, train crew, boatmaster etc.). The core intent of this occupational harmonization in terms of training and certification is to ease transnational, safety-critical transport service.

Our contribution analyzes three characteristics of this Community rule-making: institutions, participation, and outcomes. The characteristics are treated taking train drivers and aircraft maintenance technicians as privileged cases. These occupations represent the two contrasting frameworks of the European occupational harmonization observed so far.

The two case studies provide evidence that up to now no uniform regulatory model has institutionalized. Instead, a model of technically focused regulation (ex: aircraft technician) can be distinguished from a model of socially negotiated regulation (ex: train driver). In the first model, the essential criterion legitimizing rules is "safety"; the codes are ultimately fixed by a competent European authority. In the social regulation model, by contrast, the common occupational norms are established by way of industrial bargaining between European employer and trade union federations. In this model, cost moderation of the new rules is of high priority.

In each model a specific principle of participant selection is applied. In the social regulation model the participation of an association formally depends on its "representativeness". In the model of technical regulation, by contrast, associations are typically co-opted by virtue of "technical expertise". It will be shown that both principles are weakened by lobbying operations of professional organizations.

Finally, the outcomes of the regulation process are by no means uniform. Most notably, both occupational cases diverge in relation to the inter-firm portability of the permit to practice. Further differences refer to density, scope and rigidity of the rules. We will discuss this overall heterogeneity in the light of the classical debate on the basic motivation of occupational regulation: ensuring quality vs. restricting competition (Kleiner, 2006).

Headmaster leadership in public schools: complexity and change

Augustinsson, Sören

Department of health and society, Kristianstad University College Kristianstad, Sweden

Brynolf, Margrethe

Education, Kristianstad university college Kristianstad, Sweden

Keywords

organizing, management, professions organizations

Why does not the teacher staff act according to the school management documents? Why are not the latest curriculum and its contents within public schools carried through? Why do not the rational forms of implementation and management, recommended by management literature, work? (Alvesson & Svenningsson 2003); Bartunek 2006; Brunsson 2007; Morrison 2002; Pye 2006; Weick & Sutcliffe 2001; Weisly). Furthermore they are used for managing Swedish public School. Managing Swedish public organizations, as for example public schools, has been discussed and there are controversies as to why actions as management models, laws and other regulations do not give the intended results as expected (Scherp and Scherp 2007). The article presents a study material from a large number of schools where daily life of headmasters has been studied and documented by qualitative studies as interviews and observations. The question we ask in these studies is: what are headmasters doing and why? The article, with its empirical material and theoretical issue, give a comprehension and explanation of why logic and contents of management sometimes fail to correspond to logic and contents in practice. To answer questions about implementation and management this article sets out from what actually happens within organizations, and not what is expected to happen. You cannot explain a rule by another one; a rule needs to be explained by its practice (Wittgenstein in Johannesson 1999 p.86) or, as we say in the article: management must set out from complexity and mess of practice (Alvesson and Svenningsson 2007; Stacey 2003; Abrahamsson and Eddington 2006. In the article we points out that when the abstract and the simplified meet the concrete and complex, problems will arise. It is a concerning that the thought is not bound to time, space and complexity, which is the fact regarding the concrete and the real. Instead of setting out from the higher management's idealized view of what happens in a school staff room and classrooms we will set out from our empirical material where, on the contrary, headmasters' every day life turns out to be complex and dynamic.

Health professions, the state and the family: a comparison of the governance of home care services in family-centred European countries

Izzo, Marina

Department of Social and Policy Sciences, Univesrity of Bath Bath, United Kingdom

Keywords

Italy, Spain, elderly, homecare

One of the most topical and problematic issues to be faced by the European countries is their progressively ageing population. This process will increasingly require the establishment of well-designed long-term care systems in order to meet the needs of frail older people.

Only few studies have focussed on this topic, and a number of aspects are still underdeveloped, on top of this the role of the family as a key actor in the provision of home care.

This paper seeks to explore the governance of home care in two traditionally family-centred countries, namely Italy and Spain, focusing in particular on the functions performed by the family as primary informal caregiver and taking also in account the gendered dimensions of home care. Analysis of key policy documents and expert interviews carried out with providers and users of home care services in the two countries will serve the analysis.

The aim of the paper is two-fold: first, to explore whether the shared belief in the concept of 'family' as the main welfare provider in these countries is one of the key reasons of the scarce presence of the state in key areas of social policy, such as the home care services for the elderly; second, to illustrate the intersections between changing gender relations and governance arrangements, thus crossing the public-private divide embedded in the provision and the governance of home care.

How do social and ethnic background and gender affect the choice of educational field?

Helland, Håvard

*Centre for the study of professions, Oslo University College
Oslo, Norway*

Keywords

educational choice, ethnicity, class, Gender

Analyzing data on the entire cohort who embarked upon upper secondary education in Norway in 1999, the proposed paper examines the choices of educational field in tertiary education. The data are extracted from different administrative registers, and contain information on the educational activity of this cohort until 2005 (that is five years after they were supposed to complete their upper secondary education). The fact that background characteristics and gender affects the level of educational attainment is well established in prior research, but how such characteristics affect the choice of field in higher education is less well known. The proposed paper examines such questions, and focuses on differences between the different professional groups on the bachelor level, such as teaching, nursing, social work, engineering, and pre-school teaching. The paper compares the composition according to ethnicity, social background and gender in the different professional educations, and compares it both to the composition in the group who do not start any higher education and to those who choose traditional academic fields of study. The analyses show large differences between the different educational fields. Most striking is, not surprisingly, the gender differences, and whereas some fields, like nursing, have a large majority of female students, others, like engineering have a majority of male students. More surprising, perhaps is the finding that immigrants from non-Western countries more often choose the more prestigious master programs at the universities. Social background is measured by parents' education and income, and the analyses show tendencies to reproduce the social position of the parent. For instance does Parents' income have a marked positive effect on the probability of choosing business administration, and if the parents have a degree in social work or teaching the offspring tend to choose similar educational fields.

Human capital of Socio-Professional Groups as a Factor of Modernization of Russian Society

Anikin, Vasilii

*Socio-Economic Systems and Social Policy, PhD Student, Higher School of Economics (Moscow)
Moscow, Russia*

Keywords

socio-professional structure, modernization, human capital

It is supposed to present main findings of investigation accomplished under theoretical line posed modernization as a complex process of changes directed to socio-economic status among the societies that are traditionally comprised into a core of global world-system order (via I. Wallerstein). Since the 70-s last century scientists have recognized a correlation between an innovative development of domestic economy and special type of socio-professional structure, in which qualified workers play a dominant role. So the very credo of the report is ? modernization of Russian economy in many respects is concerned with a competitive capacity of its socio-professional structure.

The main data source of our research is The Russian Longitudinal Monitoring Survey (RLMS), a series of nationally representative surveys designed to monitor the effects of Russian reforms on the health and economic welfare of households and individuals. We estimated (using standard statistical means and procedures) the order of satisfying of workers of different occupations to the requirements of their positions within socio-professional hierarchy of Russian society (working with a well-known occupational classification scheme ISCO-88 that we specially adapted for the Russian reality). What is more, contrary to traditionally assumed dichotomy between white- and blue-colors we revealed some patterns of behavior of low-qualified both non-manual and manual workers (clerks and plant/machine operators) primarily concerning their human capital (in a wider interpretation). In rare cases they think about the human capital they are likely to get new specialty that seems to be explained as an attempt to obtain a higher position in socio-professional structure that is a sense of unsteadiness of these trades in Russia forced, in addition, by migration on labor markets.

Taking these and other points into account, especially as compared with developed countries, we consider Russia as a pre-modernized socio-economic system with appropriate socio-professional structure and labor values of its main actors (orientation for reproduction; weak professional self-expression accord; completion censure etc.).

We hope the comprehension of human capital of different occupation groups posed to determine development of Russian society as a socio-economic system will help us to cope with alike theoretical and instrumental problems of other transition societies.

Human Resource Management: a professional field of "good people"

Almeida, António José

Human Resource Management, Instituto Politécnico de Setúbal Setúbal, Portugal

Keywords

Human resource management, human resource professionals, competencies, professionalization

The increasing adherence of human resources professionals to the discourse and the values of managerial ideology contribute to their recognition in the business world. Since they assume themselves as partners in the fight for economic competitiveness and in the defence of financial results of the business, human resources professionals replaced the ideology of the welfare by the ideology of the management. Therefore, their role, particularly in the context of the societies of advanced capitalism, has been marked by the increasing sophistication of their means of symbolic action. Being so they are in charge of implementing practices of self-discipline of the workers in a society where the cult of performance has become the hegemonic social value

Confronted with the existence of interests that are in conflict and crossed by the mark of the heterogeneity, human resources professionals tend to use the implementation of practices based on self-discipline of the workers. These practices make sense through the mobilization of discursive resources that act as mechanisms of consented disciplining (Fournier, 1999) supporting the interests of dominant economic and cultural forces. To ensure the ideological conformity of the workers to the new forms of flexible work, human resources professionals are required to mobilize a number of competencies of a political nature that the good sense and emotional neutrality seem to be the most important ones.

Based on the issues outlined, this communication aims to report the preliminary results of a PhD research project in progress using five semi-direct interviews to the human resources directors of large Portuguese companies. Using the content analysis we discuss the role of political competencies in the course of their everyday professional practices.

The results confirm the centrality of social and political skills. Good sense is the central discursive element, because of the nature of the relational and symbolic role that human resources professionals are called to play. The emotional neutrality is another element that legitimises the everyday action which is guided by an abstract interest of the common good that the human resources professionals act as guardian.

Internal globalization of nursing: flexible professionalism in the second age of modernity

Wrede, Sirpa

*Swedish School of Social Science, University of Helsinki
Helsinki, Finland*

Keywords

nursing, Globalization, Professionalism, flexibility, Gender

Nursing is a powerful professional ideology about flexible, caring femininity that enabled the formation of modern Western health care as a societal institution. The occupation also became a central vehicle for middle class women's employment. Despite the salient internationalism of the ideology of modern nursing, the formation of the profession in the different country contexts was anchored in the cultural framings of the respective nation-state projects, as well as in the institutional approaches different states have employed in relation to the professions in general and women's occupations in particular. At present, however, nursing in all high-income countries is subjected to non-local flexibility techniques.

Using the Nordic context as a critical case, the paper considers the potential of present developments to transform the profession. The paper argues that the nation-state bound organisation of nursing is transformed from within in many high-income countries, when, first, managerialist reforms reorganize nursing work and its boundaries vis-à-vis other health care occupations, and, second, the number of domestic recruits is waning. Health care organisations have turned to international recruitment, not only to secure adequate levels of human resources but to keep labour costs low. Focusing on a high-income country context, it is evident that some groups and individuals within nursing in such countries gain new professional opportunities, at the same time as international recruits from poorer countries gain access to economic mobility by migrating. The terms for their inclusion are often unequal, however, as international recruits tend to be perceived as best suited for narrow work roles. Furthermore, strongly formalized nursing professions in Western countries often engage in protectionist practices vis-à-vis international recruits and consequently, nationality and non-domestic education are emerging as sources for new hierarchies within nursing. As a result, the profession is globalized within national contexts in ways that produce new complex ordering of nurses. Gender and ethnicity are relevant social divisions to consider but as such insufficient explanations for inequality. Finally, the paper considers the usefulness of the thesis about a 'second age of modernity' for the analysis of the present developments within nursing.

Is there such a thing as "universality" in the attempt to sustain professional identities? The case of engineers and chief physicians in Switzerland and Germany

Kels, Peter

*Competence Center for Management, Berne University of Applied Sciences
Bern 22, Switzerland*

Endrissat, Nada

*Competence Center for Management, Berne University of Applied Sciences
Bern 22, Switzerland*

Keywords

professionals, Identity Work, career, flexibility, cultures of professional work

Professionals in the public as well as the private sector are faced with changing work conditions that arguably upset central aspects of their professional identities. For example, engineers are increasingly required to be flexible and mobile and to take on different tasks in international, short-term projects. In particular, they are challenged by the fact that they have less agency and control over their individual career and - at the same time - need to take on more responsibility for employability. Chief physicians, on the other hand, have to deal with the advent of neo-liberal market economics and the increased importance of managerial logic and practices in their hospital and clinics. This challenges central aspects of their professional identity such as the belief in autonomy and peer-control, their expert status, superiority and centrality for the functioning of the hospital.

Despite various differences between these two professional groups, we found several parallels in the ways in which they reacted towards these challenges and sustained their professional identities. Among the identity sustaining strategies are:

- a) Joking about resp. disdaining management's ability to evaluate the professionals' effort, output and significance for the organization
- b) Dissociating themselves from managerial logic through emphasis on professional values, i.e. the habituel dissociation from the managerial culture
- c) Establishing and drawing on forms of social capital (e.g. establishing close links to influential politicians or colleagues)
- d) Emphasizing and glorifying the focus of the professional work (e.g. the well-being of the patient vs. cost-efficiency, problem solving vs. administration)

Based on a heuristic that includes the professionals' self-concept, their identity strategies and identity resources that enable professionals to sustain central aspects of their identity, we will present two empirical case studies. While the first case illustrates the situation of engineers in a transnational German high-tech firm, the other case describes the situation of chief physicians in Switzerland. We will discuss whether "universal" strategies exist that help professionals in their identity work. We will also address the question whether these strategies are able to change the dominance of neo-liberal market economics or whether they actually help to institutionalize them.

Itineraries of Portuguese Public Prosecutors in the social areas: profession, professionalism and functional (re)valorisation

Dias, Joao Paulo

*Centro de Estudos Sociais da Universidade de Coimbra, Centro de Estudos Sociais da Universidade de Coimbra
Coimbra, Portugal*

Keywords

Justice, itineraries, Professionalism, Public Prosecutors

Public Prosecutors in Portugal play an important role in the performance of justice. Besides their position within the judicial system, related with the competencies and its capacity to perform them with suitability and efficiency, Public Prosecutors seek to legitimate its activity through the construction of an autonomous professional project. In this sense, and having as a starting point the study of their role in the Labour and Family and Minors' Courts (the social areas of their intervention), it is possible to understand some of the professional strategies and itineraries developed, on the one hand, to ensure the socio-professional statute and, on the other hand, to preserve, or even increase, their legal competencies.

In spite of this process have been developed, for a long time, through an internal affirmation (within the judicial system), we can perceive, nowadays, the search for another way for an external legitimation (with society and its citizens). The main argument starts to question the actual collective professional itineraries, in a context of judicial reforms, higher social complexity, bigger professional competition and the implementation of new mechanisms of dispute resolution, trying to characterise the 'structuring' place in the system, through a new approach to the (re)valorisation project of Public Prosecutors in Portugal.

Job satisfaction in social services: The importance of recognition and organizational support

Jessen, Jorunn Theresia

Norwegian Social Research, NOVA

Oslo, Norway

Keywords

social workers, Job satisfaction, Recognition, social support, public approval

Job satisfaction in social services: The importance of recognition and organizational support.

Social service workers are subject to systems of managerial control and conflicting demands, aimed to ensure effectiveness and service quality for service users. Despite this policy rhetoric emphasizing service quality, the front line of social services is characterized by a lack of recognition. This paper presents the results of a study examining job satisfaction among social workers employed in the Norwegian public social services. The purpose is to investigate the influence of job rewards and the importance of external appreciation and organizational support in particular. Since social work is associated with stress and work overload, being valued and receiving rewards are expected to be important aspects of job satisfaction.

A central question is whether job satisfaction is influenced by client recognition and public approval, compared to other rewarding aspects related to the work environment.

The empirical data come from a 2004 quantitative survey among social workers in local welfare agencies. Results show that the main sources of respondents' job satisfaction are related to intrinsic rewards (e.g. helping others, interesting and developing work task) and the feeling of accomplishment, while organisational job demands were the main sources of dissatisfaction. Findings suggest that public approval and support from colleagues are significant rewards and important aspects of the workers' job satisfaction. The paper emphasizes the responsibility of the welfare administration to create an organisational climate that recognizes and sustains the worth and contribution of the social professionals, supporting them to cope with the emotional demands of their work

Joining professional arenas. Accountants, engineers and HR professionals in Italy and England

Cuzzocrea, Valentina

Dipartimento di Ricerche Economiche e Sociali, Università di Cagliari Cagliari, Italy

Keywords

Italy, England, Professions, comparative research

Professional career-paths have been transfigured by recent labour market's transformation. My research on early career professionals in the fields of engineering, H.R. and accountancy, suggests that recent graduates may think of the possibility to join a profession as a way to navigate the agitated sea of flexible employment -rather than as a mean to ensure themselves the privileges traditionally associated with professions. Thus, professions may be accounted for by graduates as resources to be enacted in order to construct a career. However, the accounts of the two groups of professionals interviewed, one based in Italy and one based in England, show that professions may work very differently depending on what "repertoires of evaluation" (Lamont & Thevenot 2000) are negotiated in each national context. Indeed, joining a profession is quite a different experience for the two groups, in relation to the multifaceted aspects related to the functioning of professions as institution, as well as to professional associations and professional membership.

More specifically, early career professionals based in Italy do not rely on the "positive" opportunities offered by professions. Instead, the flow of their narratives focuses on their attempt to avoid the constraints specifically poses by professions. This group regards at professional arenas as bureaucratic institutions from which one has to pass by, but whose inconsistent organisation forces one to substantially build on personal strategies. Vice-versa, young professionals based in England draw on professions to gain control over their careers: professions are identified as a specific career anchor, and portrayed as gateways to launch oneself in the world of adults, to access the old boys' club, to disrupt the isolation of the newcomer. More generally, when professional boundaries are perceived as "liquid", as in this latter case, professions do not act as a trap for young members but are rather seen as safe boats not to sink in the agitated sea of flexible employment.

Lamont, M., Thévenot, L., Ed. (2000). Rethinking Comparative Cultural Sociology. Repertoires of Evaluation in France and the United States. Cambridge, Cambridge University Press.

Key metaphors in the sociology of professions: Occupations as hierarchies and landscapes

Liljegren, Andreas

Dept of Social Work, University of Gothenburg Gothenburg, Sweden

Keywords

Landscape, key metaphors, Hierarchy, closure, Boundary work

In some parts of the literature on the study of discourse, the advice given is to look for 'key metaphors' in a given set of text or talk. Key metaphors guide our way of thinking; amongst other things, they provide perspective, relations, directions, distances, causality, features and principles. In other words, metaphors provide tools for understanding parts of reality. If this advice is followed, it would appear, when reading the literature on professions, that it is possible to discover at least two overarching key metaphors: one that portrays professional groups as a hierarchy, and one that describes them as a landscape. As key metaphors in general guide our understanding, it is important to reflect on what metaphors do in fact to our perceptions of professions. What, for example, do they highlight, and what do they conceal? The paper provides an analysis of two key metaphors in the literature of professions. The purpose is to outline and analyze these metaphors and to relate them to a number of other central concepts. In carrying out this analysis, questions concerning the similarities and differences between the two metaphors will be addressed. What, for example, are their epistemic virtues and what are the consequences of choosing one metaphor over the other?

Knowledge and experience in the "knowledge society" - About the relationship of these categories with a view to the engineering further education

Pfadenhauer, Michaela

Institute of Sociology, Karlsruhe University Karlsruhe, Germany

Kunz, Alexa Maria

Institut für Soziologie, Universität Karlsruhe (TH) Karlsruhe, Germany

Keywords

knowledge society, theoretical knowledge, further education, hands on experience, engineering

The debate about the Knowledge Society includes a dispute about the relationship of scientific knowledge and as a less accurate denominated practical, implicit or experience knowledge. Even if representatives of the knowledge society assume a reevaluation of scientific knowledge, the assumption misses that this also implicates a devaluation of experience knowledge: The concept of knowledge management aims to the implicit body of knowledge. And in the thesis of a transition from mode 1 to mode 2 the assumption is inherent, that the increasing implementation orientation of the scientific and technical knowledge leads to an essentially reevaluation of experience, implicit knowledge. The thesis of the knowledge society is not only criticized in terms of its knowledge concepts but also regarding its empiric expiration. But on the one hand it attracts the attention that there are sociologists of professions describe changes which are similar to those described for the knowledge society. More important the assumptions of the knowledge society are present in the world of work and occupation. Engineers e.g. describe their business as increasingly shaped by the necessity of personal- and context-bound experience knowledge, which seems to be essential for successful engineering practice and also for an adequate handling of nescience in an era of increasing complexity in cause of globalization, the innovation dynamic and a need for generalists. Concerning the material topic of the further education practice of engineers this contribution dangles with first answers to the following questions:

1. What kind of knowledge under the label of 'experience knowledge' is asked in engineering?
2. To what extend does this knowledge help to cope with the increasing complexity?
3. What consequences arises from this trend to 'experience knowledge' for the engineering professional project?

Knowledge Professions between Market professionalism and Professional Autonomy : the adequation of sociological typologies

Verpraet, Gilles

GRASS/ Paris X, CNRS

PARIS, France

Keywords

Typology, professional autonomy, Knowledge professions, knowledge circulation

The notion of knowledge professions refers to the professions of information technologies (phone, electronic, NTIC)(Matclup) and now to the knowledge economy. This labellization concerns the professions involved in the production of Knowledge, the circulation of knowledge, the valorization of knowledge (Stehr): education, training, translation, innovation transfert, project management.

These knowledge professions can be interpreted as market professions, incorporated inside the service relation within the struggle of intellectual property rights. So results instrumentalist tensions between market dimensions and intellectual dimensions. But these knowledge professions get autonomous ressources from education, training, from their high levels of knowledge (as culture and specialization) (Freidson). Facing market pressure, they present the ressources of cognitive capital, of reactive adaptation. Their relations with the public domain bring up also ressources of autonomy (intellectual, singular expression, cultural stylization).

To frame the configuration of the knowledge professions, different typologies can be assessed:

- a typology of Knowledge mobilization by organization forms and knowledge hierarchies
- their relations with the public domain and the specific modes of recognition (visibility, social recognition, added values).

Beside the classic typology between (global/ local; cosmopolitanism / incorporated), the sociology of professions brings up a more complex and triangle relation between market, public domain and educational resources (le nouveau triangle interpretative des professions). In this view, the discourses on professionalism are distributed between the injunctive discourses (knowledge circulation, innovation) and the self requirements for autonomous elaboration. This mixed development of the knowledge professions present an alternative to top / down expert knowledge.

Learning gaps in a learning organisation - professionals' values versus management values

Abrahamsson, Lena

Dept of Human Work Sciences, Luleå University of Technology Luleå, Sweden

Parding, Karolina

*Dept of Human Work Sciences, Luleå University of Technology
Luleå,*

Keywords

learning, teachers, professional work, Knowledge, Governance

There is a rhetoric emphasising that if work organisations become "learning organisation", the needs for learning are provided for. This idea is permeating work organisations not the least in the public sector where welfare sector professionals work. However, through a study on teachers' working conditions it becomes apparent that even if the school organisation claims to be a learning organisation, learning gaps can be identified. The study reveals that the conditions for learning are not optimal, despite the fact that the organisation claims to be a learning organisation. The study points at a tension between different forms of knowledge, knowledge valued by the organisation and knowledge valued by the professionals. In this article we discuss the concept of "learning organisations", by focusing on professionals' own experiences of conditions for learning.

Legal Profession and the Nation-State: What Role for Access to Justice and Guarantee of Rights?

dos Santos, Élida

*Faculty of Economy/Center of Social Studies, University of Coimbra
Coimbra, Portugal*

Keywords

Access to Justice, nation-states, Legal Professions, Public Defenders, Attorneys

At present, if the influence of transnational processes and their impact on the national structure is an inescapable fact, the centrality of the nation-state can not be ignored. Accordingly, on one hand, there is increasingly a reconfiguration of professionalism and regulatory structures, and on the other hand, the national regulation and the "old" professions related to the state play yet an important role in respect of guarantee of rights and their access. This paper aims to examine the role of legal professions in a context of transformation of the state and role of the courts. The role played by legal professions in ensuring access to law and justice is its main axis of analysis. The following hypothesis will guide the arguments of the paper: if the context of risk, precarity and complexity of contemporary societies reveals the weakness of the nation-state at the same time it calls for strong action for the protection and guarantee of rights, access to rights and to justice will rely especially with the configuration of their legal professions as well as its proactivity. The paper will focus on analyzing the performance of public defenders and attorneys in order to allow comparison of the functioning of a professional public system and a private system of access to justice. The comparative work will be extended to compare different contexts for enforcement of rights that also indicate the different joints with transnational processes. Accordingly, will be made a comparative study between Portuguese and Brazilian cases, which will allow to compare two semiperipheral societies with a common legal matrix, of which context of implementation and effectiveness of rights challenge the professional and regulatory structure of the nation-state.

Medical decision making and intra-professional negotiation: an analytical model

Serra, Helena

Sociology, ISEG/SOCIUS

Lisboa, Portugal

Keywords

decision making, risk and uncertainty, intra-professional relations, Medical profession, analytical model

Medical decision making constitutes the most complete exercise of medical power. It is itself a kind of aim, almost synonyms of the medical professions' mission: to treat the patient. Then, the several moments of medical decision making results from the construction between different medical knowledge and discourses, approaches and strategies that cross each other and materialise in medical practices.

This way, from an ethnographic study in a hospital unit of liver transplantation, this paper analyses and discuss the medical decision making processes around the patients' access to hepatic transplantation, standing out the complexity of negotiation processes between the medical specialities involved.

A qualitative methodological approach was adopted, in which we opted for a central technique, participant observation and, as a complementary technique, semi-structured and in-depth interviews. Continuous participant observation extended over a period of roughly seven months. This was subsequently followed by semi-structured and in-depth interviews involving all the medical specialities under observation. This paper presents some findings concerning medical decision making on the patients access to hepatic transplantation, by exploring the issues related to the management of risk and uncertainty. The findings highlight the role of medical discourse in the construction of medical decision making and the strategic alliances around consensus.

The key theoretical guidelines are drawn from the sociology of professions, and medical sociology, particularly the social constructivist approaches. Assuming as starting point the limitations of the classic decision making models, where decision making is seen as a rational model, this paper enhance the plural nature of the medical decision making processes and their relationships with the contexts of action associated to them. We suggest an analytical model to the study of medical decision making and intraprofessional negotiation, by standing out the relations between knowledge and discourse in the construction of power strategies. This way we intend to scrutinize medical practice leaded by actors in social contexts and not only as technical interventions.

Medicalization in Action: an Ethnographic View on the Profession of Midwife in Italy

Marzano, Marco

Scienze dei linguaggi, della comunicazione e degli studi culturali, Università di Bergamo Bergamo, Italy

Keywords

Ethnography, medicalization, Midwife, Childbirth

The paper presents some findings of research on the profession of midwife conducted in Italy by a team consisting of sociologists and midwives and based upon direct observation of childbirths and in-depth interviews. The paper argues that midwife's knowledge is subaltern to medical knowledge founded on intervention on a woman's body. This does not primarily concern medicalization 'from above'. Rather, organizational and legal factors and hospital routine often prevent midwife's knowledge from working in the childbirth interaction. Pregnant women, by delegating all choices to other actors, ask for a medicalizing intervention on their own bodies, thus excluding the midwife.

Migration of Health Professionals - the emergence of transnational professionalism

Sousa Ribeiro, Joana

*Sociology, Centre for Social Studies, CES, University of Coimbra
Coimbra, Portugal*

Keywords

Transnational Professionalism, Transnationalization of Professional Work, Professional Projects, Transnational Governance and Neo-Liberal Market Economics.

The movement of health professionals across different health systems challenges the national-base of healthcare regulation. The expansion of professional jurisdiction not only reshapes trust, discretion and competence but also extends the role of multi-level actors.

This paper is based on the analysis of the recruitment and the professional "integration" process of internationally educated physicians and nurses in a Southern European country, like Portugal. For this purpose, biographical interviews were made to nurses and physicians that came from Spain and from some East European countries to Portugal, targeting a longitudinal approach. Additionally, semi-structured interviews to institutional actors (such as the Medical Council, Nursing Council, Health Ministry, a Nurse Trade Union, a Physician Trade Union, a Nursing and Medicine Schools, a Foundation and a NGO) were carried out in order to perceive the professionalism "from the above" mentioned occupational groups, and the organizational discourse of flexibility and sustainability.

International recruitment, bilateral agreements, professional integration programs and European Union free movement regulations are explored in line with the transnational governance in healthcare and the transnationalization of professional work. In this regard, the existence of professional projects continues to matter but in a transnational, and, at some extent, neoliberal, version.

Moral ties and market constraints. On the professionalization within the cultural industries in Germany and Great Britain

Schnell, Christiane

Institute Labour and Economy, University of Bremen

Bremen, Germany

Keywords

cultures of work, formation of professions, cultural professions, professionalization

The paper addresses the tendencies of professionalization within the field of cultural and creative work in a comparative perspective. The main theoretical focus lies on the relation between value orientation and the handling of market forces within an increasingly competitive environment on a national and international level. Findings presented are based on a comparative approach between Germany and the UK. The German model of 'cultural professions', which emerged in West Germany after the Second World War, is characterized by a particular institutional frame of welfare state regulations and cultural policy. The British case is determined by a more liberal tradition, in terms of cultural perceptions and the organization of 'culture production' and creative work. In my paper I am going to show how the relation of 'moral ties' and 'market' is mirrored in economic and institutional structures and might be identified empirically on the level of cultural professionals in both cases. It is assumed that the most crucial changes might be identified regarding the primarily British phenomenon of the Cultural Industries, which became a paradigm of cultural policy all over Europe, even for the development of the cultural sector in Germany.

Negotiations on intra-professional relations - Cultural categorizations, segmentation and hierarchies

Nieminen, Suvi

*School of Public Health, University of Tampere
Tampere, Finland*

Keywords

categorization, intra-professional relations, hierarchies, migrant nurses

The recruitment crisis of health care professionals, concerning particularly registered nurses, is currently of great concern in many European countries. In this situation, a lot of hope and effort has been placed on reinforcing the international migration of health care professionals. The globalization of labor challenges the professional groups, inherently embedded in national and societal contexts, to negotiate and redefine the social and cultural orders and boundaries within them. The construction and negotiation of the social orders is centrally marked by cultural categorizations which operate at different levels of professional structures, interaction and identities. Cultural categories, like ethnicities and gender, are social constructions and situationally negotiated. The perspective of cultural categorizations brings to the fore the significance of binary thought, which locks us into hierarchical relations that value some kinds of qualities and minimize others.

In this presentation I approach the question of cultural negotiations on intra-professional relations from the perspective of migrant nurses. How are the professional centers and margins, hierarchies and differences negotiated in the professional practices? What do the intra-professional divisions and categorizations mean for the professional attachment and identity of migrant professionals? I put particular emphasis on agency and contextuality of the negotiations. Through the empirical examples of migrant nurses' own experiences in the Finnish health care system I suggest, that when examining the intra-professional negotiations it is central to understand the ways how cultural categorizations and meaning-makings of difference structure the relations and signify the intra-professional relations of power and status. However, being socially constructed, the categorizations are also open for negotiations and redefinitions.

New arenas, old arguments - science-practice interplay in care work

Nieminen, Paula

*Tampere School of Public Health, University of Tampere
Finland,*

Keywords

nursing, contested expertise, science-practice interplay

The epistemic and institutional domain of nursing practice has undergone profound changes in Finland, including the requirement for a scientific knowledge core of professional practice, expressed e.g. in the evidence-based practice agenda. Within nursing, educational and occupational changes have raised the issue of science-practice interplay. Nursing has become more regulated with specified, measured and assessed achievement targets. By the practitioners concerned, these changes are often perceived as more work and additional responsibilities with no corresponding increase in status, salary or client satisfaction. One result of these changes is a form of identity crisis: increased inter- and intra-professional disputes which touch upon the contested boundaries of basic research, applied research and practical development work.

In this paper the science-practice interplay is investigated through the tensions evoked in nursing practice by academization. The aim is to examine the conflicts caused by contested gendered expectations of academization among nurses in different hierarchical positions. The focus is on a public definitional struggle over the characteristics of the "proper nurse", initiated by the minority of the women-dominated profession, male nurses, and the cultural understandings, myths and symbols used concerning the science-practice interplay.

Empirically, the paper discusses a display of resistance against the epistemic authority of nursing science, mobilizing identity work among nurses. Triggered by an experience of prolonged dissatisfaction with existing trade union policies, an Internet discussion forum for health professionals was set up by male nurses in the aftermath of a highly contested income policy agreement in 2003. The paper asks: What kind of boundary-work is used by nurses to (re)gain professional and symbolic authority within nursing practice vis-à-vis nursing science? What kinds of rhetorical strategies are used in reconfiguring the moral orders of nursing?

The paper illuminates the dynamics and tensions among the profession and shows that gaining an academic status is not just an educational phenomenon touching the elite core of the professionals but a multi-dimensional political and cultural phenomenon challenging prevailing disciplinary, organisational and occupational orders, old practices and shared ways of knowing and belonging.

Nurses in elderly care: Motivation and job satisfaction

Abrahamsen, Bente

*Centre for the Study of Professions, Oslo University College
Oslo, Norway*

Keywords

elderly care, motivation, nurses, Job satisfaction

Nurses in elderly care: Motivation and job satisfaction

This paper examines motivation and job satisfaction among newly graduated nurses who work in elderly care. Graduates mainly prefer to work in hospitals and only a small proportion of newly graduated nurses choose to work in elderly care. Hospitals are assumed to provide more opportunities concerning professional development and interesting work compared to elderly care. In contrast, nurses in elderly care usually have administrative responsibility and few colleagues (same profession).

A common assumption is that professional development, interesting work and autonomy are crucial to professional workers. The main question posed in this paper is how important these factors are to nurses in elderly care? Do nurses in elderly care have different expectations concerning their professional work as nurses than nurses in hospitals?

The analysis are based upon a Norwegian longitudinal survey data (StudData) which collects information from professionals both as students and after graduation. Findings indicate only small differences in motivation between nurses in hospitals and elderly care. However, nurses in elderly care report lower job satisfaction compared to hospitals nurses.

Open Heart Surgery. The impact of performance data in cardiothoracic surgery

Smith, Glenn

School of Management, Royal Holloway, University of London Surrey, England, United Kingdom

Exworthy, Mark

*School of Management, Royal Holloway, University of London
Surrey, England, United Kingdom*

Gabe, Jonathon

*School of Management, Royal Holloway, University of London
Surrey, England, United Kingdom*

Rees Jones, Ian

School of Social Sciences, Bangor University Wales, Wales, United Kingdom

Keywords

Surgery, cardiothoracic, professional autonomy, Audit, surgeons

In recent years public reporting of mortality rates has been adopted in several Western countries as a way of measuring performance of surgeons. Within the United Kingdom the mortality rates of surgeons in England have been recorded since 2008.

The aim of this research was to explore the impact of performance measures on the working practices and relations of cardiothoracic surgeons, perceptions of change in professional autonomy and levels of inter-professional trust. We also wanted to gain an understanding of the rationale of those within public health organisations involved in implementing these measures.

The study used in-depth interviews with cardiothoracic surgeons from a hospital in Southern England and also observed their mortality meetings and surgical procedures. Additional interviews were undertaken with several key members of government and public health bodies involved in the development of performance measurements.

Our research suggests that key members of public bodies involved in developing performance measures feel that risk adjusted mortality rates are a necessary step in identifying surgeons who perform below average. They also feel that publishing surgeons' mortality rates provides transparent accountability to the public. However, they also recognise that few patients view published performance data and that the methods used to measure performance and interpret data are constantly evolving and open to interpretation. Our interviews and observations with cardiothoracic surgeons suggest that responses to the introduction of performance data are mixed ranging from enthusiasm to a sense of unease particularly in relation to professional autonomy and levels of trust between and within the medical professions involved in cardiothoracic surgery. The use of mortality rates may also incentivise inexperienced surgeons and trainees to avoid high risk elective cardiac surgery. More worryingly, some surgeons feel that an over emphasis on mortality rates hides issues surrounding the quality of surgical procedures, the skill base of surgeons and ultimately patients' access to complex elective cardiac surgery.

These findings suggest that current efforts to use mortality audit data as a way of measuring surgical performance contains areas of contention in its production and use. This has implications for future cardiothoracic surgeons, surgery and patients.

Overcoming the double bind of the sociology of professions

Champy, Florent

*Centre for the Study of Work and Arts (CESTA), National Centre for Scientific Research (CNRS)
PARIS, France*

Keywords

professional autonomy, professional work, definition of professions, threats on professions

To some respects, the current sociology of professions is faced by a double bind. On the one hand, interactionists have definitely shown that the functionalist definition of professions is irrelevant. Whatever the temptation may be, it is now assumed that turning back to anything like this kind of definition would be a mistake. But on the other hand, the increasing threats on the 'old professional model' (as opposed to the new discourse of professionalism) are a strong invitation to reconsider the problem of defining professions. It is possible to study the consequences of these threats for the professionals themselves without any shared and lasting definition of professions. But if we want to study the consequences for their clients and the society as a whole, we need to say first clearly what the professionals used to provide they can't provide any longer. This supposes to analyse explicitly some specificities of the work of these professionals who are faced by evolutions jeopardizing their autonomy: actually, the problem of the definition is not far, as we would not ask this question for any kind of occupation. This presentation will be devoted to showing that this difficulty can be overcome, provided that the problem of the definition is reformulated. The idea is to abandon the project of defining professions generally speaking, as so many functionalists sought vainly to do. We want to avoid both the use by the functionalist of the usual folk concept "profession" and the indistinctness between all kind of occupations, postulated by interactionists. Instead, we will propose a partition of the field in four distinctive objects of research. We will put emphasis on a kind of professions which had not been characterized as such yet. This newly identified object allows original programs of researches, among which a redefinition of the content of the autonomy some professionals have been granted, and a new way to study the consequences of the present threats on this autonomy.

PhD and Career - How adequate is the job-situation of professionals holding a PhD in Switzerland?

Engelage, Sonja

*Dept. of Sociology of Education, University of Bern
Bern, Switzerland*

Schubert, Frank

*Dept. of Sociology of Education, University of Bern
Bern, Switzerland*

Keywords

PhD, job adequacy, academic labour market, career

During educational expansion, a debate arose in many European countries concerning the rising number of academic professionals and oversaturation of the labour market. In Switzerland the number of university graduates searching for a job was in 2007 with only 2.2 Percent below the average unemployment rate of 3.6 Percent and therefore extremely low. It seems that the Swiss labour market is able to fully absorb rising numbers of academics. But, do professionals, especially PhD graduates, get jobs that match their education?

This paper focuses on the definition of job adequacy and risk factors of inadequate job situations. Hypotheses are derived from labour market theories which explain the role of a PhD as a signal leading to first row positions in labour queues. Furthermore, we employ human capital theory where the PhD should increase productivity and affect labour market outcomes positively.

Strength of the paper is the multidimensional definition of job adequacy measured on three different levels. The vertical job adequacy consists of 'objective' factors such as earnings, occupational positions and required job entry qualifications. Horizontal adequacy characterises the accordance of academic education (contents learned at university) with occupational requirements. Third, we look at subjective evaluations of the job situation.

We analyse a unique dataset containing complete educational and occupational career of 17300 PhD graduates in Switzerland using descriptive and multivariate methods. Results support segmentation theory showing great differences between professional disciplines with economics benefiting most in vertical adequacy. Comparing skills learned during doctoral studies and contents of the recent job graduates in engineering and nature science report the best matching. Social Scientists counter their bad image regarding labour market prospects holding a middle position in most dimensions. PhDs in Law evaluate their job adequacy significantly more positive than others. Women report lower vertical adequacy while the other measures show no differences, when controlling for part time employment. Overall, the situation of professionals in the Swiss labour market holding a PhD is very positive and supports hypotheses arguing that the PhD is a highly valued and unique signal.

Portuguese psychologists in search of the self-regulating monopoly's data from an exploratory approach to the field

Rego, Raquel

sociology, SOCIUS-ISEG

Lisboa, Portugal

Keywords

pressure groups, professionalization, Professional Associations, (legislative) influence

Despite literature reference to the great power of professional associations (Halliday, 1987), research on the subject, and in particular on the process that leads to their creation, is scarce. The dominant Anglo-Saxon tradition acknowledges professional associations only as a stadium of the professionalization process; frequently as an indication of the maturity of the professional project (Larson, 1979). In fact, at least since the work of Carr-Saunders and Wilson (1933), sociology of the professions has made references to it in a secondary way.

In Portugal, we have detected a trend towards professional associations' discretionary creation (Rego in Freire, 2004), with some professional associations being recently created without observing the criteria that traditionally supported their foundation. These criteria were made into Law through Act n°6/2008, which came to regulate the creation of professional associations.

The power that professional associations enjoy, in Portugal significantly demonstrated by their sizeable visibility in the media, leads many professions to pursue this statute. This is the case of the Portuguese psychologists. In 2002 they created an organization with the specific purpose of becoming a self-regulated professional association; which they accomplished in 2008.

This paper presents the results of the an exploratory approach to the field. We will present a systematisation of the stages leading to the creation of the professional association. This proposal is supported both by documental analysis and by the analysis of actors perceptions of the process (activists from professional groups and members of political parties with parliamentary representation). We will take into account the formal and informal procedures, as well as the expectations regarding the increasing role ascribed to international professional associations (Evetts, 2002).

We expect to contribute, not only to highlight the political process behind professionalization, but also to understand how the relationship between pressure groups and parliamentary political parties shapes the political decision making process in Portugal.

At the same time, we believe that this research will enrich knowledge about professional regulatory convergences and divergences in Europe.

Portuguese young psychiatrists and trainees: The creation of new professional frames and social identity in a globalized mental healthcare market

Rolim Patriarca, Madalena

*Social and Cultural Anthropology, PhD, Institut of Social Sciences University of Lisbon
Lisboa, Portugal*

Keywords

mental health care policy, professional identity, psychiatrists

Since the 1950s, deinstitutionalisation has dominated mental health care reforms throughout Europe. In the last decades, National Health Services have announced the closing or downsizing of large psychiatric institutions and the implementation of new psychiatric and mental health care services in the general hospital as well as in the community. As a result of major government initiatives and new legal frameworks, mental health care has been undergoing significant social and professional changes. However, these extensive psychiatric reforms are far from being enthusiastically received by all psychiatrists and there are a large number of ongoing struggles to adapt to changing administrative set-ups and legal frameworks all over Europe.

What do such institutional transformations have meant to Portuguese young psychiatrists and trainees? Younger generations are learning to be psychiatrists in an entirely new clinical and working setting. In fact, as the psychiatric residency training program aims to prepare the graduates according to an international clinical practice, the Portuguese trainees face a manifold challenge. On the one hand, they invest in an international scientific socialization. Trying to get a job opportunity they seek to enter the international psychiatric scene both by doing scientific investigation courses abroad and participating in clinical and scientific meetings organized by international Young Psychiatrists and Trainees Associations.

On the other hand, feeling the hazards of a precarious medical career in the National Health Service, the young psychiatrists and trainees analyse the structural problems of Portuguese psychiatry training program by criticizing what they consider a deep line separating psychiatric legislation and the actual structural problems of hospital internship.

Focusing on a social anthropological perspective, this communication discusses how the foundation of the Portuguese Association of Psychiatric Trainees reveals a new professional conscience of psychiatrists as workers in a globalized world. However, at the same time this Association is used by young psychiatrists as an important social tool to manage their labour rights towards a future medical career, it also reorders their social and cultural identity as a professional group in relation to older psychiatrists.

Practice Shock - Empirical and Theoretical Considerations

Caspersen, Joakim

*Center for the study of the professions, Oslo University College
Oslo, Norway*

Raaen, Finn Daniel

*Center for the study of the professions, Oslo University College
Oslo, Norway*

Keywords

teachers, practice shock, Knowledge, education

The transition from professional education to work is often referred to as a 'shock' of some form. The shock-metaphor is used to describe the tough and confusing realities the novice professional faces when the education is to be put to use. In this paper, this 'shock of practice' is discussed and empirically examined. We argue that the shock-metaphor is connected with the classical acquisitional view of knowledge promoted in the sociological literature on the professions: knowledge is acquired during education and is to be activated in the following professional career. Potential problems with mastering the work as a novice professional are understood as insufficiencies in the professional education. However, the existence of the metaphor itself also implies an empirical critique of this understanding of professional knowledge. It is further argued that in line with the acquisitional, cognitive, view of knowledge, the focus in the empirical research has been on individual mastery of professional work. There has been little or none emphasis on the important role played by social and contextual factors such as colleagues and management, and when acknowledged they have mainly been understood as factors external to the individual, and not something the individual itself can participate in and shape. Drawing on both qualitative interviews, observational data of novice teachers and quantitative survey data on novice and experienced teachers, novice teachers' job mastery (perceived certainty and perceived ability to make an impact in their classroom work (teacher self efficacy)) is examined. Novice teachers report to be somewhat less certain in their work, but do not have lower perceived self efficacy than the more experienced teachers. The indications of a shock of practice are therefore ambiguous. Furthermore, the analyses of the survey data reveal that support from colleagues, support from superiors, and binding collaboration with colleagues seems to be more important in predicting job mastery than being a novice teacher per se. The findings imply that the traditional understanding of knowledge and competence in the professional literature is insufficient and needs to be expanded by recognition of the role played by social and contextual factors.

Professional / Vocational Training in Russia: towards new approaches

Kliucharev, Grigory

Centre of social studies, Institute of Sociology RAS Moscow, Russian Federation

Popova, Irina

*Center of studies of social structure, department of social mobility, Institute of Sociology RAS
Moscow, Russian Federation*

Keywords

lifelong learning, Vocational Training, additional professional learning, professional mobility

The report is focused on working out a new approach to professional learning and vocational training of employees under the innovative economic paradigm in the current global economic crisis. One of the key points is to observe the professional learning and training as a source of knowledge and skills widely applied at the labor market and as a channel of professional mobility. The empirical data on professional mobility, based on Russian Longitudinal Monitoring Survey (RLMS) and nation-wide surveys conducted by the Institute of Sociology RAS, a number of recent official documents and leading expert's opinions are available. The issue of efficiency of professional training is under the investigation in the report as well.

Professional learning trajectories

Smeby, Jens-Christian

*Centre for the Study of Profession, Oslo University College
Oslo, Norway*

Keywords

professional competence, professional learning, professional careers

Professional learning trajectories

The rapid shifts in knowledge and institutional arrangements in contemporary society call upon individuals and communities to engage in never-ending processes of learning and re-learning. Although these developments have been widely discussed at a policy level, less attention has been paid to investigating how they manifest themselves within different groups and settings. Professions face challenges in transforming their domain of expertise into the complex demands of the knowledge society. At the same time their interrelated traditions, tools and working conditions produce opportunities as well as hindrances for learning and knowledge development. The traditional view of the key role of professional education may be challenged by the complexity of qualification arenas and trajectories. Has the close link between professional education and work become blurred even in field where the link traditionally has been very strong? What are the patterns that characterises learning trajectories into and out of the professions respectively?

The present paper examines the characteristics of professional learning focusing on teachers and nurses in a longitudinal perspective including educational and work experience before they enrol; initial education as well as the first six years in professional work. Data are drawn from a longitudinal Database for studies of Recruitment and Qualifications in the Professions in Norway (StudData). Many students have experience from higher education as well as relevant work before they enrol. To what extent do such experiences have an impact on their educational strategy and outcome? Moreover, what are the relationships between qualification strategies and outcome in higher education and workplace learning and further education? Are there any relationships between learning trajectories and professional commitment?

Professionalisation of academic (self)administration and the persistency of doing gender

Blättel-Mink, Birgit

Social Sciences, Goethe-University Frankfurt am Main Frankfurt am Main, Germany

Keywords

gender differences in academic leadership, limits of gender mainstreaming, professionalisation in higher education (self)administration

These new recruits take administrative jobs shortly after they are awarded tenure - usually sometime between the fifth and seventh year of employment with the university - stay in these administrative positions and move up the administrative ladder by moving from one university to the another. - (Leicht/ Fennell 2008: 96)

The "new recruits" Leicht and Fennell are talking about for the US case, who determine the picture of higher education in the 21st century, are mainly male academics or professionals. Lower and middle management positions vice versa, dedicated to tasks like quality control, course guidance service, fostering academic entrepreneurship, are open for women and ethnic minorities, thus satisfying the challenges of gender mainstreaming in higher education.

Relating these observations to the broader context of the Treaty of Lisboa and the Bologna reforms that both strive towards opening the university to societal (and economic) needs, it seems crucial to study the future of university decision making, to get a clue about which groups will determine the future of higher education.

In a research project the author is exploring to what extent the observations for US are true for European higher education as well. The research question being: To what extent do women (and representatives of ethnic minorities) participate in higher education administration and decision making, what career opportunities do they face and are they satisfied with this situation?

With this paper first results of the pilot study in Germany will be presented. On the long run the author plans to install a European monitoring instrument to observe and, from a gender mainstreaming perspective, assess recent changes in the administration of higher education today.

Reference: Leicht, Kevin T./ Fennell, Mary L. (2008) Who staffs the US leaning tower? Organisational change and diversity. In: Equal Opportunities International. Equality, diversity and inclusion. Special Issue "Reinventing gender and the professions: new governance, equality and diversity" (Guest editors: Ellen Kuhlmann and IvY Lynn Bourgeault). Vol. 27, Nr. 1: 88-106.

Professionalism as Justification

Maestripietri, Lara

*Dipartimento di Sociologia e Ricerca Sociale, Università degli studi di Trento
Cerro Maggiore, Italy*

Keywords

Professionalism, profession, Justification, service workers

The sociology of work and more specifically sociology of professions has still to build a paradigm in order to take in account the new services professions, which importance in the contemporary economy has been enlightened since the post-industrial turn in literature. In fact, the attention of sociologists of professions is still focused at a micro level upon liberal professions and at macro level they still attempt to build a systemic view of the professions, without offering an explanation for the peculiarity of the new professions. On the other hand, sociologists of work is leaded by the so called 'the end of work' paradigm, which enlighten fragmentation and individualization of workers' identities, starting from the idea that work as a dimension of social cohesion has lost its importance in the contemporary economic.

This paper contributes to fulfil these theoretical gaps by proposing a new paradigm in order to take an account the new services workers like professionals, with their peculiarities identified in the lacking of institutionalization and the focus towards organizations (while liberal professions were focus upon individual clients). The approach here proposed will follow the theoretical proposal of professionalism as discourse set of values and identities with the reprising of the idea of justification. Professionalism as Justification allows to emphasize the linguistic and moral procedures that individuals offers in order to motivate their actions and justify their position in society, thanks to the reference to standard models activate in a contextualized situation in which action develop.

Professionalism patterns in the Internationalization of Information Work

Ruiz Ben, Esther

*Institut für Soziologie, TU Berlin
Berlin, Germany*

Keywords

Internationalization, Professionalism, Information Work

Professionalism as a particular form of organizing work has experienced an important change in the recent years (Friedson 2001; Evetts 2006, 2009) especially influenced among other factors by internationalization dynamics, globalization and the development of information and communication technologies. The predominant role of large enterprises in the global economy shapes the development of new organizational forms of professionalism adopting managerialism principles with a global customer scope beyond national boundaries. The ICT industry, especially the ICT service segment, is experiencing such a development of professionalism due to rapid internationalization processes and the related uncertainties and risks of coordinating international expertise in high dynamic innovation regimes. On the one hand, the complex coordination and synchronization of emerging expertise in international work environments requires standardization and formalization of work processes. On the other hand, innovation regimes demand creativity and flexibility and thus, 'certain' work autonomy from the practitioners, who are in some segments of the IT industry high requested experts in international IT labor markets. Thus, the internationalization of information work challenges IT tasks hierarchies, work practices, as well as work and expertise control in IT multinational enterprises.

In this paper I analyse on the basis of Noordegraaf's (2007) notion of hybrid professionalism how multinational IT enterprises and practitioners combine such a kind of professionalism with occupational professionalism. Hybrid professionalism represents in this context an identity basis for international information workers comprising a sense of common experiences, understandings and expertise as well as shared ways of perceiving problems and possible solutions and contributes to occupational change. But it also constitutes a legitimacy ground for work-a-day practices, acknowledgement and power. I concentrate on the three 'ingredients' constituting 'hybrid professionalism' suggested by Noordegraaf (2007: 779): first, the linkages between work and organized action; second, the mechanisms for legitimating work and third, the searching for occupational identities on the empirical basis of three case studies in the software, hardware and IT service multinational German enterprises from my research about the internationalization of the IT industry in Germany and the transformation and categorization of tasks and employees regarding gender, age, nationality and qualification.

Professionalization of Science and Technology Park Management: The Interplay of Globalization and Professional Knowledge

Mieg, Harald

Geography, Humboldt-Universitaet zu Berlin Berlin, Deutschland

Keywords

Globalization, science and technology park management, professionalization

The management of science and technology parks (STPs) is a complex task that requires basic expertise in three different areas: business administration, urban planning, and the management of research-politics networks. The presented paper analyzes the interplay of globalization and the professionalization of this particular field of knowledge and skills.

In the last 15 to 20 years, STPs have become both a type of major urban development project and a means to foster joint innovations by research institutions and industry. There are "classic" examples of STPs in the US, such as Silicon Valley or the Research Triangle; a growing number of STPs all over Europe (e.g., Sofia Antipolis in France; the Helsinki Business and Science Park HBSP; Berlin-Adlershof); and new experimental STPs in China or university-based STPs in India (IIT Mumbai and Delhi).

At present, we observe a certain professionalization of STP management: specialized global networks emerge (e.g., IASP, International Association of Science Parks); STP managers exchange their experiences; standards are defined; specialized professional training is organized... It is probably due to this ongoing global professionalization that STPs like Berlin-Adlershof that started as problematic major urban development projects have turned into a network of nuclei of new urban economic growth.

In the presented paper, the professionalization of STP management is analyzed with regard to, for instance, association-building (national, global), academization, and the involved abstract knowledge base (Abbott). In particular, we have to discuss the following issues: (i) STP management as a "professional project" (Larson) and an example of social closure? (ii) state control vs. professional self-control (Johnson, Freidson, Fournier) (iii) professional and public values involved in STP management (iv) the kind of professional expertise required for STP management and its contextuality (v) inter-and intra-professional competition and cooperation.

STP management is a perfect example of new professionalization processes that are triggered by globalization.

Professions and Welfare State: The Social Educator and the Social Graduate

Arturo, Ballesteros Leiner

PICSE ÁREA 1, UNIVERSIDAD PEDAGÓGICA NACIONAL DF, MÉXICO

Keywords

welfare, Professions, citizen, social right, social education

The Welfare state is conceived as a social State, which it proposes as basic activity to contribute in the process of social rationalization, representing this way the most finished form of the project of modernity. This type of State is ruled by the principle of universality, of there that grants possibility and viability to him to the concept of citizenship, both in the political dimension and in the social one. The process of social rationalization needs of social agents transmitters of the welfare. Of there that we consider like investigation object the participation of some professions in that complex process. The topic approached by Bertilsson brings over of that the modern professions have a crucial role in the administration of the Welfare State, allows us to study in the Spanish case, the specific role that two professions have played, as example of it: the Social Educator and the Social Graduate. The social educators propose to decode the complex processes of management and bring over to the citizens the possibility of being educated in the knowledge of the social right and his consequences of cohesion.

The Welfare State has made possible the extension and specification of the social rights. The opening of the spaces of participation and the development of the public policies have driven to a diversification of subjects and of be afraid socially relevant, that it has forced to the specification and recognition of new rights and subjective freedoms. It, though it has implied a major democratization of the society, has meant at the same time, new demands for the State and has returned more complex still the policy, since this one has met bound to attend to specific and new questions that stem from these new rights, as well as the questions that remain linked to the class dynamics. This overlapping does not have only political effects but, principally, functional. It is in this functional space in which the Social Graduates are positioned due, attending to two fundamental pillars for the citizen welfare: the labour relations and the social safety.

Professions in transnational health policy making: conceptual and methodological issues

Burau, Viola

Political Science, Aarhus University Aarhus, Denmark

Kuhlmann, Ellen

*Social and Policy Sciences, University of Bath
Bath, United Kingdom*

Keywords

Professions, transnationalism, health policy

Health policy has become increasingly transnational in nature and this highlights mechanisms of governance operating within, across and above the institutions of national health care states. This raises new questions about the role of professions in health policy making and is also interesting conceptually.

First, transnationalism applies to all areas of healthcare and policies such as organisational reform based on market principles, the strengthening of primary care provision and guidelines for health care practice. This contrasts with the literature on global health policy which tends to focus on health policies reacting to new infectious diseases that quickly spread across the globe, such as public health policies related to HIV/AIDS and Bird Flue.

Second, transnationalism represents a form of health policy making which occurs within, across and beyond the specific institutions of national health care states, which operate as filters rather than in a traditionally hierarchical fashion. This is interesting in the context of the literature on health care states and the primary importance attached to institutions for understanding health policy. It also challenges the currently dominant debates on convergence of health systems.

Against this background, the aim of the paper is three-fold. First, the paper offers a systematic overview of trends related to transnationalism in health policy making (and the role of professions within this) and highlights developments in all areas of health policy. Subsequently and second, the paper provides a critical review of the different strands of the literature relevant for better understanding transnational health policy making and the part played by professions, and suggests using processes, actors and institutions as conceptual reference points. Finally, the paper explores elements of a possible research design for how to study transnational health policy making, and argues for focusing on new models of regulation, such as partnership governance and collaborative care, for using individual countries as stepping stones for a bottom-up analysis of transnational health policy making, and for examining European countries and developing countries such as China, South Africa and Chile as critical cases.

Professions on the move, Migration and new Masculinities: The case of Iraqi refugees in Jordan

Tsouroufli, Maria

*School of Medicine Health Policy and Practice, University of East Anglia
Norwich, UK*

Al Makhmerha, Sahar

Social Science, Al Balqa University Jordan,

Al Jahoub, Mahasen

Faculty of Law, University of Jordan Amman, Jordan

Keywords

Migration, Professions, masculinities, Iraqi refugees, Jordan

The displacement of large numbers of Iraqi people and their migration to Jordan is currently one of country's biggest challenges as several flows of Iraqi population resident temporarily in Jordan, are causing a humanitarian crisis. Lack of preparedness and effective social work interventions have rendered Iraqi refugees in Jordan a marginalised, disadvantaged group facing serious financial, health and social problems.

New patterns of family and professional life resulting from migration have long been shown to challenge gender relations and traditional constructions of femininity and masculinity. However, the intersectionality of gender, ethnicity, culture and religion and the impact on professional identity among Arab male professionals after displacement has received little attention.

This paper discusses prospective work aiming to explore the identity projects of displaced Iraqi professional men leaving in Jordan in the last five years. Drawing on a feminist post-structuralist paradigm we aim to raise understanding about the interplay of normative discourses of Iraqi masculinity and notions of professional work after displacement.

Professions, Leadership and the Public Interest: The Case of Healthcare

Saks, Mike

Vice Chancellor's Office, University of Lincoln Lincoln, UK

Keywords

Professions, leadership, public interest, healthcare

The issue of leadership is attracting increasing attention in a European and more global context in an era of change and complexity. This paper considers this issue with reference to claims by professions to serve the public interest, using healthcare in the UK as an illustrative case. In this respect, it specifically examines the leadership challenges posed by professional power and dominance. The paper begins by outlining the legally-defined power base of professions from a neo-Weberian perspective - as highlighted by the case of medicine compared to nursing, midwifery and other allied health professions. In the traditional social scientific literature on this subject, professions are typically presented as different from other occupations, altruistically taking a lead in serving the public good as a result of their regulatory bargain with the state. Historical and contemporary cases from the health domain are given to illustrate how their leadership can be seen to have been exercised in this way. However, in the more critical climate that has emerged in recent times, the public, politicians and social theorists have become more sceptical about how far leadership in healthcare has been driven by the public interest, as opposed to professional self-interest. This has been accentuated by the growing attention given to such areas as human rights in the UK and wider European context. A number of cases that have shaped this perception in healthcare are outlined, based on the exercise of professional power and dominance. The implications of the analysis are highlighted at a number of levels for future patterns of leadership in relation to the professions - from the imposition of more stringent national and transnational policies to leadership development in the professions themselves.

Public Service Transformation and Changing Professionalism in Finland: Experiences from the Third Sector

Perälä, Riikka

*Dep. of Sociology, Finnish Foundation for Alcohol Research/University of Helsinki
Helsinki, Finland*

Keywords

Finland, third sector, public service transformation, changing professionalism

As part of their welfare strategies, municipalities in Finland have made increasing use of the third sector organizations in the provision of different kinds of welfare services. This is in accordance with broader changes taking place in Finnish welfare policies which have brought third sector organizations to the fore when talking about both policy development and the provision of public services. The situation has casted third sector organizations in the role which is in many ways confusing. On the other hand third sector organizations have more possibilities than before to use their expertise and also have influence over different matters. However, at the same time these organizations face increasing outside scrutiny and control by different public officials and authorities responsible for the funding and follow-up of the services. This paper critically examines how the situation has changed the working cultures and conditions of different kinds of social and health care professionals working in the third sector. Using ethnographic interview data gathered from the professionals working in the third sector I offer a view to the perceptions these workers attach to the current system and its operation. The key question is has the autonomy of third sector professionals eroded in the new situation where there exists an increasing pressure to work in partnerships with public officials. Secondly, what happens to the 'soft values' such as solidarity and caring, typically linked to the work done third sector, in the situation where the third sector professionals face an increasing pressure to 'sell' their expertise and services to the municipalities and convince them of the services effectiveness and usefulness.

Reconnecting Professional Occupations with Professional Organizations: risks and opportunities

Evetts, Julia

School of Sociology and Social Policy, University of Nottingham Nottingham, UK

Keywords

risks, Professions, organizations, opportunities

For a long time, the sociologies of organizations and of professional groups have developed separately and had their own research questions and agendas. This has changed in the last 15 years as, increasingly, practitioners in Anglo-American societies (as well as in European) now work in complex hierarchical organizations (e.g. medicine and health) or, in law, in professional service firms (PSFs) and sometimes in international locations.

The paper will examine some of the organizational dimensions of expert work, how practitioners and organizations interact, the management of professionalism and the consequences for practitioners and their clients. The consequences of the interlinking of professional and organizational logics are beginning to be demonstrated by researchers. In the paper the risks to professionalism as the third logic (Freidson 2001) will be assessed and some of the opportunities for knowledge workers in organizations will be explored.

Respond strategies to the new logics of the market - further investigation of tourism professional's individual career paths

Formadi, Katalin

Tourism Department, University of Pannonia Veszprem, Hungary

Mayer, Peter

*Tourism Department, University of Pannonia
Veszprem, Hungary*

Keywords

mobility, Professionalism, specialization, tourism sector

Tourism sector is a rapidly growing and developing field witnessing an on-going professionalisation and also a strong specialization going on due to the market changes, the matter of market fluctuations, trends and fashions. Due to the exploding demand, there has been a continuous rise of new professions, upgrading skill requirements with different level of institutionalization. Tourism professionals intend to react immediately to the fragmented needs and the challenges of the market by upgrading skills and fastenning the institutionalization process in order to keep the professional position. It is also witnessed that the flexible, adaptable market-based skills and competences are becoming more important - providing more working options- beside of the formal education.

Theoretically professionalization is seen as a dynamic process on a micro level but there may be breaks and shifts in continuous professional development due to other personal priorities and external contents. By analysing of tourism professionals individual career paths, indicating the changes of work and workplace and the reason behind, we outline how professionals react to the new logics of the market and what respond strategies they adapt: they specialize according to the needs or use their existing knowledge in another place (finding a new job, and moving to and settling down in another location) ? so mobility may be seen as a solution to using existing knowledge and keeping the profession, instead of challenging the professionals in a new context. The respond strategies varies by the individual and market factors and also the career milestones. In this research we also consider the expanded optional spaces of individuals, the geographical mobility.

Restratification revisited: the changing landscape of primary medical care in England and California

McDonald, Ruth

National Primary care R&D Centre, University of Manchester Manchester, Greater Manchester

Keywords

Restratification, primary care, medicine

Debates about restratification within the medical profession have tended to focus on its impact on medical dominance, with critics challenging Freidson's writings on the subject. Less attention has been paid to Freidson's views on collegiality in the context of the use of formal standards developed by one (knowledge) elite and enforced by another (administrative elite). Freidson identified the proliferation of formal mechanisms to judge and where necessary, correct and control the technical and ethical standards of physicians' work as threatening collegiality and professional unity, with the collapse of the norms governing the way colleagues evaluate and control each other' (1985: 24) leading to friction and cleavage.

Drawing on interview data with primary care physicians in England and California this paper reports the emergence of new strata or elites, with groups of doctors involved in both surveillance of others and action to improve compliance in deficient individuals and organizations.

The implications of these developments differed between the two settings and this paper outlines a number of contextual factors which appear to account for these differences.

Whilst more formal mechanisms to control doctors in California caused some friction, Freidson's analysis fails to take account of the ability of the profession to develop new norms. In England, norms appear to be developing against a backdrop of an increasing acceptance of the legitimacy of professional scrutiny and accountability. A greater willingness to acknowledge and critique deficient practice, a willingness which is shared by elite and rank-and-file doctors alike, far from creating cleavage, can be interpreted as reflecting a desire for unity and a view that it is necessary to tackle problems of poor performance to bolster the standing of the profession.

Collegial practices were seen by Freidson as socialising members into an attitude of loyalty towards colleagues. The changes we observed do not necessarily undermine this socialisation process. However, in a context where performance measurement and scrutiny by elites is viewed by physicians as legitimate, this loyalty is unlikely to be unconditional.

Freidson E (1985) The reorganisation of the medical profession Medical Care Review 42(1): 11-35.

Russian Doctors: Social Attitudes and Strategies for Adaptation

Mansurov, Valeriy

*Dep. of Sociology of Profession, Inst. of Sociology of the Russian Academy of Science
Moscow, Russia*

Keywords

social adaptation, attitudes, doctors, social changes, transformation

Considerable changes are taking place in the delivery of medical services in Russia in the wake of the socio-political transformation of the country. Currently, there is a growth of the for profit sector in the delivery of medical care, where higher salaries are paid to physicians. The state sector is under stress and there is considerable dissatisfaction with the conditions of service and quality and availability of services for patients seeking treatment who do not have the ability to pay for care. The research aims to study the attitudes of Russian physicians to these changes and their strategies for adaptation. The methods used in the research include the use of existing statistical and other primary data sources; the use of structured questionnaires to collect data from a representative sample of male and female doctors in the three regions; the use of content analyses of all Russia weekly "Medizinskaya Gazeta" and some other periodicals in order to get the information on the situation. Qualitative interviews are undertaken with a smaller sample of physicians to explore understandings of change, and the threats and opportunities. Focus groups are used to collect data. The politics, the culture and the social structure of the Russian society are not intimately interrelated any longer: changes in one of them do not automatically result in changes in the others. The professional structure has become relative and dynamic. New occupations emerge, and the old ones transform. Professional status is inconsistent.

Science Careers - International Mobility importance

Emília, Araújo

Sociology, University of Minho

Scientific careers, knowledge, Research, mobility, this is a set of professions established in the European context of a knowledge economy

Quintas, Carla

Sociology, University of Minho

Braga, Portugal

Keywords

mobility, Trajectories, Science Careers

Scientific careers are arguably the most frequently discussed professional topic in the European context. The association between knowledge creation and wealth production is widely established and talk of a knowledge economy or a knowledge society is now commonplace among economists, sociologists and other social scientists. These developments helped bring into being a new professional category, namely the "knowledge worker". If not yet officially institutionalized as a distinct professional classification, the preeminence of this new kind of worker is at least informally recognized. In this framework, the following of the Lisbon Agenda and the implementation of the European Research Area put the professionals responsible for knowledge creation, diffusion and management at the forefront of policy concerns.

Nevertheless, there remains ample space to refine and differentiate the definition of knowledge worker. In this sense, this paper focuses on academic researchers, a usually neglected sub-category of knowledge workers since they are frequently not involved with R&D in the industrial sector. The paper discusses several characteristics of academic researchers' careers, devoting particular attention to one of its most prominent features: the increasingly demanding requirement of international mobility. Be it for the attainment of formal degrees, the collaboration in teaching and researching or, simply, the attendance of scientific conferences, international mobility presently typifies what academics are expected to do. At the same time, it poses severe constraints on their personal lives and on the lives of those around them. Drawing on research performed under the project "Mobiscience - Scientists' Mobility in Portugal: trajectories and knowledge circulation", the paper presents data collected by the way of interviews and a survey on experiences, motivations and expectations pertaining to academic careers with an explicit international dimension. In so doing, it advances typical mobility profiles for Portuguese academic researchers in three distinct areas (electrical engineering, health sciences and sociology) and highlights the most significant consequences for "scientific careers" trajectories.

Scientific Bureaucratic Medicine (SBM) and Medical professionalism

Spyridonidis, Dimitri

School of Social Policy, Sociology and Social Research, University of Kent Canterbury, Kent, UK

Calnan, Michael

School of Social Policy, Sociology and Social Research, University of Kent Canterbury, Kent, UK

Keywords

implementation, medical professionalism, Governance, management, diffusion

Background

SBM is the dominant discourse on evidence-based medicine in the English NHS which it is claimed lead to new forms of medical professionalism with the emphasis on organizational values, accountability and the control of autonomy. This paper explores the medical professions' response to SBM, where SBM is manifested in the form of NICE guideline and focuses on the implications for professionalism of the implementation of Obesity and Chronic Heart Failure guidelines.

Methods

The implementation process was tracked both retrospectively and prospectively using a longitudinal design. A comparative case-study design was used involving four different clinical and organizational settings in primary and secondary care. The snowballing technique was used to identify key informants for informal face-to-face interviews. In total, 70 face-to-face informal interviews were conducted, involving senior managers, service developers, and front-line providers, including hospital doctors and general practitioners, between 2007 and 2008.

Results

Medical professionals' responses to the use of NICE guidelines varied with doctors working as managers being receptive to SBM and being heavily constrained by contractual agreements and performance targets. This put them in potential conflict with their clinical colleagues although they did also mediate between managerialist and clinical interests. In contrast, doctors involved solely in clinical practice put more emphasis on professional discretion and self-regulation and used an individualised, experiential, and pragmatic approach to the use of scientific evidence in practice. In addition, doctors with the same clinical interests worked together and formed their own rules of governance and their increasing expertise made them more innovative although general guidelines were seen as increasingly redundant. This variable response to guidelines resulted in non-linearity and diffusion in the process of implementing NICE guidelines

Conclusions

It has been argued that SBM has lead to new forms of professionalism such as 'hybrid-professionals' who perform 'boundary work' illustrated in this study by the 'professional rationalists' that devote themselves to management and which suggest evidence of restratification in medicine. However, the evidence also suggested that one of the unintended consequences of SBM was to encourage professionals to innovate and develop their own body of expertise/guidelines to meet their clinical needs.

Small fraction jobs - is that what women health care workers want?

Dahle, Rannveig

*Research institute, Norwegian Social research (NOVA)
Oslo, Norway*

Keywords

Gender, ethnicity, class, Professions

Welfare services continue for the most part to be provided and organized within a national frame. The disproportionate participation of women in this field clearly suggests the consistency of gender in the professional process, and likewise, the economic and cultural positioning of paid caring work suggests the significance of class and ethnicity in this field. In the Norwegian context part time is the overall working structure, occurring in a most diversified pattern consisting of small, fractioned positions, spanning from 2,1 per cent of a full position to 4,8, 11,5, 17,2 etc, up to 70 or 80 per cent. Moreover, the recent trend is an extensive and increasing use of short term temporaries, also in fractioned positions. A full time fixed position seems hard to achieve. The social construction of a care worker is s a part time female with actual or potential family obligations - hence part time work is her favored option. This paper addresses the tension between women's assumed preferences and the institutional practices of using part time workers. Should this practice be understood mainly as a mutual adjustment to gendered, social and cultural expectations, or does it rather reflect the needs of institutions at the expense of the preferences of many women? A new concept, involuntary part time work has emerged in the Norwegian discourse, which also challenges conventional explanations of women's work. Furthermore, the working pattern seems to be related to professional positions, social class and ethnicity. Working class women are more exposed than nurses to work in very small fractions, and women and men of ethnic minorities who enter this field in increasing numbers, even more so. The paper first gives an overview of the present situation in Norway (which differs dramatically from the other Nordic countries), then goes on to analyses gendered implications of various law regulations regarding working hours, and finally examines the political rhetoric's regarding women's professional work in this sector.

Social anthropology à la russe: education, scholarly discipline, occupation

Romanov, Pavel

Center for Social Policy and Gender Studies, Center for Social Policy and Gender Studies Saratov, Russia

Iarskaia-Smirnova, Elena

Center for Social Policy and Gender Studies, Center for Social Policy and Gender Studies Saratov, Russia

Keywords

russia, Occupation, education, anthropology

The paper focuses on the contradictions in the development of social anthropology as a profession in contemporary Russia. On the one hand, the authors consider Russian higher education where anthropology emerged as a new discipline in early 1990s and was immediately split between several academic 'lineages' associated either with history, sociology, or philosophy. Anthropology curricula at various universities in Russia developed as disconnected and competing with, rather than as complementary to or compatible with each other. While 'historical' clan is engaged into studies of ancient and/or traditional folk cultures, 'sociological' one claims to study modern society, going into subcultures, corporations, markets, family life, looking closely into poverty, ageing, social problems, social policies, etc. On another hand, anthropology in early 1990s became a new name for an established institute within the Russian Academy of science, which was previously closely related to classic ethnography and ethnology. This long tradition of ethnography as a scholarly discipline is based on field research with emphasis on ethnic peculiarities and inter-ethnic conflicts. The third version of social anthropology is a course within the curricula for sociology, philosophy, cultural studies, public relations, etc. Due to a dominating trend in university textbook production, this branch of anthropology is stuck in frameworks of historic materialist concepts of 'ethnogenesis' and/or grand narratives about 'the nature of man', thus ignoring field research and constructing anthropology as an arm-chair discipline. Yet, no academic debate on the state of art of the discipline exists and the fragmentation of the discipline appeared as a major trend of its development in the country. At the same time, although anthropology is not very familiar to the wider public, the number of students has been gradually increasing during the last sixteen years. However, the Ministry of Education following the task of implementing the Bologna process, has closed down the social anthropology as a university program in order to shorten the number of specialities in the national higher education. The last section of the paper is devoted to an overview of the labor market and the nature of work of social anthropology as a modern occupation in Russia.

Social Mobility of Scientists in Russia, Europe and the USA in the XXI Century

Erokhina, Kira

Center for Sociological and Science Studies Researches, St Petersburg Branch of the Institute for the History of Science and Technology Russian Academy of Science Russian Federation,

Asheulova, Nadia

Center for Sociological and Science Studies Researches, St Petersburg Branch of the Institute for the History of Science and Technology Russian Academy of Science Petersburg, Russian Federation

Keywords

Social Mobility, emigration, government's programs, negative and positives factors of mobility

The scientist mobility is an integral part of the modern scientific activities that will grow, widen, and become deeper with the further progress of science.

Russia's migrational mobility has a marked emigrational character and is often irreversible. The scientist migration flows at three levels. The first level: a transfer of the best talented and skilled Russian scientists from province to the capital cities of Moscow and St.Petersburg. The second level: moving from Russia to Europe. The third one: relocation from Europe to the USA.

The scientist moving from the province to Moscow and St.Petersburg is a pronounced feature of the Russian mobility of scientists. Europe and more so the USA do not have such a problem.

The social mobility of scientists in the USA in a percent ratio is several times higher than in other countries. Scientists from all over the world keep on arriving in that country which can boast the largest number of scientists in the world.

The issue of the ever increasing emigration of European scientists to the USA and Canada is actively debated in Europe. The reasons of that phenomenon are the following: higher salaries, better conditions for research, a wish to work in an international scientific milieu.

Europe takes various measures to manage the scientist mobility. New programs appear that encourage a reverse flow of scientists who have achieved good results in North America. Besides, Europe tries, among other measures, to fight the shortage of scientists at the Russia's expense, or Russian scientists, to put it more correctly.

Mobility is really required in the scientist community. It is a source of obtaining researchers for new scientific fields and it promotes cooperation between scientists from various disciplines and different regions and countries. Nevertheless, the scientist mobility can be a negative factor for the conditions of the domestic science if its scope is steadily increasing and threatening to exhaust intellectual resources. Unlike other fields where the mobility periods are usually short and often restricted by certain career stages, the researcher mobility concerns people of all ages and social positions.

Social Workers in late modernity - reconstructing a professional practice

Pinto, Carla

*not applied, Instituto Superior de Ciências Sociais e Políticas / UTL
Lisboa, Portugal*

Keywords

social professions, professional practice, empowerment, social work, individualization

In the present context of redesigning of the welfare state, and by consequence also the reconstruction of the social professions, social workers try to find their professional space and expertise. We think that "empowerment" is a key concept to understand the social workers' dilemma between advocating clients true interest and rights, and having to apply to financial efficiency and performance neo-liberal criteria.

The empowerment concept is a value, a methodological and theoretical principle, central to social work practice and social welfare policies in general. Nevertheless, the rose has its thorns: the concept is polissemic and multidimensional, therefore also ambiguous, controversial and differently understood and practiced by different agents. Knowing this, it's fundamental to clearly define what empowerment is actually being practiced in the field by social workers: how do social workers apprehend the concept of empowerment, how do they try to implement it and what are the major obstacles to empowerment practice as defined by social workers? Several studies have shown that social workers tend to practice a predominantly individualistic view of empowerment. We argue that this tendency is a reflexion of some social processes typical of our late modernity societies and policies, namely individualization, prudentialism and depolitization.

To make our point we will present data from a qualitative study (a PhD research in progress) on empowerment representations and practices among Portuguese social workers.

Space, curriculum and occupational socialization: theoretical perspectives on professional learning and identity-construction

Welland, Trevor T D

*Political, International and Policy Studies, University of Surrey
Guildford, UK*

Keywords

space, curriculum, occupational socialization

Studies of professional preparation and socialization aim to explore the formal training programmes and processes of enculturation experienced by 'occupational neophytes' in order to map the range and diversity of expectations of new entrants to a profession. It can be argued that among the many challenges confronting work in this under-researched arena, are the consideration and problematization of the relationships between identities, the settings of occupational preparation and 'professional knowledge'. This challenge is presented by a number of sources. Firstly, much recent empirical and theoretical work that explores some of the settings and processes of professional preparation have indicated that this important field of inquiry has been characterised by a marked negligence of the transmission and management of professional knowledge. These voices propose that any sociologically useful approach to occupational socialization must be equally concerned with interaction (the 'classical' empirical focus on relations among trainees, educators, clients and professional bodies) and with the formal structuring and transmission of knowledge, as well as the arenas and settings of occupational preparation. In addition, a range of theoretical developments can assist in 'making sense' of these often complex relationships between learning for work/occupations and the construction of worker/professional identities. These include Foucault's notion of 'governmentality' or 'policing of the self' but Bernstein's theory of curriculum, too, although principally applied to school-based settings and processes, poses a fundamental question in asking 'how are forms of experience, identity and relation evoked, maintained and changed by the formal transmission of educational knowledge and sensitivities?' (Bernstein, 1975:85).

This paper assesses the significance of, and opportunities offered to occupational socialization research by these types of theoretical positions and the significance of empirical work in developing more integrated, systematic, theoretical accounts of identity-construction, curriculum and spatiality.

Standardised communication tools as an aide to facilitating "calling for help" and the escalation of care: the importance of understanding professional boundary work

Sandall, Jane

*NIHR Patient Safety and Service Quality Research Centre, King's College, London
London, UK*

Mackintosh, Nicola

*NIHR Patient safety and Service Quality Research Centre, King's College, London
London, UK*

Keywords

Health Professions, Patient Safety, License and Mandate

International patient safety policy documents explicitly acknowledge that tackling 'failure to rescue' (failure to recognise and respond appropriately to early signs of deterioration) has become a key international and national patient safety policy objective.

These reports note evidence of 'failure to rescue' across acute medicine, surgery and maternity and cite failure to appreciate severity of illness and sub-optimal treatment; wrong diagnoses, and failure of junior staff to diagnose or refer a case to a more senior colleague often results in unanticipated admissions to the intensive care unit (ICU), increased length of hospital stay, cardiac arrest or death.

There is widespread recognition that 'failure to rescue' is often linked with difficulties relaying and interpreting information across inter-professional boundaries which have been shown to contribute to care management problems. Standardised communication tools have been recommended as a means of improving the management of latent risk and escalation of care for the deteriorating patient. In the case of the nurse or midwife, the tool aims to enable the transmission of concise, salient information, licensing and empowering the individual to overcome established hierarchies in speaking out and asking for help.

Thus these tools are designed to override occupational and power hierarchies by facilitating transfer across organisational and professional boundaries. However, there has been little scrutiny of how such strategies are enacted in the workplace and of the response of the recipient. Draw on our research which is exploring the implementation of such communication tools in acute medical and maternity settings, we discuss how sociological literature on boundary work and inter-professional negotiation would suggest that the implementation of such communication tools may be more problematic than assumed.

To be submitted to Upsetting the health professional workforce: collaborative care and professional boundaries ? joint session with RN16 "Sociology of Health and Illness"

Studying the Role of Professional Associations in the Process of Healers Professionalization

Salo, Elena

International Department, Affiliation of Russian Academy of Sciences Institute of Sociology of RAS Code, Russia

Keywords

healers, professional association, professionalization, traditional medicine, dynamics

Studying dynamics of the professional status of specialists of traditional medicine, we should concern such prominent aspect, as activity of professional associations. The conducted research in three large regions of Russia - Moscow, Saratov and Balashov, Syktyvkar and Vylgort, has shown that there are no associations in Balashov and Vylgot, some regional branches of the Moscow associations operate in Saratov and Syktyvkar. More than ten professional associations functions in Moscow: Moscow Professional Association of Manual Therapists, Public Association of Reflex Therapists, Russian Homeopath Association, World Association of Psychologists, Doctors, Spiritual and Folk Healers, etc. Although a law on public organizations has been already issued which stipulates what associations can independently address, basically all activity is regulated by the Ministry of Health and Social Development. According to estimations of respondents, the role of associations is scanty. In our opinion, only World Association of Psychologists, Doctors, Spiritual and Folk Healers corresponds to all canons of the western classical model of professional association.

Lets consider the activity of this association in more details. The program includes a number of actions and the directions which purpose is defining a current state of truly traditional national healing and position of operating specialists in the field of national medicine, and also the organization and realization of the series of measures, directed on streamlining of activity of healers in a legal field and effective increase of professionalism of specialists and quality of healing services rendered by them. The actions include 10 items and directions contain 6 items.

The offered program provides the decision of questions of a scientific substantiation and the legal status of national healing. In a final variant the decision of a problem of healing should provide also questions of the official organization of service of healing as one of kinds of rendering of the medical help to the population.

Performance of the offered program can be assigned both to official public services of medical aid to the population and on the noncommercial organizations existing now uniting supporters and specialists of traditional national medicine.

The Career of Open Source Software Developers

Vicente, Michael

sciences économiques et sociales, Université de Technologie de Compiègne Compiègne, France

Auray, Nicolas

*SES, Telecom ParisTech
Paris, France*

Keywords

volunteer involvement, career, computing, Open Source

Involvement in FLOSS (Free/ Libre Open Source Software) is an odd object in the Information Technologies professional field, as it is both a hobby and a professional activity, (72% of FLOSS developers have a degree in computing, 40% are paid to contribute). We have realized a deep inquiry on a major FLOSS community, gathering the results of 15 long biographical interviews, an exhaustive and accurate statistical analysis of the participation and observation of meeting. On those elements we focused on dynamic aspects of individual trajectories and on the notion of 'careers' (Hughes, 1937; Becker 1985), emphasizing the generational aspects and the 'turning points' (Hughes, 1958). In doing so, we do not see involvement and motivation as a linear one but rather as sequential (Abbott, 2001). Those sequences, professional and personal, (end of schooling, major professional disillusion, unemployment, first meeting with FLOSS ) are specific points of bifurcation in the career constitution. We try to analyse how the level of participation in those collective projects influences and are influenced by those sequences. This observation teaches us on the articulation and personal arbitration between volunteer involvement and professional activity. More generally we notice a growing adoption of FLOSS in industry, so will see how this arbitration transforms the whole professional field of the computer scientist.

The Coming of the Proto-Professions - A Third Stage of Professionalization?

Olofsson, Gunnar

School of Social Sciences, University of Växjö Växjö, Växjö

Keywords

New scientific disciplines, occupations, professionalization, proto-professions, University Colleges

Today a new category of occupations seek to attain status as professions. After the classical professions came the semi-professions. The occupations seeking professional status in this third wave can be defined as 'proto-professions'.

Two forces are driving this process:

(a) The ambitions of specific occupational categories to attain professional status, demanding societal recognition of their training and competence. The Police force is a typical case. In some countries policemen are already being trained at Polytechnics or University Colleges. We also find an ambition to develop 'police science' as a cognitive underpinning of the professionalizing ambition. The same link between occupation, university training, and the establishment of a specific scientific field can be found in other 'proto-professions'. This linkage is modelled on the classical professions and more directly on the semi-professions. Occupations within the fields of Leisure and Sports, in Human Resource Management, Health promotion, information and PR, as well as real estate agents fall in the category of 'proto-professions'.

(b) A second impulse comes from the institutions of higher education, esp. the University colleges (cf. the Community colleges and State Universities in the US). They seek to expand their student enrolment by creating new study programmes with a fitting, if only imagined, occupational destination. In Sweden University Colleges and new Universities embark on this route by defining themselves as a 'Profession University' (Växjö, Malmö and Borås, with Oslo University College as a model)

This paper develops Wilensky's argument in 'The Professionalization of everyone?' (1964) in relation to the proto-professions. The empirical analysis is based on data on all relevant vocationally oriented study programmes (more than 260) in Swedish Universities and University Colleges in 2008.

The argument is that 'proto-professionalization' links the strategy of some occupational groups to achieve professional status with the growth of vocational programmes developing in university settings. If the proto-professions are to reach professional status it seems necessary for them to link their ambitions to the emergence of (new) scientific fields, related to the training and the practice of the profession-seeking occupation.

The construction of nurse's professional worlds; Comparing France and Japan evolving conventions

Harayama, Tetsu

sociology, Toyo University Japan,

Mosse, Philippe

Economics, Lest Aix-en-Provence, France

Keywords

nurse, international comparison, convention, profession

Nurse profession is changing quite quickly along with the context in which they are embedded. In order to analyze this evolutions, surveys (either by mean of interviews or questionnaire) have been conducted in both countries in 1988 in 2008. Using the notion of Convention in order to explain the differences as well as similarities of the two configurations, the communication will focus on the two main surveys results:

- 1) The professional world of French nurses is characterized by the opposition between the two logics, technical and domestic; the professional world of the Japanese nurses relies on the remaining power of the domestic logic.
- 2) In France, the rationalization logic (New Public Management) challenges the continuous trajectories of the nurses. In Japan, the introduction of the functional differentiation of Japanese hospitals requires the construction of the specialized nurses which will challenge the domestic logic.

We will discuss les relationships (critics and compromise) between different Conventions leading to the construction of nurse's professional worlds in the two, French and Japanese societal contexts.

The different ways of academic professionalization

Pérez Castro, Judith

Department of Education and Arts (DAEA), Juarez and Autonomous University of Tabasco Villahermosa, Tabasco, México

Hirsch Adler, Anita

Institute of Research on University and Education (IISUE), National and Autonomous University of México México, D. F., México

Keywords

profesionalization, Higher Education, academics

Academics?professionalization has been one of the most important topics in international education policy. In spite of the significant differences between national contexts, ministers and secretaries have recognized that academics are a vital part not only in education system, but in the development and maintenance of professional groups.

This paper presents the result of a research carried out in 2008 on the academic profession in France. While in this country, the category of "academics" does not exist, but rather they are considered bureaucrats of the system, the investigation was able to identify some policies and strategies that have been developed in order to support and strengthen the future generations of professors and researchers.

Here, we should note that France, like other European Union countries, is involved in a wider restructuring process called the European Space for Higher Education (ESHE), whose main goal is that Europe will become the world leader in knowledge generation in 2010.

The main results of the research can be summarized as follows:

- a) The process of academics renewal in France is going through a crisis. This is mainly because the low external and internal mobility in university labor market,
- b) The main source of market demand is the doctors and postdoctoral researchers, who are being educated in the universities themselves,
- c) There are significant differences between the opportunities for growth and strengthening of academic work, depending on the field of knowledge,
- d) The French system has developed various strategies to professionalize professors and researchers and to control access to labor market, such as: the monitors, the so called "ATER", and the CIFRE conventions. These measures have been successful in regard to the redistribution of jobs; however, they have also brought a series of unexpected consequences that have caused conflicts and a greater complexity in the academic market.

The emerging of a professionalization process in health: the case of cardiopneumology technicians in Portugal

Tavares, David

*Ciências Sociais e Humanas - Área de Sociologia, Escola Superior de Tecnologia da Saúde de Lisboa
Lisboa, Portugal*

Keywords

contexts of change in the health sector, autonomy, emerging group?s in health field, professionalization process, multidirectional evolution

This paper proposes to analyse the way the professionalization process of a group in the health sector ? specialized and possessing educational capital legitimized by higher education institutions ? raises new questions in what concerns the organization of labour, structured around medical dominance albeit in a manner distinctive from the traditional one. The paper submitted bears upon the findings of a research operationalised on a case study within had been applied a diversified set of methods (documentary research, interview, observation and survey). The specific object is the group of cardiopneumology technicians in Portugal, whose work refers to performing a set of diagnostic examinations, both cardiovascular and pulmonary. The analysis set forth allows an approach from a particular angle (diagnostic and therapeutical technicians), one that has been hidden in the agenda of the sociology of professions in health, with scientific outcomes almost exclusively confined to medical doctors and nurses.

This is a group who as recently acquired mounting levels of specialized and academically legitimized knowledge, and to whom are delegate ever more tasks, formerly exclusive to the medical doctors? jurisdiction, that presuppose the use of conception analytical knowlwdge. That growing delegation is mostly originated in the increasing specialization occurring within the medical field, notwithstanding it also involves the expansion of this emerging group?s competencies as well as the progressive autonomy of their work, and their (relative) separation from the medical field. This process sets forward a professional project centred on the rising attainment of new specialized functions; on the growing autonomy concerning activity organization and regulation; on control access to the profession as a form of exclusiveness over specific skills and tasks; on the wider visibility of the socio-professional group.

With the dissemination of the research findings, revolving around a specific empirical reference object, this paper intends a reflexion on the contexts of change in the health sector and the occupational groups it includes. It does so by taking as a starting point the emerging of a professionalization process that is revealing variability and multidirectional evolution, and where one can observe diversified and often paradoxical tendencies according to different ways of labour organisation.

The French Stockbrokers between the Market and The State: a Lost Profession

Riva, Angelo

*IREBS, European Business School
Paris, France*

Lagneau-Ymonet, Paul

*IRISES, Paris-Dauphine
Paris, France*

Keywords

France, stock brokers, Stock exchanges, economic-sociology, Professions

In less than three decades, one of the defining institutional symbols of French national sovereignty, the Paris Stock Exchange has been gradually demutualised and then transformed into a subsidiary of a holding company incorporated under Dutch law: Euronext NV. This private and international operator listed on the markets it operates controlled the exchanges of Amsterdam, Brussels, Lisbon and the London-based derivatives exchange LIFFE, when, in 2006, it entered into a merger process, finalised in spring 2007 with the New York Stock Exchange.

During the eighties, a closed corporation of privileged and monopolistic quasi-civil servants running family businesses, the Compagnie des Agents de Change and their charges, had exploded. By the dawn of the nineties, family-run brokerage businesses and individual memberships to a sui generis long-established guild with old boys' club practices were replaced by two kinds of market-oriented capital firms providing distinct and complementary financial services. Since then, investment firms have replaced the poorly-capitalised charges of the agents de change. On the other hand, a computerised regulated market run by a for-profit enterprise has replaced the clubbish and mutualised Bourse and is now to cope with alternative trading facilities, internalising intermediaries and third-country stock exchanges, all competing to attract trading-orders flows from investment services providers. This paper offers a brief genesis of a lost professional group, which bargained its dismantlement when its jurisdiction, the financial intermediation at the Paris stock exchanges, by large the first French financial market, became too big for its members.

The perspective developed hereafter, intermingles sociology of professions and field theory to take into account the structuring effects of national socio-economic histories on these strongly transnationalised and yet nationally-rooted financial institutions and agents that are stock exchanges and investment firms. If financial markets characterise the contemporary capitalisms as deregulation stands for a defining policy of neoliberalism, then financial deregulation, of which the end of the Compagnie was a defining moment, crystallises and reveals the very relations between State and Market that neoliberal agenda actualises.

The internalization of careers - TRANSMOBILITY in the life-science world

Wagner, Izabela

*sociology, university of warsaw
warszawa, POLAND*

Keywords

Ethnography, scientists, mobility, career, transmobility

In some professional careers the pathways are strongly related to the international mobility. It was almost always the case in elite careers (in the artist social world - Wagner I, 2005; in the business world - Wagner, A-C, other professional universe such as for some ministry positions Gruzinski, 1999) and in the science world. But with the development of life-sciences occurred in the last fifty years, and, as a consequence, the modification in the organization of work and the internationalization of researchers' career, the intensive geographical mobility constitutes not only the path of elite members but the ordinary and crucial aspect of life-science researcher's career.

The politicians of research, through the special contracts, grants and all kind of supports for mobility, push the scientists to move and improve their skills in various countries. Mobility of researchers becomes the obligation (international experiences are obligatory before getting a stable position), and is presented as a positive phenomenon, which constitutes the basic element of researchers' careers.

Thanks to the long-lasting ethnography (since 2003) realized in life-science researchers' world ? done in different countries (France, Poland, Germany, USA ? over 300 formal interviews) I was able to get the data, which allow me the possibility to analysis and reconstruction of this phenomenon of professional international mobility. The results show that there is no one type of mobility, but there are several different types of it. The analysis of this core process in the life-science-researcher career showed that this process is based on four stages. Each one represents different kind of mobility ? a) early, b) basic, c) expert and d)late. All stages ? whole process, constitute the phenomenon, which I called TRANSMOBILITY (Wagner, I 2009). My presentation is about this phenomenon - crucial for any professional careers nowadays.

The persistent importance of Knowledge in professional projects. A case study from nurses in Portugal

Carvalho, Teresa

CIPES, University of Aveiro Matosinhos, Portugal

Sousa, Sofia

CIPES, CIPES Matosinhos, Portugal

Correia, Carina

Campus B, Nursing School of Coimbra Apartado 55, Portugal

Keywords

Nusing Professional Project, Portugal, Knowledge

The traditional theoretical developments on professionalism have always putted emphasises on the importance of specialised knowledge to define a profession (Freidson, 1986; Johnson, 1982; Larson, 1977). Based on the Foucault notion of governmentality, recent approaches call attention to the impossibility of looking at knowledge as a neutral concept. Instead knowledge is understood, in this perspective, as the result of different political processes. Other theories make use of Gramsci analysis to try to analyse the way some ideas, norms and values come to be hegemonic in society (Wrede, 2008).

In contemporary societies knowledge notions have been reconfigured under the globalization influence and the principles of global neo-liberal market economics. Under this influence a new hegemonic notion of knowledge emerges sustaining the conception of a 'knowledge-based economy'. In this new context, knowledge became a major creative force of the economic development and its production and dissemination is increasingly incentivised outside higher education institutions and research centres. The increasing acceleration of knowledge production, accumulation and dissemination may put in risk its relevance to define a profession in our societies.

With this paper we intend to contribute to this discussion by analysing the more recent movements on the professionalisation processes of nurses in Portugal. This analysis is based on the political process underlying the merger of two nursing schools in Portugal, in which 'top-down' and 'bottom-up' mechanisms are identified. The qualitative approach developed, based on document analysis and 32 interviews with key and institutional actors, allows the conclusion that specialised knowledge and the formal credentials conceded in universities are still symbolically valued by professional groups in the organisational logic of professionalism. In this sense, it is possible to conclude that, even within the major processes of change in contemporary society, knowledge still remains as a hegemonic value institutionalised in Portuguese nursing professional project.

The professional divide in the societal response to child maltreatment - observations from Germany

Alberth, Lars

*Educational and Social Sciences, University of Wuppertal
Wuppertal, Germany*

Bühler-Niederberger, Doris

Educational and social sciences, University of Wuppertal Wuppertal, Wuppertal

Bode, Ingo

*Educational and social sciences, University of Wuppertal
Wuppertal, Germany*

Keywords

welfare, organisations, children

Internationally, maltreatment of small children is increasingly viewed as a severe challenge to social professionalism. Both the media reporting on violence at home and a growing sensibility to social deprivation during early childhood have brought (alleged) deficiencies of professional action on the public agenda. Concern is widespread about imperfections of existing patterns of intervention, regarding e.g. the use of organisational resources or resistance to interprofessional collaboration. However, this debate has shortcomings concerning the way it addresses professional divides in the societal response to child maltreatment. Firstly, there is little awareness of problems related to the professions' intrusion in the families' life world. This intrusion is subject to a bargaining between parents and professions, with the latter holding particular notions of intimacy boundary violations. Secondly, multi-party interventions (whether co-ordinated or not) are widespread, with the simultaneous involvement of different professions including physicians, midwives, family advisers or judges, each following a distinctive approach. Depending on who gets involved in which way, particular trajectories of professional interference emerge which entail case-specific (chains of) reactions to the problems at issue. Drawing on a broad review of the international literature and referring to the institutional setting in Germany, the paper presents a theoretical framework laying the grounds for an in-depth enquiry scheduled for the near future. It argues that the sociology of professions should pay greater attention to both the entanglement of various professional identities during social interventions and the way of how involved professions conceptualize their role vis-à-vis the private sphere of their clients.

The Reform of the Auditor Profession in Spain: What must we Study?

Rodriguez Avila, Nuria

*Sociology and Analysis of the Organizations, University of Barcelona
Barcelona, Spain*

Monllau Jaques, Teresa

*Depart. Economia i Empresa, University of Pompeu Fabra
Barcelona, Spain*

Keywords

Professions, Auditors, Accounting, Regulation, economists

The development of Professions is framed inside the social, political, and economic context of our society. Actually, this scenery appearance a new form of capital, where the professions are an essential element. We consider that the profession of Auditor in Spain has a special attention because the Auditor should be adapted to the European Directive 2006/43/CE. The Auditor profession should be asked: Which are the aspects to reform to be a good professional exercise, in the Global and European context?.

The point of view in the literature the most controversial aspects in the legislative reform are: a) The independence of the auditor. Their professional strategies and definition show how it is professionalism the auditor, b) The responsibility has to assume the auditor in the exercise of their profession.

The research methodology used has been mostly qualitative and quantitative. First part, we studied the auditor independence by the salaries invoiced and the distribution of the fees, and we analyzed the Ibex 35 business indicator since 2002 to 2007, in Spain. Second part, we revised on the literature and the scientific journals to study the responsibility of the auditor. Conclusions, we discussed these aspects in the framework in the main paradigms in the sociology of professions and how to be transform our society professional structure.

The role of the Russian business in formation and development of a new professional model (an industrial focus)

Moskovskaya, Alexandra

Institute for Social Development Studies, State University - Higher School of Economics Moscow, Russian Federation

Keywords

Professionalism, learning and development, employment, business, professional model

After a period of the radical market and institutional re-estimation of occupations and professions in 1990-es the former Soviet professional model based on the state regulation was mainly destroyed. The formation of a new one is going on under the active assistance of the business and in the absence or inactivity of the more 'natural' subjects as the state or professional associations are. The Russian business started to use the discourse of professionalism in order to strengthen the organizational control over employment. In external sphere the business spreads its influence by taking responsibility for formation of new occupational standards for employment and professional education with a consent of the state and half-consent of the universities. At the same time within everyday business practice and management during the last 10-15 years one cannot notice significant qualitative upheavals in learning and development, in professional discretion enlargement or in professional participation in a decision-making process as well. The Russian business partially inherited the attitude to professionalism from the former Soviet epoch with its ideological tendency to erase the differences in social status of an engineer and a skilled manual worker and with a weakness of the human resource management functions. The contemporary data collected from companies show the lack of qualification return, the low expenses on learning and development, mainly 'technical' character of corporate professional training based on short-term technical requirements of the production rather than on strategic development of key competences and knowledges. Paraphrasing in a way S. Clarke's saying the question is raised whether this represents a distinctly Russian professional model or is merely a transitional stage of a decline of professionalism.

The report is based on results of a series of intensive case studies, on publications and working papers of the Russian business associations and on personal experience of the author in consulting projects for a number of the Russian companies engaged in industry and transport.

The social standing of new and traditional occupations in Greece: A Weberian approach

Vryonides, Marios

*Social Sciences, European University, Cyprus
Nicosia, Cyprus*

Gouvias, Dionysios

Preschool education and educational design, University of the Aegean, Greece Rhodes, Greece

Efthymiou, Ilias

Pre-School Education and Educational Design, University of the Aegean Rhodes, Greece

Keywords

social reproduction, Weber, Greece, Occupational classification

The changing social hierarchies in society are of primary concern to many sociologists. Social hierarchies are connected with issues of symbolic power and distribution of wealth and have been at the core of sociological inquiry since the invention of sociology as a discipline. It is a particularly crucial issue in societies where structural transformation shapes and reshapes the available opportunities for social success.

This paper presents the findings from a sociological investigation of the way new and traditional occupations are perceived in contemporary Greek society. During the academic year 2005/6 as part of the research activities of the Laboratory of Social and Educational Studies (Department of Pre-School Education and Educational Design, University of the Aegean, Greece) the authors of this proposed paper coordinated a national survey in Greece. Nearly 600 questionnaires were distributed to a random stratified sample using a snowball technique, covering urban, semi-urban and rural areas. In the end 495 cases were included in our analysis (response rate 82.5%). Following a Weberian approach, we examined the way the general Greek population perceived forty occupations from all sectors of the economy in terms of six dimensions: their social standing, their desirability, the income they generated, their usefulness to society and the access they were thought to offer to power centres. These six dimensions were then investigated in order to determine their weight in making up an index of occupational classification. This index was then compared with International Occupational Indexes (i.e. ISCO-88) to assess how well the selected occupations correlated. Moreover, these 40 occupations were investigated for their gender profile; that is, how much people thought they were suited to men and women. Our analysis points to interesting findings in terms of the way new and traditional occupations are perceived in contemporary Greek society and in terms of the primary determinants of their social standing. This, in turn, has implications for social mobility and social reproduction studies of how available opportunities (educational and occupational) become accessible to different social groups.

The Specific Professional Conflicts of Teachers and Doctors within the Portuguese Reform of the Public Administration and Civil Service

Stoleroff, Alan

*Centro de Investigação e Estudos de Sociologia, ISCTE
Lisbon, Portugal*

Pereira, Irina

*Centro de Investigação e Estudos de Sociologia, ISCTE
Lisbon, Portugal*

Correia, Tiago

*Centro de Investigação e Estudos de Sociologia, ISCTE
Lisbon, Portugal*

Keywords

professional conflicts, public employment professionals, public service reform, ?new managerialism?

The conflicts that arise from the application of the not-so-new ?new managerialism? to public administration and public services can be revealing of the stakes of existing patterns of professional organization. Their outcomes also determine the contours of new patterns of professional relations. The Portuguese Reform of Public Administration, as carried out by the Socialist Party government since 2005, inspired by ideas and experiences of ?new public management?, has proceeded through radical changes in the models of organization and employment relations encompassing the sector as a whole and has also entailed specific measures of restructuring for the ?special corps? of professionals and civil servants in various state and public services. The specific reforms imply the adaptation of the general ?private sector?-inspired principles of the Reform of Public Administration to the particular professional cases. As required by the relevant legislation, the changes in career statutes and employment conditions have involved additional negotiation with the union representatives of the professional employees. The process of proposition and reaction and conflict that characterizes these negotiations has revealed differing capacities of public-sector professions to resist managerialist encroachment upon their autonomies and powers. In this paper we will present and analyze the relevant measures of the general Reform and their specific adaptation to the sectors of public education and hospitals with regard to the employment relations and careers of teachers and doctors. Both these cases have produced significant conflict between these professional groups and their union representatives and the government and demonstrate distinct issues related to the application of new management principles and new career logics to professional bodies in the public sector as well as unequal capacities for professional resistance and affirmation.

The Why and How of Professionalism: Coaching as an Emerging Occupation

Meredith, Elly

Work and Organisational Studies, University of Sydney Neutral Bay NSW, Australia

Keywords

Emerging Professions, Coaching, Professionalisation.

The perspectives and approaches to understanding professions have changed over the last forty years, yet comparatively little has been written about emerging occupations. This paper draws on professionalisation literature, semi-structured in-depth interviews as well as conferences and websites to examine why and how an emerging occupation, such as coaching, is attempting to professionalise.

Since the 1980s the development of coaching as a relatively new occupation has emerged and is now trying to become professionalised. Coaching, and in particular executive coaching, has become one of the fastest growing sectors in the western world. It has been estimated by PricewaterhouseCoopers that there are 30,000 coaches worldwide generating an income of $1.5 billion. Yet coaches, and coach associations, have different, and often conflicting, views on what constitutes coaching and the necessary qualifications and educational experience to practice as a coach.

These conflicts have resulted in the creation of a number of member based groups, such as The Coaching Commons, International Coach Federation and the European Mentoring and Coaching Council. In an effort to understand and address these differences a number of these member bodies and coach training organisations, including universities, have formed global coaching conventions such as the 2008 Global Convention on Coaching. The arguments for holding these global conventions are complex, with many reasons being put forward by the conflicting member groups. What is unclear is whether these reasons are to; establish trust, boundary work, maintain respectability, distinguish their work from others, establish control, banish governmental control by establishing a free market or expert work, or a combination of these.

The important issue is why and how these organisations are attempting to professionalise the coaching industry. It is the 'why' and 'how' that needs to be answered. This paper addresses these two questions.

Trust and collaboration in hybrid home care organization' staff empowerment or subordination

Vabø, Mia

*Welfare policies and inclusion, NOVA - Norwegian social research
Oslo, Norway*

Keywords

Governance, trust, Post-NPM, home care, benchmarking

In the wake of the NPM trend of modernizing public government, many countries have experienced shortcomings and adverse effects of reforms. Pragmatic solutions and new reform models are put on the agenda, stressing joined up governance, horizontal governance and other multi-stakeholder arrangements. These new images readily bring to mind the idea of repairing or putting back together something that is broken (Christensen & Lægreid 2007). From a Nordic perspective they have a nostalgic reverberation as they tend to raise questions which were at the forefront in reforms dominating the pre-NPM era.

This paper explores the way in which the comeback of 'old' organizational ideas -- stressing mutual trust and collegial collaboration -- are repackaged and put into practice. To what extent and in which ways are they challenged by or subordinated to previous governance models paying attention to the vertical dimensions of welfare organization? Empirical examples draw on case study data from the Norwegian home care sector, from two different city wards, both of which had organized home care according to purchaser provider model; both of which had realized that collaboration and latitude was needed in order to meet the complex and shifting needs of care recipient. The idea that service providers should be held accountable through contractual relationships with a purchaser unit was rejected and efforts were made to (re)establish trust and collaboration between purchaser and providers.

The case studies indicate that collaboration based on mutual trust and transparency open up for care giver staff to act in accordance with their own professional and ethical standards. However, they also expose that tenets of NPM are robust. Officials stick to their belief in efficiency through benchmarking and to the quantification myth i e that everything relevant can be quantified. The paper argues that the institutional dynamic of change is best understood as a complex mixture of external and internal pressure from a range of actors at different levels who possess different forms of power and knowledge. The process of governance is characterized by conflicting models and the point of balance between them may vary between different care districts.

Trying to define a profession: the Police

Durão, Susana

ICS, Instituto de Ciências Sociais da Universidade de Lisboa Portugal, <http://www.ics.ul.pt/instituto>

Keywords

plurality, Professions, Ethnography, Police

Police professions are a challenge to sociological theories of professions. Firstly, because they are based upon a permanent tension between unity and plurality; secondly, and consequently, because they are very difficult to define. With examples from an ethnographic fieldwork inside the Portuguese urban police force, the aim of this essay is to develop the argument of Peter Manning. When considering policing practices, the author defends that the police's mandate is an 'impossible' one. The police have staked out a vast and unmanageable social domain. And what has happened as a result of their inability to accomplish their self-proclaimed mandate is that the police have resorted to the manipulation of appearances. We can take even further Manning's statement and argue that the police profession is impossible to define, due to the structural tension between unity and plurality, at least if we consider the sociological literature on these matters.

Women in the Bar: A Comparative Study of Finnish and Polish Legal Practice From Gender Perspective

Choroszewicz, Marta

Department of Sociology and Social Policy, University of Joensuu Joensuu, Joensuu

Keywords

Bourdieuian field, career, Intersectionality, Gender, legal practice

The paper represents the first attempt to the comparative analysis of differences in professional careers of Finnish and Polish women attorneys. Its starting point is the detailed description of research problem regarding the study on females' professional careers in advocacy in two different national contexts. Therefore, firstly, it sketches the nature of the profession with reference to the previous studies on Finnish and Polish women lawyers (Silius 1992; Fuszara 2003). Secondly, it endeavors to discuss the peculiarities of legal practice in both countries and their possible implications for women's professional activity. Moreover, in order to contribute to the understanding of women's career and their current position in professions, the paper opens up a discussion on the importance of intersectionality in the research of females' careers. Particularly, due to the fact that nowadays gender can no longer be regarded as a simple bipolar difference (Moser 2006) but it needs to be considered in reference to other interacting factors such as nationality/ethnicity, age and class. In addition, gender is also considered as a relational and flexible part of a legal field (Adkins 2004) and therefore, its effect and value are dependable on the context it is analyzed in.

For this reason, my paper discusses Bourdieusian argument regarding the impact of the structure of a particular field on women's professional activities. Taking as an example advocacy understood as a potential Bourdieusian field, women are seen as agencies and analyzed in the regard to their capacities for action within the structure of legal practice.

As a result, this paper endeavors to shed a new light on the career, and would capture particularly women's professional experience, on the contrary to classical career theories predominantly based on the male life cycle (Pierce 2002).

Women's Ambitions in Post-Soviet Professional Environments. Being a physician, a surgeon, a scientist, a mother, and a wife

Novelskaite, Aurelija

VU KHF, Institute for Social Research Vilnius, Lithuania

Riska, Elianne

*Swedish School of Social Sciences, University of Helsinki
Helsinki, Finland*

Keywords

post-Soviet society, medicine, ambition, woman, Gender

The paper describes the ambitions of women who work in a highly feminized profession (medicine), but in a highly masculine specialty (surgery) in a post-Soviet country (Lithuania). The paper addresses three questions. First, what kinds of ambitions does a woman physician-surgeon have in a post-Soviet society? Second, how do professional women-surgeons articulate and rationalize their ambitions? Third, how does post-Soviet reality shape a woman surgeon's ambitions?

The data used in this paper consist of semi-structured interviews which were conducted with male and female Lithuanian physicians (N=36) in 2005. A total of 15 surgeons were interviewed, of whom eight were men and seven were women. This paper is based on five interviews with the most ambitious women-surgeons working in science related medical institutions.

Results of thematic discourse analysis of these five interviews demonstrate that the women surgeons have similar ambitions to those found in other societies: the main targets of the ambition in post-Soviet medicine are professional development, career achievement, and family life. Furthermore, the women surgeons were inclined to degrade their ambitions. Such a narrative can be interpreted as a way for these women to survive in surgery, which is a highly male-dominated professional environment. Specific post-Soviet reality related aspects are present in the women's narratives fragmentary.

Working and living as artist: careers and professional paths

Borges, Vera

*ICS, Instituto de Ciências Sociais - University of Lisbon
Lisbon, Portugal*

Costa, Pedro

*ISCTE, Dinâmia - ISCTE
Lisbon, Portugal*

Keywords

Careers, profession, labour markets, artists

The profound changes which we assist today in the organisation of the artistic, creative and cultural worlds substantiate our interest in artistic careers and professional paths, labour markets and their dynamics. Recently, an important number of authors discuss the situation faced currently by artists in the areas of dance, music, theatre, visual arts, their characteristics and how they have evolved.

Sociologists and economists analysing these markets have drawn attention to the considerable growth in the number and the diversity of artists in Europe, United States or Australia. These research studies show that artists are mostly young, qualified, inventive and mobile, comparing to other labour markets. Furthermore, the results have been able to show how they move in networks and multiply around different sectors of activity and a series of distinct works. These studies generally point towards the development of new ways of working which are based on the extreme flexibility of artistic careers, on their increasing autonomy and on innovative forms of working.

However, these studies also demonstrate the "dark side" of the growth of this population: the amount of artistic work increases less quickly than the number of individuals involved, increasing the competition, inequalities and differences in the level of activity. They are also dependent of a number of mediation and gatekeeping processes which are fundamental for career legitimation and professional affirmation, but which tend to be quite asymmetrical and to promote selectivity.

The aim of this paper is to present some preliminary conclusions of an ongoing research project on these topics, departing from the specific analysis of the career paths of performing artists and musicians, and how they work and live in Portugal. We inquire which formative paths do these individuals follow, and how do the different types of work and employment methods combine. Taking into account the most recent theoretical contributions and the results of countless empirical research studies realized in Europe, EUA and Portugal, adopting a multidisciplinary approach, we will give special attention to the artist "moonlighting career paths" and the importance of a "second job" in these art worlds.

Young Managers and Their Professional Dispositions

Amandio, Ana Sofia

Sociologia, École Normale Supérieure - Lettres et Sciences Humaines Lyon, France

Keywords

management, managers, , professional dispositions

In this paper I will present part of my doctoral thesis preliminary empirical results concerning the managerial dispositions of young managers of Lisbon (Portugal).

In my thesis I consider Weber's notion of the 'new type of individual'. Through its analogy I intend to observe a new type of manager in the Portuguese society: The professionalized manager. This social profile, represented by the new generation of managers, is established by opposition to two profiles characteristic of the management context in Portugal until the mid 1980s: the owners-directors, with no diploma; and the salary-directors graduates of economics and engineering. This new generation of managers is the object of our sociological study.

I will then present the results of the analysis of my questionnaire in order to discuss their different dispositions (incorporated ways of thinking, feeling and acting, etc.): 1. Normative dispositions to sacrifice, hedonism, confidence, and loyalty; 2. Dispositions to a given working situation, from ownership to salary; 3. Professional dispositions related to disciplinary and technical knowledge as well as deontology 4. Bureaucratic dispositions related to the hierarchy and the organisation's culture, including performance evaluations; 5. Dispositions of power, authority and persuasion.

The analysis of these dispositions is based on 5 corresponding prepositions: 1. Fundamental to the manager's studies is the sociological distinction between a socialising agency (management normative literature) and the socialised manager (managerial practices); 2. Taking into consideration that the discipline and profession of management is a result of the division between ownership and direction, it is inevitable to check the new configurations of this phenomenon; 3 and 4. It is furthermore crucial to contribute to the ongoing debate on the sociology of professions concerning the professional and the bureaucratic professions. 5. In addressing the legitimate types of management powers, accounts must be taken of 'persuasion' as opposed to the 'managerially obsolete' authority.

This paper will conclude with a reflection on the use of the concept of managerial dispositions, particularly its virtues and limits.

RN20

Qualitative Methods

"Heshima" - Social interaction and commonsense thinking in cross-cultural interviews

Ryen, Anne

Dept. of Sociology, Social Work and Welfare, University of Agder Kristiansand S, Norway

Keywords

transformative research, sense making, interviews, cross-cultural research

In this paper I will focus on interviewing in a cross-cultural context. Cicourel (1964) was inspired by Schutz (Fontana 2002) who argued that shared knowledge is a prerequisite for understanding and reciprocating actions. Cicourel claimed that utterances in survey interviews always are occasioned with sense making based on unspoken meanings and aspects of settings, and never context-free (Cicourel 1974, Mishler 1986, Altheide 2002). Consequently, we need to understand participants' categories and how they use them in particular activities (Silverman 2006).

I will use Cicourel's argument as a point of departure to discuss experiences from a research programme on company welfare in multi-cultural Tanzania (Ryen, Temba and Matotay 2009). This goes well along with his concern about how researchers go about categorising the activities described. Also, the interview activity takes place in a context where we cannot always assume knowledge to be shared, where reciprocity may be complicated and the context interrupted by the cross-cultural aspects of the setting, and as such complicates the commonsense devices for making sense of the environment (Cicourel 1964, Ryen 2008a and b).

I will show how this influenced upon social interaction in the interviews mapping benefits and allowances in the Tanzanian formal sector pay-packet, and discuss how we best can treat such data. This includes arguing how members of mixed teams can collaborate to manage the complexity of the everyday knowledge 'taken-for-granted' that no longer can be assumed shared. Unless these challenges are made explicit, cross-cultural programmes risk being robbed of their transformative potential.

"What can you see them doing?" - Notes on video elicited interview

Byczkowska, Dominika

Sociology of Organization and Management Department, University of Lodz Lodz, Poland

Keywords

dance, video elicited interview, Grounded Theory Methodology, photo elicited interview, embodiment research

In the article, there will be presented one of research methods used in a GTM based study on social construction of embodiment and social world of ballroom dancing. A theoretical perspective of the research is symbolic interactionism and phenomenology. The method is video elicited interview with experts of the theme. There will be presented a description of this kind of interview, which was supposed to give new data, not obtained by photo elicited interview, observation, autoethnography and video analysis also used in the research project.

As when it comes to embodiment, one should reach outside from narrative research methods and for that reason a photo elicited interview or observation are often used, there will also be presented a comparison between these research methods and video elicited interview.

In the paper I will also show how tricky it may be to believe one's own eyes, when not being a part or an expert of the theme in question. There will be shown some examples of perceiving certain moves and human action in very different ways by a researcher, by outsiders and by dancers and dance teachers. Consequences of these will be shown as well.

As the last two problems, there will be shown advantages and disadvantages of this method and ways of analyzing data obtained using this research method.

"Your tax money at work!" Notes on the ethnography of the state

Maeder, Christoph

Educational Research Lab, University of Teacher Education Thurgau Switzerland,

Nadai, Eva

Social Work, University of Applied Science Northwestern Switzerland Olten, Switzerland

Keywords

Government, bureaucracy, Ethnography

Ethnographic research in modern societies often takes place in settings and organizations which refer to, or are run by the state in one way or the other. Research in prisons, welfare agencies, unemployment programs, hospitals, schools and the like is always closely linked to political structures and governmental organizations. Like an encompassing frame the state and its organizations embed and structure local practice and shared meanings in these 'street level bureaucracies' (Michael Lipsky) in many ways. 'Bringing the state back in' (Bob Jessop) seems an even more relevant challenge now that the current worldwide financial crisis has reestablished the state as an important actor shaping social processes. Yet, participant observation as the methodical cornerstone of the ethnographic endeavor does not lend itself easily to discover and discern 'invisible' social structures and forces beyond the local setting under scrutiny. The ethnographer cannot observe directly social systems, organizations, or the state, but only 'actual activities of actual people' (Dorothy Smith). How can we link local practice and social processes with external forces and power relations?

In our paper we will present and discuss different approaches in sociological ethnography of handling 'the big' (the state, political structures) in the 'small' (interaction, local practice, shared meaning). In a somewhat oversimplified way we can position these approaches between two poles. On one side we find 'dualistic' perspectives positing external factors impacting on a local situation, e.g. the different versions of Anselm Strauss' 'conditional matrix' or Michael Burawoy's 'extended case method' which restricts ethnography to observing the immediate situation while resorting to decontextualized theory for explaining social forces beyond the local. On the opposite pole there are concepts like Dorothy Smith 'institutional ethnography' or Adele Clarke's 'situational analysis' that claim that the sociologist must reconstruct any institutional order (thus also the state) from observable local practices. With empirical examples from our own current research (inter-institutional cooperation in the welfare system, schools) we will illustrate how we can practically handle the link between the locally observable and the macro-level of the state.

A Method for Exploring the Interaction Between Client and Social Worker

Eide, Solveig Botnen

Sociology and Social work, Agder University Kristiansand, Norway

Keywords

methods for researching interaction, interaction between clients, social workers participation

The interaction between a professional and their client is a key issue in health care as well as in different welfare systems. Many other and different studies focus on this. A common characteristic of many of these studies is that the clients are being asked how this interaction was perceived, using a pre-written questionnaire or using an interview guide, like in various client surveys.

In this paper I will give an account of the method I use when researching the interaction between clients and social workers, with special reference to the investigation of the clients' participation .

Those studies are of an inductive nature and are based on ordinary conversations between the client and their social worker. These conversations are tape recorded, and later typed out in full length. After this process, the social worker and client are asked to read the transcribed conversation and to highlight parts which,

- regard or show participation of the client
- invite the client to participation

Using this as a foundation, the client and social worker is then interviewed individually. This approach ensures the proximity to the interaction between social worker and client, and engages them in the interpretation of the study's primary sources.

The methodological approach is qualitative and can be characterized as an open and active approach . This approach is chosen to get close to the actors and their perceptions, as well as to gather a ground for a phenomenological-ethical analysis of the findings according to the clients' participation. In addition to a discussion of the methodology and its potential, this paper will provide examples of the findings of my research

1. This method were used in the research for my doctor thesis: Principles and Experience ? Conversations About, and Experiences of, the Relationship Between Mother and Child in the Context of Child Protection (Eide 2007). Detecting Client Participation (Eide 2009).

2. Schutz, A. (2002): Den sociale verdens fenomenologi. Uddevalla: Daidalos.

3. Holstein, J.A. and J. F. Gubrium (1995): The Acrive Intervjue.Thousand Oks. CA: SAGA

A methodological consequence of Foucault's paradox "L'énoncé est à la fois non visible et non cache"

Bauernschmidt, Stefan

Department of English, American and Romance Studies, Emmy Noether Independent Junior Research Group "Travelling Goods/Travelling Moods" Erlangen, Germany

Keywords

Foucault's discourse theory, discourse analysis, sampling, methodology

In 2001 and 2003 the "Handbook Socio-scientific Discourse Analysis" was published, compiling different theoretical approaches to discourse analysis and presenting empirical researches on discourse. Here and elsewhere both Reiner Keller (2004, 2005, 2006, 2007, 2008) and Rainer Diaz-Bone (1999, 2006, 2007, 2008) set out to think about methodical devices for empirical research on discourse and consequently think about methodological issues, like design, inference and sampling, too.

Following Keller's sociology of knowledge approach to discourse which integrates important insights of Foucault's theory of discourse into the interpretive paradigm (Keller 2006) in my trans-cultural case study "Ford in Interwar Berlin" I am tackling the task to analyse the process of social appropriation of discourse on Ford cars. Hence, I am confronted with the above mentioned methodological problems. Especially when it comes to the description of the relations between statements and of the statements themselves, we find connected to Foucault's notion of the 'statement' this paradox: 'The Statement is neither visible nor hidden.' (Foucault 2006, p.109) It is still difficult to understand how something 'neither visible nor hidden' can be represented and analyzed. notes Simon During (1992). Well, I agree with him and from my point of view this paradox has at least one far reaching methodological consequence: it affects sampling. Why? Since the 'statement' is the modality of existence for a formulation, formulations have to be inspected concerning this feature before data gathering and subsequent analysis. Consequently, we are adopting not probability, but purposive sampling. Hence, Foucault's discourse analysis despite Foucault's 'happy positivism' pronouncement displays an affinity to qualitative methods and interpretive methodology, for now in the planning and reflection of the process of data gathering in general. This is more than to say 'theoretical sampling' informs the collection of data, as Keller (2006) did, and it is more than to call the probing phase an exploring one, as Diaz-Bone (2006) did. Foucault's theoretical concepts, like formulation, statement, discourse and so on, have a fundamental impact on methodological issues like sampling.

An International Perspective on Innovations in Social Science Research Methods: What is in store for Qualitative Research?

Xenitidou, Maria

*Sociology, University of Surrey
Guildford, Surrey, United Kingdom*

Gilbert, Nigel

*Sociology, University of Surrey
Guildford, Surrey, United Kingdom*

Keywords

structures, qualitative research, research methods, innovations

We have been constructing a 'map' of the 'hot spots' of research methods around the world. This map has two aims: first, to locate innovations in method being developed within social science disciplines; and second, to locate the sites and institutional contexts of these innovations. We have been seeking research practices that have not yet filtered through to typical research methods courses or that impact on the research process in novel ways. Our interest in innovative research practices ranges from data collection to analysis and covers disciplines such as (social) psychology, sociology, social work, socio-legal studies, political science (including public health and public policy) and international studies, (social) geography (area studies, demography, environmental and urban planning), (social) anthropology, (socio-)linguistics, education, communication studies, economic and social history, economics (management and business studies), science and technology studies, statistics, methods and computing.

In this paper, we shall present the conclusions of the project with reference to developments in qualitative methods and qualitative research overall. This includes the identification and geographical mapping of innovative methods and practices, innovators, research networks and structures, as well as a reflection on these developments. Preliminary observations indicate that (i) visual, digital and online methods, (ii) the use of existing theoretical approaches and methods in new ways and (iii) interdisciplinarity are all main features of innovative qualitative research practices.

The project has gathered evidence by reviewing previous reports, carrying out desktop research using automated methods of identifying growth points, conducting an e-mail survey with academics, practitioners, research methods experts and others (N=215) - registering data entries in the form of nominations of experts, institutions and links to explore (N=670) - and holding interviews with gatekeepers (N=36) and telephone interviews with nominated experts (N=34 in progress).

The research has been supported by the Economic and Social Research Council (ESRC) as part of the National Centre for Research Methods (NCRM).

Applying ideas from multi-sited ethnography to sociology of culture

Seppälä, Pauliina

*Sociology, University of Helsinki
Helsinki, Finland*

Keywords

Ethnography, multi-cited ethnography, sociology of culture

The methodological contemplation behind this paper began when the author set out to examine further the case of her Master's Thesis. The study had focused on the club, rave and recreational drug use culture in Finland and the empirical data supported both the, at the time popular, idea of post or late modern era with individually rather than structurally determined lifestyles and hybrid cultural sphere, as well as the thesis of cultural distinction as a way of reproducing social structures of power, by Pierre Bourdieu. Work by British sociologists combining class theory, Bourdieusian theory, feminism and Cultural Studies, most importantly Beverley Skeggs, provided the theoretical premise for the further PhD project around the same empirical case. This work made sense of the earlier findings by arguing that the mobile, post or late modern lifestyles, are actually a particular, privileged social position, and made possible only by a contrast to those failing to be late or post modern.

The research question for the PhD paper, then, was 'in which ways is popular culture today a symbolic economy that is used to produce unequal social power relations, whether of gender, class or other type?' This paper discusses the reasons that a method and a discussion known as multi-cited ethnography was drawn on as the main methodological frame for the PhD study. Advantages of ethnography as a general concept are discussed, as well as problems with conventional ethnography in contemporary contexts of doing research. The main features and advantages of multi-cited ethnography are presented.

The application of the method into author's research project is then described. It is presented how, out of the academic discussion concerning multi-cited ethnography, some concrete tools and definitions were chosen and applied.

Archiving Qualitative Data. Polish Practice vs. European Experiences

Binder, Piotr

*Institute of Philosophy and Sociology, Polish Academy of Sciences
Warsaw, Poland*

Keywords

comparative research, qualitative data, archivisation

Many qualitative researchers understand and strongly support the idea of qualitative data archiving. Although Polish sociology has great tradition of collecting and analyzing qualitative data (to mention only "The Polish Peasant in Europe and America" edited by F. Znaniecki and W.I. Thomas, 1918-1920) data sharing and/or archiving (especially) for re-use has never been a part of Polish research culture. However the core part of national policy on data archiving, namely Personal Data Protection Act from 1997 should not be treated as a barrier the social researchers could not break.

As a consequence the existing infrastructure is not impressive. The collections are spatially dispersed, very diversified (from pictures and materials from memoirs writing competitions to recorded interviews) and rarely digitalized. What needs to be stressed is that they function practically outside academia. The contacts between both sides are loose and based rather on individuals than inter-institutional cooperation.

The biggest Polish collection of autobiographical interviews belongs to an NGO called KARTA. Their collection is already impressive and soon will be available on the internet (open access). Comparing to KARTA, Qualitative Data Archive at the Institute of Philosophy and Sociology of the Polish Academy of Sciences (IPS PAS), one of the strongest Polish research institutes of an academic character, is at its initial stage of development struggling with the institutional practices (of NOT sharing data) and financial limitations.

The aim of the presentation is to critically present current state of development of the Polish archives of qualitative data and reflect upon the possibilities to draw on the experiences of much better developed European initiatives including International Association for Social Science Information Service and Technology (IASSIST) and Council of European Social Science Data Archives (CESSDA).

Beyond Visualization: Qualitative Software, Spatially Integrated Social Science and Qualitative Mapping

Cisneros-Puebla, Cesar A.

SOCIOLOGIA, UNIVERSIDAD AUTONOMA METROPOLITANA-IZTAPALAPA MEXICO, MEXICO

Keywords

community mapping, visualization, qualitative data analysis, spatially integrated social science

This paper provides an overview of "Spatially Integrated Social Science" and includes discussion of motivations for pursuing this approach, its benefits and challenges and a discussion of the current role qualitative software plays in these efforts. The integration of geographic dimensions into qualitative analysis projects adds a contextual angle to study. The paper addresses issues to consider when incorporating analysis of spatial dimensions into the study. Spatially integrated social science allowed us to discover links between human emotions as culture, language, memory and its spatial dimensions with geographic references.

It will also address conceptual and methodological considerations related to qualitative mapping as an approach to data collection. Qualitative mapping is a discussion group technique designed to collect spatial data in the form of drawings and maps with supplemental textual data. Mapping activities have always sought to represent relationships between different levels and elements in space; however qualitative mapping also includes human emotions, culture, language, memory, and so on. Modeling these human relations and their multiple connections to space is not an easy task; the presentation focuses on how the visualization, coding, and annotating functions in qualitative software can be used to build a multifaceted representation of space and lived experience and link multiple types of data.

The presentation draws its examples from data collected on adolescent reproductive health behaviors in Asuncion, Paraguay in 2006 through small group discussions, qualitative mapping activities, and digital mapping activities. The presentation outlines the analytical tasks that were conducted using MAXqda software to develop a typology for adolescent romantic and sexual relationships that takes into account youths' perceptions of safety in the community and supervision by parents and other adults. The approach worked to visualize discussion group data (text) from the perspective of spatiality and view visual geographic data (drawings and digital maps) in terms of youths' discussions of their lived experience.

Holistic visualization of complex phenomena is discussed as a new frontier for emergent and mixed method engaged to develop spatially integrated approaches in social science.

Comparative Data Analysis: Performing, Dancing and Theorising the Data

Abbas, Andrea

School of Social Sciences and Law, Sociology, University of Teesside Tees Valley, UK

Singleton, Carrie

School of Social Sciences and Law, Sociology, University of Teesside Tees Valley, UK

Carroll, Rachel

School of Arts and Media, English Studies, University of Teesside Tees Valley, UK

O'Brien, Sarah

School of Arts and Media, Performing Arts, University of Teesside Tees Valley, UK

Salzer, Heike

School of Arts and Media, Performing Arts, University of Teesside Tees Valley, UK

Keywords

performance, dance, qualitative research, data analysis, artistic methods

In recent years, there has been burgeoning sociological interest in the use of artistic methods, such as film, photography, poetry and performance in qualitative data generation, analysis and dissemination. For example, artistic and performative forms of data analysis have been used by some social researchers (Bagley, 2008; Bagley and Cancienne, 2002; Gergen & Jones, 2008). In this context, artists and art forms have become additional resources through which social scientists can 'transform their analysis' into artistic representations. This paper discusses a pilot project which was established to facilitate a process of co-analysis between artists and sociologists. This involved sustained and structured collaboration and debate between academic researchers from sociology, dance and performance studies. The main aims of the pilot were to analyse data in ways which did not prioritise the needs of social scientists and to explore the ways in which different perspectives might transform data analysis itself. The collaborators analysed ten qualitative interviews using methodologies drawn from the three disciplines. Within the paper we demonstrate and critically evaluate our comparative analysis and address the methodological and epistemological issues raised by it for sociologists. We also provide insights into the process and outcomes of analysis created through our collaboration. Our discussion and findings contribute to the growing corpus of literature which considers what sociology has to gain from engagement with artists and artistic methods and explores the potential of artistic methods in enriching qualitative data analysis.

Bagley, (2008) 'Educational ethnography as performance art: towards a sensuous feeling and knowing?' Qualitative Research 8:53 - 72.

Bagley & Cancienne, M. B. (2002) Dancing the Data New York: Peter Lang.

Gergen, M. & Jones, K. (2008) 'Editorial: A Conversation about Performative Social Science?' Forum: Qualitative Social Research 9(2) Art 43.

Constructing identities in immigrant life stories

Varjonen, Sirkku

*Social Psychology, University of Helsinki
Helsinki, Finland*

Keywords

immigrants, identity construction, Life stories, Narrative constructionism

I am currently preparing a doctoral thesis on the life and acculturation of immigrants in Finland. My aim is to examine identity construction and acculturation in the context of personal life stories narrated by immigrants. I am interested in the different ways immigrants narrate their identities and acculturation experiences.

My longitudinal research data consists of 50 autobiographical narratives by 25 immigrants (2 stories narrated by each participant) from 12 different countries of origin.

The data analysis is focused on the interplay between identities constructed and the topics narrated, and in how this relationship changes as time passes.

I have analysed the narratives and identity construction from 'narrative constructionist' and 'storied resource perspective' (Smith & Sparkes, 2008a & 2008b). That means looking at narratives as social and discursive actions. It also involves looking at the cultural narrative resources which the narrators draw on and resist when constructing their life stories and identities. Furthermore, it means paying attention to the contextually negotiated nature of identity positions. People are both positioned by others but also positioning themselves. 'As such selves and identities are both conferred and actively claimed and contested?' (Taylor & Littleton, 2006, 25).

In my paper I would first and foremost like to demonstrate how I have in practise developed and used narrative- and discursive-analytical tools for analysing textual data from this perspective. In addition to that I would like to introduce some preliminary results regarding identity construction in immigrant life stories.

Conversation Analysis and Mother-baby Interaction

Kahri, Mikko

*Sociology, University of Helsinki
Helsinki, Finland*

Keywords

conversation analysis, Mother-baby interaction, ethnomethodology

The presentation is about Conversation Analysis and interaction between 4-6 months old babies and their caretakers. In my masters thesis and in my subsequent research work aiming at doctoral dissertation I have studied the relations between adjacent expressions in mother-baby interaction, trying to find out what it is, that makes adjacent expressions seem related to each others. I have emphasized that similarities and marked dissimilarities make adjacent expressions seem related to each others, as do continuities (in pitch level, for instance) from the previous turn to the next. In my written work I have tried to show this with, besides rather traditional CA transcriptions, slow-motion video clips that have been attached to the text files.

My findings so far can be discussed quite intelligibly in relation to discussions about prosodic orientation in adult interaction (Szczepek-Reed 2006), since there clearly are similarities between the phenomena, and they may possibly contribute to the understandings of the role of emotions in adult interaction, in the future. In that case, studying mother-baby interaction with qualitative methods will contribute to our understandings of adult conversation.

But could the analysis be taken even further? Can some turns in mother-baby interaction be considered to be initiating, and others responsive? While in some cases it seems sensible to describe a particular turn as initiating (when it is different from the previous turn and comes after a pause), defining what makes a turn responsive seems a bit more difficult. Can turns that don't seem initiating be classified based on what kinds of actions they do in relation to the turns previous to them? Do particular kinds of initiating turns invite particular kinds of responsive turns? Is the kind of approach indicated in these questions possible, at all?

All of these issues will be discussed, and examples from baby-caretaker data corpus will be shown.

Conversation Analysis and Psychotherapy: Building Bridges between Social Science and Clinical Theory

Peräkylä, Anssi

*Department of Sociology, University of Helsinki
Helsinki, Finland*

Keywords

clinical theory, conversation analysis, psychotherapy

The paper will discuss the ways in which conversation analytical research on psychotherapy can contribute to clinical theories of psychotherapy, and the ways in which clinical theories can, on the other hand, inform conversation analytical research. Research examples are drawn from an ongoing study on the interaction between psychoanalysts and their patients, using 58 audio recorded psychoanalytic sessions as data.

Conversation analysis can contribute to clinical theory by explicating a substratum of interactional practices upon which the conduct of psychotherapy is dependent. In a string of studies, Sanna Vehviläinen and I have shown number of practices through which the delivery and reception of psychoanalytic interpretations is accomplished. The paper will review some of these practices having to do with preparation for an interpretation, designing the interpretative utterance, patients' responses to interpretations, and the psychoanalysts' ways of dealing with the patients' responses.

Thorough knowledge of relevant clinical theories is essential for CA research in this field. Issues in which different clinical theories offer conflicting understandings may be particularly useful for CA researcher. Interpretation in psychoanalysis is such an issue. While the classical psychoanalytic theory considers interpretation as the most important vehicle for therapeutic change in the patient, various more recent theories suggest that emotional interaction, rather than interpretation, is the curative factor in psychotherapy. This theoretical debate can sensitize conversation analyst to attend to the ways in which interpretation and emotional interaction are related to each other in the actual psychotherapeutic practice. In psychoanalysis, it appears that the analysts' third position utterances following the patients' responses to interpretations are one locus where the interpretative work and the emotional work merge.

Conversation Analysis as a Tool for Developing Professional Practices

Simonen, Mika

*Department of Sociology, University Of Helsinki
Helsinki, Finland*

Keywords

conversation analysis, tool, developing, practices

Conversation Analysis as a Tool for Developing Professional Practices

MSocSc Mika Simonen

University of Helsinki

Introduction

This presentation studies a possibility of using ethnomethodological CA as a tool for providing a detailed analysis of interaction for practical use. The objective is to describe experiences of using CA for developing professional practices and to show examples from two projects related to the development of functional capacity assessment in Finland. The benefits of videotaped and analysed interview interaction are not well known among the practical developers.

Methods and materials

As part of a PhD study, videotaped interview data were gathered in collaboration with two projects during 2007-2008. Total number of data was fifty-two cases consisting of videotaped research interviews. The project teams transcribed parts of the videotaped data using conventional CA standards. The PhD-student analysed the transcribed data and offered the results for the projects.

Results

The project schedules did not support a thorough CA analysis. A rough CA analysis was presented and discussed in the project meetings. A 'CA as a Tool' approach provided a coarse description of the interaction process in a functional capacity interview. A brief analysis showed how the assessment data were produced in interview interaction.

Conclusion

The project teams developing professional practices considered the efforts of qualitative analysis remarkable. The results of the CA analysis were applied in quality control and training. At best, the collaboration between the project teams and the PhD-student offered new and alternative ideas for policy makers.

Crossroads for ethnography: studying the space between real and virtual experiences

Marques da Silva, Sofia

Faculty of Psychology and Sciences of Education, University of Porto Porto, Portugal

Guedes, Mafalda

*FPCEUP, Faculdade de Psicologia e de Ciências da Educação da Universidade do Porto
Porto, Portugal*

Keywords

Youths, on-line/offline spaces, Ethnography

What kind of knowledge are we still producing through ethnographic methods?

Using insights from an ethnographic study in a Youth Centre (2005-2007), we argue that ethnography has felt some difficulties in researching youth cultures. Youth studies quickly become outdated, especially if we take into account new realities, as virtual ones, where youngsters are producing their subjectivity and identity in everyday life.

The above mentioned study suggested that young people need offline spaces, sometimes at the same time they interact in online spaces, creating a new nature for youth community. This subjective conciliation between diverse and dispersed locations causes for a particular set of challenges for the researcher.

More used to real ethnographies, this study confronted us with youngsters' strategies for imagining and living online and offline experiences. Especially allowed to understand how an individual integrate in his/her life these apparently opposite experiences. Through virtual experiences some youngsters of marginalized groups, living experiences of soft exclusion, are suspending, through the simulacrum, images of themselves more related to structural social inequalities that they don't control. In order to feel safe and protected young people create links and belongings to different worlds, conciliating what seems to be contradictory.

In this study we felt that the ethnographic method needed to be updated in order to understand some segments of young people life that can only be visible if we stand in the crossroad of both virtual world, where youngsters produce almost 'bodyless' relations, and real world, where they feel structural constrains in their own body. Taking these assumptions into account we will try to discuss some methodological questions, namely the adaptation of traditional features of ethnography to study the cultures and practices existing in the space between virtual contexts and real contexts. Can we still use ethnography to understand youth experiences in those 'spaces between'? How ethnographic research methods can assist the understanding of online environments in relation with offline environments?

Data Visualization in Qualitative Data Analysis

Kuckartz, Udo

Education, Philipps University Marburg Marburg, Germany

Ebert, Thomas

*Education, Philipps University Marburg
Marburg, Germany*

Keywords

data analysis, Visualization, QDA software

The paper will discuss the problem of data visualisation in qualitative research from two perspectives: in the first part I will focus on theoretical and methodological issues and argue that visual thinking is creative, helpful for exploration and for discovering patterns, relations and structures in social science data. Scholars like Tony Buzan or Lothar Krempel have shown conclusively that complex information and dependencies can be translated into easy-to-read graphical representations. The second part of the paper will focus the practice of research, particularly the new visual tools integrated in QDA software.

Data display and visualization are areas of research methods that become more and more important, particularly in qualitative and mixed methods approaches. As Matthew Miles and Michael Huberman pointed out in their widely known book Qualitative data analysis? an expanded sourcebook better displays are a major avenue to valid qualitative data analysis?. Data displays may have multiple functions in the analysis process: data condensation, data reduction, data exploration, idea management and last but not least data presentation. According to Miles/Huberman, the dictum "You are what you eat" might be transposed to "You know what you display?".

In the practice of data analysis, it is useful to differentiate between two types of visualizations: case-oriented and cross-case visualizations. Case-oriented visualizations offer a visual display of the codes applied to a text. These displays are interactive and directly connected to the source material. Cross-case displays show more complex information and make it easy to identify relations.

Detour towards knowledge - use of interpreter in research

Flemmen, Anne Britt

*Department of Sociology, University of Tromsø
Tromsø, Norway*

Eriksen, Sissel H

*Department of Sociology, University of Tromsø
Tromsø, Norway*

Keywords

Interpreter, knowledge production, interview research

When sociologists decide to do research in a different culture, a different country and in a different continent than the one they grew up in, reflection is needed as to what kind of knowledge this can provide. Not only is language a barrier, but the cultural and societal circumstances will for a large part be unfamiliar. How do we get access to the phenomenon we want to study and how do we understand their cultural significance and the place they occupy in the society? This is of course also the classical challenge of social anthropology.

An important goal with this paper is to review the scholarly literature and debate related to use of interpreters in research, as well as to reflect upon what distinguishes this kind of research from challenges facing interview research in general as well as to identify the commonalities. Drawing on our own research experiences we will identify the interpreter's different roles and dilemmas and discuss them in relation to the role of key informant. Finally we will analyse the particular challenges, or the detour, dependency on interpreters involve.

Dialogic analysis of discourse dynamics for political and IR research

Mikalayeva, Liudmila

Center for Comparative and International Studies, Swiss federal school of technology Zurich, Switzerland

Keywords

discourse dynamics, Bakhtinian dialogue theory, heteroglossia, Genre

This paper formulates a method of the analysis of discourse dynamics drawing on the theoretical foundations of the work of the members of the Bakhtin circle. By operationalizing the theory of dialogue into a method applicable to the analysis of written texts in different fields, such as social research, political science or IR, the paper fulfils two tasks.

First, it offers the first applicable dialogic method of discourse analysis incorporating in an articulate way the fundamental concepts of the theory of dialogue.

Second, it proposes a new method of discourse analysis in social research, political science and IR that focuses on dynamics and on the aspects of discourse often ignored in current research, namely, restrictions of genre and multi-voicedness in discourse.

Distinctively, the suggested method reveals the ways of accommodation with the anticipated reaction of the interlocutor in written exchanges, exposes different uses of borrowed speech in a given utterance, and addresses the interaction between large narratives and more basic narrative structures within the utterance.

The theory of dialogue is completed by other theories and methods such as the communication accommodation theory, stylistic analysis, genre analysis and narrative analysis and represents a tool for a comprehensive study of discourse dynamics in an exchange of written texts. In its current elaboration, the method is most suited for the study of written texts, as the dynamic changes in this medium of communication have been understudied in comparison to the oral exchanges.

The dialogic method may be applied, for example, to the study of inter-organizational communication in general or to the analysis of discursive compliance within a negotiation between a State and an international organization more concretely, or to research on the dynamics of discourse in complex settings such as document drafting within organizations, in international conferences or in parliamentary debates.

Digital methods: risks, challenges and opportunities for qualitative research

Milan, Stefania

Political and Social Sciences, European University Institute San Domenico di Fiesole (FI), Italy

Keywords

Computer-mediated communication, , digital methods

The processes by which knowledge is constructed, that is to say the methods and the researcher's epistemological commitments, as well as the means and the kind of interactions in which the researcher engages, have an impact on the knowledge that is generated. Computer-mediated communication offers unprecedented opportunities for qualitative researchers. It allows to increase the number of people that one can reach, cuts down travelling costs, reduces transcription time. However, conducting an inquiry in an online environment presents also a substantial number of risks and challenges.

In my Ph.D. dissertation I have used both face-to-face and online in-depth interviewing. The aim of the research was to understand how meanings are socially constructed in the field of communication and media activism: in other words, how social actors' discourses, motivations and identities are created and developed on a continuous and interactive basis and in relation with the social context in which they are embedded. Cases included community radio practitioners and 'radical techies' (cyberspace activists).

I assumed that methods are not neutral tools, and therefore need to be adjusted to the ways social actors experiment reality. With the group of radical techies, very familiar with online interactions, I conducted online interviews and online focus groups, in order to create 'an atmosphere in which the subject feels safe enough to talk freely about his or her experiences and feelings' (Kvale 1996: 125).

This paper critically explores my experience with digital methods, focusing in particular on the method of 'online asynchronous interviewing', pinpointing opportunities that the method offers (increased intimacy, virtually no costs attached, removal of geographical barriers?), but also the challenges (such as the duration of the interview, that can last over a year, a diluted process of trust building, the need for the researcher to disclose more about him/herself?).

Discovering Homo Administrativus - Ethnography from the Armchair

Åkerström, Malin

Sociology, Lund university, Sociology Lund, Sweden

Keywords

juvenile care, case managers, reading interviews and field notes in textual form, analysing ethnographic data

In a study of case-managers employed to improve the Swedish juvenile care, an image of them as Homo Administrativus emerged. It became clear that meetings, documents, rules and regulations as well as evaluations of other street-level bureaucrats inspired engaged talk among the members of the field, while the formal objects of their work, the youngsters, resided in discursive shadow. This tendency became visible in field notes and interviews read by the senior researcher, but was not noted by the graduate student and the post-doc who were collecting and transcribing the data. For them, other issues attracted attention, such as the difficulties of the newly employed case-managers, or the situation of the juveniles at the juvenile centers.

As qualitative ethnographic researchers, we are often encourage to do our own fieldwork and interviewing: seeing and hearing provides so much more nuances, and details that we have problems in accurately translating into words. This paper will argue, that such details, and the convincing reality of face-to-face interactions with the studied subjects, and their everyday world, may give rise to an analytical gaze that may be captured by these witnessed realities. Analyzing interviews and field notes in the bare textual form may on the other hand invite or make possible another gaze, not ?disturbed? by seeing, hearing, and experiencing first-hand situation, people, and contexts.

In the case at hand, some distinctive features of the research project, may have led the gaze of the field researchers to illuminate other parts of the material than the ?arm-chair? researcher.

Discovering pragmatism, discovering method. Between Grounded Theory and methodology of social sciences

Turek, Konrad

*Institute of Sociology, Jagiellonian University
Krakow, Poland*

Keywords

methodology, theory, abduction, pragmatism, grounded theory

The paper address the question about (1) implications of Grounded Theory for social sciences in the area of research methodology and social theory development, (2) and also the question whether new findings in sociology can contribute to any improvements or conclusions in GT. The inquiries results in a proposition of connecting GT with wider pragmatic methodology, basing on the pragmatic philosophy of Charles S. Peirce.

Nowadays GT is one of the most developed research methods. An important fields of discussions regards the logic of GT and the role of abduction in the process of development of theory. Those issues can be combined with more general question concerning the model of methodology for social sciences and attempts of creating more unified methodological paradigm.

The presentation shortly refers to pragmatism of Charles S. Peirce and his methodological approach to result in reflection about pragmatic character of GT, the role of abductive reasoning and the consequences of its conscious use. GT is an excellent exemplification of the abduction process, what is frequently emphasized in the newest literature. Abduction enables to keep the process of theory development clear and conscious, preserving its flexibility at the same time. The awareness of abductive logic of GT deals also with some important problems, for example: the role, place and way of development of theory, 'open minded' vs 'empty headed' dilemma, namely the possibility to minimize pre-conceptualizations, and the role of intuition in research inquiry.

The most important part of presentation is a reflection on the possibility of connecting GT with wider pragmatic methodology, basing on the Peirce philosophy, which is a very promising model for social sciences in the field of empirical studies and theory development. In this perspective it is explained what connects GT with i.e. evaluation methodology, Bayesian statistic, artificial intelligence or even Paul Lazarsfeld's researches. What are the schemes and element that GT can offer to the general sociology? What can be implemented in GT as a result of assuming pragmatic paradigm? The conclusion of this part contains an attempt of broadening previous GT borders and setting of new, not necessarily qualitative, grounded approach.

Doing qualitative case study research: a review of the literature and some methodological suggestions

Perrotta, Manuela

*Sociology and Social Research, University of Trento
Trento, Italy*

Keywords

case study, qualitative methods, critical review

In the last years have been produced an increasing number of publications on case studies research. Many well-known case study researchers have written about this topic and suggested techniques for organizing and conducting the research successfully. However, this crowds of books and papers propose different understandings and sometimes produce a jumble in this field.

Case study research, in fact, appears to be particularly suitable in understanding complex issues and can extend knowledge to what is already known through previous research. Moreover, this methodological approach emphasizes detailed contextual analysis of a limited number of events or conditions and their relationships. For this reason, researchers have used it across a variety of disciplines. Social scientists, in particular, have made wide use of qualitative case study research method to investigate a contemporary phenomenon within its real-life context.

The main critics to this method is that the study of a small number of cases can offer no grounds for establishing generality of findings and dismiss case study research as useful only as an exploratory tool. However, others feel that the intense exposure to study of the case allows to better analyse a variety of real-life situations, issues, and problems.

The aim of this paper is twofold: on the one hand, it is to summarize the main topics in a review of the literature on case studies, looking both at methodological and empirical work; on the other hand, the aim is to sum up the different position on this approach and give some methodological suggestions on the basis of the analysis.

The purpose of this critical review is to introduce a specific approach on qualitative case studies, focusing on four main issues: case selection, data collection, data analysis, and results report. Particularly, the paper will deal with the following issues: the logic of case selection in a theoretical sampling perspective; the use of extreme or deviant, critical and paradigmatic cases; different collecting data techniques, proposing a mix of techniques as participant observation, interviews, focus group and document analysis; generalizing and building theories from case studies.

Embodiment and observer's gaze. The methods of research on climbing activities

Kacperczyk, Anna

Method's and Technique's of Social Research Department, Lodz University

Lodz, Poland

Keywords

Grounded Theory Methodology, observation, embodiment, climbing, data gathering

The research on climbing is mainly based on interviews and analysis of textual data. However the action of climbing is mainly connected with the experience of bodily movement, restraints, suffering, touching the physical objects, technical competencies of performing some movements, body handicaps, etc. The experiences are very often not fully in the consciousness of the climbers and not orally elaborated. They are embodied and continuously practiced and generally are made visible by action, if somebody watches them. The visual data are needed then to catch the essence of climbing. The analyzing the bodily movement and experiences is connected with the situation: who gaze, for what, what the lenses are used to see, what kind of reports are from seeing the climbing? For whom the reports are done? These questions are methodological questions connected with ?the situation of observation? that is a base for generating data for analysis. Some visual recordings of climbing are done by journalists, tourists, professional movie makers, climbers, researchers, bystanders, etc. Their gazes and perspectives are different. What makes the difference? How to compare the data produced by different kind of data ?capturers?? What is the methodological status of these data? Should we take into consideration the context of producing the data? What about the visual patterns of the specific social worlds where the data are produced? These questions structure the proposed methodological paper.

Ethnographic deceptions

Neves, Tiago

CIIE - Centro de Investigação e Intervenção Educativas, Faculdade de Psicologia e de Ciências da Educação da Universidade do Porto
Porto, Portugal

Malafaia, Carla

FPCEUP, Faculdade de Psicologia e de Ciências da Educação da Universidade do Porto
Porto, Portugal

Keywords

Ethnography, ethics, Deception

Based on personal ethnographic experiences in particularly sensitive settings, I argue that while ethnography is usually referred to as a non-intrusive, naturalistic method, in fact it involves a reasonable amount of cautious and thoughtful manipulation on the part of the ethnographer. Indeed, both in my experience of street ethnography in drug-ridden housing estates and of institutional ethnography in a detention centre for juvenile delinquents, I have come to realize that there are quite a few deceptions in the ethnographic business (Fine, 1993).

First, impression management (Hammersley and Atkinson, 1983) can easily slip into chameleonic opportunism. Where exactly is the line between self-conscious impression management and the manipulation of relationships with the subjects in the field?

Second, though reciprocity between the ethnographer and the subjects in the field is unquestionably an ethnographic value, the truth is that, in the vast majority of cases, the ethnographer has much more to gain from the research than the subjects in the field (Bourgois, 1996: 47).

Third, it is virtually impossible, at least in some contexts, to carry out an ethnography without getting one's hands dirty. Ethnography is not an aseptic process, and ethical options are not uncontroversial. Thus, the ethnographer is anything but immaculate. For example, when he/she establishes a frontier between tolerable and intolerable evil, or when stating the whole truth succumbs in face of the need to manage relationships in the field.

References:

- Bourgois, P. (1996). In Search of Respect - selling crack in El Barrio. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Hammersley, M., and Atkinson, P. (1983). Ethnography - principles in practice. London: Tavistock Publications.
- Fine, G. A. (1993). "Ten lies of ethnography". In Contemporary Journal of Ethnography, 22(3), 267-294.

Ethnographically stirred phenomenologies for counter-attacking analytical disregards of common technical objects and environments

Pólvora, Alexandre

CETCoPra & Department of Sociology, Université Paris 1 & ISCTE Seixal, Portugal

Keywords

everyday life, Technical Objects and Environments, Ethnographic Phenomenologies

In 'Everyday Life in the Modern World' [1969] Henri Lefebvre told us that if the scientist insists on classifying the residue as something with no interest, he embarks in a ridiculous pedantry while closing up the scope. Such critical view was not new at the time, nor did it remain without replicas until now. Nevertheless, its words stay amid those which better depicted a particular aspect of the meager liaisons between our major social studies and the small bits and pieces of our social realms. The notion that there are things so marginal that could never act as legitimate epistemological entries to our social realities. A misconception by which huge fractions of our worlds become heuristically valueless.

This presentation will argue about the prospects of ethnographically approaching some of these residues, within phenomenologically stirred trails directed at exposing their analytical potential. In addition, it will do so by primarily pushing some of our common material environments and objects into the core of this argument. As overlooked major constitutors and denizens of the same worlds where we spend wide portions of our lives, they are worthy of such consignment. Moreover, as technological sceneries and artifacts constantly disregarded with reference to their technical modes of existence, they deserve a position even more crucial in assembling these ethnographical phenomenologies.

However, the current proposal is also grounded on premises stating that when not subdued under larger things, most of our ordinary technological constructs are generally misfiled and confined under symmetrical or flat laboratorial analysis of their essences, rough interactionist views of their construction, or yet instrumental and neutralized ideas about their use and consumption. This presentation upholds methodological ways aimed at surpassing limited macroscopies through submersions on common realms. But it equally follows conceptual trails closer to our ordinary worlds with the essentialist intention of exceeding constrained microscopic paths. Its lines are sewed with everyday life appraisals ranging from Lefebvre to Merleau-Ponty, Berger, deCerteau or Maffesoli, as well as with critical reviews of technology by Simondon, Ellul, Winner, Ihde, Feenberg or Verbeek, and new archaeologies or materiologies by authors like Buchli, Tilley or Miller.

Excel Spreadsheet as a Tool for Social Narrative Analysis

Marcuello Servós, Chaime

Psicología y Sociología, Universidad de Zaragoza España, <http://geses.unizar.es>

Amozurrutia de María y Campos, José Antonio

Laboratorio de Desarrollo e Investigación en Comunicación Compleja, Universidad Nacional Autónoma de México MEXICO, <http://labcomplex.ceiich.unam.mx/labcomplex/>

Keywords

Content Analysis, software, qualitative analysis

Qualitative research is an open field where different researchers from several disciplines deal with social meanings and with the issue of understanding. During the last two decades, the use of computers and software has extended to become a relevant part of our daily landscape and also a basic device of social research, even in relation to a qualitative approach. There are many applications of qualitative research software specially designed by a diversity of firms and institutions producing different levels of sophisticated tools that can be used in the social research process.

This paper presents a protocol for using a simple Excel spreadsheet as a tool for analyzing social discourses. We will show how to work with the documents produced in the empirical data collection. Finally, we offer a protocol for developing a personalized use of the tool.

Finding concepts beyond your plan

Wästerfors, David

Department of Sociology, Lund University Lund, Sweden

Keywords

concepts, Ethnography, analysis, analytic induction

The transition from fieldwork to written analyses might be called a recurrent distress but also a very creative phase of research practice. The data collected are to be packaged into recognizable concepts in order to be presented to a wider audience that not necessarily is particularly interested in the investigated field but, more likely, in the researcher's analytic and sociological points.

At this stage researchers quite often realize that their original plan does not fit with the material at hand. As Howard S. Becker writes in "Tricks of the Trade" students may be deeply dissatisfied with their data since their gaze upon them too rigidly are shaped by their original plan or expectations; Becker argues for the necessity of finding concepts retrospectively and by unconventional thinking.

This paper further explore this decisive methodological situation with the help of examples from the author's experiences. When analyzing Swedish businessmen's stories about bribes and corruption a new angle came to be constructed by using the concept of 'courtships', and when analyzing observational data on interpersonal conflicts at a center for juvenile delinquents a similar re-energizing consequence seems to be realized by the concept 'play fights' (or 'play quarrels'), as well as by an alternative use of 'going concerns' (compared to Everett C. Hughes' original meaning).

The paper argues that constructing empirically fine-tuned concepts is a matter of practicing analytic induction on the basis of a sociological ontology. It also reflects upon what a concept is in qualitative research, and what specific rhetorical use that makes it sociological.

Focus Groups - rethinking natural interactions in a artificial situation

Demant, Jakob

Centre for Alcohol and Drug Research, University of Aarhus Copenhagen S, Denmark

Keywords

actor network theory, analytical strategies, social experiments, focus groups, situated knowledge

The focus group method is unique in the social sciences because it provides the opportunity to conduct interviews on chosen topics while observing the social interaction that occurs. The paper discusses the focus group method with special attention to its similarities with the social experiment. Focus groups are not natural, social settings, and it is precisely due to this fact that the focus group provides a privileged opportunity for producing interesting data. Thus, the method differs radically from both the sociological in-depth interview and ethnographical observations: the focus group does not merely allow the observer to interrogate and observe the social; it actively influences the construction of these parameters through sampling and moderation. At the same time the focus group must relate to a form of naturally occurring interactions between group participants. The paper discusses some of the methodological problems and possibilities in this intersection between the constructed and the naturally occurring data.. The discussion is based on a focus group study with adolescents on the topic of drinking.

Frame Analysis in Sociological Study of Visual Representations: The "Visual Orders" of Local Activism in Helsinki

Luhtakallio, Eeva

*Sociology, University of Helsinki
Helsinki, Finland*

Keywords

Local Activism, Visual Representations, frame analysis

The study of visual representations is a sociological peculiarity: it is often depending on methods 'borrowed' elsewhere. The methodological imagination that recurrently renders sociology the provider of methods for other disciplines has been scantier concerning images. An urge to develop further sociological tools for dealing with images is acute, as the visual dimensions of the social and the societal become increasingly prevalent, and the crowds on courses of visual methods grow. In order to participate in this project, I put forward an application of Erving Goffman's frame analysis to visual representations.

The objective of frame analysis for Goffman (1974) was twofold: to define framings that make understanding of social situations possible, and to examine the vulnerability and conversion of these framings. Framings are never definite, as different shades of meaning emerge through the functions of keying, lamination, and superimposition.

I have applied frames into analyzing images by calling these functions the dominant and the secondary frames. A dominant frame is the primary 'analysis of a situation'. A secondary frame directs and focuses 'and sometimes transfers or even switches' the meaning rising in the communicational process of looking at an image. The frames emerge from within the data, instead of ready-named and defined categories. Working with a large set of images, the definitions of dominant frames enable quantification of the data with ballpark interpretations of its characteristics. Qualitative analysis of the dynamics between dominant and secondary frames forms the core of the method.

I illustrate the method application through a study of the visual representations of local activism. The data consists of images published on websites of local activist groups in Finland (N=274). Through the analysis of dominant and secondary frames in this set of images, I show the grasp a visual analysis provides to the diversity of collective action, and to questions like what do local activists claim, and what kind of response do they expect to get, and what kinds of intersections of power and powerlessness occur within local struggles for recognition.

Gangster, victim, or both?

Sandberg, Sveinung

Department of Sociology, University of Bergen Bergen, Norway

Keywords

discourse, oppression, Gangster

In this paper, I conceptualize two contradictory discourses, both used by ethnic minority drug dealers in a street drug market in Oslo, Norway. Oppression discourse includes personal narratives of unemployment, racism and psychosocial problems, often combined with stories about the government and city council being unwilling to help. Drug dealers use the discourse to justify drug dealing and violence, both in self-talk and in meetings with welfare organizations. Gangster discourse, on the other hand, includes a series of personal narratives emphasizing how hard, smart, and sexually alluring the young men are. Drug dealers use this discourse to gain self-respect and respect from others, and it dominates interactions on the street. An important argument in this paper is that the discursive practice of criminals inspires theoretical perspectives on criminal practice. Oppression and gangster discourses have inspired, respectively, neutralization and subculture theory. When the same people use both discourses, however, the picture becomes more complicated. This interdiscursivity may have been sacrificed in previous research to produce more coherent theoretical frameworks. Most importantly however, the 'bilingual' discursive practice reflects a Scandinavian institutional and social context where street drug dealers have extensive contact with a welfare state apparatus.

Housing, Materiality and Sociality - an investigation into the social topologies of the Danish single-family home

Juul Jørgensen, Cecilie

Department of Sociology, University of Copenhagen

Copenhagen K, Denmark

Keywords

topologies, social enquiry, space, place, methodology

The emergence of the industrially produced single-family home in the 1960s and 70s completely altered the social and natural landscape of post-war Denmark, as it democratised access to home ownership for the masses. Through an historical analysis of this phase of transition using archival sources, the paper aims at demonstrating the methodological importance of analysing the social and the material symmetrically in order to illuminate the complex socio-material processes that led to the formation of a particular figuration between home-owning middle classes and the Danish welfare state. It is argued that the specific case of the modern single-family home should not be seen in isolation; on the contrary it poses a challenge to social enquiry and modes of explanation as it emphasises the roles of materiality, space and place in the formation of the social.

To undertake such analysis, the paper uses a topological methodology as a mode of investigating principles of space and distribution. Originally developed within Science and Technology Studies as a way of questioning the spatial presuppositions of social theory, this methodology has the advantage of remaining sensitive to the complexity and multiplicity of social relations as they are enacted in and with the material. Therefore, this approach is also highly relevant for research into the formation of societal structures as well as modes of agency.

The three topologies in the paper are the region, the network and the fluid, and they are to be seen as methodological devices for analysing the shifting relations between the social and the material. Hence, the region helps us analyse the creation of sameness and difference along the axes of inside and outside, while the network illuminates assemblages of heterogeneous actors stabilizing particular objects. Finally, the fluid topology opens up for an understanding of slow, incremental change in socio-material relations. These three methodological tools point to a renewed understanding of structure and agency in society as the topological analysis highlights the dynamic character of socio-material processes of formation, and in this way the paper raises methodological challenges to sociological enquiry.

How metaphorising could make sense of what research interviews are about?

Poutanen, Seppo

*Department of sociology, University of Turku
Turku, Finland*

Keywords

research interviews, metaphorising, gendering

My general goal in my research project is to further develop the model for 'gendering the research self' that Alison Pullen has introduced in her work. Pullen aspires to synthesise three well-known approaches to the gendering: i) the discursive/textual approach; ii) the performance/social practice approach and iii) the gender corporeality approach. In my view, metaphors can evade dichotomous categorising and convey a plurality of differences that must be looked for in research. I argue that metaphorical thinking is a key tool in applying the strategies that Pullen recommends for gendering the research self. I have found what I call 'metaphorising' potential to i) metamorphose the often-contrived and too-polished looking autobiographical confessions of a researcher into something more interesting and intertextual; ii) contribute to construction of a gender perspective that is ironic or otherwise 'eccentric?'; and iii) make us see our research practice in a new and innovative light.

How the Micro killed and rebuilt up the Macro Different Theoretical perspective in the Sociology of Mobility

Wagner, Izabela

sociology, university of warsaw

Warszawa, POLAND

Keywords

mobility, career, researchers, micro-macro

Some theoreticians state that the Ethnography and micro-sociology allow the researchers to ripen previously built even frequently obvious THEORIES, and constitute excellent tools to provide detailed descriptions or examples of processes, which were already in the center of Macro inquiry. Micro is, according to them, kind of picturesque supplement for the majority of Macro - studies ? the supplement, which confirms (and when contradicts this is only for showing exception) the Macro? Knowledge.

On the other hand, Grounded Theory practitioners follow an opposing method ? from Micro to Macro ? developing their own theories from their fields. Other way of QM practice is simply using of Micro without Macro perspective: Ethnographers analyze the phenomenon doing Micro-sociology, strongly close to a chosen particular example ? directly from their field? they avoid construction of theoretical models, because they believe that social processes are dynamic and depend on interaction (so each time different); as a consequence people?s behavior cannot be ?modeled?.

Started from this last perspective (micro without theoretical ambitions) I was surprised to see the whole specialty of sociology (Mobility), well organized and with a lot of publications (Macro level; large statistics) working with erroneous tools regarding wrong models. My ethnographical field (started in 2003) ? life-science researchers? world ? done in different countries (France, Poland, Germany, USA) gives me the data for showing that this obvious and largely practical perspective is not exact.

I would like to propose the results of my work (about careers and mobility of life-science researchers), proving that starting from Micro is not only one of the way of doing science but also it is the necessary method for providing the Macro Sociology. This method of working Micro-Macro, provides the stability of research process, and, in consequence, the maturity of our ?young discipline? (according to Kuhn and other sociologists of knowledge) ? sociology.

In-depth interviews with patients: dilemmas and possibilities

Vik, Kari

*Department for child and adolescent mental health, Sorlandet hospital
Kristiansand, Norway*

Keywords

ethics, In-depth interviewing, Patients as participants

Several questions arise when patients act as participants in research projects. Juggling different professional roles simultaneously, for example acting like both therapist and researcher, is one challenge. Demands directed at the various roles can influence data collection and analysis as hidden biases. There are also important ethical issues to be considered when inviting patients as informants or participants in research projects. One of them is whether it is right to expose them to research when they are in a vulnerable situation. Another matter is the question of time and interest. One can assume that a therapist in a research situation has more time to spend and is more dedicated than a therapist in a daily routine situation. These dilemmas will be discussed and solutions and strengths will be outlined.

Indications of the Quality of Quality Indicators: The Quality Indicators Movement Seeks Qualitative Measures

Koppel, Ross

Sociology Department, University of Pennsylvania Philadelphia, USA

Keywords

key medical journals, quality methods, quality indicators

For the past three decades, manufacturers and service organizations have focused on measurement of quality?quality indicators?as the key to improvements and even survival. ?Sigma Six,? ?Lean Production? and the medical ?Quality Indicators? efforts stressed the necessity of standardized quantifiable measures to enable organizations to study and then improve their processes and products. Entire industries devoted to quality indicators exist to serve these goals.

Recently, however, heresy has emerged. The key medical journals have questioned the value of standard quality indicators. Their articles argue for more specific measures of quality that closely examine specific events in situ; they recognize qualitative, locally examined, and entirely contextual reflections of quality are necessary to effect improvement and reduce medical errors?arguing improvements to problems and medical errors are primarily found via contextually rich understandings of what specifically caused the problems and what resolved the problems.

In this presentation, we discuss the increasing appreciation of qualitative methods in medical research on quality measures?an appreciation that recognizes many of qualitative methods? strengths while also identifying some of the weaknesses in the heretofore orthodoxy of quantitatively-based quality indicators.

Interviewed "for what reason"? Imputed research motives and the production of "deviant" accounts

Jacobsson, Katarina

School of Social Work, Lund University Lund, Sweden

Keywords

Neighborhood, "deviant interview", interview, qualitative analysis

Some people attract the interest of social research for belonging to a particular category of people, for example 'handicapped', 'immigrants' or 'criminals'. Interviewees of such commonly 'high-interest' social categories may use researchers' interests in them, so that the interview become more than reflections on a subject or narrated experiences. Instead the interview becomes an arena where perceived misunderstandings can be corrected or refuted, simply by producing (and insisting on) a preferred version of a problem, or as in my study, of a neighborhood. These types of interviews have implications for analytic proceedings.

At a master course, students carried out interviews on the loosely formulated topic 'neighbors and neighborhood' as part of a qualitative method exercise. One reason for the choice of topic was that students quickly and easily should find a person to interview; practically anyone can be expected to have some experiences or ideas on the subject matter. Out of fourteen interviews, one stood out as very different from the rest of the material, in which interviewees quite casually discussed experiences of 'good and bad neighbors and neighborhoods'. The 'deviant' interview, on the other hand, had an obvious agenda in praising her neighbors and neighborhood. Living in an 'immigrant area' heavily marked by social problems - an area with a history of attracting interest from the media, the police and other authorities, as well as social researchers - she instantly draw the conclusion that this was the reason for her being asked for an interview. In accordance with these assumptions, the interviewee took on the task of countering the negative view of her neighborhood by presenting a sunny and problem-free picture.

In this paper, I first single out how this interview differs from the rest of the material. Secondly, I raise questions regarding how to analytically handle a 'deviant interview' in relation to the whole body of material. Finally, I discuss the methodological significance of linking interviewees' accounts to the surrounding social contexts that sometimes seem to over-shadow the research purpose in question.

Interviewing on sensitive family issues - the challenges of the researcher's role

Hämäläinen, kati

*social work, University of Jyväskylä
Jyväskylä, Finland*

Rautio, Susanna

*Family research centre, University of Jyväskylä
Jyväskylä, Finland*

Pirskanen, Henna

*Family research centre, University of Jyväskylä
Jyväskylä, Finland*

Keywords

Family research, interview method, sensitive issues, researcher's role

When doing research on sensitive and private issues, the approach that family researchers often choose is interviewing family members qualitatively. This interview method is in these cases well suited for revealing meanings, values and thoughts of the informants.

In this presentation, data from three separate family studies is used as the basis for discussing challenges of the researcher's role when interviewing on sensitive family issues. The three data sets consist of interviews on foster children about their family relations; on families about the support from the family work; and on adult sons about their problem drinking fathers. Although the focus groups of these three studies are different, the considerations entwined in the interview process are strikingly similar.

The considerations include, among others, the challenge posed by the location of the interviews, whether they should be carried out at the informant's home environment or elsewhere. Home as a private sphere can affect the interview situation in one way or another, as it contains both possibilities and challenges for the researcher. For example, the researcher has to deliberate whether the location affects the informant's willingness to disclose on a sensitive topic.

In this presentation we will discuss also the therapeutic aspect of the interviews.

When dealing with sensitive issues, there is a risk that the researcher might adopt the role of the therapist. In such a situation the researcher should carefully consider his or her role. The therapeutic aspect is also related to the researcher's possibilities and restrictions in showing empathy. For instance, how to listen and how to remain in a neutral role are relevant questions for family researchers to consider. We will demonstrate these considerations by presenting extracts from our data.

Interviews with power

Thuesen, Frederik

Department of Employment and Integration, SFI - The Danish National Centre for Social Research Copenhagen, Denmark

Keywords

power, organizations, dialogue, Elites, agonistics

Interviews with political or organizational elites are useful providing valuable knowledge of organizational strategies, culture and values. However, such interviews sometimes confront the researcher with respondents seeking to take control of the interview ? or themselves asking critical questions. These interviews may therefore end up alternating between dialogue and conflict. This is shown in relation to organizational strategies concerning the implementation of human rights norms concerning organizational freedom and non-discrimination in the Danish labour market. Furthermore, drawing inspiration from qualitative methodology focussing on resistance and power in qualitative research the paper argues that in fact it may be productive that such interviews alternate between a dialogical and an agonistic approach. The article therefore proposes to seek to integrate a dialogical and an agonistic approach drawing inspiration from both Foucault and from the ethics of Aristotle which has recently inspired qualitative organizational research.

Intimate Relationships - A Relational View on Couples and their Development

Ruiner, Caroline

Phil.-Soz. Fakultät, Professur f. Soziologie, Universität Augsburg Augsburg, Germany

Keywords

Dynamics of Intimate Relationships, Qualitative Panel, Relational Approach, couples

The social transformation processes do not leave intimate relationships unaffected. The biographies of individuals are subject to decision and have to be coordinated with the partner to provide a common life. Additionally events like getting married or having a child have to be arranged in the couple's biography according to their notions. Against the background of the changing environmental conditions, this paper attempts to illuminate from a methodological point of view how the processes between the partners can be focused to understand the development of couples over the course of time.

The underlying empirical findings stem from a qualitative panel of dual-earner couples collected in Germany between 1999 and 2008. In total eleven couples were interviewed in extensive narrative manner. Each couple was interviewed at three points in time in joint interviews with both partners together and in interviews with each partner separately.

The survey bases on the methodological orientation that the intimate relationship can be seen as a dynamic-interactive connection of two 'significant others' (re-)constructing their own reality. This construction of reality is causing effects in everyday life through interaction and therefore influencing the development of the intimate relationship. This process is analysed from a microsociological perspective by using a relational approach - with respect to intimate relationships as 'realities sui generis', the couple is more than the sum of its parts - focusing on the partners' perspectives on their development.

For analysing the development of couples and its relational construction, 'objective' biographical events are focused and compared to 'subjective' events which were made a subject of discussion by one or both partners. Furthermore the expected and anticipated trends are compared with the actually perceived development, the thematised causes and consequences of change. By relating (missing) 'objective' biographical events to the 'subjective' perceived development and the meanings the partners attribute, the dynamics in intimate relationships can be figured out, what is - especially in times of social transformation processes - the key to understand the (in)stability of couples.

Is it worth to reach beyond the obvious? Selected issues of qualitative data analysis

Worek, Barbara

Department of Sociology, The Jagiellonian University Krakow, Poland

Cent, Joanna

*Department of Sociology, The Jagiellonian University
Krakow, Poland*

Keler, Karolina

Department of Sociology, The Jagiellonian University Krakow, Krakow

Stec, Katarzyna

*Department of Sociology, The Jagiellonian University
Krakow, Poland*

Krzaklewska, Ewa

Department of Sociology, The Jagiellonian University Krakow, Poland

Keywords

qualitative content analysis, advanced qualitative research, CAQDAS

The aim of the paper is to compare different levels of analysis and the possibilities of using various analytical perspectives, classical early steps in analysis and selected content analysis methods in particular, in the process of drawing conclusions. This comparison includes the level attainable by different analytical frameworks and the new look at the process of qualitative data analysis that extends classical approach. Moreover, the paper presents the outcome of the benefit-impediment analysis of applying the usage of selected advanced software in the analytical process.

The discussion about the usefulness of different content analysis methods and techniques is topical and pivotal, as a direct consequence of the fact that the vast majority of qualitative research do not go beyond a simple interpretation of the transcripts of interviews. Even if CAQDAS is widely used in this process, the advanced options and possibilities are rarely utilized. The plain approach is dominant: simple coding, interpretation of the coded elements, and, sometimes, comparison of the frequencies of the codes. Therefore, it is worth to analyse existing propositions of the content analysis methods and techniques and answer the question, if they indeed cannot offer anything more to experienced qualitative researchers. Are they able to help, and provide new perspective or possibilities to reach a deeper level of analyses, to formulate revealing outcomes inaccessible without using them?

Hence, selected content analysis methods and techniques such as semantic, semiotic, and evaluative assessment analysis were used in the analysis of the transcripts of several dozen of in-depth interviews. These interviews conducted with the representatives of different generations are used as an exemplary material. They concern the intergenerational contacts and ties of a rural community in Poland (in the village in Silesia called Krzyzowa). The aforementioned methods and techniques were used with the assistance of MaxQDA and QDAMiner in, both, early steps in analysis, and further analysis.

Looking into the life through others' eyes: the Cultural Probes (as methodological proposal)

Gennai, Francesca

*department of sociology and social research, University of Trento
Italy, <http://portale.unitn.it/sociologia/>*

Cristoforetti, Antonio

*Research Unit, Regional Institute of study and social research
Trento, Italy*

Keywords

textual and visual data., qualitative research, methodology, Cultural probes

The aim of this paper is to present the Cultural Probes (C.P.) qualitative methodology (Gaver et al. 1999) starting from our CP study. CP born inside the field of Information System as participative approach for the design of information technologies. In our case study, we adopted CP to understand the elders' domestic life and, consequently, to individuate the requirements for Ambient Assisted Living technologies to promote their wellbeing at home.

Using CP means to produce and give people creative tools (such as diaries, post-it, disposable cameras, maps, postcards, friends or family pictures, etc.) to describe their daily life. This methodology allows researchers to obtain intimate information and subjective accounts about the dairy people experience without being inside the research context. The researchers look their setting through the others' eyes. Through the maps, the pictures, the dairies, the stories, the metaphors or the poems, the objects, people give to the researchers the possibility to -discover and explain the way in which they (?) understand, explicate, influence and manage the dairy situation? (Van Maanen, 1986, 36). So CP could be useful when it is difficult to have access to the research area (for example we think to the organizations or to in - home observations) and to use ethnographic or shadowing methodology.

The participative nature of CP implies a great researchers' efforts during the preparation of the CP kit. It's not exist a general CP kit, but it's necessary to design it basing on the characteristics of the people involved and of the context explored. In the following paper we will describe how we have construct the probes kit in cooperation with the elder people and other mediators, and how we have organize the kit distribution. Secondly, we will present our difficult to interpret the data collected and the follow up interviews conducted to discuss the researcher's interpretation of the relevant material and topic with the participants. In other words, we will introduce the pros and cons of CP as methodological proposal.

Lost in translation. The art of data transcription and translation

Nikander, Pirjo

Methodology Centre for Human Sciences, Universtiy of Jyvaskyla Jyvaskyla, FINLAND

Keywords

data translation, discourse analysis, transcription, validity

Transcribing talk originating from various interactional contexts into a written form is an integral part of qualitative research practice. Transcripts are produced for particular analytic purposes and therefore range in detail: from broad verbatim transcripts in more content oriented analysis to refined and detailed transcriptions on naturally occurring interaction and its multimodal aspects. Analytic traditions like conversation analysis and the wide range of research under the wide umbrella of 'discursive' all rely on and produce transcripts according to their own conventions, level of detail and procedure.

This paper offers a concise review on working with and producing 'good quality transcripts'. The main focus is on the largely overlooked question of having to produce transcripts of data originally in another language for an English speaking and reading audience. The paper claims that transcribing and translating data is not merely a question of 'adopting' or 'following' a 'transcription technique' but rather includes a range of practical and ideological questions concerning the level of detail chosen in the transcription, and of the way in which translations are physically presented in print. The mundane, practical choices made and their analytic, ideological and theoretical implications are, however, often hidden from the reader and only rarely explicitly dealt with in qualitative research reports and published analyses.

Discussion on transcription and data translation is crucial given that qualitative research based on working with transcripts uses transcripts as a central means of guaranteeing the credibility, cumulative nature and validity of its claims and findings. Opening questions concerning the art of translation to a wider and more detailed discussion is equally crucial as qualitative research is increasingly conducted in a transnational environment. Students, scholars, and data travel across national boundaries and new language areas join in. This means that guidelines on how data should ideally be translated and presented in an accessible yet precise fashion, and on how analytic transparency is secured are in increasing demand.

Managing the Quality of Qualitative Research

Flick, Uwe

Qualitative Research, Alice Salomon University of Applied Sciences, Berlin Berlin, Germany

Keywords

Quality Criteria in Qualitative Research, Strategies of Quality in Qualitative Research, Quality Management in Research

Qualitative research has come of age and undergoes a permanent process of proliferation. Different research programs and approaches have developed and the variety of qualitative methods is permanently growing. However, some basic issues in qualitative research still seem unsettled. One of these construction sites of qualitative research is the quality issue: How to define and how to assess the quality of qualitative research how to distinguish good from bad research when it comes to teaching, funding, planning, evaluating and publishing qualitative research. Several ways are gone to answer this question. Different versions of developing criteria are available, sometimes the answer is sought in formulating standards and sometimes it is the use of strategies for promoting quality in qualitative research, which is suggested for solving this problem. After a brief overview of the state of the discussion on quality in qualitative research, some strategies for improving the quality of qualitative research will be discussed. In particular, triangulation, quality management and clarifying the indication of using particular methods will be addressed.

References:

Flick, U. (2008). Managing the Quality of Qualitative Research. London/ Thousand Oaks, CA/ Dehli: Sage.

Methodological Difficulties in Studying non-Western Populations in European Societies

Weil, Shalva

Research Institute for Innovation in Education, Hebrew University of Jerusalem Jerusalem, Israel

Keywords

Non-Western populations, appropriate qualitative methods, Ethiopian migrants

The difficulties of studying non-Western populations in European societies and the appropriate qualitative methods to utilise have pre-occupied sociologists during the last two decades as a result of increased globalisation and migration. The question is raised whether an "outsider" can collect valid information or whether an "insider" can better understand the material, despite the obvious biases of his/her affiliations within the community. However, employing a "native" research assistant, who may often be second-generation European, may bring to the fore other problems. Furthermore, the intentional use of ambiguities in communication among certain migrant populations may produce an extreme situation in which the collection of "basic data" may be impeded. Indeed, there may be no common understanding of what "basic data" constitutes, and the interview session, or administration of an alternative qualitative methodological tool, may represent a negotiated reality between the researcher and the Other. There may be misunderstanding about the meaning of a simple questionnaire, which may take a full day to complete. In this paper, the difficulties encountered in the field with non-Western populations are revisited and exemplified with special reference to Ethiopian migrants in Israel. In fieldwork carried out in 2009, respondents conceptualized differently from this researcher questions that they were asked; observations were sometimes perceived as acceptance of socially stigmatic situations. These difficulties went over and beyond language barriers and cultural misconceptions about meanings of words, and tended to challenge qualitative methods traditionally used by researchers.

Methodological Issues of Applying Focus Groups with Children

Vogl, Susanne

Department of Sociology, Catholic University of Eichstaett-Ingolstadt Eichstaett, Germany

Keywords

abilities, children, focus group, methodology

Children are increasingly seen as competent informants when their interests and needs are at focus. We cannot only rely on assessments of adults as children have their own view. This has consequences for the social research methods we apply. Typically research methods are developed with adults and their abilities in mind. But children have different needs and abilities and therefore pose specific demands on research design and researcher. Although in practice there is some research employing children so far methodological considerations are rare.

In this paper focus groups as means of data collection are examined. Guiding questions are: Which peculiarities result regarding the method of focus groups when carried out with children? How can we enhance children's potential of participation? How can we improve data quality by adapting the method to respondent's abilities? The analyses are based on five focus groups conducted with children and adolescents aged 6 to 16 in Germany dealing with comparable topics and tasks. Verbal, interactive and cognitive abilities of children in focus group situations, different levels of activities during the focus groups, specifics of group interaction as well as procedural aspects and their implications for the feasibility of focus group research were core categories of the analyses. Furthermore, to reach a broad picture of the focus groups, not only respective qualitative (e.g. evaluation of the content of the statements) but also quantitative aspects (e.g. amount of words used) were considered. These factors were used to draw conclusions regarding cognitive, social and verbal abilities of children at different ages in focus group situations, the consequences for the method as well as the resulting advantages and disadvantages.

The results show the different abilities and needs of each age group and point out consequences for feasibility and potential gain in insights through focus groups with children.

Multi-Perspectivity in Qualitative Research: Children and their Parents

Zartler, Ulrike

*Institute of Sociology, University of Vienna
Vienna, Austria*

Keywords

children, parents, multi-perspectivity

Perception of reality, from a subjectivistic point of view, depends on the perspective: Different members of a specific system might have completely different views regarding ongoing developments, relationships and changes within a certain system. This is particularly the case for family systems: perceptions of women and men, children and their parents, brothers and sisters, may differ considerably among the same family. Nevertheless, empirical research in the field of family sociology seldom pays attention to this fact. Most often, only one member is included in scientific studies on family issues and processes.

In this presentation I will argue that the integration of multiple perspectives into empirical research on families and family transition processes has a useful potential and may provide valuable insights. Therefore, research approaches have to bear in mind the relevance of different family members' subjective experience and interpretation: They are crucial for our perception of the situation, for the perceived chances to act, and finally also for implemented action. Consequently, it is productive to interview several family members, to include more than one perspective into the research, and to consider systemic principles.

This contribution will focus on methodical and methodological reflections concerning multi-perspective interviews within families. Experiences from two Austrian studies based on such an approach serve as illustrations. The first study deals with the causes and consequences of divorce and takes into account the viewpoints of children, their mothers and their fathers. It is argued that family transition processes and post-divorce family construction can be different for every single family member, which has an enormous impact on the post-divorce reorganizational process. In addition, first results of a currently ongoing study, dealing with children's and parents' perceptions of different family forms, are presented.

Narrative and historical truth in sociological interviewing. An epistemological analysis

Nigris, Daniele

Sociology, Univerity of Padova Padova, Italy

Keywords

epistemology, Narrative, interview, narrative truth, historical truth

Which ought to be our mandate as social scientists? Aiming at the reconstruction of the historical truth of what is said, or focusing our analysis only around narrative truth, so limiting ourselves to discourse and its context, and to the linguistic construction created by the interviewee??

Answering to such a question requires some passage. One start can be a naïve realist position of the kind: 'In any statement, what has been said can appear true or false with respect to something we know?'. Of course, serious problems arise, because:

- statements can be interpreted, and misinterpreted too; they are often indexical in nature, and most of all, nothing assures us that the informant's frame and the analyst's one are isomorphic (i.e.: that their 'emic' and 'etic' perspectives are similar);
- not everything can be judged according to the true/false schema. Statements must be of a referential nature; they must concern something external to the subject; but we are often ambiguous, and we talk continuously about inner feelings, which cannot be defined neither true, nor false;
- the third fallacy lies of course in the formula 'something we know?'.

Donald Spence defined 'historical truth' and 'narrative truth' two objects which can be addressed by the psychoanalyst. My proposal aims at adopting this frame of analysis in the epistemology of the social research, by reasoning along three dimensions:

- in any narrative statements can be found whose content could be evaluated via triangulation; some which cannot; and some which once could, but no more (informants are dead, documents got lost);
- if the link to the empirical dimension is still our primary raison d'être, then a deeper concern with methodological issues about checking the content of some of the interviewees' statements could be useful;
- the public image of Sociology as a science has much to do with the way we answer to these epistemological problems: as any other science, we have the burden of proof about our own disciplinary statements.

The discourse will be illustrated via schemata connecting the different statements of the argument.

Narratives and Membership: Combining qualitative methods to examine the biographical accounts of older LGBT adults

King, Andrew

Social Sciences, Kingston University Kingston upon Thames, England

Cronin, Ann

*Sociology, University of Surrey
Guildford, England*

Keywords

Narrative Analysis, Membership Categorisation Analysis, older LGBT adults

In this paper we illustrate how we have been combining two established qualitative methodologies, narrative analysis and membership categorisation analysis, in order to examine the biographical accounts of older lesbian, gay, bisexual and transgender (LGBT) adults. Narrative analysis is concerned with examining the processes of story-making that individuals and groups construct in specific settings, for specific purposes. As a methodology, it has been particularly prominent in biographical research. On the other hand, membership categorisation analysis (MCA) is a form of conversation analysis that is attuned to investigating the categories and attributes that people use in talk, largely to undertake forms of identity work. So far within qualitative research, these methodologies have rarely been used in conjunction. In this paper, we explain how and why we have used them in our research. We highlight, in particular, how combining NA and MCA has enabled us to consider how older LGBT adults accomplish their identities in relation to both social and situated requirements. We conclude that this has implications for those interested in theorising and creating policies for older LGBT adults in contemporary European societies, in addition to qualitative researchers interested in biography and identity.

Politicizing the Narrative or Narrativizing the Political? Methods for Reconstructing a Political Life Story

Gilad, Noga

Department of Sociology and Anthropology, Tel-Aviv University Haifa, Israel

Keywords

, Narrative Analysis, life story, Political Discourse

On the face of it, it seems that Anderson has helped us to explore national identity beyond the scope narrative scholars such as Labov and Waletzky have reached. While the phenomenological narrative study concentrates on the experienced events, we must search for a method to incorporate also the images retrieved from history and myths into the narrative fabric of the Self. Anderson has ostensibly helped us in that. The theory about the constitution of 'imagined community' helps understanding the formation of the political Self not only via the experienced life but also through the use of such secondary knowledge. Anderson claims that these too become resources for the constitution of the political Weltanschauung. But how 'exactly' does that process happen? How does that 'abstract' type of knowledge become part of the individual experience? It seems that here, the method of narrative analysis can help in return.

Studying the formation of identity out of experiences concentrates on deciphering the subjective meaning of events. According to Labov, a story is not only an account of pointless events that happened to someone per se. Rather it is constructed around the subjective meaning of the event for the narrator. The narrative method extracts it.

That way of looking at narratives is very different from the straightforward way political world-view is generally viewed and discussed in literature. Rather than the latter's concentration on arguments as the bricks of the discourse, attention is moved here to narrations.

Now the focus of attention turns to the careful reconstruction of the implicit meaning which is elicited from the various narrative components. Thus, we can reconstruct the individual use of collective resources, by comparing the explicit with the implicit.

The presentation will demonstrate this claim and discuss the consequences for the study of political perspectives, as the empirical findings of the research suggest.

Precariousness experiences of the graduates of the University of Porto: empirical results and methodological challenges

Dias, Isabel

*Departamento de Sociologia da Faculdade de Letras da Universidade do Porto, Instituto de Sociologia da Faculdade de Letras da Universidade do Porto (ISFLUP)
Porto, Portugal*

Veloso, Luisa

*Centro de Investigação e Estudos de Sociologia, CIES-ISCTE, Centro de Investigação e Estudos de Sociologia, CIES-ISCTE
Lisboa, Portugal*

Keywords

Professional precariousness, qualitative interviews, comprehensive analysis

This communication has as starting point some of the results of a research focusing on professional precariousness of the graduates of the university of Porto in social sciences, humanities, management and economics and the future alternatives concerning their integration in the labour market. Adopting a comprehensive point of view, within the research project it were done 32 interviews concerning the life trajectories and the meanings graduates give to their precarious experience. From the information gathered and analysed, there were defined a set of "portraits of precariousness/ non precariousness", taking as primary dimension of analysis the discourses of the individuals but also their objective social conditions, present on a set of variables, like, graduation, gender or type of family. It is intended, therefore, to discuss, on the one hand, some of the empirical results, taking into account the present situation of the labour market, and, on the other hand, and mainly, the adequacy of the methodological options taken and the study object. As a consequence, it is aimed also to discuss the discourse analysis and the advantages of an analysis centered on each interview as a hole, as well as its theoretical fundaments.

Qualitative and mixed methods research for social program evaluation

Pardo, Ignacio

*Sociología IV, Universidad Complutense de Madrid
Madrid, Spain*

Keywords

mixed methods, qualitative methods, program evaluation

The impact evaluation of a social plan often requires the combination of both quantitative and qualitative techniques. In this cases is crucial to innovate through a mixed-method approach based on an ad hoc design. Better and more comprehensive impact evaluation designs can arise in the near future from the lessons learned from evaluation practice.

Techniques such as surveys, focal groups and in-depth interviews should be taken into account, considering the different ways in which this combination could take place. The design of the study (in this type of evaluation research) is inherently flexible and analysis should address specifically and with extreme caution the interrelation between the two types of data.

The main lessons learned in mixed methods evaluation research include the correct use of focal groups and in-depth interviews when working with marginalized and non marginalized communities; the different ways of measuring empowerment strategies; the reflection on the consistency of interpretations across different actors (NGOs, participants, political authorities, evaluation experts); and the importance of being aware of design limitations and method biases in order to improve the quality of evaluation research.

Qualitative Secondary Analysis and Re-using the Original Research Data set of the British Sociological Classic

Takeda, Naoko

Department of Sociology, Musashi University Tokyo, Japan

Keywords

secondary analysis, British classic studies, research design, atypical case, polarization

This study presents some findings by re-analysing the original research data set of the British sociological classic which is 'Isle of Sheppey Studies in R.E.Pahl Collections' in the UK Data Archive at the University of Essex. Ray Pahl is known internationally for his outstanding research on the community, family and labor in the context of de-industrialization, including his Isle of Sheppey studies in the 1970s-80s which was the ESRC-funded study written up by as 'Divisions of Labour' (Blackwell 1984). The main theme of Isle of Sheppey Studies was making clear the polarization process of poor families. I re-studied his original qualitative data by means of secondary analysis.

This research focuses on the original transcripts of the extended family of the poor household. I present how I made the research design for secondary analysis. I combined the theme of secondary analysis with the original theme. I found some factors for polarization process which original researchers did not mention; family factor( family identity, working-style of ethnic minority family), cultural factor(rough-respectable norm, reproduction of the culture of poverty), and personal factor (health problem).

And I found the importance of the atypical case for develop the research interest of original researchers by following up the research process of Isle of Sheppey Studies.

This study will be one of useful cases of secondary analysis and re-using the data set of classic studies.

Quality criteria for mixed methods sociological inquiry across designs

Fàbregues Feijóo, Sergi

*Estudis de Psicologia i Ciències de l'Educació, Universitat Oberta de Catalunya
Barcelona, Spain*

Keywords

mixed methods, quality criteria, delphi technique, systematic review

Mixed methods (MM) research has been accepted by many sociologists as a valuable research option. One of the main reasons of this trend has been discussed in relation to improving various forms of quality criteria via MM design. By the past decade, there have been initial steps in empirically identifying broad criteria for quality assessment in MM research. A common denominator of these studies is that they all advocate for further research to be carried out on the issue of quality criteria, across disciplines and across designs. Departing from a contingency position that prioritizes the centrality of the research question rather than the epistemological and ontological debates, this ongoing doctoral study intends to fill this gap by elaborating a design-based typology to assess the quality of MM research, including research question, sampling, data collection, analysis, and interpretation. The typology is derived from researchers' consensus and empirical testing. Following Sale and Brazil's (2004) recommendations that the revision of quality criteria should involve consultation with critical appraisal experts, and that those criteria be applied to a sample of mixed-methods studies, the inquiry adopts a 2-phase sequential design. In the first, qualitative, phase the Delphi technique is used to develop a ranked list of 'best' criteria to assess the quality reported in MM sociological inquiries. Criteria from phase one is tested during the second, quantitative, phase of the study onto a corpus of published, and unpublished (grey literature), MM studies in a systematic review. Systematic review involves comprehensively searching and identifying MM studies in sociology, and testing the applicability and thoroughness of the Delphi criteria. If appropriate, a meta-analysis appraises the quality effect of MM studies onto which the criteria are applied. The findings are oriented to the provision of helpful insights for MM researchers to assess rigour and overall quality of MM sociological inquiries.

Rationalising the Rationale: An ethnographic case study

Watt, Sal

Psychology, Liverpool Hope University Liverpool, United Kingdom

Keywords

Organisational Change, Ethnography, British Civil Service

This paper discusses the valuable contribution that ethnography can bring to organisational research and draws on an ethnographic case study that explored how organisational change was communicated in a department of the British Civil Service. Modernising government lies at the heart of Government reform in the United Kingdom, indeed, the British Civil Service has a long and chequered history of reform that is predicated on perpetuating drives for standardisation, efficiency and more recently, 'value for money'. The need for modern government to rationalise and be transparent is all the more difficult in a system that is historically pre-existing, rational and bureaucratic in structure. Typically criticism focuses on the inflexibility of the civil service and its tradition of operating mechanistically. Organisationally since the 1980's the civil service's project of reform has found itself likened increasingly to the private sector and contemporarily draws on business strategy to effect both operational and cultural change.

Such strategy typically promotes a 'top-down' discourse that on the one hand is post-modern woven with threads of 'new age' business mantra while on the other, remains tightly bound within an existing and rigid hierarchical structure. The question is how effective are discourses of change and modernising government and, what are their effects on the organisation's working culture. Ethnography can bring much to the table in this respect. Through observation, conversation, interviewing and secondary data drawn from open government resources, this paper through a 'bottom up' approach ethnographically explores how a cohort of civil servants negotiated a change discourse; a discourse that as an amalgam fuses old and new ways of 'being' and therein creates everyday risk. Risk in terms of identifying with proposed organisational change, personal risk around negotiating a sense of self and identity within the organisation and finally, locating oneself within a changing culture. This paper argues that in terms of understanding the complex nature of organisational change, change must also be understood from grass root level and that ethnographic research is a highly effective means by which to understand organisational culture and in this case, a complex micro culture within the British Civil Service.

Relationship between fertility and poverty, the influence of representations of pregnancy in the use of maternal health services by women of fertile age: a mixed methods design

Craveiro, Isabel

*International Health, Instituto de Higiene e Medicina Tropical
Lisbon, Portugal*

Ferrinho, Paulo

*International Health, Instituto de Higiene e Medicina Tropical
Lisbon, Portugal*

Keywords

Poverty, healthcare, Gender, mixed-methods

It's currently recognized the importance of knowing and understanding the social representations of the population and studies about attitudes and practices are increasingly used, but not specifically related to the motivations for the use of maternal health care among women of fertile age, living in urban areas and in different social contexts - of poverty and not poverty.

The main objectives of this study were: to verify if the representations of pregnancy influences the use of reproductive health care; and compare the access to health care, explaining the patterns of utilization of reproductive health care among poor and non-poor women.

We used a mixed-methods design: a case-control study that was conducted in the Lisbon council, with a random sample of 1513 women of fertile age, through a questionnaire; and sub sequentially a phenomenological study, conducting focus groups and semi-structured interviews with a smaller sample of those women. The justification of that approach is related to the complexity of the issues under study, namely, the inter relationship between fertility and poverty and the importance of the social representations of pregnancy /maternity in the patterns of use of health care. It would be very restrictive utilize only one methodological approach on a study with all the dimensions included, therefore the option was to use a multi methods research design aiming to reach the variety of social and societal factors involved on the demand and utilization of health care services.

Research on the Researcher's Own University Colleagues, existing of two Academic Groups in Conflict

Tonsberg, Knut

Department of Music, University of Agder 4604 Kristiansand, Norway

Keywords

dilemmas, research ethic, qualitative

In 2008, a PhD-program in Popular Music Performance was established at a former purely classical conservatory of music in Norway. This was the last step of a 20 year process, which led an originally "anti-academic" music genre as rock all the way to the top of the ivory tower, at the expense of the classical section at the same institution. This process was, concerning the popular music staff, characterized of disrespect from classical colleges, which led to a high level of conflict between the two groups.

The institutionalizing process was also the topic for my PhD-dissertation from 2007. The main empiric basis was interviews of both classical and popular music professors at this conservatory, which is my own place of work. Since I was a very close college of all the interviewees, I had to discuss and solve some really difficult qualitative, methodological, and ethic dilemmas, for instance:

My many roles, confidentiality problems, serious reliability challenges, probably low level of truth or at least two parallel truths, protection of the third part, and possibly additional polarization between the two academic groups just as a consequence of my interviewing. Besides:

How should I treat the disrespectful classical statements that popular music colleges referred to me? Should I quote them in the dissertation and risk a strained relationship to my classical colleges? Alternatively, should I not, and risk criticism from my popular music colleges, because I did not show the worst (or best?) evidences of disrespect? Was I too afraid of falling out with my colleges? Was I too busy of saving my own skin?

Originally I planned to chart the college's socio-economic background. I had the prejudiced idea that popular musicians had grown up in the lower social classes, while the classical colleges were brought up in "furnished homes", and that these differences could explain the conflicts. Was it research ethical doubtful to reject this sociological approach, which I did because: a) I feared invading my colleges' private sphere, b) I feared hearing that "my father is an industrial worker" and c) I feared discovering colleges with "low cultural capital"?

Rigor and Grounded Theory

Cooney, Adeline

School of Nursing and Midwifery, National University of Ireland, Galway Galway, Ireland

Keywords

Rigor, grounded theory, credibility, auditability, fittingness

Glaser and Strauss (1967 p.3) suggest two main criteria for judging the adequacy of a grounded theory: fit and work. Strauss and Corbin (1990; 1998b) identify similar criteria: fit, understanding, generality and control. Corbin and Strauss (2008) expand these to ten criteria: fit, applicability, concepts, contextualisation of concepts, logic, depth, variation, creativity, sensitivity and evidence of memos. These lists suggest that the criteria on which to judge a "good" grounded theory are explicit and non-contentious. This is not the case. Elliott and Lazenbatt (2005) argue that such criteria are insufficient because their use means the evaluating criteria are -"the very constructs used to generate it". They suggest it is more important to consider the research methods themselves when evaluating a grounded theory study, for example, constant comparative analysis and theoretical sampling. Glaser and Strauss (1967 p.224) agree that the evaluation criteria used should be based on the "actual strategies" employed. Some authors agree with this perspective, others do not. These differing perspectives appear to result from whether the author focuses on "methodological rigour" (Glaser and Strauss, 1967; Glaser, 2004; Elliott and Lazenbatt, 2005) or -interpretive rigour? (Beck, 1993; Chiovitti and Piran, 2003). Others argue that both these dimensions should be considered but allow that the various criteria comprising these may not be equally applicable or important to a particular study (Fossey et al., 2002; Corbin and Strauss, 2008). For example, Strauss and Corbin (1998 p.265) indicate that both - "the adequacy of the research process and the grounding of its findings" should be considered. What is not clear is how this should be achieved. Neither Corbin and Strauss (2008) nor Strauss and Corbin (1998) specify criteria, choosing instead to refer to the work of others. This paper will examine the adequacy of Beck's (1993) criteria for establishing rigor in a grounded theory study. Examples of how Beck's criteria were interpreted and applied in a recent grounded theory study will be shared.

Sociological Research on the Holocaust - in front of the direct testimonies. Some methodological remarks

Malgorzata, Melchior

Institute of Applied Social Sciences, University of Warsaw Warsaw, Poland

Keywords

direct testimonies, Holocaust research, methodological issues

The analysis of direct data - the testimonies of participants and witnesses of the past events ? enables the researcher to get into the social reality constructed by individuals: to their consciousness, memory and to the ways of thinking about their own experiences.

We can be interested in events from the past of certain societies or in individuals' past experiences from two different perspectives:

1 - first perspective, the historical one, is focusing on giving the answer to the question: how it was? Then, the description of the past events is very important: chronology, reconstruction of facts and details which have confirmation in historical empirical data, in sources of the time. The experiences of individuals, participants of these past events - in order to know what these experiences were really alike - can be reconstructed mainly from the documents and testimonies originated from the time of these experiences (or created shortly after that time).

2 - second perspective, sociological one, is applying to the past from the present time. For the sociologist can be important how the historical events of his interest are remembered today by their participants and witnesses (not only by them): how they describe them, how they see and judge their role in these events, what importance they attribute now (at the time of the narration) to the past and experience long ago.

I will explore in this paper the nature and the role of the direct testimonies used in the sociological research on the Holocaust as well as some methodological issues they could arise.

Tell me... Mixed «personal story» and art «to tell story» to understand the lesbians that choose to become mothers

La Rocca, Gevisa

Scienze Sociali, University of Palermo Italia, <http://www.unipa.it/~dss/index.htm>

Keywords

mixed methods, art to tell story, lesbians mothers, personal story

Tell me about something of you and I'll listen your story. Sometimes if the purpose is to understand pieces of people life, the only possible method is to ask and to listen the «personal story». There are many ways to ask something and often mixing methods could be useful in order to obtain our research' goals.

To study the wish of lesbians to become mothers and their root to obtain this represent a good situation to test the mix between «personal story» (Bertaux 1981, 1998; Ferrarotti 1981; Olagnero, Saraceno 1993; Bichi, 2000) and the art «to tell story» (Marradi, 2005).

The particularities and the delicacy of this topic have need non-standar technique for the analyze, because the researcher must be feel person that speaks with him.

In this case it seems useful to mixed the two methods because in this way we can analyze:

- using «personal story», the subjective dimension of the thoughts of women that have choose to become mothers
- and using the art «to tell story», them family values.

So, we analyze at one hand the personal journey to obtain a son, but at the other hand we evaluate their sense of family, what these women think about traditional family. This study offer moments for thought on this kind of mixed methods and their pros and cons.

The challenge of involving children as participants in the research process. Participatory action research in researching children's participation in child care

Seim, Sissel

*Faclty of Social Sciences, Social Welfare research Centre, Oslo University College
Oslo, Norway*

Keywords

participatory action research, participation, children

In studying the participation of children in child welfare we have applied participatory action research (PAR) as a methodological approach to study possibilities for developing new or alternative actions or practice forms based on children's participation. The overarching question in the project is: How can the professional practice with children be structured and shaped to strengthen the opportunities of the child to be an active social participant in his/her everyday life? One of the research questions is in focus in this paper: How can a professional practitioner cooperate with a child in ways that will help that child to actively participate in professional processes and endeavours?

The paper will address a central question related to the participatory dimension of the project: How can children and parents be involved as co-researchers in studying participation? By choosing PAR the participants, both the child welfare workers, but also the children and their parents should take part in developing new practice forms, and take part in the research process: to develop research questions, in analysis and in dissemination of results. The empirical basis for the discussion is the research activities in the project Professional Practice and the Participation of Children, conducted at Oslo University College, in cooperation with two child welfare centres in Oslo.

The construction of stance in social research interviews

Myers, Greg

Linguistics and English Language, Lancaster University Lancaster, United Kingdom

Lampropoulou, Sofia

Linguistics and English Language, Lancaster University Lancaster, United Kingdom

Keywords

stance, research interviews, discourse features, grammatical features

Qualitative research interviews provide an important basis of social knowledge both for academic researchers and for commercial marketing and public opinion research. There is a large literature on the practice of interviewing that treats interviews as, ideally, a neutral channel for information and attitudes. But recently discourse analysts have begun to treat research interviews as social encounters, in which both interviewer and interviewee present themselves, moment to moment, responding to and anticipating responses of the other person. One aspect of this interaction is stance, the ways participants mark the propositions they present, strengthening or weakening them, conveying attitudes towards them, and suggesting the style of delivery. Grammatical stance can involve such markers as adverbials, stance verbs plus clause complements, and modal verbs. Stance can also be indicated by discourse features such as reported speech, pronoun shifts (use of generic you), tag questions, and narrative evaluation, where a whole story serves implicitly or explicitly to mark a stance on a previous statement. In this study, we analyze transcripts from ten social research projects in which qualitative interviews were an important component. We identify the different kinds of stance-taking, and relate them to the ways the interviewees (and interviewers) present themselves, the functions served in particular interactional contexts, and the use of stance-taking to deal with interactional problems such as sensitive issues and possible contradictions. The framework is intended to help social science researchers by sensitising them to interactional issues in transcripts, allowing them to locate key passages, showing shifting interviewer-interviewee relations, and providing a principled framework for describing interviewees' complex positioning and their responses to problematic topics and interactional dilemmas.

The gender in the field

Pavesi, Nicoletta

Sociologia, Università Cattolica del Sacro Cuore Milano, Italy

Keywords

Gender, Knowledge, fieldwork, selfreflexivity

The Phenomenology says that every knowledge is a perspective knowledge, because every knowledge is situated in a time and in a space. The human's embodiment discloses a perspective overview on the world. The paper claims the aim to analyze how the sexual and gendered dimensions, which are incarnated in a determinate body, are present in the qualitative research, specifically into the ethnographic observation.

First for all, we hypotize that the gender is a bound for the access into a field and not in other, so to be man or woman is not neutral for the knowledge of a specific social context. Moreover, the performative dimension of the gender, which shows the norms that prehexist and that conduct the role's interaction (i.e. the role's gendered content and the role's gendered language) is another tie in the participiant observation. The awareness that all the knowledge is gendered, requires to the fieldworker to play a double competence (ability). The researcher must use the selfreflexivity to point out his gender identity and his background on this theme: he must point out his background frame relatively to the gender, his gender behaviour's expectations in the interaction, and his correlated opinions. The researcher, moreover, must know that exist a cultural mainstream about the gender, but that the concrete gender playing is based on the interaction in a concrete frame. So, we have a lot of concrete ways in which the gender is embodied.

The researcher on the field, so, must enter in a knowledge's circulation in which must point attention to: the epistemic interdependence, i.e. the knowledge borns in the symbolic interaction between the researcher and the researched; the gendered nature of the communicative interaction between the researcher and the researched; the negotiable nature of the concrete managing of the gendered role in the interaction.

The mediating document in interviews and observations - capturing value creating processes in rural tourism businesses

Andersson Cederholm, Erika

Department of Service Management, Lund University Helsingborg, Sweden

Keywords

mediating documents, mixed methods, value creating processes

The social construction of value in commercial contexts is often presumed to result in economic value. However, capturing the very process where value is emerging, articulated, categorised and performed as some kind of value ? economic or not ? is an area of research facing analytical and methodological challenges. With examples from an ethnographic study of small rural tourism and hospitality businesses in Sweden, such as B&Bs, galleries and horse-farms, the notion of value creating processes are addressed by the use of mixed methods. Interviews with the managers/owners show that the issue of value often oscillates between personal lifestyle-values and experience-values that are presumed to be attractive to the guests/customers. These values are more or less easy to articulate, more or less discursive ? relating to a general discourse of ideal tourist experiences and ?the good rural life?. Furthermore, they become gradually more objectified and thus often mechanically articulated when marketing practices enters as a topic in the interview, for instance when the interviewees talk about what they write in their brochures and what is included in the price. Document analysis of tourist-brochures, web-pages and price-lists, shows that the experience-value in these contexts is even more objectified, stereotyped and quantified as it is transformed into economic value. Furthermore, observations of interviewees interacting with these kinds of documents, for instance in meetings with producers participating in a joint tourism development project, highlights the performative character of value creation, where documents may facilitate as well as restrain the transformation of ?personal value? into ?economic value?. These meetings may, for instance, indicate resistance and ambivalence towards the process of transforming personal lifestyle values into economic value. The aim of this paper is to discuss the importance of mixed methods in order to capture the social process of value creation, and more generally, the mediating role of documents in interviews and observations, either as a physically present artefact or as a topic of conversation.

The Only Way is up? Women's Narratives of Class Mobility

Sohl, Lena

Department of Sociology, Uppsala University Uppsala, Sweden

Keywords

Narrative Analysis, discourse analysis, class mobility, life-stories, Gender

Upward class mobility is often seen as something desirable in a modern society, a success story told by 'the ones who made it'. In this paper the subject matter is women's narratives of upward class mobility in Sweden during the 1990's and 2000's. In order to understand such narratives this paper argues that a combination of narrative analysis and discourse analysis is needed.

These narratives were collected using a life story-approach. When analysing life-stories it is important to understand the construction of the stories in relation to the context in which they are produced. As Sandra J. Jones (2003) has emphasized, 'a drawback of narrative analysis is that it tends to produce highly individualized account from which it is difficult to develop concepts or themes.' The usage of narrative analysis alone can make the researcher fail to notice the relation between individual stories and the stories of class mobility that is a part of Swedish equality discourse. Therefore, this paper argues that in order to understand such narratives a combination of narrative analysis and discourse analysis is needed.

The methodological argument on combined methods will be addressed through empirical observations from the actual setting of the interviews. These empirical observations include:

- 1) The impact of power relations in the interview situation. During the interviews the women several times asked the interviewer about the 'right answer' about class location. How can the relation between the researcher and the interviewee be understood in these situations?
- 2) The importance of analyzing shared knowledge about class and class mobility. For instance, the interviewees referred to the sociologist Pierre Bourdieu in the understanding of their own class mobility, the same theorist that the researcher intends to use in the analysis of the interviews. What effect do these common understandings of class have in the interview situation?

Summing up, this emphasizes the importance of combining methods of analysis.

The paradoxes of communication in the dental clinic: Luhmann's form analysis and the clinical system

Boiko, Olga

*Oral health and Development, University of Sheffield
Sheffield, UK*

Gibson, Barry

*Oral Health and Development, University of Sheffield
Sheffield, UK*

Keywords

forms of communication, paradoxes, clinical system

Contemporary conversation studies have increasingly accounted for the complexity of meaning construction in communication and characterised by both conceptual and linguistic rigor. The paper makes a strong case for a methodologically novel approach to the analysis of communication originated in systems theory and discussed the possible cross-fertilisation between conversation analysis and form analysis. This framework originates in the systems theory and form analysis of Luhmann (1995, 1999, and 2001), and later in the works of Andersen (2003, 2007). Form analysis has been relatively unknown and detached from the Anglophonic sociologists until recently. Some new research demonstrated its empirical applications to communication research (Schneider, 2000; Baraldi & Gavioli, 2006), however, the benefits of potential synthesis should also be carefully explored.

The paper aims to contribute into the understanding of the semantic and communicative complexity of clinical encounters and to explain the tensions between medical professionals and patients from the a new analytical framework. This methodology adds to the insights about the systemic discourse of medicine, but also allows exploring communicative contingency in clinical (dental) encounters.

Data are collected through 36 observations of dentist-patient consultations and interviews with 5 dentists and 20 patients in primary and secondary care. The results of form analysis suggest 14 forms of functionally specific communication which described the semantics of the dental clinic. These forms explain the complex, intricate relations between what dentists and patients actualised as important for them.

The findings sensitize the paradoxes of communication in clinical settings by exploring the connections with the semantics of the clinical system. Semantic power of the dental clinic discussed as different to structural discourses of medicine and dramaturgy of language games, yet, as imposing connectivity on the communication in the encounters.

The Potential and Challenges of Articulation as a Methodological Tool in the Case of an Interview Study of Artist's Conceptions of Being About an Artist

PhL Logrén, Anne

*Finnish and Cultural Research, Joensuu University
Finland,*

Keywords

articulation, conceptions of artist, interview study

The topic of my research is the definitions of the (contemporary) artist in Finland. The purpose of the study is to promote the understanding of the network of definitions about artist as a process where different values confront, cross and clash. The material of the study is chosen so as to provide different viewpoints on the process. In addition to textual material I have also interviewed several artists in the North Karelian province. In my research the essential questions about the definitions of artists concern, among others, the identifications, positions, values, interconnections, distinctions and historical notions in and between (con)texts.

The basis of my research approach is that 'the artist' is a discursively produced concept under a negotiation process. Definitions matter and have an impact on a material level. The dominant discourses of the artist are just one, and often unquestioned, viewpoint which hides many other existing and often implicit assumptions and expectations, which may actually be crucial in the formation of the conceptions. Here the concept of articulation comes in to view. Articulation has been described as an interrelation of at least two originally distinct clusters or practices of unnecessary relations (Grossberg 1997). The core element is certain arbitrariness. As a made, nonessential formation, it is possible to take apart erupting natural and self-evident meanings (ibid).

In my presentation I would like to further demonstrate the possibilities and challenges of the articulative approach, especially concerning the interview analysis. As a methodological tool the concept of articulation reveals tendencies of meaning formation and also helps to consider contextual effects (see Grossberg 1997). The approach has a potential for providing useful and concrete guidelines for analysing and reading interviews. For example, its reluctant foundation urges to take any meanings of the artist as non-axiomatic formation. Its foundation also orientates itself to the surrounding world and society thus revealing the intertextuality. In addition, it helps to understand the network 'inside' and 'beyond' the discourses about the artist. However, the challenges of the articulative approach are linked to the problems of discourse in practice, the space of interpretations and the identification of articulation.

The qualitative systemic methodology in the context of qualitative research methods

Lalanda-Gonçalves, Rolando

Departamento de História, Filosofia e Ciências Sociais, Universidade dos Açores Ponta Delgada, Portugal

Keywords

recurrence., circular causality, qualitative framework, modeling, qualitative systemic

In this paper we are going to present the fundamental operations of systemic qualitative method: framework, recurrences, circular causalities and modeling relations/exchanges. These operations lead to find the sense/meaning of a social exchange system.

As any qualitative methodology the qualitative systemic method (Alex Mucchielli) adopts the fundamental principles which lead to understanding the structure and functioning of social phenomena and human behavior: comparison, generalization, exchanges and correlative building of the sense/meaning for the actors.

The first operation in this systemic analysis is the building of a framework (cadrage) which corresponds to what is called "sampling" in other qualitative methods. The delimitation of the field of analysis is made from the point of view of the actors correlated with the observed relational networks.

The second operation consist in identify the recurrences on the relations system. These recurrences are listed as a "form of exchange". (Mucchielli, Alex, 2006) This intellectual process combines the seeking of similarities with the categorization although is not yet even an assign of meanings to the actions of the actors in the system.

The third operation is based on seeking circular causalities and on the process of seeking totalities. The researcher shall answer the question: " what is the collective concern shared by the actors that ?builds? the relations system?" (Mucchielli, Alex, 2006)

This research by comparison and generalizing induction of this ?challenge? provides then the key for the interpretation explained on modeling. The modeling relations/exchanges (fourth operation) explicit then, a scheme, of the significance of each "exchange" (formal categories) developed by the actors in a more global context.

By modeling relations/exchanges (fourth operation) we put, in an explicit scheme, the significance of each "exchange". To do this the investigator shall make an intellectual work of "contextualization" but also an interpretation of the emergent sense/meaning of the relations (Mucchielli, Alex, 2006)

For the qualitative systemic this research of the general framework of significations system is a constructivist approach that permits, by the modeling, and by the analysis of circular causalities, to open new perspectives on the fields of the analysis of relational systems in micro, mezzo and macro scale.

The relationship between interviewee and interviewer

Pretto, Albertina

*Scienze Umane e Sociali - Human and Social Sciences, Università di Trento
Trento, Italy*

Keywords

life story, interviewers, relationship, listening

The purpose of my presentation is to emphasize the importance of relationship established between the narrator and the researcher-interviewer during the gathering of a qualitative interview, in terms related to a more specific area of the life stories. As a matter of fact, we believe that it is necessary to discuss the relationship that "should" be established since, in the area of social research, it is not uncommon to come upon interviews both transcribed or registered that present conduction strategies remarkably different among them and that seem to be in contrast of what is recommended and indicated by a greater part of literature on the conduction of qualitative interview. In order to understand the reason why this occurs, we present also a preliminary analysis of the qualitative interviews realized among Italian sociologists who affirm that their researches are carried out through life stories and qualitative interviews. This research aims to assert by which criteria these are conducted and in what ways the relationship with the interviewee is regarded

The role of trust and recognition in field research. Empirical data and theoretical explanations for a neglected methodological issue

Kelle, Udo

*Sociology, Philipps-University Marburg
Marburg, Germany*

Newerla, Andrea

Graduiertenkolleg "Gruppenbezogene Menschenfeindlichkeit", Philipps-University Marburg Marburg, Germany

Keywords

Research ethics, participant observation, qualitative interview, Ethnography

In the past decades a growing tendency in qualitative research towards large scale interview studies could be observed. In conjunction with the pressures of funded research the necessity to collect and analyze large amounts of interview data often leads to a reduced contact to the field. The role and image of the qualitative researcher as a person who intensively participates in social interactions in the field and establishes long-lasting personal relations to research participants is often changed to someone 'collecting data' like a poll interviewer. However, the quality of information which can be obtained by research interviewing is highly dependent on the relationship between interviewer and research subject and esp. on the possibility to establish mutual trust. An atmosphere of mistrust and concealment will obviously result in worthless data and 'thin descriptions' which fail to grasp social processes in the field. Research about sensitive topics and interviews with vulnerable research subjects suffers in particular from such a lack of trust.

In this paper we will draw on our field experiences and on data from two different research projects carried out in care homes using participant observation and interviews with residents and members of staff. We will provide concrete example to demonstrate how the establishment of trust in interview situation through a prolonged stay in the field leads to an improvement of data quality and thus can dramatically alter the understanding of interview data. Furthermore we will provide an analytic framework for describing and understanding the relation between researcher and research participants based on two theoretical approaches developed in the framework of contemporary critical theory: Axel Honneth's theory of recognition and Juergen Habermas' concept of discourse ethics. By framing our field experiences with these approaches we will show that research methodology, social theory and research ethics are not distinct domains, but closely interrelated.

The Trifle That Matters. Noticing Unnoticeable in Qualitative Research

Marciniak, Lukas T

The Sociology of Organization & Management, Lodz University Lodz, Poland

Keywords

Ethnography, conversation analysis, indepth insight, grounded theory method, applied sociology

One of the commonly advanced arguments for qualitative methods is a detailed and meticulous approach to the studied phenomenon. Numerous researchers, especially those explaining methodological decisions in their articles and research reports, repeatedly emphasize that qualitative methods enabled them to get indepth insight and access to all significant parts, aspects and episodes of the phenomena. Nowadays, the indepth insight often becomes a synonym for qualitative methods, but unfortunately it is more a slogan than applied research practice. After paragraphs of high-flown methodological statements we find rather sketchy descriptions, careless transcripts and weak conclusions. What is the problem then? Is the detailed analysis not so important after all, or is it just so difficult to apply? If we recognize the indepth insight as an attempt to uncover complex nature of studied events and analyze those significant aspects, we can formulate more precise questions. Should we care about all the details which occur in the data? How deep should we explore? What makes some details more important than others and how can we identify those noteworthy? Finally, how can we cope with the obviousness of studied details of everyday life, the obviousness which makes important details unnoticeable. In my presentation, I will try to answer these questions using three examples from different qualitative researches, comparing analytical decisions, showing indepth findings and overlooked details. I will refer to the ethnographic study, grounded theory methodology research and conversation analysis, presenting different ways and general importance of gaining detailed qualitative analysis. The conclusion will provide further suggestions on how to turn 'indepth insight' slogan into the research practice and how to identify the trifle that matters

The use of data suites for the analysis of global cultural trends

Anheier, Helmut

*Institute of Sociology, University of Heidelberg
Heidelberg, Germany*

Hoelscher, Michael

*Institute of Sociology, University of Heidelberg
Heidelberg, Germany*

Keywords

culture, comparison, globalisation, qualitative methods, Quantitative methods

Session: ?The relationship between qualitative and quantitative research?

Traditionally, the starting point for many analyses of globalisation is the country level. This has recently been criticized as ?methodological nationalism? (e.g. Beck 2002), as the national focus may not be able to grasp current processes of globalisation adequately. Such global trends (Beck?s example is the world risk society; one could add the internet, migration etc.) become ever more important for developments in sociological theory.

Therefore, new units of analysis beyond the nation-state and better indicators may be needed. There is, however, a problem with missing data for alternative levels of analysis.

To circumvent these problems, we introduced the idea of data suites (Anheier 2007). The basic idea behind indicator suites is that indicators of different units of analysis, and even with incomplete data, can still be brought together in a thematic (not statistical) way, and generate insights about relevant aspects of the relationship between globalization and cultures. What unites indicators to form a thematic suite is not some statistical rationale but a conceptual, qualitative one.

In methodological terms, we are using (mostly) quantitative information in a (mostly) qualitative way. Indicator suites are a compromise in the sense that they take the inchoate and incomplete state of quantitative indicators as a given, at least for the medium term, while refusing to accept the interpretative limitations this state imposes on descriptive analysis.

The notion of indicator suites is informed by Tufte?s (2001) approach to the visual display of quantitative information.

We would like to discuss benefits and problems of this approach and assess its usefulness for analyses of the relationship between cultures and globalisation.?

References:

Anheier, H. (2007). Introducing cultural indicator suites. In H. Anheier & Y.R. Isar (Ed.), Conflicts and Tension. The Cultures and Globalization Series, Vol. 1. (pp. 335-347). London: Sage.

Beck, U. (2002). Macht und Gegenmacht im globalen Zeitalter. Neue weltpolitische Ökonomie. Frankfurt am Main: Suhrkamp.

Tufte, E. (2001). The Visual Display of Quantitative Information. Cheshire, CT.: Graphics Press

The vignette technique: advantages and limits of a technique of reconstruction of the real

Le Pape, Marie-Clémence

*Observatoire Sociologique du Changement - OSC, Institut d'Etudes Politiques de Paris
Paris, France*

Keywords

vignette technique, practices, values

Using the vignette technique is not very frequent yet in sociological research. This technique is however frequently used by psychologists and politists, both in their quantitative and qualitative studies. J. Finch (1987) defines it as "short stories concerning hypothetical characteristics in a specific context, about which the interrogated person is invited to answer?". The use of this technique in sociology has grown and diversified, and its application is more rigorous. First I will briefly describe its use by sociologists in the last 50 years, then I will recall some of its principles. Finally, I will try to show the advantages and limits of this technique of reconstruction of the real, using an ongoing qualitative research on family education as an example.

Timeline Stakeholder Analysis (TSA) in innovation projects

Klendauer, Ruth

Institute of Sociology, Technical University of Munich (TUM) 80335, Germany

Wastian, Monika

*Institute of Sociology, Technical University of Munich
Munich, Germany*

Schneider, Michael

*Institute of Sociology, Technical University of Munich
Munich, Germany*

Gunkel, Jennifer

Institute of Sociology, Technical University of Munich Munich, Germany

Kirschner, Rafael

Institute of Product Development, Technical University of Munich Garching, Germany

Kain, Andreas

Institute of Product Development, Technical University of Munich Garching, Germany

Keywords

Interview technique, critical incidents, visualization tool

Timeline Stakeholder Analysis (TSA), a qualitative and process-focused method, is based on Timeline Interviews (Wastian & Schneider, 2005), using a digital whiteboard as visualization tool. The primary purpose of TSA is to identify important stakeholders and their roles (e.g., promoters versus incubators) as well as to analyze critical interaction situations among stakeholders in the course of projects.

The Timeline Interview technique draws upon Rogers' (1945) person-centered conversation and Flanagan's (1954) critical incident technique. It allows for getting started in a structured way but also for the interviewee to describe one specific project in a non-constrained, open manner, remembering the process details step by step. Thus, the interview technique takes into account the temporal progression of the project and the selective and slowly emerging memory of the interviewee.

One specific feature of TSA is the visualization of the project, utilizing a digital whiteboard. A project is reviewed as it proceeds along its specific stages. The interviewee is asked to write down important situations and stakeholders on digital cards and to put the cards on a timeline that is depicted on the whiteboard. These situations are then described in greater detail. After this, a high-low-curve is drawn on the whiteboard by the interviewee. This is to depict the subjective evaluation of the project progress. Following this curve, highs, lows, and turning points during the project are explored.

The interviewee thus deeply reflects on critical incidents concerning interactions among important stakeholders. Both transcript and the visualization on the whiteboard of the interview are analyzed and then validated by subject matter experts in interviews and workshops.

We present the results of a field study on innovation projects in order to illustrate the use of TSA.

Unlike conventional stakeholder analyses applied in project management (Caupin et al., 2006), our approach is dynamic and process-oriented. We expect TSA to improve the methods and timing for stakeholder integration in innovation projects, thus contributing to process quality and success of innovation projects.

Towards a holistic understanding

Nilsen, Ann Christin

*Welfare Research, Agder Research
Kristiansand, Norway*

Jensen, Hanne Cecilie

*Welfare Research, Agder Research
Kristiansand, Norway*

Keywords

practice, cooperation, action-oriented, multi-perspective, explorative

In this paper we discuss our experiences with an explorative, multi-perspective and action-oriented approach for understanding cooperative practice, adapted in the project 'Cooperation for the total benefit of the child'. Our focus of interest in the project is children with special needs attending Norwegian kindergartens. In order to ensure the well-being of these children there is a need for substantial cooperation among the children's families, their kindergartens, and bodies within different sectors of the welfare system (e.g., educational and medical services). The aim of this project is to address how the relations within cooperative teams are constructed and carried out from the perspectives of the different agents involved. The knowledge generated from the project is further intended to contribute to improving cooperation within the teams as well as for use in developing models of 'best practice'.

The character of the project presupposes an explorative, action-oriented and multi-perspective approach. We follow six cases, each consisting of (1) the parents of the child receiving support, (2) the child's primary contact person in the kindergarten, (3) the child's special educator, (4) the coordinator of the team, and/or (5) other relevant agents (e.g., physiotherapist, doctor). In the first phase of the project we conducted individual interviews with the people involved in each case, observed cooperative-team meetings and held focus group interviews with representatives from agencies involved in the cooperation. In the next phase, we arrange two seminars. The first, to which only participants are invited, is intended as an arena for sharing experiences derived from phase one. We regard this seminar as both data collection and communication of results. The next seminar will focus on dissemination of results to a larger audience.

The discussion will concentrate on the following questions: What possibilities lie within a multi-perspective approach to uncover similarities and differences in experiences and understandings? How can a multi-perspective approach be action-oriented? How can these approaches promote development towards 'best practice'?

Unequal relation of power in the final interpretation

Almlund, Pernille

Department of Communication, Business and Information Technologies, Roskilde University Roskilde, Denmark

Keywords

interpretation, qualitative methods, Unequal relation of power

Unequal relation of power in the final interpretation

This paper addresses the kind of information we get by using qualitative methods such as interviews, observations and the like. The paper elaborates and discusses some important aspects of producing data in a way that is respectful to the phenomenon or the persons in focus of the analysis.

To use qualitative methods respectfully, we may consider how the relation between researcher and researched is a relation of power. The researcher is the one who initiates the research and makes the agenda. He or she decides what is the theme in focus, poses most of the questions in an interview and chooses the angle of observations. Most important is the domination in the final interpretation and conclusion, written by the researcher in the final report or article.

There has been some attention to the unequal relation of power in the literature. Focus has been on how to handle this relation in the meeting between interviewer and interviewed, between observer and observed. The final interpretation has not been offered much attention with respect to this relation of power, not even the fact that the final version of the research is published, uploaded on the web and may be read by many persons.

To take this final interpretation into consideration some questions may be posed: How can we make a respectful interpretation of the data produced in collaboration between researcher and researched? What exactly do we mean when we say interpretation?

The paper will argue that interpretation is a condition that we must be aware of, but will never get rid of (Gadamer 1999), because the final interpretation of the qualitative research can only be the interpretation of the researcher. The researched will leave the interview with his or her own interpretation, but this version will mostly not be committed to paper.

This paper will take up this challenge and try to elaborate, argue and discuss how a decentralized subject, a descriptive focus and an accept of an approaching condition will bring us closer to a respectful use and interpretation of qualitative research.

Urban studies: methods of data collection and data analysis

Strelnikova, Anna

*Sociological department, Russian State University for the Humanities
Moscow, Russia*

Keywords

urban studies, visual strategy, mixed methods, data collection, data analysis

City is a special object for the sociologists. The point is that the traditional «measurements» added spatial component. So when we start to explore the city, we need to adapt the usual research methods (such as interview, observation, experiment). The study of urban space involves not only detection of urban distance and orientation, detection of boundaries of various units (center, districts and neighborhoods, the boundaries of the city as a whole), but also symbolic perception of the spatial dimension. Therefore, the selected research strategy can build the following methods:

1. Including projective questions into interview
2. Creating pictures, maps, photos.
3. Interpretation of existing pictures, maps, charts, photos, etc.
4. In addition, you can apply a strategy based entirely on an analysis of physical environment and visual images - a visual strategy.

Required minimum «tools» to collect data:

- 1) General map of the city and detailed district maps (including transport schemes)
- 2) Camera (photo, video)
- 3) Paper and pencils (for schematic drawings)
- 4) Questionnaire tool (if necessary)
- 5) prepared visual images as stimulus materials (if necessary)

In our opinion, the combination of different methods (interviews, projective techniques, visual techniques) gives a more complete picture of the social processes in modern cities. Because the city is filled with visual signs, one of the most effective methods of data collection and analysis of social information is a visual strategy.

Using narrative interview and semi-structured interview in research of emotions in organization.

Kubczak, Anna

*The Sociology of Organization and Management Department, University of Lodz
Lodz, Poland*

Pawlowska, Beata

*The Sociology of Organization and Management Department, University of Lodz
Lodz, Poland*

Keywords

emotions, semi-structured interview, organization, narrative interview

The aim of the paper is to discuss the use of selected qualitative methods in research on emotions in organization. We will show some methodological problems and difficulties when studying emotions using semi-structured and narrative interviews. We will argue that emotions, commonly recognized as subjective states experienced by an individual, and their meaning for an individual should be reconstructed with reference to actions and social processes in which actor is involved (recognizing wider context ? organizational and social).

The focus of the paper will be on answering questions: what is the difference between semi-structured interview and narrative interview according to obtained empirical data? What kind of methodological difficulties may emerge during research process in reference to each of above mentioned techniques? How to go beyond declarative layer of data and reach the one which is meaningful but often hidden because of interactional specific of interview situation?

The discussion will refer to research on professional careers, based on 38 semi-structured interviews, 25 narrative interviews (and observations).

Using semi-structured interview and focus group interview in research of social stigma

Chomczynski, Piotr

*The Sociology of Organization and Management Department, University of Lodz
Lodz, Poland*

Keywords

qualitative methods, focus group interview, qualitative interview, semi-structured interview

The main aim of this paper is to present selected qualitative methods in research of social stigma phenomenon. I want to describe my findings according to usefulness of techniques used in the study of this issue and also some primary conclusions according to conditions of social stigma phenomenon. There will be described some methodological findings that relate to these both techniques in the context of stigma research. I want to answer the questions: what is the difference between semi-structured interview and focus group interview according to data obtained? What kind of difficulties may occur in research process in case of these both techniques and how to deal with them? How to stimulate interviewed people encouraging them to express their opinion? How to go through declared superficial opinions and deepen obtained information? What kind of data can be obtained using individual and group interviews?

My conclusions base on forty semi-structured interviews and eight focus group interviews applied in the study of circumstances that lie under public perception of people who served a prison sentence. I used some visual and audio materials to obtain information about ex criminals? perception.

Video elicited interview and visual methods in the research of yoga practice. Researching the body and gesture

Konecki, Krzysztof

Sociology of Organization and Management, Lodz University

Lodz, Poland

Keywords

symbolic interactionism, gesture, Body, Grounded Theory Methodology, visual methods

The paper will deal with description of the different methods in the research of yoga practice and lived experience of yogi. The practice of yoga could be described from the different points of view by using different 'slice of data'. The problem of researching a meaning of body gesture and presenting the lived experience by using gesture will be discussed in the paper. The triangulation of methods are shown as an indispensable in the researching not verbally transmitted meanings and definitions of situation. There will be presented the arguments for using the visual methods and for connecting them with other methods based on oral communication.

We, You and I: Interviewing Same Sex Couples Together and Apart

Einarsdottir, Anna

*Sociology, School of Social Sciences, Morgan Centre, The University of Manchester
United Kingdom,*

Heaphy, Brian

*Sociology, School of Social Sciences, Morgan Centre, The University of Manchester
United Kingdom,*

Smart, Carol

*Sociology, School of Social Sciences, Morgan Centre, The University of Manchester
Manchester, United Kingdom*

Keywords

ethics, Same Sex Couples, joint and separate interviews

This paper explores key practical and ethical issues which arise from interviewing couples. It does so by discussing an interview based qualitative study among sex couples who have entered into Civil Partnership. The study, entitled Just Like Marriage? Young Couple's Civil Partnerships, is funded by the British Economic and Social Research Council.

To date, most couple studies derive from joint or separate interviews with heterosexual partners. This approach has largely been taken to counteract gender inequalities in interview settings and to keep labour costs under control. In our study, we interviewed couples together and then separately. This allowed for the production of individual and collaborative narratives of relationships, but also raised distinctive practical and ethical issues.

The paper explores the possibilities and challenges offered by our method with respect to these practical and ethical issues - and especially with respect to issues of power, loyalty, confidentiality and trust.

The paper concludes by suggesting that in moving beyond the conventional methodology of 'couple studies', our study points to a alternative way of exploring couple relationships: One that is not without its challenges, but that allows for a fuller exploration of the complexity of contemporary relationships.

Witness, memory and narrative: the journey from experience to recounting

Coetzee, Jan K

Department of Sociology, Rhodes University Grahamstown, South Africa

Keywords

analysing, oral sources, objective markers

The paper explores the epistemological problems when analysing oral sources. A personal narrative is a meaning-constructing activity that takes place on different levels. It starts off with the interaction between narrator and the narrated event (the life experience as it takes place) but includes various dimensions on its way to the final text of the narrated event. This paper explores some of these dimensions, such as objective markers (real people, real events, factually correct features, etc), memory, suffering, trauma, and intersubjectivity. The hermeneutical complexity of analysing witness accounts will be illustrated.

Writing across Boundaries: Explorations in Representation, Rhetoric and Writing in Qualitative Research

Simpson, Bob

Anthropology, Durham University South Road, UK

Humphrey, Robin

Keywords

analysis, doctoral researchers, Writing

This talk will be based on initial analysis of qualitative feedback from doctoral candidates and their supervisors on two annual workshops, organised via an UK Research Council (ESRC) Researcher Development Initiative project, based on providing advanced training in analysing and writing up qualitative data. The rationale for, and the format of, the workshops will be described, and the formative and summative evaluative strategies outlined. The formative evaluation took the form of ongoing iteration based upon reflective comments made by the participants and the contributors. Also, two doctoral researchers were employed to attend the workshops as ethnographic participant observers. Summative evaluation took the form of an evaluation questionnaire collected after each workshop, and was supplemented by a follow-up telephone interview six months after the workshop, both to researcher participants and, independently, to their supervisors, to assess the benefits of the workshops on the writing-up process. Initial results from the evaluation of the first two years of the project will be presented, which shed light on the practical, intellectual, and emotional elements integral to the process of writing up qualitative data.

Youth, Risk and Identities: Exploring the Focus Group as a Site for the Positioning of Selves and Others

Merryweather, Dave

Deanery of Science and Social Sciences, Liverpool Hope University Liverpool, UK

Keywords

Identities., Risk, Youth, Conversations, focus groups

In this paper I argue that the focus group constitutes a valuable method for exploring processes of positioning of selves and others which occur in talk-in-interaction. The paper draws upon current PhD. research into youth, risk and identities in which focus groups are used to generate talk about aspects of everyday life that youths aged 14-24 living in Liverpool, UK, regard as risk. While the method is more conventionally used to gather opinions of, or attitudes towards, particular topics, focus groups are posited here as social contexts in which conversations characterized by the multifarious forms of interaction and conversational strategies typifying everyday talk can be generated. Data generated via focus groups can therefore be analysed using insights from the traditions of conversation analysis and discursive psychology which illuminate how, through the dynamic processes of talk-in-interaction, individuals construct and reconstruct the social world, and position themselves and others in a range of classed, gendered and racialized identities. As such, my concern is less with expressed attitudes and opinions, and more with conversational processes and the implications of this for identity-work.

Understanding focus groups as social contexts in which identity work occurs nevertheless necessitates consideration of not only the conversational moment, but also of how conversations are informed by broader cultural factors. Developing this, I contend that individuals occupying different positions in social space experience and define the social in different ways. Using 'risk' as an example, I suggest that factors such as gender, ethnicity, age and class, inform what is defined as risk, how risk is understood, and what form responses to risk should take. As such, risk cannot be divorced from the material experiences of everyday life and the culturally-embedded interpretive repertoires individuals draw upon in defining and understanding risks. Such factors inevitably inform both content and character of conversations. Focus groups, I argue, provide an ideal method for generating data which can be analyzed according to how conversations are informed by the material and the cultural, influencing both what is discussed, the form conversational interactions take, and processes of positioning of selves and others occurring therein.

RN21

RENCORE: Methods for Comparative Research on Europe

A Comparative Analysis of Individual-Level Determinants of Catholic Belief and Practice in Wider Europe: Evidence from Belgium, Ireland and Slovenia

Conway, Brian

Sociology, National University of Ireland, Maynooth Maynooth, Ireland

Keywords

europe, Catholicism, religion, comparative

This paper examines individual-level determinants of religious belief and practice through a comparative study of three Catholic countries - Belgium, Ireland and Slovenia. Within the sociology of religion literature, a great deal of attention has been given to the "secularisation debate". This debate turns on the question of whether the processes associated with modernisation such as individualisation and urbanisation are associated or not with a decline in religion as a source of individual and group identities. Comparative research suggests that this process unfolds at different levels and speeds in different societies. While sociologists have sought to capture variation in pathways to secularisation through the construction of interesting typologies of secularisation "regimes" distinguished in denominational terms between Catholic, Protestant, and mixed models, insufficient attention has been paid to differences and similarities within the Catholic category. Furthermore, it is very difficult to find studies employing cases from periphery, continental and eastern parts of Catholic Europe. Drawing on data from the World Values Survey, this paper examines patterns of belief and practice in these three Catholic societies and attempts to explain variation with respect to these dimensions of religiosity with reference to individual-level explanations derived from the sociology of religion literature. Specifically, I ask three interrelated questions: (1) what patterns of belief and practice are evident among Belgian, Irish and Slovenian Catholics? (2) do Belgian Catholics differ from the Irish and Slovenian Catholics? and, (3) what individual-level factors help account for variation between these three Catholic countries? By estimating these effects we will be better positioned to understand how secularisation plays out in different ways in different societies and how Catholicism is expressed in nationally-specific forms.

Crosstalk and Miss Links in Multilingual Networks

Harnisch, Svetlana

SOCIOLOGY OF PROFESSION, INSTITUTE OF SOCIOLOGY RAS MOSCOW, RUSSIAN FEDERATION

Keywords

miscommunication, multilingual network, crosstalk, languages education of R&Ds, professional discourse

The paper is devoted to problems of misunderstanding in professional talks among non-native English speakers. It is assumed that professional type of discourse differs from personal and administrative types due to common knowledge and experience. Mutual comprehension among members of a profession is based on shared concepts and terms. Nonverbal signs, codes and formulas help to overcome lingual diversity of experts, as it is known, e.g., in mathematics, physics and chemistry. Concept of crosstalk [Harnisch, 2008] is used here to cover different types of obstacles in communication on data of English used by non-native English speakers. It is argued that crosstalk in professional talks can occur in result of (1) phonetic/phonemic interference; (2) conceptual interference at the semantic level and (3) semiotic interference due to ethno-cultural values of a sign's meaning. 100 respondents and 12 experts were interviewed to analyze those types of crosstalk manifested in professional discourse. All of them are to use English for their professional reasons. English is not their native tongue.

The aims of the paper is to emphasize the needs in (1) the standardization of international scientific terminology; (2) the unification of nonverbal symbols and codes used in international technological networks; and (3) an improvement of intensive qualified programs for teaching foreign languages to experts, R&Ds and students.

Direction of Response Scale Format in International Comparison

Krebs, Dagmar

Institute for Sociology, University of Giessen Ludwigshafen, Germany

Bachner, Yaacov

Sociology of Health, Ben Gurion University of the Negev Beer Sheva, Israel

Keywords

method effect, response behavior, comparative multi-method research, scale direction, comparative measurement quality

Direction of response scale format and response behavior

Formatting an answer - as one step in the cognitive process of answering a question - means to map the selected answer to the categories on a response scale. In this process response scales, as one part of questions, serve as orientation for respondents in mapping their answers to response categories. Therefore it can be expected that the direction of a response scale (either starting with the positive or the negative response category on the left side of the scale) provides information for respondents influencing their response behavior. If left means "top", then starting a response scale requesting approval of a behavior with, for example, "completely approve" or with "completely disapprove" might result in different subjective hypotheses that respondents form about the "most frequent" or "most accepted" behavior. This would imply that direction of reading is important in reacting to response scales.

If this principle applies in general, then it should be observable in response behavior of respondents in different contexts: first in a context, where reading direction - and accordingly response scales - run from left to right, and second, in contexts where reading direction runs from right to left. In the latter context, the right side of the scale would carry the meaning of "top" and response behavior can be expected to vary accordingly comparable to response behavior on scales running from left to right.

This paper tests the hypothesis that first, scales beginning with the positive pole bring about different responses than scales starting with the negative pole. Second, reading direction is important under the condition of different reading direction.

A panel design was combined with split-ballot forms of the questionnaire. Therefore it is possible to test the postulated effects of response scale direction on response behavior by comparing responses across split groups within each sample as well as across samples within each split group. Split groups of respondents did only participate once, panel members participated either twice or three times. Results of this step reveal if there is an effect of scale direction and if this depends on reading direction.

Full score invariance of employee commitment across countries and times

Stebe, Janez

Social sciences data archives, University of Ljubljana Slovenia, <http://www.adp.fdv.uni-lj.si/>

Mesner Andolsek, Dana

Chair of Human Resources and Social Management, University of Ljubljana Ljubljana, Ljubljana

Keywords

structural equations, measurement equivalence, international survey

Employee organisational commitment has been long and extensively studied until now (Meyer & Allen, 1997; Jaussi, 2007). An emphasis of current analysis was to verify its measurement characteristics, for the purpose of comparisons of levels of commitment across time and countries. A limited set of countries was chosen among those available in a sample from the data on Work Orientations II, ISSP 1997, purposefully selected to reflect cultural and structural differences that was expected to affect change in levels of organisational commitment. With the use of structural equations models we first confirmed that a model for configural invariance for two factors measuring conceptually distinct components of Affective commitment (AC) and Continuance commitment (CC) respectively has better support than of one factor model. Metric and error term invariance was subsequently confirmed. Scalar equivalence, needed for valid comparison of mean levels of both components of commitment, was confirmed as well, with the exception of two country specific Tau coefficient. Finally, a model thus established was applied additionally on data from 2005 ISSP. Acceptable fit was achieved for a common model containing both points in time and all countries, which allowed making more firm conclusions about the changes in AC and CC in different countries.

A procedure for testing measurement characteristics of items from comparative survey proved useful. In particular, it makes possible to compare multidimensional concept in situation when a limited number of items (4 altogether) was available, of which in 2005 data one was omitted. A robustness of procedure has to be tested by replicating analysis on extended set of countries.

Harmonising the Measurement of the Employment Status in the EU-LFS - The "12 Principles" and Beyond

Koerner, Thomas

*Labour Market, Federal Statistical Office Germany
Wiesbaden, Germany*

Puch, Katharina

*Labour Market, Federal Statistical Office Germany
Wiesbaden, Germany*

Keywords

International Harmonisation, labour force survey, labour market

The harmonised measurement of the employment status is one of the key objectives of the EU Labour Force Survey (EU-LFS). The Labour Force Survey offers various advantages with regard to comparative analysis, e. g. relatively large sample sizes, high response rates and a high degree of methodological harmonisation. In order to guarantee conceptual comparability, the measurement of the employment status is implemented according the Guidelines of the International Labour Organization (ILO) and further operationalised in the EU regulations mandating the EU-LFS.

Based on methodological studies carried out during the 1990s, the Commission Regulation 1897/2000 provided further elements of conceptual and methodological harmonisation. First of all, the regulation specifies details regarding the operational definition of unemployment, namely the definition of "active job search" and the treatment of persons with a job, but not at work. Secondly, the regulation stipulates twelve principles for the formulation of the questions on the employment status. The principles concern various aspects like the order of questions (e.g., the question on the main status shall never precede the question on employment according to the ILO guidelines), the use of filter questions, the cues to be used in question wording, and the order of the response items. The aim of the twelve principles is to standardise question formulation, while leaving some degrees of freedom to take into account institutional and cultural differences across the member states in questionnaire construction.

Different results of recent research indicate that some of the principles might need some revision and further principles should be discussed. For example, a follow-up survey carried out by Destatis, the Federal Statistical Office Germany, showed that the questions on employment could be further optimised with regard to the measurement of small jobs. Other studies emphasised that the results on the employment status are subject to mode effects, especially comparing CAPI and CATI techniques. Furthermore, results on job search seem to depend upon question wording, question order and the use of filter questions. The paper outlines the harmonisation approach of the EU-LFS regarding employment status, presents recent relevant research and suggests issues for the future development of the principles.

Improving the Quality of Background Variables in the International Social Survey Programme (ISSP)

Scholz, Evi

Social Monitoring & Social Change: ISSP, GESIS

Mannheim, Germany

Keywords

socio-demographic variables, cross-national survey, harmonization

An ISSP module consists of two parts: the substantive questions and the ISSP background variables. In contrast to the substantive questionnaire with an input harmonisation approach where questions and related variables are developed by the ISSP in a joint effort, the ISSP background variables result from a more or less output harmonised approach.

From the very beginning of the ISSP in the 1980s, there was a set of obligatory background variables called the ISSP standard background variables. The measurement goals were stipulated but question wording, question order or construction rules were not fixed. Over the years, problems with the ISSP background variables originally developed for a small number of co-operating Western countries have occurred with the increasing number of ISSP members, nowadays coming from different cultures and from all around the world. Concerns about the ISSP background variables in this global context resulted in a review and revision process by the ISSP itself that is still in progress.

This presentation reports how the ISSP deals with these concerns about the compliance of the ISSP members' implementation of the ISSP background variables with the intended measurement goals. To improve its background variables the ISSP first required a detailed documentation of the construction process of the ISSP standard background variables from each individual ISSP member country. In a second step this ISSP member wide documentation was completely reviewed to learn about the problems. In a third step the analytical relevance of the ISSP background variables was examined to learn about the use of the ISSP background variables by the scientific community. Findings from these three steps contribute to the continuous improvement process of ISSP background variables and help to decide on far reaching changes of the ISSP background variables. The ISSP is currently updating its standard background variables and developing a comprehensive construction schema where basic information for each ISSP background variable and some guidelines to help ISSP members to construct the background variables in an appropriate way are included.

Information and Entertainment in Mass Media Systems. The Organization and Use of Television and Newspapers in Cross-National Perspective

Meulemann, Heiner

Wirtschafts- und Sozialwissenschaftliche Fakultät der Universität zu Köln, Forschungsinstitut für Soziologie Köln, Germany

Keywords

Cross-national Comparison, Mass Media, European Social Survey

As information and entertainment are the main axes of media gratification, their use should depend on the preference for information and for entertainment. In order to isolate the impact of both preferences, resources - such as leisure time - have to be controlled for. Informational and entertainment media use is analyzed as two choices: using newspapers rather than television, and using the political contents rather than other contents; the latter is considered for newspapers as well as for television. The main hypothesis are that the preference for information - measured by education, political interest and the value Universalism - has a positive, and the preference for entertainment - measured by the value Hedonism - has a negative effect on the informational media use, controlling for resources. These hypotheses are tested in 69 samples over 29 countries of the European social survey 2002, 2004, and 2006. To compare countries, variables measuring the public control of media systems are introduced. The following macro hypotheses are examined: Public control - measured by the types of media systems of Hallin / Mancini (2004) and by the audience share of public broadcasters - increases the informational media use; and it increases the positive effect of the preference for information on the informational media use and decreases the negative effect of the preference for entertainment on the informational media use, controlling for the media supply and the wealth of countries.

Two methodological problems will be discussed: (1) constructing indicators for media systems and (2) analyzing samples of the same country over time points, thereby creating dependency among samples in multi-level analyses.

Interviewer voice characteristics and productivity in telephone surveys

Best, Henning

*Faculty of Social Sciences, University of Mannheim
Mannheim, Germany*

Bauer, Gerrit

*Faculty of Social Sciences, University of Mannheim
Mannheim, Germany*

Steinkopf, Leander

*Faculty of Social Sciences, University of Mannheim
Mannheim, Germany*

Keywords

participation, nonresponse interviewer characteristics, voice, telephone survey

Telephone interviewing has gained great importance in empirical social research, as it enables fast and cost effective data-gathering as well as the use of random samples (in contrast to online surveys). Compared to face-to-face interviews, however, the response rates are relatively low. To gain extended understanding of the mechanisms behind unit nonresponse, this study relates response rates to interviewers' voice characteristics. We use contact data generated in a survey with 78 interviewers and 606 respondents (gross sample N=2227) and supplement these data with information interviewers' voices. The survey was conducted during 2007 and 2008 at the University of Mannheim, Germany. To obtain metadata, we recorded the interviewers' voices and analyzed the recordings using praat, a software for acoustic analysis. In a second step, each voice was evaluated on a number of subjective dimensions by 20 raters each (n=156). Using this combined dataset, we study the determinants of interviewer effectiveness with a special focus on objective voice characteristics (e.g. pitch, loudness etc). Additionally, we account for gender, local and foreign accent as well as a variety of subjective voice attributes (friendliness, trustworthiness etc). First results show that (a) objective voice characteristics have greater explanatory power than subjective indicators and (b) a differentiation by gender is indispensable to obtain valid results. Since subjective indicators are related to the objective measures and interviewer effectiveness only weakly, the further study of objective voice characteristics seems to be a worthwhile opportunity for future research.

Nationality, Citizenship, Race, Ethnicity and Migration as Socio-demographic Background Variables in Comparative Social Surveys

Hoffmeyer-Zlotnik, Juergen H.P.

Center for Survey Design and Methodology, GESIS - Leibniz-Institute for Social Sciences Germany,

Warner, Uwe

*ERDI, CEPS/INSTEAD
Differdange, Luxembourg*

Keywords

harmonization, ethnicity, socio-demographic variables

All European national states are characterized by reasonable proportions of resident people not belonging to the national majorities in the countries. In Luxembourg about 37% of the resident population are foreigners; in Estonia about 20% are non-nationals; and the EU-25 average across the member states reports about 5% of the population are foreigners in the countries.

In comparative surveys, we are interested in the social stratification of the European countries and the social inequalities of their population. An increasing mobility of people across the national borders raises the probability to include non-nationals in samples for social surveys. Also, the position of foreigners in stratified social structure and the different chances of integration into the host society becomes an important issue in social sciences.

Therefore we need to identify nationality, citizenship, ethnicity and the migration experience of survey respondents for the comparison of the European countries.

We propose a survey instrument that covers four dimensions constituting the ethnical inequality in the societies:

The first dimension is citizenship with the main information on the respondent's right to participate in the social and political life of the state coded as the interviewee's nationality. For non-nationals, this is completed by the residential status the respondent holds.

The second element covers race and ethnicity where we are interested in the self attributed membership of the respondent to the minority groups of the observed population.

The third dimension collects information on the origin of the surveyed person. The country of birth is the central information. In addition the year of arrival in the host society is of interest. In this section of the questionnaire we propose to ask about the naturalization.

The fourth useful variables inform about the use of languages at home; this can be interpreted as an indicator on "assimilation" to the host culture.

The fifth block on questions collects the information about the migration background.

On Trading Zones, Ecologies of Knowledge and Technological Change: Some Methodological Considerations towards Culturally Encompassing Socio-Historical Narratives

Mols, Sandra

*CITA and Faculty of Computer Science, University of Namur
Namur, Belgium*

Keywords

technological change, methodology, Sociology and history of science and technology

In this paper, I develop a methodological reflection - inspired by empirical research on the diffusion of modern computing in Europe - on ways of constructing culturally encompassing multi-factorial socio-historical analyses of technological change processes that account for the complexity of the social and cultural processes of technology appropriation and normalisation. I will discuss towards that end, on the one hand, the concepts of "trading zone" and "intercalated periodisation", introduced by P.L. Galison in his "Image and Logic" towards the writing of encompassing culturally and epistemologically-concerned narratives on the history of physics, and, on the other hand, that of "ecology of knowledge" proposed by A. Akera, e.g. in his "Calculating a Natural World" - following on from Galison - towards exploration of computing history in the context of the early Cold War. In a second stage, I will outline a proposal for a combined, integrated, usage of the "trading zone", "intercalated periodisation" and "ecology of knowledge" concepts towards assisting exploration of technological change as socio-historico-cultural process in which micro, meso and global history issues would be potentially accounted for and related to one another. These discussion and proposal will be inspired by other existing analytical methodological tools and concepts developed towards the exploration of social systems and societies under processes of technologisation. Among these concepts: 'technological regime' (Kemp and van den Ende), 'practice' (Galison, Hacking, Shapin, Schaffer), 'hybridity' and 'heterogeneity' (Galison, Latour), 'bifurcation' (Serres), 'trajectoire technologique' (Tissot, Veyrassat), 'habitus' (Bourdieu), 'boundary object' and 'institutional ecology' (Leigh Star, Griesemer).

Proposal for harmonisation of Slovenian Labour Force Survey microdata

Stebe, Janez

*Social sciences data archives, University of Ljubljana
Ljubljana, Slovenia*

Znidarsici, Erika

Demography and Social Statistics, Statistical Office of the Republic of Slovenia Ljubljana, Slovenia

Smrekar, Tomaz

Dissemination of Statistical Data and Methods, Statistical Office of the Republic of Slovenia Ljubljana, Slovenia

Keywords

Slovenia, labour force survey, scientific use microdata, longitudinal series, Ex-post harmonisation

Labour force survey is conducted in various institutional setting and with some shifts in research design and variables content from 1989 onwards. In later period, from 1997, it relatively stabilise under the auspices of the Statistical Office of the Republic of Slovenia (SURS). It contain rotated panel sample design. And it has been calibrated to a EUROSTAT common reporting requirement. A proposal for harmonisation starts from the premises of benefits that could be achieved if the added value data set is prepared ready made for complex analysis requirements of scientific community.

Problems that has to be addressed during the implementation phase, which is planed for 2010, are how to satisfy strict confidentiality requirements that SURS impose over its microdata, how to select, document and efficiently monitor the process of harmonisation, including use of conceptual metadata model and tools, and finally how to train new users, make the data widely accessible and promote advanced analysis of enhanced data set.

A proposed collaboration among statistical agency, data archives and members of scientific community could serve as a model for future collaboration on a common cause of data access provision.

Reasons for refusals and their collection: Lessons learned from a content analysis of interviewers' notices in contact protocols

Menold, Natalja

CSDM, GESIS Leibniz Institute for the Social Sciences

<http://www.gesis.org/sites/default/files/168/168.pdf>

Zuell, Cornelia

CSDM, GESIS Leibniz Institute for the Social Sciences

Mannheim, Germany

Keywords

interviewer, contact protocols, reasons for refusals

Refusals are an important source of non-response in surveys. During field work some surveys collect reasons for refusal in call record data. The European Social Survey even provides such data for secondary research. In addition to providing interesting information for research these data can also reveal some information about non-respondents which could be used to reduce refusals. But, some questions should be posed on the collection of this information: Do people who refuse state valid reasons or only excuses? Is there some usable information? Is there a valid collection of the data? Here two aspects are included: validity of categories used by interviewers and accuracy of data collection done by the interviewer. These questions are handled in this paper. Notices by interviewers regarding reasons for refusals were analysed with the help of content analysis. The data used were provided in call record protocols for the Germany General National Survey (ALLBUS 2008). Prior to this we analysed reasons for refusals in ESS and found that the numbers of undifferentiated outcomes ranged broadly between 0% and 50% across the rounds and countries. Additionally, there were only marginal numbers of several reasons of refusals in numerous countries. ESS applied a category list which included 10 to 13 categories for the collection of reasons for refusals in different rounds. The categories of ESS (blue print and categories applied in Germany) were used as a starting point for the content analysis of interviewers' notices in ALLBUS. We found numerous new categories, while the percentage of "other" was 1.4%. Additionally, less occupied ESS-categories were marginally occupied in ALLBUS data also. On the basis of these results a schema of categories was developed and applied for the further analysis of ALLBUS 2008 data. Here, correlations with socio-demographics of interviewers as well as interviewer variance were taken into account to find any evidence regarding the question of interviewer impact on data collection. Finally, the results were discussed in light of the posed research questions, the usability of developed schema in surveys, as well as in relation to further research on the topic.

The intercultural dialogue

Stadler, Sabine

none, free lance social scientist to the EC; Austrian ministry of foreign affairs and lower Austria 1010 WIEN, AUSTRIA

Keywords

Migration, comparative rresearch, EU research

The European social sciences developed a large amount of qualitative studies and methods in the field of comparative methods. The qualitative methods are divided into three parts:

- comparative narrative methods interviews in literal style
- observers reports and memory reports of observers on events of the past
- and the intercultural dialogue under the premisses of the EU enlargement as a principal of social sciences and education in order to work together.

All three methods have their own tradition and past and are part of an international improvement on research in Europe. My investigation will treat the research-principles on intercultural dialogue, the use of it and the methods implied. How do Europeans politics refer officially on it and what to do in social-sciences in it. The I will investigate the impact and the influence of social sciences in research and teaching in the field of sociology and history and in how far the method of intercultural dialogue is used and in how far the theory - creation is used.

The German speaking sciences have implemented the intercultural dialogue as a must in the school -education, migration work and cultural work, wherever it appears from literature to theatre, and social-sciences to investigate and make research on it.

Is there a difference among the European member-states how to use the contact and cultural difference and what impact it has on the national consciousness is a second problem the minority politics on the Balkans, like all states with minorities have this method in their policy.

The third part is dedicated to the general utterance of famous social-scientist in the field of intercultural dialogues of oral history and migrations research.

The life-phase as a socio-demographic variable for international comparisons

Komp, Kathrin

Sociology, VU University Amsterdam, Netherlands

Hoffmeyer-Zlotnik, Jürgen H.P.

*Center for Survey Design & Methodology, GESIS - Leibniz Institute for the Social Sciences
Mannheim, Germany*

Keywords

europe, gender differences, socio-demographic variable, life-phase, country differences

International comparisons often strive to compare persons in similar situations across countries. In those comparisons, a person's age is frequently used to determine the situation a person is in. While information on a person's age is readily available, it only allows for limited conclusions on the situation a person is in. This is because age is a proxy-variable, which means that the researcher needs to specify what he or she assumes age to stand for. What age stands for, however, differs between and within countries. Women, for example, often retire earlier than men do, and the French, as another example, tend to retire earlier than Danes do. To improve our understanding of the situation a person is in, we suggest replacing age with a different socio-demographic variable: the life-phase.

A life-phase is a longer-lasting situation most persons encounter within their lives. In the beginning of the 21st century, persons in western societies are generally assumed to pass four distinct life-phases within their lives: (1) youth, which is the time of education and socialization, (2) middle-age, which is the time of paid work and raising children, (3) young old, which is the time retirees spend in good health, and (4) old old, which are the last years of life spent in poor health. While there is general consensus about the concept of the life-phases, their operationalization is disputed. The reason are gender- and country-differences in what a suitable operationalization should look like. Examples for such differences are the more prominent role of raising children within women's lives than within men's, and the existence of a long-term care insurance in Austria and Germany, which puts informal care in a different context in those countries.

In our presentation, we suggest a gender- and country-sensitive operationalization of life-phases. Furthermore, we apply the suggested operationalization on international survey data. The results allow for quickly gaining an impression of a person's life situation and of the commonness of life-situations within a population.

The modified question for the income measurement in the European Social Survey

Warner, Uwe

LCDBA, CEPS/INSTEAD

Differdange, Luxembourg

Hoffmeyer-Zlotnik, Jürgen HP

Center for Survey Design and Methodology, GESIS - Leibniz Institute for the Social Sciences

Mannheim, Germany

Keywords

measurement, income, survey questionnaire, ess

In social surveys the measurement of "total net household income" is influenced by

- the household definition and size,
- the respondent's family relation to the main income earner,
- the main source of income,
- the income composition, and
- the respondent's capability to remember income element.

Comparing the household income across countries, these impacts are obvious and visible in the first round of the European Social Survey. The data collection of ESS did not consider the different national income distributions and did not take into account the various national concepts of income for the operationalization of the income questions.

In the fourth round of the interviews for ESS, the survey coordinators took up parts of our suggestions and modified the national income questions.

This presentation shows the modifications of the fieldwork instruments and illustrates the improvements for the quality of the income measure.

Towards a European comparative multidimensional analysis of collective action

Nunes, Nuno

*Sociology, CIES/ISCTE
Lisbon, Portugal*

Pereira, Ines

*Sociology, CIES/ISCTE
Lisbon, Portugal*

Keywords

collective action, comparative analysis, indicators of collective action

This paper focus on collective action, considering three main dimensions: labour participation, political participation and involvement in associations. It aims to present a set of data concerning collective action practices on a group of European countries. Drawing upon "European Social Survey" data, combined with a lot of dispersed micro-data that will be gathered for the selected countries, it will discuss the new methodological possibilities offered by the quantitative analysis of this issue, combining a bunch of disaggregated data that are usually not probed altogether by contemporaneous sociology. So, it intends to contribute to a new transnational perspective of sociological analysis of European collective action, both in the methodological level (offering a set of coherent, comparable data) and in the theoretical one, proposing a "typology of collective action" and the building of a set of comparable "indicators of collective action".

Unit-nonresponse - empirical findings of an experiment

Haunberger, Sigrid

Department of Sociology of Education, Institute of Education Switzerland, http://edu.unibe.ch/content/abs/mitarbeitende/index\_ger.html

Keywords

unit-nonresponse, theory of planned behavior, subjective expected utility theory

The main objective of the presentation is to answer the relevant question for social research, why some people participate in a scientific survey and others refuse to participate.

The so-called unit-nonresponse, i.e. the systematic denial of a person to participate in a scientific survey, presents a central problem in social research, since it can be a crucial source of selective sampling.

Results of the existing nonresponse literature are very often based on demographic variables, from which reasons for participation are often speculatively deduced. Social decision-making mechanisms of the respondent's decisions thus remain unexplained. To answer the central research question, the causes for the participation or non-participation in surveys must be uncovered.

The two relevant models of participation behaviour in social research - the Theory of Planned Behaviour by Fishbein and Ajzen (1975; see Ajzen and Fishbein 1973; Ajzen 1991) and the theory of action (based on the theory of subjective expected utility) by Esser (1974, 1984, 1986 und 1990) explain the unit-nonresponse as a result of an individual decision of the respondents.

Using an experimental design, surveying 600 students at the University of Berne (classroom survey; random selection of courses), the relevant theoretical expectations, evaluations and attitudes toward scientific surveys were collected. At the end of the questionnaire, students were asked to provide their e-mail addresses so that results could be sent to them. By use of these e-mail addresses, students were asked to participate in an online survey on drug use. The actual participation is explained by the previously collected theoretical constructs.

Overall, through this complex theory based and empirically informed design, we hope to answer the question why people in scientific surveys do participate and others do not.

Value differences and transnational social trust

Kleiner, Tuuli-Marja

*Soziologie IV, Universität in Hagen
Hagen, Germany*

Keywords

value differences, cultural similarity, transnational social trust

Social trust approaches assume that trust is based upon common political and societal values. Commitment to a group sharing the same family and work orientations produces feelings of obligation and responsibility and fosters senses of respect, thoughtfulness and common identity.

For the transnational realm, it can be hypothesized that cultural similarities and differences affect attribution of trustworthiness to other nations and their citizens.

Using data from the EUROBAROMETER (1996) and EUROPEAN VALUE SURVEY (2001) it can be shown that there is a significant coherence between differences in value orientations and transnational social trust.

At the first step "objectified" distances between national communities are calculated. For each country, individual value orientations can be aggregated and averaged to a so-called value climate, so that for each national community there is a certain climate value per orientation dimension. The distance between two countries is measured by the absolute differences - or alternatively Euklid Distance - of their value climates. These distances are identified with data from the EVS. Likewise, data from Eurobarometer 46.0 are used in order to attain a measure for trust intensity between countries in Europe.

Coherencies between objectified value distances among countries and trust intensity are estimated. It is expected that value similarity is positively correlated with social trust.

As expected, results on the macro level show significant correlations between value differences and social trust.

At the next step, it is questioned whether the effects remain stable when controlling for micro indicators within multi-level models. Again, Eurobarometer is used to measure the extent to which individuals from one country trust citizens from different other European countries.

Here also the assumption is verified. Results show that value distances between national communities are relevant indicators for transnational attribution of trustworthiness.

However, they also indicate that not all values are meaningful in explaining transnational evaluating processes. Whereas some value differences show no effect, others - like different gender conceptions or attitudes towards democracy - play a major role.

Altogether the findings lead to the conclusion that values that clearly signify the degree of modernization (performances in economic, political and welfare achievements) systemically affect transnational social trust.

RN22

Sociology of Risk and Uncertainty

"European Society or European Societies?" - exploring divisions of age and class through attitudes to risk and uncertainty in play

Navidi, Ute

International Play Association: Promoting the Child's Right to Play, The London region children's charity London Play London, United Kingdom

Keywords

children, risk-taking, litigation, inter-generational, cotton-wool culture

Risk-taking in play offers children a way of being "in control of being out of control and so enjoy a sense of both risk and mastery simultaneously"(Gordon & Esbjorn-Hargens, 2007). Inter-generational shifts underlie the transition to a risk society. We will explore contemporary attitudes of children and adults in the UK towards risk and why risk is important in developing children's ability to assess risks and uncertainty, and foster resilience.

Past generations of children often built their own play environments. But children's habitat has shrunk significantly; streets belong to adults and cars. Traditional local social networks and public playable space have diminished. Public attitudes to risk and institutional risk-averseness can cripple the development of exciting play opportunities. A 2008 survey shows 51% of children aged 7-12 years are not allowed to climb a tree without adult supervision.

Gill (2007) argued that tackling risk aversion in childhood is as pressing for public policy as global issues. Alongside mounting evidence indicating the adverse effects of lack of risk taking opportunities, public policy is gradually changing. The message, from the Royal Society for the Prevention of Accidents to the Department for Children, Schools and Families, is that a "cotton-wool culture" is holding children back. A balance has to be struck between concerns for children's overall welfare and a need to keep them physically active.

However, great confusion remains about striking the right balance. Parents who take a more relaxed view of their children's independent outdoor play, or those less able to supervise their children due to economic pressures, often face peer criticisms. And local play providers still fear litigation should accidents occur.

Lester and Russell's 2008 comprehensive literature review indicates that current social policy is rooted in the risk-focused prevention paradigm, arguing that children need strong social networks, managed exposure to risk and acute (rather than chronic) stressors, and the opportunity to experience control, agency and mastery.

Making children's world too safe, we risk creating new generations of children and young people who are ill-prepared, less capable and self-reliant, and therefore actually more prone to physical and social harm later in life.

"Prevention of Terror", or "Terror of Prevention"? Victimization, Risk and Regulation Amongst Young British Muslims

Mythen, Gabe

Sociology and Social Policy, University of Liverpool Liverpool, Uk

Keywords

identity, Risk, Victimization, terrorism

Since the events of the 11th September 2001, Muslim minority groups have been subjected to pervasive scrutiny in the UK. The July 7th 2005 attacks committed by British nationals have led to young Pakistani males in particular being party to intensified modes of monitoring, surveillance and intervention by crime and security agencies. The introduction of multiple forms of counter-terrorism regulation by the State has been underpinned by discourses of (in)security - promulgated in media and political spheres - which have defined British Muslims en bloc as a risky, suspect population. Widespread concerns have been raised about the ways in which counter-terrorism regulations have impacted on the rights and liberties of ethnic minority groups. Young British Pakistanis in particular are presently maintaining their identities in an environment in which they are simultaneously cast as a threat to national security and invited to integrate more readily with "core British values". Against this wider backdrop, this paper presents the findings from a study investigating the effects of victimization and marginalization on identity construction amongst young British Muslims in the North-West of England. In this paper we elaborate three focal themes from our study. Firstly, we examine the ways in which media representations of Muslims are connected to wider stereotypes that present Muslims as "other". Second, we elucidate the ways in which young British Muslims have been subject to deeper forms of racist victimization as a consequence of their amplified risk status in relation to national security. Finally, we explore the wider consequences of this victimization for identity management, free movement and social engagement in the public sphere.

"So What Do You Mean by «Risk», Anyway UK Stakeholder Knowledge of Food Chain Risks

Cassidy, Angela

*Consumer Science, Institute for Food Research
Norwich, UK*

Maule, John

Leeds University Business School, University of Leeds Leed, UK

Keywords

participation, food risks, methodology, risk communication

This paper will report on recent research investigating differential understandings of food chain risk amongst a range of UK stakeholders in food and food production, including food scientists and risk regulators farmers NGO workers and food campaigners food industry representatives and members of community groups. We were interested in comparing how these stakeholder groups understood risk and risk management across the food chain, with a view to ultimately improving the ways in which these risks are communicated. An innovative visual research method, known as fuzzy felt, was used to elicit focus group discussions of food risk. Participants were asked to work together to produce an image of the food chain, upon which they marked where and what the major risks were, and the steps to be taken to manage them.

We found that this method successfully supported group exploration of the complex issues at hand amongst participants with very different levels of familiarity with food production. The images produced were analysed alongside transcripts of group discussions, in order to show how participants conceptualise the food chain, where and what the risks are, and how these risks should be managed. The research has found that the complexity and scope of stakeholder knowledge of food chain risks is highly variable and solidly grounded in social, political, economic and ethical contexts. Furthermore, we found wide variation in stakeholders concepts of risk itself, and striking differences in awareness of how food risks are managed and regulated. By creating a situation where participants themselves can set the agenda on risk, this research highlights the potential shortcomings of traditional, expert-led, risk communication approaches. We explore the potential of this approach for participatory risk communication and management, and reflect upon the implications of these findings for the constructed and negotiated nature of «risk» itself.

'Insurer of last resort' and 'Lender of last resort': exploring continuity and discontinuity in UK governmental risk regulation

McGuinness, Martina

Management, University of Sheffield Sheffield, England

Keywords

terrorism, risk regulation, banking, insurance

This paper explores the role of the UK Government as a key actor in facilitating complex risk management processes in a risk society paradigm. Comparing and contrasting the UK Government's response to terrorism and banking crises, as insurer of last resort and lender of last resort respectively, this paper seeks to provide insights into UK regulatory responses to economic threat in the late twentieth and early twenty-first centuries.

It is argued that terrorism and banking are particularly apposite vehicles for deriving insights into shifting paradigms of risk as they encapsulate elements of continuity and discontinuity, most notably in aspects of form, impact and actors. They represent a modern variant of traditional or "old" risk. This modern variant reflects the transforming social and political context within which these risks present - a changing context driven by key themes of advanced modernity (Beck, 1992; 1998; Castells, 1996), such as increased complexity, embedded inter-connectivity and the globalisation of both markets and risk.

Whilst seeking to provide institutional stability and allay the fears of key stakeholders, the paper recognises that Government intervention may have the potential for unintended consequences. Arguably, this reflects the dynamic and complex nature of these risks in late modernity. The comparisons explored illustrate key challenges facing institutional actors such as uncertainty and the limits of knowledge (Ericson & Doyle, 2004; O'Malley, 2004) as well as more traditional concerns of moral hazard and contagion (Schwartz, 2002). These factors have significant repercussions upon accepted norms of "calculability" as well as "insurability", the traditional cornerstones of rational risk regulation response.

'No, thanks' or 'Yes, please'? Social Perceptions of Nuclear Power in Lithuania

Balzekiene, Aiste

*Department of Sociology, Kaunas University of Technology
Kaunas, Lithuania*

Rinkevicius, Leonardas

*Department of Sociology, Kaunas University of Technology
Kaunas, Lithuania*

Keywords

risk perception, Lithuania, nuclear power, public attitudes

This paper aims to reveal what social, economic and environmental concerns are reflected in nuclear risk perceptions and what context specific factors are shaping public attitudes towards nuclear power in Lithuania.

This paper is based on the results of representative public opinion survey (N=1000), conducted in 2008 for the project "Risk perceptions, public communication and innovative governance in knowledge society" (RINOVA), funded by the Lithuanian State Science and Studies Foundation (for period of 2007-2009). The research is using complex theoretical and methodological model to explain risk perceptions of technological and environmental issues.

Placed in the scope of various environmental and technological threats, nuclear power risks are perceived as lower than the risks from e.g. food preservatives or ozone layer depletion. That leads to the search for specific contextual factors that shape public opinions on nuclear power in Lithuania, as surveys in other countries indicate that nuclear risks are usually rated among the highest in comparison with other technological threats/ issues. Such contextual factors include mainly concerns of energy and economic independence from external sources, leaving environmental concerns, such as radioactive waste storage or threat of possible accident of lower public concern.

Paper also discusses the issues of trust, knowledge, and social amplification shaping public attitudes towards nuclear power dilemmas in Lithuania.

A changing balance between risk management and rehabilitation? A discourse analysis of prison regimes in Switzerland since 1970

Young, Christopher

Social Work and Social Policy, University of Fribourg

Fribourg, Switzerland

Keywords

management of risk, punishment, rehabilitation, discourse

Punitiveness and security have become defining features of many Western criminal justice systems since the 1970s (Garland 2001). In the field of corrections, Feeley and Simon (1992) posit the development of a «new penology» centred on the management of risks rather than on rehabilitation or punishment as a moral imperative. «Management» suggests that the reformation of offenders is considered to be unlikely, thus discharging state agencies of responsibility for recidivism. In a seeming paradox, therapeutic instruments continue to be employed in correctional settings. They are, however, increasingly based on rationalities of choice, transferring the responsibility for success to offenders and ignoring structural conditions of (criminal) action (Krasmann 2000, Moore and Hannah-Moffat 2005).

In Switzerland similar demands for increased punitiveness and security have repeatedly received popular support at the ballot box in recent years, e.g. the introduction of mandatory life-long imprisonment for certain sexual offenders. One could thus expect to find a weakening of the rehabilitative ideal in the corrections system. Rehabilitation, however, still figures prominently as a central objective of imprisonment in Swiss criminal law and in prison officers' descriptions of prison regimes.

This paper asks how the balance between risk management and rehabilitation has changed in Swiss correctional institutions. To that end, a qualitative analysis of internal prison documents from several decades such as staff regulations and minutes of staff meetings has been done. The analysis reconstructs discourse and discursive practices concerning rehabilitation, responsibility and risk. We analyze how risks are framed and related to rehabilitative efforts as well as how criminological conceptions and particularly concepts of the offender have developed.

First results show that a considerable commitment and allocation of resources to rehabilitation can be found throughout the period. Rehabilitative practices in a broad sense have, however, been criticised or modified based on changing perceptions of risk. Officers and prison administrations decisions concerning risk are in part based on a system of classification in which nationality has become an important dimension. The defining trend seems to be the increasing emphasis being placed on the offender's responsibility for the success of rehabilitation, thus subtly changing the meaning of rehabilitation.

A Sociology of Risk and Uncertainty

Zinn, Jens

School of Social and Political Sciences, University of Melbourne Melbourne, Australia

Keywords

Risk, theory, uncertainty

Since risk entered the sociological agenda a number of different theoretical approaches and controversial discussions refer to "risk" as their core object of research. However, many researchers doubt that there is a shared object of research. Environmental sociologists or disaster researchers even claim that they already cover the risk agenda. With this presentation I will try to line out what problems and research questions are in the core of a Sociology of Risk and Uncertainty and how this perspective might differ from other perspectives on risk. It is also an attempt to show how different theoretical approaches contribute to the heterogeneous agenda of sociological theorizing on risk and uncertainty.

An "ideal-type" of trust? Using Schutz to relate trust in systems to trust in individual professionals in the context of mental health services

Brown, Partick

School of Social Policy, Sociology and Social Research, University of Kent Canterbury, United Kingdom

Calnan, Michael

School of Social Policy, Sociology and Social Research, University of Kent Canterbury, UK

Keywords

trust, healthcare, Schutz

Trust in healthcare systems, and indeed individual professionals, has received much recent attention and a significant literature now exists. Research suggests that perceptions of individuals and the systems within which they work are related, but neither necessary nor sufficient in explaining one another. Though clearly defined and differentiated, there is a lack of theory which reconciles trust in systems with trust in individual experts in explaining why some may trust the individual but not the system, or vice versa. Giddens, for example, suggests confidence in systems is extended into specific inter-personal scenarios but this does not aid in explaining such conflicting trust perspectives. Moreover whilst facework at the "access points" is described as being decisive, there is little explanation as to why this is the case. This paper uses the phenomenology of Alfred Schutz to analyse this relationship and in particular applies his concept of "ideal-types" as a means of understanding the building blocks of inferential knowledge through which trust functions.

Trust - either in healthcare systems or individual professionals - involves the application of "ideal-typical" assumptions. Such assumptions are made as to the motives and capabilities of institutions - inferred from limited knowledge and experience. Similarly, beliefs are constructed regarding the competency and care of practitioners based on ideal-typical notions of how such characteristics appear as embodied by an individual. So whilst the extent to which trust is either "assumed" or "conditional" may vary between when it is directed towards institutions or individuals, the inferential process is the same. Rather it is the nature of ideal-typical knowledge being applied which varies and Schutz clarifies why some such knowledge may be more "concrete" and therefore compelling than others.

The context of mental healthcare is used as an illustration, especially as it is a domain where issues of mistrust in healthcare institutions may be especially salient for service-users.

An Intersubjective Approach to the Social Amplification of Zoonotic Risk

Duckett, Dominic

Management Science, Lancaster University Management School Lancaster, United Kingdom

Keywords

Social Amplification of Risk, SARF, zoonosis, intersubjectivity, risk perception

Zoonotic risks, for example "bird flu", exhibit rich social contours linking human well being to animals in complex relationships. The Social Amplification of Risk Framework or SARF (Kasperson, Renn et al. 1988) portrays risks following consequential trajectories under the influence of "social stations of amplification". "Amplification" is held to be a phenomenon whereby perceptions of risks "that experts assess as relatively low..." (Kasperson, Kasperson et al. 2003:13) become heightened over time leading to serious consequences such as economic losses.

We visited "stations" looking for the risk amplifiers and found none: We conducted grounded, qualitative research within the institutions tasked with the management of zoonotic risk, with the media widely charged by SARF exponents as being amplifiers, and within other lay and expert groups, looking at how these actors understood zoonotic hazards and we found that no group or individual saw themselves as amplifiers of risk. What we did find were subjects readily identifying "amplification stations" elsewhere. Subjects pointed the finger at other individuals, groups, or institutions and accused them of disproportionate response to risk.

Our findings are consistent with Rayner's reservations about SARF (1988): That it naively implies an initial, objective level of risk, reifying risk and placing it outside the social system subject only to "amplification" once it enters that system. But as Rayner correctly states; "neither risk nor information are things; They are complex relationships..." (ibid:202) Our data shows "amplification" to be useful as a relational concept.

As data was gathered a picture developed of actors concerned not exclusively with risk objects, for example the highly pathogenic avian influenza, but also significantly concerned with other actors, for example, the Bernard Mathews operation. Actors saw other actors variously downplaying risks or exaggerating them for a complex variety of reasons.

This view of disproportionate risk perception and risk related behaviour as an intersubjective phenomenon transcends the limitations of SARF's of signal/receiver metaphor, and the theoretically problematic implication that risk signals have an objective value. It further promises progress toward building "the capacity to identify relationships between the various components of SARF" (Breakwell and Barnett 2003:84) by exploring how "stations" coexist.

Between work and non-work. Risk transitions through life stories and everyday life

Murgia, Annalisa

*Sociology and Social Research, University of Trento
Trento, Italy*

Keywords

work, narratives, biographies, Risk Transitions

The paper aims to analyze the critical transitions intersecting the work careers and the methodological implications concerning the study of risk biographies. Trying to understand some of the changes of contemporary labour markets (such as flexible and immaterial work and fragmentation of professional identities), different theoretical models have been proposed, but the emphasis, in most of these studies, is on the "chances" offered by new work and professional paths, forgetting the risks to which less competitive, professionalized and "attractive" workers are exposed.

In this contribution, on the contrary, I want instead offering an analysis of contemporary work trajectories that is not limited to the contractual and economic dimension, but that takes into account a variety of fields and spheres of life that are articulated in different ways, events and representations that inspire people's action. This approach is motivated by the awareness that in today's social context, marked by swift changes and the growth of work and social precariousness, it is more and more difficult to identify biographical sequences marked by consistency and predictability.

From a methodological perspective, the attention goes to the development of methods for the narrative analysis of risk transitions. The reading criterium assumes the actor as sense maker, who interprets retrospectively the shifts and the events of his/her life, defining its significance with his/her own principles. For this reason narrative analysis is an outstanding tool to describe how the actors ascribe meaning to the changes and how they reconstruct the shattered order, allowing both a longitudinal analysis of the biographical transitions in the life stories, and the analysis of the everyday transitions (between paid work, unpaid work and private life).

My reflection will found particularly on the analysis of fifty narrative interviews with men and women working in the Italian public administration. I have chosen this particular sector on one side because it represents one of the new paradigmatic sectors of the present configuration of precariousness in Europe; on the other because it is a sector in which women are highly overrepresented, showing the high gender segregation and stratification in the European labour markets.

Changes in Global Strategy of Fighting on Terror from Bush to Barack Obama Strategies

Włodzimierz, Chojnack

Sociology, University of Wrocław

Wrocław, Poland

Keywords

transition, intangibles, reinforce, homeland, cognitive

In this speech I am trying to show and explain how important are the consequences of transformation from the Bush strategy of fighting on terror to the B. Obama strategy on active role of foreign policy and economic cooperation in global dimension. Moreover, in my speech, I would like to present the outline of model facilitating the measurement of intangibles of security at several levels.

The global strategy of fighting on terror by "sword and fire" implemented by former US president G.W. Bush was the attempt of military solving the problem and also the attempt of rebuilding the psychical sphere as a result of the unprecedented in the entire US history terrorist attack on Sept. 11. 2001. The Bush global strategy was only true by its name, since in reality it was limited to active military fighting in Iraq and Afghanistan. The war waged in Iraq gave partial effects in the area of a democratic stability and simultaneously led to reinforcing the terrorist groups in Afghanistan and Pakistan.

At present the US is apparently forced to conduct more active foreign policy oriented toward international cooperation in the sphere of security as well as focusing upon homeland security, among other things, because of transforming the financial crisis into the economic one, which may be enlarged to a social sphere.

In practice, it means the necessity of changing strategy on fighting global terrorism conducted by the B. Obama administration. This change will probably rely on transition from "hard" to "soft" methods, what in reality is manifested as departing from the power to political solutions. These changes are perceived in submitting proposals on reducing the Weapon of Mass Destruction (WMD) and broader political, economic cooperation not only with the UE countries but also with Russia, China and India. What constitutes a great challenge for these states.

In the measure of homeland security one can notice some attempts made to strengthen the role of statehood in financial, automobile, health and social care sectors.

Condominiums, Risk and Quality of Life. A discussion (also) about the City - a trip over the contradictory space

Martins, Marta

*Departamento de Sociologia, ISCTE - Instituto Superior de Ciências do Trabalho e da Empresa
Lisboa, Portugal*

Keywords

Risk, safety, security, Closed condominium, Gated community

Absent, in Portugal, of a clear legal agreement, the notion of closed (or private) condominium report to a whole of architectural, social and symbolic heterogeneities, usually -but not exclusively- associated to a mode of formal aggregation of closed vicinities.

Its rising and expansion has gathered a notorious public visibility and a markedly little consensual one.

Dwelling without city or sheltered nests in a menacing environment, redoubts of withdrawal or laboratories of what some designate as "private urban governance", the phenomenon invites us to question Space, City and Democracy, this being a strategic issue when discussing the city we (think we) have and the ideal one to live in.

Based on theoretical and fieldwork performed in Lisbon's Metropolitan Area - in which a dialogue has been analytically established between agents/actors diversely associated to the social production/appropriation of these sort of dwelling (from residents to local decision/policy makers) - we travel among the space of contents associated to the idea of closed condominium, namely in what concerns to: the material and symbolic marks which operate the distinction between these and other sorts of residential developments and the reasons/impacts underlying its rising and expansion.

Besides points of rupture, some mutual understandings and consensus arise, enlightening a catalogue of concerns/claims/demands about the present city, shared by confessed its adepts and assumed oppositionists.

The analysis of these elements question the causal relationship often established between security, fear and the expansion of closed condominiums - a strong component of an ideal-type of gated community that connects worldwide expressions and discussions of the phenomenon.

Bearing in mind that a menace is something socially and culturally mediated (Kasperson), it also asks us to clarify the non equivalent notions of security, safety and control of uncertainty - this being an important issue when discussing how to incorporate the daily life assertions of fear, risk and uncertainty in Urban Policy.

Finally, the presentation shares some results that reveal the contradictory images of closed condominiums, seen either as places of safety, security and reliability, but also as spots of danger, exposition, transgression and social amplification of risk.

Coping with Precariousness - Household Strategies between Objective Constraints and Subjective Scope of Action

Amacker, Michèle

*Social Work and Social Policy, University of Fribourg
Switzerland, <http://www.unifr.ch/travsoc/d/>*

Schief, Sebastian

*Social Work and Social Policy, University of Fribourg
Switzerland, <http://www.unifr.ch/travsoc/d/>*

Budowski, Monica

*Social Work and Social Policy, University of Fribourg
Switzerland, <http://www.unifr.ch/travsoc/d/>*

Keywords

Welfare State, household strategies, precariousness, comparative

In recent years the concept of "precariousness" (précarité) has become very prominent within research on social inequality. "Precariousness" can be characterized by fundamental uncertainty: a further social decline, a persistence in this insecurity or even a (re-)advancement into a secure social position are possible (Kraemer 2008). Although numerous studies on households in poverty and their respective "survival strategies" do exist, only a few analyze the actual precariousness of specific groups of the population and their coping strategies. Due to latest research results (Farago et al. 2005) not only objective factors (e.g. low income) have an influence on the choice of coping strategies, but also do subjective factors (e.g. the perception of one's own social position) play an essential role. Our contribution focuses on those subjective factors.

Our analysis is based on two methods: By means of qualitative data from Chile, Spain and Switzerland the household strategies as well as the motives and the perceptions of these households will be analyzed. Within the project "A Comparative Perspective on Strategies of Households in Precarious Living Conditions in Four Countries" financed by the Swiss National Science Foundation (SNF) extensive qualitative data about precarious living conditions have been collected. We analyze opinions about and expectations towards the state - or more specific the welfare state - by means of data provided by the International Social Survey Programme (ISSP, 44 countries) concerning the "role of government". The aim of the analysis is to estimate the strength of the influence of objective circumstances and the attitudes towards the (welfare) state on coping strategies of precarious households.

First findings indicate that household strategies vary according to the perception of the role of the state in terms of social security, employment or health and education responsibilities as well as according to the institutional arrangements itself. Furthermore, opportunity structures (e.g. the local labour market or the social security system) influence the choice of a specific strategy. Therefore they have a massive influence on how uncertainty is handled. Nevertheless, every single household has a relatively wide (subjective) scope of action in developing specific strategies against precariousness within these objective constraints.

Dangerous relationships between the autonomy and the nationalism on Upper Silesia (Poland) ? the risk or the cultural capital?

Sekula, Elisabeth Anne

Department of Culture and Communication, Warsaw School of Social Sciences and Humanities Poland,

Keywords

minority, autonomy, cultural capital, nationalism

I would like to undertake the subject matter of potentially dangerous relationships between the aspiration to the regional autonomy and the national matter (on the example of Upper Silesia in Poland).

The problem relates to both various types of political and social risk as well as to specific forms of the cultural capital, which is often hidden behind activities of groups having suchlike claims. Additionally, the case of Upper Silesia one can tie with other analogous examples in Europe, and the analysis of the case shows the problems which should the sociologists and social anthropologists face with.

In Upper Silesia the autonomous tendencies are attached with the historically motivated sense of the cultural and lingual separateness which in the last period of time gains also the national dimension. In case of Upper Silesia we deal with the crisis of the certain habit of thinking about the national state with which not all groups can identify themselves, as they are seeking other references for their own collective self-identity. Such situation ties with the crisis of the definition of the statehood and the understanding of the nation, can be taken therefore as the risk.

On the other hand the situation can become the moment of the crisis and of shaping new structures and values. In postmodern world, as more and more often we notice the disappearance of communities of the type Gemeinschaft; such manner of building of the collective identity seems a specific answer of individuals seeking their own ego to the (post)modern problems. In case of Silesians the interesting and specific items are also the accepted forms of the cultural and social activity.

Are therefore Silesians aspirations a threat for the Polish state or rather they are still one more example showing the direction, in which seems to aim Europe? And how the answer to this question we can be inscribe into fundamental, interesting for us context: European Society or European Societies?

Dealing with Climate Change Related Uncertainties: Shifts in Flood Protection Policies in the Tisza River Basin

Banaszak, Ilona

Institute for Forecasting, Slovak Academy of Sciences Bratislava, Slovak Republic

Matczak, Piotr

Institute for Agricultural and Forest Environment, Polish Academy of Sciences Poland, <http://www.socjologia.amu.edu.pl/index.php?op=205&pid=48>

Keywords

uncertainty, institutions, adaptation to climate change

Dealing with Climate Change Related Uncertainties: Shifts in Flood Protection Policies in the Tisza River Basin.

Climate change impacts are widely recognised but the level of uncertainties involved in predictions is still significant. According to climate models, weather extremes are likely to increase, and indeed the amount of weather related disasters and the scale of losses have increased substantially. However, a direct influence of climate change on the losses is not proven (Hoeppel et al., 2006; Kundzewicz 2005). It poses a challenge to adaptation policies. In the Hungarian Tisza River basin new records of water level were observed in the last decade. As a result of the devastating floods at the end of 1990s a large-scale flood protection and water management plan for the Tisza River was launched.

The conflicts and difficulties in the implementation resulted in alterations in the plan undermining the dominant position of the structural protection initially proposed. Non-structural options, proposed by a coalition of NGOs, academic institutions and local stakeholders were included in the plan.

In the paper we analyse modifications of the flood protection in the Tisza River Basin taking into account the uncertainties connected with the climate change. We explore how uncertainties affect development of floods risk policies. We employ the Thompson's (2008) concept on forms of solidarities in the analysis of positions taken by stakeholders involved in the plan preparation and implementation. The concept proposes that the models of understanding the nature, selecting information, and disposition to action influence decision-making.

In order to collect data we carried out in-depth interviews with stakeholders and experts. We also organized a workshop focused on adaptation options to climate change where we gathered Hungarian and non-Hungarian flood experts.

The analysis shows that hierarchical and egalitarian actors were initially represented in the dispute over the plan, having two competing views on uncertainty reduction. Individualist, market oriented actors acted behind the scene. A budget shortage, which occurred during the course of the program implementation, helped to equalize the power of actors. However, finding a solution acceptable by all main actors is still difficult to reach.

Dealing with Danger - Risk and Security in the Everyday Lives of Aid Workers

Roth, Silke

Division of Sociology and Social Policy, University of Southampton Southampton, United Kingdom

Keywords

Gender, biographical methods, security, humanitarian aid

In this paper, I will explore how humanitarian aid workers experience danger and risk and what strategies they employ to deal with dangerous situations. Aid work encompasses a broad range of interventions, including development cooperation, peace-building and post-conflict activities as well as emergency relief. Depending on the assignment, aid workers find themselves in high or low risk situations. Three strategies of dealing with danger and risk will be explored in the paper. The first strategy refers to the security policies of international organisations, which include evacuating international staff, leaving local staff behind. While the first strategy highlights the differences between international and local aid workers and beneficiaries, the second strategy can be labeled "community approach" and is based on the knowledge and support of the local community. The third strategy is faith-based; in particular local aid workers described that they were not afraid to enter dangerous situations since they believed that their fate is predetermined. I will explore how these three strategies are employed differently by local and international staff. Furthermore, gender differences will be addressed. The paper is based on biographical interviews with 23 women and 21 men born between 1937 and 1980 who worked for a wide range of smaller and larger NGOs as well as UN organisations. Seventeen of the respondents came from the Western Europe, eight from North America, three from Central and Eastern Europe, eight from Asia and the Middle East, four from Africa and four from South America.

Drinking like the Guys or Drinking with the Girls? The Role of "Risk-Talk" in British Female University Students' Stories of Alcohol Consumption

Moore, Sarah

Sociology, Social Policy, and Social Work, Queen's University, Belfast Belfast, UK

Keywords

Gender, alcohol, Risk-Management

There is an upward trend in female alcohol consumption in a number of European and North American countries; in the UK and Finland young women report higher rates of intoxication than their male peers (Ahlstrom, 2007: 70). In the UK, a country with a particularly high rate of female "binge-drinking", qualitative researchers have sought to explain the implications of female drinking for women's gender identity, since, as Gough and Edwards (1998: 409) put it, "Western cultures advertise (excessive) alcohol usage as an exclusively male activity". Female drinking is widely seen as challenging gender norms, either as a deviant subversion of ideals of femininity, or as part of a broader project of female emancipation (Day et al, 2004; Young et al, 2005). The implication is that traditional femininity does not offer a relevant language or framework to discuss and explain female binge-drinking. The problem with such accounts is that they start from the presumption that female binge-drinking and hegemonic femininity are irreconcilable. In an in-depth study that looked at British female university students attitudes towards binge-drinking, socialising, and drink-spiking, we found that female drinking is by no means at odds with a dominant discourse of femininity, and one of the central ways in which these two are allowed to co-exist is through recourse to a language of precaution. Interviewees often discussed their experiences of binge-drinking in terms of the precautionary behaviour it entailed - watchfulness, concern for personal security and predatory others, and policing one's physical boundaries. Such behaviours are integral aspects of traditional femininity, as well as at the heart of a precautionary language of risk-awareness. The practices associated with risk-management are, in this respect, functionally important in terms of creating normative concerns that reinforce - rather than contradict - hegemonic femininity. This paper will outline the interview findings, discuss the function of "risk-talk" in legitimating new behaviours and reinforcing group solidarity, and consider the idea that the assimilation of a precautionary language and ethos might have distinctive gendered characteristics.

Environmental Risk Governance and Citizen Input: a Analysis of Decision Outcome-Based Arguments

Ahteensuu, Marko

*Public Choice Research Centre (PCRC), University of Turku
Turku, Finland*

Keywords

citizen input, Environmental risk governance, decision outcome-based arguments

There are several weighty reasons for citizen involvement in environmental risk governance. Public engagement has been stated, for instance, to serve democracy and secure the legitimacy of decisions, increase consensus within a society, and establish trust in decision-makers and experts. Another kind of rationale is that citizen input is typically presumed to lead to better judgment and decisions on risk. First, taking lay people's views into account in risk management might result in better answer to the non-factual questions of risk appraisal and decision-making, such as the socio-ethical ones. Second, at the level of the assessment of risks citizen input might enable scientists and decision-makers to answer factual questions related to environmental matters. From the scientist's point of view it may seem, however, that taking citizen views into account necessarily deteriorates the quality of the estimates and decisions. This paper discusses the ways in and stages at which the public can participate in environmental risk decision-making and the possible benefits and problems of doing so. The focus is on decision outcome-based arguments, i.e. I consider the question whether the prevailing conception of environmental risk governance leaves space for citizen input from the knowledge-producing point of view.

Forested commons, community, state and territory? How to limit damage from fire in forested areas, when «taskscape» are increasingly more and more merely landscapes or natural areas?

de Sousa, Marta A. P.

*CICS/Dept. de Sociologia/Univ. do Minho, PhD Student - Centro ICS
Braga, Portugal*

Keywords

community, Forested Commons, Risk and Territory, State and EU, Fire Risk

Forest fires are a common threat, across Europe, especially in southern areas, as it was shown with last years' fires in Greece, and those happening almost yearly in Portugal and Spain. Thus fire risk is an increasing potential hazard for most rural areas, and also those in the fringes of cities. Human and land desertification gave way to a forested landscape, that is both an important carbon sink, an environmental «necessity» as it is a "highly fuelled risk". This presentation aims at showing how a local commons system, a community, a territory and a state bureaucracy, at national and European levels, combine together to bring about a higher level of risk and uncertainty, such as that which stems from forest fires. The ongoing PhD research draws on a case-study of a community, where different layers of conflict exist (i.e. limits, cutting, grazing and state vs. people management), in what comes to their local commons. The local community is trying to sort out ways of coping with the alien reality of a forest and the resulting financial «surplus», since it was implemented in 1950, but simultaneously with its own changes - human and land desertification - and processes, such as client-patron networks and political conflicts. However, it was expected that the community would have been able to present interesting ways to cope with fire risks and events, nevertheless, neighbours may not speak about fires, even when they could gain insight on the ways to manage and limit damages (e.g. a fire-fighter lives nearby, and a farmer will not ask for help in controlling a slash and burn operation). Also, conflicts, that may «prevent» fire prevention, on the other hand, may also ensure and enforce the all-important face-to-face, and direct surveillance of the «taskscape» in the periods of higher risk. We have to understand that the major risk these populations express is not fire, but that one already written in their landscapes, since unhurriedly and silently it seems there are only but landscapes and nothing more...

HIV infection risk groups - possibilities to integrate into labour market. Latvian example

Pranka, Ieva

Faculty of Economics, Latvia university

Riga, Latvia

Keywords

Integration, Risk, labour, HIV, groups

The presentation is based on the analysis of research data "HIV infection risk groups and their possibilities of integration into Latvian labour market". It is a new field of research in Latvia - it is the first complex research of possibilities of persons belonging to the HIV infection risk group to integrate into Latvian labour market, as well as the obstacles and problems, factors of discrimination.

The entire global society is now faced with the issue of the spread of HIV/AIDS, and the consequences, thereof. According to the Joint United Nations Program on HIV/AIDS, Latvia has the third highest estimated HIV/AIDS prevalence in Europe (0.6% of adult population, 15-49 years old) after Estonia and Portugal. The European Commission has evaluated Latvia as the currently most potentially HIV/AIDS endangered country in the EU.

As economic changes affect social risk exclusion groups especially, united and purposefully coordinated functions of different social actors' politicians, municipal and governmental representatives, civil society - are of a great importance for reduction the social exclusion risk factors. The paper examines the research data analysis. Different methods have been used in the research process: statistics analysis, data from risk group survey in the communities with the highest HIV/AIDS infection rate in the country, and experts' interviews.

HIV Risks Reduction Strategies among Gay and Bisexual Men and the Production of Risks in Prevention Discourse

Langer, Phil C.

*Psychology, Ludwig-Maximilians-University Munich
Munich, Germany*

Kühner, Angela

Sociology, Goethe-University Frankfurt Frankfurt/Main, Germany

Drewes, Jochen

*Psychology, Free University Berlin
Berlin, Germany*

Keywords

Social Psychology, prevention, HIV, Risk Reduction Strategies

Background: The number of HIV diagnoses has been rising significantly in most European countries since 2000/01. Men who have sex with men (MSM) are exceptionally affected by this development. As a main factor for new HIV infections risk reduction strategies (RRS) apart from condom use are discussed. Referring to a recent qualitative study on sexual risk behaviour of MSM in Germany we aim at analyzing current risk strategies of gay and bisexual men and evaluating their epidemiological impact in the context of a further production of risks due to a biomedicalization of prevention.

Methods: Based on Grounded Theory 58 semi-structured interviews with recently HIV-diagnosed MSM and untested MSM reporting sexual risk behaviour were carried out in 2006/07. Following computer-based categorical content and discourse analyses, the RRS-related results were contextualized within the concept of an "entrepreneurial self" (Bröckling).

Results: We found considerable evidence of the use of multiple RRS among MSM in our study. They especially encompass serosorting, i.e. the self-restriction to unprotected sexual intercourse to men who are believed to have the same HIV serostatus, strategic positioning, i.e. the taking of an insertive position by the HIV-negative partner, and therapy sorting, i.e. the inclusion of HIV treatment status as criterion for sexual decisions. The reported HIV infection could be linked to "failing" RRS due to inaccurate evaluation of transmission risks in many cases. The decision for unprotected sexual intercourse was based on in-group community knowledge about biomedical virus transmission probabilities. The intentional use of RRS can be interpreted as coping strategy for dealing with the uncertainty of an infection in the context of new treatment options.

Discussion: The omnipresence of RRS we found in the study points towards a change of attitude towards the disease: It signifies a normalization of HIV within the gay community and indicates that sexuality may increasingly be perceived as a normal behavioural system of society. The ongoing biomedicalization of the Aids dispositive, that promotes antiretroviral drugs as biomedical prevention tools, produces new uncertainties that result in a multiplication of sexual risk situations. Paradoxically present prevention discourse is therefore likely to fuel the HIV epidemic.

HIV/AIDS risk perception among HIV positive women

Frade, Fátima

Medicina, Instituto Português de Oncologia Vialonga, Portugal

Amaro, Fausto

*Centre for Public Administration and Policies, Institute of Social and Political Sciences
Lisboa, Portugal*

Keywords

risk perception, women, HIV/AIDS, Portugal

This paper is based on a study of 143 HIV positive women attending an out-patient consultation in a public hospital in Lisbon.

Data were gathered through semi-structured interviews in hospital context during the last semester of 2007.

Main results: HIV/AIDS risk perception was associated by 60.8% of the interviewees to social consequences of AIDS, such as discrimination or withdrawal of the infected people; only 60.5% of the women had accurate information on HIV/AIDS and only 72.1% of these infected women have informed new sexual partners about her HIV status.

The implication of risk HIV perception on behavior, health policy and health information campaigns are discussed.

How employers construct risk and strategies for risk management in relation to hiring new employees

Backman, Christel

Sociology, University of Gothenburg Gothenburg, Sweden

Keywords

risk management, morality, Vocabularies of motive, Recruitment practises, Criminal background checks

In this paper I examine vocabularies of motive among Swedish employers who check employment-seekers' criminal background. My aim is to show how risks related to hiring new employees and strategies for managing those risks, are accounted for. The data consists of qualitative interviews with employers and with representatives for employers' associations and unions. Special attention is given strategies for dealing with risks that are controversial in Sweden, like criminal background checks and credit ratings. Although still considered somewhat unorthodox, the use of criminal background checks has increased tenfold in Sweden during the last decade. The use of credit ratings in recruitment processes is believed to be less frequent, but the overall access to this kind of data has increased through new ways of dissemination, like Internet websites and databases, which means that it is more accessible to employers.

Researchers within the criminological field have depicted a society that becomes more and more "exclusive" in terms of actors trying to exclude elements and individuals that are considered to be risks of some kind (cf Young 1999). In contemporary Western societies responsibility for risks and risk management has largely been relocated from the state and state agencies to individuals and corporations (cf Garland 2001). This means that individuals' and organizations' actions are understood as risk management strategies. In this paper I show that "risk management" and the desire to be seen as "responsible" are not the only type of accounts that employers use to describe why they chosen particular methods, like for example criminal background checks, drug testing, credit ratings and personality tests, for evaluating employment-seekers. I also show that strategies for "risk management" and responsibility are negotiated against other norms such as employment-seekers' right to privacy and the establishment of trust between employer and employee. It is clear that in order to be regarded as "moral actors" employers' risk management needs to display respect for those values as well the value of responsibility and crime prevention.

Incentives and Sanctions: Shifting Patterns of Risk Management in the Welfare State

Hugh, Jennifer

*Politics, University of Sheffield
Sheffield, United Kingdom*

Keywords

Sanctions, Risk, welfare

Risk is the defining characteristic of the modern world (Beck, 1992a; 1992b). However, an element of the management of risk has always been present in the evolution of the social security system in the United Kingdom. The Liberal government's reforms 1905-1911 were based on the concept of social insurance against what have been termed "Old Social Risks" (OSR) felt by industrial workers (Bonoli, 2005). The post-1945 welfare reforms continued this, resulting in a welfare system designed as a state response to risk (Barr, 2001; Giddens, 1996; Taylor-Gooby et al, 1999).

However, the changes wrought by globalization, and demographic shifts, have altered the nature of risk and who is most affected. In a post-industrial, post-modern era, these "New Social Risks" (NSR) offer new challenges. Both globalisation and demographic changes have broken down the hegemony of society on which traditional welfare systems have been based (Bonoli, 2005). Policies based on meeting NSR are evolving to be better targeted, and to show more awareness of attitudes and behaviour; thus the understanding of motivation and the use of incentives and sanctions become increasingly important (Taylor-Gooby, 2004).

New Labour's welfare reforms reflect this shift. The state transfers risks both to individuals and to private sector and third sector organizations. The rights and responsibility agenda, underpinned by a sanctions regime, aims to create a welfare system where individuals take responsibility for their own risk. This paper discusses these recent reforms and proposed changes to the welfare system in the context of understanding the state's response to "risk society".

Lay attitudes towards nuclear technologies

Gadomska, Magdalena

EFDA Close Support Unit Garching, EFDA ? European Fusion Development Agreement, CSU Garching Garching - Munich, Germany

Keywords

Public, acceptability, Knowledge, Risk, Technology

Paper discusses public acceptability of post-modern technologies and the lessons learned from communication errors in the field of nuclear fission and then it focuses on questions related to public awareness of emerging thermonuclear fusion technology. Results of a recent enquiry, investigating the role of knowledge in shaping lay reasoning about thermonuclear fusion, are reported.

The research executed on university students' sample, combined many techniques of sociological enquiry but essentially it followed the experimental research design. Five groups of students read five versions of informative material on fusion technology prepared by fusion researchers and these groups' knowledge and judgements have been confronted among them and with the control group which has not been taken through a learning process.

Understanding of fusion measured by the knowledge test was markedly higher in the experimental groups which enabled the examination of the role of fusion understanding for its acceptability and risk perception. Judgements about various aspects of fusion technology and its risk perception were interrelated among them and interacting with being exposed or not to scientific information. Attitudes towards fusion technology depended stronger on pre-existent dispositions such as generalised risk perception level, trust in scientists and general "technological optimism" than on knowledge about fusion. Explaining of thermonuclear fusion through the confrontation with nuclear fission promoted better understanding of fusion technology, but it did not induce favourable attitudes towards fusion; on the contrary, students exposed to this type of informative text expressed lower fusion acceptability, which suggests the greater role of affective than cognitive elements in attitudes shaping. Message presenting scientific uncertainties as dividing scientific community, on the contrary to the message presenting the same uncertainties without painting the picture of experts' controversy, strengthened the relationships of attitudes towards fusion with pre-existent generalised risk perception level. The results demonstrated the holistic nature of public awareness of technology, composed of many cognitive and affective elements, interacting among them and enrooted in pre-existent attitudes and dispositions. Scientific information enhances or weakens this enrooting, depending on how it is communicated.

Leaving the city in the face of unemployment and unemployment risk

Kley, Stefanie

*Institute for Empirical and Applied Sociology EMPAS, University of Bremen
Bremen, Germany*

Keywords

decision-making, Migration, region, unemployment

In modern societies, unemployment is one of the mostly feared risks in everyday life. Starting from the thesis, that unemployment is an issue which forces individual migration decision-making, two possible causes for our difficulties to measure this relation are discussed:

(1) Timing. Facing the risk of unemployment could be the main source for search activities in regard to another job. Therefore persons who are employed and perceive a high risk of becoming unemployed are expected to begin considering migration. Thinking of migration as a possible way to act should go hand in hand with search activities in a greater area, which in turn should increase the opportunities to find a job. Therefore, the decision in favour of migration is expected take place while people are employed or while they have become unemployed recently.

(2) Region. Living in a "deprived region" should go along with a relatively high propensity to perceive risks of becoming unemployed. Additionally, living in a region with high unemployment rates is expected to trigger migration decision-making because of a perceived lack of opportunities at the place of residence.

This contribution aims to disentangle these influences on the relationship between unemployment and migration, using a dynamic model of migration decision-making and behaviour. Other factors which are influencing the migration process are taken into account as well, whereas education receives special attention.

The data comes from a study in two middle-sized cities, one situated in a "deprived region" and one situated in a "prosperous region" in Germany, with initially 2,400 respondents. It is a panel study with three waves, including an event-history module. Making use of Generalized Ordered Logistic Regression the expected influences on the stages within migration decision-making - not considering - considering - planning migration - will be estimated, whereas migration refers to moving beyond the city boundaries. Data from the event-history module will be used to analyse the expected timing effects in detail.

Leaving the city in the face of unemployment and unemployment risk

Kley, Stefanie

*Institute for empirical and applied Sociology EMPAS, University of Bremen
Bremen, Germany*

Keywords

decision-making, Migration, region, unemployment

In modern societies, unemployment is one of the mostly feared risks in everyday life. Starting from the thesis, that unemployment is an issue which forces individual migration decision-making, two possible causes for our difficulties to measure this relation are discussed:

(1) Timing. Facing the risk of unemployment could be the main source for search activities in regard to another job. Therefore persons who are employed and perceive a high risk of becoming unemployed are expected to begin considering migration. Thinking of migration as a possible way to act should go hand in hand with search activities in a greater area, which in turn should increase the opportunities to find a job. Therefore, the decision in favour of migration is expected take place while people are employed or while they have become unemployed recently.

(2) Region. Living in a "deprived region" should go along with a relatively high propensity to perceive risks of becoming unemployed. Additionally, living in a region with high unemployment rates is expected to trigger migration decision-making because of a perceived lack of opportunities at the place of residence.

This contribution aims to disentangle these influences on the relationship between unemployment and migration, using a dynamic model of migration decision-making and behaviour. Other factors which are influencing the migration process are taken into account as well, whereas education receives special attention.

The data comes from a study in two middle-sized cities, one situated in a "deprived region" and one situated in a "prosperous region" in Germany, with initially 2,400 respondents. It is a panel study with three waves, including an event-history module. Making use of Generalized Ordered Logistic Regression the expected influences on the stages within migration decision-making - not considering - considering - planning migration - will be estimated, whereas migration refers to moving beyond the city boundaries. Data from the event-history module will be used to analyse the expected timing effects in detail.

Main Trends and Varieties in Social Security Threats in Siberian Regions

Sergiyenko, Aliye

*Institute of Economics and Industrial Engineering, Siberian Branch of the Russian Academy of Sciences
Barnaul, Russia*

Keywords

social differentiation, region, social security, social threats, state policy

In conditions of global social transformations and present-day financial crisis a value of social security immeasurably is increasing. Therein areas with the most acuteness in social security threats attract special attention. Among such areas is Siberia as unique territorial community with rich natural resources and high quality of human potential and at the same time extremely low living standards and as a result with more concentration of social threats and probability of their appearance.

To discover a scale and structure of social threats and mechanisms of their forming sample inquiries of inhabitants (N=1700, 2006; N=1011, 2008) and expert questionings of local authorities (N=82, 2006; N=222, 2008) were conducted in five Siberian regions.

In rating of threats socio-economic risks take leading place in Siberian regions, among them are: consumer prices growth, low living standards, unemployment, poverty and great social differentiation, foodstuffs counterfeited and of poor quality. On sociological results and statistical data Siberian regions have more significant scale of socio-economic threats in comparison with Russia in whole. Differently directed changes of security risks scales in Siberian regions occurred in 2000s confirming of the break of mainly negative trends in 1990s. The national remote areas of Russia with traditionally backward economics and social sphere and agrarian regions have remained as territorial centers of security threats in Siberia.

Not high level of Siberian inhabitants' satisfaction in their social status and estimation of state reforms were revealed. One third respondents had been not satisfied of their welfare standards, dwelling, job, health or place of residence and had intended to migrate. On experts opinion the main social risks have been impacted by national economic reforms and state policy, people' bad starting position, low social and economic adaptation and deviant activities.

Analysis of social threats in Siberian regions permitted to conclude about non-system of executed reforms with autonomously regional nature or national nonregistering regional specificity type that have led to extreme territorial differences. The need for conversion to systematic technologies that provide social security taking into account regional trends has been ripe.

Managing risk and uncertainty: the organisational dynamics of early warning systems

Suokas, Anu

Health Sciences, University of Leicester United Kingdom,

Keywords

responsibility, accountability, standardisation, organisational risk management

New ways of governing health services have involved a narrative shift towards high-reliability organisations and utilisation of procedural standards to manage operational risks. Few studies in healthcare have described and theorised how procedural standards are actioned to manage operational risks arising from processes, people or systems. This paper suggests examining procedural standards as organisational accountability mechanisms that seek to define responsibilities in frontline risk management. Based on an ethnographic study of patient safety and ward culture in four UK hospitals that participated in the Health Foundation's Safer Patients Initiative, the paper examines early warning systems aimed at managing risks of patient deterioration on hospital wards. Observational data and interviews with nurses, doctors, and staff from patient safety and risk management were analysed to examine how organisational accountability is translated into frontline risk management.

Early warning systems were examined by constructing a conceptual framework based on theoretical and empirical work on risk, accountability and responsibility. The systems emerged as risk management strategies that introduce accountability relationships and mechanisms to activate those relationships. This involves delegating risk management responsibilities to professionals; associating organisational targets such as patient safety with good professional practice; and placing professionals in clinical governance, patient safety and risk management. Thus organisational risk management seeks greater responsiveness and accountability as defined by hybrid forms of professional-managerial power.

The findings implied that early warning systems clarified accountabilities and responsibilities by defining: the causal pathways between monitoring practices and appropriate response; tasking and role responsibilities; and standards of appropriate practice. The systems were also perceived as promoting capacity building and good professional performance. Despite efforts to achieve greater accountability for standard practices, early warning systems generated negotiation over perceptions of risk, causality, and accountability relationships. As a result, organisational actors adjusted formal definitions of appropriate practice, causal pathways of risk management procedures, accountability expectations, and allegiances to sources of authority. The paper will discuss hybrid organisational and professional accounts of risk, and how they influenced operationalisation of early warning systems. The paper will also discuss the qualities of the conceptual framework in analysing organisational approaches to risk and uncertainty.

Mass violence and social insecurity: the case of school shootings in Finland

Oksanen, Atte

*Department of Social Research, University of Tampere
Tampere, Finland*

Räsänen, Pekka

*Helsinki Institute for Information Technology HIIT, University of Helsinki & Helsinki University of Technology
Helsinki, Finland*

Keywords

violence, insecurity, risks

In the light of homicide and suicide statistics, Finland is one of the most violent countries in Western Europe. Also the recent dramatic incidents, particularly the bomb explosion in a shopping centre in Vantaa (2002) and the high school shooting at Jokela (2007) and Kauhajoki (2008), received worldwide media coverage about violence in Finnish society. Simultaneously, however, Finland scores high in many international surveys on generalised trust and social capital.

Our Everyday life and Insecurity project (2008-2011) analyses social relations and management of risks after school shootings in Finland. We have collected comparable survey data from Jokela and Kauhajoki. Both of the data represent the local residents aged 18-75. In the paper, we discuss how the engagement with neighborhood activities connects with the perceptions of social risks and the feelings of insecurity. We examine how people make use of their social bonds after violent disasters and what kind of coping strategies they use. In other words, we ask how community cohesion was affected by a violent incident, and what social relationships people predominately use in order to maintain their psychological well-being after such an incident.

We assume that interpersonal trust is associated with the fears people have. For example, mass violence incidents are typically portrayed as random and unexpected acts. This is why they provide with a stressful risk for citizens. Moreover, we have witnessed the trend that one act tends to increase the likelihood of future acts. In the aftermath of Jokela and Kauhajoki shootings, for example, hundreds of pupils in Finland and other European countries tried to attract public attention by making false threats and leaving messages on Internet bulletin boards.

In the analysis, interpersonal trust and community cohesion are seen as positive resources aimed at social well-being in the community level. Our results indicate that a high level of interpersonal trust and community cohesion is connected with a low level of psychological insecurity. In addition, we find that the previous experiences of violence relate to residents' capacity to cope with social risks. Socio-demographic background is also associated both with the risk-coping capabilities and the feelings of insecurity.

Modernity Risk Dynamics & Social Inequalities: A Case-study on Homelessness in Paris, Lisbon and London

Menezes, Filipa

Sociology, CIES-ISCTE

Lisbon, Portugal

Keywords

Social exclusion, Social Care Services, homelessness, Risk

The paper I propose to present at the "9th ESA Conference European Society or European Societies" outcomes from a cross-national comparative (FR, PT, UK) research on homelessness that takes the concept of risk as fundamental analytical string. Risk is a cultural and social construct that to be analyzed leads necessarily to compare the perceptions of different social actors. In this case the institutional level and the homeless themselves.

As the institutional plan, responsible for the categorization and regulation of the phenomenon, are considered documental sources (risk theories, empirical researches and international studies) and the social workers (from volunteers to managers). In what regards the homeless, the analysis focus on their life trajectories and symbolic perceptions for several domains, including survival strategies and the evaluation of the social provision services.

The empirical research is based on semi-directive interviews conducted in Paris, Lisbon and London (2005-2006), both to social workers and homeless.

The main findings allow enhancing that the existing divergences on risk discourses assume relevant implications regarding the conceptualisation of preventive measures, social control and reinsertion plans. The life-trajectories, taking homelessness as a process, are of extreme importance to understand the role of social capital for coping with crisis susceptibilities. It is verified that cross-checking the perceptions of social workers and homeless constitutes a crucial tool for finding participative proposals for the development of the social support practices.

Occupational risks in France, the difficulties of an incentive system to encourage prevention

Célérier, Sylvie

DOT, Centre études de l'emploi-CPN-TEPP (cnrs 3126)

Noisy le grand, France

Amossé, Thomas

DOT, Centre études de l'emploi

Noisy le Grand, france

Fretel, Anne

DOT, Centre études de l'emploi

Noisy le Grand, France

Keywords

occupational risk, MSD, social construction of risk

We focus on occupational risks and especially on occupational diseases in France. The data show a steady upward trend that is clearly accentuated in 1995 essentially illustrating the massive increase in asbestos-related pathologies and the development of musculoskeletal disorders (MSD). The extent of occupational health risks in France sows suspicion on employer's practices and on the French preventive system. Indeed, in France, the occupational risk is a risk of the employer, which is oriented by using financial incentives and regulations.

In that context, we try to understand how occupational risks and especially MDS, appear (or not) to the managers of the firms and how they are aware of the predictable health catastrophe it could be. We use the data of a national statistical survey (REPONSE 3 000 representative firms queried in 2005) and a qualitative survey in the poultry processing industry. The health risks in that industry are blatantly manifest whether it concerns work-related accidents whose frequency index remains high or occupational diseases whose numbers have recorded a steady increase over the last 10 years. The latter essentially concern musculoskeletal disorders that have risen spectacularly since 1990. Our survey will be completed at the end of 2009.

Our data demonstrate that the awareness of the occupational risk matter doesn't lack. More or less, firms put preventive measures in place and knowledge on the matter tends to be quite widely spread. However, things are much more confused for the MDS. The persons interviewed don't clearly see how work organization is involved in the diseases process and they even seem enabled to identify MSD as a problem. It's easier for them when the worker's bodies are straight damaged in connection with a specific event. There is not an obvious fact but a result of long social construction of work accidents as a matter of industrial world appealing to compensation. The occupational diseases and the MSD are not still built as so.

Online sexual solicitation of young people: new risk patterns, or old risks in new arenas?

Grødem, Anne S.

*NOVA, NOVA - Norwegian Social Research
Oslo, Norway*

Mossige, Svein

*NOVA, NOVA - Norwegian Social Research
Oslo, Norway*

Keywords

sexual abuse, children, internet, sexual solicitation, Norway

Across Europe, there is a growing awareness of risks associated with the new media, most obviously the internet. One aspect of this is the potential opportunities for paedophiles to use the internet to solicit children and young people for sexual purposes. While stories about "online predators" who use the internet to gain access to young victims have become a media staple since the late 1990s, very little research has been done with regard to how common this phenomenon actually is. In this paper, we raise two main questions: first, how common is it for young men and women to have experienced online sexual solicitation? Second, are all young people similarly at risk for such events, or will we find that the young people who are exposed to online solicitation share characteristics with young people who have an increased risk for sexual abuse in more traditional settings? Data is found in a Norwegian survey with 7033 respondents, drawn among students in their final year of secondary schooling (normally 18-year olds). The main topic of the survey is past experiences of violence and sexual abuse, and the questionnaire contains a separate section with questions about online sexual solicitations and meetings with cybercontacts. We explore two aspects of this issue, namely online sexual solicitation (exposure to "dirty talk", being asked to provide sexual photos of oneself, being invited to have sex) and meetings with cyber-contacts. Regarding meetings, our main interest is in knowing how many of these meetings end in unpleasant situations, such as pressure to have sex or actual sexual abuse. We analyse variation in risk along the lines of gender, ethnic minority status, how the respondents evaluate their family's financial situation, whether or not the respondent has physical disabilities, the respondents' sexual orientation, and how the respondents evaluate their relationship with their parents. Drawing on this information, we seek to establish how and to what extent risk profiles differ for exposure to online sexual solicitation and sexual abuse in settings that are not connected with the internet.

Patterns of content in public engagement with zoonotic and other emerging infectious diseases: continuities and discontinuities

Joffe, Helene

*Psychology, University College London
London, UK*

Keywords

social representations, Ebola, Avian flu, EID

Studies that I have conducted on public engagement with the zoonotic diseases Ebola and Avian flu indicate continuity between their social representation and that of the broader category of Emerging Infectious diseases (EID), including HIV/AIDS and MRSA. This social representation hinges around the following content: blame of particular entities for the disease; distancing of the disease from the self and in-group once the initial mass panic has died down; and stigmatisation of those who have contracted it or who are thought to have intensified its spread.

This paper explores this patterning to understand the processes of public engagement with mass disease. Two types of blame can be elicited by such diseases: upwards (e.g. of governments and other institutions) and downwards (e.g. of marginalised groups). Both types of blame can co-exist in relation to a disease, such as the spread of HIV being linked, initially, not only to gay and African identities but to the lack of government regulation and screening of donated blood.

Blame of either kind tends to be accompanied by a "not me, not my group" response in the public responding to the particular disease. Thus a key aspect of the response to zoonotic and other EID serves an identity protective function. The impetus towards identity protection cuts across a surprising number of the EID and is found in unlikely publics (e.g. those one might expect to feel vulnerable to the particular disease).

While the identities of those representing an EID in this way are protected, stigmatisation results from these representations. The nature of the stigma depends on whether the blame is directed upwards or downwards. Accompanying the former type of blame is impaired trust in the authorities and institutions seen to be associated with the disease's escalation whereas spoiled identity, and sometimes political action to challenge this, follows from downwards blame.

Beyond these continuities in the social representation of infectious diseases, the paper also discusses the potential for discontinuity between those of zoonotic origin and the others. While experts label a subset of the EID as zoonotic, awareness of the animal-human link may not permeate public thinking.

Perception of the Estonian Genome Project: Perceived Risks and Benefits among the Estonian Population

Korts, Külliki

*Institute of Journalism and Communications, University of Tartu
Tartu, Estonia*

Keywords

Gene banks, public perception of risks, risk society

The paper discusses one specific phenomenon in the emerging risk society: the launch of major scientific-technological ventures, involving large amounts of highly sensitive personal information. The focus is on a specific case study, the launch of the Estonian Genome Project, a population-based biobank. Drawing on both quantitative surveys and focus-group interviews, public perception of what could be the consequences of getting access to one's own genetic information (the main recruitment bait of the EGP being "a personal gene card") and how the introduction of large volumes of genetic knowledge into the society could change personal and social relations. The launch of the project took place in a situation where EGP constitutes the first major "gene-issue" in the society which largely missed out on other major gene debates, or the risks related to new technologies more generally. Estonian society seems to be a particularly fertile ground for experimenting with such ventures: the empirical analyses reveal a low level of concern for possible technologically induced risks among the population, in comparison to other types of risks, as well a notably high level of technological optimism, amidst uncritical promotion of IT and gene technology, both in political and media discourse as keys to country's economic and international success.

Preventing child abuse fatalities: a critical investigation of Dutch child abuse inquiries

Kortleven LL.M, W.J.

Department of Sociology of Law, Erasmus University Rotterdam Rotterdam, Netherlands

Keywords

investigation, abuse, child

From the beginning of this millennium onwards, several child abuse deaths in the Netherlands have not only led to public debate about the quality of youth care and its responsibility for preventing child deaths, they also serve as a justification of changes in youth care policy and practice. In particular the Savanna case has become symbolic of a failing youth care system and has gained a similar significance for the Netherlands as "Jessica" and "Kevin" have for Germany and "Victoria Climbié" for Britain.

Like elsewhere in Europe and abroad, in some Dutch fatal child abuse cases one or more inquiries into the involved organizations' practices have been conducted, the results of which have subsequently been published. Such inquiries deserve scholarly attention, since they have become an important part of the public response to child abuse tragedies and apparently contribute to important developments in the field of youth care and youth protection. However, whereas for instance in Britain investigation of child death inquiries is far from uncommon, Dutch inquiries into child abuse fatalities have not yet been investigated.

My presentation draws on an examination of all published Dutch inquiry reports into the role of youth care in fatal child abuse cases, concerning seven child deaths occurring from 2000 to 2008. In considering the contents and characteristics of the inquiry reports, I will deal with the question whether the reports' explicit aim of reducing the likelihood of similar events occurring in the future is feasible. Particular attention will be devoted both to the way the reports judge practitioners' dealing with risks and to the role of the reports in promoting the use of risk assessment tools. Furthermore, my presentation will highlight some similarities and differences of inquiries in the Netherlands and in Britain, in order to investigate what is unique to the Dutch context and what is not.

Protest, justice, citizenship and environmental rehabilitation: the worth of death and the value of life

Mendes, José

*Centre for Social Studies, University of Coimbra
Coimbra, Portugal*

Araújo, Pedro

*Centre for Social Studies, University of Coimbra
Coimbra, Portugal*

Keywords

citizenship, collective action, death, environmental rehabilitation

This paper compares the different ways the State activates policies of environmental rehabilitation in Portugal and France, and how local populations and ancient uranium workers contest or normalize the notions of hazard, public and personal health, death and risk. The main objective is to analyse the political work that is done to normalize permanent hazardous situations and the interference of local histories, memories, bodies and communities on the technical work applied on the normalisation process.

The paper focus on the protest actions engaged, in Portugal, by an association of ancient uranium miners and workers as a way to disrupt the frontiers of responsibility laid down by the State throughout the application of a program of rehabilitation of degraded mining areas. While the Portuguese State seeks to reduce the issue to an environmental one, highlighting the importance of rehabilitation to public health, the miners and workers struggle to expand it so that it can embrace other aspects, such as social and labour rights of former workers. Although central in the action repertoire of the workers, the politicization of death aims above all to uphold a moral debt of the State towards people. This is a moral debt that should not materialize itself in a symbolic assuming of guilt by the State but in real form as financial reparation.

By contrast, in Limoges, France, death and suffering on the closed uranium mines are normalized in the post-production process, and the exploiting company, AREVA, is engaged in a strategy of self-presentation of responsibility, engaged environmental rehabilitation and competent manager of radioactive waste. The contestation arises from the local environmental movements, through judicial processes, and focus on environmental deficit, the predation of natural resources and the legacy of nuclear waste. The discussion is structured around the overall notion of France as a nuclear power and the entailing costs and necessary victims that arise in the process.

The paper concludes by a discussion of democratic risk governance and the role of memory, resentment, repair, death and generational legacy on the constant engagement of public constituencies in the production of civic epistemologies and citizenship.

Public Consultations and Democracy: The Case of GMOs in the EU

Ahteensuu, Marko

*Public Choice Research Centre (PCRC), University of Turku
Turku, Finland*

Siipi, Helena

*Department of Philosophy, University of Turku
Turku, Finland*

Keywords

DEMOCRACY, EU, GMOs, Public consultations

The paper highlights a democracy deficit in public consultation practices on the deliberate release and placing on the market of genetically modified organisms (GMOs) in the European Union (EU) by focusing on the case of Finland. In particular, GMO consultation practices are assessed in regard to three prerequisites for a democratic decision-making procedure: availability of information, possibility to affect decisions, and the transparency of decision-making process. It is argued that in its current form, GMO consultation fails to meet these basic requirements.

Public Trust and Social Policy: The Experience of the UK

Taylor-Gooby, Peter

SSPSSR, University of Kent Canterbury, UK

Keywords

trust, Social Policy, Risk, Welfare State

This presentation discusses issues of public trust in relation to social policy, drawing on European and especially UK experience. The argument is developed further in Reframing Social Citizenship (Oxford University Press, 2008). The core point is that trust is vital to the longer-term success of public policies, just as much as the technical efficiency and effectiveness of the services offered. Policy-makers, particularly under current pressures, sometimes focus too strongly on the latter and pursue policies that may improve cost-efficiency but damage trust, so that they achieve short-term gains at the cost of undermining the continuing political viability of the system.

Trust is vital to the success of social policy for two kinds of reasons: if citizens as individuals do not trust social services they will not use them, provided that they can gain access to preferable alternatives. If citizens as a group do not trust them, they will resent paying for them and funding may eventually suffer. In either case, low trust in public provision damages political legitimacy.

The argument is supported by empirical research on the flagship UK social service, the National Health Service and by other work

Pulling Together? Consensus, Security & Human Rights in the UK

McGhee, Derek

Sociology & Social Policy, University of Southampton Southampton, Hampshire

Keywords

national security, desecuritization, human security, human rights, securitization

In this paper I focus on the interplay of securitizing and desecuritizing processes surrounding the consensus building activities of the Prime Minister Gordon Brown and his Home Secretary (Jacqui Smith) on the matter of "public security". At the same time the paper examines the relationship between the latter and the question of "the right to have rights" that has dominated human rights policy in Britain in recent years.

Thus, in the paper I will argue that Brown and Smith's consensus building activities are being enacted through a combination of securitizing and desecuritizing processes (or more accurately desecuritization in the context of already successful securitization) which are in turn being articulated in conjunction with a highly resonate "human welfare" inflected discourse of "human security" designed to appeal to a shared sense of common fate. It will be argued here that the Prime Minister and Home Secretary's attempts to garner Parliamentary support for their counter terrorism strategy (in this instance, the extension of pre-charge detention) coincides with Justice Secretary (and Lord Chancellor) Jack Straw's recommendations with regards to the next steps for Britain's human rights policy. In this paper I will examine the discourses associated with the process of attempting to build a consensus on security and the simultaneous process of shifting the balance in human rights in favour of "public security". The paper is therefore an exploration of (1) the interplay of securitizing and desecuritizing processes; (2) the re-calibration of security away from "national security" perspectives to a more emphatic definition of security and threat in "individual" terms; and, (3) The shifting legislative (and human rights) landscape in response to what are presented as new security threats.

Reducing the risk? The operation of a barring and vetting scheme in care services in England and Wales

Stevens, Martin

*Social Care Workforce Research Unit, King's College London
United Kingdom, <http://www.kcl.ac.uk/schools/sspp/interdisciplinary/scwru/people/stevens.html>*

Manthorpe, Jill

*Social Care Workforce Research Unit, King's College London
London, United Kingdom*

Hussein, Shereen

*Social Care Workforce Research Unit, King's College London
London, United Kingdom*

Martineau, Stephen

*Social Care Workforce Research Unit, King's College London
London, United Kingdom*

Rapaport, Joan

*Social Care Workforce Research Unit, King's College London
London, United Kingdom*

Harris, Jess

*Social Care Workforce Research Unit, King's College London
London, United Kingdom*

Keywords

individualism, policy, disability

Introduction

Reducing the risks of mistreatment and neglect among people who use social care services has been a prominent policy goal in the UK throughout the 1990s and 2000s. The paper explores the implementation and operation of the Protection of Vulnerable Adults List (POVA) in England and Wales. The POVA List is a statutory instrument to bar unsuitable staff from working in social care services, which carries criminal penalties for businesses and staff that fail to follow its provisions. While the scheme is unique to the United Kingdom (UK), safeguarding is an international theme in policy in this field.

Methods and materials

The paper will contextualise the POVA List within the complex context of social care in England and Wales, in which multiple and highly varied commercial companies provide the bulk of services. It draws on a study comprising analysis of POVA List referral data; interviews, using a vignette method, with civil servants administering the POVA List and discussion groups of older people, staff and managers.

Results

The overall schema for decision making resulting from the analysis, portrayed the process as an interplay between emotional and moral responses to individuals referred to the scheme and evidence about the alleged misconduct. Initial emotional and moral reactions to information accompanying referrals direct further requests for evidence and are moderated by further details that subsequently emerge. A final construction of an 'unsuitable' or a 'suitable' person coalesces from the interplay of these factors, which leads to recommendations about whether to bar the referred person.

Conclusion

Establishing people as suitable or unsuitable to work in social care, because they have caused harm or have placed users of social care services at risk of harm, rests on construction of and concern about risk. The POVA research illustrates how a policy based on the management of future risk is operationalised through individual decisions. Such a policy tends to emphasise an individualistic response to risk (ie the locus of concern is the individual worker), possibly at the expense of more collective approaches, which chimes with themes identifiable in other policies in the field.

Reflexivity and Deliberative Modes of Governance in the Context of EU Risk Regulation

Khoury, Alexandros

*Law, University of Leicester
UK,*

Chalari, Athanasia

*Sociology, University of Manchester
Manchester, UK*

Keywords

EU GM Food and Feed Regulatory Regime, Public Policy and Law, Deliberative Democracy Stream: Politics, Reflexivity, risk regulation

This paper attempts to apply Archer's theory on reflexivity (i.e. "the regular exercise of the mental ability, shared by all normal people, to consider themselves in relation to their (social) contexts and vice versa") to governance arrangements, and more specifically, to risk regulation. We argue that the realisation of citizens' inherent reflexive ability provides an additional independent justification to the widespread literature which calls for deliberative modes of governance. What is more, a distinction is made between politics based on spontaneous (re)action (or shallow politics) and politics based on "reflexivity" (or reflexive politics). The latter aspire to involve citizens in the political process within a framework of constructive and carefully constructed dialogue that takes place simultaneously amongst and between the governors and the governed. Conversely, shallow politics are not, primarily, preoccupied with deliberation and reasons giving but they are chiefly concerned with realising the unrefined wishes of citizens. In making this distinction, the paper uses the European Union governance arrangements in relation to Genetically Modified Food and Feed as a case study in order to ascertain the extent to which they encourage policies based on reflexivity.

Regulating the uncertainty and risk of technique-centred innovations in healthcare

Finlay, Susan

*Sociology, King's College London
London, United Kingdom*

Keywords

Ethnography, Technique-Centred Innovation, Hidden Research System, Innovation Review Committee

The advancement of medical care is, in large part, driven by clinicians and patients who, respectively, develop and submit to experimental technologies. However, as such technologies develop and are translated into mainstream clinical care they carry risks and uncertainties for patients, practitioners and healthcare systems. This paper explores the oversight processes, practices and rationales used within a U.K. NHS Trust to attempt to address these uncertainties and risks within their hospital.

History has taught us of the risks associated with experimental/innovative treatments which are not rigorously tested prior to their diffusion into standard practice. However, while the likes of thalidomide sparked an international overhaul of the development and regulation of pharmaceutical drugs, more "craft-based" developments, such as innovative surgical and clinical procedures, have remained largely under-regulated.

Hopkins (2006) contends that the embedded and autonomous nature of "technique-centred" innovation allows clinicians to change their practice while remaining hidden from external regulatory view. This hidden nature also contributes to the difficulties clinicians have in determining what counts as "innovative" and when external assessment is necessary. Various clinicians, ethicists and social scientists have identified this lack of regulation and the resultant risks presented, however few have explored attempts of tackling these concerns. One proposed solution is an internal, collegial Innovation Review Committee (IRC) charged with the task of assessing the acceptability of technique-centred innovations and the risks they pose "Morreim 2006". Nevertheless no empirical research on the practice, processes or feasibility of this model of regulation has been published.

This paper presents the findings of an ethnographic study exploring the workings of an IRC-like committee within an NHS Trust. Drawing on participant observation and semi-structured interviews this paper explores the issues of risk and uncertainty associated with technique-centred innovations and the difficulties this committee faced in attempting to judge safety in the unknown and unknowable territory of innovation.

Risk and Health: Epidemiology and the new forms of governance

Areosa, João

*Safety at Work, Metropolitano de Lisboa
Lisboa, Portugal*

Raposo, Hélder

*Departamento de Ciência Sociais e Humanas ? Área de Sociologia, Escola Superior de Tecnologia da Saúde de Lisboa
Lisboa, Portugal*

Keywords

Risk, Governance, Health

The risk as a social phenomenon has gained prominence in certain aspects, both in scientific and lay knowledge. The literature included in the field of social sciences has largely proved that the risks are in part socially constructed phenomena. The concerns that some risks can bring to societies (e.g., from lay perceptions) and how these risks can be managed politically are two dimensions that are usually linked, although not always revealing coincident perspectives. The political field has to consider and articulate the knowledge from experts and from lay people (or better, risk perception) while two different ways of interpretation of social reality. The study of the epidemiology associated with the risk has shown that certain consequences of such risks may be categorized, or better, may be found certain social regularities. For example, Farr found in the mid-nineteenth century that the risk of death by accident was somewhat calculable. This epidemiological information allows us to assess what types of risks that most affect the societies, enabling the creation of mechanisms to prevent and minimize social risks.

The study of the epidemiology associated with risk, as characterized perspective of the principal risks affecting the societies, as well as the theories of the risk governmentality, framed in a political, regulatory or management of risk, are two points that we want to develop in this paper, but the possible approaches to risk are far from being exhausted in these two aspects.

Risk and responsibility in a manufactured world

Pellizzoni, Luigi

*Scienze dell'Uomo, University of Trieste
Trieste, Italy*

Keywords

neo-liberalism, responsibility, gene technologies, uncertainty, science-policy interface

Critics of traditional understandings of risk, responsibility and the division of labour between science and politics make a case for the intimate connection between facts and values, drawing from the acknowledgement of the co-produced character of the natural and social orders a demand for less ambitious and more inclusive policy processes. Yet within the neo-liberal political economy uncertainty, rather than of unmanageable surprises, becomes a source of opportunities open to individual craftsmanship. Difficulties in responsibility ascription stem as a consequence. In my paper I will focus on gene technologies, which offer a vantage point for reflecting on the consequences of the drift from discovery to invention as a master frame in the appraisal of human intermingling with the world. Biotech patenting connects contingency with an expanding agency which, by crafting nature, crafts also the distinction between manufactured and non-manufactured world. I will argue that it is likely not by "democratizing" knowledge production that politics and economy can be democratized and responsibilities rearranged, but rather the opposite.

Risk perception and risk behaviour in a heterogeneous society: The impact of basic values and experiences of vulnerability

Olofsson, Anna

*Dep of Social Science, Mid Sweden University
Östersund, Sweden*

Öhman, Susanna

*Dep of social science, Mid Sweden University
Östersund, Sweden*

Keywords

values, heterogeneity, risk behaviour, risk perception

The aim of this paper is to elucidate the complex patterns between sociocultural heterogeneity, risk perceptions and risk behaviour. It is well known that risk perception and risk behaviour varies between different segments of populations, e.g. men and women, minority and majority groups, young and old people, and people living in cities and on the countryside. Hence, this study focuses on the heterogeneity factors gender, ethnicity, sexual orientation and disability in relation to risk perception and risk behaviour. However, this paper does not only identify if, and which, risk perceptions and behaviours that differs, but also analyses the underlying causal factors "general value" and "vulnerability" and their role in understanding sociocultural heterogeneity and risk.

The analyses were made with data from a Swedish national survey (Society and Values II) conducted as a postal questionnaire during autumn 2008. The dataset used in the analyses is composed of two representative samples of the Swedish population between the ages of 16 and 75: One national random sample (n=2000), and a random sample of people living in three residential areas with a relatively large population of people with foreign background (n=750).

The findings confirm earlier research in so far that there are differences both in risk perceptions and behaviour between the different groups. However, the differences are not general, that is, even though there are differences between e.g. native people and people with foreign backgrounds, there are examples of risk perception categories and behaviours that do not differ as well. Further, some differences, as between people with or without disabilities, disappear when values and experience of vulnerability is added to the analysis. The main conclusions are that heterogeneity factors such as gender, ethnicity, sexual orientation and disability are important to understand people's reactions to risks but underlying factors such as values and vulnerability is more important to explain these reactions.

Risk perceptions of zoonoses in text vs. images: The impact of the social representations of animals

Marcu, Afrodita

*Psychology, University of Surrey
Guildford, United Kingdom*

Barnett, Julie

*Psychology, University of Surrey
Guildford, United Kingdom*

Brodzinska, Marta

*Psychology, University of Surrey
Guildford, United Kingdom*

Uzzell, David

*Psychology, University of Surrey
Guildford, United Kingdom*

Keywords

Animals, imagery, Risk, zoonoses

Lay appraisals of risk rely not so much on perceptions of risk per se as on the social representations of the risks at stake (Joffe, 2003). In the case of zoonoses, i.e. diseases which can be transmitted from animals to humans, perceptions of risk may be anchored in the social representations of animals and in the social practices that put humans at risk from animals. The animals' perceived utility to humans, their status in the human culture, and the wider ideology of speciesism (Singer, 1990) can influence the perceptions of risk of zoonoses. The present research investigated how people perceived danger and risk of zoonoses from animals, and explored whether presenting animals in images vs. text would influence the perceptions of risk. A card-sorting task was adopted, its open-ended format allowing the researchers to explore the reasoning behind the sorting of the elements. 25 target animals, including insects, mammals, and arachnids, were represented in both text and image cards, but separately. 12 participants were allocated to one of the two conditions, and completed 3 free and 3 structured sorts, the latter asking them to sort the animals in terms of their dangerousness, their likelihood of transmitting disease, and the emotions that they aroused in the participants. The results provide a pictorial representation of the extent to which the elements were viewed as similar or as different to each other. In both the danger and the disease sorts, the insects and the arachnids were grouped together and separately from the mammals, regardless of the study condition. The animals' perceived likelihood to transmit disease was underpinned by their categorization as dirty and as scavenger in the free sorts. More animals were perceived as likely to transmit disease in the image than in the text condition. In this talk we will reflect on the implications of using text vs. images in relation to the research on risk of zoonoses. We will discuss the results in relation to the social and ideological contexts in which the social representations of animals and the risk of zoonoses are constructed.

Risk reasoning around pandemic influenza

Barnett, Julie

*Department of Psychology, University of Surrey
Guildford, UK*

Keywords

, risk reasoning, pandemic influenza, avian influenza

The possible risks of pandemic influenza (PI) have been the subject of extensive media attention in the UK. The early focus of this interest followed the discovery in April 2006 of a swan that was found to have been infected with the H5N1 virus. Since that time there has been considerable expert attention to preparedness and thus to public protection.

The early expert and media discourse around PI was initially strongly linked with the H5N1 virus (Highly Pathogenic Avian Influenza). An ideal opportunity to explore how people made sense of PI in the light of this was afforded by a series of eight focus groups conducted in rural and urban areas across England and Wales in the month following the first H5N1 outbreak. The serendipitous timing of the groups affords a unique opportunity to explore the ways in which people negotiate and draw inferences about potential human health threats in the context of the developing and uncertain risk landscape that was anchored in animal disease.

Thematic analysis (Braun & Clarke, 2006) was used to analyse the data and reflections are made on the links made with previous literature on risk reasoning (Horlick Jones, 2005), critical trust (Walls et al. 2005), lay logics and risk signatures (Petts et al. 2001). The analysis highlighted the ways in which participants do - and don't - anchor their considerations of pandemic influenza in relation to avian influenza. The motif of avian influenza was evident in relation to some claims about, for example, the likely effectiveness of vaccination yet other claims (such as the safety of vaccinations) resonated more strongly with other risk events. People had well developed and considered arguments about what their strategy would be in the event of PI in the UK and were well aware of the possible implications of rationing and prioritisation of vaccinations. The possible future of PI was complex and yet largely consensual. The implication of such public understandings for those charged with communicating public health risk information will be discussed.

RiskPrint: an exploratory cartography of the spatiality of risks

November, Valérie

*ESpRi - Etude de la spatialité des risques, Ecole Polytechnique Fédérale de Lausanne
Lausanne, Switzerland*

Viot, Pascal

*ESpRi - Etude de la spatialité des risques, Ecole Polytechnique Fédérale de Lausanne
Lausanne, Switzerland*

Penelas, Marion

*ESpRi - Etude de la spatialité des risques, Ecole Polytechnique Fédérale de Lausanne
Lausanne, Switzerland*

Keywords

actor network theory, Risk, cartography

Our project aims to identify and understand the relationships between risks and spaces in the identification, representation and management of risks. The main objective is to devise new instruments for understanding risks in relation to the land dynamics in which they arise and which they themselves help to alter. Various types of knowledge (scientific, technical and popular) are called upon to play a decisive role in risk and crisis management. Such knowledge is produced during the risk identification process (including definition of the instruments used in that process) as well as in the process of devising preventive measures (town and country planning, the promotion of vigilance). We intend to examine how, during both of these processes, types of knowledge are constructed, consolidated, revised or abandoned in order to updating their performative dimension, i.e. their capacity to influence and transform space. This research program is based upon three studies concerning, respectively, fire risk, flood risk and video surveillance, which have demonstrated the usefulness of studying the various types of knowledge likely to have a spatial impact. This study of what we will call "spatiality of risks" will also lead to the production of a 3D graphic representation, enabling us to see risks on different geographical scales and to get a clearer idea of how these various types of knowledge coexist and interact with one another. This innovative mapping technique will enable us to reveal the connectivity at work in the complex spatiality of risks.

Risks in an interdisciplinary prospective. The advantages of a simulative approach: study-case analysis

Fici, Anna

*Social Science, University of Palermo
Palermo, Italy*

Punzo, Valentina

*Social Science, University of Palermo
Palermo, Italy*

Keywords

Social simulation, risk and uncertainty, Rational choice

Contemporary context is characterised by an ever growing information overload, generated by the diffusion of new interactive media.

Such overload makes daily choice in uncertainty conditions particularly "costly".

Our work takes into consideration both risks and uncertainty, considering them as social constructs, dependent on the way choice is "prospected" (Kahneman & Tversky) to social actors.

We started from the assumption, of interdisciplinary matrix, that individual attitude toward risk and perception of probabilities tied to choice prospects on the part of social actors are determined, besides strictly sociological variables, also by variables of the cognitive and emotive type. Up to date, however, it has not been possible for sociology to handle the interdisciplinary matrix verifying the contribution of cognitive and emotive spheres in the genesis of meaning (in the weberian sense), and so, that of rationality, of social actions, and choice. Today, simulative methods allow such links, starting from the definition of computational models of social phenomena. Social Simulation based on Agents consists in constructing society models of artificial agents, in transferring these models onto programmes that run in computers, in observing the dynamics of such societies and possibly translate them into values, quantitative data to elaborate statistically. Our work will examine a study-case, i.e. an agents' simulation bent on the exploration of the relationship between users of new technologies and the propensity to risk, intended as tendency towards innovation. The simulation originates from a research about the effects that an information campaign against Trusted Computing, (i.e. a hardware and software control system on digital information flow that members of the Trusted Computing Group have been trying to put in to action for some years) could have on six different type of users, that research differentiates on the basis of their info computer-studies competence and their interest in new communication and information technologies. Such simulation will be analysed from the epistemology of social sciences point of view, with the objective of verifying which could be the contribution of hypothesis triggered by the connection of different disciplines, such as, in the specific case, sociology, cognitive psychology of the experimental cut, economics.

Risks of health surveillance: the case of mammography screening in Norway

Solbjør, Marit

Public Health and General Practice, Norwegian University of Science and Technology Trondheim, Norway

Keywords

Mammography screening, health surveillance, false negative

Mammography screening for breast cancer is common in most European countries. Mammography screening is health surveillance technology meant to minimize women's risk of dying from breast cancer. In Norway the mammography programme invites all women aged 50-69, and has a participation rate of more than 70 per cent. Its aim is to reduce breast cancer mortality by 30 per cent through its early detection of breast cancer, preferably at a pre-symptomatic stage.

Women who participate in mammography screening are non-symptomatic. Through screening they are put at risk for a breast cancer diagnosis which may be true or false, but which in any case induces their entry into cancer treatment regimes. Debates on the risk of over-diagnosis from mammography screening are presently taking place in medical journals. Women themselves do however worry more about the potential of having a false negative mammography screen (Solbjør 2008).

This paper will explore whether mammography screening, with its potential to save women from breast cancer death, also could be seen as a health risk. Based on interviews with women who receive a breast cancer diagnosis between screening rounds, the paper asks how these women interpret mammography screening. A central point here is how women experience receiving their breast cancer diagnosis in the interval between screening rounds while being participants in a screening programme. Women who are invited to the Norwegian mammography programme are glad to be enrolled into the programme (Østerlie et al 2008). This paper will examine whether their positive attitude towards mammography screening remains after having an interval cancer. It raises questions of whether mammography screening is saving the lives of some women, while putting other women at risk for a false diagnosis and untimely or delayed medical intervention.

Risks of Misunderstanding in Multilingual Networks

Harnisch, Svetlana

SOCIOLOGY OF PROFESSION, INSTITUTE OF SOCIOLOGY RUSSIAN ACADEMY OF SCIENCES MOSCOW, RUSSIAN FEDERATION

Keywords

R&D, miscommunication as a risk, multiplication of links, language expansion, lingual diversity

The paper deals with linguistic diversity as a result of labor migration and expansion of flows of information. Multiplication of Networks links is seen as one of the principles of informational society (democratization). But it is also seen as an obstacle for mutual understanding for operators working within a network (babylonization). Tasks of the paper are: to find out how communicative problems are solved in a case of linguistic diversity of employees within various types (scientific, commercial, educative, et al) of international organizations (IO) & transnational cooperations (TC); what languages tend to expand and how language expansion effect real & virtual public spheres of information, including the street posters of advertising. Commercial advertising has neither geo-political, nor socio-cultural borders. Meanwhile they are not neutral neither for culture no languages of population of Western and Eastern European countries.

A choice and a use of a language as a lingua-franca for public spheres in a case of lingual diversity of population has become one of the urgent items of national policy. One may speculate about risks in a high-technologized society security in connection with of their national languages and cultural heritage. English has become an official language in international aviation, navigation and electronics. But it does not mean that those who work in aviation, navigation and electronics and whose native languages differ from English have proper command of English and can use it for proficiency. English is used as the most popular lingua-franca in EU. And it is a link of exchange between the East and West. It confirms an expansion of English all over the world. But it also means that a number of variables of English have been increased. As a result there are numerous territorial and professional variants of English with a risk of mutual misunderstanding among them. It has become an obstacle is it is used within a Network among operators and R&Ds whose native languages are not English.

Results of survey of misunderstanding of English used by non-native English speakers have been discussed.

Risky Identities and the UK Biometric ID Cards

Pieri, Elisa

*Sociology, University of Manchester
Manchester, United Kingdom*

Keywords

Immigration, Risk, uncertainty, UK ID cards, Newspaper Coverage

In the aftermath of the terrorist attacks in NY and London the strengthening of internal and external security continues to be a priority of the European Union. A common and enhanced security policy plays a strategic role in the attempt to create a cohesive European Society.

In the United Kingdom the need to enhance security and manage the risks and uncertainties associated with terrorism has been intertwined with old concerns about immigration flows and border control. Security threats have also been linked to the new or increased risks associated with identity theft and fraud, particularly in an age of internet banking and other on-line transactions.

This paper looks at the new National Identity Scheme that the UK Government is seeking to implement, which will involve the creation of a database - the National Identity Register - and the collection of biometric details and other citizen personal data. The Scheme will keep a record of all the encounters that require the verification of the id token (a card), and access to citizens' information will be shared across government departments and some private partners.

The paper is based on a project conducted at the ESRC National Centre for e-Social Science (2008-2009) that analysed the UK national newspaper over several months in 2008 to identify and appraise the arguments mobilised to create momentum behind the Scheme and the perceived need to verify and authenticate one's identity. The Scheme, which has proven very unpopular both in parliament and in public opinion, will be discussed against the backdrop of enhanced surveillance in the UK, the collection of personal data and the pervasive use of monitoring and profiling technologies

Through the analysis of newspaper coverage I will focus on the fragmentation of citizens into groups, as operated by the UK Government's plans and its rhetoric for differential enrolment in the Scheme. I will problematise the construction of risky identities and this fragmentation, which results in different levels of risk and uncertainty being associated with each group, and different steps for coerced enrolment in the Scheme.

Risky solidarity. The limits of insurance as a technology for distributing welfare

Liukko, Jyri

*Sociology, University of Helsinki
Helsinki, Finland*

Lehtonen, Turo-Kimmo

*University of Helsinki, Helsinki Collegium for Advanced Studies
Helsinki, Finland*

Keywords

Risk, insurance, welfare, Solidarity

Insurance technology leads one to think about the production of welfare in terms of risk pools. Through these pools, economic risks and benefits are redistributed in a particular way. In private insurance the degree of risk classification affects the way in which insurance can be seen as a form of solidarity. In social insurance the degree of income redistribution has the same effect. This paper analyses the particular conceptions of solidarity which the different forms of insurantal practice produce. The main questions are: How have insurantal practices led to a specific understanding of the meaning and extent of solidarity and, consequently, the idea of welfare itself? How are the limits of insurantal solidarity defined in different variations of insurance technology? We emphasize that the question of solidarity has to be analyzed simultaneously in relation to both private and social insurance. We begin by briefly examining the historical developments through which insurance became a focal instrument of social solidarity. Second, we analyse the peculiarity of insurantal solidarity in relation to a more general concept of solidarity. The third section discusses the ways in which the prices and benefits of insurance can be determined, and the ways in which the ideas of solidarity, equality and justice are involved in this. Special emphasis is put on the role of risk classifications. The final part of the paper discusses how insurantal solidarity diverges from the conceptions of solidarity evident in the non-contributory minimum benefits provided by many social security regimes.

School-staging and back-watching - teachers strategies in risk-conscious schools

Nordängner, Ulla Karin

School of Human Sciences, University of Kalmar Kalmar, Sweden

Lindqvist, Per

School of Human Sciences, University of Kalmar Kalmar, Sweden

Keywords

audit culture, risk management, school, teacher, risk society

In the twenty-first century, risk assessment has become a crucial part of our daily lives and the fact that people in today's society perform daily risk analyses also affects the school system. Should the class go on a school outing even if the bus lacks seat belts? May the female PE teacher enter the boys dressing room?

In the presentation we put forward questions, hypothesis and empirical examples of how this societal fear of nondescript risk-scenarios interact with an increasing emotional value of children and market-oriented forms of control and regulation, and how this, in its turn, affects the daily life and work of teachers. How do they cope?

When analysing data from focus interviews, home-pages of schools and parent-teacher meetings three distinct strategies that teachers develop in order to deal with risk and avoid blame can be discerned. The first strategy concerns risk as an objective phenomenon while the other two can be tied to more subjective risk assessments. They concern on one hand the mediation of promotive images (school-staging) that, in different ways, suggest that school life is characterized by security, and on the other preventive strategies (back-watching) in order to avoid future blame. In the presentation, we focus on the two latter strategies. We have chosen to depict them as strategies of assurance and insurance.

In the empirical material a risk practice with defensive characteristics can be discerned, where the focus is on what may go wrong and who, in such a case, may be named, blamed and shamed. In the presentation, we call attention to the fact that risk is not always something negative, that it also includes a positive potential. To be in the risk zone does not only mean that one is subjected to danger, but also that one is situated in a zone of possibility and development. Hence, we want to debate the possibility of introducing practices which reflect a more constructive and positive risk logic, a logic that is not just based on individual flaws but where it is possible to generalize separate events to the system as such.

Seismic Hazard on the ambit of Sociology of Risk and Uncertainty

Diego Gonçalves, Carmen

*Center for Social Studies, University of Coimbra
Coimbra, Portugal*

Keywords

Risk, uncertainty, Hazard

On the perspective of the Sociology of Risk, a reflection about the interconnection of hazard, risk and uncertainty concepts related with seismic natural disaster will presented in this work.

The focus will be oriented to the culture of risk and its, social, economic, and political implications, related with physical dimension of this geophysics events and their consequences related with human action (antropic) which can contribute to unleash those events, increasing the uncertainty of the prevention measures, which can not be considered aside the uncertainty (or undeterminacy) of the prevision scientiifc procedures related with the very nature of the phenomena.

Setting up the risk society - the rise of the epidemiological risk factor model into Finnish public health research and policy

Jauho, Mikko

-, National Consumer Research Centre Finland
Helsinki, Finland

Keywords

Finland, Public Health, epidemiology, risk factor model, coronary heart disease

How is a style of reasoning adopted by a scientific community? How do its modes of analysis become established in a policy field? These two questions guide my paper that looks at the rise of the epidemiological risk factor model into Finnish public health research and policy in the post-WWII era.

A risk factor is "a pattern of behavior or physical characteristic of a group of individuals that increases the probability of the future occurrence of one or more diseases in that group relative to comparable groups without or with different levels of the behavior or characteristic" (Rothstein). The tracking of epidemiological risks has a long and scattered history from the studies of Farr and Villermé to insurance medicine, but the risk factor model was consolidated in the discussions on the aetiologies of lung cancer and coronary heart disease (CHD) during the epidemiological transition after WWII. This discussion concerned not only the question whether smoking and other lifestyle factors actually caused chronic disease, but also a more fundamental issue, the status of epidemiological explanations based on statistical correlations. In the process, a new way of conceptualising health problems or a new style of reasoning (Hacking) was introduced into the professional world of health experts. It also had a profound impact on public health policy, guiding e.g. tobacco legislation and preventive health care measures to fight CHD.

My paper discusses this development in the context of CHD prevention in Finland from 1950s to 70s. How were epidemiological risk models and risk analysis adopted by Finnish health professionals? How were the new insights translated into action plans and public health policies to reduce cardiovascular risks in the population? Based on historical archive material, the paper contributes to the salient discussion on risk society. Its emergence is not viewed as an epochal rupture, but a gradual process that involves specific technologies of risk put into operation in concrete settings. Through its focus on a specific national path in adopting new technologies of risk, the paper also addresses the general theme of the conference.

Spatial dimension of risk at major events: the case study of Geneva during Euro 2008

Viot, Pascal

*ESpRi - Etude de la spatialité des risques, Ecole Polytechnique Fédérale de Lausanne
Lausanne, Switzerland*

Keywords

crowd, major events, security

This abstract corresponds to a thesis project that targets questions of laying out, of welcoming, of security and crowd management asked by the organisation of major contemporary events, based on two case studies, a music festival (Paléo Festival Nyon - Switzerland) and a sports event (Euro 2008 in the host-city of Geneva - Switzerland). In the Framework of this research, we will interest ourselves at the manner an event incurs a temporary rearrangement of the space in a physical dimension (deployment of security barriers, road closures, arrangement of special transport measures, etc.), and at the specific social and policing management (deployment of a reinforced surveillance, police presence, welcoming and security policies). This project aims to understand the manner in which the actors of a major event are brought to integrate the risks and security questions in the organisation of the event. Among the numerous questions that we ask ourselves, some particularly concerns the management of the event's participants (fans and supporters, visitors with ou without tickets, neighbours, etc.), the temporary urban installations specifically installed for the event (redefining traffic plans, pedestrian walkways) and the management of designated meeting points. It is thus a question for us to analyse the security Handling of an event in all its aspects, not only in the festival sight or stadium but also in the movements of participants or their gathering in public areas. In terms of objectives, this research aims to shed light on the general security and welcoming measures for major contemporary events but also in fine to think on the application of planning and urbanism measures (ephemeral or more long-lasting) integrating strong security preoccupations.

Surveillance, Ambivalence and Public Participation

Simões, Maria João

*Sociologia, Universidade da Beira Interior ? UBI_CES
Covilhã, Portugal*

Augusto, Amélia

Sociologia, Universidade da Beira Interior ? UBI_CES Covilhã, Portugal

Keywords

Risk, Public Participation, Surveillance, ambivalence

Surveillance has increased exponentially in contemporary societies, either extensively through all spheres of social activity, and also becoming global, as intensively penetrating in the routines of our daily lives.

This twofold process of expansion, already enabled by ICT, has been further enhanced by the emergence of new forms of surveillance, namely biosurveillance, videosurveillance, surveillance made possible by electronic identity cards and commercial surveillance.

The surveillance technologies (ST) are also used in a systematic way for risk prevention - having this aspect been enhanced from the September 11th. However it is paradoxical that the use of ST for the prevention of risk has become increasingly a risk to take into account for the exercise of citizenship.

On the other hand, the registration, categorization and classification made possible through ST triggers processes of the inclusion and exclusion concerning commodities, services and participation opportunities that impact upon life trajectory of people, depending on the categories in which they are inserted.

It is known that the ST are ambivalent, given that they have positive and negative dimensions that can be enhanced more in one way or another, depending on the purposes for which they were created. We also know that the development and use of ST can vary regarding the social and historical context. Even if used for benign ends, they may have unintended consequences

The question is whether we are witnessing either an increase to their negative dimensions or a growing imbalance of power between the "vigilant" and the "monitored" and, in this way, a subsequent thickening of the raising social risks of a totalitarian society, composed by increasingly "transparent" citizens. This is even more worrying, because large sections of the population are more willing to give - if solicited - their personal data, believing more in the benefits of surveillance than in the potential risks, thinking they have nothing to fear or hide.

Pursuing this line of argumentation, the purpose of this communication is to question the mechanisms and procedures for participation of people in the policies, design and uses of ST.

Sustainability and uncertainty of pension provisions in Europe

Gough, Orla

*Sociology, University of Westminster
London, United Kingdom*

Adami, Roberta

*Sociology, University of Westminster
London, United Kingdom*

Keywords

Adequacy of pension income, public and private pensions, sustainability and uncertainty

In recent years there has been a trend towards sustainable pension systems with policy makers and academics showing an increasing interest towards private institutions playing a role in complementing public provisions and individuals being offered incentives to save for retirement. The sustainability of pension systems has provoked discussions in many western countries about the reform of funded pension schemes, the age of retirement, and the adequacy of post-retirement income. Many European countries, faced with ageing populations and their socio-economic consequences have had to implement several pension reforms in the last decade. The argument in favour of fully funded pension systems (as opposed to PAYG), where retirees receive pensions linked to their contributions over their lifetime, is one of long term sustainability, however amongst the countries that have implemented private defined contributions schemes some have also experienced high poverty rates of those in retirement, especially among the most vulnerable individuals with interrupted employment histories or on low incomes. This paper examines the microeconomic evidence on provisions and adequacy of pension income of ageing populations across Europe by using data from the Survey of Health, Ageing and Retirement in Europe (SHARE) and the Family Resources Survey (FRS). This article presents the key changes introduced to pension systems by European governments in the last decade, illustrates how recent reforms aim at increasing the sustainability of state pension systems by introducing and encouraging private schemes but also reflects on the increased uncertainty brought about by the same reforms. The authors suggest that unless a complementary relationship between public and private pension exists, where private components are added to the basic level of state pensions and do not substitute them, the adequacy of retirement income will be negatively affected. Further, we argue that the effects of interrupted employment histories and low paid jobs lead to more serious consequences, in terms of post-retirement income adequacy, in systems based on private defined contributions, where the risk of stock market falls and low annuity rates are placed with the individuals.

The axioms of Precaution: Precautionary Logic and our Relation to Nature

Arnoldussen, Tobias

Sociology of Law, Erasmus University Rotterdam Rotterdam, The Netherlands

Keywords

culture, worldview, Risk, environment, precaution

In my paper I wish to examine the presuppositions implied in arguments to justify precautionary politics in the field of environmental regulation, life style choices and crime. Precautionary politics is based on the idea that taking preventative measures is necessary, even when there is no scientific evidence of harm.

In order to convince others of the merits of this point of view, arguments are used. Arguments have a certain structure which would render the argument true and hence the participant should be convinced with the argument if he or she is rational. The science dealing with the form of arguments is called formal logic. The classic example of a logical structure of an argument is the syllogism. It is already documented by Aristotle. The syllogism has a certain structure which allows us to deduce a true conclusion from its premises. However in order to reach true conclusions, the premises must be true as well. In medieval times the science that dealt with finding true premises was called material logic.

In this presentation I put forward the thesis that precautionary logic is a type of material logic. This means it is based on premises or presuppositions which are presumed true and are not themselves questioned. By analyzing various arguments used by proponents of precaution, I aim to unearth these presuppositions upon which precautionary arguments rest. In doing so I hope to show that an eschatological worldview often lies behind the call for precaution.

The construction of risks and uncertainties in relation to the avoidable death

Mackintosh, Nicola

*Research Associate - Innovations Programme NIHR, King's Patient Safety and Service Quality Research Centre
London, United Kingdom*

Sandall, Jane

*Research Associate - Innovations Programme NIHR, King's Patient Safety and Service Quality Research Centre
London, United Kingdom*

Keywords

Patient Safety, Health Professions, medical uncertainty

In today's risk society the management of latent risk and escalation of care for the deteriorating patient at a professional and organisational level has been identified as a key issue in distributed care systems both nationally and internationally. Evidence of "failure to rescue" (failure to recognise and respond appropriately to early signs of deterioration) has been documented across clinical specialities, notably medicine, surgery and maternity. A significant proportion of these hospital deaths (including maternal and perinatal) from failure to rescue are perceived to be potentially predictable and preventable. Reflecting the current safety discourse of prediction, control and avoidance of "the accidental" (Green 2003), current national and local policy have a tendency to present the normative view that all causes of death can be determined, manipulated and postponed. Current risk management strategies are constructed around regulation of routine assessments and the governance and control of the professional management of the trajectory of the patient with acute deterioration in their condition.

Further exploration is required to understand how the distributed decision making, multiple viewpoints and conflicting knowledge bases influence the "brokering" process around deterioration. Death brokering involves processes such as drawing an acceptable line between curing or letting go, achieving a "good" death and avoiding "bad" deaths and attributing legitimate responsibility for the death (Abbott 1988). In addition, furthering our understanding of the risks associated with the uncertainty and "messy world" of the patient whose condition is deteriorating will increase our understanding of the role of these safety strategies introduced to predict and control this "avoidable" phenomena.

This paper will draw on findings from a two year project combining elements of ethnographic (observation and narrative analysis of documentation) and interview-based research from two medical settings from two UK NHS Trusts. The combination of these approaches enables assessment of street-level practice in terms of its own internal logic by examining both the conditions of work and the content of practice. Data will be presented from observations and interviews with patients, relatives and a variety of staff.

The implementation of medical advances: the constitution of Intensive Care Medicine as new Speciality in a Central Hospital

Xavier, Beatriz

*Department of Sociology / PhD student, Faculdade de Ciências Sociais e Humanas da Universidade Nova de Lisboa
Lisboa, Portugal*

Keywords

risk and new medical technologies, medical work, Medical sociology

Medical work is mediated by sophisticated technological means. The "transformative power" of technological innovation regarding health, illness and the body, and even the concept of human life, can be illustrated, among others, by the case of Intensive Care Medicine.

The number of Intensive Care Units has been increasing steadily by various technological, medical and social reasons. Equality and the universality of citizenship rights, scientific development and improvement in the services, exert constant pressures with regards to the treatment of patients in intensive care, originating ethical and medical controversies.

Beyond the discussions held by institutional actors, which kind of participation do patients, their families, and society in general, could have in matters of uncertainty and risk associate with the employment of all available technology in the hospital?

Thinking in different views of risk and uncertainty among medical staff, patients and families, we intend to know how they are negotiated and applied in hospital work.

Technology is not only about artefacts but also an organizational and professional procedure, underlining the modernization, innovation and progress discourse. The ways of doing and organizing the medical practices transform them selves in technological procedures.

Technological functions and effects are not an inherent matter but social and culturally contextualized, so they could be passively accepted or radically contested. However, as far as health and medical practices is concerned, they are always introduce to us as good, justified for the well of the patients, minimized in concerned to risks and uncertainty degree.

New technical knowledge both opens and close doors because it works with uncertainty. The consequences for medical practices are the growing number of options at one's disposal, implying risk-benefit accountability

The interactive effect of strain and personal resiliency in the explanation of deviant behaviour: age and gender differences

Op de Beeck, Hanne

Criminal Law and Criminology, Leuven Institute of Criminology Leuven, Belgium

Keywords

strain, deviancy, resiliency

Agnew's General Strain Theory (GST), although only recently developed, became quickly one of the most prominent social-psychological theories of youth delinquency. Within this theory it is proposed that individuals who are exposed to more and/or intense stressors have a higher chance to become frustrated and, as a consequence, engage in internalizing or externalizing deviant behavior. However, this connection does not have a linear pattern. Some individuals are more resilient than others. Therefore, the independent as well as the interactive effects of the experience of frustration (strain) and personal resiliency factors (individualism, self-efficacy and morality) on deviant behavior will be tested. In this model, a specific focus will be given to age and gender differences. Considering age differences, it is assumed that adolescents will experience more stress than adults. On top of that, it is assumed that they will be higher in individualism and lower in the estimation of their self-efficacy. Considering sex differences, the hypothesis that girls and boys experience the same amount, but a different type of frustration as well as the hypothesis that girls will be lower in individualism and self-efficacy will be examined. The hypotheses will be tested with the second Flemish Youth monitor. For this database, a self-report survey was filled out by a sample of 3708 Flemish youth (minimum age was 11, maximum age was 30). Data collection started in August 2008 and was finished in January 2009.

The phenomenon of preparing for pregnancy challenged by risk: a case study of a woman with epilepsy.

Winterbottom, Janine B.

*Neurological Science, The University of Liverpool
Liverpool, England*

Jacoby, Ann

*Public Health, The University of Liverpool
Liverpool, England*

Kierans, Ciara

*Public Health, The University of Liverpool
Liverpool, England*

Baker, Gus

Neurological Science, The University of Liverpool England,

Keywords

Epilepsy, pregnancy risk, teratogenicity.

Women with epilepsy preparing for pregnancy must balance individual seizure risk alongside general health risks. The societal premise that healthy women deliver healthy babies who grow into healthy infants and adults, rests on the assumption that the women have consciously expressed pregnancy intentions, access health care prior to conception, and make necessary health changes that will reduce potential adverse pregnancy outcomes.

The additional challenge for women with epilepsy is that a balance needs to be struck between reducing seizure risk (which often requires ongoing antiepileptic drug therapy throughout childbearing years) whilst minimising teratogenic risks to the unborn child.

Access to preconception counselling and recommendations to plan pregnancy are internationally recognised as ideal opportunities to intervene by assessing risk, providing pregnancy risk information, and promoting health interventions with the goal of reducing adverse pregnancy outcome.

This paper will present a case study from an interpretive phenomenological research project exploring how women with epilepsy perceive risk information and make personal decisions when contemplating pregnancy. A 30 year old woman with epilepsy was followed throughout her involvement in preconception counselling. Data were collected by observation of a hospital clinic visit and follow-up with an in-depth interview. The complexity of this woman's reproductive life with epilepsy, her need to interpret personal seizure risk and treatment decisions, alongside her future pregnancy desires will be presented. The case demonstrates the social context of pregnancy intention and risk awareness, the utility of risk information and the health behaviour-related actions arising from a preconception counselling visit.

Analysis reveals how women with epilepsy are shaped by their social world of work and finance, of relationships and by their personal view of motherhood, which places responsibility on them to be the gatekeeper of risk. Women are typically presented with risk information during routine clinical review; however, the opportunity to contextualise individual risk within a woman's life is seen to fall outside of the experience of preconception counselling. The context of how women with epilepsy make decisions will be interpreted alongside the literature on reflexive judgements in which future pregnancy desires are judged subjectively.

The Riskiness of Some Persistent Taxonomies: A Methodological and Ethical Note

Burns, Tom

Sociology, Uppsala Universitet Uppsala, Sweden

Machado, Nora

, ISCTE

Keywords

Gender, Risk, race

Why does the widespread use of some highly dubious social category systems persist? How to explain their resilience? Even when essentialist definitions of gender, race/ethnicity, age, weight, etc. have long been scientifically and often politically discredited, such classifications are still commonplace in much scientific research and policy-making as well as in everyday private usage. The paper argues that a major explanatory factor is that such systems are widely assumed to facilitate the analysis and regulation of many important social patterns and to reduce social risks. At the same time the systems themselves contribute to other, unintended risks. The paper's concluding discussion emphasises that risky category systems are established and applied not only to distinctions in populations and groups of individuals but to distinctions in situations, objects, technologies, actions/behaviour, and development patterns. It is argued that there are practical and unavoidable reasons for such persistent usage in modern "calculative rationality." On the other hand, improvement in the design of category systems must take into account the impact(s) on people's lives (legally, administratively, socio-economically, medically, etc and everyday life) and related ethical issues. The paper concludes that from an ethical perspective, social and bio-medical category systems have to be continuously and critically assessed in order to minimize the risks of reification, stigmatization, and negative unintended impacts on people's lives. At the same time, developing better alternatives to such social taxonomies should be an enduring priority.

The role of gender dynamics in decisions on credit and debt in low income families in the UK

Goode, Jackie

*Social Sciences, Loughborough University
UK,*

Keywords

low-income families, Gender, debt

Low income families constantly face potential financial crisis and are always at risk of poverty. This precarious position is exacerbated for some by over-indebtedness. Despite the rise in the use of credit and levels of indebtedness in the decades preceding the recent 'credit crunch', it is not a subject that has figured largely in the academic literature. A small number of studies document the extent of UK indebtedness, identify some characteristics of households who use credit and incur debts, and give some limited information about the kinds of consumer goods credit is used to purchase, but their methodological approaches do not give any insight into actual decision-making processes around borrowing, especially in low income families.

Disparities between partners that have emerged in research on the distribution of income within families is at odds with a ubiquitous finding of the same literature that the majority of couples apparently subscribe to a partnership model in which men and women are seen to be equal, and therefore to share resources equally. Explanations for why financial discrepancies between men and women persist despite an espoused ideology of equal sharing have drawn variously on: the resource theory of power; the sociology of gender; the psychology of entitlement; and the social psychology of distributive justice. More recently, there has been a call for a more discursive approach to studying the household economy.

This paper reports on an ongoing qualitative longitudinal study of the dynamics of poverty and debt in low income families in the UK, begun just as the credit crunch and recession brought a heightened sense of risk to all. Using repeated telephone and in-depth interviews, it takes a discursive approach. Pahl observed that the financial arrangements of a couple speak eloquently about the nature of their relationship. Here, the nature of the couple relationship, as recounted and observed over time, is used as a window on their decision-making around the use of borrowing and the acquisition of debt, which enables identification of gender dynamics as one of the mechanisms through which decision-making in relation to this area of practice is accomplished.

The Social Dynamics of Rumours in the Age of Risk and Uncertainty: The Relationship between Rumours, Risk, Uncertainty and Erosion of Social Trust in Turkey

Delibas, Kayhan

Sociology, Adnan Menderes University AYDIN, Turkey

Keywords

Rumours, Risk, uncertainty, Erosion of Social Trust, Turkey

Drawing on empirical research, questionnaires and in-depth interviews carried out in five Turkish cities from March to December 2008, this paper aims to chart «rumours» - particularly «earthquake related rumours» will be investigated in relation to the fragmentation of cultural authority, growth of competition for claims making by various groups, risk society and uncertainties that have been prevalent in the post 9/11 world in Turkey. The research addressed five main objectives: to find out patterns and causes of sudden rumours explosions; to examine the relationships between alternative sources of information, e.g. urban legends, rumour, gossip, risk society and erosion of trust and assessing how they affect each other; to understand the reasons of rumours spreading and emerging in post 9/11 world; to grasp the patterns of rumour construction and circulation, and, finally analyse the socio cultural impacts of rumour in Turkish society.

In the last two decades risk and uncertainties has become one of the most common futures of postindustrial Western societies. For this reason risks have become a focus for numerous contemporary research across the social sciences. In recent times non- Western societies too came to share the same outlook. For Beck (2005) in world risk society, non-Western societies share with the West not only the same space and time but also the same basic challenges of the second modernity. This thesis widely discussed, however very rarely tested using quantitative data. Departing from this perspective we aim to test some of the assumptions of risk society using empirical evidence gathered our fieldwork.

The paper suggests that Turkey has been rapidly becoming part of the world risk society and sharing numerous aspects and showing symptoms of it. There is another but quite parallel occurrence taking place that is the mass circulating rumours concerning a wide variety of issues. It is our intention to examine the nature and characteristics of rumours that currently occurring in unprecedented scale. Rumours, particularly the earthquake related rumours will be investigated in relation to risks, uncertainties and erosion social trust in Turkey.

*The author acknowledges the support of the TÜBİTAK for the (project no 107K230).

The Social Organization of AIDS

Kleres, Jochen

Institut für Soziologie, Universität Leipzig Berlin, Germany

Keywords

power, organization, AIDS

The AIDS epidemic marked a turning point for the institutional response to public health threats. It was the context for further institutionalizing and widely implementing an approach known as "new public health". This became the dominant political response to the epidemic in many countries. The central aim of this approach is to involve affected communities as carriers of public health efforts. Accordingly, AIDS organizations have become the pivotal actor for managing the public health risks signified by "AIDS". Research on AIDS organizations, however, is scattered. This presentation will synthesize the existing research and will sketch out general aspects of a sociology of AIDS organizations. Neo-corporatism and neo-institutionalism can function as a theoretical basis, but wider cultural aspects need to be included as well. AIDS organizations evolved within the broader context of AIDS-discourses that constructed in complex ways culture-coded notions of risks - these left crucial imprints on AIDS organizations. These combined perspectives help to explore the significance of explanatory factors, starting from political opportunity structures and ending with the processes of professionalization. In particular, this approach allows dissection of key conditions for AIDS organizations to operate as well as analysis of the complex forms of power that constitute and permeate them. AIDS organizations then appear in the dual role of challenging power structures while wielding power themselves. This will be briefly illustrated by some of the burgeoning research on emerging practices and identities of bareback sex. Another example will be taken from my own research on dissolved AIDS organizations that reveals the significance of civic identities (activism, volunteerism, professionalism) for degrees of politicization and the maintenance of individual commitment to AIDS work.

The societal context of individual risk perception - an empirical investigation of the acceptance of disposal projects for nuclear waste in Switzerland

Stauffacher, Michael

Institute for Environmental Decisions - Natural and Social Science Interface, ETH Zurich Zurich, Switzerland

Kruetli, Pius

*Institute for Environmental Decisions - Natural and Social Science Interface, ETH Zurich
Zurich, Switzerland*

Moser, Corinne

*Institute for Environmental Decisions - Natural and Social Science Interface, ETH Zurich
Zurich, Switzerland*

Scholz, Roland W.

*Institute for Environmental Decisions - Natural and Social Science Interface, ETH Zurich
Zurich, Switzerland*

Keywords

Societal context of risk, risk perception, nuclear waste, societal mood

It is often claimed that when deciding upon a controversial socio-technical system, like for example the siting of a nuclear waste disposal, people tend to refer to risk-benefit considerations. More concretely, research shows that acceptance is positively influenced by perception of benefits and negatively by that of risks. In contrast, the role of unconscious and automatic responses is stressed in the affect heuristic. Here it is shown that positive affect impacts the perception of benefits; negative, on the other hand, that of risks. Further research integrated additional variables like e.g. trust or values.

These effects are mostly discussed from an individualistic perspective neglecting the historical and societal context. We argue that a more encompassing view is necessary, accommodating the different understandings and appraisals of the issue existing in the society. We claim that judgments are not primarily influenced by risk-benefit calculations but more so by non-rationalist deliberations. These are normally referred to as affects in risk perception research. We, however, argue that at the societal level, a "societal mood" develops in discourses on the risk object in a broader context, often amplified (or attenuated) through opinion leaders and the mass media. We therefore deliberately use the term prevailing mood as we do not consider actual emotional states as prevalent especially in a situation of low concernedness and among the public at large.

We test our model using a representative postal survey (N = 2,428, response rate 46.1%) in whole Switzerland. Using path analysis, we can show that negative moods have a large influence on acceptance both mediated through trust and risk perception but as well directly. In congruence with this, we can show that positive moods play a comparable role insofar they influence trust and perception of benefits positively and even more acceptance of nuclear waste disposal directly. Hence, the societal context - captured by the "societal mood" - matters. We conclude that acceptance of a nuclear waste disposal is a multilayered phenomenon which defies easy explanations. Hence, risk communication strategies should refrain from simplistic recommendations and rather promote a well-informed governance of the societal decision process.

The Struggle with Terrorism and Political Authenticity

Japp, Klaus P.

Sociology, Bielefeld University Bielefeld, Germany

Keywords

Authenticity, Risk, terrorism

Observers of world politics and the world public attribute damages to risk, because there has to be someone who is guilty. For example, they attribute bombings to entities with the assumed ability to act, primarily al-Qaida. For these observers, the temporal, material and social uncertainties of the organized and globally operating terrorism are a danger that must be attributed to a concrete enemy. Consequently, the political system is expected to deal with the problem, which thus is transformed into a political risk of preventive decisions. The style of this prevention is typically displaying authenticity. The politics of prevention is following the "credibility imperative". The heroic expression of this style is the term "war on terror". What I want to show is that this display of authenticity provokes counter-effects of disbelief and distrust. The reason is, that modern society undermines the display of authenticity. The general loss of basic values, religious or moral substance produces a tendency of "suspicion of motive". Whenever someone displays his motives as authentic he will be suspected as hiding his real motives. This tendency is strengthened by the difference between risk and danger. Those who feel affected by the side-effects (danger) of preventive politics (risk) like a loss of liberal rights and/or the questionable support for authoritarian regimes will not believe in the display of authenticity.

This constellation possibly results in an -authenticity trap: Politics of the "credibility imperative" will be undermined by a tendency of suspicion. It is a trap because politics on the one side cannot do without authenticity and on the other side this authenticity will produce disbelief resulting in a decrease of political support. The end of the Bush-Regime is one example - but how long will the presumed authenticity of Barak Obama be perceived as a solid political style?

Trans-national risks and the regulation of online gambling in the EU: Exploring Gibraltar as an "online gambling haven"

Kingma, Sytze

COM, Vrije Universiteit Amsterdam

Amsterdam, The Netherlands

Zborowska, Natalia

COM, Vrije Universiteit Amsterdam

Amsterdam, The Netherlands

Keywords

risk regulation, online gambling, Europeanisation

This paper deals with the emergence and regulation of online gambling organisations in the EU. Empirically the issue is explored in the case of Gibraltar, one of the EU jurisdictions which emerged as one of "online gambling havens". Theoretically it is argued that online gambling organisations introduce new kinds of "trans-national risks". In many EU states, national gambling enterprises have been protected from competition from abroad. However, this situation has been challenged by the development of Internet gambling, the discussions about the "Services Directive", and cases brought to the European Court of Justice. These circumstances are redefining the European context for national gambling policies and gambling organisations. Online gambling created new opportunities for the industry to transcend national borders creating a new challenge for policy makers. National legislators and some existing gambling businesses often actively resist operators from other member states. The risks associated with online gambling such as money laundering, easy access for the under aged and vulnerable, often serve as justification to constrain the market. However, risk management does not pertain only to the risk of excessive gambling and crime. A significant feature of the risk relates also to organisational legitimacy. Contesting the perception of the public and policy makers or as Power (2007) puts it, "managing of reputational risk", is one of the strategies of online gambling operators to legitimise the industry. Industry and governments are increasingly involved in the management of "manufactured" risks (Beck, 1992), in fact creating a new "institutionalized risk environment" (Giddens, 1990) and new forms of "risk-governance" (Hood et al, 2001). The few European jurisdictions which have regulated online gambling play a vital role in this process, with Gibraltar being a key player. In this paper we explore the online gambling industry in Gibraltar and how this industry relates to the broader national and European regulatory environment. We outline how the industry presents itself and the various risk-management strategies it adopts. The main argument is that online gambling constitutes a relatively new field of trans-national risks, and that risk-regulation in this field involves a variety of state and non state actors.

Trust in the health care system: The risks of placing confidence in professional communities

Lascaux, Alexander

*Sociology, Russian Academy of Science & University of Hertfordshire
Moscow, Russia*

Keywords

health care system, trusting attitudes, patients and doctors relationships

Forming and sustaining trustful relationships between patients and doctors seems to be of paramount importance for the correct functioning of medical care systems, since they by necessity embrace emotionally-driven interactions among the people involved in this area of activity. In turn, personal attitudes, which are developing within the patient - doctor dyads, are molded by the vehicles of institutional support built into the medical care systems.

But what precisely are the reasons for experiencing trust in the systems of medical care, that is, an array of organizations and institutions aiming at preventing ailments, curing them and subsequently rehabilitating their patients? Certainly, our specific knowledge cannot serve as a foundation for this form of trusting attitudes. Were we ourselves knowledgeable in medicine, we would feel much less need for developing patterns of trust in physicians. Expertise at our disposal would perform the controlling function in the area of medical assignments, while simultaneously protecting us from potentially harmful actions of medical systems and diminishing the need for forging trustful relationships with their constituents. On the contrary, when we are dependent on a medical care system as a result of lack of professional knowledge coupled with helplessness of being ill, signs of doctors' competence and integrity bear direct connection to developing trusting attitudes towards them and creating a sense of security despite possible health hazards.

We must take into account, however, that this sense of trust and safety is to a large extent founded on illusionary expectations. We are trying to assure ourselves that, in the situation of our ignorance or partial knowledge, our manifestations of trust are safeguarded, guaranteed or insured by the higher-order institutions, which are lowering our vulnerability to the systems of medical care. Essentially, we are involved into building characteristic pyramids of trust, so that the responsibility for the proper functioning of underlying systems is being transferred to ever higher levels of hierarchical structures. The arising problem of infinite regress spoils the attempts at building the reliable foundations of placing confidence in the professional medical systems.

Vermin, victims and disease: public controversy over badgers and bovine TB in the UK

Kenten, Charlotte

*Consumer Science, Institute of Food Research
Norwich, UK*

Cassidy, Angela

*Consumer Science, Institute of Food Research
Norwich, UK*

Keywords

science, farming, wildlife, animal disease, policy

In the wake of a series of high profile, acute controversies concerning livestock diseases in the UK in recent years, risks associated with animal disease have come under increasing levels of media, public and policy scrutiny. While these episodes have largely been high profile, acute crises, it can be productive to examine how animal disease risks are debated and managed in ongoing, chronic risk situations. Such a case is provided by controversy over the transmission risks of bovine tuberculosis (bTB) between domestic cattle and badgers. Since the early 1970s, when links between the disease in the two animals were first drawn, the extent of these transmission risks, and consequent policies of culling wild badger populations, have been contested by a variety of actors including farmers, veterinarians, politicians, animal activists and environmentalists.

In the UK, badgers have been a protected species since 1981, and are a highly cherished wild animal with an important place in British popular culture. As such, any suggestion of state-aided culling of these animals is highly controversial, and so actors in the debate have increasingly turned to science to provide them with evidence to support their positions. Despite extensive and long range government research designed to resolve the issue of badger-bovine disease transmission risks, the findings have proved to be ambiguous and subject to interpretation by all sides of the controversy. This paper presents some early findings of content analysis of coverage of the badger/bTB situation in the UK national press from 1995 to the present. We have found that risk is framed in terms of human and animal health, economics, rural culture, animal welfare and the natural environment. These risks framings vary according to the orientation of both actors and media publications towards wild animals, farming, animal welfare, government and UK party politics.

Viewing assisted reproductive technologies' risks and uncertainties through the lens of ecologies of knowledge and action: promises and challenges

Silva, Susana

*Department of Sociology, University of Minho
Braga, Portugal*

Keywords

Assisted reproductive technologies, risks, ecologies of knowledge and action, uncertainties, bio-genetic citizenship

I intend to understand the social images of the ART' risks and uncertainties produced by medical doctors, jurists and lay people in Portugal. My objective is to explore the mutual shaping of medicine, technology, law and gender through the concept of ecologies of knowledge and action. This concept establishes relationships between knowledge, actions and social images, in order to analyze how ART are being used not only in the service of various structures, but also in the production of a new repertoire of perceptions and meanings concerning the institutional and individual management of risks and uncertainties. I intend to raise some concerns about widely-held implicit assumptions which sustain the views around the values of a family and the mothers' and fathers' rights and duties, as well as the perceptions about who should have the right to live and what the elements are which ground the construction of identity and citizenship. The new forms of bio-genetic citizenship have been reconfigured into intimate and apolitical forms of citizenship, thus contributing for the diluting of the State's and the individualization of citizens' social responsibilities and for the emergence of a set of unpredictable risks.

The empirical research involves semi-structured interviews conducted with medical doctors, jurists and women and men who tried to conceive by ART in Portugal, and the analysis of medical documentation and legal writing about the ART' risks and uncertainties. My main theoretical assumption is that the social structure of ecologies of knowledge and action allows us to perceive the relationships between "legitimate" producers of knowledge and practices and their receivers. These relations are associated with local and uncertain forms of knowledge, competence and meanings, with different implications for women and for men.

The evaluation of risks and uncertainties created by ART are associated with issues of power, credibility of institutions and equity in terms of results and strategies of clinical intervention. I conclude that the main social images of ART' risks and uncertainties are mediated by the social power of medicine and technology, the dominant perceptions about the women's and men's bodies and social relationships and the geneticization of genealogy.

RN23

Sexuality

"Compulsory sexuality": a measure of well-being

Woodiwiss, Jo

Criminology, Politics and Sociology, University of Huddersfield Huddersfield, UK

Keywords

narratives, Compulsory sexuality, sexual well-being, childhood sexual abuse, innocence

In a (Western) world increasingly informed by therapeutic discourses, childhood is constructed as a time of sexual innocence, at the same time as we are led to believe that we can and should (and have the right to) live better, brighter, happier, more fulfilling, satisfying, and successful (sexual) lives. This has enabled a lack of childhood sexual innocence or a lack of sexual knowledge and desire in adulthood to be identified as evidence of childhood sexual abuse, but there are a number of problems with using sexual activity in this way. It denies children's sexuality and constructs children who do not conform to childhood sexual innocence (whether they are victims of sexual abuse or children beginning to explore their own sexuality) as problematic. It also constructs as problematic women who "deviate" from what, drawing on Rich (1980), I have called "compulsory sexuality", and thereby puts pressure on all women to adhere to the norm of a healthy, and therefore sexually active womanhood.

This paper presents findings from an ESRC funded in-depth study of sixteen women in the UK, which looked at their engagement with the recovery literature aimed at adult victims of childhood sexual abuse, and in particular that aspect of the literature which dealt with sex and relationships. Although all the women had, at least temporarily, believed themselves to be victims of sexual abuse in childhood, the majority had no concrete memories and for some their only evidence of such abuse was the identification of sex or relationship difficulties in their adult lives. The paper highlights some of the problematic assumptions which underlie much of the childhood sexual abuse recovery literature before going on to look at how women engage with this literature. The research suggests that women, including those who have no knowledge or memories of having been sexually abused as children, use the ideas promoted in this literature to reinterpret child and adult experiences within a narrative framework of childhood sexual abuse and construct themselves as victims of such abuse, and in doing so ignore those external factors which may better explain or improve their adult lives.

"I knew I wasn't like anybody else" - Young men's accounts of coming out and being gay in Northern Ireland

Schubotz, Dirk

School of Sociology, Social Policy and Social Work, ARK, Queen's University Belfast Belfast, Northern Ireland, UK

Keywords

Same-sex attraction, gay identity formation, Northern Ireland, mental health

Twenty one-to-one in-depth interviews were conducted with young gay and bisexual men in Northern Ireland between 2000 and 2006. The interviews were part of two larger mixed-methods projects: one undertaken by the University of Ulster and fpaNI on sexual attitudes and lifestyles of 14-25 year olds, the other one conducted by the Rainbow Project (a local advocacy organisation for gay and bisexual men) on mental health of same-sex attracted young men. During the interviews the respondents were asked to recall their experiences of coming out and living as same-sex attracted people in Northern Ireland.

My presentation aims to do two things: Firstly, I will relate the collected biographical interview data to a theoretical model of gay identity formation. In order to do this, sociological narrative text-analytical coding techniques are used to identify core categories and themes of the coming-out process experienced by the young people interviewed. Secondly, I will then contextualise the interview material by addressing how Northern Ireland's particular macro-sociological circumstances may impact on identity formation. The evidence provided will draw on data from recent surveys undertaken in Northern Ireland as well as material from the wider public debate on homosexuality in the Northern Irish society.

"Little things": Managing homo-eroticism in the work place

Brandão, Ana Maria

*Sociology, University of Minho
Braga, Portugal*

Keywords

Sexual orientation, work place, discrimination

Gay and lesbian activism is a recent phenomenon in Portugal. Its actions have gained public prominence since the 1990's and have notoriously profited from the country's status as a full member of the European Union (E.U.). Despite the Portuguese legislator's clear recalcitrance and the public opinion's obvious opposition to homo-erotic preference, the mandatory transposition of EU directives to national legislation, the country's belonging to other international multi-State organisations, and the pressure of gay and lesbian organisations have led to the recent inclusion in the Constitution of a clause of non-discrimination on the basis of "sexual orientation", with impacts namely on work law. Yet, discriminatory practices do not refer exclusively to formal actions, whether individual, collective or organisational. Pervasive hetero-normativism renders disclosure of homo-erotic preference hazardous and it may lead to diverse types of formal and informal discrimination. This communication focuses on an exploratory empirical research based on the life-stories of a group of women and it highlights their evaluations of such risk, as well as the multiple interaction strategies they resort to in order to reduce its impacts both to personal/ social image and in professional/ career terms. Results show that risk perceptions and interaction strategies are dependent on the type of contract, activity sector (namely, public or private), permanence on the work place and durability of co-worker relationships, and the type of work environment (to be precise, feminisation). Additionally, the personal impacts of disclosing, passing or actively hiding homo-erotic preference in the work place - and so, the decision on whether to do so - appear to depend also on personal ethos. The purpose of this communication is to highlight particularly the mechanisms of regulation of sexuality within the work place, pointing out the persistent and negative impacts of discrimination on the basis of "sexual orientation" and the way social actors deal with both when they go about their daily lives.

"My mum wants me to be a 40 year old virgin!": Managing the Active Avoidance and Acknowledgement of Young People's Emerging Sexual Identities

Elley, Sharon

*School of Sociology and Social Policy, University of Leeds
Leeds, United Kingdom*

Keywords

class and education, sexuality/gender, social-networks, Youth

Childhood and youth are a key formative period in determining emerging sexual identities and research highlights how routine silencing practices reproduce sexual behaviour across various sites. The family remains an influential site in the management of growing up and research shows that sexuality is frequently used to create boundaries of appropriate behaviour and communication which both parents and children avoid overstepping. Research also shows that communication between friends and amongst "equals" offers scope for the expression of sexual identities unconstrained by family sanctions. Solomon and colleagues (2002) and Kirkman and colleagues (2005) suggest two factors contribute to silence around sexuality in the family: "mutual ignorance" and the "incest taboo" which silence family communication. Expressing sexual identity is, however, a much more complex process than the idea of "ignorance" encapsulates for it suggests individuals are unaware of developing sexualities. The role the family and friends play in regulating young people's sexual identities remains poorly understood in much research yet these are crucial to how young people can develop a positive sexual identity for themselves.

This research reports findings from an ESRC funded doctoral investigation into the interface between Sex and Relationship Education and young people's lived experiences in the UK. The data is drawn from interviews with 38 young people aged between 15-21 years with a further 31 participating in focus groups. Data revealed that despite strong kinship and friendship relationships, complex patterns of surveillance and negotiation means parents and children monitor and control situations related to expressing sexual identities. Instead of "passive" mutual ignorance operating to manage sexual identity, I argue that parents and young people draw on more sophisticated processes of what I have conceptually termed "active avoidance" and "active acknowledgement". While research indicates adults and adolescents desire open communication which facilitates the development of sexual identity, there is a disjunction between the contradictory discourses about sexual identity, the quest for sexual knowledge and the silences around these matters. This data offers new insights into how we theorise young people's sexual identities and holds significant implications for offering encompassing sexual health messages to young people.

"The good life and the good society": queering Strauss and integrating theorizing in the politics of sexualities

Welland, Trevor T D

*Political, international and Policy Studies, University of Surrey
Guildford, UK*

Keywords

Sexuality, politics, political philosophy

In this paper I argue that the "politics of sexualities" can be characterised as a series of ruptures, fragmentations and discontinuities. Aspects of these dislocations can be illustrated in some of the key analytical themes and theoretical foundations of sexuality politics. These include the relationships between sexualities and feminisms; issues focused around identities, rights and citizenship; political axes such as the public/private binary, as well as the relationships between well-established and robustly embedded academic discourses around the theory and politics of sexuality and the lived realities of those individuals and identities that are the focus of such activities, namely gay men, lesbians, bisexuals, transsexual and transgender individuals and "communities". These fragmented fields of sexualities politics are intimately intertwined with social and cultural structures and relations of power and inequalities, whether there are theoretical foci on performativities, subjugated knowledges and identities or governmentality and renarrations.

In 1954/1955 Leo Strauss presented the Judah L. Magnes Lectures at the Hebrew University in Jerusalem and later published these as "What is Political Philosophy?" (Strauss, 1959), a seminal piece that explores and interrogates the nature and meaning of political philosophy and its meaningful character. This paper argues that Strauss' imaging of political philosophy as a dynamic process and enterprise with dreams of the good life and the good society as a guiding ethic, can offer a philosophically useful model for integrating the shimmering patterns of rainbows represented in the diverse range of critical practices, priorities and dimensions of the politics of sexualities.

"We must keep up the fight for democracy": Emotions and collective memory work in the context of public gay and lesbian activism in Poland

Gruszczynska, Anna

School of Languages and Social Sciences, Aston University Birmingham, United Kingdom

Keywords

Poland, emotions, collective memory, public protest, gay and lesbian

In this paper, I focus on the spatial and emotional constitution of protest in the context of gay and lesbian public activism in Poland, on the basis of case study of the Poznan March of Equality. The event took place on 19 November 2005, despite an earlier ban issued by the Mayor of the city, following the recent rise of right-wing parties in power. The brutal break-up of the peaceful demonstration by the police sparked a discussion on broader issues of freedom of assembly and the state of Polish democracy. Through the narratives of March of Equality organizers, I look at the ways in which the activists engaged in the practices of collective memory work and emotion work, focusing specifically on anger, fear and euphoria. I call for discussion of emotions of public protest in the context of sexual citizenship. In particular, I look at the ways in which the spatial and emotional context of collective memory work enabled the activists to inscribe the event into the narrative of Polish 1980s Solidarity activism. This way, my analysis contributes to research that looks at the ways in which less-privileged groups engage in collective memory work in order to challenge their subordination and reclaim citizenship.

"Words Came Much Later": Experiencing Different Sexuality in the Lack of Language, Israel before 1975

Yonay, Yuval

Sociology, University of Haifa Haifa, Israel

Harari, Yuval

History, Hebrew University Jerusalem, Israel

Keywords

Israel, communication, language, self-perception, gays

We think with a language. Individuals cannot understand themselves, the other, and the world around them without the categories provided by the language they talk. This fundamental proposition raises the question what happens when someone experiences something she has no words for. In the Jewish community of British Palestine (1917-1948) and during the first decades after Israel independence Gays and Lesbians hardly penetrated the public sphere. Newspapers reported on sexual assaults on boys and male teenagers. The few guides on sexual relations scantily mentioned same-sex attraction as rare abnormal deviance. In some social circles "homo" was a frequent slur; in other circles the words "homo(sexual)" and "Lesbian" did not exist even as an affront.

How, then, could an adolescent who felt an attraction to other adolescents or to mature people of the same sex understand his/her own emotions? Current literature on the development of gay and Lesbian identities refers to social environments in which "Lesbianism" and "homosexuality" are perhaps undesirable but existing options. Developing same-sex identity in societies where such options are not offered by the spoken language must be entirely different.

Based on 30 Israeli Jewish male gays, who came of age between the 1940s and the early 1970s, the proposed paper explores this process. We tried to find out how our interviewees had understood their early feelings of attraction to other men/boys, how they had sought relevant information, and how it affected their self-concepts. We also asked them how they had told other people what they had felt and investigated how their haphazard encounter with the underground gay community had provided them with new language to think about themselves and make sense of their own passion.

One of our most interesting findings is the impressive creativity of many individuals in creating their own meanings to their perceived otherness. We believe that our study makes it possible to comprehend simultaneously the immense importance of the cultural repertoire for understanding reality and, at the same time, the autonomous, agentic, aspect each individual has in creating her own individual world image.

'The (In)visibility of Lesbian, Gay, Bisexual and Transgender Issues in Residential Child Care in Scotland'

Sutherland, Mike

Applied Social Studies, The Robert Gordon University Aberdeen, Scotland, UK

Keywords

residential, Youth, invisibility, Sexuality, care

Ragg et al (2006) refer to Mallon (1992, 1998, 2002) when stating that Positive identity development for gay and lesbian youth appears to be contingent on a stable and supportive environment. For gay and lesbian youth raised in out-of-home care, this situation can be bleak.' It is assumed that this North American experience is unlikely to be dissimilar to that in Scotland. There is a concern then that Lesbian Gay Bisexual and Transgender young people in residential care are not having their particular needs met in relation to their sexual identity and orientation.

It is impossible to calculate accurately the number of LGBT young people in residential child care as this would depend upon all LGBT young people being confident enough, and willing, to identify themselves as such, but an estimate can be made based upon studies of both the general and the residential child care population. Recent research suggests that between 2 and 9 % of young people have had some same-sex sexual experience. (NATSAL - National Survey of Sexual Attitudes and Lifestyles, of 19,000, 16-24 yr olds, in 2000). There are approximately 2500 young people in residential child care. Whatever the size of the population of LGBT young people in residential child care, they are present, often confused about their sexuality, sometimes, for some, self-consciously visible, or for others, safely invisible, as they perceive it, as lesbian, gay, bisexual or transgender.

This paper considers the degree of (in)visibility of Lesbian, Gay, Bisexual and Transgender issues within residential child care in Scotland. Research was undertaken with two groups of individuals with an interest in the field of residential child care: 50 students undertaking a degree in social work but also working within the sector; 15 advocacy and children's rights workers who have contact with Looked After and Accommodated young people. The research looked into where LGBT issues featured in the areas of communication, physical environment, recording, counselling and social activities. The paper looks at the implications of degrees of (in)visibility for LGBT young people in residential child care and offers recommendations for changes in practice.

(How) should sexual and family diversity be taught? The substantially but limitedly advanced case of Spain

Smietana, Marcin

*Sociological Theory, Philosophy of Law and Metodology of Social Sciences, Universitat de Barcelona
Barcelona, Spain*

Keywords

communication acts, inclusion, education, families, LGBT

Based on qualitative interviews carried out in the Spanish Autonomous Province of Catalonia in 2008 with families of lesbians and gay men with children and with the children's school teachers, the present study has found the school to be one of key elements contributing to the inclusion or exclusion of the families in question. Still, despite the fact that Spain boasts one of the most progressive family legislations in Europe, its school curriculum, both the official and the hidden one, does not include LG families, which may have detrimental effects on their children's subjective well-being. One recent step towards the inclusion is the introduction of compulsory Citizenship Education. Drawing on the interviews, both the already implemented and the desirable inclusive and exclusionary school practices in relation to LG families are identified in the paper.

The analysis is carried out within the interactionist and critical communicative framework of the theory of communicative action by J. Habermas (1984) and the theory of performative acts by J. Butler (1990), operationalised as communicative acts according to J. Searle and M. Soler (2004). It reveals that inclusion is a product of an inter-play between context factors such as the school curriculum, and, on the other hand, the family members' ideas and agency. Under the present circumstances, where at school almost all the inclusion-oriented action for LG families is undertaken by their members themselves, the best effects are achieved by those families who employ the extreme open communication strategy, bearing resemblance to the affirmative action and related with performative acts of subversion. Nonetheless, an idea prevailing in the interviews is not one of affirmative action but one of normalisation, even if according to Habermas' and Butlers' frameworks it could be judged as less inclusive.

(Im)Personalisation: Reconsidering the Personalisation Agenda in relation to Sexuality

King, Andrew

Social Sciences, Kingston University Kingston upon Thames, England

Cronin, Ann

*Sociology, University of Surrey
Guildford, England*

Keywords

care, older LGBT adults, personalisation agenda

The Personalisation Agenda in UK care services has been aimed at placing the individual at the centre of the social care services they may need. According to the British Government personalisation involves transferring power from state and service providers to citizens, summarised as "fair for all, personal to each". In this paper we consider what this means in relation to older lesbian, gay, bisexual and transgender (LGBT) adults. We begin by examining what the personalisation of care means to older LGBT adults themselves; that is, what they see as important as "fair for all, personal to each". We then contextualise these empirical findings by placing the personalisation agenda in the context of sociological conceptualisations of sexual citizenship. We argue that our findings further illustrate the problems with this model of agency, occluding factors such as social class and access to social networks. Indeed, we contend that if policy makers are sincere about personalisation, they need to avoid locating this agenda within an individualistic remit; recognising and reacting to diversity, whilst recognising social structural impediments is important if personalisation is not to become impersonalisation. This, we argue, has implications beyond the UK context.

A Space for Queer Place in Zagreb: 1970-2009

Bacak, Valerio

Department of Sociology, Faculty of Humanities and Social Sciences, University of Zagreb Zagreb, Croatia

Irvine, Janice

Department of Sociology, University of Massachusetts Amherst, MA, USA

Keywords

transition, Croatia, space, Sexuality, queer

A Space for Queer Place in Zagreb: 1970-2009

This paper examines queer place in Zagreb, Croatia, comparing two decades before independence in the early 1990s and two decades as a post-socialist society. Our research explores the question: "How do places come to be the way they are, and how do places matter for social practices and historical change?" We examine queer place in Zagreb for what it can tell us about the influences on sexualities of nationalism, religion, and the transition of a socialist society to a market economy. By "queer place" we include not only physical and cultural spaces created by sexual minorities like gay men. We also include the material locations created for any expression of non-dominant sexual and gender formations in Zagreb.

An examination of queer place in Zagreb is instructive because of the profound social changes undergone in Croatia over the last two decades. A former republic of Yugoslavia, Croatia was likely the most westernized post-1945 communist country. However, after a devastating war for independence from 1991 until 1995, there ensued a corrupt privatization, increases in poverty and unemployment, a rise of nationalism, and a renewal of the Catholic Church. This cultural turmoil was conducive to new discrimination against those considered to be threatening to the new national tissue. There was no space for sexual minorities or queer sexualities in this order of dominant national values. All this contributed to the distinct ways sexual spaces were organized. Our aim in this paper is to map and describe these queer places, show how and why they emerged and declined over time, and assess the transformations of meanings in these sexual spaces in the capital city of Zagreb over the last four decades. We examine how sexualities in the Croatian transition to democracy were affected by the wider political, cultural, and economic shifts. Insights into the social organization of sexual spaces can aid our more general understanding of the way post-communist societies in transition deal with sexual difference.

Gieryn, T. F. (2000). A Space for Place in Sociology. Annual Review of Sociology 26: 463-96.

A traumatic departure: a study of the intimate and emotional relationships of close others with trans people who migrate across the normative boundaries of gender and sex

Jenkins, Claire

*Sociological Studies, University of Sheffield
Sheffield, United Kingdom*

Keywords

transsexual, transition, intimate, relationships

My doctoral research is centrally concerned with exploring the intimate and emotional relationships of trans people who have or intend to permanently transition across the normative binaries of gender and sex. This aspect in relation to trans people has been undertheorised due to a lack of empirical work, for example, whether or not intimate partnerships or family and friendship relations can survive these transitions. My empirical research consists of interviews with the actors associated with such transitions and addresses this specific issue. Early analysis of the data has identified that when a decision to transition is made, those in relationships with the trans person can be emotionally traumatised and they grieve.

In this paper I will discuss the data arising from investigating three different transitions: one involving a wife and a recently transitioned trans woman, another a 23 year old trans man beginning transition in a relationship with his female partner and finally a trans woman living ten years post transition with her female partner. Discussion will be focussed on the factors that influence recognition of the trans person's emergent identity, the characteristics that influence the viability of intimate relationships and how research subjects are able to manage the social and psychic distress resulting from the transition.

Note: Transgender is an umbrella term, used to include people whose lifestyles appear to conflict with the gender norms of society. It includes many types of people and lifestyles. In the use of the broad term, a transgender person crosses the conventional boundaries of gender; in clothing; in presenting themselves; even as far as having multiple surgical procedures to be fully bodily reassigned in their preferred gender role. I use the term 'trans people' to describe those people who might be described as falling broadly within this context, to be as inclusive as possible of different 'types' of trans-identified people. The three categories generally used to describe trans people - transvestite, transgender and transsexual - are very simplistic, trans people often have complex gender identities, and may move from one 'trans' category into another over time.

Activism, conflict and engagement: the syncretic approach of the Portuguese LGBT movement

Santos, Ana Cristina

*School of Psychosocial Studies, University of London, Birkbeck Institute for Social Research
London, United Kingdom*

Keywords

LGBT movement, claims, outcomes, syncretic activism, socio-political change

In recent years, there has been a socio-legal shift in Portugal, which has slowly responded favourably to some of the lesbian, gay, bisexual and transgender (LGBT) movement's demands. However, this tendency has encountered opposition from particular value-discourses that resulted in setbacks in respect to LGBT relational-claims, namely same-sex marriage and same-sex parenthood. Faced with such resistance, the LGBT movement has modified its modus operandi, shifting from responding reactively to external events to becoming proactive and setting its own autonomous agenda. In so doing, LGBT activists have diversified their political, legal and social approaches, becoming actively involved in new relationships of engagement. The diversity of approaches used by the LGBT movement leads me to the main topic I wish to explore in this paper.

The international debate about questions of assimilationism and radicalism has occupied activists as well as scholars over the years. Drawing on this debate, I discuss the strategies used by the Portuguese LGBT movement to achieve positive political, legal and social outcomes - lobbying and direct action - and I offer specific examples to explain each.

My analysis of this social movement has exposed a third way of approaching and, perhaps, overcoming the split between assimilationism and radicalism. This is what I call the syncretic activism. I argue that the Portuguese case study provides evidence of a simultaneous and symbiotic deployment of both lobbying and direct action, combining assimilationist and radical approaches to activism. Moreover, I suggest that a central feature of this LGBT syncretic activism is the movement's multilayered agenda, which operates on several fronts simultaneously, rather than having one overarching priority. Thus, it is my claim that the Portuguese LGBT movement is goals-oriented, rather than ideology-guided.

In the concluding section of this paper, I consider the wider implications of syncretic activism for both theory and practice of social movements engaged in sexual diversity and social change.

An Age-Old Story. Lesbian Domestic Violence, Age and Cohort Effects

Todd, Megan

Applied Social Studies, Robert Gordon University Aberdeen, Scotland

Keywords

community, age, lesbian domestic violence

To date there has been very little research in the area of lesbian domestic violence. There has long been need for a paradigmatic shift in sociological studies. Research into lesbianism has traditionally existed within a different academic framework, reflecting a preoccupation with sexuality and identity, hence where domestic violence is mentioned lesbians are largely absent; where lesbians are mentioned domestic violence is absent. In particular, age has been largely overlooked in research relating to lesbians, and particularly in relation to lesbian domestic violence. In part, this is perhaps due to the fact that older lesbians are a particularly hard to reach population. It may also be because the lack of recognition of age stems from a focus on sexuality as key determining factor of lesbian and gay experience. This paper is based on the findings of my ESRC-funded PhD research, conducted at Newcastle University, during which I interviewed 25 self-identified lesbians about changing community responses to the topic. In part, I wanted to examine lesbian domestic violence in terms of whether it was perceived to be a new social story, or an old one, which for various reasons is only just beginning to be told. What has changed to facilitate the telling, and hearing, of these stories, and who is doing the talking? I reflect on the ways in which time (cohort effects) and age may have impacted on the women's responses to, and understandings of, lesbian domestic violence. For example, because older lesbians may be viewed as asexual and vulnerable, it may be that older victims of lesbian domestic violence are conceptualised as victims of elder abuse, and the violent older woman might be rendered invisible. If the ageing body is generally a problem in contemporary youth-orientated lesbian communities, it could be more difficult for older victims of lesbian domestic violence to be heard and to find support.

Are boys different from girls? Young people's practices and representations on sexuality

Marques, Ana

Sociology, ISCTE

Lisbon, Portugal

Keywords

Youth, Sexuality, Gender

The results of several studies point to the profound transformations that have been taking place since the 60s of the twentieth century, with regard to family, gender and sexuality, as the democratization of intimate life, the pluralisation of family life or the recognition of sexual diversity. Among the various changes that happened in the field of sexuality we find the approximation of the trajectories and sexual attitudes of men and women. Today, women live their sexuality in a freer way and open to new possibilities.

However, these changes are not equal in the entire world, not being accessible to everyone. The transformations of social relations that relate to sexuality are less radical than is generally believed. At the level of sexuality coexists a modern egalitarian discourse for women with a traditional one patent in the maintenance of the control of female sexuality.

Sexuality appears to young people as asymmetric, both in their periods of experimentation, in sexual initiation, in the emotional investment made, in the choice of partners, and in the spaces of sociability that allows. Boys and girls don't experience sexuality in the same way; they have different areas of manoeuvre and different moral pressures that fall on them.

In this communication we present some results of an ongoing research on the sexual trajectories of young adults for marriage and parenting. The data was obtained through biographical interviews, held in Leiria, Portugal, to young people between 18 and 29 years, belonging to different social backgrounds. We want to focus the analysis on practices and representations of young people about sexuality. We'll try to answer to some central questions: what is the meaning of sexuality for these young people? Do boys and girls have the same opportunity to live their sexuality? Do the differences between boys and girls when it comes to sexuality exist more at the level of discourse than practice? Does the sexual double standard still exist?

Becoming a john': the emergence of peer socialization of clients in commercial sex

Adriaenssens, Stef

*Economics & Management, HUB - University College Brussels
Brussels, Belgium*

Hendrickx, Jef

*Economics & Management, HUB - University College Brussels
Brussels, Belgium*

Eyckmans, Johan

*Economics & Management, HUB - University College Brussels
Brussels, Belgium*

Keywords

sex work, prostitution markets, policy effects, health risks

The European nations represent an intriguing laboratory of prostitution policies. They basically aim for the same very general goals: quality of life, public health and the fight against exploitation through human trafficking and forced prostitution. However, the repertoire of regulations and policies is diverse and even antipodal. Between the extremes of the far-reaching regulated liberalization of paid sex markets in the Netherlands and the total ban on marketed sexual encounters in Sweden, a whole gamut of different policies exists. It would be a mistake however to reduce the government's regulation and policy of sex work to the national polity. Quite often other governments are important players: in particular the city governments play an important role.

This paper investigates the intended and unintended effects of national and city policies on prostitution markets in the Low Countries. A quite exceptional dataset was constructed based upon the reports of clients of their experiences of encounters in Belgian and Dutch sex markets. Thereby reports of different types of sex work are included: soliciting, window prostitution, escort services, clubs and massage parlours.

The starting point consists of an analysis of the price-fixing elements of paid sexual encounters. With the help of the so-called "hedonic pricing method" the paper retrieves the most important factors determining prices in prostitution. Thereby particular attention is paid to those factors that are either directly created by regulation or policy and to factors that are relevant to policy, such as the presence of certain groups of migrants among sex workers.

The explicit aim is to evaluate the intended objectives and the unintended effects of national and local policies. Thereby the effects for the groups concerned, in particular clients and sex workers, are assessed.

Being different - managing and living with state sponsored homophobia: the life course of 6 British older lesbians and gay men

Pugh, Stephen

School of Community, Health Sciences and Social Care, University of Salford Manchester, England

Keywords

older lesbians and gay men, state homophobia, life course

This paper seeks to explore one aspect of the effect of state sponsored homophobia which has been made manifest in and has had a consistent presence through-out the lives of 6 older lesbians and gay men (3 women and 3 men) - the concept of separation - of not being the same as everybody else.

The current cohort of older lesbians and gay men were born in an era of severe reaction to their sexuality as the state enforced through legislation, policy and rhetoric the idea that lesbians and gay men were separate to the rest of society.

In developing a sense of themselves as they were growing up through the 1930's, 40's and 50's the paper will argue that the idea of separation became incorporated into the identities of older lesbians and gay men in the negative sense in which it was intended and was made manifest in the behaviour and attitudes of older lesbians and gay men as they engaged in same sex relationships and as they conducted their ordinary lives in a heteronormative society through-out their life course. The paper will present evidence which identifies that the concept of separation was also incorporated into their lives in a very positive sense which initially accounted for their sense of difference but appears to grown into a very positive expression of who they are based upon what they have lived through.

The evidence is drawn from 25 biographical interviews undertaken with the 6 older lesbians and gay men in a 2 year period from 2005. The paper will question whether such an idea is the manifestation of a cohort effect - the effect of growing up and being different at a time of severe oppression. The implication is that this cohort learned to cope with being separate from the rest of society. In particular the paper will ask whether the more individually positive manifestations of separation are the unintended consequence or backlash of oppression which have been reconstructed at a time when such oppression is much less severe and at a time of state sponsored social cohesiveness.

Boundary work, sexual passing and hybrid bodies. From Agnes to Cheryl Chase

Sassatelli, Roberta

Dipartimento di Studi Sociali e Politici, University of Milan Milano, Italy

Keywords

embodiment, Transsexualism, Hermafroditism, Passing, Sex Categories

In Western modernity, bodies "between the sexes" have been object to a normalising gaze that was both fascinated and disgusted by their "difference". If the "impure" is that which is situated between the classifications of culture, sexually hybrid bodies are a potent object of both repulsion and fascination. Transvestites, transsexuals and hermaphrodites have equally been indicated as figures who make visible the taken-for-granted and yet normative character of gender and sexuality. Stressing transgression, contemporary post-structuralist gender theory may run the risk to obliterate embodiment and its differentiated social organization. In this paper I want to take seriously embodiment as subjective experience. To do so I go back to a foundational moment and re-consider the debate on transsexualism in sociology as initiated by Garfinkel's classic work on sexual passing. This masterpiece is revealed in its actuality, limitations and strengths on the backdrop of current post-structuralist gender theories. Comparing and contrasting the consolidation of the social persona of the "transsexual" and the "hermaphrodite", the paper thereby explores how embodiment as experiential subjectivity must be considered along with boundary work predicated on sex categories, gender and sexuality. To conclude the paper offers a reflection on the politics of embodiment aimed at accounting for materiality as a distinct, yet culturally framed, level of reality.

BUTTERFLY'S WINGS: THE LESBIAN COMMUNITY BETWEEN SEXUAL IDENTITY AND GENDER SYMBOLISM

Bruni, Attila

*Sociology and Social Research, Trento University
Trento, Italy*

Orabona, Giusi

*Sociology and Social Research, Trento University
Trento, Italy*

Keywords

sexual identity, gender symbolism, lesbian community

Stemming from a theoretical framework that views gender and sexuality not as something that we are individually, but as the result of social and interactive practices, a collective "doing", the paper will focus on the symbolic representation of the lesbian community in Italy.

The paper will take in consideration the case of "ArciLesbica", the biggest Italian lesbian association. Through the analysis and interpretation of the symbolic communication promoted by the association in various years (through images, flyers and posters) and semi-structured interviews with its founders and main activists, we will show the articulated interplay of sexuality and gender in the production of a collective identity and imaginary. In particular, the discussion will concentrate on the ways in which the representation of a lesbian community seems to be rooted in the belonging to a particular model of desire and, thus, to a sexual identity. But at the same time, the symbolic construction of this identity deeply implies gender symbolism, evoking masculine and feminine versions of "being lesbian", sometimes celebrating gender stereotypes and, some other times, subverting them.

The conclusions, thus, will concentrate on the relationships between sexual identity and gender symbolism, highlighting how they intertwine with each other in the images and symbols implied by the association to communicate itself and perform a public imagination of the lesbian community. The final claim of the paper will be that of deepening the conceptual framing and understanding of the categories of sexuality and gender, focusing on their mutual construction, action and performance (as well as on their clashes) at a symbolic level.

Changing Times, Changing Lives. Midlife Men and Women Doing Heterosexualities in Italy

Bertone, Chiara

Department of Social Research, University of East Piedmont Alessandria, Italy

Ferrero Camoletto, Raffaella

*Department of Social Sciences, University of Turin
Torino, Italy*

Keywords

accounts, Midlife, practices, Gender, heterosexuality

The paper illustrates the findings of a research on the transformation of intimacy and sexuality in midlife in a North-Western Italian region, Piedmont. On the basis of 60 in-depth interviews with self-identified heterosexual men and women aged between 50-70, we have investigated their sexual biographies, looking in particular at how they account for sexual practices as a site of re-production and negotiation of masculinity and femininity within institutionalised heterosexuality. Representations and discourses on heterosexuality and midlife have been further explored in 9 focus groups. Data from a recent national survey on Italians' sexual behaviour and attitudes are also used, as a background for identifying the specific features of these cohorts.

Starting with largely homogeneous experiences of sexual socialisation, during their life course these men and women have experienced structural transformations in gender relations and changes in the cultural scenarios regarding sexuality, with the emergence of the new permissive and intimacy scripts. Many elements of our finding support the thesis of women's qualitative and men's quantitative experience of these changes: women share a clear perception of a fundamental shift in the socially legitimate model of femininity, including agency and autonomy, and experience it as a strong generational break, while many of the men draw upon socially available and legitimised discourses on male sexuality, without experiencing any relevant lack of continuity and consistency in their biography. Our focus on sexual practices, however, questions simplistic pictures of change or continuity, and point to situated changes in heterosexualities, depending, especially for men, on breaks in their individual biographies, triggering processes of redefinition of male sexuality and masculinity.

Demands and strategies of the LGTB-Q movement in Spain: the marriage law

Trujillo-Barbadillo, Gracia

Sociology, University of Castilla- La Mancha Ciudad Real, Spain

Calvo-Borobia, Kerman

*Sociology, Centre of Constitutional and Political Studies
Madrid, Spain*

Keywords

strategic framing, sexual politics, social movements

Our paper examines the political strategies of the lesbian, gay, transsexual, bisexual and queer movement in Spain. The first aim is descriptive: the historical evolution of the political profile of this social movement will be presented, to show the evolution of the demand (from the partnership law to the marriage one) and the internal tensions about them. The second aim is explanatory: our work spins around the question of why the movement changes the demand and how. The article develops the idea of the strategic framing, or, in other words, we will argue that strategic resources are generated by social movements in order to present the demands in a certain way. The choice of the demand of the marriage law was made by the moderate section of the movement, which used the opportunities windows generated by a discourse centered in the issue of equality and human rights, and the political alliances that could favor the entrance of this issue in the political debate.

Paper presented for its consideration by the ESA Sexuality Research Network. ESA Congress, Lisbon, September 2009.

Gracia Trujillo (University of Castilla- La Mancha) and Kerman Calvo (Centro de Estudios Políticos y Constitucionales, Madrid)

Disciplining "dangerous sexualities": new directions in prostitution policy in Italy

Crowhurst, Isabel

*Birkbeck Institute for Social Research, Birkbeck College
London, UK*

Keywords

nation, Italy, Migration, Prostitution

In January 2002, the Italian head of the Government, Silvio Berlusconi, expressed concern about Italian cities being swamped with "foreign prostitutes". He claimed that they represented a disturbance of public order and a threat to the preservation of public morality and the integrity of the "social body". His outbursts inflamed heated debates amongst politicians, experts and various stakeholders about possible new legislation on prostitution to replace the 1958 law that to this day regulates the selling and purchase of sexual services in Italy.

This paper explores some of the most significant public debates over the modification of the 1958 prostitution law that initiated in 2002 and that continue to this day. The discussion shows how the right-wing governmental coalition has shifted its policy agenda from an interest in forced prostitutes and "sex trafficking" - as it had been with the previous leftist legislature - to "foreign prostitutes". Rather than addressing their unwanted presence within a migration regime, the Government has set out to manage the practice of prostitution in such a way that "foreigners" would be automatically expelled from the country. I argue that the political agenda pursued by the right-wing government to tackle "foreign prostitution" can be seen as part of propagandising moves and strategies enacted to publicly celebrate and empower the state as the "moral guardian" of national boundaries and values from these unwanted "Others". The control of women's bodies in this strategy becomes an instrument to demarcate boundaries to discipline and/or eliminate those groups whose "foreignness" and "dangerous sexuality" supposedly threaten the nation. The discussion of these aspects highlights how central women's sexualities and women's sexual behaviours still remain in discourses around the construction and "preservation" of national identities.

Early sexual debut and sexual life style reflexivity

Bernik, Ivan

*Faculty of Social Sciences, University of Ljubljana
Ljubljana, Slovenia*

Klavs, Irena

*of the Republic of Slovenia, Institute of Public Health
Ljubljana, Slovenia*

Hlebec, Valentina

*Faculty of Social Sciences, University of Ljubljana
Ljubljana, Slovenia*

Keywords

sexual life style, Reflexivity, sexual debut, Sexuality

Sexual life styles of persons with early sexual debut differ in some respects from the rest of population as shown by an analysis of factors associated with sexual debut in Slovenia. Such characteristics of sexual early-starters have been observed in other countries as well (e.g. France, Great Britain, and USA). Our paper will explore whether early sexually debut is related to reflexivity as a characteristics of sexual life styles. The level of sexual reflexivity will be measured both on interaction (communication with sexual partners, coping with sexual risks) and attitudinal level (restrictiveness/openness of sexual attitudes).

Drawing on sociological insights suggesting that most of the factors related to early sexual debut are not conducive to sexual reflexivity, we hypothesise that sexual life styles of early starters are characterised by a lower level of reflexivity than of the rest of population.

The paper will be based on data collected in Slovenia from a national probability sample of the general population aged 18-49 years in the year 2000.

Family intimacy: making sense of sexuality and intimacy in families

Gabb, Jacqui

Social Policy, The Open University Milton Keynes, UK

Keywords

Sexuality, intimacy, family relationships, relating practices

Family intimacy: making sense of sexuality and intimacy in families

Family lives are constantly being scrutinised in the UK: how to sustain family relationships and help parents raise children; families as the primary repository of values that characterise society; how changes in the patterning of families and intimate relationships affect children and wider ideas of social cohesion. Against this policy-oriented backdrop, family studies research has shown that individuals construct elaborate and multifarious relational networks beyond the adult-sexual couple and/or 'the family'. Paradoxically how we make sense of different feelings often lies at odds with these extending and extensive repertoires of intimacy. Discursive and experiential boundaries are set up around relationships, making culturally meaningful differences stick to interactions between self and other. In this paper I will examine how parents complete boundary work to manage differences of feeling, feelings that might otherwise overflow, breaking down categorical demarcations. Drawing on original empirical research I will examine how we make sense of different interactions. I will show how emotional investments and ordinary experiences of intimacy and sexuality routinely cut across culturally prescribed categories. I suggest that the slipperiness of emotions and the work involved in the affective containment of feelings refocuses the analytical lens on the quality of relating, cutting across the categorical demarcation of feelings. It is relating practices which shape the boundaries of intimacy more than the status of the intimate. In this way I aim to interrogate ideas of intimacy, sexuality and relationality, to include the intimate connections and affective processes that characterise people's lives.

Forms of Resistance to Workplaces' Symbolic Heteronormative Order

Gusmano, Beatrice

DISPO, Università degli Studi di Firenze Firenze, Italy

Keywords

performance, Workplace, narratives, heteronormativity

In order to produce a significant contribution to our understanding of how minority sexual identity is constructed and managed at work, I will present five challenges that non-heterosexual workers pose to Italian public and private workplaces in order to counteract to the heteronormative hegemony of organizational contexts.

The empirical background is based on 32 narrative interviews conducted to self-defined non-heterosexuals who had come out with at least one person in their workplace.

Coming out is not considered as a single event that happens once, but it's defined as a process, being a performative act that is reiterated, following Butler's definition of performance (1993).

Following the stories' analysis about challenging the symbolic gender order in organizations (Gherardi and Poggio, 2007), I identified five ways of resisting to the symbolic heteronormative order of workplaces. First of all, I've recognized three distinctive features characterizing non-heterosexuals narratives about work life: the degree of visibility, the commitment showed towards work, and the centrality of sexual identity in the workplace.

These five challenges are:

- 1) the challenge through professionalism characterizes men occupied in managerial positions that give value to a sharp division between private and professional sphere. They usually try to silence their sexual identity at work.
- 2) the challenge through peripheral symbolic presence is performed by workers that have an high degree of commitment and try to manage both professional and relational satisfaction by coming out only with colleagues that they trust.
- 3) the challenge through temporary symbolic presence is characterized by a lower commitment. These workers have come out with everybody in the organizational context because they hope for a surpassing of gender and sexual identity.
- 4) the challenge made possible by constant symbolic presence aims to completely change the organizational culture through practice and explicit reference to non-heterosexual way of living. Visibility has been reached gradually after evaluating how workplace could have reacted to coming out.
- 5) the challenge as struggle is carried out by workers that daily take a stand towards discrimination.

Having sex with words: sexuality, technology and the body. An ethnographic exploration of phone sex

Selmi, Giulia

*Department of Sociology and Social Research, University of Trento
Trento, Italy*

Keywords

Gender, Sexuality, technologies, embodiment, disembodiment

In the daily lives of people sex is an embodied experience. However, nowadays technologies have made possible a disembodied experience of sexual interactions. We can "have sex" through chat lines or web games and even over the phone. In the 90's social theorists of cyberspace welcomed these new technologies as the "liberating media" of sexuality claiming that these new opportunities of sexual encounters would have allowed people to be free of their bodies, and therefore of their gender and race positions, and to explore a "pure" experience of sexuality and desire.

But what does it mean to experience sexuality without the body? Are body and sexuality meaningful only in physical terms? Can we be "free" from our body, gender or race? These are the questions that guide this contribution which is aimed at exploring the social construction of sexuality in erotic interactions performed through the phone. More precisely I will focus my attention on the role of the body in sexual interactions over the phone: I will explore how the body, even if it is not physically present in the interaction, becomes "sticky" by actually remaining a necessary arbiter of meaning and a signifier of sexual action. Moreover, I will explore how the discursive construction of sex over the phone it's performed using exactly gender and race features as a sort of social repertoire which is marked out by the same stereotypes people experience in their embodied life. I will argue that, concerning sexuality and the body, the social (and sexual) opportunities offered by technologies rather than free people from their actual positioning in terms of gender, race or erotic desire, put into practice a reinscription of them in a new code of interaction. In these terms, this contribution offers also a hint of reflection on the social and cultural nature of sexuality and of its relations with the physical body.

From an empirical point of view, this study draws on ethnographic observations and in-depth interviews carried out in 2008 in two erotic call center in the north of Italy where women operators perform phone sex for male costumers.

Head above the Parapet: Organisational Resistance and Sexualities Equalities Work in the UK

McNulty, Ann

*School of Geography, Politics and Sociology, Newcastle University
UK,*

Monro, Surya

*Politics, University of Sheffield
UK,*

Richardson, Diane

*School of Geography, Politics and Sociology, Newcastle University
UK,*

Keywords

Sexuality, Lesbian, gay, equality, organisations

In recent years the UK has seen a raft of new legislation concerning equalities and human rights. This legislation, and the policy drivers issued by central government in relation to equalities, are interpreted in varied ways by the local authorities that are tasked with implementing them. Processes of organisational change, and resistance to change, are apparent within these local authorities and their statutory partners. These processes are shaped by the dynamics that play out in relation to the different strands of equalities work, and the intersections between them.

This paper presents findings from an Economic and Social Research Council-funded examination of the impact of recent policy changes, in different parts of the UK, on sexualities equalities initiatives. Interim findings suggest that initiatives aiming to implement sexualities equalities policy are spread unevenly across local authorities. Patterns of resistance to conducting sexualities equalities work are affected by factors such as rural/urban differences, political alliances of the different localities, and the socio-economic profile of the local population. Via a focus on sexualities equalities, the paper explores patterns of organisational resistance. In doing so it pays reference to an intersectionality framework, something that is important to local authority equalities work in the UK, where equalities strands are managed in ways that are structured not only by legislative drivers but also by a complex interaction of racialised, sexualised, classed and other dynamics. The paper examines the ways in which local authorities manage the tensions, divergences, and overlaps between "race", faith, disability, gender and age equality strands. It highlights the construction, in some authorities, of sexualities equalities as an uncomfortable area of work "at the bottom" of the equalities hierarchy.

Presenter:

Dr Ann McNulty, Newcastle University

Research team:

Professor Diane Richardson, Newcastle University

Dr Ann McNulty, Newcastle University

Dr Surya Monro, University of Sheffield

HIV/AIDS and risky sexual behaviour of adolescents

Zampachova, Marketa

Department of Sociology, Faculty of Social Studies, Masaryk University, Brno, Czech Republic Brno, Czech Republic

Keywords

adolescents, HIV/AIDS, sexual behaviour

The number of new HIV positive cases in the Czech Republic has been recognised as increasing rapidly every year. There were 147 new diagnoses of HIV positive people in the year 2008. Adolescents are one of the most vulnerable groups because they are at the beginning of their sexual lives.

The key research question of my PhD project "HIV and risky sexual behaviour of Czech adolescents" is: How has the sexual behaviour of Czech adolescents been changing in the light of the progressing HIV epidemic? The secondary research question is: Why do adolescents behave mostly unsafely in their sexual lives?

The research Youth and AIDS that was mapping risky sexual behaviour of adolescents towards HIV/AIDS was realized in the years 1997, 2004 and 2008 in the second largest city in the Czech Republic - Brno. Its aim was to interview adolescents in order to gain their HIV knowledge, attitude to AIDS and safe sexual behaviour. The research method was quantitative and the data were obtained through a survey at high schools in Brno. Owing to this research I gained unique data sets (time series) which enabled me to compare trends over the time. I also wanted to learn if adolescents behaved in accord with their knowledge or not.

The results show that the adolescents have a good knowledge of how to behave safely and in most cases show attitudes implying safe sexual behaviour. Nevertheless, they do not behave safely. Approximately 75 % of sexually active adolescents use some form of contraception. However, only 50 % of adolescents use condom in their sexual lives - not because of the fear of getting infected with HIV, but because of the fear of unwanted pregnancy.

Czech adolescents have not changed their sexual behaviour and HIV/AIDS has not been a motive for them to change it.

Except more detailed outcomes I would like to focus on the situation in the light of European comparison in my paper: is it possible to find convergence or divergence with other European countries on the field of HIV and sexual behaviour of young people?

How the social shapes the sexual: the importance of biographical turning points to the making of sexual trajectories, in Portugal

Policarpo, Verónica

PhD - Sociology, Institute of Social Sciences

Lisbon, Portugal

Keywords

intimate orientations, individualization, sexual scripts, sexual trajectories, biographical turning points

This paper presents some results from a PhD research about sexual biographies, in Portugal. Based on an interactive qualitative research design (Maxwell, 1995), this research approaches sexual experiences from a dynamic and narrative perspective. Through extended in-depth interviews, men and women, between 30 and 50 years old, are invited to narrate their sexual biographies, enabling the identification of important individual turning points, namely those of biographical disruption. Being moments of personal and biographical crisis, these turning points become privileged observatories of the ways the social shapes the sexual, and turn out to be determinant to the social construction and updating of sexual scripts (Gagnon & Simon, 1973). Therefore, and on the one hand, placing sexual experiences in their biographical context enables a better understanding of sex as a social fact, whose meaning, created by social interactions, plays a decisive role. On the other hand, it enables one to explore the diversity of sexual trajectories and the ways they become progressively part of each individual's personal identity, giving room to intimate orientations (Bozon, 2001 & 2004).

I want to sleep with you: rupture and normative processes in sexuality

Neves, Dulce Morgado

*Sociology, ICS-UL / ISCTE
Portugal,*

Coelho, Bernardo

*Sociology, CIES-ISCTE
Portugal,*

Keywords

reciprocity., ordinary sexuality, Prostitution, normativity

This paper spawns from two on-going research projects that, in a way, converge in a common interest on rupture and normative processes in sexuality. The data used here has, therefore, different sources and is based on a plural methodology. Following an ethnographic strategy complemented by in-depth biographical interviews we analyze the organizing principles of social sexual relations between escort-girls and their clients. Simultaneously, we explore semi-structured in-depth interviews applied to 30 women and 30 men, as part of the Gender and Generation project (ICS.UL).

The sociological study of sexuality has been determined by its analytical focus on more particular or deviated forms of intimate lives, privileging often the exceptionality on sexual practices and life styles. However, we must consider that sexuality is also a part of the mundane routine of everyday life. The aim of this paper is, in this extent, to explore both disruptive and normative experiences of sexuality, showing how those experiences are crossed by regulation and freeing up phenomena.

A closer look at everyday intimate lives reveals that neither the ordinary is always monolithic, nor the marginal practices free actors from constraints. On the contrary, protected by legitimacy, most normative sexuality can potentiate scenarios of change and relativity, for instance, when it comes to variations in sexual interaction, values and desire during the couple life-course; contexts of gender roles suppleness; or the elasticity of the sexual exclusivity rule.

Conversely, in the margin, transgressive practices must obey to more rigid conduct codes. The erotic scenario of call-girl and client is a dimension where they organize social constructed images or plots for sexual behaviour and expression that they wish to accomplish, turning out to be a ritualistic and controlled dimension of the everyday life of repetition.

Resulting from the analysis of these two erotic scenarios sexual reciprocity emerges as the most powerful constraint to those involved (both men and women) in sexual relations. The idea of reciprocity not only defines the intimate dynamics setting an orgiastic normativity, but also shapes gender identity.

Ideas and laws affecting sex work: notes about female prostitution in Portugal

Schouten, Maria Johanna

Sociology - Centre of Social Studies (ubi_CES), Universidade da Beira Interior Covilhã, Portugal

Bessa Ribeiro, Fernando

Economia e Sociologia, UTAD Vila Real, Portugal

Keywords

Sexuality, Portugal, Prostitution, social representations, legislation

This paper addresses some of the results of a recent elaborate research into female prostitution in border areas between Portugal and Spain. An aspect to be highlighted is the stigmatization of the sex workers, an attitude closely connected with the prevalent representations about female sexuality. The social opinion in the western world about sex workers, considering them as either "victims" or "bad women", is all too often based on stories about them rather than on their own stories. In the proposed paper, the phenomenon and conditions of female prostitution will be discussed in the light of the life stories obtained from the actors and with consideration for the historic and social context.

There are striking parallels with, or rather a continuation of the ideas about sex workers which emerged in the nineteenth century, the period of "disciplinization" of sexuality in the terminology of Foucault. In the course of that century, the dominant scientific discourse and consequently the emerging middle class came to view the female prostitute as an anomaly, who should be condemned or helped - in any case should abandon her activity. These aims were reflected in social and political action and in legislation. Despite changes such as the much increased migration and the facilities of international contacts, a look at those nineteenth-century debates is worthwhile for an assessment of the present situation.

Prostitution constitutes a topic in the contemporary political debate in several European countries, where recently new legislation has been adopted or is currently being prepared. The highly diverging or even antipodal character of these laws convey the diversity of viewpoints about prostitution and the actors involved in it, thus attesting to the value of a consideration of the socio-cultural and historic studies about mercantile sex.

In the Name of Equality: Sexuality and Social Change

Richardson, Diane

School of Geography, Politics and Sociology, Newcastle University Newcastle-upon-Tyne, UK

McNulty, Ann

School of Geography, Politics and Sociology, Newcastle University Newcastle-upon-Tyne, UK

Monro, Surya

*Politics, University of Sheffield
UK,*

Keywords

INTERSECTIONALITY, LGBTEQUALITIES, SEXUAL CITIZENSHIP

In recent years there has been an explosion of interest in the field of equalities and diversity, fuelled by a raft of legislative changes in the UK and other parts of Europe, as well as broader demographic trends concerning migration and citizenship. Sexualities equalities work, which has for many years been marginalised, has now gained social and political currency and visibility, with greater inclusion of previously marginalised sexual and gender communities. This integration of (some) lesbians and gay men into social and political life as 'normal citizens' represents a significant shift with important implications for understandings of sexual citizenship and the meanings and importance attached to sexual identities. This paper will develop and extend our previous theoretical work on sexuality and citizenship by considering these issues. It considers the broader ways in which social constructions of sexuality and gender are changing, and also whether the increasing citizenship rights of sexual and gender minorities alter models of heterosexual and gendered citizenship. Empirically, the paper draws on emerging findings of an Economic and Social Research Council (ESRC) funded study on LGBT Equality Initiatives in local government, which maps citizenship discourses onto examples of everyday practices and attitudes of LGBT equalities work in local government organisations in England, Wales and Northern Ireland. Specifically, the study looks at the ways in which policies concerning sexual and transgender equalities are resisted by organisations, with institutional processes being mobilised in ways which support or block implementation, sometimes in a fragmented fashion. Also, the research explores the expression of sexuality equalities and transgender equalities initiatives in relation to other equalities strands, in particular the relationship between faith and sexuality equalities.

Islam and the acceptance of homosexuality: the shortage of socio-economic well-being and responsive democracy

Beckers, Tilo

Research Institute for Sociology, University of Cologne Köln (Cologne), Germany

Keywords

Homosexuality, religion, DEMOCRACY, Islam, human development

The primary source of scripture and the point of departure for analysing homosexuality in Islam is the Quran which is very explicit in its condemnation of homosexuality. Marriage is interpreted by the prophet as half of the religion and thus assigned a high status. Homosexuality is regarded as an infringement of marriage and as being "against nature" and against faith. It is important to note that only public homosexual behaviour is condemned and legally sanctioned if there is clear evidence of a public nuisance due to eye-witnesses. As long as "homosexuality" does not interfere with or threaten the family (familialism as a social norm), casual and age structured same-sex sexual contacts are often tolerated in Islamic cultures. This difference of public and private indicates that there is an endogenous laissez-faire attitude towards sexual "deviations from the heterosexual norm" or a "will not to know" when it comes to same-sex sexual contacts which have been extensively described. On the other hand, in Islamic countries Jewish Law, and the British, i.e. Christian, prudery and condemnation of homosexuality had a strong impact, i.e. the exogenously imposed condemnation should not be ignored. This paper argues that the acceptance of homosexuality is a consequence of human development, a process comprising gender equal socio-economic well-being and life chances and a more responsive democracy. The multilevel analyses are based on contextual data as well as survey data from the World Values Survey (1999-2007) and prove the importance of both individual factors (social norms such as familialism, cohort, education and religiosity) as well as contextual factors, i.e. the religious culture, the legal setting and human development for the acceptance of egalitarian homosexuality. This paper proposes to understand the acceptance of same-sex relationships as a function of both the social opportunity structures as well as the legitimate order given in the culture as the context or horizon of action and norms beyond the normative impact of religion. It is not religion alone but it is the shortage of both gender equal socioeconomic well-being and responsive democracy that has recently limited the degree of public acceptance of homosexuality in Islam.

It didn't "just happen": reflection, intention, deliberation

Taylor, Yvette

Geography, Politics, Sociology (GPS), Newcastle University Newcastle Upon Tyne, UK

Keywords

Sexuality, class, gay, lesbian, parenting

This paper draws upon a British Academy funded study based upon 60 interviews conducted in the UK (Taylor, Y. Lesbian and Gay Parenting: Social and Educational Capitals. Palgrave Macmillan, 2009). It explores gay men's and lesbians' varying routes to parenthood and how they make sense of this path, as intersecting classed and sexual inequalities. Many commentators on lesbian and gay parenting have pointed towards the high degree of reflexivity and intentionality with which lesbians and gay men construct and plan families, with biological constraints compelling a profound re-thinking of families (Agigian, 2004; Clarke and Kitinger, 2005; Lindsay et al., 2006). While lesbian and gay parents' "creative" routes into parenting have been evidenced as innovative this perhaps sidelines more "normative" pathways, as well as the disruptions and (dis)continuities between these. Here, possibilities intersected with classed transitions - what interviewees imagined for themselves and what others imagined for them, still compellingly constructed by heteronormativity. All still had to gauge, perform and even resist the constitution of "respectable" routes into parenthood, often as a defence but sometimes as an offence, where middle-class interviewees positioned themselves against the "poor" parenting of others - in order to "redeem" themselves. Hence, the dominant academic narrative in "postmodern", "reflexive" accounts, and in middle-class parents own accounts, negates working-class "queerness", calling into question the quality and legitimacy of their parenting. Here I will focus on reproductive experiences and the construction of "respectable routes" as intersecting sexuality and class. The narrative of "choice", which is materially resourced and performed across legal, medical and parental terrain, eclipses the experiences of working-class parents; interrogating the intersecting class and sexual dimensions of this narrative unpacks important aspects of constraint and agency within "family planning".

Just like marriage - Young couples' civil partnerships

Brian, Heaphy

*Sociology, Social Sciences, University of Manchester
Manchester, United Kingdom*

Einarsdottir, Anna

*Sociology, University of Manchester
Manchester, United Kingdom*

Smart, Carol

*Sociology, University of Manchester
Manchester, United Kingdom*

Keywords

Civil Partnership, marriage, Same Sex Couples.

It has been argued that same sex relationships are individualised intimacies par excellence: relational forms that are more (insecurely) rooted in reflexive biographies than in the social practices and norms associated with modern marriage. In this paper, we challenge this view through a preliminary analysis of interviews with couples who have entered into Civil Partnership. The interviews were generated for a study entitled "Just Like Marriage" Young Couple's Civil Partnerships' that is funded by the British Economic and Social Research Council. Same sex partners (aged under 35) were interviewed together and individually to produce joint narratives of the "married" relationship and individual narratives of partners' intimate orientations. These narratives were subsequently explored for the insights they generated into the range of factors (biographical, material, social, cultural) that shaped the young couples' partnerships. The paper adopts an intersubjective approach to analysing these interviews, exploring (i) how young same sex couple's narratives of their "marriages" display a complex interplay between different forms of reflexivity, and (ii) the insights this generates into the links between contemporary marriage as a social institution and civil partnership as a couple and personal project. The paper considers how social continuities and change (with respect to the norms and practices of marriage) are evidenced in joint narratives of civil partnerships and in personal narratives of intimate orientations.

Leaving domestically violent relationships: exploring how barriers to leaving are similar and different across gender and sexuality

Donovan, Catherine

Social Science, University of Sunderland Sunderland, UK

Hester, Marianne

*SPS, University of Bristol
Bristol, UK*

Keywords

Gender, Sexuality, leaving, domestic violence

One of the least understood aspects of domestic violence in the public mind is why victim/survivors stay. Understood as a "simple" decision resulting from a single incident or moment in which the problem is realised, the "common sense" view, also held by many professionals, is frustration and impatience that victim/survivors apparently will not make this "right" ("healthy", "rational") choice and act on it; or if they do, they then make the "wrong" ("unhealthy", "irrational") choice to return (sometimes more than once). Often explanations of this apparent inability of survivors to make the right decision focus on (or blame) the survivor for individual inadequacies/psychologies. However, compelling evidence from work with heterosexual female victim/survivors demonstrates not only that leaving is a process rather than a single act/decision; but that many socially and culturally produced factors impact on the decision-making process. Drawing on our qualitative study of women and men who have experienced domestic violence in heterosexual and/or same sex relationships, we explore, for the first time in a UK context, some of these factors and the ways in which gender and sexuality might impact on this process. Reasons for staying can be understood to coalesce around at least four themes: recognition factors that reveal understandings of what constitutes domestic violence; cultural factors that reveal dominant ideas about marriage, relationships, family and heterosexism; relationship factors that reveal narratives of love; and behavioural factors that reveal abusive partners' strategies for keeping victim/survivors engaged in relationships. These themes overlap at times but are separated here to enable discussion both of the beliefs and expectations held by victim/survivors about themselves and what constitutes an adult love relationship as well as the particular strategies perpetrators adopt to exert control over their partners. In parallel with discussion about these themes we will also consider some of the ways that gender and sexuality intersect to construct gendered experiences of domestically violent relationships which can, in turn, produce gendered understandings of leaving.

Living on the "virtual" edge: Researching young people's marginalised sexual and gender identities and distress through the internet

McDermott, Elizabeth

Social Policy & Social Work, University of York York, UK

Røn, Katrina

*Department of Psychology, University of Oslo
Oslo, Norway*

Keywords

internet methodology, suicide, Gender, self-harm, Sexuality

AIM: This paper reports on a pilot online qualitative study which aimed to test the feasibility of virtual methods for investigating young people, sexual and gender identity and emotional distress.

BACKGROUND: International research shows clear links between LGBT young people, emotional distress and suicidal behaviour. However, there is a lack of research within most European countries demonstrating this relationship, and there is a lack of research internationally examining how this connection operates. Quantitative psychological studies have brought attention to the elevated rates of LGBT youth suicide, but understanding the social, cultural and economic "context" of young LGBT people's lives is important for explaining the higher suicide risk.

METHOD: This pilot study used online interviews and recruited participants through a UK queer youth website. There are a minefield of ethical and methodological problems arising from researching LGBT youth, and these are amplified in research on sensitive topics such as emotional distress. We designed a virtual qualitative study with the intention of reaching a small number of participants who were diverse in terms of their sexual and gender identifications. Fourteen participants responded to our on-line questionnaire, six signalling willingness to participate in an on-line interview. They identified variously as transsexual, queer, transgender, lesbian, pansexual, asexual, genderqueer, and gay. They ranged from having left school at 16 without qualifications to going to university.

RESULTS: The study generated important methodological and substantive insights. We found online methods were useful for recruiting LGBT participants who may otherwise not take part in research, e.g., transpeople, and those outside of established LGBT youth groups. The study confirmed the importance of the internet to LGBT youth for constructing identities in safe spaces. The study suggests that identity management strategies across the young people's life domains may be important to understanding emotional distress.

CONCLUSION: Internet methods provide the means of recognising sexual and gender fluidity in young people, and the possibility of understanding the relationship of sexual and gender identity and deliberate self-harm. Virtual methods provide potential for working across Europe to develop understandings of sexual and gender identities in young people.

Magnus Hirschfeld, Race and a Twenty-First History of Sexuality

Monk, Daniel

*Law, Birkbeck College, University of London
London, UK*

Cook, Matt

*History, Birkbeck College, University of London
London, UK*

Bauer, Heike

*English, Birkbeck College, University of London
London, UK*

Jacobs, Amber

*PsychoSocial Studies, Birkbeck College, University of London
London, UK*

Keywords

Inter-disciplinarity, identity, methods

This panel interrogates via particular case studies current methodologies for investigating and understanding identity, community, and representation in four different disciplinary contexts: law, history, literature and psychosocial studies. The aim is to prompt discussion of resonances and dissonances between these approaches to fraught questions of sexual subjectivities in different social, cultural, historic, and spatial contexts. This panel brings together members of the steering committee of the Birkbeck Institute of Gender and Sexuality (BIGS) which seeks to foster interdisciplinary debate about gender, sexuality, politics and culture:

Dr Heike Bauer, 'Sexology, Psychoanalysis, Anthropology: Discipline Formation and the Genealogies of Racism and Homophobia'

Dr Matt Cook, 'Squatting in Brixton: towards a local queer history'

Daniel Monk, 'Queering Homophobic Bullying: Memories, Identities and Strategies'

Dr Amber Jacobs, 'On Intimacy and Becoming: Barebacking, Feminism and the Posthuman'

Masculinities, Negotiations of Sexuality and the Workplace

Robinson, Victoria

*Sociological Studies, University of Sheffield
Sheffield, UK*

Hockey, Jenny

*Sociological Studies, University of Sheffield
Sheffield, UK*

Keywords

masculinities, Sexualities, occupations, Hairdressers, Re-negotiating

This paper draws on qualitative data from a UK, ESRC-funded project which explored men's transitional identities across public and private spheres in the occupations of hairdressing, fire fighting and estate agency. It primarily explores men's feelings about working in "a woman's world" as hairdressers, and the extent to which their intentional and unintentional 'feminization' in a largely feminized workplace offers scope for men to challenge, reaffirm and play with dominant understandings of what it is to be a man. In foregrounding this occupational culture, it asks how the job and its associated lifestyle might act to disrupt men's gendered self-perceptions. In contrast with more traditional forms of masculine embodiment, hairdressing turns on "the look", on performance and on nurturance, in ways defined primarily by female stylists and clients. Differences of social class are also important here and we compare men in working class and upmarket city centre salons. Core to the paper is the question of how the body of the hairdresser becomes implicated in challenging, asserting and re-defining the boundaries of hegemonic masculinity, as men move between their domestic and paid work environments. Our data show how routine salon practices are appropriated or re-described by men in ways which illuminate, and potentially disorder, their relationship with prevailing conceptions of masculinity. As Brickell's (2005) discussion of Butler (1990) and Goffman (1959; 1974) reminds us, those who subvert the prevailing values surrounding masculinity are at constant risk of being "misunderstood". For the hairdressers in our study, the parodying of femininity and campness is always at risk of being misinterpreted. Data therefore suggest that contextual realignments of "acceptable" gendering create the possibility for change, but that there are limits to subversion; "feminized" men can find themselves re-affirming the gender order as well as contributing to its disorder.

Naturism and sexuality: Broadening our approach to sexual wellbeing

Smith, Glenn

*School of Management, Royal Holloway, University of London
Surrey, England, United Kingdom*

King, Michael

Dep't of Mental Health Sciences, University College London London, England, United Kingdom

Keywords

sexual health, naturism, naturists, Sexuality, social nudity

There are very few studies on naturism and fewer still on the relationship between naturism and sexuality. This original study aimed to investigate how people manage their sexuality when practicing naturism in the United Kingdom (UK).

Thirty-nine self-identified naturists from across the UK were interviewed in-depth using an oral history methodology. Interviews explored how people entered into naturism and traced their experiences of social nudity over time and place to the present. Interviews were conducted clothed and nude when requested and appropriate to enable cultural sensitivity. This resulted in some interesting methodological and fieldwork reflections.

From our research, sexuality, when practicing naturism, was found often to be suppressed through the use of rules, geographical isolation and thoughts and behaviour. Some participants found ways of exploring and enjoying their sexuality by keeping feelings hidden and/or seeking out more sympathetic naturist environments.

We conclude that naturist environments may offer a unique space in modern society in which to explore aspects of our sexuality that are currently pathologised, criminalised or commercialised. In contemporary society the only alternatives to private nudity are the virtual realities of commercial pornography with its emphasis on nudity as always sexual, commercial sexual environments such as swinging clubs which are often based on a prior knowledge of sexual interest and experience, or lap dancing clubs which play on the objectification and sexual exploitation of women and sustain sexism. Our research has important implications for sexual wellbeing and sexual health policy and promotion.

Paper One: BIGS Panel

Bauer, Heike

*English, Birkbeck
London, UK*

Keywords

Sexualities, Identities, methods, interdisciplinarity

This paper reconsiders points of intersection between the genealogies of homophobia and racism. It will focus on the formation of three disciplines invested in the identification of human "types" "sexology, psychoanalysis and anthropology" examining a series of cross-disciplinary encounters between key thinkers from the different fields during the first part of the twentieth-century. We know a great deal about the individual histories of each discipline: the emergence of anthropology from post-Enlightenment philosophy and natural science, the establishment of sexology out of the criminological, medical and legal sciences of the nineteenth-century, the turn-of-the-century foundation of psychoanalysis around the work of Sigmund Freud. The paper examines a series of cross-disciplinary engagements in the writings Freud, anthropologist Malinowski and sexologists Hirschfeld, arguing that they provide fresh insights into the prevalence of racist and homophobic ideas within the formation of the disciplines. For instance, Malinowski in his Sex and Repression in Savage Society (1927), which is a critique of Freud's Totem and Taboo (1913) held on to the idea of "savagery" and a distinct "primitive" sexuality to stake a claim for the methods of anthropology. Freud's references to his sexological colleagues (especially Hirschfeld) in his correspondence with C.G. Jung in turn indicate the extent to which Freud was steeped within contemporary homophobic thinking, as he sought to discredit Hirschfeld by suggesting that Hirschfeld's homosexuality rendered him prone to mental and physical instability. Hirschfeld himself was one of the first to try and lay bare the problematic overlaps between racial and sexual sciences in his Racism (1938), a posthumously-published work that retraced the histories of sexual and racial stereotyping in a warning against the rise of Nazism. By considering alongside each other the occasionally overtly intersecting issues of racism and homophobia, the paper does not argue that they shared one genealogy. However, informed by recent queer and postcolonial scholarship on issues of normativity and temporality, the paper aims to rethink the meanings and politics of the historic binds between the two discourses, and their theoretical legacies.

Polyamory as a possibility of feminine empowerment

Cardoso, Daniel

Ciências da Comunicação, Universidade Nova de Lisboa Amadora, Portugal

Correia, Carla

Psicologia, Universidade de Lisboa - FPCE Amadora, Portugal

Capella, Danielle

*Sociologia, Universidade Nova de Lisboa
Lisboa, Portugal*

Keywords

feminism, polyamory, erotic plasticity, bisexuality, plastic sexuality

Polyamory has been gaining ground in several western countries but still remains largely under-publicized. Even so, it seems to indicate an on-going and historically contextualized trend that reminisces of the American Sexual Revolution of the 60s and 70s.

The term Polyamory is generally defined as "the desire, practice, or acceptance of having more than one loving, intimate relationship at a time with the full knowledge and consent of everyone involved" according to Wikipedia (2009). Besides that "essential" terminology, Polyamory shows several differences, varying across different cultural contexts and periods of time.

Based in these variances, we present several definitions of polyamory as a starting point of this paper and then move on to draw on an ethnographic study conducted in the USA by Elisabeth Sheff, characterizing one large polyamorous group and describing its functioning regarding gender dynamics.

Then, our objective is to indicate how polyamory comes in line with several contemporary changes in the meaning and dynamics of gender and gender studies by crossing references from Giddens, Beck & Beck-Gernsheim, Kaufmann and Foucault.

This analysis attempts to conclude how polyamory can be framed as a feminist stance, taking advantage of erotic plasticity (Baumeister, 2000) and Giddens' plastic sexuality as an element of empowerment to women and add some insight into the Psychology field by looking at the high levels of female bisexuality amongst polyamorists, also reported by Sheff's studies.

Post Sexual Trafficking in Nepal: Livelihoods, Sexuality and Citizenship

Laurie, Nina

*School of Geography, Politics and Sociology, Newcastle University
Newcastle-upon-Tyne, UK*

Richardson, Diane

*School of Geography, politics and Sociology, Newcastle University
Newcastle-upon-TYne, UK*

Poudel, Meena

*School of Geography, Politics and Sociology, Newcastle University
Newcastle-upon-Tyne, UK*

Townsend, Janet

*School of Geography, politics and Sociology, Newcastle University
Newcastle-upon-Tyne, UK*

Keywords

Nepal, Poverty, citizenship, Livelihoods, Sexual Trafficking

Sexual trafficking is a priority issue for many governments and has increasingly become a focus for debate within the academy. Despite this, many aspects of sexual trafficking remain poorly understood. In this paper we focus on an area that has received scant attention in the literature: the situation of trafficked women when they return home and specifically, the livelihood opportunities available to them as they experience differing notions of citizenship and processes of sexual stigmatisation. In addition to the fact that there has been very little attempt to document poverty alleviation strategies post trafficking, within the mainstream development literature little attention has been given to questions of sexuality and how they relate to development and poverty reduction strategies and constitutional reform. Bringing together distinct literatures on sexual citizenship and sustainable livelihoods we develop our analysis of these themes through a focus on the livelihood opportunities and strategies of returnee trafficked women drawing on qualitative research carried out in Nepal. In particular, the Nepal case study examines the relationship between marriage and sustainable livelihood opportunities illustrating the complex relationship between what is regarded as acceptable and appropriate sexuality, constituted through marriage and motherhood, and unacceptable and inappropriate sexuality, which in this context is the returnee trafficked woman who, defined against the desired norm is typically judged, as a "prostitute", to be a "bad woman" who is "spoiled". The paper, finishes by outlining a new interdisciplinary research agenda for understanding how advocacy around "the sexual politics of poverty" and anti trafficking engage with the policies and practices associated with the new democracy in Nepal.

Prostitution as a body work and sex work

Ratecka, Anna

Institute of European Studies, Jagiellonian University Krakow, Polska

Keywords

Prostitution, sex work, body work, economics of intimacy

In this paper, I wish to develop a theoretical framework for a discussion on sex work in the context of commodification of intimacy and body work.

The aim of this study is twofold. First, sex work will be conceptualised against other kind of body and emotional work.

It will be show that stigma attached to this kind of work comes from several positions. It can be defined as a sin - a danger for social order, or as an ultimate oppression of women, as it is often conceptualized within the feminist discourse. Moreover, sex work is frequently viewed as a commercialization of the most intimate sphere of women's life. However, if sex work is defined as body work it can be argued that there are many similarities between such professions as sex workers and nannies on one hand, and massage therapist on the other. From this point of view the stigma attached to sex work is not inherently inscribed in this profession, but can be interpreted as a result of discursive practices of those, who want to ban it.

Secondly, is will be show that stigmatization of the sex work may be seen as a result of deeply rooted in social sciences theoretical separation of two spheres: intimacy and economics. I wish to show that those two spheres should not be seen/conceptualized as contradictory, but deeply interwoven. An insight into the various practices of everyday life enables us to prove that there are many areas where people agree to pay for services within an intimate sphere, e.g. childcare, nursing, beauty services or therapy.

Therefore, I wish to argue that distinction between sex work and other kinds of body-work/emotional work is mainly discursive. The actual practice of everyday life of workers engaged in body work/emotional work causes similar burden in the areas of emotions management, personal attachment to clients, trust or engagement.

Putting the Interaction back into Sex

Jackson, Stevi

women's studies/sociology, university of york york, uk

Scott, Sue

pro vice chancellor, glasgow caledonian university glasgow, UK

Keywords

interactionism, Orgasm, embodiment, feminism, Sexuality

In this paper we seek to recover and rehabilitate the radical insights of the pragmatist/interactionist tradition and to establish its continued relevance to a distinctively sociological and feminist analysis of sexuality. It was this tradition which informed the first fully sociological theory of sexuality, developed by John Gagnon and William Simon in the late 1960s and early 70s. Their approach was truly radical, challenging not only biological determinism, but also the concept of repression. Their argument presaged Foucault's critique of the repressive hypothesis, but subsequently came to be eclipsed by it with the rise of poststructuralist and queer theory. Interactionism, we argue, enables us to address aspects of sexuality largely sidelined by queer: the everyday gendered and embodied doing of sexuality in interaction. It thus enables us to locate sexuality within wider patterns of sociality. We explore the example of gendered orgasm in order to develop the idea of scripting/composing the sexual body.

Queering Homophobic Bullying: Memories, Identities and Strategies

Monk, Daniel

*Law, Birkbeck
London, UK*

Keywords

Sexualities, Identities, methods, Interdisciplinarity

Homophobic bullying has attracted much attention in recent years. A high profile issue for LGBT and children's rights campaigners it has also been the subject of extensive academic research, policy initiatives and case law.

This paper explores this literature to question how memory and identities are utilised in strategies designed to tackle homophobic bullying.

In particular it identifies and critiques the centrality of two dominant images of victimhood within the literature: the 'brutalised innocent child' and the 'tragic homosexual'.

It also questions the use of memory in the empirical research based on interviews with adult gays and lesbians looking back to their childhoods and examines how these construct a collective past.

The aim of the paper is not to reject endeavors to tackle homophobic bullying but to question the conditions of possibility that enable it become a legitimate speakable harm.

Re/searching lesbian families in the Czech Republic

Nedbalkova, Katerina

Sociology, Faculty of Social Studies, Masaryk University Brno, Czech Republic

Keywords

stigma, Gender, heteronormativity, lesbian family, Ethnography

Based on a qualitative research the paper explores the phenomenon of lesbian families in the Czech Republic. First I focus on the often contradictory conceptualizations of lesbian and gay families in social sciences and argue for critical interpretative approach. The concepts and research developed and conducted primarily in the Anglo-Saxon countries was continuously confronted with my ethnographic field research of 16 lesbian couples who parent or plan to parent.

On general level I was concerned with how women living in lesbian families negotiate the notion of family, parenthood, kinship, community and gender. Contrary to the prevailing research findings I argue that their social practice can be interpreted as distinctly gendered. Further I explored how lesbians living in families meet and confront two stereotypes: the stereotype of the lesbian and the stereotype of the so called normal family. The everyday presentation of lesbian families is described as a constant interplay between distancing themselves from the stigmatizing stereotypes attached to homosexuality and uncommonness of the so called homosexual family on one hand and affirming their commonness on the other hand.

Recognition and Regulation: Gender, Sexuality and the UK Gender Recognition Act

Hines, Sally

*Sociology and Social Policy, University of Leeds
Leeds, UK*

Davy, Zowie

*Sociology and Social Policy, University of Leeds
Leeds, UK*

Keywords

Gender, Recognition, Regulation, Sexualities, Transgender

Representing the civil recognition of gender transition, the UK Gender Recognition Act (GRA, UK, 2004) marks an important change in attitudes towards trans people; enabling the change of birth certificates and granting trans people the right to marry or civilly partner in their acquired gender. These developments reflect broader social changes around the conceptualization and the lived experiences of sexuality, and illustrate how questions of gendered, sexual, intimate and embodied identity and citizenship are being debated, contested and reconfigured. The paper will draw on research findings from an on-going ESRC (Economic and Social Research Council, UK) funded project exploring the impact and significance of the Gender Recognition Act.

The paper will explore understandings of "sex", gender and sexuality, and the relationship between these, within the GRA. While the GRA enables trans people to marry or civilly partner in their acquired gender, the criteria for "gender recognition" demands that existing marriages have to be annulled before a gender recognition certificate is granted. Within the law as it stands, then, married people have to choose between the recognition of gender or relationship. First the paper will examine how trans people and their partners are negotiating the GRA's "marriage clause" and will explore the effects of these choices upon intimate lives more broadly. In defending the "marriage clause", Ministers argued that, post-divorce, partners could register for a Civil Partnership; as enabled by the UK "Civil Partnership Act" (CPA, UK, 2004). The paper will move on to examine areas of connection and disconnection between the GRA and the CPA; pointing to a problematic fusing of "gender" and "sexuality", which fails to account for the nuanced formations and intersections of sexuality and gender .

In conclusion the paper will suggest that while the GRA and the CPA were guided by a need to further account for gender and sexual multiplicity, new regulatory practices emerging from processes of recognition may limit expressions of gendered and sexual diversity.

Regulated and Racialized Homosexuality in MADtv Skits

Kolehmainen, Marjo

*Department of Social Research, University of Tampere
Tampere, Finland*

Keywords

Sexuality, representation, Humour, racialization, affect/emotion

The paper discusses representations of male and female homosexuality in MADtv parodies with emphasis on the role of affects and emotions in doing both hetero- and homosexuality. MADtv is an originally American comedy series (1995- ), which is aired in several European countries too.

The series both promotes "gay visibility" and participates in the regulation of sexuality. The paper deals with the two main themes of the research material: the coming out stories and the stories concerning sexual transformation. The special scope of interest is in how the representations of affects and emotions participate in both regulation of sexuality and in "racializing (homo)sexuality" in the research material. Homosexuality is continuously represented as an object of recognition and knowledge in the series and at the same time heterosexuality is constructed as a cultural norm marked with silence. However, there are also differences in representing homosexuality itself. On one hand, homosexuality is depicted as already "known" when related to white and middle-class effeminate men or women. On the other, one's homosexuality is represented as surprising and embarrassing when concerning masculine white men, working class gays or ethnic "others". In the research material, gays themselves have feelings of ambiguity and discomfort due to their sexuality, which operates in constructing the feelings of awkwardness as a ridiculous, private problem of homosexuals. The skits thus produce an image of sexual discrimination not only as imaginary but as imagined by homosexuals themselves, which may offer a comforting fantasy of sexual equality but it also may trivialize the feelings of everyday marginalization. The social norms which regulate sexuality are not touched upon. Rather, the paper argues that the series participate in constructing Western societies not only as liberal but also as free from discrimination and sexual hierarchies.

Regulating sex. Moral panic about gays and lesbians in the public sphere

Zielinska, Iwona

*Graduate School of Social Science, Polish Academy of Sciences
Warsaw, Poland*

Keywords

norms, moral panic, sex regulations, gays and lesbians

Sexual behaviors are managed and regulated by the moral system of a society. Changes of morals always results in the transformation of the traditional norms and values. However, if the changes are too sudden and intense, the disruption of normative order they cause, might be simply too difficult for a society to accept. Hence the system of social control is called for action.

It appears that joining the European Union in May 2004 provided the Polish gay and lesbian movement with more confidence to make some attempts to challenge the general prejudice and intolerance feelings. Parades and demonstrations were organized in order to attract public attention and to raise important questions. The strictly heterosexual Polish public sphere has been disturbed by gays and lesbians who not only admitted openly their homosexuality but also claimed for acknowledgment of their rights. The long non-spoken subject of "other" sexualities had suddenly resurfaced the public discourse proving that the existing norms are no longer credible, and rushing the politicians, authorities and the audience to tackle the new situation.

This paper is based on the content analysis of the Polish press in 2004-2007 period in which a volatile moral panic about homosexuals took place. It seemed that the heated social anxiety was caused by an apparent threat posed by gays and lesbians to moral order. However, the hidden issue of the panic were the attempts to widen the definition of accepted sexualities. We will trace the measures and proposals taken in order to regulate the new situation and to defend the "old patterns" of sexual behaviors. A special attention will be devoted to those means which had been used in order to sustain the existence of the traditional norms. A more theoretical account of the events will be provided/ given by drawing on Foucaultian perspective on the reasons for regulating sex as well as the concept of Nomos by Peter L. Berger, which offers a broaden framework for looking at the ways of protecting traditional values, norms and moralities.

Released from Gender? Heterosexual Couples, Intimacy, and Normativity

Liskova, Katerina

Gender Studies Program, Sociology Dpt., Masaryk University Brno, Czech Republic

Keywords

Czech Republic, marriage, Gender, Sexuality, norms

"Increasingly, the individuals who want to live together are, or more precisely are becoming, the legislators of their own way of life, the judges of their own transgressions, the priests who absolve their own sins and the therapists who loosen the bonds of their own past" wrote Beck and Beck-Gernsheim (1995:5). Have love, coupledness and gender been freed from patterns dictated by modernity? Do we fully negotiate the terms of our "being-togetherness"? How are the norms regulating gender and love constructed in the late modern social landscape? What has become of the normalizing power of the state?

I argue against the view that social actors are the sovereign agents of their lives, and that "norms and morality vary from individual to individual and from relationship to relationship" (ibid.). I criticize the silencing of the political nature of institutions which have supposedly instantiated increased equality, transparency and democracy (Giddens 1992). Through sociological analysis of legal texts, my paper focuses on changes within the symbolic universe of gender. I analyze the historical shifts in what constitutes a family and/or other legal/legible forms of kinship, and under what circumstances. I focus on family laws as they have scripted gender and sexuality in Czech lands since the late 19th century until contemporary Czech family law, together with other relevant legal texts.

This paper draws on my understanding of social domination as created and reproduced through language, i.e. performative speech acts. Elaborating on Austin (1962), Derrida (1988), Bourdieu (1991) and Butler (1997), I perceive the efficiency of performative speech as a function of it belonging to a series of the same acts which sustain a repeated social action. An illustrative example is a legal norm. Backed by the symbolic order, social domination takes the form of symbolic violence when subjects gauge themselves according to the dominant yardstick (Bourdieu 1991). Not only is the symbolic power of language typically not resisted, it is eagerly accepted for it bestows its subjects with social intelligibility. My paper explores how gender norms are reproduced alongside the re-articulations of the symbolic order of law.

Sexual beginners. The social construction of the debut of Italian young people's heterosexual biographies

Ferrero Camoletto, Raffaella

Department of Social Sciences, University of Turin Turin, Italy

Keywords

Youth, Gender, sexual scripts, agency, sexual biographies

The paper analyses the process of social construction of the "sexual debut" of a sample of self-identified heterosexual young people living in a North-Western Italian region. The empirical data were collected within a research project carried out in 2006-07, entailing a survey on a regional sample of 1000 young people aged 18-29 and 60 semi-structured interviews with young people aged 18-34.

The paper focuses on one main feature of young people's heterosexual biographies: the account of their first sexual intercourse. Within an interactionist approach, sexual conduct is led by scripts, i.e. patterns of perception, evaluation and action which define "who, what, with whom, where, when, why". Scripts are made of narrative sequences which represent the legitimated rules and moves of the heterosexual game: therefore, they work as frames that people use not only to depict their conduct, but also to make sense of their experience.

In their accounts, young people use scripts not as strict rules to be enacted, but as symbolic repertoires to appropriate and combine in order to organize a meaningful sexual biography and to perform a gendered subjectivity. The paper will show the complex intertwining of compliance with, adaptation, negotiation and challenge of gendered sexual scripts.

On the one hand, at the beginning of their sexual careers young people follow gendered scripts strongly shaped by a double standard: young men more often place their first sexual intercourse within a context of emotional and relational detachment, while young women rather tend to interpret their sexual debut as a romantic experience.

On the other hand, the research findings point to processes of negotiation and re-definition of scripts based on three/different cultural logics: the denaturalization of scripts, by which young people acknowledge the socially constructed nature of sexual scripts; the reversal or inversion of gendered script, by which young men adopt an intimacy script and young women a (seemingly) predatory one; the convergence to or construction of a common script, what some scholars have controversially interpreted as a degendering process.

Sexual Citizenship Ethics

Claes, Tom

*Department of Philosophy and Moral Science, Ghent University
Ghent, Belgium*

Keywords

Consent, ethics, SEXUAL CITIZENSHIP

In his Embattled Eros (1992) Steven Seidman signals a 'dilemma:' "How to arrive," he wonders, "at a sexual ethic that preserves what Gayle Rubin calls 'benign sexual variation,' yet articulates norms that allow us to make the kind of moral judgments that are routinely made in everyday life." (199) He echoes an oft-heard critique of the 'liberal view' of sexual ethics in which valid consent is seen as a sufficient condition for moral legitimacy of sexual acts and for the formulation of a sexual morality (Primoratz). According to Seidman, relying solely on what could be called a 'sexual ethics of consent' will not suffice because it does not empower us to make ethically informed choices in a range of everyday situations, practices and conflicts. Seidman suggests that the concept of 'sexual responsibility' has 'strategic value' for formulating such a sexual ethics.

Recently, the concept of 'sexual citizenship' has been proffered as a cornerstone for such a sexual ethics of 'responsibilisation' (cf. Plummer, Weeks). Even more critical and reserved advocates of sexual citizenship, like Bell & Binnie (2000), acknowledge its rich personal, social, political and ethical potential. Sexual citizenship is presented as an anchor point for the social recognition of (some) diverse sexual identities and as a grounding for sexual rights claims. On the offside, one could point at the possible normalizing and disciplining effects of the notion, problematizing 'irresponsible,' often 'public' sexualities.

In my presentation I will explore the theoretical structure, the contours, opportunities and limitations of this emerging Sexual Citizenship Ethics. Is the notion of sexual citizenship a necessary and welcome complement to the notion of (valid) consent in sexual ethics, adding a much needed ethical ideal (which?) to the procedural character of a sexual ethics of consent? How well does such a sexual citizenship ethics fare as a basis for everyday sexual moral choices, and as an aide to a sexually emancipatory agenda? How much, if at all, 'benign sexual variation' can such a sexual citizenship ethics tolerate and/or advocate -- and how much of this 'in public'?

Sexual health: evidence based practice and LGB research

Formby, Eleanor

Centre for Education and Inclusion Research, Sheffield Hallam University Sheffield, UK

Keywords

Risk, sexual health, sexual activity, men who have sex with men

This paper reports on a UK research project with men who have sex with men (MSM), including those who identified themselves as gay or bisexual. The research sought to further understanding about the behaviours of gay and bisexual men and MSM in relation to sexual activity, and sexual health more broadly, with a view to informing service development. Participants completed detailed self-completion surveys and some men participated in follow-up in-depth interviews. The resultant data includes interesting findings about: influences on types of sexual activity; common understandings of "safe sex"; expectations in relation to safer sex, and what men said they wanted from sexual health services. With concern increasing in the UK about the high numbers of new sexually transmitted infection diagnoses, including HIV, particularly among younger men who have sex with men, there is a need to add to understanding about the views of MSM in relation to sexual health in its broadest sense, including views on, and experiences of, so-called "risk behaviours", and access to services. The paper will draw out implications for service development, and future research, highlighting the potential for strong partnerships in lesbian, gay and bisexual (LGB) health research between researchers, practitioners, and LGB communities and activists in order to influence policy and practice, and ultimately LGB health and well-being.

Sexualised girlhood. Trend or aberration of socialisation process - Polish and European perspective

Wójtewicz, Anna

Department of Sociology/Ph.D. Student, Nicolaus Copernicus University Torun, Poland

Keywords

sexualization of girlhood, paradox of emancipation, sexualization of culture, bitch-or-good girl dilemma, schizophrenic everyday life

I intend to describe the phenomenon concerning sexualisation of girlhood in the context of changes which have been taking place within the approach to sexuality and the increase in our interest in this field.

The sexualisation of girlhood is treated here as a distinctive feature of changes occurring in girls' reality and aberration of socialisation that concerns ascribing to girls, (by themselves and their social environment) inadequate for their age and the stage of their psychosexual development, sexual meaning and functions.

The purpose of this paper is to find an answer to the question whether sexualisation of girls is only an ephemeral social phenomenon and a short-lived trend, or rather a tendency which will become an integral element in the girls' world.

The problem has been illustrated by the results of my research carried out among girls in Polish Gymnasium. The sample included girls at the age of 15-16. I aim at presenting this phenomenon in a broader European context.

Dealing with sexualisation of girlhood means at times describing girls' everyday lives, in which sexualisation becomes an alarming and ubiquitous phenomenon. Sexualisation requires clarifying and coming up with an appropriate terminology together with a diagnosis and description. Unfortunately, the character of this phenomenon does not facilitate its in-depth examination and therefore, is a reason for dilemmas and difficulty which have to be overcome by a researcher who decides to go into this matter. Difficulties are caused by a lack of standards in defining sexualisation as such, sexualisation of girlhood, and girlhood itself. It is also impossible to avoid methodological problems and dilemmas of ethical nature.

The paper includes my respondents' answers which illustrate the sexualisation phenomenon and statistical data from other countries.

The method used enables to answer the question of the reasons for sexualisation. It allows to examine individual cases. Owing to the in-depth interviewing, I managed to illustrate the fact of mixing the two categories of girlhood and womanhood, which can be regarded as a paradox of emancipation. I also succeeded in presenting the course of the game which the culture of consumption plays with girls.

Sexuality and HIV/AIDS vulnerability: female youths' behaviours, beliefs, myths, taboos and knowledges

Brak-Lamy, Maria de Guadalupe

*CRIA - Centre for the Research in Anthropology, New University of Lisbon/Faculty of Humanities and Social Sciences
Lisbon, Portugal*

Keywords

Sexuality, vulnerability, HIV/AIDS, young cape verde girls, young portuguese girls

The objective of this communication is to analyse the factors which provoke the vulnerability to HIV/AIDS of young portuguese and cape verde girls (15 to 25 years old), living in four migrant slums in the Great Lisbon Area namely, socio-cultural factors, as the family control and the peers influence related to sexual behaviours of young cape verde girls and young portuguese girls, power asymmetries in heterosexual relationships and the negotiation of safe sex, the access to information and the obstacles to service health utilisation, as well as specific factors associated to sexual behaviours, sexual practices, myths, taboos, beliefs and knowledges regarding HIV/AIDS, perceptions of personal HIV/AIDS risk and religious beliefs of these girls.

The basis for this study is the qualitative methodology based in semi-structured interviews (40 portuguese girls and 40 cape verde girls were interviewed). The interviews are analysed using the technique of analysis of thematic content (Bardin, 1977).

For the analysis of the thematic "youth sexuality and HIV/AIDS" we apply the gender relations theory (Holland et al., 1990, 1991a, 1991b 1992 and 1994) and the theory of vulnerability (Mann et al., 1992 and 1996).

Sexuality and youth biographies: teenage pregnancy revisited

Fonseca, Laura da

*Educational Sciences, University of Porto/CIIE/Faculty of Psychology and Educational Sciences
Porto, Portugal*

Araújo, Helena C.

*Educational Sciences, Unniversity of Porto/CIIE/Faculty of Psychology and Educational Sciences
Porto, Portugal*

Keywords

biographies, educational institutions, sexual health, Sexuality, teenage pregnancy

The paper focuses young women who have dropped out from basic and secondary schools and their experiences concerning sexuality and pregnancy. It aims to listening and interpret the voices of these young women. There is a high incidence of teenage pregnancy in Portugal, as the second highest after the UK among 15 European countries and it is seen in public discourses as a social problem. The ambiguous messages apparent in broader public debates sometimes as alarmist, while others involving censorship, compassion or conformity need to be questioned. In he framework to be presented here, they are seen within the context of the more general process of changes to the balance between public life and gender relations during the past decades, favouring a critical approach that promotes alternatives to the views based on psychobiological and pathological factors: teenage pregnancy is defined by the «lack» of information, resources, family and emotional structure etc. The proposed view allows us to perceive how much the lack-centred discourses contribute to the reinforcement and to the reproduction of social inequalities. Moreover, the framework here favours the research of the many meanings and life experiences in connection to socio-cultural and power relations. By questioning the complex and mixed meanings around teenage pregnancy (Almeida et al. 2004, Vilar & Gaspar 1999), it is possible to deconstruct the stereotyped and idealised conceptions of gendered relations and social life, which can help to think about educational strategies for citizenship, a politics of difference that involves diverse social groups, and sexual citizenship (Young 1997; 2000; Lees????) in a context of changing femininities and masculinities. Educational institutions are spaces of transitions and social reproduction, not always directed to the well-being and sexual health of young people. Hence in this paper an interpretation of the experiences and views of young women through their life histories aims at understanding the ways they rehearse and live their sexualities, recognising their claim for inclusion and respect.

Sexuality, Youth and Sexual Education in Portugal and Europe

Raimundo, Alexandra

Department of Sociology, ISCTE

Lisbon, Portugal

Keywords

school, sexual education, legislation, youth sexuality

We analyze several surveys about youth sexuality, conducted in Portugal since the 1980's, to better understand the changes in regard to young people's representations and practices of sexuality and, considering similar surveys in other European countries, we will compare different perspectives and evolutions.

On the other hand, considering that recently in Portugal, we are facing some issues at the application of the legislation regarding sexual education at public schools, we will also present some perspectives and questions from the Portuguese reality, once again comparing it with experiences and perspectives of other European countries.

Social class and contraceptive use among youth. In what ways are emotions and aspects of sexual self associated with contraceptive use among youth in various social contexts?

Valle, Ann K.

*Section for Health Promotion and epidemiology, University of Oslo
Oslo, NORWAY*

Roysamb, Espen

*Department of Psychology, University of Oslo
Oslo, NORWAY*

Keywords

emotions, Youth, sexual health, self, contraception

Urban youth are exposed to stark contrasts of social realities, even in a "so-called egalitarian society" as Norway. Intentions to promote sexual and reproductive health among youth, and to prevent unintended pregnancies and sexually transmitted infections has to some extent lead to easier access to contraception among teenage youth over the past decade. At the same time, contraceptive use is not impressively high in Norway, as compared to other countries in Europe. The research report of the sexual awareness for Europe partnership - Sex and Young People in Europe, documented variations in EU-countries between 60 to nearly 90 % use (SAFE). This study can document systematic variations according to social class when it comes to contraceptive use among urban youth in Norway. The study aims to investigate possible mediating effects of not only cognitive but also emotional factors of self in sexual interaction. A randomly selected population sample of youth from Oslo and Bergen responded to postal questionnaires, here selected 18-19 year olds (N 868). Social class are measured by parental occupation (ISCO88,) Sexual self by Winthers Sexual Self Adolescence scales, as adjusted by Tschann, and positive emotions connected to condom use scales as developed by by Roysamb and Valle. Contraceptive use at last heterosexual intercourse are used as dependent variable and divided into three categories, condom, hormones or none-use. Statistical analysis of multinomial logistic regression reveal social class inequity in contraceptive use for both hormonal and condom-use. Emotions and sexual self components have different associations with condom use and hormonal use. In conclusion it may be advisable to develop more comprehensive studies to investigate both condom use and emotional components of condom use as well as hormonal use among youth of complex and varied social contexts.

Squatting in Brixton: towards a local queer history

Cook, Matt

*History, Birkbeck
London, UK*

Keywords

Sexualities, Identities, methods, interdisciplinarity

In 1974, the South London Gay Centre opened on squatted premises in Brixton's Railton Road. It had a short and chequered history, but it also spawned an extraordinary gay squatting community based in houses on the same street and the parallel Mayall Road. The 10 houses and the communal gardens which were formed between the two terraces became the focus for experiments in art, theatre, sex, politics, and domestic life over the next decade - and beyond. Though the houses were incorporated into the Brixton Housing Co-op in the mid 80s and converted into individual flats, they were reserved for gay tenants, including a number of the original squatters. The properties are still linked by the communal garden. A gay community has thus endured here in one form or another for over 30 years, and this paper, based on newly available archival material and a series of oral history interviews, reflects on the particular contours of queer life in this context. It explores especially the underlying politics of the squatters, looking at the ways in which they related to the wider local community and at how sexual, class and ethnic identifications intersected for them. In this close focus I make an argument for a 'local turn' in queer history-making, one which would allow us to understand more fully the particularities of gay identities and communities and so provide a counter to the more sweeping and totalising accounts of recent gay life.

Teenager's sexual behavior and drinking style in Finland

Lavikainen, Hanna

*School of Public Health, University of Tampere
Tampere, Finland*

Lintonen, Tomi

*Research Unit, Police College of Finland
Tampere, Finland*

Kosunen, Elise

*Medical School, University of Tampere - Faculty of Medicine
Tampere, Finland*

Keywords

alcohol use, risk-taking, adolescent, sexual health

Background: Adolescent's early sexual activity and alcohol use have been widely recognised as a major public health problem. In this large-scale study we focused on the relationship between adolescent's sexual behavior and drinking style. Three aspects of sexual risk-taking were included: early activity, unprotected sexual intercourse, and having sex with multiple partners. Further, to obtain more comprehensive perception of adolescent alcohol use, we made the distinction between different drinking styles, i.e. alcohol drinking and drunkenness-related drinking.

Methods: Cross-sectional school survey data from School Health Promotion Study was collected in Finland in 2002-2003. The national sample consisted a total of 100.790 adolescents from the eight and ninth grades. Mean ages were 14.8 and 15.8 years. The SHPS questionnaire concentrates on adolescent's health and health-related behaviours, such as sexual behaviour and use of alcohol. To examine the association between sexual behavior and drinking style among teenagers, we used logistic regression analysis.

Results: The likelihood of engaging in sexual intercourse increased with the frequency of alcohol drinking among 14 to 16-year-old teenagers. In particular, frequent drunkenness-related drinking increased teenager's probability to report that they had experienced not only sexual intercourse, but to engaged in sexual risk-taking behaviors. We found that the likelihood of engaging in unprotected sex and/or having multiple sexual partners was many-fold for adolescents drinking frequently until they were in a state of drunkenness. Especially for girls, drunkenness-related drinking at least once a week was associated with multiple partners (OR=4.21, 95% CI=3.24-5.48).

Conclusions: Results confirmed that it is not the frequency of alcohol drinking per se, but it is the drunkenness-related drinking style that is strongly associated with sexual risk-taking behavior in adolescence. Consider the short- and long-term harms related to early sexual activity and alcohol drinking, further research and efficient interventions are needed. For instance, it could be effective to combine both alcohol education and sexual education in school settings to reduce both adolescents' alcohol use and various harms.

The burden of policy: health risks and exploitation in the prostitution markets of the Low Countries

Adriaenssens, Stef

*CEDON, HUB - University College Brussels
Brussels, Belgium*

Hendrickx, Jef

*CEDON, HUB - University College Brussels
Brussels, Belgium*

Eyckmans, Johan

*Economics & Management, HUB - University College Brussels
Brussels, Belgium*

Keywords

health risks, policy effects, prostitution markets, sex work

The European nations represent an intriguing laboratory of prostitution policies. They basically aim for the same very general goals: quality of life, public health and the fight against exploitation through human trafficking and forced prostitution. However, the repertoire of regulations and policies is diverse and even antipodal. Between the extremes of the far-reaching regulated liberalization of paid sex markets in the Netherlands and the total ban on marketed sexual encounters in Sweden, a whole gamut of different policies exists. It would be a mistake however to reduce the government's regulation and policy of sex work to the national polity. Quite often other governments are important players: in particular the city governments play an important role.

This paper investigates the intended and unintended effects of national and city policies on prostitution markets in the Low Countries. A quite exceptional dataset was constructed based upon the reports of clients of their experiences of encounters in Belgian and Dutch sex markets. Thereby reports of different types of sex work are included: soliciting, window prostitution, escort services, clubs and massage parlours.

The starting point consists of an analysis of the price-fixing elements of paid sexual encounters. With the help of the so-called "hedonic pricing method" the paper retrieves the most important factors determining prices in prostitution. Thereby particular attention is paid to those factors that are either directly created by regulation or policy and to factors that are relevant to policy, such as the presence of certain groups of migrants among sex workers.

The explicit aim is to evaluate the intended objectives and the unintended effects of national and local policies. Thereby the effects for the groups concerned, in particular clients and sex workers, are assessed.

The Changing Landscape of Heteronormativity: the regulation of intimate citizenship in Europe

Roseneil, Sasha

*Birkbeck Institute for Social Research, Birkbeck, University of London
London, UK*

Crowhurst, Isabel

*Birkbeck Institute for Social Research, Birkbeck, University of London
London, UK*

Hellesund, Tone

Rokkansenteret, STEIN ROKKAN SENTER FOR FLERFAGLIGE SAMFUNNSSTUDIER Bergen, Norway

Stoilova, Mariya

*Birkbeck Institute for Social Research, Birkbeck, University of London
London, UK*

Santos, Ana Cristina

*Birkbeck Institute for Social Research, Birkbeck, University of London
UK,*

Keywords

comparative, heteronormativity, intimate citizenship, same-sex sexualities

A number of sociologists have argued that recent years have seen significant transformations in the organization and regulation of same-sex sexualities. For instance, as early as a decade ago Bech (1999) suggested that the modern homosexual was disappearing, Seidman, Meeks and Traschen (1999) explored the normalization of homosexual lives, and Roseneil (2000) argued that the homosexual/ heterosexual dichotomy was being radically destabilized. Recognizing that the research on which such arguments rested was based on north-western Europe and north America, we take up the challenge to develop a comparative analysis of the contemporary landscape of heteronormativity across Europe. Our particular focus is on the ways in which heteronormativity is at work in the regulation of intimate citizenship, and how this has, and has not, changed. Our analysis is directed at the legal and policy frameworks regulating intimate citizenship in four European countries (Bulgaria, Norway, Portugal and the UK), selected according to a 'most different' comparative methodology in terms of gender and welfare regimes. We address the assumptions embedded, explicitly and implicitly, in social policies and law about the nature of 'proper', recognizable intimate relationships and about what constitutes "family", and we explore the extent to which procreative, conjugal, married, or at least, cohabiting, monogamous heterosexuality is the normative framework for intimate citizenship. The paper offers some pointers towards an explanation of the factors producing differential transformations in heteronormativity across the case study countries. The research presented draws on work carried out as part of the "Intimate Citizenship" work package of the EU FP6 integrated project, FEMCIT, Gendered Citizenship in Multicultural Europe.

The construction of national identity, gender and sexuality in Cyprus, and the role of European human rights for LGBTQ people

Kamenou, Nayia

EUROPEAN STUDIES, KING'S COLLEGE LONDON (PhD CANDIDATE)

LONDON, UK

Keywords

Europeanization, identity, Sexuality, Gender, nationalism

National identity vis-à-vis Europeanization has received a lot of attention in social sciences? literature. Both in the literature and in political activism the demand for LGBTQ recognition has been primarily premised on EU human rights law, directives, and litigation. Nevertheless, national identity and European LGBTQ rights have not been conjointly addressed sufficiently. Literature about the effects of national identity on the construction of gender and sexuality and on the substantive realization of LGBTQ equality within societies is also limited. This paper attempts to bring together these issues. It uses Cyprus as case-study, since its Europeanization has not resulted in increased tolerance towards "dissident" genders and sexualities. It answers the questions: a) How are gender and sexuality constructed in Cyprus and what is their relation to national identity and other predominant discourses? b) How are "human rights" and "Europe" conceptualized and how do LGBTQ rights operate in the Cypriot context? c) What strategies are needed in order for alternative identities to flourish and for European LGBTQ legal developments to be substantially applied? Once we have a new understanding of these dynamics and of the intersectional subjectivization issues they raise, we could apply it on a wider scale beyond the Cypriot context and beyond specific types of exclusion to all types of "othering". I employ both a theoretical and an empirical research approach. Firstly, I assess the existing literature and I propose gender and sexuality as central aspects of agency exercise over the negotiation of identity. Secondly, I juxtapose the cultivation of nationalism in Cyprus and its normalizing effects on gender and sexuality, to the situation in other European countries. Thirdly, I expose the Cypriot institutional actors responsible for regulating gender and sexuality subjectivities and I propose proliferating inter-communal same-sex partnerships as the epitome of identity-barrier eradication. Fourthly, I examine the effectiveness of a strategically identity-based LGBTQ movement in milieus where the framework of queer theory and practice seems to be limited. I conclude by proposing possible strategies for affecting societal and political change and for expanding of the boundaries of the "proper".

The Limits of Sexual Citizenship: The Politics of Sexual Containment

Reynolds, Paul

Social and Psychological Sciences, Edge Hill University Ormskirk, UK

Keywords

Law, citizenship, culture, Containment, tolerance

Jeffrey Weeks recent 'The World We have Won' is a paradigm example of how recent attempts to survey of the range of legislation and political changes in European countries that leads many authors to believe that the project of sexual citizenship has been achieved - there are substantial equalities for sexual minorities in contemporary European societies, particularly in the West, and this model is effective is achieving the same where it is absent. In this paper I want to balance the optimism of liberal and humanist models with some critical discourse, along three lines. First, the application of law and public policy to enable non-heterosexuals is uneven and within a politics of containment where the notion of power and autonomy for different sexual 'communities' is mediated by a normative notion typified by the 'virtually normal' against sexual dissidence discourses describing the place of sexual minorities in contemporary societies. Particularly in respect of bdsmers, but not exclusively so, 'sexual minorities' are contained with prevailing and damaging heterosexual confines and discourses that limit their citizenship. Allied to that, there is a flawed assumption that formal legal change has a corresponding normative and cultural impact - that is to say because law says a thing, people accept and embrace it. Here the difference between a tolerance and an appreciation of difference is critical, and the maintenance of heteronormative values and their absorption of 'legitimate' sexual discourse and conduct from legally recognised sexualities is misconceived in respect of progress and citizenship. Finally, there are substantial questions of sexual ethics and politics that are not resolved by this process of recognition and containment that form an agenda for a next generation of political struggle, though the means of that struggle and its articulation as a discourse of equality and justice is impeded by the legal and organisational forms that represent progress thus far. The paper will thus provide a general terrain through which it is possible to map more effectively 'the world we have won' and the opportunity costs involved that set the terrain for the world we have still to win.

The Material Reality of Holidays: Gay Men, Sex and Socio-Economic Class

Casey, Mark

*Sociology, Newcastle University
Newcastle upon Tyne, UK*

Keywords

Exclusion, inclusion, Social Class, Gay Men, Sex

In this paper I will be focusing upon the intersections of travel, sex and gay male identity. Much research and writing (e.g. Clift et al, 2002; Waitt and Markwell, 2006) has positioned that an ability to travel to and consume specific global gay sites and spaces is central to gay male identity in the early twenty-first century. Although such discourses are giving a visibility to travel experiences outside of traditional (heteronormative) understandings of tourism, they can also be positioned as limiting the range of gay identities that are both visible and normalised. In particular the paper will address the exclusion of low income Australian gay men from tourism and travel experiences. Travel has been positioned as central to understandings of western gay male identities and as being important for the material experiences of gay men in defining their own identities. However the relationship of low income gay men to travel and both their inclusion and exclusion from such travel has received limited attention. I will be drawing upon research focused upon gay men in the Australian cities of Melbourne and Sydney to further develop debates around gay men, sex and travel. The paper will include those who are excluded and in turn "invisible" from gay male travel experiences. However this does not mean that such gay men do not desire travel experiences or that they are unable to engage with values created when travel and sexual identity intersect. In so doing the paper seeks to develop discussions of gay men, sex and travel to include gay men who have been positioned as 'other' and/or undesirable through their limited economic position. The paper will present the material realities of exclusions from travel in drawing on a number of interviews. The presumed need for gay men to be able to travel to claim a valued identity position within contemporary gay male culture will be both challenged and critiqued.

The politics of in/visibility - Public space, collective agency and the creation of "lesbian" space in urban Russia

Stella, Francesca

Central and East European Studies, University of Glasgow Glasgow, UK

Keywords

Sexualities and space/place, Sexual citizenship and collective action, Sexualities and globalization

While the intimation to get "out of the closet, into the streets" has long been central to gay and lesbian politics, political strategies based on visibility and recognition have recently earned pride of place in queer activism (Fraser 1999; Richardson 2000). The aesthetisation of LGBT politics blurs the firm boundaries between consumer practices and political claims: indeed, visible urban "queer" space is often used to claim legitimacy and recognition for the whole LGBT community (Skeggs 1999; Moran and Skeggs 2004; Kates 2003).

However, some literature has questioned the subversive potential and inclusive character of the politics of visibility. The public avowal of one's sexual identity may be more central to the experiences of white middle class individuals based in cosmopolitan cities, who have greater access and entitlement to "queer" space (Manalansan 1997; Taylor 2007; Fraser 1999). Some scholars have argued for the need to reappraise the role of the "global closet" as a universal mechanism of oppression for non-heterosexuals, particularly in non-Western, provincial and rural contexts, where visibility may not always be an empowering or viable strategy (Binnie 2004; Seidman et al. 1999; Jolly 2001).

This paper focuses on the activities of informal "lesbian/queer" networks in urban Russia, and explores the role of collective agency in appropriating public and semi-public urban space as "lesbian/queer". It draws on ethnographic data collected for a research project on non-heterosexual women's negotiation of everyday space. Fieldwork was conducted in Moscow, a global city with a lively gay scene, and in provincial Ulianovsk, a city of 700,000 in the Middle Volga region with no established "queer" space. My analysis problematises dichotomous notions of visibility/invisibility and political/consumer practices, and questions Western-centric assumptions about the emancipatory value of "outness" and authenticity.

Transsexuality and transgender: Gender identities and expressions of gender

Palma Saleiro, Sandra

CIES-ISCTE, CIES-ISCTE

Lisboa, Portugal

Keywords

Gender, identity, Transgender, transsexuality

This communication intends to present some of the first results from the ongoing research project "Transsexuality and Transgender: Gender Identities and Expressions of Gender" carried out in CIES-ISCTE, financed by the Portuguese Foundation for Science and Technology (FCT). At a Portuguese national level this is the first research on the subject, in sociology and generically in the social sciences.

Overall the innumerable gender expressions that the umbrella term transgender includes, this communication will focus only on individuals that we designate as transsexuals, understood as individuals whose gender is permanently felt and experienced as being the opposite of their biological sex. In this category of individuals, attention will be given only to transsexual women, ie, male-to-female (MtF) individuals.

Through the biographical interviews carried out, age stands out as a major distinctive factor of self-identity within transsexual women, more than other variables such as class or geographical location. They share the same sex/gender non-coincidence feeling and reveal similar emotions, but their expression and interpretation of gender differ in various aspects. One of these aspects has to do, first of all, with self-identification regarding the expression of gender: they classify themselves as women, as transsexuals or even as transvestites or homosexuals.

The research reveals that younger transsexual women tend to build their identity of gender based mostly on psychological-medical scientific discourse on "what transsexuality is" or "what is to be a transsexual", which are appropriated through their involvement on medical care services or through the access to information available on sources like the Internet. For this reason they self-identify and account themselves in a way that is closer to the "classic" narrative concerning transsexuality. Older transsexual women, on the other hand, interpret this feeling of sex/gender non-coincidence without access both to specialized information and to transsexual medical care services. Though, they tend to build their gender identity among peer, frequently in micro-cultures linked to gay environments, drag show environments and prostitution, and produce narratives that are less linear and "clean" from a gender identity's point of view.

Trapped in the wrong body, again. A comparative perspective on transability and transgender personal narratives

Arfini, Elisa A.G.

Social and human sciences, University of Ferrara Alessandria, Italy

Keywords

body project, crip theory, transability, Transgender, queer theory

If deviant sexuality is - for queer theory - the constitutive outside to compulsory heterosexuality and correct gender identification, disability is - for crip theory - the constitutive outside of the able body, an able body that is an essential requirement for social recognition. This comparative presentation of transability and transgender narratives will be given in the light of a broader project aimed at the deconstruction of "ability" as a prerequisite for processes of recognition of subjects as gendered and sexual.

This paper will present one particular phenomenon in which disability is desired as a project for one's own body: body image integrity disorder (hereafter: BIID), a psychiatric diagnostic category ascribed to those able-bodied individuals who want to become disabled. "Transability" is the identity category used by some subjects diagnosed with BIID, i.e. a cultural translation of a diagnostic category. Transability represents an "ability trouble", in analogy to transgender subjectivity as a "gender trouble". Normative discourses embedded in social practices and scientific knowledge define disability as a condition not to be desired, thus, desiring self-injury and impairment is a body project that goes against any normative and desirable body standards. Transgender body projects go against normative body standards, too.

Evidence of transability exists on the English-language Internet, mostly in the form of personal blogs. Blogs provide a space to produce and archive knowledge about oneself; as such they represent a tool for "presentation of self", one that offers anonymity and the possibility of creating a disembodied identity. Transgender personal narratives are a well established genre, one that appears also in the form of autobiographies and memoirs.

A comparative analysis of transabled narratives will suggest many parallels with transgender narratives and rhetoric. Some terms have been borrowed from the transgender community, some metaphors are equivalent (such as "being trapped into the wrong body"). Moreover, transability and transgender share a wary relationship with the medical institution. How can we compare strategies concerning medical pathologization deployed by the two communities? Can this rhetorical cross-fertilization be seen as a political alliance?

What matters to prejudice? Attitudes towards homosexuality and their predictors in a sample of Portuguese university students

Gato, Jorge

*Differential Psychology Centre, Faculty of Psychology and Education of Porto University
Porto, Portugal*

Fontaine, Anne Marie

*Differential Psychology Centre, Faculty of Psychology and Education of Porto University
Porto, Portugal*

Carneiro, Nuno

*Differential Psychology Centre, Faculty of Psychology and Education of Porto University
Porto, Portugal*

Keywords

Homosexuality, attitudes, Prejudice, students, predictors

Results from the European Values Study (Ferreira, 2003) revealed greater levels of prejudice towards homosexuality in Portugal than in most of its European counterparts. However, the same survey verified a progressive endorsement of a "moral permissiveness" index (in which an item about homosexuality was included), especially in younger and more instructed Portuguese citizens. Thus, positive and supporting attitudes towards homosexuality may be found in younger generations.

In a first study, an instrument was developed to assess different types of attitudes towards homosexuality in a sample of university students. Following exploratory (n=384) and confirmatory (n=425) factorial analyses, two positive dimensions (comfortable interpersonal contact with homosexual persons and support of rights and visibility of lesbians and gay men) and two negative dimensions (heterosexism and considering homosexuality as a pathology) were identified. High levels of the two positive dimensions were found, whereas the perspective of homosexuality as a pathological disorder was lowly subscribed. The heterosexism dimension, a subtler negative attitude according to which heterosexuality is considered a more legitimate lifestyle, was moderately subscribed. Given this last result, Portuguese students could not be considered unprejudiced, as they also revealed a more subtle or "modern" form of prejudice, a type of attitude that has been observed towards other out-groups (e.g., Meertens & Pettigrew, 1999).

As life contexts influence attitudes, in a second study, the predictive power of socio-demographic variables (e.g., sex, age, parental educational level, having gay and lesbian friends, contact with scientific information about homosexuality during academic training) and personal variables (e.g., social values, gender ideology) in explaining students' attitudes towards homosexuality, was tested (n=409). The results are discussed taking into account previous studies about predictors of attitudes towards homosexuality. Implications for prejudice reduction interventions are also pointed out.

References:

- Ferreira, P. M. (2003). "Valores morais: as noções de "certo" e de "errado" na transição pós-moderna." In: J. Vala, M. V. Cabral & A. Ramos (eds.), Valores sociais: Mudanças e contrastes em Portugal e na Europa., 95-122. Lisboa: ICS.
- Meertens, R. & Pettigrew, T.F. (1999). Será o racismo subtil mesmo racismo? In J. Vala (Org.), Novos Racismos: Perspectivas Comparadas. Oeiras: celta Editora.

Women's spaces in Canadian universities: Gender, sexualities and spatial contestations.

Nash, Catherine

Geography, Brock University Canada,

Webber, Michelle

Sociology, Brock University Canada,

Keywords

Gender, Sexuality, feminism, queer, women's studies

"Women's centres" and Women's Studies programs have played an important and prominent role in Canadian universities since the mid-1970s when the women's liberation movement challenged the hegemonic masculinities inherent in university spaces, curricula and faculty. From a geographical perspective, university spaces, from classrooms to hallways and from departmental lounges to cafeterias, are constituted through normalizing gendered and sexualized (as well as classed, aged and racialized) discourses that discipline the normative expectations, behaviours and practices of individuals utilizing those spaces. Women's centres and Women's Studies programs serve an important purpose in challenging normative and hegemonic discourses. Nevertheless, these spaces are also highly contested and experience challenges arising from the presence and role of men, contests over the classed and racialized nature of such spaces and the visibility of non-heterosexualities including self-identifying lesbian and bi-sexual women. In this paper, we explore contemporary tensions arising from the increasing visibility of queer and trans analytics and practices in "women's centres" and Women's Studies spaces. We highlight some of these emerging issues and speculate about the difficulties and possibilities in play including the move to rename such spaces ("Diversity" centres, "Positive spaces", Gender Studies); protests against the loss of "women only" spaces and the debates over the presence of "masculine" bodies (men, butch women, transmen and transwomen). Given the current economic and political climate, such debates often lend credence to claims that such places are "obsolete." We conclude with a consideration of whether such spaces remain necessary and in what ways.

RN24

Science and Technology

"What should we fear?" Forensic DNA databasing in Portugal and public (un)trust

Machado, Helena

*Dep. Sociology, University of Minho
Braga, Portugal*

Keywords

DNA profiling, forensic database, public trust

The Portuguese forensic DNA database was recently established by the publication of the law 5/2008 in the 12th February 2008, following the earlier widespread adoption in many other European countries. This setting up of a forensic DNA database was accompanied by a clear enthusiasm from the part of the Portuguese government, supporting the idea that it was needed that Portugal followed more advanced countries in matters of DNA criminal investigation and transnational database cooperation regarding security policies and crime fighting. Despite this political enthusiasm, no doubt many citizens felt uneasy about these developments because of a low public confidence in the political institutions and in the criminal justice system compared with other European nations

This paper intends to provide a contribution for a discussion of some issues which are omitted or at least clearly reduced in the legislation, in public debates and in official representations of science and DNA technologies. We will critically examine some traces of this political projecting of positive images on the uses of DNA technologies, exploring two main issues: pressure for expansion and building of public trust. Our empirical basis will be interviews with forensic and law experts. The analysis of these discourses provide valuable insights for the further mapping and understanding of some cultural assumptions, values, unwritten codes and practices that can produce a sort of soft or informal governance of the forensic DNA database.

I will explore three topics of concern: 1) how a developing country in European context was pushed to the importance of DNA profiling and databasing and might be very soon pressured to expand the uses and scope of these technologies; 2) how the political narratives is used to garner the confidence of the citizens uses and based on cultural assumptions of neutrality of science and on the alleged value of DNA technology to criminal justice's efficiency; 3) the implications of the fact that the mechanisms of civic accountability and participation in the modes of organisation and maintenance of genetic data are missing, with the State emerging as the single guarantor of the public interest.

"Yes, we can!", or how citizen participation may revert inequality and vulnerability scenarios: the case of Participatory Budgeting

Matos, Ana Raquel

*Science, Technology and Society Research Group, Centre for Social Studies, University of Coimbra
Coimbra, Portugal*

Neves, Daniel

*Science, Technology and Society Research Group, Centre for Social Studies, University of Coimbra
Coimbra, Portugal*

Arriscado Nunes, João

*Science, Technology and Society Research Group, Centre for Social Studies, University of Coimbra
Coimbra, Portugal*

Matias, Marisa

*Science, Technology and Society Research Group, Centre for Social Studies, University of Coimbra
Coimbra, Portugal*

Keywords

inequality, accountability systems, Citizen participation

This paper is based upon a 3 year-long research (April 2006 ? March 2009) developed as part of the project Researching Inequalities through Science and Technology - ResIST, funded by the European Commission. The project drew on a range of approaches in the social sciences to understand processes that contribute to the increase in inequalities through the role of S&T, but also, importantly, to understand processes that contribute to mitigate inequalities through S&T, and to bring that knowledge into policy, in developing countries and in Europe.

More specifically, we aimed at expanding the analysis of accountability systems towards experimental initiatives in urban planning, namely Participatory Budgeting (PB). As social technologies, PB processes promote a participatory strategy of urban planning, actively involving a set of actors at the local and regional levels, such as elected officials, technical and administrative staff, citizens, civic organizations and social movements. One of the main innovations brought about by PB is the "democratization" of the budget, turning it from a reserve of experts and administrators/political agents to a multifaceted object that can be appropriated by "common" citizens; a calculation device for establishing needs and priorities; a tool for redistribution based on criteria of social justice; a process of co-production of decisions and their monitoring and evaluation. This type of process aims at addressing both the redistribution of resources in order to mitigate or reduce inequalities and the empowerment of citizens to participate in deliberation and decision-making, and it is based on an articulation of participation and representation of citizens.

Through a comparative analysis of three different PB processes - Seville (Spain), S. Brás de Alportel (Portugal) and Belo Horizonte (Brazil) -, we seek to identify new configurations of relationships between knowledge and inequality and alternative "high intensity" systems of accountability, such as those commonly named by the actors involved in such processes as "forms of social control", and to evaluate their contribution to addressing inequality and the social and institutional vulnerability of poor or marginalized populations.

After the linear model: a situated approach to innovation

Perrotta, Manuela

*Sociology and Social Research, University of Trento
Trento, Italy*

Keywords

innovation, practice, technological change

Innovation and change are fundamental issues in science and technology studies. What scholars from different perspectives try to explain is how innovation and change occur, with particular reference to the ongoing evolution of new technologies.

The aim of this paper will be to explore the concept of innovation from a new perspective, which try to go over the "traditional" linear model of innovation. The latter, in fact, proposes a view of innovations in which they are first recognized, then accepted by few actors, and then widely diffused and accepted within a field. However, in this paper it will be used a situated approach to innovation, which looks at change that is not planned, but emerges from the situated practices of specific contexts. Therefore it is necessary to investigate the situated practice as the locus of innovation.

Adopting this approach I will explore a situated technological change using the empirical example of assisted reproduction, where a new technology will take the place of the old one. At the moment two different assisted reproductive technologies (ARTs) are simultaneously used: IVF (In Vitro Fertilization) and ICSI (Intracytoplasmatic Sperm Injection). The two techniques differ in the laboratory practices of the professional, usually a biologist, who performs them. In the case of IVF the biologist puts an egg and sperm together in a test tube and it is only after 24 hours that s/he will know if fertilization has occurred; instead, in the case of ICSI, the biologist injects a single sperm in the oocyte, with control of the process.

The case under examination shows therefore, how two different technologies that don't present significant differences in terms of the results obtained, coexist in the realization of daily work practices in reproductive centers. Looking at technological innovation from this perspective, that which I am interested in examining is technological change in action, the progressive passage from the old (IVF) to the new (ICSI) technique, integrated in a controversial technology and tied to knowledge processes that are developed through organizational activity.

Assessing Scientific Mobility Dynamics and Impact: drawing on the potential of electronic CV databases

Pirralha, André

*Knowledge and Innovation, DINAMIA
Lisbon, Portugal*

Assis, José

*DMS ; Knowledge and Innovation, INETI and DINAMIA
Lisbon, Portugal*

Fontes, Margarida

*DMS ; Knowledge and Innovation, INETI and DINAMIA
Lisbon, Portugal*

Keywords

Knowledge flows, scientific mobility, Highly Skilled Migrations, Career Trajectories, CV Analysis

The mobility of scientists has become, in the last few years, a hot topic in the context of highly skilled migrations. Although it is not a new phenomenon - since historically these movements have always been present - there is evidence of the fast growth of scientific mobility as we move towards an increasingly globalised world. Along this process, the asymmetries between countries in terms of mobility flows became more evident. However, the early emphasis on the loss of highly skilled resources by less advanced regions - coined in the "brain drain" concept - is being increasingly replaced by the "brain circulation" approach, which rejects the idea of unidirectional flows and addresses scientific mobility as a complex phenomenon, whose effective role on knowledge production and transmission is still far from being understood.

Despite the growing relevance of scientific mobility, researchers are confronted with a lack of reliable data on mobility flows. This led to a search for new methods that would permit to capture the complexity and multidimensionality of the phenomenon. Since mobility increasingly consists of a sequence of events that take place along a scientist's career (rather than a one-off move), the analysis of scientists' trajectories emerged as a promising methodology, and the Curriculum Vitae (CV) as a rich source of information. In addition, because CV's report career evolution and outputs, they could equally provide information enabling the assessment of mobility impacts.

However, CV's have a number of problems, concerning data format and contents and data treatment, that have so far limited their usefulness. The recent introduction of electronic CV databases, which present information in a standardized format and in an electronic support, may contribute to overcome at least some of these problems. The objective of this paper is exactly to use a novel electronic CV database - the Portuguese DeGóis Platform - to explore the possibility of building meaningful mobility indicators and of using them to understand scientific mobility dynamics, as well as to address the impact of mobility upon knowledge production and circulation, both at an individual and at an organizational or country level.

Career paths, scientific productivity and academic rewards

Sanz-Menendez, Luis

*Systems and Policies for Research and Innovation (SPRI_SCIMAGO), CSIC Institute of Public Good and Policies (IPP-CCHS)
Madrid, SPAIN*

Cruz-Castro, Laura

*Systems and Policies for Research and Innovation (SPRI_SCIMAGO), CSIC Institute of Public Goods and Policies (IPP-CCHS)
Madrid, Spain*

Keywords

Academic Careers, mobility and inbreeding, scientific workforce

Based on the survey responses and publications' data of 1583 academic scientists in several fields affiliated with a Spanish university or with the Higher Council for Scientific Research (CSIC), this paper examines the relationship between scientific performance and reward, considering tenure as a key academic reward and looking at the mediating effect of mobile versus non mobile career paths. Although an extended practice in many academic systems across the world, inbreeding has been often considered as conflicting with the norm of universalism and the rule of merit in science. By using regression analyses, our findings indicate that inbred faculty does not get tenure with less scientific merits than Ph.D.s from other institutions. However we also find that non mobile careers are a strong and significant predictor of the timing of rewards in the form of early permanent positions. Our results question the assumption, rooted in the open competitive model of the academic job market, that mobility enhances career. We argue that these findings must be interpreted in the context of organizational, institutional and structural features that promote the development of internal academic job markets.

Conceptualising network structures through Assemblages

Haynes, Paul

INGENIO, Universidad Politécnica de Valencia Valencia, Spain

Keywords

Social Networks, innovation, assemblages

Technological Innovation, in its development and diffusion involves both collective action and complex interdependencies. The concept of social networks - which combine the social world and individuals in patterns which are not pre-determined - would therefore seem a useful way of expressing the relationships required for such innovation. However, because the concept does not imply a specific system or mechanism of technological innovation, social networks are often invoked in a very uncritical way, with the concept itself unable to produce any insight into either the social or networking processes at work in the development of new practices or technologies. In this way it becomes a placeholder or blackbox which can be set aside while other factors are brought into relief. In this paper I introduce the concept of "assemblages" in an attempt to outline a corrective to these limitations in a way that captures the crucial interdependencies and relationships from which innovation emerges. The paper presents research data from a project examining the ceramic sector explaining how the concept of assemblages exemplifies innovation practice.

Creative knowledge environments in technoscientifically different European societies: An empirical comparison of organisational support to Swedish and Croatian researchers in biosciences

Hemlin, Sven

Gothenburg Research Institute / Dept of Psychology, University of Gothenburg Gothenburg, Sweden

Prpic, Katarina

None, Institute for Social Research - Zagreb Zagreb, Croatia

Keywords

survey, organisation, R&D, productivity, creativity

The idea behind the framework creative knowledge environments (CKE) is to emphasise which environmental factors influence creativity and innovation in knowledge intensive work fields (Hemlin, Allwood & Martin, 2008). The literature does not tell us much which organisational factors may promote individuals to be creative and produce innovative results. We believe that much more research should be done in this field to find out how to better design creative environments in the future.

We are carrying out a comparative analysis based on Swedish and Croatian survey data in bioscience aiming at exploring, a) which factors were important to a creative output (publication productivity) in R&D, and, b) which were the distinguishing factors across the two countries as measured by the Organisational Support for Innovation Questionnaire (OSIQ). OSIQ was developed by Pirola-Merlo (2000) to measure how influential work environments are for creative action and innovations as perceived by persons in this environment. OSIQ addresses three points of reference: the organisation as a whole, the project being worked on, and the individual. It consists of the three scales: organisational encouragement of innovation, resources and empowerment. The comprehensive scope, level and length of this questionnaire made it suitable in the analysis of organisational R&D environments.

Apart from getting a common picture of organisational support for creativity in R&D we hypothesise that the researchers in biosciences will report also distinguishing features of organisational support due to differences in economic, socio-cultural and technoscientific development. Results of this study will be addressed at the SSTNET meeting and are expected to be relevant for further studies and the design of creative knowledge environments.

DNA technology in the Portuguese tabloid press - CSI Portugal?

Machado, Helena

*Department of Sociology, University of Minho
Braga, Portugal*

Santos, Filipe

*Centre for Social Studies, University of Coimbra
Coimbra, Portugal*

Keywords

DNA, Crime, Tabloid press, public understanding of science

Two recent cases of missing children in Portugal " Joana Cipriano and Madeleine McCann " presented privileged opportunities to inquire into the tabloid press' discourses surrounding DNA technology uses and promises in criminal investigation contexts.

Our methodological approach draws on the principles of the grounded theory. We collected and analyzed news articles regarding both cases published by the highest circulating daily Portuguese newspaper. That analysis raised the prominence of categories such as certainty and dependence, which appear related to popular conceptions of objectivity and neutrality, but also to the images of a super-science disseminated in forensic science fiction TV series such as CSI. These associations may produce potential impacts in the public's representations of forensic science and particularly DNA technology.

We argue that the tabloid press's narrative constructions surrounding the use of DNA evidence in criminal investigations is based on a deficit model of the public understanding of science, which may explain the simplification and reduction of uncertainty regarding identification by DNA profiles. Simultaneously, television cultural references are appropriated by the tabloid press and merged into accounts of real cases, which may serve as sources of referential and interpretative frameworks of reality.

Embodied Narratives, Participation and Performance in Emergent Technologies: Debating Nanotechnology

Nunes, João Arriscado

*NECTS, Centre for Social Studies, University of Coimbra
Coimbra, Portugal*

Matias, Marisa

*NECTS, Centre for Social Studies, University of Coimbra
Coimbra, Portugal*

Carvalho, António

*NECTS, Centre for Social Studies, University of Coimbra
Coimbra, Portugal*

Filipe, Ângela Marques

*NECTS, Centre for Social Studies, University of Coimbra
Coimbra, Portugal*

Keywords

participation, Nanotechnology, focus groups, deliberative forum

The development of emerging sciences and technologies, such as nanosciences and nanotechnologies, has led to the proliferation of promissory notes and scenarios for the future. Unlike the case of other technologies, such as biotechnologies, which were "put into politics" and brought to public debate after they had been developed and made available, there is a widely shared concern that these emerging technologies be subject to public discussion regarding the priorities of research, the directions of their development, the concerns over their possible risks and the hopes regarding their benefits at early stages of research and development. This debate calls for the creation of spaces incorporating citizens, their concerns and diverse ethical conceptions, experiences and knowledges. Conversely, the organization of such spaces must take into account new challenges and issues raised by the specificities of nanosciences and nanotechnologies.

As part of the European project DEEPEN (Deepening Ethical Engagement and Participation in Emerging Nanotechnologies), exploratory methodologies for citizen involvement in debate on the possible trajectories of these technologies were rehearsed. A variant of the focus group technique, conceived as a collective learning exercise, inspired by Paulo Freire, and complemented by a performative exercise incorporating tools from Augusto Boal's forum theatre, allowed "matters of concern" to emerge. In a second moment of the project, a deliberative forum was organized, bringing together a heterogeneous range of actors and modes of knowledge production, including citizens, nanoscientists and social scientists. This paper is a preliminary account of the outcomes of these two moments, as well as a discussion of the epistemological, methodological and conceptual implications of these procedures as tools for the democratization of science and technology policies.

Enrolling citizens through technology. Laypeople as "junction workers" in new healthcare infrastructures

Zanutto, Alberto

*Dipartimento di Sociologia e Ricerca Sociale, Università degli Studi di Trento
Trento, Italy*

Piras, Enrico Maria

eHealth unit, Fondazione Bruno Kessler Trento (Povo), Italy

Keywords

medical narratives, infrastructures for healthcare, Personal Health Record (PHR)

Among the many transformation in healthcare systems a particular role is played by technological innovation. While often considered as results of larger scale decisions, technologies do reshape social roles and redistribute responsibilities among the networks they are part of. The study of the making of health-related technologies, though, can provide a thought-provoking perspective on the healthcare sector and its policies.

Here we present a reflection on the growing role of laypeople in their own care by the analysis of the process of design and prototyping of a new ICT, the Personal Health Record (PHR). According to Medical Informatics, PHR is a web-based technology that will allow everyone to manage, share and access medical records, designed to give laypeople a tool to create and keep active a personal network of formal/informal caregivers but also an instrument to help creating a new doctor-patient relation.

As part of a interdisciplinary team (computer scientists, mathematicians, sociologists) we conducted a preliminary study to identify the health-related needs of ordinary citizens so to create a Personal Health Record (PHR) to be implemented at a regional scale (500.000 people roughly) in northern Italy.

We elicited medical narratives, revolving around the existing health records, to study how people manage their health in their households. We conducted 50 in-depth interviews focusing on a) how people manage their medical information at home, looking for existing strategies to be considered as guidelines in the PHR design and b) how the records are used to build shared account between patients and doctors.

We argue that the rhetoric of patient empowerment underemphasizes the new role and the consequent responsibility of patients/citizens who are progressively charged with the burden of being constantly accountable to healthcare professionals. In this respect, the PHR can be considered as a patient-activated infrastructure which has to be kept working for the healthcare provision to be delivered.

In this paper we reflect on the implication of designing and implementing such a technology with particular attention to the power and responsibility issues tied to it.

Expert Knowledges and Action-Nets in the Field of Biotechnologies: Studying a Network In-The-Making

Bruni, Attila

*Sociology and Social Research, Trento University
Trento, Italy*

Keywords

network, expert knowledge, biotechnology, action-nets

What contributes to the enactment of a network of knowledge and technological innovation? And what are the elements involved in its stabilization?

To answer these two questions, the paper will address the question of the coordination and institutionalization of knowledge in the biotechnology sector, as a prime field in which to observe the intermingling and interaction of scientific, professional and technological knowledge, and of a plurality of organizational actors and practices.

In fact, the biotechnological sector is nowadays configuring itself as the point of confluence of a plurality of knowledges and organizational practices, whose common denominator is a strong technological orientation. They are mediated by diverse technologies and are at the same time oriented to the learning of new forms of action, work, and technological innovation. The biotechnological sector (and the knowledge connected with it), thus, occupy a privileged position from which to observe the encounter among an array of expert knowledges, technologies and organizational and professional memberships.

Observing the constitution and stabilization of an Italian biotechnological network (involving ten departments of three universities, two national research institutes, two hospital research centres and two science and technology parks), the paper will focus on the coordination and stabilization of a web of knowledges and organizational practices, the common denominator of which is a strong technological orientation. Following an actor-network perspective, the case will be analysed as an attempt to stabilize and institutionalize a learning network within which new technologies (and knowledge connected with them) occupy a prime position, and in which the meeting and merging of a plurality of expert knowledges and professional memberships can be observed.

The conclusions will critically reflect on the case-study presented, highlighting how elements involved in enacting forms of interorganizational collaboration are not necessary the same ones that stabilize a network in itself. Finally, the paper will offer some methodological reflections about the studying of a network in-the-making, underlining the importance of investigating networks not only from a structural standpoint, but also from a processual one, in order to understand the various practices of knowledge production and coordination.

Exploring Growth and Structure of Biogerontology Research in Portugal

Almeida, Maria Strecht

*Dept. Biologia Molecular, Instituto de Ciências Biomédicas Abel Salazar, Universidade do Porto
Porto, Portugal*

Gomes, Miguel

*Dept. Biologia Molecular, Instituto de Ciências Biomédicas Abel Salazar, Universidade do Porto
Porto, Portugal*

Keywords

Portugal, biogerontology, publications, research projects, science mapping

Biogerontology is a growing and fundamental research area within the broad field of biomedicine. This paper deals with the case of Portugal. Is this also a fair portrait of the investigation conducted in Portugal on the subject of aging? How should the current state of that research area in this country be depicted within national and European contexts? Recent key events such as a prominent international conference jointly organized with the European network LINK-AGE and that took place in Porto or the public announcement of the restructuring of different research institutes into a consortium having "age-related diseases and regenerative medicine" as one of major areas of investigation, might illustrate the acknowledgement of its local importance.

Present paper aims at describing the development and structure of this particular research area in Portugal. Using a scientometric approach, it explores biogerontological research in this country both through publications and projects. The study is focused on indicators of productivity and scientific collaboration, as well as on funding; additionally it looks at the specific topics covered. What does it mean speaking about a research community on the theme of aging in Portugal? Which specific topics do the different research groups focus on? What are their scientific collaborations, within and beyond national borders? In a time when the study of aging seems to gather huge public attention, the results here presented are an attempt towards mapping biogerontology in Portugal and its integration within a broader international setting.

Facilitating biomedical research in Austria

Wieser, Bernhard

Modern Biotechnology, IFZ

Graz, Austria

Keywords

biomedicine, research policy, ELSA research, socially robust knowledge, civic epistemology

During the last decade, biomedical research has certainly been one of the major hopes of science policy making. Many European countries have launched specific research programmes to stimulate and foster biomedical research. Not only significant advancements in public health and medical practice have been expected, but also economic potentials have been attributed to this research field (and science policy making). Large public investments have been taken to provide a research infrastructure and organisational conditions for biomedical research. In Austria the Vienna Bio Center (VBC) is a good example for this and also the Austrian genome research programme GEN-AU. With these science policy initiatives Austria aimed to put itself on the map and to become an international player in the European research landscape.

A specific element of biomedical research initiatives all across the western world are specifically designed research programmes to investigate the ethical, legal, and social aspects of genome research (ELSA). This tandem-model was introduced already together with the Human Genome Project and adopted by many countries for their own national research policies of biomedical research.

The explicit linkage of genome research and the reflection of its ethical, legal and social implications constitutes unique circumstances for the research that is carried out under this framework. Not only is it a paradigmatic example for science policy making that aims to produce a socially more "robust knowledge", but also it raises fundamental (methodological) questions about the social function of a research that is expected to feedback and thereby to shape the research field it is investigating.

With this paper I will discuss biomedical research as a prime case of the complex interrelations between science and policy making. ELSA research is encouraged to provide knowledge on the basis of which policy decisions can be made (civic epistemologies). While at the same time policy makers confront researchers with ever stronger expectations that their work should meet - especially economic - goals that lay traditionally beyond the boundaries of academia.

Governance of Emerging Research Infrastructures in Europe

Ryan, Lorna

*Sociology, City University
London, UK*

Keywords

research policy, gender mainstreaming, research infrastructures

A new generation of Research Infrastructures (RIs) are emerging in Europe. To date, 44 initiatives have been identified by the European Strategy Forum on Research Infrastructures (ESFRI) as potential European Research Infrastructures. Of these 44, 5 are social science and humanities initiatives.

This paper provides an overview of the development of these Research Infrastructures within the context of EU research policy, with particular reference to social sciences research infrastructures. The modes of governance of these new "super-clusters" of research expertise, their position and relation to the European policy and public bodies and the policy vision(s) (as enunciated by different actors in European Union) for their regulation are critical elements impacting on the future structuring of the "European Research Area". The extent to which gender equality issues are mainstreamed in the various research infrastructures is also explored.

Helping water to flow: institutional context of solutions strengthening permeability

Matczak, Piotr

Polish Academy of Sciences, Institute for Agricultural and Forest Environment Poznan, Poland

Chorynski, Adam

Polish Academy of Sciences, Institute for Agricultural and Forest Environment Poznan, Poland

Keywords

permeability, decision making, diffusion of innovation, climate change, institutions

Permeability in urban areas has been diminishing last decades as a result of human interventions (covering ground spaces with concrete surfaces, e.g. roads building etc.). At the same time, climate models predict that due to climate change, sudden precipitations and heat waves will be more likely. Loss of permeable surfaces leads to higher probability of flash floods, but also makes cities more vulnerable to heat waves.

The problem is already recognized and in many countries policies are introduced (e.g. permeability taxes) in order to counteract the adverse effects of lower permeability. Also there are technologies available to help in adaptation: materials for roads and pavements etc. Among the solutions the green and cool pavements, green roofs, permeable car parking places are already implemented.

The solutions are not always new but climate change creates a new context for them. In this sense their implementation is regulatory driven. In Poland, a new regulations were introduced in 2008: the ministerial decree allowing local councils to impose permeability taxes.

In the paper the Poland's situation is considered, in terms of strengthening the permeability in the urban areas. The focus is both on the demand (regulatory) side and on the supply sides, and it is investigated how the process of decision making is made and what are the obstacles in application of the new, permeable solutions.

Green pavements/parking are treated as innovations. In the paper, the institutional side of diffusion of innovation is explored. A model describing factors influencing the decision making is built helping to investigate, what factors are enhancing and what factors counteract in the diffusion of technology.

The analysis of existing regulations and the review of technologies available on the market were done. The factors important in the decision making processes were collected through in-depth interviews with decision makers on the local level.

It is argued that environmental concern is of marginal importance in the decision making process, while the economic aspect is crucial. There is a potential in the use of the information and education techniques, since the permeable solutions could be both environmentally and economically beneficial, but they are hardly recognized.

Homogenisation of Intellectual Property Rights? The various functional properties of different research disciplines and corresponding technological industries

Gill, Bernhard

Sociology, Munich University Munich, Germany

Keywords

Varieties of Capitalism, biotechnology, Open Source, intellectual property rights, sectoral systems of innovations

Privatisation of scientific research and a quest for stronger Intellectual Property Rights (IPR) - mainly patent protection - can be observed since the 1980ies, as a wave of institutional change beginning in the US. But soon after, a counter movement for Open Source (OS) and Open Access emerged, starting from the US and the Scandinavian countries. Within the European Union, reactions are divided - not only about IPR versus OS, but also within IPR protection, with some actors putting more stress on trademark than on patent protection.

This heterogeneity might be explained if we take into account the differences between explicit and implicit knowledge (Polanyi), and discrete and cumulative innovations (Scotchmer). The combination of explicit knowledge and discrete innovation is a clear case for patent protection, exemplified by the pharmaceutical industry with drugs often based on one substance with clearly described chemical characteristics. The combination of explicit knowledge with cumulative innovations however, which is pervasive in the electronic and software industries, is often better based on OS, because OS allows for open standards which reduce transaction cost between cooperating firms and reduce lock-in fears on the side of their customers. Innovations based on implicit knowledge are usually cumulative, as can be seen in the machine-building industry where excellence depends on the professionalism and apt cooperation of craftsmanship. Since implicit inputs cannot be patented by definition, trademarks or similar more comprehensive and output oriented IPRs are most functional.

With this typology and inspired by the Sectoral systems of innovation (Malerba) and Varieties of capitalism approach (Hall/Soskice), we hope to explain why different industries and different countries promote (and need) different IPR policies. The first wave of our own empirical research was based on plant breeding and biotechnology, where we can observe plant breeder protection as an output oriented IPR, patent protection with the advent of biotechnological single gene introduction, and the prospect for multiple gene combination now, which probably sets the stage for OS biotechnology - the latter not so much for ethical, but for economical considerations.

Human Embryonic Stem Cells in France : Bioethics law and Dynamics of Research Networks

Dubois, Michel

GEMAS - MSH, CENTRE NATIONAL DE LA RECHERCHE SCIENTIFIQUE (CNRS)

Paris Cedex 06, France

Keywords

social regulation, dynamics, scientific network, bioethics, biomedical research

Since the bioethics law of 2004, the french research on Human Embryonic Stem Cells (hESC) has a derogatory status. That law gave to the french researchers a five year authorisation in order to demonstrate to the members of the French biomedical Agency - l'Agence de la Biomédecine (ABM) - the usefulness of their research strategy and their potential therapeutical outcomes.

The comparative study of scientific networks shows that a significant part of potentially interested researchers consider the entry in the hESC domain as too risky.

The temporal constraint previously mentioned is not the only problem. The hESC domain is strictly regulated in terms of scale (limited numbers of researchers), orientations of research (only short term therapeutics orientations are allowed) and global cohesion. Paradoxically, if hESC are the paradigmatic form of genericity, the research domain is divided in « organ-oriented » subgroups with low levels of interaction between them.

The first objective of this paper will be to give an accurate description of the consequences of ABM's action on the dynamics of hESC scientific networks in France. What are the structural outcomes of the regulative process associated with ABM ? What are the main forms of interaction between the organisational agenda of ABM and individuals research strategies ? The second objective will be to analyze the current state of the reform of the bioethics law of 2004. This reform has been recently postponed to 2010. What can be expected from this reform ? Who are the individual and collective actors of the reform ? What will be the consequences of their action on the dynamics of research networks ? These are just some of the questions we will try to answer from a sociological point of view.

Human Sciences and Surveillance Technologies Pride and Prejudice

Lobet-Maris, Claire

*Faculté d'Informatique-Computer Science Faculty, Université de Namur
Namur, Belgium*

Cornelis, Mathieu

*Faculté d'Informatique-Computer Science Faculty, Université de Namur
NAMUR, Belgium*

Grandjean, Nathalie

*Faculté d'Informatique-Computer Science Faculty, Université de Namur
Namur, Belgium*

Keywords

Governance, Expertise, DEMOCRACY, Surveillance technology, Human sciences

The paper addresses the question of the status and of the responsibility of human sciences in technological projects funded by European Commission which concern surveillance technologies. Those technologies raise societal questions regarding autonomy and democracy in their co-generational dynamics. The paper rests on the experience of the authors (from ethics, law and sociology) currently committed in a European project gathering scientists and industrials specialized in body recognition and tracking.

Along the different frame programmes (FP) that organize the European R&D, the status and the responsibility of human sciences have evolved. Three main steps can characterize this evolution showing a progressive moving from a general policy advisory role to a more local and instrumental role inspired by the "value sensitive design" paradigm. After a short presentation of the two first steps and their critics, we will consider the current situation as set up in FP6 and FP7. In those programmes, human sciences are integrated as part of technical projects with the specific responsibilities to influence the technical designs in order to make them "societal compliant" or acceptable. Even if this more integrated position brings a technical answer to the previous critics, it raises also critical questions regarding the local and the instrumental status of social sciences placed into the narrow context of a single project under development.

This third step raises two main questions. The first one regards the narrow context of the project and the difficulty to question the more societal framing of these types of surveillance projects. This appears particularly difficult due to the very instrumental and urgent demands of the partners to help them to design a technological system that is societal "compliant". Fundamentally, this "instrumentalization" of human sciences questions the impoverishment of an already discreet public space to deliberate democratically these surveillance technologies. The second question regards the deliberative methodology into the project. This questions the democratic values that should support our ?expert? role into the project and the learning deliberation to set up in order to foster a sound appropriation of those values by industrials and technicians in their current practices.

International joint laboratories, an emerging feature in the internationalisation of public sector research

Jonkers, Koen

*Systems and Policies for Research and Innovation (SPRI_SCIMAGO), CSIC Institute of Public Goods and Policies (IPP-CCHS)
Madrid, Spain*

Cruz-Castro, Laura

*Systems and Policies for Research and Innovation (SPRI_SCIMAGO), CSIC Institute of Public Goods and Policies (IPP-CCHS)
Madrid, Spain*

Keywords

research infrastructure, internationalisation, joint laboratory

This paper analyses the emergence of public sector international joint laboratories as an increasingly important new phenomenon in the internationalisation of public sector research. Over the past decades national governments and research organisations increasingly fund the establishment of research laboratories in a foreign country. As French and German research organisations have been most active in the establishment of such organisations they receive most attention but these activities are compared with the joint labs established by other European, North American and Asian (Pacific) research organisations.

The main questions the paper aims to answer are what are the different institutional and organisational forms in which international joint laboratories have been established in the past decade? What are the organisational goals for doing so? And to what extent are the expectations being met?

When discussing so-called international joint laboratories it is important not to start with a narrow operational definition and to realise that this group of sub-organisations is very heterogeneous in terms of size, physical and juridical set up. The paper will account for this diversity by means of a typology of international joint laboratories which are grouped according to these three dimensions. The paper continues by providing an overview of the frequency with which new organisations are established and the countries in which most of these organisations are set up over the last decade. Finally it discusses the results of a survey of the directors of these joint laboratories (N=110) as well as interviews with the managers in charge of international relations in major (European) research funding and performing organisations.

The phenomenon is of interest not only because it is an important element of the internationalisation strategy of some of the major European research organisations, but also because it has become a prominent feature of the internationalisation of the research systems of countries like China. The phenomenon is expected to become more prominent in other Western and large emerging research systems as well.

International mobility of researchers and the circulation of knowledge

Delicado, Ana

*University of Lisbon, Instituto de Ciências Sociais
Lisbon, Portugal*

Keywords

international mobility, networks, researchers

The international mobility of researchers has been strongly promoted both by the European Union (with programmes such as the Marie Curie Fellowships, the ERA Careers website, the European Charter for Researchers) and by national governments (that fund grants abroad or to foreign citizens and lift administrative barriers to the entry of highly qualified personnel). These policies rely on the assumption that international mobility enhances professional development in individual careers but also generates networks through which knowledge is circulated, fostering the production of science.

International scientific mobility has been extensively researched in the past few years. However, these studies have focused mainly on pull/push factors of scientific systems and career issues and not much attention has been paid to the role of mobility on generating and sustaining knowledge flows.

This presentation aims to address this issue, in particular whether mobile scientists keep ties with different locations, promote collaborative international projects, are more prone to publish internationally, and build bridges between different national scientific systems.

It is based on an ongoing post-doctoral research project regarding the international mobility of Portuguese researchers. Empirical data stems from two main sources: a survey of scientists abroad carried out in 2007; and a set of interviews with returnee researchers with PhDs from foreign institutions, who are currently working in science in Portugal, performed in 2008.

International Scientific Mobility and Knowledge Flows - the Portuguese case

Cotta, Diogo

*SOCIUS, SOCIUS-Centro de Investigação em Sociologia Económica e das Organizações
Lisbon, Portugal*

Bento, Sofia

*Departamento de Ciências Sociais, SOCIUS-Centro de Investigação em Sociologia Económica e das Organizações
Lisbon, Portugal*

Keywords

Portuguese case-study, knowledge circulation, international mobility

After decades of debate structured by the brain drain rhetoric, the international mobility of scientific researchers has been recently put under a more positive light. Recognized by several authors as a fundamental force behind the circulation of knowledge at the transnational level these movements are nowadays frequently portrayed as not only desirable but also worthy of policy incentives. Accordingly, one of the main principles behind the creation of the European Research Area underlines the importance of stimulating the mobility of researchers in the European context.

Nevertheless, the relationship between physical mobility and knowledge circulation still remains relatively under-researched. With the purpose of alleviating the shortage of empirical information about this increasingly relevant subject, this paper presents findings derived from a study conducted on Portugal based researchers, in three scientific domains (Health Sciences, Electrical Engineering and Sociology). Drawing on survey and interview data, as well as on science policy literature, the paper charts the perceptions of relevant actors (both researchers and research institutes' directors) on the connections between mobility - understood as a period spent researching abroad during one's career - and international knowledge flows. Taking into consideration differences between disciplines, lengths and purposes of stay and the nature of the work actually performed, an exploratory typology is advanced, with the intent of associating specific types of mobility with the circulation of different kinds of knowledge.

Thereby, we expect to provide a conceptual starting point in order to promote further empirical research. Given the strong political will in setting up a European dimension into scientific careers and the resultant need to devise concrete policy measures, the establishment of common based discussions on the tangible impacts of scientific mobility is absolutely essential. The empirical results presented were gathered under the auspices of the research project "Mobiscience - scientist's mobility in Portugal: trajectories and knowledge circulation" (www.mobiscienceportugal.com).

Knowledge Transfer Processes in Multinational R&D Networks

Urze, Paula

Departamento de Ciências Sociais Aplicadas, FCT/UNL _ Faculdade de Ciências e Tecnologia da Universidade Nova de Lisboa Caparica, Portugal

Manatos, Maria João

---, UNINNOVA - Instituto de Desenvolvimento de Novas Tecnologias Caparica, Portugal

Keywords

R&D units in Europe, Knowledge flows, electronics and automobile industries, multinational networks, innovation

One of the crucial aspects of world economy globalization relies on the new forms of creating and spreading new technological knowledge. Actually, the last decades have shown a generalized concern about the study on how multinationals create knowledge and, specially, about how they operate its transference (Sölvell and Birkinshaw, 2002). Knowledge is recognized as a principal source of economic rent and the effective management of organizational knowledge has increasingly been linked to competitive advantage and is considered critical to the success of the business firm (Nielsen, 2002).

In this way, a crucial challenge for multinationals is to combine the unique location-bound resources found in local clusters with the global resources of the firm to generate valuable and rare capabilities (Lundan, 2002). In this sense, they should assure that competencies from the different units are diffused throughout the group (Andersson et al, 2002).

Based on the theoretical discussion around innovation and transfer of knowledge through multinational networks, we will present the final results obtained on the R&D.COM - Local R&D COMPETENCIES within Global Value Chains (FCT/MCTES) - project. This paper aims at identifying the knowledge and technology transfer processes developed among the worldwide R&D units and the competencies that are locally created to earn power by knowledge within these global value chains.

The empirical component of this project is grounded on a local case study and on one extended case - that involves a local R&D unit (Portugal), a foreign R&D unit (Holland) and the headquarters (Norway) - developed on multinationals from the automobile and electronics industries.

In the analysis of the local case two main questions arose: the importance of knowledge and competencies interchange between local agents and the portuguese unit, and its privileged position in the knowledge diffusion in the network. From the analysis of the extended case, we explored the knowledge creation and dissemination process within the multinational. We can see, on the one hand, that the headquarters are the units where core knowledge is produced and diffused, but, on the other hand, there are some particular subsidiaries where R&D is developed with a growing level of autonomy.

Leadership styles in biomedical research groups

van der Weijden, Inge

*Science System Assessment, Rathenau Instituut
The Hague, The Netherlands*

Keywords

biomedical research, research management, research groups, performance, leadership style

An understanding of the determinants of research performance is a prerequisite for designing effective micro and macro research policies. This study examines the relationship between leadership style and research performance of academic groups. It focuses on Dutch medical and health research groups. The effects of managerial initiatives of research leaders, in which leadership style is an example, on research performance are investigated. Over the years several scholars have emphasized the style of leadership as an important aspect of performance. Studies have emphasized the importance of participative or consultative leadership in research groups (e.g., Pineau and Levy-Leboyer, 1983). Also positive relationships are found between transformational (also called charismatic) leadership and outcome variables of research project groups (e.g., Keller, 1995). However, studies concentrating on leadership and research performance leave other managerial control elements beyond the scope of research. In this study also research management activities (van der Weijden et al., 2008), contingencies and personal scientist characteristics are taken into account. Data will be gathered from both biomedical group leaders and (junior as well as senior) staff members. Results of a first pilot study will be presented.

The outcomes of this study are intended to help research groups, the management of the research institutes and individual researchers to arrive at better decisions about future research, research management and policy.

Mapping contemporary technoscientific controversies: the software patent debate in Europe

Sadaba, Igor

*sociologia IV, universidad complutense de madrid
madrid, spain*

Garcia, Albert

*sociologia I, universidad complutense de madrid
madrid, spain*

Keywords

intellectual property conflicts, patents, scientific controversies, software

For the last decade, software and IT lobbies and a few European industry sectors have presented a proposal for a directive ("Directive on the patentability of computer-implemented inventions" (2002/0047/COD)) in order to apply the patents regime to software. This directive would entail one of the sweeping changes in software's legal and socioeconomic regulation in the European history (a shift from copyright to patent protection). The conflicts and controversies which arose over the planned directive have configured a landscape where several political and social actors, institutions and movements (such as "Free Software" or Open Source movement) fight to define the social and legal place of computer programs. In fact, while the European Council adopted the software patent directive and the European Commission welcomed Council agreement on it, the European Parliament voted by a massive majority to reject it (July 2005). The immaterial code has become an obscure object of desire (at stake) and a real puzzle for legislators and current juridical normative. In this work, after an historical revision of software's trajectory in Europe and its role in the global economic order, we will try to sketch the kind of discourses and effective rhetorical strategies developed on each side of the intellectual property controversy. Besides which, we also aim at mapping out the spaces of conflict and to register the multiple participants around this debate, ranging from software companies (European and American) to social movements of programmers or computer users (The Foundation for a Free Information Infrastructure (FFII)) or the European Patent Office (EPO). The ubiquity of such conflicts about intellectual property claims has become a relevant phenomenon of which deserves a careful consideration and research.

Mapping the European TB Vaccine Research Network: Actors, Structures and Collaboration

Freestone, Peta

School of Social and Political Sciences, The University of Melbourne Parkville, Victoria, Australia

Keywords

Tuberculosis, vaccine, collaboration, Research networks

Scientists developed the original vaccine against Mycobacterium tuberculosis (TB) in the first half of the 20th Century. Yet the World Health Organisation (WHO) estimates that each year 30 million people are infected with TB, 8 million develop the active disease and 2 million people die. The only vaccine for TB, BCG, was developed in the 1920s and has limited effectiveness if administered later than childhood, in particular geographic regions and against particular forms of TB infection. This inconsistent performance is particularly concerning considering the emergence of drug-resistant strains of TB in the last two decades.

It is arguable that the greatest long term impact on tuberculosis prevalence would come from the development of a new, single-dose, reliable and affordable vaccine. However, in recent decades scientific research in this area has been limited. The reasons for this situation are complex, though most can be attributed to social and economic inequality. Nevertheless, the continuing global health burden from TB and the increase of resistant strains has led to a gradual increase in scientific research into TB prevention and treatment.

This paper explores the actors and structures involved with TB vaccine research in Europe. Following on from recent pioneering studies in the U.S., this paper collates publicly available data, including journal article co-authorship, research organisation websites and the WHO clinical trial database. Social network analysis (SNA) methods are used to analyse the data and construct a visual representation of the European TB vaccine network.

Mapping the TB research network is significant as it has not been done before. It has also been suggested that greater coordination of research activities and information sharing amongst scientists pursuing innovations for neglected diseases is needed. Practical resources to achieve this level of coordination, such as a website or publicly accessible database, informed by studies such as this, will help maximise the return on investment from research funding. The findings of this paper also have policy implications in that they provide insight into national and cross-border collaborative patterns as well as the relative centrality of particular precincts and states in the European TB vaccine research network.

Materialities and Actors in Knowledge Transfer: Translation in a Portuguese Technology-based Start-up

Pinto, Hugo

CES - Centre for Social Studies, University of the Algarve; University of Coimbra Faro, PORTUGAL

Pereira, Tiago Santos

*CES - Centre for Social Studies, University of Coimbra
Coimbra, PORTUGAL*

Keywords

knowledge transfer, Actor-Network Theory, University-Industry links, translation

While differing in their perspective and policy implications, several recent analytical approaches on the role of universities in the innovation process have underlined its central importance. The analysis of the new mode of knowledge production, the triple helix or the innovation systems approaches all highlight the contribution of the university into this process, in what is increasingly considered as the third mission of the university: inducing knowledge-intensive entrepreneurial activities. This mission is also expected to have, more or less explicitly, a particular impact on regional dynamics and territorial development. In this framework, it is of particular importance to understand how the links between academy and market, and the corresponding knowledge transfer mechanisms, are created and sustained.

In this communication, we will focus in particular on analysing the usefulness of the tools provided in the framework of ANT (Actor-Network Theory), by understanding the creation of relationships between academia and industry as a process of translation, in ANT terms. The implications thereof, regarding the identification of languages, problems, interests, and even actors identities, will be analysed. The work is based on a case of a new technology-based spin-off firm, emerging from a Portuguese university. Using the ANT approach, attention will be given to both the role of human and non-human actors and to the development of the process of translation and network building. The analysis will finally consider whether such approach can help us understand the present success of the firm.

Mediatized science: science and technology has a media issue

Rui, Brito Fonseca

*Sociology, CIES/ISCTE
LISBON, PORTUGAL*

Keywords

popular, newspapers, quality, Portugal, Science and technology

This presentation aims to discuss the public understanding of science and technology, namely, it aims to question the last 30 years of science and technology, in Portuguese newspapers.

Taking Science and Technology published in national newspapers has representative and source of the whole science and technology media coverage, this presentation goal it is to build a landscape of Portuguese science and technology media coverage, between 1976 and 2005.

It seems clear that for scientific activity to be understood, the communication of science plays a central role. The representation of science by the mass media possesses, thus autonomy before the scientific activity playing, relatively to this, different social functions.

Starting with the approval of the first Portuguese democratic Constitution, this paper analyses science and technology newspaper coverage, in Portugal.

This has been a period of major changes in Portugal, namely in science and technology. In 1976, Portugal had almost no investments in science and technology and science and technology weren't an important issue. Are science and technology noticeable now? Does science sells newspapers? Are science and technology popular issues?

Based on, a quantitative and qualitative, analysis of thousands of newspaper articles published in four major national, daily and paid Portuguese newspapers (two "popular" and two "quality" newspapers), this presentation develops a portrait of what has been the media coverage of science and technology, and discusses trends and transitions, between 1976 and 2005.

This discussion it is a chapter of a wider research that aims to discuss and characterize the presence of science and technology in the Portuguese newspapers.

Mobility, networks and knowledge flows: towards a more comprehensive methodological framework

Videira, Pedro

Dinamia/Iscte, Dinamia/Iscte

Lisboa, Portugal

Keywords

Social Networks, Knowledge flows, scientists mobility

In developed countries the management of academic careers is strongly and increasingly related to mobility which allows coming into contact with new knowledge and different ways of doing and evaluating in the scientific activity. European policies, namely through the creation of the European Research Area, emphasize this demand for mobility, seen by the researchers as an essential part of their professional trajectory and vital to the construction of their human and social capital.

The mobility trajectories of scientists originate periods of co-location, decisive in the formation and strengthening of trust bonds and social and epistemic proximity relations, which facilitate the creation and transfer of shared knowledge between individuals even after they are geographically separated.

The role of scientific mobility and of the social networks deriving from it in the circulation of knowledge is not yet fully understood. The measurement of knowledge flows and the role of social networks in that process have been approached mainly through CV analysis and bibliometric methods. These methods have strong limitations since many knowledge flows don't originate co-publications or co-authorships being thus much more elusive and difficult to analyse.

The aim of this paper will be to put forward for discussion a theoretical and methodological framework, which includes Social Network Analysis instruments, that can arguably allow a more comprehensive understanding of the relation between the mobility of scientists, the construction of their human and social capital and the circulation of knowledge between scientists and as a consequence between national systems of science and innovation. This model, which has been developed in the course of an ongoing Phd thesis and which will be applied to the Portuguese case, articulates diversified instruments such as the mapping of individual mobility trajectories through secondary data, CVs' analysis, the application of questionnaires and in-depth interviews with selected scientists.

The data obtained will be partially analysed through specific Social Network Analysis software. We contend that these methods can be extremely useful in the study of knowledge circulation processes specially when articulated with other "more traditional" approaches in sociological studies.

National science policies under transition - analysis of recent trends in ten countries

Häyrynen-Alestalo, Marja

*Department of Sociology, University of Helsinki
Helsinki, Finland*

Pelkonen, Antti

Innovation Policy Research and Impact Assessment of R&D, VTT Technical Research Centre of Finland Espoo, Finland

Teräväinen, Tuula

*Department of Sociology, University of Helsinki
Helsinki, Finland*

Tuominen, Terhi

*Department of Sociology, University of Helsinki
Helsinki, Finland*

Waltari, Suvii-Tuuli

*Department of Sociology, University of Helsinki
Helsinki, Finland*

Keywords

comparative analysis, research systems, national science policy

National science policies in several countries have recently become more and more economy- and innovation-driven. Changes in world economy, objectives from OECD and EU (especially Lisbon strategy), aims to secure the international competitiveness of the national economies and global political challenges like climate change and energy supply have all in their part contributed to this development. Despite general trends towards market-orientation individual nation-states have pursued aggressive or passive science policies and defined the importance of science in various ways. While some of them have seen scientific knowledge only as a servant of the economy and therefore similar to technology policy and some others as worthwhile of having value in itself, most of them have regarded it as situating somewhere in between. In this paper we examine science policy in a comparative international perspective by analysing changes in the structures, goals, resources and practices of science policy as well as its links to other policy fields in ten countries: Finland, Sweden, Denmark, the Netherlands, the UK, France, Canada, Ireland, Switzerland and Norway. All these countries have actively developed their science policies in various ways and thus provide good examples of recent trends at Nordic, European and international levels. The main interest is on the changes that have taken place during the 2000s.

Our analysis shows that while indeed there are many similarities in the development of the science policy structures, goals and practices, also interesting differences can be found between the countries. What has been typical for all of them is the growing significance of science policy in the national policy agenda, which has nonetheless led to various interpretations, practices and instruments depending on the country. Most of the countries attempt to find top-research priorities, utilise the research results more effectively and pay attention to relations between science and society. Some of the disparities are the restructurisations of the science policy administration and university systems, the principals and allocation of research funding, and how key priority areas in science policy are determined, if at all.

Presentation of Recent SSTNET Publication "Women in Science and Technology"

Prpic, Katarina

, Institute for Social Research ? Zagreb

Oliveira, Luísa

, ISCTE

Hemlin, Sven

, University of Gothenburg

Keywords

Research, R&D, comparisons of gender inequality, S&T

The topic-based organisation of the book arises from its concept. Besides the introduction, the book consists of three thematic units or parts. Although comprising only one paper, the first part, Multinational comparisons of gender inequality in S&T, is close to being a general, main overview because it offers international (European) comparisons of the key indicators of gender differentiation in science and technology. The second part is entitled Women's careers and performance, indicating the common denominator of the four chapters included in this part. The third part, Policy-relevant research and experiences, consists of two papers, where one investigates the research bases relevant for the development of gender equality policies in R&D, and the other sums up the experiences of one of the most powerful actors of such a policy.

Re-thinking the spaces and flows of science

Woolley, Richard

Centre for Industry & Innovation Studies, University of Western Sydney Penrith South DC, NSW, Australia

Keywords

knowledge value collectives, spaces of circulation, scientific mobility, networks

Spaces and flows of scientific knowledge, personnel and innovations are topics of great interest to institutions and policy-makers. The perceived importance of science and technology for economic growth and social development has led to the building of frameworks for knowledge and learning that transcend national borders and reflect the interdependencies of globalisation. Traditional centres of excellence in North America and Europe have been joined by emerging knowledge hubs in Asia, whilst south-south collaboration in science and technology is also expanding as flows of private sector R&D investment diversify. In such a context, competition for scientists and engineers encourages the adoption of policies to attract and retain highly skilled researchers. However, much of the thinking underlying these policies is based on neo-classical economic understandings of human capital. For example, a concept such as 'brain drain' is limited by its reliance on neo-classical human capital theory and not well suited to the collective and distributed nature of scientific research teams, epistemic communities and collaborative networks. This paper argues that better tools for understanding the dynamic interplay of human capital mobility, scientific knowledge production and diffusion, and technology transfer exist in sociological studies of science. The paper describes and discusses two theoretical approaches: Callon's 'techno-economic networks' and Bozeman and colleagues' 'knowledge value collectives'. These perspectives emphasize the irreducible role of tacit knowledge in the replication of scientific research and the structuring of research collectives through social capital networks respectively. Scientists' mobility and networks are thus understood as both fundamental to the research activity of science and integral to the processes (training, postdocs) and contexts (laboratories, centres, departments) responsible for the (re-)production of scientific fields. It is argued that these insights offer a better starting point for thinking about transformations in the institutional organisation and social and spatial distribution of scientific activity. From this perspective the role of public policies is not so much to build 'markets' able to attract and retain scientists but to observe and support the process of distributed network (re)configuration. Finally, implications of this approach for the European Research Area are considered, particularly in relation to socio-economic interdependence and development.

Research Councils and Resource Allocation Committees: A Comparative Analysis

Fernández-Carro, Remo

Ciencia Política y Sociología, Universidad Carlos III de Madrid Getafe, Spain

Keywords

Sociology of Science, research councils, Political Sociology of Science, Resources of Science, Science Institutions

Research councils are not the only source of resources for science. Very often, researchers depend on non-monetary resources such as beam-time in a particle accelerator, a neutron jet in a spallation source, or observation time in an orbiting telescope. Resource Allocation Committees (RACs), offices devoted to non-monetary resource allocation, are widespread in the world of science and are key in the management of large infrastructures, both for big science or domestic projects, and for academic or industrial research. But do RACs work just like research councils? Do they occupy the same position in the boundary between science and government? Do they play the same role in the reward system of science?

Little has been written about this particular science institution. This article is a first attempt to compare the structure and operation of RACs with research councils. Although the focus is on big science and international cooperative projects, a broad typology is developed based on the nature of the allocated resources and their flexibility: whether they are monetary or not; the scarcity of the resource; the elasticity and nature of the demand for the resource (public, private, basic, applied, field of research); the degree of competitiveness of the resource allocation; the prioritization of the lines of research and the influence of political factors; and ownership of the installation.

Research Politics in Russia: review of reforms in the scientific sphere for the last 17 years

Asheulova, Nadia

*Centre for Sociological and Science Studies Research, St. Petersburg Branch of the Institute for the History of Science and Technology, the Russian Academy of Sciences
St. Petersburg, Russia*

Suglobova, Valeria

*Centre for Sociological and Science Studies Research, St. Petersburg Branch of the Institute for the History of Science and Technology, the Russian Academy of Sciences
St. Petersburg, Russia*

Keywords

Science and technology politics in Russia, transformation of science, changes in organization and administration of science, system of financing, scientist staff

The paper is based on an annual sociological monitoring of science transformation in Russia, which has been carried out by the Centre for Sociological and Science Studies research of IHST of RAS. Research actuality consists of that during the protracted period Russian science was in a state of innermost crisis, there was degradation of scientific complex, which on the whole hid in itself threat for development of country, conducted to the loss of present advantages and prospects.. Necessity of successive and adequate transformations for a scientific environment appeared vitally needed. For successful realization of reforms the attentive study of changes in science is required.

This research helped to retrospectively analyze reforms in Russia's science over the period of 1991 to 2007 and to define the mainstreams and steps which are undertaken by various groups and representatives of scientific community for an exit from the developed crisis.

There were deep social and economic transformations for last 17 years due to the transition from the Soviet management system to system of market relations and disintegration of Soviet Union in all spheres of the Russian society. Russian science underwent structural changes in organization and administration of science. The occurred changes have caused a number of serious negative consequences in science. It became necessary for the scientific community such kind of reform which would promote modernisation of system of basic researches and adjustment of communication with modern requirements of society.

The reforming period of Russian science may be defined by stages as crisis (1991 to 1996), transformation (1996 to 2001), stagnation (2002 to 2005), a new phase of reforms (2006 to 2008). The transformations which occurred during each period are lighted up in the article in detail.

The special attention is spared to the stage of new phase of reforms. Its measures to reform science are the most significant ones. Their implementation is supposed to crucially enhance the role of science in the Russian society and facilitate Russia's transition to a stage of stable economic development and helps Russian scientists to become members of international scientific community.

Retail Innovation: (In)Success Factors and User's Profile-Types

Reigadinha, Tânia

Sociology, ISCTE

Lisboa, Portugal

Keywords

Actor-Network Theory, User's Configuration, Technological Innovation

The research looked to identify the reasons that lead, from the retailer side, to the implementation of the technological innovation, as well as understand the implementation process adopted. From the customer side, one tried to understand the customer's adherence to the technological innovation and degree of satisfaction. This research refers to the technological innovation concept, the diffusion of innovations models and the user's configuration problematic, focusing on the work of Actor-Network Theory authors. The research starts from the notion that innovation is born from a socio-technical network and tries to identify the actors that were involved in the retailer's implementation process, as well as the efforts made by the retailer to promote the relationship between the customer and the machines. Following the user's configuration problematic the research also looked to sustain the importance of incorporating users needs into new machines. The research explores the relationship between customer profile-type and the innovation's degree of adherence and satisfaction by using the self-completion questionnaire. The structuralized interview, applied to the technological innovation responsible, explores the implementation process. For triangulation purposes secondary data analysis and in loco observation of the self-checkout machines were also used. Results showed customer's age, gender and professional situation differentiating users and non users of the technological innovation. New investments to interest even more customers in the new machine have been identified. Some organization key characteristics were identified as good contributors to the innovative attitude. Organizations must realize that to implement an innovation successfully they have to involve some key actors, namely the future users. This will help the organizations to rapidly implement the innovation with a cost effective diffusion. Organizations should also pursue some key competencies and variables to assure an innovative attitude. This is the first retail innovation implementation research in Portugal. This constitutes a starting point to further research in this field that looks to help organizations in their innovation projects.

Science and Democracy: from Technocracy to Dialogue

Baert, Patrick

Sociology Department, University of Cambridge Cambridge, ENGLAND

Shipman, Alan

Economics Department, Open University UK Milton Keynes, England, UK

Mateus Jeronimo, Helena

ISEG, Technical University of Lisbon Lisboa, England, UK

Keywords

dialogue, DEMOCRACY, pragmatism, technocracy

Much sociological work has always been aimed at influencing public policy, by documenting social problems and offering explanations of why they arise. This paper argues that recent developments in empirical sociology reinforce a pre-existing methodological case for defending a "dialogical" approach to policy over the more narrowly defined "technocratic" approach. Technocratic policy-making tends to assume that a specific solution will be most appropriate to solving a problem or improving a situation, in any particular political context. It also tends to assume that this solution, identified through scientific reasoning, will often be more complex than can be readily understood by non-experts; and, more importantly, that the views of an uninformed public may be more obstructive than constructive in getting beneficial policies adopted. The "piecemeal" technocratic approach was borrowed from applied natural science and engineering with the intention of rooting policy in proven effectiveness, avoiding dictatorial "grand designs" and so strengthening democracy. But its effect has often been to limit democratic debate, by showing some social processes and structures to be beyond dispute - matters of causal fact, not open to reshaping by rhetorical preference or public opinion.

The paper argues that a contrasting, dialogical approach is central to sociology's distinctive contribution to policy making and analysis, and has been reinforced by recent empirical discoveries. Dialogue must, in practice, complement or replace technocratic procedures because public opinion and belief are not separable from the operation of policy, or the impact of technology. A technocratic approach, even to questions rooted in the natural world (such as energy generation, waste disposal, transport and climate change), must therefore allow public opinion to react to and interact with expert opinion, and not be subordinated to it. Drawing on recent studies of decisions on major technology deployment, the paper argues that sociology has re-established the necessity of dialogue, especially by broadening of the scientific concept of risk, and drawing attention to additional socially-determined sources of uncertainty. Whilst drawing on neo-pragmatist philosophy, the paper then shows that several other strands of sociology also converge on the dialogical approach, through the way they theorise historical and survey-based research.

Scientific awards and young researchers' careers: the Gulbenkian Prize 'Stimulus to Research'

Costa, Antonio Firmino da

CIES, ISCTE

Lisboa, Portugal

Keywords

research systems, scientific prizes, young researchers, scientific careers, scientific workforce

Attracting young people into scientific careers and encouraging quality in their research are priorities in science and technology, namely at the European level. The institutions that deal with the planning and funding of research in science and technology, whether public or private, European, national or regional, have been promoting instruments to this purpose. Among these instruments, scientific prizes occupy an important place thanks to their connotations of excellence and prestige. Scientific prizes are practically as old as modern science itself, though they have passed through different stages and models. The first prizes were designed for ex-post recognition and gave credit to scientific achievement. The most important of these is the Nobel Prize. Later, they were joined by other prizes encouraging future high-quality research, aimed especially at attracting young people into scientific careers. One of these is the Prize 'Stimulus to Research' awarded by the Calouste Gulbenkian Foundation, in Portugal. A sociological analysis of the academic and research pathways of the prize-winners over the years found different 'types of scientific career' among these young, high-level researchers. This paper covers the theoretical assumptions of the study, the methods used and the main results obtained. In addition to a typology of scientific pathways, these results include an analysis of the main factors influencing them, such as their relationship with the development of the scientific systems in which these young scientists trained and took jobs. We hope to contribute to an analysis of the formation of top-quality, highly competitive segments of the scientific workforce in European research systems.

Scientific collaboration within and across research teams

Correia, Zita

*DEECA - Dept de Engenharia Energética e Controlo Ambiental, INETI - Instituto Nacional de Engenharia, Tecnologia e Inovação, IP
Lisboa, Portugal*

Cera, Rosália

*DEECA - Dept de Engenharia Energética e Controlo Ambiental, INETI - Instituto Nacional de Engenharia, Tecnologia e Inovação, IP
Lisboa, Portugal*

Egreja, Catarina

*DEECA - Dept de Engenharia Energética e Controlo Ambiental, INETI - Instituto Nacional de Engenharia, Tecnologia e Inovação, IP
Lisboa, Portugal*

Keywords

Collaboratory, scientific collaboration, resource sharing, Social Networks

This paper presents part of the results achieved to date in the process of developing a collaboratory in two R&D organizations. A collaboratory corresponds to a laboratory without walls, in which scientists are connected to each other, to scientific instruments and to information, independently of time and location. These two cases are part of a broader research project engaged in building a collaboratory in order to share knowledge and resources among the Portuguese State Laboratories. The building of the collaboratory is anchored on three main tasks: a) information audits carried out in each of the organizations, in order to map the main information flows, entities, repositories and systems; b) information behaviour research, in order to gain insight into the organizational information culture and the researchers' information use; c) implementation of the appropriate infrastructure and tools, in order to accommodate information archiving and intelligent search, collaborative software, remote control of scientific instruments, and multi-channel access to the services.

The case study strategy was adopted because it is particularly amenable to the triangulation of methods (namely document analysis, survey and interviewing) thus providing rich ingredients to characterize a specific context. Discourse analysis was the technique used to analyse the interview transcripts. The research sites are two government R&D institutions operating in the Civil Engineering and in the Nuclear Technology fields, respectively.

In the process of preparing the ground to develop the collaboratory, interviews were carried out with researchers of those two organizations in order to understand what collaboration means for them, and how collaboration actually happens within specific research project teams, and on their organizational daily routine. Attention was also paid to the socio-professional networks of these researchers, in order to understand the role played by these networks in their lives. This paper focuses on the interpretative repertoires emerging in the course of the interviewing process. We expect that our understanding of the researchers' collaboration framework and the meaning they assign to it may help us shape the collaboratory.

Self-monitoring of universities using Social Network Analysis: best practice between research and university consultancy Management of University Research and Research Assessment Exercises

Obermeier, Uwe

*Innovation Research Unit, University College Dublin
Dublin, Ireland*

Ahrweiler, Petra

*Innovation Research Unit, University College Dublin
Dublin, Ireland*

Keywords

collaboration networks, interdisciplinarity, co-publication

Networks within and between organisations are crucially important in shaping the success of innovation. Collaborative research projects, co-authored publications or multidisciplinary excellence networks in universities point to the network mode of today's knowledge production. Understanding communication patterns and network dynamics is relevant for R&D policies on the national, regional and sectoral level to identify access point for intervention and support. Social network analysis (SNA) can be a powerful tool for a better understanding of the collaborative research processes and of academic research performance. SNA can help to make the invisible visible and to support strategic collaboration.

This contribution presents first SNA results of investigating the internal and interdisciplinary collaboration networks of a major European university. R&D networks of universities are not only self-organising features, but also a target for management design. Therefore, the study is set up, on the one hand, as an academic research project, but is also intended, on the other, to contribute to the self-monitoring mechanisms of the university.

This ambiguity, scientific interest in the field of higher education research and consultancy for academic managers, gives rise to more fundamental considerations. It is important to discuss SNA in a methodological and ethical-regulatory context for evaluating its applicability. The methodological context concerns the discipline- and organisation-dependent usability of STI indicators (co-publications, co-patents etc.). It is important to see that indicators such as citation statistics only offer a limited and incomplete view and have to be complemented by other measures and qualitative considerations. The ethical-regulatory context refers to requirements of protecting personal data and transparent management procedures.

Semantic Interoperability and Biobanking - Setting Standards for European Tissue Economies

Tupasela, Aaro

*Department of Sociology, University of Helsinki
University of Helsinki, Finland*

Keywords

biomedicine, research infrastructure, biobanking, tissue economies, standards

Recently a great deal of attention has been given to national or regional biobanking initiatives. The goal of many such initiatives is to study disease and thus provide the basis for developing treatments and medicines. At the same time, however, local biobanking initiatives and the data that can be derived from them are increasingly being embedded into a global network of biobanks, such as through BBMRI. These international collaborative networks necessitate and produce new forms of collaborative models within biomedical research, but also necessitate considerable national investments into biomedical research infrastructure and research. Database federation is the process by which data from different research projects can be brought together to form larger data sets for statistical analysis and the development of biomedical platforms. In order to do this, however, a great deal of standardization needs to take place between the various actors.

In this presentation, I will look at the way semantic interoperability operates to allow for such data exchange tasks. Semantic interoperability forms the basis for the development of tissue and informational economies within biobanking. At the same time, however, national tissue and informational economies become intertwined with the increasingly global market for information on the human body. From this I will derive some conclusions as to the direction and form that current and future biobanking initiatives will take in terms of practices in the biomedical sciences.

Systems, networks or spaces: science dynamics revisited

Nedeva, Maria

Manchester Institute of Innovation Research, MBS, The University of Manchester Manchester, United Kingdom

Keywords

framework, change, science dynamics, research space

This paper explores critically existing notions conceptualising the dynamics of science across its different aspects (e.g. knowledge, epistemic communities, organisations, practices etc.). Here the focus is on conceptual developments that are mainly relational and aim to incorporate in the understanding of science influences (actors and relationships) to a certain degree exogenous to it. Examples are provided by the notions of National Innovation Systems, National Research Systems, actor networks (in different guises) and actor constellations.

Building upon the critical analysis of existing notions conceptualising the dynamics (and explicating their methodological strengths and weaknesses) it is proposed that a concept of research space(s) might be better suited. Conceptually and empirically, the research space is defined by the "essential" relationships of the research organisations and by layered notions of utility of knowledge. In turn, the "essential" relationships of research organisations are outlined by the essential exchange in which these engage. At the most general level this is the exchange of resources for knowledge. In terms of resources the organisations of science engage predominantly (although not exclusively) in exchanges involving money. Where knowledge is concerned the exchange can involve knowledge embodied in science artefacts (academic paper, books, research reports, data sets, equipment and facilities, techniques, new molecules etc.) or/and knowledge embodied in people (competencies). Although the organisational actors are likely to vary between different research spaces these would broadly be state/government organisations, industrial and commerce organisations and possibly (but not necessarily) charity organisations.

Finally, it is argued that the proposed notion of "research space" has several implications for the analysis of science and its dynamics. First, it gets away from notions of science systems and their structure as hierarchical and "layered". Second, and related to the previous point, the notion of "research space" allows the student of science and science policy to look beyond different socio-political entities (nation state, European level, regions etc.) and see the interactions of the organisations of science as a seamless transgression of boundaries and levels. And third, the notion of "research space" can provide an important stepping stone towards the development of comparative frameworks.

Technological dangers and challenges. Science and Technology Professors on the Social Impact of Modern Technology

Mucha, Janusz

Sociology and Social Anthropology, AGH University of Science and Technology Poland,

Keywords

scientists, new technologies, social changes, challenges, Poland

The paper is based on the in-depth interviews with top full and assistant professors (and a survey among the fifth-year students) in one of the largest and best science and technology universities in Poland. This is a part of a much larger project, the findings of which are now in print in Polish. The main topic of the project and of the paper is the analysis of the mentality or rationality of the scientists: to what extent it is or is not a technocratic rationality. This paper will deal with the following issues: new scientific discoveries as well as new sophisticated technologies and their broadly understood social impact, new technologies and new kinds of social differentiation, civilizational dangers, risks and challenges and their perception, "socially controversial" scientific and technological projects, potential and real control of science and technology, the role of experts in the public sphere. Analysis of the interviews and questionnaires shows that the mentality of these scientists is far from being strictly technocratic and their awareness of the social contexts of the production of science and technology, as well as of the dissemination and application of their findings is very strong.

TO THE JOINT SESSION: "SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY: THEIR ROLE IN THE GENERATION AND PREVENTION / MITIGATION OF CRISIS AND DISASTERS"

The Increased Role of Intermediary Structures and Networks in the Recent Processes of Scientific and Technological Globalization. The Case of Small Country

Mali, Franc

*Faculty of Social Sciences, University of Ljubljana
Ljubljana, Slovenia*

Keywords

Globalization, ERA, intermediary science structures, converging technologies, science networks

THE INCREASED ROLE OF INTERMEDIARY STRUCTURES AND NETWORKS IN THE RECENT PROCESSES OF SCIENTIFIC AND TECHNOLOGICAL GLOBALIZATION. THE CASE OF SMALL COUNTRY.

The recent processes of globalisation are leading to the unprecedented reorientation of national R&D and innovation systems in a new global order. Even states with very large R&D and innovation systems are being forced to join their R&D efforts within supranational entities. This requirement is even more acute for small countries with the lack of strong R&D and innovation efforts. In the paper, I'll analyze what are the crucial positive social consequences for small countries to become part of European Research Area (ERA). Namely, in the tradition of the EU's history of response to challenges of globalization, we could propose that ERA is rolled out through a series of coordinated actions encompassing R&D, but also innovation and the development of lead markets and/or regulatory and public service environments. The focus of my discussion will be oriented to the role of the new created intermediary structures and networks (centres and networks of excellence, technological platforms, other types of so-called converging institutions) at the EU and at the national/state level. Is it possible to come to the full homogenisation of intermediary structures and networks among EU-Member States? My answer will be no. Namely, the idea of Europeanizing the national R&D structures is not a model of simple copying, but a model of learning from each other. On the case of Slovenia it will be shown that the creation of the flexible institutional R&D structures and R&D networks is especially important because of the arising of new enabling techno-sciences. They represent a host of radically new possibilities that are opening up for modern societies.

The organizational structure of research groups in a regional university system

Hernández, Nuria

Science, Technology and Society, Institute for Advanced Social Studies, Spanish National Research Council Córdoba, Spain

Fernández, Manuel

Science, Technology and Society, Institute for Advanced Social Studies, Spanish National Research Council Córdoba, Spain

Ramos, Irene

Science, Technology and Society, Institute for Advanced Social Studies, Spanish National Research Council Córdoba, Spain

Keywords

university organization, scientific work, research groups, regional science policy

What is the role of research groups inside a university system? What are the elements that influence the structure of scientific and scholarly work in academy? Since the main activity of most university systems is teaching, the organizational arrangements for research are generally non-hierarchically oriented. Apart from research institutes and big labs, academic research is normally carried out in an individual manner or in small teams, depending on the habits and needs of scientific specialties. On the other hand, science policies promote funding schemes to improve participation of professors in research. The recipient is usually a group of researchers, working together as a team, which combines training of PhD students with original investigation. In consequence, the ways of doing research become a result of both bottom-up practices from scientific communities and the incentives provided by research policies affecting universities.

This paper studies the organizational structure of academic work in a regional university system, focusing on the emergence of research groups as the basic unit for scientific activities. The site of the study is a region of Southern Spain (Andalusia) characterized by a large public university sector, traditionally oriented to teaching and yet detached from the industrial tissue that is representative of a considerable number of European regions. The empirical basis for our analysis resides on a face-to-face survey to 765 heads of research groups conducted in 2008.

The main goal of our analysis is to describe how the research work is organized and to identify the fundamental drivers to form a group. For that purpose we observe the characteristics of research groups and the activities they develop. Taking the working practices of the teams as a key variable, we pursue an analysis to detect the influences of the motivations to form a group, the internal decision making process and the workload of the members. Some control variables as the age and size of the group, the science field and the type of center are used. In the conclusions we contribute some research-based insights on the impact of public policy in the organization of a scientific community.

The role of negotiations in coordination of actions in small research groups

Chirikov, Igor

*Sociology, State University - Higher school of economics
Moscow, Russia*

Keywords

coordination, negotiations, Research organizations, situational analysis

The question of the way research activity and research groups are organized is central to policymakers, who are looking for the most efficient means of managing scientific institutions, especially in the rugged times of economic crisis. Paradoxically, this issue is rarely addressed in micro-level empirical studies of research groups. What are the communicative strategies researchers employ to organize their scientific activities? How do they perform coordination of the actions in research projects? How do they negotiate certain solutions for everyday problems? The present study is focused on the phenomena of negotiations in the activity of several types of research groups. I tried to provide comparative perspective examining (1) educational research groups, (2) scientific research groups and (3) research groups in small innovative firms. The empirical part of the study took place in Tomsk - traditionally one of the strongest educational and scientific centers in Russia, famous by its high level of research culture.

Theoretical background of our study is negotiated order theory developed by Anselm Strauss. Negotiated order theory calls into question the more static structural-functional and rational-bureaucratic explanations of organizations; it presents an interactional model involving a processual and emergent analysis of coordination and division of labor. Qualitative methodology of situational analysis (based on works by A. Clarke) was used to highlight the key categories retaining the researchers' communicative activity. The study revealed a set of intriguing results, which indicate different ways of negotiation of tasks, deadlines, allocation of responsibilities, reporting about results. These ways of negotiation depend on the type of research (educational/fundamental/applied study). Moreover, nothing except the negotiated context of work organization itself compels scientists to complete their research: project-based organization of researchers' work implying active engagement of all the participants in the process of coordination and management. Results obtained can be used by managers of scientific organizations to optimize research activities, besides the study sheds some light on the nature of contemporary research process.

The use of Web 2.0 technologies by the research community: opening up new communication spaces

Oliveira Silva, Lúcia

*Associate Laboratory - School of Economics - University of Coimbra, CES - Centre for Social Studies
Coimbra, Portugal*

Santos Pereira, Tiago

*School of Economics - University of Coimbra - Portugal, CES - Centre for Social Studies - Associate Laboratory
Coimbra, Portugal*

Keywords

Social Networks, web 2.0, Science communication

The present communication focuses on the use of Web 2.0 services by the research community. The technologies associated with the Web 2.0 are said to create new social networks, which overcome more rigid communication structures. Montgomery (2009:83) considers that "New forms of communication create new possibilities for scientific knowledge, not just as a corpus of data and interpretations but also as a means of doing work, establishing expert communities and interacting with "outsider" publics. New modes of communication create new forms of science and ways of being a scientist". This communication will analyse the use of Web 2.0 services by the research community. In particular, it will analyse how these technologies are used in research, and which communities are targeted by when researchers and research centres develop Web 2.0 technologies. The use of such technologies among the research community can have implications on the culture and practices of knowledge production. In addition, the use of Web 2.0 technologies can be envisaged to open-up the research community for wider interaction with the socio-territorial systems in which it is integrated. The research analyses the use of Web 2.0 services in the internet platforms of research centres, and identify the different types of publics and users and the extent to which external input is sought, and how it contributes to the agenda setting within research institutions. It will be concluded whether these technologies can be considered as a central tool in the development of research institutes as "reflexive organisations".

The Weight of Research Systems History in the Construction of the European S&T Space

Carvalho, Helena

*Department of Quantitative Methods, Lisbon University Institute, ISCTE
Lisboa, Portugal*

Oliveira, Luísa

*Department of Sociology, Lisbon University Institute, ISCTE
Lisboa, Portugal*

Keywords

Industrial development, History of S&T, European S&T space

In spite of the policies to construct a European S&T space, and the well succeeded steps concerning the science networks, the international mobility of researchers and students, its impact in scientists socialization and the design of a new relationship pattern, the weight of historical contexts of each country or groups of countries difficult S&T European integration. Research developed in this area shows that the S&T European space is stratified (Oliveira & Carvalho, 2008) whatever are the variables we use in the analysis (Oliveira & Carvalho, 2009).

science development and industry development during the last century are two sides of the same coin, which led in the central and northern European countries to the construction of the innovation systems (Lundval, B. 1992; Nelson, R. 1993) with basis on the implementation of multinational firms - the so called national champions - which developed their technological innovation with basis on national scientific institutions. Southern European countries and eastern European countries for different reasons, did not follow the same model. That's the reason why we do not have innovation systems of these parts of Europe, and we propose to use the concept of innovation space instead of innovation system (Oliveira, 2004, 2008). In this paper we will show how the development of science was straight linked to the development of industry, by focusing on the main characteristics of the history of science and industry during the second half of the last century. This will be supported by empirical information reporting examples from France, Germany, England and Portugal.

Tracing researchers' mobility. Is human and social capital circulating, being transferred and/or increasing through researchers' mobility?

Fernandez Zubieta, Ana

Institute for Prospective Technological Studies (IPTS), Joint Research Centre (JRC) Seville, Spain

Keywords

social capital and human capital, researches' mobility, career development

The paper aims to provide a preliminary analysis of the relationship between researchers' mobility, academic performance (measured in terms of publications, patents and citations) and career development. It presents a case study of 150 UK academic researchers that focuses on the intersectorial and postdoctoral researchers' mobility. The study relies on researchers' Curriculum Vitae (CVs) as a source of data in addition to ISI Web of Science and EPO. The case study aims to analyse the relationship between mobility and academic performance by comparing mobile and non-mobile researchers' performance and precocity.

In this work it is hypothesised that job transitions offering qualified human and social capital are related to increases in academic performance. The quality of the human and social capital is considered in terms of gains of recognition (e.g. access to institutions with higher status). The congruence between the human and social capital acquired through job transitions and different sectorial patterns of recognition are also taken into account.

Three conceptualisations of researchers' mobility are considered in this work: job mobility (changes in job positions), postdoctoral mobility and collaborations.

The study of the relationship between researchers' mobility and academic performance is tested by comparing mobile and non-mobile researchers' performance. The database includes productivity records for all the researchers' career (1963-2005). However, this study is focused on yearly publications from 1981 to 2005 in order to increase the number of "active researchers" in the mobile and control group. The dataset is a panel that follows all academic researchers productivity since 1981 until 2005. The dataset contains 3750 researcher-year observations.

There are four main expected results of the case study. Firstly, the study will find the most relevant individual and institutional characteristics of "mobile" researchers. Secondly, the study aims to show the relationship between different conceptualisations of researchers' mobility. Thirdly, it is expected to test the correlation of different types of mobility, academic performance and career development. A negative correlation of intersectorial mobility and academic performance (measured in terms of publications and citations) is expected, as well as a positive correlation of postdoctoral mobility on academic performance and career development.

X-radiation exposure in medical imaging

Zhou, Mei

RWTH Aachen University, Chair for the History of Technology Aachen, Germany

Keywords

radiation exposure, computer tomography, medical imaging, historical development, X-ray

Note: This abstract is submitted for the special joint session between RN8 (Disaster and Social Crisis) and RN24 (Science and Technology):

Science and Technology: their role in the generation and prevention/mitigation of crises and disasters

Abstract:

The most important discovery in the field of medicine concerning medical imaging was carried out in 1895 by Wilhelm C. Roentgen. The discovery of the X-rays changed the whole landscape of body-imaging and radiographs found their ways into the hospitals shortly after.

The idea of producing images of interior objects which are not visible from the outside seemed so tempting and revolutionary that these equipments were not only used for medical terms but also in everyday life. Radiographs were even used by shoe store customers to detect whether a new shoe fits or not. But besides all enthusiasm people forgot the danger which X-rays brought along. The cancer-causing characteristic of this type of radiation was not identified at the beginning. Not until 1976 the first Radiation Protection Ordinance in Germany was published.

In this paper the historical development and the social impact of the discovery of X-radiation is illustrated from the beginning until today. The main focus is put on X-rays and computer tomography as the most common methods in modern medical imaging and their influence on minimal invasive therapy.

RN25

Social Movements

"I" encountering another "I": Identity formation and emotions in technology-based activism

Milan, Stefania

Political and Social Sciences, European University Institute San Domenico di Fiesole (FI), Italy

Keywords

emotions, collective identity, cyberspace activism

This paper looks at the sector of cyberspace activists ("radical techies") who set up independent digital infrastructures (internet servers) in order to provide other activists with Internet-based communication tools that are free, secure and do not operate according to market-driven principles. Examples include Italian server Autistici, Riseup in the USA, Sindominio in Spain, Nadir in Germany. They provide email accounts, web space, and mailing-lists to fellow activists. The paper explores the process of creation of a collective identity, and the emotional side of this peculiar cyberspace activism, where technical expertise plays such an important role. It suggests a reversal of the very same definition of collective identity, no longer based on a preponderance of the "we", but on the centrality of the private experience at the individual level.

Collective action in the field of radical techies emphasises the individual dimension: expertise is owned at the individual level (even if the knowledge becomes meaningful in relation to the group), and actions are usually performed individually (see programming and hacking, which gain meaning in interaction with the community of peers, but are individual actions). The resulting collective identity is the synthesis of individuals' private experiences: it is realised in the experience of difference and affinity of the encounter between the "I" with another "I", and not in the collapsing of the "I" in the "we". The "we" does not cease to exist, but it is experienced through the "I", and not vice versa. Individual action assumes a performative valence of the "I", partly losing the representative function of the "we".

In this process, emotions do play an important role, performing both a normative and an expressive function in collective identity building. Radical techies mobilise largely in response to the perception of a sense of structural injustice in the contemporary communication and technology sphere. "Negative" emotions such as anger, frustration, and moral outrage perform a normative function. On the contrary, a sense of togetherness, fun, leisure ("positive" emotions) speak to the expressive dimension of collective identity.

"Work that Wins": Frame Selection, Resonance and Outcome Determination in 19th Century Civil Rights Movements

Smith, Christi

*Sociology, University of Mannheim
Mannheim, Germany*

Keywords

ethnicity, qualitative methods, outcome failure, frame selection, right-wing movements

As the American Civil War drew to a close, the people of the United States were faced with two daunting political projects: rebuilding the nation, and creating a new racial order. Social movements had been vital in bringing about the abolition of slavery. The decade following the war saw enormous optimism for African Americans: literacy rates increased by 200%, small businesses flourished and political office-holding by African-Americans in the U.S. House and Senate was not again repeated until 1970, and the number of African Americans represented in certain state legislatures has never been repeated. Yet within a few short years African Americans were once again denied the vote, experienced profound status displacement, and significant decline in economic conditions. Using independently collected archival data, I conduct a content analysis over fifty years of two contemporaneous social movements to analyze frame selection and resonance and link these to the outcomes for two groups: African Americans and Appalachian whites. Initially both organizations had advocated equal standing for African Americans and the one advocated the ideal of a classless, colorblind society. The findings suggest a zero sum relationship for group status: as the movement for increased standing among poor whites of Appalachia increased, African Americans experienced dramatic status decline. This research has implications for multicultural social movement theory and nation-state formation theory.

A globalization of localized grievances? Transnational social movements mobilizing towards community conflicts

Beuzamy, Brigitte

Law and Political Science - CERAL, University of Paris 13 Villetaneuse, France

Keywords

transnationalization, community conflicts, anti-globalization

Transnational mobilizations towards community conflicts are not new phenomena, as the case of Irish-American mobilizations in the Irish conflict ever since the 19th century shows. Even before anti-globalization politics became prominent examples of transnational social movements, such displays of solidarity have occurred regularly, usually taking the form of fund-raising in order to help the victims or to sustain a 'war of liberation'. Some movements have also aimed at channeling direct action into community conflicts politics: the case of the non-violent direct action movement in Palestine, which attracts numerous international participants, is here particularly clear. What motivates transnational movements to get involved in community conflicts, and what are the requirements for a successful mobilization? We will examine the discursive and organizational strategies displayed by movements mobilizing for the Northern Irish and Israel/Palestine conflicts. We will then assess the role played by the Global Justice Movement in such mobilizations by comparing the Northern Irish and the Israel/Palestine cases.

A model of failure and success for organising social movements

Lappalainen, Pertti

*Department of Social Sciences and Philosophy, University of Jyväskylä
Jyväskylä, Finland*

Keywords

experience, internet, organizing, public involvement

A model for failure and success for organising social movements

The paper concentrates on the failure and success of social movements from the viewpoint of organizing as well as on the role of the Internet in organizing and mobilisation. Two ideal types of organizing will be at the core of the paper.

The first one is called making organic, that is, social actors (for example, a social movement) are made organic parts of a harmonic whole. A certain kind of a functional role is given to social actors in this model. An example of the model of making organic is public involvement which refers to listening of the social actors of a civil society in public decision making. In this case the actors are invited to co-operate with public authorities. However, participating in this kind of organisational structures is often a kiss of death for social movements because they are demanded restrained behaviour by the political institutions instead of spontaneous action typical to social movements.

The second one emphasises experience as a starting point of action of social movements. Here ideas of John Dewey are utilized. My point is that social action is 'organised' around the problems the participants of the movements experience. The concepts of behaviour and action as well as empowerment and self empowerment/empowerment-as-enablement are essential for the failure and success of social movements. In this second part of the paper an attention is paid to the meaning of the Internet as a means enabling new options for organizing. I call my proposal of successful organising the deliberative organizing to which active politicizing is included and which the Internet may contribute.

Act locally act globally, the dilemmas of trans-national social movements

Pereira, Inês

Sociology, CIES/ISCTE

Lisboa, Portugal

Keywords

social movements, Transnationality, global/local

This presentation is based on an on-going PhD research focusing on social movements' networking processes, and particularly on the so-called alterglobalization movement. The paper will particularly focus on the complex relationship between the local and the global scale, probing how a set of events and collectives based in Lisboa, Portugal, relate to broader, trans-national, networks.

The multifaceted local-global articulations presented in this paper will be based both on an analysis of a set of convergence events (specific temporal cut-outs that gather a large amount of activists on a precise time-space, a good example of 'glocal' happenings, anchored on a specific city but involved on a broader international context); and on international biographies of activists that walk throughout different countries drawing lines and creating bridges between different national events and organizations.

The paper aims to discuss and propose different modalities of local-global combinations, showing that sometimes the quite well known slogan "Act locally, think globally" appears to be very accurate while on other occasions, we may as well propose the new slogan "Act globally, think locally".

Analysis of a Social Movement Transformation and Outcome: The Case of the Grassroots Movement Against Goldmining in the Villages of Bergama, Turkey

Koçer, Banu

PSYCHOLOGY, BEYKENT UNIVERSITY

ISTANBUL, TURKEY

Keywords

political economy, goldmining in Bergama-Turkey, environmental justice movement

This paper explores the grassroots movement against goldmining in the agricultural villages of Bergama, Turkey, and provides a conceptual analysis of its transformation process and outcome. The struggle of Bergama villagers started out as a local ecological resistance movement in the early 1990s and gradually transformed into an environmental justice movement with national implications when activists adopted a rights-based discourse by incorporating into their claims the notions of justice, democratic participation, and citizenship rights. The paper reviews the movement in four distinct phases. Following a synopsis of these phases the paper provides a theoretically-informed analysis of the case with a focus on movement transformation and outcome.

Anarchist Networks in Postwar Europe

Romanos, Eduardo

*Sociology and Social Research, University of Trento
Trento, Italy*

Keywords

protest innovation, postwar Europe, networks, cross-national diffusion, anarchism

This paper examines the so-called in postwar Western Europe focussing on the transnational networks set up after 1945 by young activists in contention with the official movement organizations, and libertarian intellectuals who criticised the core principles, tactics and ends of the nineteenth-century anarchism. I will analyse the cross-national diffusion of demands, forms of organisation and protest strategies within and among the networks from a historical perspective. How and to what extent they critically confronted the mobilisation frames and repertoires of the traditional left and, at the same time, served as inspiration for the emergence of alternative left-wing movements in the late-fifties and sixties? The inquiry into the contestation of the anarchist tradition will use the as a key element and will underline the process through which new sources of anti-capitalist insurgency were identified in spheres far from labour and/or institutional politics. The inquiry into the legacy of the postwar anarchist networks suggests that some of their questions and proposals paved the way for later protest movements (e.g., Situationists, Provos, New Left) and, eventually, for the 1968 generational contestation.

Assessing Outcome Understanding Impact: The World Social Forum Between the National and the Global

Caruso, Giuseppe

Centre of Excellence in Global Governance Research, University of Helsinki Helsinki, Finland

Keywords

world social forum, Success/Failure, Outcome/Impact/Influence

This article discusses the WSF influence on the Indian civil society and the global WSF process and theoretically reflects on current debates on assessing social movements' success and failure both in academic and activist contexts. This paper is constituted by three sections of decreasing size and increasing scope and ambition. The first section explores successes and failures of the WSF in India. I discuss them according to their own principles assessing the accomplishments vis-a-vis the promises and the goals set at the outset. The second section discusses the relation between success and failure and their critical understanding in the case of the WSF India context. I will ask questions not only about the nature of success and failure but also, according to whom? when? why? I will suggest that it is very difficult, if at all possible, to establish unique dimensions of success or failure for a movement of the size and scope of the WSF which (like perhaps most movements) eludes a coherent definition as bounded space. In the third section I will develop the criticism on the conception of movements as bounded spaces and coherent actors in order to build my final argument against the radical instrumental opposition inherent in the failure/success debate showing how the fragmented nature of the WSF, and the complex nature of social movements, is not compatible with simple assessments and deserves less linear and rather more complex strategies of impact assessment.

Brokers beyond language boundaries? Diffusion, and democratic innovation in transnational publics

Doerr, Nicole

Social and Political Sciences, Free University Berlin Berlin, Germany

Keywords

DEMOCRACY, transnational publics, language and culture brokerage, media diffusion, visual images

In the context of global activism in a porous public (cf. Olesen), cultural and linguistic terms conditions the effects of social movements. Activists' language skills, and their media knowledge vary, yet activists participate in (transnational) learning processes in which they acquire the skills to diffuse claims and frames across countries. Activists even specialise and become communicative brokers able to diffuse multilingual skills of communication in their own groups and in their media tactics. If the dominant cultural and linguistic frames in domestic media publics restrict movements' impact on home societies, brokers may also mobilise target groups beyond national, cultural, and regional borders. I show that the world-wide Social Forum (WSF) process and European Social Forum (ESF) processes have triggered the emergence of a new type of norm entrepreneurs, communicative brokers, who diffuse norms and strategies of multilingual communication suitable to culturally hybrid movement democracies in Non-Western and Western European groups, which could also propose broader societal innovations of conflict solving in multicultural democracy and porous (transnational) publics. Comparing trans-national and local meetings of African and European groups within the umbrella of the ESF and WSF processes, the proposed paper will, first (1), investigate the problem of linguistic misunderstandings and of conflict for democracy in movement groups. Second (2), it explores the innovative methods that activists have developed to include multilingualism within their repertoires of contention applied towards the outside public sphere. The findings compare the variety of different translation practices in culturally mixed groups. Among the scenarios compared are practices of (a) multilingual face-to-face communication, (b) multilingual internet communication, and (c) visual tactics of communication towards media audiences by which radical activists try to mobilise migrants, and resource poor or precarious people. Whether radical protesters impact and reach out on transnational media publics does not necessarily depend on material or technological resources. Rather, working experiences, particular cultural and linguistic skills, and broader societal environments in which groups emerge get resources to understand how activists dialogue, or become brokers beyond language borders.

Civil or uncivil society? Social movements in Central and Eastern Europe

Piotrowski, Grzegorz

*Social and Political Sciences, European University Institute
San Domenico di Fiesole, Italy*

Keywords

social movements, Civil Society, alterglobalism

In Central and Eastern Europe after the transformation of 1989 there was a need for civil society actors. Their presence was meant to be a measurement for the quality of democracy in the new states. Some of the patterns of the new-born activism were directly taken from Western countries but the 'third sphere' does not seem to catch much attention until today. Parallel, large groups were left, especially in the beginning, without any representation and the empty space was filled by more radical and less structured groups. These groups, using globalization-critical rhetorics, are still outnumbered in comparison with their western counterparts, but they are present in the public discourse and seem to have a significant impact on the public opinion.

The concept of Kopecky and Mudde of the uncivil society (2003) overlaps to large extent with these radical groups and is used to analyze them, although some criteria (for example the use of violence) seem to be controversial. By giving a critique this concept I would like to argue that some of these movements are in fact an important part of the civil society in the region, adding up with NGOs.

Moreover, basing on the data collected during my ethnographic fieldwork in Poland, the Czech Republic and Hungary, I would like to point the reasons for existing tensions as well as show examples and areas where fruitful cooperation takes place. Playing different roles in the public space these two kinds of groups do cooperate sometimes and are able to form coalitions, although their methods, tactics and aims are different. Because of their radicalism, the less structured groups (which some scholars tend to call alterglobalists) are better in channeling and using the anger and the need to resistance which are a by-product of the economic transformation; they are also much more present in the mass media.

Coalition Building and the Formation of a Regional Solidarity Network in East Asia: The Case of the "Comfort Women" Movement

Nam, Sang-hui

*Sociology, University of Heidelberg
Hamburg, Germany*

Keywords

regional solidarity, transnational advocacy network, East Asia, comfort women

On the case of the so-called "comfort women" movement, this presentation examines how the interplay of global and local forces led to the formation of a regional solidarity network in East Asia. The comfort women movement struggles for the moral and financial compensation of an estimated number of 200,000 victims of the Japanese system of military sexual slavery during World War II. In the past, this issue frequently gave rise to large waves of nationalist protests against Japan all over East Asia. Nevertheless, the movement successfully established a transnational advocacy network that also includes Japanese groups. This process was led by domestic NGOs and INGOs, governmental organizations (GOs), and institutions of international governance (IG). In this context, the analysis focuses on the development of a specific Asian identity beyond nationalist and global values.

(1) The rise of the solidarity network began when many East Asian countries entered the international political system after their transition to democracy in the late 1980s and early 1990s. In this stage, the comfort women issue benefited from a favorable political climate and open opportunity structures. Comfort women-issue related NGOs were strongly supported by the Japanese women's movement, INGOs, and IGs. The framing of the comfort women issue was closely connected to universal "global" values such as gender equality and human rights. (2) In 1995, the transnational advocacy network was shaken by a crisis, when Japan introduced the Asian Women's Fund in order to financially compensate the victims without serious apology. The transnational advocacy network broke in two parts: While moderate civic groups from Japan and most INGOs supported the Japanese initiative, women groups from Japan, South Korea, Taiwan, China and North Korea opposed it. As a consequence, outside Japan, the comfort women issue was increasingly expressed in a nationalist language. (3) However, with the rise of the alter-globalization and the peace movements against the war in Iraq, activists began to revive their transnational ties. This time, the comfort women issue was connected to experiences of war and violence all over East Asia. In this context, activists developed a regional identity beyond nationalist and global values.

Collective Identity and transnationalism

Parthenay, Kevin

POLITICAL SCIENCE, SCIENCES PO PARIS

Clichy, France

Keywords

Transnationalisation, cross-border diffusion, collective identity

Between 2003 and 2007, Central America was confronted to a wave of unprecedented mobilizations. These mobilizations joined a dynamics of contestation of a project introduced by the United States in order to create a Free Trade Area between the United States, Central America and The Dominican Republic. As countries of Central America are simultaneously confronted to a chronic economic instability which affects mainly the poorest populations, the prospect of an asymmetric agreement with the United States created important grievances within the society. It seems paradoxical to apply a transnationalisation of grievances against the CAFTA-DR considering the national character of the legal ratification process and the national impacts of this agreement (agriculture for Nicaragua, technologies and communication for Costa Rica, economy and investments for Salvador and Honduras). As a consequence, we can first wonder whether the "anti-cafta" social movement is a transnational social movement (TSM). Besides, as some elements of the mobilization are of a different nature regarding the previous mobilizations, we can put forward some hypothesis about the identity carried out by the movement, its organizations and its peculiarities. From that viewpoint, several points are central in our study. The dynamics of transnationalisation will be the subject of a first development, by presenting the characteristics of the social movement and the emergence of a "regional political opportunity structure" (RPOS). We also approach more technical elements relative to the exchanges between national social movements, such as the cross-border diffusion, the inclusion in a transnational coalition. The last part explains how the reactivation of the mobilization, noticed in the protest cycles, results from the building-up of a "community of solidarity" in Central America. The conceptualization of this "community of solidarity" rests on predefined theoretical elements such as the "implicit consensus", "ritual strategies" and the institutionalization of solidarity assertion.

In that case study, we are based on structural social movement theories (Tilly, Tarrow, McAdam) as well as constructivist approaches of collective action (Melucci, Jasper, Goodwin and Snow). Our very deep purpose will be further to develop a new articulated approach of social movement theories and regional integration ones.

Dreams, ideals and hopes in collective action: The contribution of utopia as a new conceptual tool in the research on social movements

Bossy, Sophie

*Political and Social Sciences, European University Institute
San Domenico di Fiesole, Italy*

Keywords

Political consumerism, social movements, utopia

For this conference, I would like to present a paper on an often forgotten aspect of collective action, its imaginary dimension. Indeed, I would like to open the perspectives of social movement research by introducing a concept that has not been, to my knowledge, studied deeply: utopia.

According to me, utopia is both of form of discourse and a set of particular practices. Thus, to be called utopian, a discourse has to include, first, a rejection of the existing society, and second, if not a clear conception of what another world might look like, at least the idea that another society is possible and desirable. And, to be called utopian, practices need to be an attempt to create here and now at least some of the features of this utopian discourse, in the hope of a spread in the rest of society.

With the research I am currently undertaking for my PhD on utopia in social movements I try to observe if forms of utopia can be found in social movements and, if yes, what their impact on collective action is. Therefore I would like to take the opportunity of this conference to present some preliminary results.

In order to apprehend some aspects of collective action that are not fully understood with the current theories, I operationalized utopia as a conceptual tool by identifying a series of invariant elements - the utopemes - that compose its specific grammar. With this conceptual approach, utopia helps us think about the collective stories and imaginaries that trigger collective action, as well as the emotional work that is involved and the articulation between the discourses developed by activists and their practices.

In order to complete this research, I am focusing on political consumerism, which, according to me, includes a series of collective and individual actions with a collective goal that criticize and try to differentiate themselves from traditional consumerism by politicizing the act of buying in order to search and promote other types of consumption. My fieldwork consists of a comparison of moderate and radical groups in two countries: France and the United Kingdom.

Feminism in Sicily. Cultural outcomes, success and failures of a social movement

Daher, Liana Maria

Educational Process, University of Catania

Catania, Italy

Keywords

unintended consequences, cultural outcomes, change

The field of cultural outcomes has been neglected in social movement studies, except for very few studies (Gamson 1998, Earl 2004). Therefore cultural change is an essential outcome of the collective action of social movements. Social movements expressly plan and pursue modifications in the symbolical meaning of objects, behavioural norms and prevailing opinion. In fact, the goals of social movements strategies concern the creation of new symbols, alternative norms and the modification of discourse on a particular topic (Swidler 1986; Wuthnow 1989). Cultural modifications are usually not direct nor do they have short-term effects. That may make it difficult to understand the mechanisms of the achievement of a specific outcome. In fact, scholars often use the consequences of the women's movement to exemplify the matter (Marx, McAdams 1994; della Porta, Diani 1997; McAdam, Show 1997).

The aim of this contribution is to investigate, through qualitative interviews with the ancient feminist activists of the movement in Sicily, who participate to the seventies revolts, the outcomes, successes and failures of the movement, looking for casual relationships between stated goals and achieved outcomes, the different perspectives of the opinions of outsiders and actors, and the unintended outcomes of the purposive goals and actions of activists.

Frames and Symbols in Terrorist Communication

Olesen, Thomas

Dep. of Political Science, University of Aarhus Aarhus, Denmark

Keywords

Framing, symbols, terrorism

Frames and Symbols in Terrorist Communication

The literature on framing has become a staple in social movement theory since the 1980es. The main focus of framing research has been on verbal and written statements. Yet activist communication also has a symbolic element that is not well captured by framing theory. There are three aspects to symbolic framing: First, the use of images and photo/film, second, the use or targeting of symbolic places and constructions, and, third, the use of meaning condensing symbols in verbal or written framing efforts. The paper is an attempt to expand framing theory to include such symbolic elements. This exercise is based on a theoretical dialogue between framing theory and communication theory. It is argued that such a dialogue has considerable, but as yet relatively unexplored, potential for the development of social movement theory. Empirically, the paper analyzes the symbolic framing strategies of contemporary radical Islamic organizations.

From Bargaining to Contentious Politics : Understanding Change within Trade Unions. The Case of the French Confederation Force Ouvriere

Karel, Yon

Political science, CERAPS/CRPS (CNRS)

Lille, France

Keywords

qualitative analysis, Social change, organizational culture, Trade Unionism

From Bargaining to Contentious Politics : Understanding Change within Trade Unions

The Case of the French Confederation Force Ouvrière

Force ouvrière was born during the Cold War from a split of the communist-led Confédération générale du Travail. Like many other Unions in Europe and the whole world, its strategy was destabilized by globalization in the 1980s. The Confederation, that had promoted negotiation and compromise, progressively turned into dissent action and ideological critique. This transformation cannot be explained as the mechanical result of a change in the configuration of industrial relations or political opportunities. It can neither be understood as the consequence of a political plot led by a minority of radical activists - though it is, in France, the common interpretation. Our proposal aims at showing that one can make sense of that evolution by taking into account FO's organizational form, considering it as a universe of significations and practices.

Throughout an analysis of organizational archives and interviews with actors, we show that union members had to accept and learn, at a wider level, new sorts of practices : developing a common sense of membership at an interprofessional level, demonstrating and competing in the street with other organizations, using discourse within the organization to confront ideas and strategies and not only to express consensus, homogenizing the organizational image, linking that organizational identity to the affirmation of specific aims?

We thus show what a social trajectory of « radicalization » means from the actors' viewpoint, by stressing the breaks it implies amongst practices and representations. In the same time, we intend to point out the limits of this radicalization, by articulating those breaks with the continuity of the organizational and symbolic structures that bounds the « thought world » of those activists. Indeed, FO's "contentious" turn less contributed to homogenizing the organization in a radical way than developing the confederal scene as a setting for new sorts of activist commitment, beside negotiating technique.

From the Perception of Symbolic Domination to the Symbolic Struggle - The Nation of Islam's efforts to raise consciousness in 1950's and 1960's America

Husu, Hanna-Mari

Department of Social Sciences and Philosophy, The University of Jyväskylä Jyväskylä, Finland

Keywords

the Nation of Islam, Reflexivity, Pierre Bourdieu, symbolic violence, symbolic struggle

This paper explores the perception of symbolic imposition of cultural arbitrariness and symbolic violence of the oppressed group the Nation of Islam in the late 1950s and early 1960s. During the period, the Nation of Islam was the biggest and most influential of the radical and separatist organizations of African Americans. In the black ghettos of the North, poverty, unemployment and other social defects were rife and social problems were escalating. The radical message of the Nation of Islam was most readily adopted by young males with criminal backgrounds living in ghetto environments.

Referring to Pierre Bourdieu's idea of symbolic imposition of cultural arbitrariness and symbolic violence, I analyze how symbolic domination was understood in the writings of Elijah Muhammad, the leader of the organization, and Malcolm X, the most well-known member. According to Bourdieu, symbolic violence is imperceptible and invisible to its victims, as they are socialized into the existing social order. The most intolerable conditions can be perceived as acceptable and natural. It is important to study how those who are economically, socially and culturally excluded can be conscious and resist symbolic violence.

I argue that there are also possibilities for reflexivity. Reflexivity here contains recognition (the ability to perceive), rejection (the ability to question) and replacement (the ability to construct new symbolic meanings). More precisely, reflexivity concerns i) religion, ii) the educational system and iii) the dominant cultural values. I suggest that the Nation of Islam can be understood in terms of symbolic resistance and symbolic struggle in order to enhance self-determination and self-definition.

Hegemonic Breakdown and Worker Protest in Egypt and the Gulf

Chalcraft, John

*Department of Government, London School of Economics and Political Science
London, United Kingdom*

Keywords

Egypt, labour, Gulf, Hegemony, protest

In Egypt, as elsewhere, worker protest has not stemmed simply from the objective contradictions of capitalism as some have argued (Abbas 1967; Beinin and Lockman 1987; Beinin 1989). Egypt's labour movements have owed much to nationalism, the state, modes of leadership, non-proletarian groups, moral economy, and gender (Alexander 2007; Chalcraft 2001, 2004; Goldberg 1986, 1992, 1996; Lockman 1994; Posusney 1993; Vatter 1994). But whereas historians continue to argue over the relative importance of class vis-à-vis other factors, and social movements theorists debate the relative importance of political opportunity, resource mobilization, and cultural framing, one useful approach aims to deploy concepts that transcend these competing categories. Antonio Gramsci's concepts of hegemony and alternate hegemony seem ideally suited to this approach as they point towards political and cultural processes without ignoring economic structures. The idea of hegemony refers to how consent is won for either dominant or oppositional political projects via the articulation of diverse material interests and cultural materials in the construction of a collective subject capable of making history. This paper, based on fieldwork (in the UAE, Kuwait, and Egypt), interviews with key officials, members of relevant NGOs, migrant and non-migrant workers, and secondary and primary research in Arabic and English, argues that studying the moments when hegemonic consent breaks down can shed useful light on the unprecedented mass labour protests in these countries since 2004. The argument is that key hegemonic components of labour regimes in the Gulf and Egypt have been significantly eroded in the last few years. In Egypt, the Nasserist notion of social protection and national development in return for productive labour is in ruins amid extensive privatization of formerly public sector firms and the accompanying stripping away of social protections and ideas about inward-oriented national development. In the Gulf, rising costs and falling wages have struck a major blow against workers, ability to provide for families back home. In both cases, elements of a pre-existing hegemony have broken down and this attrition has played a major role in propelling protest.

Hegemonic State Crisis and Social Protest in Contemporary Mexico

Ortega Bayona, Berenice

Sociology, University of Essex Colchester, United Kingdom

Keywords

case study, APPO, Mexico, hegemony crisis

In recent years, across borders we have witnessed a growing tendency towards a rejection of traditional forms of political organization and the emergence of "new" forms of social protest. My research will focus on a specific social and political experience that reflects many aspects of the breakdown of legitimacy that Mexico is increasingly suffering today: the events that led to the formation of APPO (Popular Assembly of the Peoples of Oaxaca) in June 2006, the different political forms of protest and resistance that evolved for over 6 months there, the governmental response and repression to the conflict, and the transformations in the forms of political and social organisation that have occurred since then in Oaxaca. Because of how diverse and complex the popular sectors that participated in this conflict were (some historical while others new), I believe that it is a crucial example through which we can understand the historicity and extent of the structural and institutional legitimacy crisis at the national level, as well as contrast and analyse the convergence of traditional and "new" forms of political protest. An oral and brief life history approach was taken to reconstruct how the political, economic and social relationships were shaped in the Mexican post-revolutionary state, as well as how previous experiences of social and political organisation continue to have an influence in political culture today; to evaluate how neoliberal political and economic reforms have impacted their lives and ignited other forms of political organisation; and to explore the role that the APPO experience played in transforming their outlook on social protest, the construction of democracy and a disputed hegemony in Oaxaca and Mexico today.

Hidden Threads - Feminist initiatives within the framework of the underground movement of the "Democratic Opposition" in Hungary in the early 1970's

Judit, Acsády

Sociology, HAS Sociology Research Institute Budapest, Hungary

Keywords

feminism, state-socialism, democratic opposition

Social movements aiming to restore democracy were not tolerated by the one-party, state-socialist systems of the ex-Soviet block. That was the context in Hungary as well, within which circles of "alternative thinkers" tried to find their ways to reach and mobilize people against non-democratic practices of the Soviet-type system. Feminist ideas had a particularly complex reasoning in that setting, as the state-socialist system had an explicit propaganda aiming for women's emancipation, yet, in practice those endeavours of the state resulted very controversial end-results. Women were supported to get employment until the late 1960's. Women were encouraged only in a limited way to take part in public life. Yet, in private life many aspects of traditional gender relations were not challenged. These facts became reflected in the feminist discourse of activists of the opposition movement.

The paper aims to explore the facts about the only-known independent grass-root initiative of a collection of signatures (supporting a pro-choice campaign) and that of the feminist activities by mostly university students. It will be explored why the initiatives remained marginal and how the activists became harassed and criminalized by the authorities. Furthermore the value system and arguments of the activists will be analyzed (whether arguments were based on second wave "western" feminism or rather a genuine criticism of the non-democratic policies of state-socialist system). The research is based primarily on personal, oral history interviews with participants of these feminist actions and members of the movement of democratic opposition and also based on review of contemporary archive documents.

In defence of the local? Urban grassroots movements in the Stockholm Periphery

Kings, Lisa

Sociology, Södertörn University Huddinge, Sweden

Keywords

Civil Society, Urban periphery, spatial scale, localization

The implications of the new global restructuring process under neoliberal flag has been described in terms of parallel processes of increased integration and greater fragmentation between different regions and scales. The limited ability of nation states to regulate and control this unequal development has led to a rediscovery of civil society as an alternative political arena and a new source of identity, solidarity, coordination, control and regulation. The novelty of the contemporary civil society discourse is that civil society has "gone global", i.e. through transnational networks, the global spatial scale has become the primary scale for resistance and alternative visions. Although, an excessive curiosity of the "new" always include limitations. In this case, a unilateral focus on the new, both in terms of new social movements and the global scale mean that research tends to ignore the contextual embedding and the relationship between stability and change. Furthermore, another consequence may be that other scales are reduced to the victims and the activism conducted there is viewed as particularistic or reactionary. Additionally, the voices and strategies of the most affected by the new global order are overlooked due to that new social movements primary engage the educated middle classes. With a perspective that advocate the need for civil society research that both considerate aspects of "scaling up" and "scaling down" the empirical basis of this article is grassroots organizing at the local level in the Swedish urban periphery. The Swedish context is particularly interesting, since the relations between state and civil society in Sweden has a heritage of a specific form of close cooperation. The article shows in relation to what is discussed as a growing global civil society that is also possible to identify a parallel trend of increased fragmentation and the localization of the civil society. By taking over traditional forms of organization and participation at the local level, but without the hierarchical structure of local, regional and national relations and further more reformulate the content, new formations is created that argue for rights and inclusion both inside and outside Sweden's borders.

In-between actors and networks: actor-network theory and the prospects for a symmetrical perspective on social movements

Rodríguez-Giralt, Israel

*Psychology and Education, Universitat Oberta de Catalunya
Barcelona, Spain*

Keywords

collective action theory, Actor-Network Theory, actor-network dualism, social movements, symmetry

Conceptualizing and understanding forms of collective action is one of the historic preoccupations of social thought. In this context, we propose that the conceptual and methodological baggage that goes with the Actor-Network theory (ANT), can become a fundamental resource for renewing and enriching the analysis of collective action. For this, I focus on two main contributions: i) ANT's alternative understanding of social action (to explain the social it is necessary to leave the exclusive concern with social relations aside and take into account the non-human actors, such as the technical procedures in which they are involved); and ii) its original definition of the "collective" (the collective is basically an aggregate of humans and non-humans, without predefined borders, it is just the relational product created by the constant and precarious commitment between heterogeneous elements). Both contributions, I affirm, allow the opening of an interesting discussion about agency and the possibility of articulating a new theory of collective action that differs from the dominant traditions in that it considers and assumes the heterogeneous and relational character of social movements, and, as such, it also assumes that all (social) political action is the emergent effect, the interactive product of hybrid collectives in action.

To give an example of the fertility of this approach, I will focus on an analysis of the ecological disaster that occurred in Doñana National Park, in Spain. As will emerge from my reading of the events, the action of environmentalist groups mobilised and enlisted human and non-human entities to resignify the content of the political activity and weave a globality that was to resist the attempts at localising the disaster operation. In this sense, we could easily say that the collective action mounted at Doñana was similar to the "actor-networks" that ANT tells us about. They were networks because they designate the result, the instantiation of an assemblage of practices, actions and interactions between various, heterogeneous entities. But they were also actors because we see that these networks mobilise the world, reorder it and execute it in a particular way.

Karl Planyi and 'The Double Movement'

Muukkonen, Martti

Faculty of Humanistics, University of Joensuu Joensuu, Finland

Keywords

theory, Polanyi, double movement

Karl Polanyi analysed, in his 'The Great Transformation', the causes that led to the depression of 1930's. His view of 19th century liberalism, haute finance and their social consequences resembles surprisingly the modern neo-liberalistic globalisation process.

Polanyi argued that the 19th century liberalistic capitalism was purposefully created and was not 'natural'. In this, old ideas of reciprocity and redistribution were abandoned and land, work and money were made as commodities. This created a counter-movement when people were forced to defend their human rights against exploitation.

Polanyi's theory was influential in economic anthropology of the 1950's and 1960's. Today, it has been utilised in globalisation studies. For social movement studies it can provide a new approach to explain the emergence of movements.

Mobilization under Permanent Crisis: Russian Environmental Movement in 1987-2007

Yanitsky, Oleg

*Environmental sociology, Institute of Sociology, Russian Academy of Sciences
Moscow, Russia*

Usacheva, Olga

*Environmental Sociology, Institute of Sociology, Russian Academy of Sciences
Moscow, Russia*

Davydova, Svetlana

*Environmental sociology, Institute of Sociology, Russian Academy of Sciences
Moscow, Russia*

Keywords

mobilization, Russian Environmental Movement, socio-economic transformations

The paper considers aims and forms of mobilization of Russian Environmental Movement (REM) under Soviet/Russian crises that happened during the period of rapid and risk-laden socio-economic transformations ("perestroika", decay of the USSR, default of 1998 and the current global economic crisis). Using resource, network and contextual approaches as theoretical background and drawing on field-research data gathered by Yanitsky's research team in 1987-2007, the authors discovered three main forms of crisis mobilization outcomes: resistant, resulting in maintaining the status quo; innovative (mainly enlightenment and education); and constructive (westernization) aimed at protecting nature from big construction projects, on the one hand, and compelling some branches of business to operate in line with international standards, on the other. In each individual crisis these forms of REM mobilization combined in a particular way which depends on the respective region of such big country as Russia. During the period under consideration, Western-oriented activism has experienced growing pressure on the part of media controlled by the state and big business. Under the current economic crisis the REM splits into "transnationals" who try to civilize Russian state and business in accordance with western standards, and "localists" who defend their local landscapes by all means regardless of the resources at hand. The paper concludes with some theoretical considerations concerning social and political opportunities for the REM's mobilization in short-term and mid-term periods of global crisis in the light of the use of information-communication technologies.

Mobilizing mobile pastoralists: Rural Environmental Movements in Mongolia

Dalaibuyan, Byambajav

Sociology, Hokkaido University Japan,

Keywords

Mongolia, mining, pastoral community, movements

How are mobile pastoral communities mobilized against the threats to their natural and social environment? In the summer of 2005, the local herding communities of Suvarga were mobilized against the gold mining in the local area by forming a grassroots movement and organizing sittings, blockage, and lawsuits. This was one of the rural grassroots movements recently emerged in Mongolia, particularly in the regions affected by the mining activities. The pioneer of these movements was emerged in 2001 to preserve an endangered river flowing through three provinces. Since then similar organizations have been emerged in different rural areas where local watersheds were endangered by the external factors. This is a new kind of grassroots activism where local herding community was mobilized and consequently involved in contentious politics. The movement organizations transformed the composition and leadership of the environmental groups where professional and donor-driven organizations were dominant actors. In 2006, 11 movement organizations formed a coalition with the umbrella organization aimed at generating more collaborative operations and impacts. The coalition, however, was dissolved and consequently reorganized into two independent groups after two years. Based on the personal interviews with the movement leaders, activists, and the participant observation, the first part of this paper explores the emergence, mobilization, and development of the rural environmental movements in Mongolia. Then, the paper discusses the case of Suvarga incidence using my interviews with the leader, oral histories told by local activists and supporters of the movement and the media sources. The paper shows that (1) local political opportunities and resources significantly affect protest emergence and movement mobilization: (2) contentious politics influence the alliance patterns of movement organizations: and (3) symbolic politics and urban-rural dualities play a significant role in the movement mobilization.

Moral Business: Changing Corporate Behaviour by "Speaking Their Language"

Gillan, Kevin

School of Social Sciences, University of Manchester Manchester, United Kingdom

Keywords

social movements, Framing, stakeholder, outcomes, corporations

The academic publisher Reed Elsevier also organised the world's largest defence exhibitions. The exhibitions themselves have regularly met vibrant street protests, and from 2005 campaigners targeted the corporate organisers. A coordinated network of anti-arms trade activists, academics, medical professionals and institutional shareholders formed a multifaceted campaign that sought to persuade the corporation to change its behaviour on its own terms. After initial intransigence, Reed Elsevier divested itself of its defence sector activities in 2008.

On the basis of interviews with activists and corporate employees, this paper addresses two sets of questions about the Elsevier campaign. First, what are the components of a successful, corporate-focused campaign? Insights from the recently expanded literature on the outcomes of social movements will be tested against both facts of this case and the conscious strategy pursued by participants. I will argue that the movement outcomes literature continues to cope better with movements demanding state responses than those directed at corporations. Secondly, therefore, this paper examines a set of broader questions about the character of moral demands placed on corporate activity, and the way in which management discourses of corporate responsibility or citizenship partially constrains the response of relevant decision makers.

Movement of recovered factories in Argentina

Hirtz, Natalia

*Sociologie, Université Libre de Bruxelles
Brussels, Belgium*

Giacone, Marta

Administración en salud, Universidad Nacional de Córdoba Córdoba, Argentina

Keywords

workers, innovation, organization, Movement, Struggle

Introduction: Economic politics from the 90's had for consequence a huge increase of unemployment, and also a reinforcement of the tenuousness of the labor force.

In the frame, the workers started to strike and to organize themselves on an autonomous way. New alternatives grew to fight against this tenuousness's situation. The recovered companies (RC) by those workers became one of the emblems of the self management.

Methodology: Qualitative analysis (observation and twenty interviews with the members and leaders of the movement).

Search results: On a general way, the recovered factories rise as an alternative of the shutting down of themselves: some workers occupied then recovered the work's machineries, re-opening the doors of the companies under the management of the workers.

The movement of the RC is not homogeneous; the diversity of the political orientations gave the birth at six different organizations.

Anyway, and even with this heterogeneity, workers agreed on some common characteristics for the recovering process, what gives the identity of "the workers of the RC". Those characteristics are: existence of the conflict between employers and employees; the bankruptcy or the desertion of the factory by it employers and the formation of working's cooperative in order to be able to commercialize their productions. In another way, the recovering involves the participation of all workers in the decisions concerning the management of the factory, the organization of the work, and the lack of the employers; that's why that the RC movement define themselves as self managerial companies.

Today, around 200 factories have been recovered by the workers. This phenomena has strongly increased since the 2001 crisis, but after the re-composition of the economical system (in 2003), the recovering of new factories became rare.

Anyway, with the new word crisis, we can observe a strong comeback of the recovered companies. As a consequence, between December 2008 and February 2009, ten new factories have been recovered by their workers.

New forms of the socialist movement in globalised world

Velikaya, Nataliya

Political Sociology, Russian State University for the Humanities Russian Federation,

Keywords

Globalization, parties, socialist movement

Globalization creates a number of contradictories which cause changes in policy on different levels and different spheres. The most important contradictories are the following: between enriching and pauperization, between rich and poor countries, between rational culture and culture of different social groups, and between global and local. In these conditions interest in socialist ideas has been rising up. One can watch actualization of left ideologies and values. This process is spreading not only in Latin America, but also in Western Europe and Post-Soviet countries. Left parties pay much attention to the problems of the environment, to the problems of sustainable development of local communities, national states and regions, to the problems between poor and rich countries, between west and east, south and north, and also to the ways to overcome the crisis.

Development of left ideologies and politics has specifics in different countries. In Western Europe, socialists worked out the ideology of the third way (manifest of Blair-Shröder), based on compromises with neo-liberals. Priorities of socialist parties in Latin America are mainly connected with nationalization of economics and overcoming of dependency on foreign capital, with modernization, with fight with poverty and social un-equality. The main task of socialist and social-democratic parties in post-socialist countries is restoring of social justice and building the social state.

Socialist movements unite more than 160 social-democratic, socialist and workers parties and organizations from 130 countries of the world Socialist International and some fraternity organizations, trade-unions, PES (20 parties, 27% seats in EP). We are analyzing programs, documents and actions of left movements and political parties of socialist orientation, activity of Socialist International in the context of globalization (world poverty, world economic crisis, global warming) and especially socialist movement in modern Russia.

This analysis shows that socialist, social-democratic and labor parties are disappointed in liberal ideas and don't try now to include in their own social-economic projects elements of liberalism anymore. The main important discussions in international socialist movement are connected with the understanding of fact that global problems provoke problems on local level, that globalization process couldn't be controlled only by transnational corporations.

New Media and collective action in contemporary Spain (the March 2004 events): new methodological approaches and some conceptual issues.

Sadaba, Igor

sociologia IV, universidad complutense de madrid

pozuelo de alarcon, madrid, spain

Alcalde, Javier

political science, european university institute

florence, italy

Keywords

Anti-war movement, global justice movement, New Media, new technologies, social movements

This paper looks at the structural, dynamic and temporal context that characterizes the Spanish political (and media) opportunity structure for collective action. This context operated as a set of facilitating conditions for a cycle of mobilization between 2003 and 2004 which concluded in the events that took place between 11 and 14 March 2004. Through an analysis of different data, including mobilisation turnout and type of mobilisation, use of new technologies and the role of mainstream and alternative media, the text aims at studying the extent to which the emergence of recent waves of social mobilisation are linked to and shaped by the new communication technologies. Specifically, the focus is on the spontaneous demonstrations of 2004 against the Spanish government (13 March) which took place after the bombing attacks in Madrid on 11 March, and just the day before the general elections (14 March). This analysis permits us to reflect on the way collective action takes place in contemporary society and to extend the concept of political opportunity structure. Also, the use of new methodological approaches have enhanced and achieved the results of the research.

New Social Movements Supporters: A Southern Europe Analysis

Belchior, Ana Maria

*CIES, CIES-ISCTE - Centre of Sociological Studies and Research of the Higher Institute of Social Sciences and Business Studies, Lisbon
Lisbon, Portugal*

Keywords

Political Parties, social movements, post-materialism, Southern Europe, ideology

Theories of cultural modernization show that, in modern democracies, new political movements and parties generated around a multiplicity of social objectives have start to conquer the political arena. These movements and parties answer to new political issues, basically of a post-materialist nature, to which traditional parties have difficulty reacting (Kitschelt 1990; Dalton et al. 1990: 10-16; Müller-Rommel 2002). Essentially mobilized by the ideal of a pluralist, participative, libertarian and even anti-capitalist democracy, they are concerned about ecological, feminist, and peace matters and collective political issues. They are also regarded as exhibiting a higher defence of democratic values and rules (cf. e.g. Kitschelt 1990: 185, 195; Dalton et al. 1990: 13-14; Doherty 2002: 72-73).

This paper is focused in the party preferences, ideological orientations and post-materialist positions of the supporters of new social movements in the Southern European countries.

Although showing an undersized number of active supporters, new social movements' political importance can sometimes show quite strong importance in some political decisions. The main purpose is, therefore, to descriptively analyse what are the more significant characteristics of their supporters particularly from a party, ideological and materialist post-materialist perspective. Is voting behaviour of new movement supporters' more supported on the traditional ideological dimension, or new explanations have to be considered, namely the ones related to the post-materialism dimension, Similar studies have been carried out (see Müller-Rommel, 1985). The purpose of this paper is to reply the general idea underlying those studies considering a set of countries that were never studied in this perspective.

New time of civic activity in rural areas? A new perspective on re-organization of services in Finland

Tuija, Mononen

Karelian Institute, University of Joensuu Joensuu, Finland

Keywords

civic activity, social movements, rural

Finland is a very sparsely populated; most local authorities have a low number of residents and distances are long. At the moment there is a process of municipal mergers and a project of restructuring local government and services going on in Finland. The aim of these processes is f. ex. to increase the viability and effectiveness of municipalities, and to ensure high-quality services. Although services are supposed to be better, resistance to the mergers has been arisen among rural citizens. What happens when community is going to close down local services like schools, village shops, and post offices, in rural areas? Does rural people's activity increase and how? Who is activating, who is activated? What is the motivating force? What is the meaning of sentimental reasons and emotions? Is there a fear of losing identity? What about regionalism and collective identity?

Media has a strong influence to public opinion and it may increase/decrease the involvement in rural activism. In my paper I will focus on discussion about municipal mergers and restructuring local services from the point of civic activism and democracy in newspapers. Data includes more than 1000 articles about five (both implemented and un-implemented) municipal mergers in Eastern Finland. I examine and analyze public discussion about mergers and restructuring of rural services in the theoretical frame of rural protest and social movements.

Opposition and integration ? Movements of the marginalized in a Nordic welfare state

Alm Andreassen, Tone

MIO, Work Research Institute

Oslo, Oslo

Seim, Sissel

SAM, Oslo University College

Oslo, Norway

Keywords

Welfare State, Recognition, marginalized groups

In this paper we investigate the mobilization and collective action of marginalized groups in Norway in light of the specific characteristics of the Nordic welfare state. The paper depart from theories of social movements as focused on societal dilemmas and antagonistic conflicts concerning basic orientations of society, represented by Alain Touraine and Alberto Melluci. This is an approach stressing that the collective actions of social movements involve a breach of the limits of compatibility of the system, and make a distinction between social movements and political movements, the last ones concerned mainly with participation in decision-making.

In the paper we analyze collective action by recipients of welfare services and income maintenance and the outcome of their action. We argue that in a welfare state in which social movements and civil associations turns towards the state, not against in, movements of the marginalized too put effort in achieving recognition from the political system. The outcome searched for by movements of the marginalized is policy measures. Thus, to understand the nature of social movements one has to take account of the nature of the state in which the movement operate.

The empirical basis for the analysis is two cases, an organization mobilizing poor people, and an association of mental health patients. These cases of collective action of marginalized groups are to be understood in light of the disability movements' struggle for equal opportunities, for disabled people's right to speak for themselves, and for associations of disabled as the legitimate spokespersons of the disabled. The disability movement, building on the traditions of the labor movement, seems to have paved the way for other marginalized groups. Thus the Norwegian welfare state seems to integrate oppositional voices, and offer a position where marginalized groups both might participate in and oppose the established welfare system. However, this position presents dilemmas to the marginalized.

Primary Frameworks, Keying, and the Dynamics of Contention

Johnston, Hank

*Sociology, San Diego State University
San Diego, CA, USA*

Alimi, Eitan

Political Science, Hebrew University Jerusalem, Israel

Keywords

radical Islam, Chechen nationalism, Palestinian nationalism, Framing, dynamics of contention

McAdam, Tarrow and Tilly's Dynamics of Contention approach to contentious politics (2001) has a strong cultural-interpretative focus that has not been widely recognized by social movement scholars. In this paper, we examine front-stage politics in light of back-stage cultural and interpretative processes, drawing upon the Chechen national mobilization (1987-1997) and the Palestinian national movement's struggle against Israeli rule (1987-2005). We use Goffman's original notion of "primary frameworks" to capture the influence of fundamental cultural templates, and his concept of "keying processes" to capture the way frameworks are reworked in the dynamics of political contention. We then identify three central components of primary frameworks, namely, collective identity, (the subject), what the subject does (the verb), and who or what is the object of those actions (the object). This paper identifies the primary frameworks and keying processes of Chechens and Palestinians with relation to Russia and Israel respectively. It then traces how they are played out in the heat of political contention as changes in the structure of political opportunities and threats unfold. We trace how the subject-verb-object triplet of primary frameworks help elaborate and specify the dynamic interpretative work in political contention, focusing McAdam, Tarrow, and Tilly's process analysis on its essential elements and relationships.

Religious identities and political attitude in Italy

Giorgi, Alberta

Department of Sociology and Social Research, University of Milano Bicocca Milano, Italy

Keywords

social movements, religion, politics, associations, political behaviour

The paper focuses on the interconnections between religious and political attitudes within the Italian religious associations, basing on original survey data.

This survey (2006) is part of a larger project research carried out by PolisLombardia (University of Milano-Bicocca), that included a survey addressed to associations participants in Lombardia and a telephone survey addressed to Lombardia population (either involved in association activities or not). The research design build up on a previous research addressed to the same target in 1992-3, made by IREF (Istituto di Ricerche Educative e Formative).

This paper will focus on the interconnections between political and religious identities of Catholic associations participants. Namely, we will explore: electoral behaviour, political attitudes, political activities and the relations with religious belonging, religious values and religious identity.

Religion in Italy has always had an high degree of politicization. The party system in the Italian first republic was built up with explicit references to the religious cleavage.

In both the first and the second Italian Republic, political parties used religion as a lever for obtaining electoral consensus. Especially in the last decades, political actors use ethical issues in order to mobilize religious actors and believers, trying to unify religious people under ethical themes supposed to attract "religious" vote. Nevertheless, Catholics political commitment cannot be reduced to electoral behaviour. Namely, religious movements and associations played an important role in the Italian political sphere, either as political actors or as places for political socialization.

There are two main interesting research outcomes. It seems that there are any connections between religious and political identity. Secondly, there is a clear separation between political involvement and political party commitment.

Right wing activism in contemporary Portugal: Partido Nacional Renovador

Marchi, Riccardo

Political Science, Instituto de Ciências Sociais da Universidade de Lisboa (ICS)

Portugal, <http://www.ics.ul.pt>

Keywords

anti-immigration, radical right, Portugal

Since the mid-80's, the Portuguese Radical Right has suffered deep changes. The traditional radical right, coming from the authoritarian regime and characterized by the multiracial imperial myth, has been replaced with a new radical right characterized by an ethno-nationalist political thought.

In particular, since the turning of the millennium, an extreme right-wing party - the Renewal National Party (PNR - Partido Nacional Renovador) - has been capable to merge the militancy of the more recent extreme fringes of the skinhead movement, with some cadres coming from radical nationalism of seventies. Actually, the new president of the PNR - José Pinto Coelho - is trying to improve in Portugal the electoral and political strategies of the more mature European national-populist parties, without losing some characteristics of the old radical right and the activism of the youth extremists.

PNR is actually engaged in gaining the attention of the media and putting the party in the forefront of the political arena. To achieve this goal, PNR leadership decides for a policy of impacting messages against immigration, throughout a series of huge outdoors in the centre of Lisbon.

In matter of fact, every PNR's outdoor causes condemning reactions by Portuguese political parties and antiracist organizations, putting the theme and the right-wing activism at the top of the Medias' agenda during a while.

If at the beginning of the campaign, Portuguese opinion makers were hardly critics with PNR strategy and the party was, in some cases, persecuted by law, in the last year PNR gained a sort of solidarity by some prestigious intellectuals, concerned with the freedom of speech.

This strategy did not yet produce significant results in electoral term. However the growing media exposure offered an unquestionable national notoriety to the Portuguese radical right, inexistent in the last two decades of the XX century. This fact would produce, in the future, some success, especially in suburban local election, where immigration is a sensitive matter.

The paper analyzes PNR's policy in comparison with the broader European radical right activism.

Serve and Protect - The use of bottom-up online applications by civic groups

Bognar, Eva

Center for Media and Communication Studies, Central European University Budapest, Hungary

Szakacs, Judit

Sociology and Anthropology, Central European University Budapest, Hungary

Keywords

internet, qualitative methods, civic participation, activism, bottom-up applications

The presentation proposed here draws on a large-scale European project entitled CIVICWEB, in the course of which "Young people, the internet and civic participation" has been studied. The aim of this paper is to introduce the results of a qualitative analysis of European civic websites. We have carried out a web-based in-depth analysis to examine the characteristics and nature of the European civic online sphere and to gain a better understanding of the different ways in which issues are represented, users are addressed and invited to participate in these websites. 47 websites had been analysed individually in seven countries focussing on issues such as content, design, structure, interactivity and notions of civic and political. Where possible, producers and users of the analysed websites have been interviewed in order to gather as much insight and information about the website as possible.

In this paper, we will be focussing on one aspect of the analysis: the role the interactive bottom-up applications play in the life of the communities behind the websites. We will demonstrate the complex interplay between aims, the organisational nature of the civic group and the site producers' concept of the medium by examining and contrasting three Hungarian websites: judapest.org, a Hungarian community blog on Jewish identity, where tight control, strict moderation of the user-generated content is used to ensure what the producers see as productive, high quality discussion; lmv.hu, a community activist portal whose aim is to bring together people interested in the same issues and organise collective action; and criticalmass.hu, the single issue community portal of probably the most well-known Hungarian civic movement dedicated to urban cycling that also tries to attract the highest number of users possible, but whose function is primarily to create and maintain a "cyclist identity". We will be tracing the role the internet and its interactive applications have been playing throughout the history of the three communities showing how similar applications may be interpreted in different ways and evoke different practices and concerns about the technology.

Social movements and voluntary associations as autopoietic systems

Siisiäinen, Martti

*Department of Social Sciences and Philosophy, University of Jyväskylä
Jyväskylä, Finland*

Keywords

systems theory, voluntary associations, social movement

Social movements and voluntary associations as autopoietic systems

Abstract

Martti Siisiäinen

University of Jyväskylä

Finland

Research and theorizations on social movements and voluntary associations have developed to their own directions for several decades. Due to social and sociological reasons this has - to large extent - led to a differentiation and development of (middle-range) theories of their own and to discussions carried out separately. Both field of research have theoretical traditions, conceptual repertoires and methodological solutions of their own. Associations and movements are not the only actors on various political and social fields. Miscellaneous group of actors from smarts (and less smart) mobs, gangs, boycott campaigns, party organizations to various internet networks and communities are competing with each other and with more "traditional" associations and movements. These actors are communicating with different social sub-systems and on various social fields.

This all forms a very complex constellation of relationships between various actors and between them and societal sub-systems. Therefore is it often difficult for students of collective action to form a clear picture of the totality of collective action and actors and their relations with each other and societal sub-systems. For that purpose comprehensive theories including all these components are needed, theories that make it possible to describe differences of various forms of voluntary organization and their relationships with social subsystem in a systematic and logical way.

This paper adopts Luhmann's systems theory to voluntary organizing: (1) by developing a theoretical typology of voluntary associations (interactions, associations, social movements, formal organizations); (2) by discussing about the characteristics of communication between various types and social sub-systems. It is only a first step because of the formality and "emptiness" of the theory that has to be filled with more substantial theorizations. The paper also presents possible contributions (a) systems theory on the research of voluntary organizing, and (b) of association and movements research on systems theory. The paper argues for such approaches which include both the movement and the associational component in a way outlines already by Max Weber and certain other classics of association and movement research.

Social movements and world society. The genesis of a world political system?

Haugen, Leif Martin

*Sociology, University of Tromsø
Tromsø, Norway*

Keywords

World Society, systems theory, social movements, collective action,

There is an increasing discrepancy between a state-differentiated political system and a transnational problem structure (ecological crises, poverty, rapid population growth, etc.). For a substantial number of theorists, (global) civil society (GCS) represents a prospect for a new political world order, beyond the Westphalia state model. At the core of the current enthusiasm of GCS is a fascination with social movements/NGOs - civic activist groups that presumably foster political participations, empowers citizens and thus creates "deeper" forms of democracy. Jürgen Habermas is the most celebrated advocates for a transnational civil society, contributing to a discursive process of democratic will-formation. Against this view, I will argue that the analytical parallel between social movements/NGOs and civil society is theoretical challenging, and thus suggest that NGOs alternatively can be understood as an emerging system. Partly following N. Luhmanns systems theory, I will claim that NGOs can be perceived as a functional response on an imbalance between an emerging world society and a political system differentiated in national-states. Through NGOs society is described as a world society, bringing attention to the need for collaboration and collective orientation on a global scale. NGOs description and radicalization of problems in world society, contributes to a potentially solidarity emerging from collective interest in solving global problems.

Through an empirical case study I will compare WWF-Norway with the normative orientation in the civil society literature. Especially, the paper will focus on the rather clear-cut distinction which is being made between civil society and the political system/state. In the continuation of this, I will analyze how WWF-Norway describes and reflects on the "global situation", and how problems in world society can be solved. What is WWF-Norways reference for global problem "solving". The underlying assumption is that WWF-Norway is both appealing to individuals, local and global communities, but also the political system as means to handle problems in world society.

The subject of my paper relates both to the primary topic of the ESA 2009 conference, and is relevant to the requested topic of "Social Movements research network" (RN25).

State Relationships of the Finnish Environmental Movement

Konttinen, Esa

Social Sciences and Philosophy, University of Jyväskylä Finland,

Keywords

Civil Society, state, social movement

The relationships between the state and social movements obviously vary greatly from society to society. It is characteristic of Finland - like of other Nordic countries - that collaborative activities between the state and environmental movements are culturally and practically rather well institutionalized. The most clearly, this holds with the most important environmental association of the country, The Finnish Association for Nature Conservation (f. 1938). It is argued that the relationships of the FANC with the state are in the end based on the specific model of the civil society more generally, the formation which goes back far to the late 19th century. The connections of the FANC with the state are studied in this historical context. It will also be studied the forms of co-work, their development and the present state. It will be argued that the relationship is a sensitive balance protected by the both parties. From the viewpoint of FANC this means a kind of continuous and sensitive move between a moderate well organized formal association and a challenging movement, however carefully watching not to be too militant. The relationship is conditioned by the respect for an old cultural code of peaceful demonstrating, determining the possibilities for co-work. The outcomes of this kind of collaborative activity of the FANC with the Finnish state will be studied.

Sympathetic media and social movements. Some evidence from the cycle of protest against precarity in Italy

Mattoni, Alice

SPS, European University Institute San Domenico di Fiesole (FI), Italy

Keywords

social movements, precarity, sympathetic media, media practices

Contemporary media environments are made up by overlapping information flows channeled through multiple media. When addressing media practices developed by social movements, for instance, it is possible to single out media that differ both from mainstream media, because they are not completely commercial and profit oriented, and from alternative media, because they are not completely linked to social movements and their protests. I named this peculiar type of media "sympathetic media", since they are usually politically oriented and near to claims social movements raise, while keeping a certain degree of autonomy from them. Literature about social movements devotes scarce attention to sympathetic media, while activists consider them important in terms of visibility and develop specific media practices aiming at catching their attention, pushing their collective action frame and obtaining support in protest diffusion. The paper intends to fill this gap in the literature by adding empirical knowledge on the relationship between sympathetic media and social movements and by developing further the sensitizing concept of 'sympathetic media' at the theoretical level.

The paper is based on a qualitative and comparative case-studies approach. Five case studies belonging to the same cycle of protest, the one against precarious employment in Italy occurred from 2001 to 2006, are indeed investigated. Though different under many respects, the five case studies presented multifaceted "communication repertoires" in which media practices oriented towards mainstream, alternative and sympathetic media developed in parallel and sometimes intertwined. The paper focuses on the latter, taking into consideration: (a) perceptions of sympathetic media among activist groups; (b) media practices that activist groups developed towards sympathetic media and (b) reactions of sympathetic journalists to these media practices. The investigation is based on two data sets: semi-structured interviews with activists and journalists and documents generated by social movements. The discourse analysis and frame analysis approaches have guided the investigation of the collected data.

The "Anomalous Wave" 2008 University Movement in Italy: a Self-research case-study in Catania

Piazza, Gianni

DAPPSI, University of Catania Catania, Italy

Keywords

self-research, social movements outcomes, student movements

Last Autumn 2008, a student movement (Anomalous Wave) against the university reform promoted by the Education Minister M. S. Gelmini (centre-right Berlusconi government) arose in Italy. During the mobilization, a group of student-activists and researchers of the Faculty of Political Sciences in Catania decided to investigate the overall movement they belonged to, using the analytical and methodological tools provided by political and social sciences. The goal was to better know and understand the aims, interests, preferences, demands and evaluations of the larger constituency of the movement, beyond the narrow circle of the leaders and activists. They made a survey through the elaboration of a questionnaire (mostly composed by questions with open answers) administered to the participants to the demonstrations in Catania, during the university mobilization.

In this paper I will present, firstly, the findings provided by the elaboration of the collected data, regarding the following characteristics of the demonstrators; socio-graphical data; cognitive frames (motivations, aims, causes and targets, alternative solutions); strategies and forms of action adopted and preferred; individual participation and/or group membership; previous protest and political experiences; evaluations on participation, mass-media role, movement allies and opponents; political preferences. Moreover, I will reflect on the impact the self-research had on the movement outcomes concerning both the targets of the activists and their strategies and forms of action at local and national level.

The Access to Knowledge movement: reshaping politics in the information society

Krikorian, Gaëlle, Pascale

UMR 8156 CNRS - Inserm - EHESS - Université Paris 13, IRIS, Institut de recherche interdisciplinaire sur les enjeux sociaux Sciences sociales, politique, santé France, <http://iris.ehess.fr/>

Keywords

Access to knowledge (A2K), intellectual property, politics

Individuals and organizations choose A2K as a common umbrella under which they critique the inequalities and injustices arising from intellectual property rights (IPR) protection. The A2K movement can be seen as a movement of movements overlapping as in Ven diagrams, each group bringing its own causes, tactics and networks, but all forming one collective identity. Without imposing a hierarchy of claims, A2K promotes the emergence of an entity that transcends the elements that constitute it. Individuals invest in the movement their handicaps or their privileges, which become resources for collective action and/or basis for claims bearing universal range. A2K can thus be understood as "a multitude" inheriting its own intentionality by articulating the singular to the common - as such, it illustrates an evolution of the culture of mobilizations.

A2K actors rallied in the name of their opposition to increasing IPR protection. But opposition to a concept that affects a wide range of aspects of society and impose structural interconnections between them - such as IP or the WTO - favors the coalescence of movements originally focusing on specific issues, but separately, forcing them to wrap themselves up in a more systemic way. Thus A2K constituencies seek to be perceived not as simply contradictors, but as promoters of a positive agenda seeking to reframe issues independently of a relation to IP and outside of the logic of the IP system.

A2K targets issues specific to the new digital society, but fundamentally addresses classical problems (inequalities in the distribution of resources, social justice). Raising access issues, it reveals the dissonances of the public claims of dominant powers regarding equality and democracy, making the perception of injustices and moral questioning possible. While its pragmatic concerns (innovation and creation) anchor it within the capitalist system, their articulation to social justice claims (access) re-injects a moral dimension into politics. Hence, the framework of social movement theory applied to A2K/pro-IP conflicts offer tools to understand recent evolutions affecting the relations between the state and its constituencies in the neo-liberal "rationality", and the ways politicization occurs outside of representative politics.

The Effect of World Society on Local Activism: The Transformation of the Environmental Movement in South Korea

Kern, Thomas

*Sociology, University of Heidelberg
Heidelberg, Germany*

Keywords

Cultural Creativity, World Society, environmentalism, South Korea, social movements

The classical movement approach explains the rise of social movements on the basis of domestic configurations of political and cultural conflicts. From this perspective, their success is determined by political opportunities, mobilizing structures, and collective action frames. In contrast, the theory of world society suggests that social movements are the product of an expanding world culture. They are no longer conceived as primary agents of social change and they appear as mere "enactors" of a world culture. This presentation examines the translation of global values and ideas into domestic contexts on the case of the environmental movement in South Korea. It will be demonstrated that the rise of the environmental movement was equally shaped by the expansion of the world society, domestic configurations of power, and the cultural creativity of movement activists

This process will be empirically analyzed in four steps: In the first step, a short overview over the development of the global environmental regime from the perspective of the world society theory will be given. In the second step, environmental attitudes and values of leading Western and East Asian countries will be compared on the basis of data from the world value survey (1990). The results show that in Western countries, pro-environmental attitudes are closely linked to postmaterialist values. In East Asia, environmentalism is generally more distinctive and it highly correlates with materialist as well as postmaterialist values. In the third step, the framing of environmental problems in South Korea will be investigated. The analysis shows that the rise of environmentalism was accompanied by a shift from the radical "Anti-Pollution" ideology to the more moderate "Life Philosophy". As a consequence, environmental activists were able to address a broader audience in the generally more conservative Korean society. In the fourth step, on the basis of a network analysis, it will be shown how the Rio Conference on Environment and Development (1992) produced a major shift in the power distribution of the local environmental movement by providing opportunities and incentives to moderate environmental groups who adopted the ideological framework of the new "Life Philosophy"

The environmental movement and climate change: evidence, campaigns and outcomes in Europe

Bozzini, Emanuela

*Sociology and Social Research, University of Trento
Trento, Italy*

Keywords

europe, climate change, environmental movement

Climate change is a highly controversial and complex issue. In general terms a consensus exists over the need to tackle climate change, though policy implications and their relative costs and benefits are much more controversial. The EU target to limit global warming to 2°C above pre-industrial levels requires addressing issues as diverse as energy efficiency, transport, biofuels, deforestation and biomass, agricultural land use and to do so in a coordinated way. Areas of risk, uncertainties and ignorance are wide and an assessment of how different measures contributes to the reduction of CO<sub>2</sub> emissions is highly uncertain and changing over time. Further, it is controversial to assess whether efforts for reducing emissions from a sector do not negatively affect the level of emissions from other sectors. For example, efforts for meeting targets on biofuels may adversely affect efforts against deforestation. Similarly, plans for extensive afforestation may lead to a loss in biodiversity. Finally, impacts on national economies differ and are difficult to ascertain. In all these cases different conceptions of risks and priorities make it difficult to achieve policy coordination and to develop coherent plans. This paper aims at assessing how the environmental movement is responding to such a complex challenge and proposes an analysis of a climate change-related campaigns - such as "Big Ask" and "Time to Lead" - as well as contributions to EU consultation processes. The analysis of campaigns and consultation processes will allow to assess who are the actors involved on different issues, how organisations set priorities for action and manage contradictory evidence, and to what extent the environmental organisations are able to retain coherence and coordination in a highly complex field.

The political mobilisations of Sri Lankan Tamil Diaspora as a transnational social movement

Dequirez, Gaelle

Political sociology, University Lille2

Pontoise, France

Keywords

Immigration, social movements, transnationalism, Diaspora

Transnational social movements have become a prominent theme of the research on social movements. I propose to examine transnational movements through the case of the pro-LTTE political mobilisations of Sri Lankan Tamils in Europe and in Canada. The LTTE (Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam) are engaged in an armed conflict against the official army in Sri Lanka. This war has provoked a huge exile of Sri Lankan Tamilians who have applied for asylum in several countries (India, Canada, United-States of America, European and Southeast Asian countries). The LTTE have managed to gain a certain support within this Tamil Diaspora all over the world. Consequently a pro LTTE movement has developed in a transnational way. Its leaders and members seem to act coherently at international level, and they attempt to get visibility to the authorities of the European Union or to international organizations such as the United Nations through demonstrations or lobbying actions. But at the same time, some of their political activities (petitions, hunger strikes) are more specifically directed to the governments of their host countries (even if mostly in a coordinate manner). Moreover these activists stage different kind of activities (school tutoring, dance or music course, sports) and lots of events (dance or music festival, political meetings, demonstrations) in order to socialize Sri Lankan Tamil immigrants to their cause. So they have to interact with the municipal level and are deeply constrained by the local level of this type of action. Studying this case will allow us to better understand what is actually transnational in their actions (a point sometimes neglected in the current literature in my view), and how this transnational level is supported by a hierarchical organization and also by the diasporic family network. With this communication, I would also like to defend the idea that this kind of political mobilisations of migrants present real transnational features and, as such, deserves more attention from scholars. My analysis is based on interviews, direct observations and Tamil documents gathered during a three years fieldwork in the Parisian region, France, and a short fieldwork in Toronto, Canada.

The Political Project of the Communist Re-foundation in Italy: Sociology of a Party in movement

de Nardis, Fabio

Social Sciences and Communication, University of Salento Lecce, Italy

Keywords

political culture, left, Refoundation Communist Party, Political Parties, social movements

Social movements has been usually conformed to traditional party families. In particular, students and workers movements have often singled out left parties as strong allies determining several cases of multiple belongings. Notwithstanding this, the relationship between left parties and social movements has been always on strained terms, like a sort of conflictual cooperation. Movement's activists are usually wary of the bureaucratic structures of the parties. They prefer lighter forms of organization in informal networks no compatible with hierarchic logics of power typical for a political party. But in Italy during the last years It's been possible to observe the structuring and then the partial de-structuring of a close bond between the movement for a global justice (and other local movements) and the Refoundation Communist Party (Prc). Since 1999, with the 4th National Congress, Prc started to debate some principles of classic Leninism through a critic re-reading of the communist experiences of the XX century and the consequent consciousness of the communist no-self-sufficiency. After this, the leaders of the party could throw out the new strategy of an horizontal link to social movements, confirmed by 5th and 6th National Congresses. The relationship between Prc and social movements seem to go on without particular problems until the participation of Prc to the center-left govern in a pretty moderate coalition.

This paper intend to analyse the dynamics of this hard relationship by using, on one hand, the data from a survey carried out during the last four European Social Forum regarding the attitude of Italian movement activists on their relationship with traditional political institutions and organizations; on the other hand, we will analyse the interior debate of the Refoundation Communist Party, in the field of the European Left, by using documents published in occasion of the 7th National Congress with particular regard to the articles published on the party's newspaper "Liberazione" for the tribune of the Congress. All the documents will be analysed with a specific computer program for content analysis.

The problem of using rights as a means to advocate legal reforms: the example of the eviction order and its severe consequences

Rantala, Kati

*General Research Unit, The National Research Institute of Legal Policy
Helsinki, Finland*

Keywords

eviction order, Feminist movement, evaluation research, legislation, Rights

Occasionally, social movements tend to transform welfare issues and power conflicts into the language of rights in order to justify and advocate legal reforms. However, using law as an instrument for empowering a specific group of people and improving their conditions may backfire. What easily happens is that a simplistic solution is offered to a complex problem, and for the sake of argumentation the parties involved become homogenised. This leads to unrealistic premises, means and goals for the legislators and finally, when the law is implemented, at the worst to severe consequences. Political pressure aggravates the setting.

This has all come true in the case example of launching "eviction orders" in Finland. It is an internationally spreading but poorly evaluated legal instrument for preventing violence against women, in which the violent person is required to move out from the common household and is banned from returning for a predetermined length of time. Driven by feminist movement linked with feminist research, the order is justified based on rights rather than needs or sufficient cultural understanding, homogenising the parties involved.

The neglect of paying attention to contextual circumstances has resulted in severe consequences, including for example hidden violence, social exclusion and suicides. Many people in all groups involved, that is women, men, children, and the elderly have become victims of the state driven, short sighted feminist agenda. Thus, the intervention was designed to help suppressed victims of violence but due to a poorly prepared legislation, it does a misservice for them and produces new victims also of the perpetrators.

This paper is based on an evaluation research that focuses on the premises, implementation and consequences of the law on eviction orders in Finland; it came into force in 2005. The data consist of law drafting documents, interviews and all orders from 2005 and 2006, including district court decisions and police records of the parties involved.

The Romaní Women Movement: Opening Up Spaces

Sordé Martí, Teresa

Sociology, Universitat Autònoma de Barcelona Bellaterra (Cerdanyola del Vallès), Spain

Aubert, Adriana

*Sociological Theory, Methodology of Social Sciences and Philosophy of Law, Universitat de Barcelona
Barcelona, Spain*

Keywords

Overcoming Unequalities, Human agency, Social Transformation, Romaní Women

Romà experienced globalization early in their history. This ethnic minority of Indian origin, who has spread out all around the globe, are one of the first people to live beyond the states' boundaries, without their own territory or state. The Romaní rights movement has always mirrored this reality. Thus, Romaní women have not been an exception to it, and in less than twenty years, they have passed from not having any organization by their own to being organized in almost any remote region. The paper would present an analysis of the current Romaní women movement as an example of a contemporary social movement. Romaní women organizations are directing many processes of change in their communities, families and schools. Romaní women, considered one of the pillars for the Romaní culture, have always functioned between the past and the future, as responsible for carrying the culture. At the crossroad of traditions and modernity, Romaní women feminist ideas and strategies are changing gender and family relations, creating new understandings of their identity, generating new opportunities to fully participate in society, and making their own decisions to better face nowadays uncertainties in a globalized world. These organizations are opening up many spaces for dialogue and negotiation about their community and the society in general. Romaní women are not alone in their endeavor. As a result of the actions led by the network of associations that have flourished in the last decades throughout Europe, these transformative dynamics are found at their individual lives and also in their social contexts. An analysis of this social movement, and particularly their claims in terms of opening up spaces of participation in the educational domain for themselves and their communities will be presented.

The suburb and the event. Depoliticization and new forms of youth subjectivity in Dublin's deprived suburban neighbourhoods.

Zagato, Alessandro

Sociology/NIRSA, National University of Ireland Maynooth Maynooth, Ireland

Keywords

Youth, Subjectivity, Depoliticization

This title refers to an ongoing doctoral research that contemplates two main areas of study: on one hand, the worldwide spreading phenomenon of depoliticization and on the other hand, the emerging of new forms of youth political subjectivation, especially in European suburban metropolitan areas. Aim of the study is to understand if the Republic of Ireland, with an explicit reference to Dublin, possesses some specific characters of this depoliticization and subjectivation processes.

In Ireland the contemporary crisis of the political parties, that is to say of the "par excellence" modern political subject, has affected also other political organizations. These organizations "just like parties" are visibly turning into bureaucratic apparatuses coextensive to the State, disconnected from the population and almost devoid of a genuine political content. A representative example can be found in the way so called "community based activism" has recently displaced its independency with a movement towards regularized organizational standards and engagement in partnership. This sort of "normalization" has worked against the very foundation of community activism, i.e., a political aspiration to social change against the wishes of the status quo.

The philosopher Alain Badiou - a main theoretical reference in this research - would probably interpret this problem with the idea of an inescapable contradiction opposing political subjectivity and the State. In fact, according to Badiou, the State in itself is an apolitical and inegalitarian metastructure, that has no independent rationality. For him only an independent political subjectivity, decentralized with respect to the State, can deal with its objectivity transforming it in a positive field for inventive and egalitarian possibilities.

Inspired by the novelty of the extraordinary forms of antagonism recently performed by youths in various European cities, I have conducted fieldwork in suburban areas of Dublin, using qualitative data collection methods. Preliminary results highlight the emergence of new forms of youth political subjectivation and resistance to normalization. Empirical evidence shows that these practices are in particular enacted through deliberated acts of conflict and through new organizational configurations, like the creation of autonomous and independent "spaces" where to develop practices and thoughts at a distance from state's totalization.

Turning moral panics into organized actions

Zielinska, Iwona

Graduate School of Social Research, Polish Academy of Science Warsaw, Poland

Keywords

norms, social order, moral panic, moral entrepreneur

Moral panics are defined as exaggerated, media-amplified social reaction to relatively minor acts of deviance. Although, the initial reaction, triggered always by negative emotions, seems to be spontaneous and rather irrational the action taken in the later stage of a panic against the deviants remains surprisingly sound and rational. As a result, the issue in question gives rise to a considerable public debate about the breakdown of social order and the means of protecting it. If the scale of the threat posed by the deviant is believed to be significant (and it is always thought to be larger than the real threat) the actions may take a form of social movement which aims at serious legal and institutional changes to the situation.

In 2004-2007 Poland experienced a moral panic about homosexuals as a result of the growing activity of the gay and lesbian movement and its visibility in public sphere. Parades and demonstrations were organized in order to attract public attention and to raise important questions about gays' and lesbians' status in legal and social system. That caused a great alarm among politicians, right-wing organizations as well as the Polish church, who felt that social order might be at a threat.

Using the results of the content analysis of the four-year period we would like to focus on the means of social control which were evoked in order to suppress gays' and lesbians' visibility in public sphere as well as to prevent the apparent threat to social order. There were attempts to stop the parades, to introduce a bill against gay-teachers or to threaten, ridicule and vilify homosexuals. Special attention will be given to this very moment when the first, emotional reactions become rationalised and turned into systematical activities with their clearly specified purpose. We will try to see to what extent this "enterprise" can be analysed as a form of a social movement and what were the results of it. The analysed case will also allow us to ask about the necessary conditions for a successful publicity and organized action taken in a moral panic phenomenon.

Ups, Downs and Come-Backs of Social Movements on the Democracy Trail: The Trade Unions in Nigeria (1994-2004)

Obono, Daniele

Political science, University of Paris I - Pantheon Sorbonne AUBERVILLIERS, FRANCE

Keywords

social movements, trade unions, Nigeria, DEMOCRACY

This paper will deal with the role as democratic agents of Nigerian trade unions inside social movements throughout a decade of intense and important political developments.

The Nigerian trade-unions have been at the forefront of the 1990s democratization movements which powerfully shook the military regimes that had been ruling the country for the most part of its history. But as the authoritarian system resisted and a new, more violent junta succeeded in putting an end to the long-awaited transition and the popular unrest, social movement activists and organisations were met with a brutal repression. Having been at the centre of the agitation for the restoration of democracy, the trade union movement bore the brunt of the crushing. During the period that followed, they underwent a dual and contradictory process. On the one hand, the trade-union leadership got more closely linked and co-opted by the power; but on the other hand, there has been some sort of a renewed militancy from the rank and file. Their relationships with other social movements were also altered. When the country finally went back to a civilian and democratically-elected regime in 1999, it was also for the trade union movement an opportunity to rise up from the ashes. In tune with the African political "Zeitgeist", it is under the banner "Rebirth 99" that Adams Oshiomhole campaigned and was elected president of the Nigeria Labour Congress, the main trade unions umbrella body. Indeed it looks like the trade union movement has since been able to best position itself within the post-transition civil society and social movements. It has regularly been able to make its voice heard nationally - although not without controversies - in the public and political debate. How did the Nigerian trade-unions manage to play such an important role on the national scene? Articulating analyzes of the Nigerian system of political opportunities and constraints, with the impact of trade unions as mobilizing structures and their framing strategies within wider social movements, we will try and explain their dynamic trajectory and contribution to the democratic renewal in Nigeria.

Urban social movements in/against European Capital of Culture Istanbul

Ergin, Nezihe Basak

*Sociology, Middle East Technical University
Istanbul, Turkey*

Rittersberger-Tilic, Helga

*Sociology, Middle East Technical University
Ankara, Turkey*

Keywords

internet, Urban Regeneration, culture, Urban social movements, Istanbul

Istanbul, after being proposed especially by municipal actors as a winner of a "cultural characteristics competition" at "European" level, beyond Turkey as a candidate for EU, is transformed according to aims for "contemporary arts", "cultural heritage", "historical background", with the reinvention of "multiculturalism", "culture". "Culture" -a complicated and controversial word- and "Europe" components of this new label became legitimatizing tools for already started urban projects of neoliberal urbanism but redefined by the benefit of this "cultural industry", excluding Istanbul's residents, especially lower classes, leading to one question: "whose culture, whose city" as Zukin stated. Urban social movements in Istanbul against urban projects will be discussed within the discussion on its definitions as "new social movements" or a "old movement". In a class-based theoretical standpoint both for the reasons and organization, alliances, it will be attempted to pursue continuity and relationship between these two definitions. The study will examine "urban social movements" of intellectuals and grassroots towards urban projects (for demolition of residents in different neighborhoods, of urban landmarks, cultural centers) within the so-called "urban renewal/regeneration" in Istanbul, gaining new aspects in the framework of Istanbul, the European Capital of Culture for 2010. The paper will underline the role of internet in terms of network, information, organization and recruitment in the protests and of media both as stigmatizing these protests and especially as a means of protest. Working on protests at different levels of "intellectuals" and grassroots in opposition to decisions within this "program", the study has a standpoint of revealing heterogeneity within "intellectuals", including actors within the organizational structure who even changed the first urban decisions of the program and of exposing a critique for the definition of grassroots either as "silent", "deviant" or "radical", "revolutionary".

Visual methods for protest movement research

Philipps, Axel

Institute for Sociology and Social Psychology, Leibniz University Hannover Hannover, Germany

Keywords

Protest Event, Visual Method, social movement, Protest Movement

Social scientists work with a widely elaborated "set of tools" analysing protest events or movements. Very common are interviews, questionnaires, content analysis of documents, case studies, observations etc. All these methods have strengths and limits.

Hardly unrecognized are visual methods in protest (movement) research. There are only few studies focusing on visual protest material (i.e. posters, banners, logos) or other visual aspects of protest events. However, there are good reasons to introduce visual methods for analysing protest material in order to recognize the research potentials they offer:

1) Especially if "triangulation" (Uwe Flick) is seen as an improvement of research quality, visual methods will contribute to an advanced methodological analysis. Visual protest material offers a sensitive and fertile access to comprehend protest events or movements.

2) Visual methods also provide a more direct access to protest discourses because the protesters often visualize their topics and arguments in banners, posters, logos etc. Mass media texts or reports, in contrast, are mainly produced by observers of the protests.

Visual methods allow two approaches to protest material:

The former implies the interpretation of the meaning of visual protest materials which is close to text interpretation. Thus visual signs or symbols are interpreted like texts.

The latter focuses on the arrangement of visual protest material which goes one step further than the first one. Whilst the first approach questions what is the meaning of the visual protest material the second asks how they are produced.

The concept of this visual method was introduced by Erwin Panovsky, an art historian who discovered homologies within a sample of diverse paintings of the same time period. Panovskys concept has been transferred into sociology in order to study visual material produced in everyday life (i.e. Bourdieu 1990, Bohnsack 2008).

The presentation starts discussing the visual methods of these studies, and how to implement them in protest (movement) research. The research potentials of this method, and how they are to be applied to visual protest material will be demonstrated by two examples: a) comparing political stencils and posters, and b) protest material conducted during Anti-Hartz IV protests in Germany.

Women's Transnational Networks

Vingelli, Giovanna

Department of Sociology and Political Science, University of Calabria Rende, Italy

Garreffa, Franca

Department of Sociology and Political Science, University of Calabria Rende, Italy

Keywords

Gender, transnational, movements

The emergence and diffusion of transnational networks working with a gender perspective is a relatively new phenomenon characterizing the last three decades with growing interest in gender studies, political science and sociology of social movements. "Transnational networks/organization" is a working definition: an umbrella term referring to organized advocacy groups that undertake voluntary collective action across state borders in pursuit of what they believe to be the wider public interest. (Keck & Sikkink, 1998; Snow et al. 1986, Tarrow 2001). A transnational dimension seems thus to be more fit to negotiate women's different conditions and interests - compared to traditional ones, whose actions remain limited to national arenas. Transnational networks facilitate the creation of policy expertise among activists, through the exchange of information and knowledge across borders, and relations with experts, and policy makers, in a milieu characterised by co-presence of insiders and outsiders sharing an interest in creating "global expertise". The main hypothesis is that the proliferation of newcomer organizations dilutes the traditional role of grass-roots groups and challenges their monopoly on the "production" and the praxis of gendered issues. Moreover, transnational organizations contribute in creating a global arena in which gender-related organizations become progressively professionalized and expert social networks. Is it possible to identify an optimum degree of closeness/distance from institutions to allow the organizations to reach their goals without the risk of being co-opted? How equal are the relationships between Northern and Southern members or within networks and coalitions? The aim of the research is to deal with such questions - focusing on transnational organizations' missions, activities and strategies - through carrying out exploratory research of women's/feminist transnational movements, in order to present the results of a quantitative survey, and the outcomes of a qualitative investigation.

RN26

Sociology of Social Policy

"Monkeys hang in trees, Ma'am." On the social construction of fear of and among urban youth in The Hague and Rotterdam, The Netherlands

Binken, Saskia

Urban Renewal and Housing, OTB Research Institute for Housing, Urban and Mobility Studies / Delft University of Technology Delft, The Netherlands

Blokland, Talja

*Stadt- und Regionalsoziologie, Institut für Sozialwissenschaften / Humboldt-Universität zu Berlin
Berlin, Germany*

Keywords

Youth, Public Space, ethnicity, urban fear, urban policy

Youth hanging out in urban public space is by no means a new phenomenon in the Netherlands. Yet, recently, these youths - particularly of ethnic origin - have become even more a matter of public concern than ever before. In response to this public fear the Netherlands witness a shift of urban policy to a more repressive model. There are, however, two peculiar empirical patterns that raise the question of effectiveness of more repressive policies towards urban youth in public space. First, statistically, the Dutch neighbourhoods targeted most intensely by these policies continue to show high degrees of feelings of fear. Second, the number of incidents between youth and police do not drop, but rise instead, affecting the crime and nuisance rates as statistically measured. This paper proposes four hypotheses which may explain these trends. First, relying on the work of Body-Gendrot and the literature on moral panics, we argue that feelings of safety may be explained through factors outside the actual interactions between urban youngsters and other residents, so that intervening in the behaviour of the first fails to produce the desired results. Second, we maintain that these youngsters are not isolated from the community so that treating them harsher does not have to affect the feelings of safety of others in a positive way, but may not affect them or affect them negatively. Third, relating to Wacquant's work, we propose that approaching them more repressively will increase their sense of social exclusion and the denial of their full citizenship and therefore increase - not decrease - their felt need to present themselves publicly. Finally, and adding to the perspective of Wacquant, being denied a status as full citizen affects the masculine behaviour between youths themselves, often resulting in violence and therefore confirming the moral panic about unsafe streets once more. We formulate these hypotheses drawing on empirical data from studies in disadvantaged neighbourhoods in Rotterdam and The Hague, two large urban centres in the Netherlands.

A Sociological Approach to Municipal Social Service in Spain

Arenas, Miguel

SOCIAL SERVICES, AYUNTAMIENTO DE AVILÉS -SPAIN-AVILÉS, ESPAÑA

Keywords

social control, focus group, municipal social services, disadvantaged social groups, social development.

In this proposal we made an approach to one of the primary care services more important in the social state and social policies, the Municipal Social Services (MSS), to meet within their horizon of action the most disadvantaged social groups. Our working hypothesis part from their recognizable ambivalence between stabilization and development in the welfare State in Spain, which makes them essential for an increasing proportion of the citizenry, and your institutional bureaucratic settings, little versatile and one accused of practicing control over the social spaces in which it has more influence, particularly to individuals and groups who require more support.

Thus, valuable and often urgent contribution to access to resources and social benefits now off the criticism and practices that seek to improve them, postponing the resolution of technical, organizational, and focus on the social responsibility to them. This will make a critical approach to the MSS, addressing some of its major problems, but also thinks about the potential improvements of the social rights of citizenship posed by the project of solidarity of the welfare State.

For the realization of this work we rely on the main results of an investigation based on Qualitative Perspective (Ibañez) and the Institutional Analysis (Loureau, Lapassade). Was conducted under the MSS of a medium city, structured similar to most of those in Spain, which were consulted workers and responsables for the service, according to levels of command, professions and area teams of social services.

Across Group Meetings (Focus Groups or Group Interviews) was an informative exploration to ascertain the main concerns and suggestions of workers and professionals. By using non-directive communication techniques, collecting and processing information (Habermas), were possible contributions on the "problems and possibilities of basic social services" to be structured and analyzed to contain, we think, comprehensive features and purpose, for services move towards more flexible and responsive to the social world.

Abandoned children in Russia: regional and municipal resources of the control

Lovtsova, Natalia

Social Anthropology and Social Work, Saratov State Technical University Saratov, Russian Federation

Keywords

child protection policy, abandoned children, social policy reform, region resources, inter-agency collaboration

Social policy administrative reform in Russia has strengthened powers of regions to define priorities of social policy and to distribute resources, both material, and administrative, between the administrative bodies, taking part in social problems resolution. Many regions in Russia see the situation with the growing level of abandoned children as one of the most urgent social problem. However the financial status of region essentially influences resources which municipalities possess for realization of preventive actions in this sphere. Transfer of significant proportion of the responsibility for the social orphans problem resolution from the federal level to the regional and further, to the municipal ones, minimizes the effectiveness of administrative bodies and social services efforts, acting in the regions with deficit budgets. This paper addresses three major questions: (1) What is adequate and purposeful strategy of the state in the sphere of child maltreatment control? This includes a discussion on the macro forces determining the coordination of different social agents efforts. (2) What are opportunities and resources of the region in conditions when conflicting administrative interests not always promote the precise organization of preventive actions? This part analyses the role of social agents involved in the child protection policy measures directed on the social orphans level decreasing. (3) How does a system of inter-agency collaboration address the contradictory interests of the parents, abandoned child, social agents in the community with limited resources and increasing level of the risk families? By analyzing results of inter-agency collaboration case-study connections will be drawn between the macro and micro factors influencing effective prevention of child maltreatment as well as adequate level of intervention. At conclusion this paper shows spheres of contradictions in the state and region child protection policy as well as resources for its optimization.

Cash-for-care policies impacting on user-careworker relationships

Christensen, Karen

Department of Sociology, University of Bergen Bergen, Norway

Keywords

disabled people., Cash-for-care, relationships, personal assistants

This paper explores how different cash-for-care systems within different socio-political systems impact on the kind of relationships that develop between the cash-for-care receiver and the care worker. This new social policy termed cash-for-care has recently been introduced in many European countries. The policy allows local authorities to pay people who are assessed as eligible for social services cash instead of care and they can then employ their own care workers. The paper's discussion will be based on a small-scale qualitative in-depth study of experiences of cash-for-care in everyday life within two different cash-for-care systems: the UK, representing a liberal welfare regime and Norway representing a social democratic welfare regime. In both these countries the majority of users so far consist of physically disabled people while the majority of the care workers consist of unqualified women. While, traditionally, the policies of social services have produced paternalistic professional-client relationships the new cash-for-care policy deeply challenges this kind of relationship by empowering the previously traditional non-participating dependent role of the welfare client. Research in this area has so far mainly been directed at the users while only limited attention has been paid to the relationships developed from this new policy. The cross-national UK-Norway study reveals the development of three different kinds of relationships: an emotional solidarity-oriented relationship in which reciprocal understanding and sympathy between members of two social subordinated groups (disabled people and care workers) are central aspects, a professional relationship based on regulated working conditions and agreements, and a master-servant relationship in which the user fully controls, directs and subordinates the care worker. The study suggests that the structural organisation of the Norwegian cash-for-care model gives an impetus to the professional relationship while the UK's organisation rather directs the relationships towards either emotional solidarity or exploitation. In the European cash-for-care debate this study points at the need to explore further the different relationships produced by different ways of implementing cash-for-care systems.

Changes in the gender order - work/family change and policy reform in Scandinavia

Leira, Arnlaug

*Department of Sociology and Human Geography, University of Oslo
Oslo, Norway*

Keywords

politicisation of childcare, feminisation of workforce, familisation of fathers

During the latter half of the 20th century in the western industrialised world the gender order of the industrial era was crumbling, the gender-differentiated nuclear family gave way to new family forms, and, gradually, the arrangement between family, labour market and welfare state was transformed.

This paper examines the reconceptualisation and redesign of work/family policies that took place in Scandinavia from the 1970s into the early 2000s: a series of policy reforms introduced a renegotiation and redrawing of the boundaries between the public and the private - between the state and parents. The work/family policy discourse shifted to put the care of young children centre stage in policies advocating the dual aim of reconciling work and family and promoting gender equality. Increasingly, work/family policy came to include not just parental responsibilities but also the care-related social rights of parents and children. In legislation, the caring father became the companion parent of the working mother. - The paper analyses two waves of policy reforms in the 1970s and 1990s in Denmark, Finland, Norway and Sweden. Focus is on three sets of policies directed towards working parents - namely the legislation of parental leave, state-sponsoring of childcare services, and institution of cash grants for childcare. In conclusion the paper discusses the interplay of family change and policy reform and considers the welfare state contribution to changing gender relations in work and family.

Community, Social Capital and Housing in Lisbon Neighbourhood

Xerez, Romana

*Social Policy, Instituto Superior de Ciências Sociais e Políticas
Lisbon, Portugal*

Keywords

social network analysis, regeneration, Welfare State, social capital, community

This paper analyses the significance of housing neighbourhood ties in community through a theoretical and practical perspective, community building in Lisbon neighbourhood. It also reports the relevance of community to the welfare state in recent urban policy trend. In the age of proclamation of the decline of social capital by some researches, this paper provides significant data that proves the strength of bonding and bridging in a Lisbon neighbourhood and its relevance to social policy theory and practice. Social scientists have been researching the lost, the emergence and community as social networks. The social capital perspective is rooted in sociology and grounded in the observation that social networks have value. It can be found in different sources such as: family, friendship, co-workers, social clubs or neighbourhood. How is the perspective of a declining social capital affecting communities? How do sociologists differ from other social scientists in social capital scores? How do trust and participation matter in social networks? The paper addresses this research question through the literature review and practical research conducted in the city of Lisbon. Research reports data collected mainly in 2007 from ethnographic observation, in-depth interviews, focus groups and survey (N = 402). This article investigates the significance of neighbourhood ties in housing, community and civic engagement. It shows high level of neighbours: trust, social capital and community engagement. It confirms the pioneer relevance of this seminal urban design bairro during the 40s and 50s and its housing diversity and neighbourhood unities with relevance to present territory social cohesion and neighbours satisfaction. Results underscore the social significance of Lisbon neighbours ties in European comparative perspective.

Critical Junctions of State and Citizenship: A Case of Early Retirement of Military Personnel in Post-war Croatia

Soh, Damir

Department of Sociology, Center for Croatian Studies, University of Zagreb, Croatia Zagreb, Croatia

Keywords

citizenship, former military personnel, post-socialist state transformations

First steps toward democracy and market economy in Croatia were taken during the 1991-1995 war for independence. Period during and after the war was marked by mass migration, increases in poverty and unemployment, corruption, and general feeling of uncertainty. Many citizens became soldiers over night; some were mobilized, while most volunteered. In the post-war years, some war veterans who were eligible to retire left the Military forces, while a significant number of them remained active as military personnel. After the elections in 2000, under pressure from the World Bank and IMF, Croatian government decided to downsize its military sector. Military budget exceeded the needs of the peace-time period. A set of measures was introduced to facilitate the process of downsizing the military. Law concerning military personnel entitlements changed, the early retirement scheme was introduced, while a number of requalification programs were designed to help those who retire early. From 2002 until 2006, after being deemed as non-perspective workforce within the military, approximately 13.000 servicemen decided to retire early and were off to find a second, civic career. This brought along new uncertainties for them. They were entitled to a monthly compensation until they find a new job by using the existing state mechanisms. There is no data as yet on how many people actually found new jobs, and how effective requalification programs were.

This research is driven by the following question: "How does the state restructuring process interact with the experience of being a citizen in post-socialist, post-war context?" The answer to the research question will be sought in a two-level analysis. First level is about the early retired military personnel narratives on their life history obtained through semi-structured interviews. The emphasis is placed on the period immediately before and following their retirement. Second level deals with an analysis of the legislation regulating their formal entitlements and consequent social policy solutions. Early retired military servicemen seem to be particularly suited for this research because they played a vital role in establishing the Croatian state, while the state consequently rendered them as superfluous and applied a set of questionable policy solutions.

Education must be relevant - Europe's soft channels of influence

Randhahn, Solveig

Institute for Political Science, Westfälische Wilhelms-Universität Münster Münster, Germany

Keywords

Welfare State change, education policy, Social Policy

Education Policy is a key issue of the Lisbon strategy, aimed at making the EU "the most dynamic and competitive knowledge-based economy in the world" (Lisbon European Council 2000). - This is an ambitious goal, but how and to what extent do the member states consider this aim in their national education political agenda?

The EU tries to influence the national education and social policies by soft channels like the open method of coordination, benchmarking projects, financial support or political recommendations. Through these, the basic concept of an activating social policy is to be transported.

This development includes the question whether and to what extent these influences are considered in national education policies. In this context, causalities cannot be analysed, yet possible influences and their effects on national education policies.

The paper discusses this question, investigating the example of Germany. Due to the federal structure in Germany, there is a formal separation of social and education policy. Changes in social and economic processes (including the process of Europeanization) provoke a changing relevance of education policy for the recalibration of the welfare state which fits into the concept of an activating social policy.

These developments lead to the hypothesis that Germany is characterised by increasing cross-sectional policies in the education and social policy sector with the purpose to reach a new balance between old and new social risks in Germany. This assumption includes two research questions that are to be examined in this paper: To what extent does the supranational level of the EU influence the German education sector and how is this mirrored in the education policy concepts of the German federal states? What are the consequences of such transnational effects for the national welfare state, in this case the German welfare state?

In addition to the direct impact of European directives, especially soft forms of influence are to be considered. The effects are examined by case studies of individual German federal states. This analysis aims to draw a current picture of the changes between education and social policies in Germany, with particular consideration of possible influences from the European level.

Fertility and public policies: trends and challenges

Cabrita, Miguel

*Department of Sociology, ISCTE
Lisbon, Portugal*

Keywords

fertility, decision-making, SOCIAL POLICIES, demographic change, family policies

Low fertility is one of the main determinants of population ageing, in the context of the deep-rooted demographic changes that have been taking place in recent decades in most countries across Europe and also other parts of the globe. The widespread and systematic decline of fertility rates, which has serious implication for the sustainability of social and welfare configurations, has acquired increasing centrality in social and political agendas and, conversely, a new visibility in public and social policies. This presentation seeks to (a) identify key aspects of demographic changes concerning fertility trends and their consequences, (b) map factors and fields that are usually identified as contributing to these changes and (c) focus on policy trends in order to discuss the options and implications of policy developments. Policies concerning fertility are discussed in the context of family policies and in the wider framework of social policy. The complexity of fertility issues and policies is underlined, namely to stress how they are deeply related to different social and policy fields. These, however plural, result in variable conditions for the decision-making processes of individuals and families. It is argued that this perspective provides an important focal point for policy design and assessment, as well as for a more general reflection on fertility trends.

Fertility Choices and Childcare Availability in Portugal

Gomes, Cristina Sousa

*Ciências, Sociais Jurídicas e Políticas, Universidade de Aveiro
Aveiro, Portugal*

Oliveira, Isabel Tiago de

*Métodos Quantitativos, ISCTE
Lisboa, Portugal*

Pinto, Maria Luís Rocha

*Ciências Sociais, Jurídicas e Políticas, Universidade de Aveiro
Aveiro, Portugal*

Keywords

childcare, fertility, female employment

In Portugal, as in the other South European countries, both fertility and family friendly policies are challenging. The familialistic societies in South Europe put the most of the childbearing responsibility within the family, particularly on the women, while in the northern European countries a set of family friend policies had been developed in the last decade. At the same time, in almost all European societies, the female participation in the labour market had increased. In the southern European countries, the combination between the familialistic cultures with the current trends of female work had result in a double burden for women associated with the lower levels of fertility.

Within this context, the availability of childcare in the first years of life is one of the most important points to the conciliation between work and family.

In Portugal the rate of children, between 3 to 5 years, enrolled in childcare had a most significant increase: it was near 27% in the mid 80's and it is around 77% in 2003/4. Nevertheless, this tendency was not followed by any recuperation in the fertility levels. This apparent paradox is associated with the multidimensional scope of the fertility drivers. The low levels of fertility are associated with the postponement of motherhood (and the tempo effects in the current indexes), the increase in job instability, high costs of the housing market, and other factors.

The purpose of this analysis is to understand the impact of childcare availability on fertility levels and on the postponement of motherhood, using a quantitative insight as a basis to the analytical discussion. In view of the fact that regional fertility is associated with a set of different other factors; we apply multivariate models to understand the impact of the childcare availability in fertility, in the presence of a diversity of social and economic environments. The main hypothesis we want to verify with this research is about the association between higher levels of fertility and the actual implementation of family friend settings, particularly the childcare availability.

Grey Markets for elder care: Preconditions and ambivalences

Dallinger, Ursula

Sociology, University Trier Trier, Germany

Keywords

Migration, care, European enlargement, service society

In ageing European societies with a growing demand for care services for the elderly a new development can be observed since some years: "Grey care markets" are emerging. On the one hand elderly people in need of care and their families demand (grey) care services, enabled by the introduction of payment for care that many European countries introduced and the new aim of creating a customer, choosing own care arrangements. On the other hand migrants, usually women, offer their care services to a lower price than care can be bought on national formal labour markets, enabled by open frontiers in Europe. Usually the quality problems of "cheap care" and the problems with labour regulation are discussed. But my contribution will discuss grey care markets under the perspective of different path in a service economy. It will analyse the interplay between the options and strategies of families resp. elder people in need of care on the one hand and the institutional frame mainly set by social policies. It conceives grey care markets as unintended result of open borders, and wage gaps between countries. Elderly people in need of care and their families are actors, that partly undergo the original aims of care policies - to set incentives for informal care networks - and transform cash for care in their sense. They act like economic actors, that use comparative cost advantages of the migrants and the resources, they receive by the welfare state. Grey care markets especially emerge in countries with a strong cultural norm of family responsibility for elder care, where the public service sector is weak and where the intermediary sector is strong. The paper will discuss grey care markets on the background of differing path into service economy as Iversen/Crusack or Esping-Andersen described them. The paper thus contributes to the issue "New markets in old societies", mentioned in the call for papers, and shows economic behaviour of private households, leading to transnational care.

Incapacitated or unemployed? Welfare and employment policy - The German approach in an international perspective

Dornette, Johanna

Joblessness and Social Inclusion, Institute of Employment Research Nuernberg, Germany

Konle-Seidl, Regina

International Comparisons and European Integration, Institute for Employment Research Nuernberg, Germany

Rauch, Angela

Joblessness and Social Inclusion, Institute for Employment Research Nuernberg, Germany

Keywords

Welfare State, unemployment, activation policy, welfare delivery

In many European countries there are rising numbers of people, which rely on work incapacity benefits as their main source of income. Germany is an exception with constantly low rates of work incapacity benefit recipients. If one looks at OECD data, the compositions of the 'benefit dependent' populations in Europe differ vastly by benefit category. While France is leading in granting old age pensions before the age of 65, most incapacity or sickness benefits are granted in Denmark and Germany scores top in benefits related to unemployment.

Three causes are commonly mentioned that explain the cross-national variation: demographics, health and institutions. The first argument claims that countries with an older population have higher prevalence of work incapacity benefit receipt. The second claims that differences in physical and mental health explain why incapacity benefits are taken more frequently in some countries than in others. The third relates to incentive effects of the incapacity benefit systems, which significantly increase the uptake of incapacity benefit provisions. Studies provide evidence that internationally highly different incapacity rates cannot be attributed to differences in health status or demographic factors alone but appear to be primarily caused by institutional differences.

The availability of work incapacity and unemployment benefits in Germany depends on the ascription of work ability. Every person that is assessed capable to work at least three hours a day has no access to work incapacity benefits but to qualification or activation schemes that aim at labour market integration. In consequence, those persons remain in the system of labour market benefits. So in Germany the rates of long-term unemployment are relatively high, compared to other countries. While other Europeans are incapacitated, Germans are unemployed.

In the paper we discuss factors that shape the pathways into employment, unemployment or incapacity benefit in Germany taking into account institutional differences in other European countries. Thereby access to medical and vocational rehabilitation schemes, to employment integration support and other governmental initiatives as well as self-ascriptions and individual preferences will be taken into account.

Informational Capital and European Social Policy: Knowledge Production, Accumulation of Symbolic Power and the Cognitive Unification of Europe

Bernhard, Stefan

Labour Market Policy, Institute for Employment Research Nürnberg, Germany

Keywords

Social Exclusion/Social Inclusion, Pierre Bourdieu, European Integration, political sociology, Sociology of Social Policy

This contribution deals with the link between European Social Policy, the production of statistical knowledge, and the cognitive unification of Europe. Social policy in the EU does not only take the form of decision-making, collective agreements, or policy coordination but is also and increasingly concerned with knowledge production. The expansion of the statistical infrastructure is particularly striking in this respect. The refinement of quantified information on the economic and social state of the Union constitutes EU-wide problems as well as common European challenges. Using Pierre Bourdieu's sociology we can say that the EU accumulates symbolic power in the form of Informational Capital. This capital allows for performative acts, which lead to symbolic representations of Europe as a single social and economic space. Thus, on the cognitive level the production of Informational Capital prepares the advent of a European society.

A case study of the development of social indicators in the field of poverty and social exclusion policy exemplifies the dynamic and efficacy of this transnational form of power. From the very first attempts to establish a European policy on poverty in the 1970s adequate knowledge about the "real extent" of poverty in Europe was a key issue. Over time conceptual innovations - like the replacement of the concept of poverty by the concept of social exclusion - have inspired an expansive dynamic of knowledge production. The development of theoretical claims (e.g. dimensions of social exclusion) triggered the development and improvement of measuring instruments (e.g. indicators for the number of people living in jobless households or the share of early school leavers). Consequently, issues covered by European statistical representations are now ranging from health to homelessness. With every new indicator and with every further EU document describing the social situation in Europe our practical capacity to perceive of Europe as a unified entity with genuine European properties advances. Hence, building a European statistical infrastructure is an important aspect of the unification of Europe.

The contribution presents results from a Ph.D. on the sociology of European policies on poverty, social exclusion, and inclusion, which I completed in December 2008.

Innovation against crisis: supported employment programs for socially excluded people

Cabrera, Pedro José

*Sociology and Social Work, Universidad Comillas Madrid
Madrid, Spain*

Keywords

methodology, Social exclusion, Supported Employment, Best Practices

At this moment a very strong impact over labor market is the first and main consequence in Spain of the economic crisis. Unemployment rate has grown up from 8.6% at the end of 2007 to 13.91% finishing 2008. In front of this worrying scenario, we need to apply innovative methodologies in the work to social inclusion. In this paper we analyze the results of a program managed by a NGO in Madrid in collaboration with the Regional Government and financed by the European Social Fund. They has make use of Supported Employment methodology largely applied with handicapped people, but adapted to the specific field of social exclusion: homeless, immigrants, battered women, etc. At the end of their first year we analyze registered data, offering the positive impact over the life of excluded people after an external evaluation process using discussion groups, and focused interviews to clients, social workers, and human resources managers of companies participating in the project. A reviewed social intervention model it is also suggested, after comparing this local experience with some others European good practices of SI working with social excluded groups that could be useful in the context of public social policies design.

Migration policy in a transnational European context: uses of the Voluntary Return Program among the Brazilian community in Portugal, Belgium and Ireland

Góis, Pedro

*CES, Universidade de Coimbra
Coimbra, Portugal*

Coêlho, Christiane

*CIES, ISCTE
Lisboa, Portugal*

Keywords

europe, Social Policy, voluntary return, Brazilian immigration

European policies regarding migration will be analysed through the study of the Voluntary Return Program (AVR) of the International Organization for Migration (IOM), which is financed by the European Union and the governments of several European countries. The first years of the 21st century have been characterised by the growing use of this program among Brazilian immigrants in Portugal, Belgium and Ireland. The data on this community will be analysed comparatively between these three countries in order to sketch a transnational panorama of migratory flows in parts of Europe.

Needs in Portugal - Tradition and Emerging Trends. A discussion for the XXIst century

Guerra, Isabel

*Departamento de Sociologia, CET/ISCTE - Centro de Estudos Territoriais do Instituto Superior de Ciências do Trabalho e da Empresa
Lisboa, Portugal*

Pinto, Teresa

*Departamento de Sociologia, CET/ISCTE - Centro de Estudos Territoriais do Instituto Superior de Ciências do Trabalho e da Empresa
Lisboa, Portugal*

Almeida, Sara

*TESE - Social Innovation Programme, TESE - Associação para o Desenvolvimento
Lisboa, Portugal*

Martins, Marta

*TESE - Social Innovation Programme, TESE - Associação para o Desenvolvimento
Lisboa, Portugal*

Keywords

Social Policy, opportunities, quality of life, capabilities, Need

Reflecting on the impacts of contemporary changes in Portuguese society - recognizing both the improvement in human development, as well as the persistent and the new borderlines that challenge traditional development models and shape risk, poverty and social exclusion phenomena - this communication aims to present the results of a Study about non satisfied and unmet needs in nowadays' Portugal.

Anticipating the eventual negative effects of perceptions of unsatisfying needs over quality of life, trust and social cohesion, these results pay particular attention to the latent and emergent trends that, currently and at a near future, disturb and impair the optimization of opportunities in individual and collective life.

By confronting a game in which aspirations and expectations play a simultaneous role of mediators and drivers in a relationship established between Capabilities and Opportunities, the theoretical frame underlying the investigation attempts to go beyond traditional dichotomies.

Needs are operationally considered as generative and dynamic processes, found at a conciliation of two analytically and practically different dimensions: a subjective one - related to a set of multidimensional perceptions of absence or lack of something wanted; and a socially objectified dimension, associated to a set of physical, psychic or social harms, these latter, socially and/or individually identified and recognized as practical manifestations of states of absence (or neediness).

By relation to an analysis of objective constraints and claims about well-being and quality of life, the eventual transformations in the needs' patterns manifested among the diversity of individuals and territories were extensively and intensively explored throughout: a collection and analyses of statistical information from a selected set of secondary sources; an application of a questionnaire about perceptions of neediness and harms, representative of the opinions of residents in continental Portugal; and the exploratory study of cases, selected by their potential enlightening of actually latent and dormant needs and future severe social problems.

This last approach to the field, allowed illustrating and clarifying the factors that shape the complex relationship (and the eventual dysfunctions) between planning and provision mechanisms to Need, and its complete satisfaction by the individuals and the subject groups of social policy.

Obstacles to gender symmetry - the controversy over parental leave reform in Norway

Ellingsæter, Anne Lise

*Sociology and Human Geography, University of Oslo
Oslo, Norway*

Keywords

Norway, parental leave, GENDER symmetry

The policy institutions of the Nordic welfare states have come a long way toward the dual earner/dual carer model, which is why the Nordic countries serve as notable "exemplars" in current debates of institutional reform for gender equality. Paid parental leave arrangements are considered a crucial element of this model, and a particularly important measure in transforming the gender division of labour within the family. The Nordic countries have been the first taking steps in the direction of mandate sharing of leave - by introducing the daddy quotas. While most attention is directed at the outcomes - and the pitfalls - of the current leave systems, this paper examines obstacles to move parental leave policies further toward mandate equal sharing: Further expansion of the daddy quota has been a much debated topic in recent years in Norway and Sweden, but with little political success. Reasons for this impasse are addressed in this paper. The public debate in 2008 in Norway ensuing a proposal from a government commission on equal pay constitutes an especially informative case in that respect. The commission proposed a three-part leave division within the current leave arrangement, following the so-called "Icelandic model": one part for the mother, one for the father, and one to be shared at the parents' discretion. Main arguments against reserving more time for fathers were "parental choice" and the "best interest of the child" - that the child gets to spend as long time as possible at home under parental care, and that the child is being breastfed according to the recommendation of health authorities. The analysis concentrates on the different positions taken by political actors and interest groups, investigating in particular the underlying conceptions of equal parenthood.

Policies and Public Opinion - An (un)clear Relation

Calca, Patrícia

*Centre for Research and Studies in Sociology (CIES) - ISCTE, Centre for Research and Studies in Sociology (CIES) - ISCTE
Lisbon, Portugal*

Jerónimo, Paula

*Centre for Research and Studies in Sociology (CIES) - ISCTE, Centre for Research and Studies in Sociology (CIES) - ISCTE
Lisbon, Portugal*

Keywords

society, Portugal, public opinion, Government, policies

What sort of policies exists in Portugal? Could we establish a continuum of policy implementation by key-sectors? Are Portuguese policies a result of a "structural" or of an "environmental" bigger strategy, or are both? Portuguese governments launch different policies according with their constitutive ideologies? These are some of the questions that we can ask if we consider the study of policies in Portugal.

In our paper we aim to present some correlational work related with implemented Portuguese policies. Using the European Social Survey (ESS) data and, analysing governmental programs, government law-making, and other political documents, generate and in exercise during the ESS rounds years (2002; 2004; 2006), we will try to understand the relation between Portuguese public opinion about key ESS aspects and existent policies.

Having the three ESS rounds' as statistic support, we will explore Portuguese Political Satisfaction using indicators as "Satisfaction with Education", "Satisfaction with Health", "Satisfaction with Economy", "Satisfaction with Government" and "Satisfaction with Democracy".

We will try to be aware of the policies path during the referred period of time, and likewise, we will attempt to employ an index that uses all the indicators that we previously identified.

Quality of jobs in the sector of elderly care: is there any solution?

Loïc, TRABUT

Department Sciences Sociales (ENS), Institution Centre Maurice Halbwachs (EHESS/ENS) & Centre d'étude de l'emploi Noisy-le-Grand, France

Keywords

Social Policy, care, labour market, elders, professional training

Professional Elderly care is one of the most difficult professions. Part-time work, a low salary per hour and a spread time schedule characterize it. Placed between social politics and employment politics, these jobs are affected by reforms, which are aiming at guaranteeing permanent care as well as at increasing the quality of the jobs.

The guarantee of permanent care is characterized by an increase of the financial help to the person in need of care through the public policy of the personalized allowance for autonomy (Allocation personnalisée à l'Autonomie). Since 2002 this allowance allows to finance a certain part of care done by professionals. The increase of quality is attempted by professionnalisation, through professional training, in particular the state diploma of social life helper (Diplôme d'état d'auxiliaire de vie).

The French care sector is structured in three ways, all of them defined by the legal status of the labour relation. In representative order, we find the "provider way" first (this means that the elderly pay an organisation to provide care); the second one, is « direct employment » (the elderly is the employer of the care worker) and the third one, the "mandate way" (this means that the elderly hire the professional care-worker, but an organisation takes care of the administrative tasks).

Recent research on the quality of work in the professional care work opposes these 3 forms of working contracts in order to show the difference of quality that is inherent to them. We will argue that quality of these jobs is not consubstantial to the legal statute but to the main characteristics of the care activity, and the way it is defined by the social politics.

By analysing the workers' time schedules, the care plan defined by the public policy and ethnographic interviews conducted in a French district, we will show that work characteristics and definitions are more significant than legal status to define quality. Furthermore we will show that the attempt of professionnalisation takes the wrong turn, as specialising the worker in a certain kind of tasks can negatively impact the quality of professional care.

Rural Social Sphere: Development Processes and Policy Technologies in Russia

Sergiyenko, Aliye

*Institute of Economics and Industrial Engineering, Siberian Branch of the Russian Academy of Sciences
Barnaul, Russia*

Keywords

Social Policy, rural social sphere, social trends, welfare standards

The paper presents the findings of rural social sphere trends and mechanisms since 1992 in Russia. Special attention was paid to modern processes in people income and employment spheres, social infrastructure dynamics, demographic reproduction and migration streams, peculiarities of nation state and local social policies in rural areas. The findings based on quota sample inquiries of rural inhabitants differing on gender, age, places of employment and residence (N=1011, 2008; N= 1100, 2002) and expert questionings of local authorities and heads of agricultural enterprises and social organizations (N=222, 2008; N = 25, 2004; N=53, 2002). Last research was conducted in two Russian regions (Altai krai and Altai Republic) under finance support of Russian Foundation for the Humanities (grant "07-03-00321").

The profound changes in rural social sphere trends for last almost two decades of nation state and municipal reforms has been showing in concentration of poverty and unemployment, social infrastructure worsening, various human rights violations in spheres of income payment and labor conditions, low economical activities of rural inhabitants, ineffective using of modern social policy technologies by government bodies, imperfection of their interactions with rural business structures and public organizations in the field of social policy.

A rating of main rural social challenges was revealed, leaders of them are the following: extremely low wages and pensions under impetuous growth on consumer prices, lack of workplaces, especially for youth, alcoholism and drug addiction spreading, neediness of elementary public utilities, large social differentiation, intensive migration of young people from rural areas.

The rural social sphere shifts for yeas of 2000s were unidirectional, mixed picture of non-system reforms was revealed. On the one hand reduction of cultural and consumer service organizations has been continuing that partly was impacted by imperfection of federal and local self-government reforms, and as a result greater lack of financial resources for social development was become to feel. On the other hand some positive changes in welfare standards, education, and public health, demographic reproduction were appeared because of national projects and federal social programs implementation. Main directions and technologies of social policy on rural social development are presented in the paper.

Social Economy and social enterprises in the European Union. The case of the Spanish region of Aragón

del Negro, Grazia

Psicología y Sociología, Universidad de Zaragoza Zaragoza, España

Keywords

economy, social enterprises, social cohesion's role

Social Economy is a complex, heterogeneous, dynamic and flexible sector that contributes to rectify three major labour market imbalances: unemployment, job instability and the social and labour exclusion of the unemployed. Within it, there is the particularly interesting sphere of the social enterprises, that are organizations subjected to a double tension: on the one hand, they have to participate in the market, so they must compete with other firms and be viable in terms of price, cost and quality; on the other hand, they want to be a means of social inclusion by means of employment. Moreover, they are organizations combining income from sales or fees from users with public subsidies linked to their social mission and private donations and/or volunteering. The concept of social enterprise, it first appeared in Italy, where it was promoted by a journal entitled Impresa sociale launched in 1990. The concept was introduced at the time to designate the pioneering initiatives for which the Italian Parliament created the legal form of "social cooperative" one year later. Straight after, other European countries have passed new laws to promote social enterprises.

This contribution focuses on the social economy like a phenomenon that has gained a larger institutional consideration and that is more and more present in the politic discussion and in the economic speech. After an introductory part to introduce concept and evolution of social economy across Europe, it shows a possible way by which social economy expresses itself, through the particular case of social enterprises in Aragón; to finish reflecting upon the key challenges social enterprises are facing, and upon the social cohesion's role that social economy's sector is called to carry out.

Social Intervention and the Financing State: Trick or Treat?

Nunes, Madalena

CTPP, IDT

Matosinhos, Portugal

Keywords

economic subordination, negotiation, local knowledge, social helpers

SOCIAL INTERVENTION AND THE FINANCING STATE: TRICK OR TREAT?

This presentation is part of the work developed in order to obtain the master in Sociology. It aims to analyze the negotiations (Strauss: 1992) between the public entities and the organizations that receive subventions to act in the social sphere.

Nowadays, state delegates more and more social service tasks in non-profit organizations. It finances these organizations so that they may accomplish the public responsibility of enhancing the quality of life deprived people. The economic subordination may undermine the desirable autonomy of these organizations (Hespanha: 2000).

This paper explores the ways organizations deal with public control and "trick" dependency, using their local knowledge (Geertz: 1993).

Social Policy and Individual Responsibility

Neves, Tiago

CIIE - Centro de INvestigação e Intervenção Educativas, Faculdade de Psicologia e de Ciências da Educação da Universidade do Porto
Porto, Portugal

Silvestre, Agostinho

ADILO, Agência de Desenvolvimento Integrado de Lordelo do Ouro
Porto, Portugal

Keywords

Social Policy, individual responsibility, Welfare State, Securitarian State

The risk society (Beck, 1997) - which follows the decadence of the Welfare State and its promises - calls on reflexivity and individual responsibility in order to keep control over life processes. Whereas social policies in the Welfare State had an essentially redistributive, solidary, universal, de-territorialized nature, in the so-called risk society they tend to be grounded on the principles of risk management, territorialized intervention and individual responsibility. This individual responsibility, however, refers more to fulfilling obligations as defined by the State than to the development of moral and social agency. It is no surprise, then, that the beneficiaries of social policies are increasingly forced to sign contracts with the State. In such contracts they commit themselves to taking part in social inclusion programs. This means, for example, that they need to design their life-projects together with a social worker, to take part in training activities if they cannot get a job, to make sure their children go to school, and agree to home visits by social workers. The trouble with this approach is that it rests on an atomistic view of society. Here, social policies seem to be more oriented to managing individual life-trajectories and minimizing risks than to maximizing social justice or introducing structural social changes. So, the fostering of individual responsibility these new social policies claim to involve is actually quite feeble: without being framed by collective goals and collective hopes, individual responsibility is quite sterile and powerless. Also, contractual obligations can be fulfilled without any significant development of moral and social agency. That is why, rather than changing the social condition of the beneficiaries, such policies actually tend to generate great dependence of individuals on State programs. Social policies then run the risk of becoming more oriented to keeping things as they are than to introducing change, and the Welfare State runs the risk of being replaced by a Securitarian State (Castel, 2003).

- Beck, U. (1997) Risk Society: Towards a New Modernity. London: Sage.

- Castel, R. (2003) L'Insécurité Social - Qu'est-ce Qu'être Protégé? Paris: Éditions du Seuil.

Spending into poverty. The impact of social assistance schemes on asset accumulation among low-income households in 12 European countries

Avram, Silvia

*Social and Political Sciences, European University Institute
San Domenico di Fiesole, Italy*

Keywords

assets, inequality, Poverty, social assistance

Generally, research on poverty and inequality has restricted itself to investigating income distribution patterns. Very little attention has been directed towards assets and wealth. Yet, while less important for everyday consumption, the assets one possesses might heavily impact on one's life chances, whether through providing a cushion for times of financial adversity or enabling investment. Although, clearly related to income, accumulation processes have a dynamic of their own. Previous studies have found that not only is wealth inequality several times larger than income disparity, but that the wealth gap can increase dramatically even when income inequality diminishes (Shapiro 2001).

Social policies have long constituted the main tool through which public intervention affected the income distribution. They have played a much less visible role in affecting patterns of wealth buildup. Yet, their potential in this respect is undoubtedly substantial. This paper sets out to investigate the impact that social assistance schemes have on asset accumulation among the poor. Social assistance programs are designed as a last resort safeguard against destitution. As such, they cannot be expected to significantly boost wealth among the poor. However, depending on how they define eligibility, they can actually diminish resources for the poor they can trigger a "spending" of assets, which may be harmful for low-income households in the long-run and actually make transition to self-reliance more difficult.

Using the EU-SILC database, eight Central European countries are analyzed. To facilitate comparison, a further four West European countries have been added, based on previous classifications of social assistance schemes (de Neubourg, Castonguay and Roelen 2007; Eardley et al. 1996; Gough et al. 1997). Results show that social assistance does little to prevent poor households from having to spend their asset resources. On the contrary, the results suggest that programs select their clients based on the absence of such resources and thus may be conveying negative incentives. Moreover, social assistance payments do not have a positive impact on the poor households' likelihood of having debts. Nonetheless, significant country variation exists. Schemes that are more decentralized and more discretionary have the strongest negative effects.

Structural Transformations of Russian Society and Challenges for Social Policy

Sidorina, Tatiana

*philosophy, Higher School of Economics
Moscow, Russia*

Keywords

marginalization, Social Policy, society, state, structural transformations

Structural Transformations of Russian Society and Challenges for Social Policy

Sidorina Tatiana (Higher School of Economics, Russia, Moscow)

Contemporary Russian society has gone through serious structural transformations over the last two decades. There appeared new strata and phenomena: "the new rich", "the new poor", "new financial and political elite", social exclusion etc.

Formally the objects of social policy remained the same. However if formerly the first place among objects of social policy was taken by citizens (households), who could not provide for themselves an adequate level of income (disabled people, invalids, pensioners, families with many children, young people and so on), now this list has been considerably extended. The process of total marginalization of the population of Russia in 1980-1990-ies resulted in extreme poverty of able-bodied citizens.

Alongside with this there appeared in Russia new strata which enter the higher income groups. The representatives of these strata have their own requirements for the new social policy: social stability, opportunity to buy elite housing, modernization of medical care system and system of education, provision of future pensions, creation of reliable savings system.

All this is a challenge for the Russian social policy and the Russian state, because it inherited a society which was very complicated in its structure and this situation is becoming more complicated as the social problems of the population have remained unsolved for decades in the absence of a well-founded concept taking into account the specific features of Russia.

The de-institutionalization of the mental patients and the alternatives for local caring: models of public policy

Hespanha, Pedro

*University of Coimbra, Center for Social Studies
Coimbra, Portugal*

Keywords

mental health, de-institutionalization, social networks for caring

The process of de-institutionalization of the mental patients has known innumerable obstacles and delays but it finally seems to be starting, as much in Portugal as in Brazil. This paper intends to contribute for a comparative analysis of the processes of psychiatric reform in the two countries, identifying both the sources of resistance and obstacles and factors of progress, political conjunctures and means mobilized in each country to generate a renewed model of caring for mental patients.

It will trace the evolution of policies, identifying their premises and outcomes; identifying care producers and their modes of operation at present; analysing the impact of deinstitutionalization on mental health care and evaluating families' capacity to provide care; and identifying the factors that obstruct or facilitate the implementation of the philosophy of deinstitutionalization

Starting from the theses on the welfare mix, and bearing in mind the specificities of Southern European countries, and particularly Portugal, the study seeks to test the following hypotheses: 1. State action is characterized by weakness and inefficacy; 2. The action of the family and primary social networks is characterized by flexibility and efficacy; 3. Policies show a discrepancy between premises and outcomes; 4. Policies have been following the model of deinstitutionalization, but have not actually put it into practice; 5. Deinstitutionalization entails a burden for families.

The impact of the individualization process on the social policy

Kubicki, Pawel

*Institute of Social Economy, Warsaw School of Economics
Warsaw, Poland*

Olcon-Kubicka, Marta

*Faculty of Humanities, Warsaw University of Life Sciences
Warsaw, Poland*

Keywords

individualization, new communities, local social policy

There is an assumption in the modern sociological debate that Western societies are more individualized as a result of the modernization process. People become emancipated from communities which once had defined their place in the society. In the first phase of individualization an disembeddement from communités of descent could have been observed; in the second phase a diminution of social structure took place.

The process of so called structural individualization (Ulrich Beck) leads to the situation, where it is no longer the social position which defines our biography, but the individuals who are getting more and more responsible for their life.

On the other hand, the social policy is still based on Bismarck's and Beveridge's contribution, as well as on a social solidarity principle. This contradiction between the process of individualization and social policy principles is a subject of this presentation. Our aim is to show how the individualization process can induce changes in social policy and how the social policy can use the new forms of sociality, as "new tribes", "imaginated communities", "communities of assent" or "virtual communities". Although these new forms of sociality are less formalized and less visible, their presence and functioning have been well documented in a social discourse.

Our presentation focuses on a local social policy, where the informal ties play the most significant part. In our opinion the proper use of the individualization process can promote the development of local communities provided the role of social participation and of new communities is increased .

The lure of the missing asylum-seeking children - A comparative study on policy directed unaccompanied minors in Sweden, Norway, Denmark and the UK during 2000 until 2008

Stretmo, Live

the Department of Sociology, the University of Gothenburg Göteborg, Sweden

Keywords

discourse analysis, Unaccompanied asylum-seeking children, Comparative method, Policy and media analysis, Social problems construction

This paper aims to analyze how the construction of missing asylum-seeking children as a social problem in the medial debate, has come to shape the way national and supranational (EU) frame work, policy papers and guidelines has formulated official responsibilities towards unaccompanied minors.

As part of Schengen and the Dublin convent the EU member states are to take joint action regarding asylum policies; a refugee (over or under 18 years of age) can only have its asylum claim processed in one EU country, the member states are to unite in combating "smuggling of illegal aliens" and to vanquish "trafficking in humans". Regardless of policy integration and the construction of one external EU borderline; "migration" as such is considered rather controversial in many European countries. Narratives concerning "asylum seeking children who goes missing from official contacts" constitute part of this public debate.

During 2000 until 2008 accounts of unaccompanied asylum-seeking children who go missing traceless from refugee centers, or social service facilities, has been featured in daily news in Norway, Sweden, Denmark and the UK. Such instances has often been used as important angles of incidence through which issues, concerning the wellbeing of underage and unaccompanied migrants applying for asylum, has become addressed on the public agenda. Even though similarities exists in between the four countries when it comes to framing the public perspective of missing asylum seeking children, different conceptualization of why these children disappear also subsist.

Sometimes these episodes are constructed as cases of "missing children", leading to groups of claimants making calls for further action regarding "missing children" in general. "Unaccompanied minors who vanish" has also been alleged as to be proof of children being trafficked through the asylum system.

The sample of empirical material consist of Norwegian, Swedish, Danish and British policy, frame work and guidelines concerning official treatment of unaccompanied asylum-seeking minors: from the point of their first asylum application/official contact until the asylum claim has been processed. Important EU directives and policies have also been analyzed in this regard.

The political economy of social vulnerability. The social and political determinants of new social risks in western European countries

Pavolini, Emmanuele

*Studi su mutamento sociale, istituzioni giuridiche e comunicazione, Macerata University
Macerata, Italy*

Ranci, Costanzo

*DIAP, Politecnico di Milano
Milan, Italy*

Keywords

welfare regimes, vulnerability, new social risks

The undergoing changes in Western Europe are rapidly transforming the characteristics and dimensions of social problems. The so-called "European social model" was founded for many decades on the association among permanent employment, stability in the division of roles within the nuclear family and the progressive extension of welfare guarantees. All these conditions seem to be lacking in contemporary society because of the greater job insecurity and the consequent discontinuity in incomes, the organisational tensions in the family and the inertia of the welfare system. Taken together these transformations cause a spreading situation of social vulnerability in the population.

This paper is primarily aimed at describing the dimensions and characteristics of social vulnerability in Western Europe using ECHP data as the empirical basis. Although the literature on the "new social risks" is now quite broad, there is so far no analysis which shows the actual diffusion and intensity of those risks.

The analysis maintains a comparative purpose: the objective is to identify different profiles of vulnerability existing in different "regions" of Western Europe. Since these profiles depend on a complex set of socio-economic and institutional characteristics, which are not always homogeneous within the larger nations states of the EU15 (France, Germany, Italy, Spain and the UK), one of the contributions of the paper is to develop comparison on a sub-national scale, starting with the identification of 28 "macro-regions" in Europe, identified on the basis of the socio-economic characteristics of the different areas of which the EU15 is composed.

On the ground of a multilevel analysis, the paper attempts to verify to what extent the vulnerability profiles previously recognised are influenced in their extent and distribution by a plurality of social, economic and political factors. Social factors such as class structure, family organization, level of education are considered, as well as more institutional and regional factors, such as social programs addressing either "old" or "new" social risks, and the regional level of economic development. The analysis considers the role played by welfare systems in "covering" specific areas of vulnerability.

The quality of life in Portugal in the European context: main patterns and social determinants

Rodrigues, Eduardo

*Sociology, Centre for Research and Studies in Sociology (CIES-ISCTE)
Lisbon, Portugal*

Guerreiro, Maria das Dores

*Sociology, Centre for Research and Studies in Sociology (CIES-ISCTE)
Lisbon, Portugal*

Keywords

Social Policy, welfare regimes, well-being, quality of life

In this paper, we'll be characterizing the main quality of life patterns in Portugal. The way Portuguese citizens evaluate their living conditions and family and work lives will take centre stage in the analysis, as well as the social and cultural determinants that shape those patterns. Special attention will be given to the country's place, understood as a specific welfare regime, in the European context.

In more analytical terms, the focus will be placed on the connections existing between societal structures of constraint and opportunity and family and work contexts that frame the everyday life of individuals. Understanding those connections is crucial if we want to have an insight into the social and cultural determinants of the quality of life and well-being of European citizens.

Quantitative data gathered in a number of comparative European projects will be used in this paper. A general characterization of the Portuguese situation in Europe regarding quality of life will be made using existing data from the European Social Survey (ESS 2002) and from the first European Quality of Life Survey (EQLS 2003).

More in depth analyses of the quality of work and family life will be carried out using quantitative data gathered in the Quality of Life in a Changing Europe Project. This innovative project has the general aim to map out and understand the well-being and quality of life patterns of European workers in the service sector. Eight countries are involved in this project: The Netherlands, Finland, Sweden, Germany, the UK, Portugal, Hungary and Bulgaria. In each country, a survey was carried out in four companies: telecommunications, banking/insurance, retail and a hospital. A total of 7869 questionnaires was gathered in the eight countries (1373 in Portugal).

This diversity of welfare regimes, of social policies and of economic and cultural features is most useful in the construction of a comparative analysis, and is also very important to help further our understanding of the factors that lie behind the levels of well-being of Portuguese workers in the European context.

Unemployed people towards self-employment: between need and opportunity

Nogueira, Cláudia

*Centre for Social Studies, University of Coimbra
Coimbra, Portugal*

Keywords

unemployment, Self-employment, motivations to self-employment, policies towards self-employment

In a context of increasing unemployment, many people find in the self-employment an alternative to the salaried work. This tendency has been stimulated by the new generation of social policies and by non-governmental programs against poverty.

Based on a study which originated the book "Microempreendedorismo em Portugal: experiências e perspectivas" (Portela et al, 2008), the present communication intends to show that self-employment by unemployed people is a complex reality, particularly in what concerns their motivations.

In that study, very different situations were detected such as: a) people who decide to start a business because they don't have any hope to return to the salaried work (usually in cases of older workers; b) people who decide to start a business to keep an occupation until getting a new salaried work (usually in cases of younger workers with high qualifications); c) people who decide to start a business because of the incapacity to reconcile the salaried work with the family life (usually in cases of women with a high number of children); d) people who decide to start a business because they always wanted it and see on the loss of salaried work the opportunity to do it (usually in cases of persons who had a leader charge in the last salaried work); e) people who decide to start a business because they want more satisfaction and autonomy in work (usually in cases of persons who had been victims of moral siege).

Different motivations to self-employment are associated with different patterns of resources. For example, people who create their own job as a way to run away from the unemployment situation, probably haven't a consolidate range of ideas and strategies as someone who achieves in unemployment situation an opportunity to carry out an old dream and for a long time was planning to do it.

We can say that different starting points involve different rhythms as well as different arrival points. As a result, in the present communication it is stated that the policies towards self-employment should be flexible. Their efficacy will depend on their ability of adaptation to many different "clients".

Welfare regimes in four countries - a pre-comparative proposition

Keim, Wiebke

*Dept. Social Work and Social Policy, Fribourg University
Fribourg, Switzerland*

Amacker, Michèle

*Dept. Social Work and Social Policy, Fribourg University
Fribourg, Switzerland*

Budowski, Monica

*Dept. Social Work and Social Policy, Fribourg University
Fribourg, Switzerland*

Keywords

Costa Rica, comparative welfare regimes, Switzerland, Chile, Spain

This paper forms part of a qualitative research project on household strategies under conditions of precarious prosperity in four countries: Chile, Costa Rica, Spain and Switzerland. Data on household strategies shall then be compared with regard to given welfare regimes and social policy measures on the one hand, subjective interpretations hereof on the other hand.

For such a comparative approach, it is necessary to characterize available welfare measures in these four countries. In recent years, most comparative perspectives have relied on Esping-Andersen's (1990) typology of three worlds of welfare. However, this book and academic debate following its publication is of little use for the four countries in question (Cf. Arts/Gelissen 2002): Switzerland has not been adequately classified and switches type of welfare regime according to which indicators are taken into account (Armingeon/Bertozzi/Bonoli 2004, Arts/Gelissen 2002). It has thus been termed a "Sonderfall" in several occasions (Nollert 2006). For the case of Spain, several authors have attempted to include this country under the newly created type of "Latin" countries. However, this "post-authoritarian" welfare regime (Leibfried 1990, Lessenich 1994, Schmid 2002) still remains a "special case". And if later attempts to make Esping-Andersen's typology viable for a broader range of countries have included Australia and New Zealand, the perspective on Southern countries has remained very limited and thus irrelevant for the Latin American cases. A classification that makes two cases look like exceptions to the rule and that does not take into account the two other cases is of little relevance for our project. Other comparative frameworks are hard to come by or have not yet overcome themselves the "pre-comparative" phase (Schubert/Hegelich/Bazant 2008).

We have thus decided to rely on a rather descriptive overview over the welfare regimes in the four countries under consideration. Instead of trying to classify and label them, we would like to briefly expose their major traits in the domains of social security, employment, health and education, including available comparative indicators. These descriptions will serve as a basis for the comparative design of the research project later on.

Welfare states and quality of later life - distributions and predictions of QoL in a comparative perspective

Motel-Klingebiel, Andreas

*German Centre of Gerontology, German Centre of Gerontology
Berlin, Germany*

Romeu Gordo, Laura

*German Centre of Gerontology, German Centre of Gerontology
Berlin, Germany*

Keywords

welfare state comparison, Standard of Living, quality of life, diversity, social inequality

Demographic transitions are a driver of social change and societal ageing influences the resources and chances in life of different age groups. As a contribution to the debate on (potential) results of the transformation of social security in ageing societies, the impact of social security systems on distributions of quality of life in later life is discussed.

Three basic hypotheses are examined and thoroughly tested: the hypothesis of (relative) levels, the distribution hypothesis and the social structure hypothesis. The empirical investigation includes the following questions: How do levels of quality of life in later life depend on welfare state arrangements? Is the variability of objective and subjective quality of life related to welfare state arrangements? What is the relevance of social structure indicators for this variability and how is it related to old age security systems? What can be learned for the perspectives of current debates on equity and social security reforms?

The analyses apply data from 12 countries. While most of them are included in the first wave of the international comparative research project SHARE, data for England come from the English Longitudinal Study of Ageing (ELSA).

Descriptive analyses as well as multivariate models prove an interconnection between welfare state systems and quality of life indicators but not all three hypotheses can be fully confirmed. The analyses confirm the "level hypothesis" for three out of four indicators applied. Analyses only partly back the "distribution hypothesis" as well as the hypothesis of social structure effect can also only be partly confirmed. Finally, a basis for extended future analyses is outlined.

Welfare systems in East Europe: regional variations and explanatory factors

Couceiro, Mariña

Sociology, Universitat Autònoma de Barcelona (UAB) Cerdanyola del Vallés (Barcelona), Spain

Keywords

Social Policy, national actors, Central and Eastern Europe, welfare, international pressures

In the year 2004 the first eastward expansion of the EU took place thanks to the incorporation of eight new members (Latvia, Lithuania, Estonia, the Czech Republic, Slovakia, Slovenia, Poland and Hungary). This fact somehow marks the end of the transition for the above-mentioned group of countries.

The eight countries that acceded to the EU share a set of features that makes them an object of delimited study: a common process of adhesion negotiations and a common dynamics in the process of economic and political transition beginning in the year 89. Such double transition would be mainly characterized by the influence of such international agencies like BM and IMF.

The above-mentioned agents will impose a set of quick, simultaneous economic reforms (shock therapy) and a set of measures of economic correction, including the decrease in public expenditure and, therefore, an expense reduction in the field of social protection policies. In this manner, we can speak of the introduction of a series of new measures (appeal to individual responsibility, promotion of private investments) which will mark the later development of welfare systems in the eight countries.

These pressures and common trends towards the liberalization of social protection systems would have led to the assumption that these countries nowadays constitute a specific welfare system. Nevertheless, this point of view implies supposing that the economic, social and political structure is homogeneous in the eight countries, without bearing in mind the differences which exist between them. In fact, in spite of the previously mentioned international pressures common to all of them, the national answers to the said pressures would have varied noticeably. And this would have been so due to the fact that these international pressures would have interacted with a series of specific actors and determinants characteristic of each country.

For all this, my communication will try to provide a systematic answer to the following questions: it is possible that equal pressures acting on heterogeneous realities may produce the same results? What national factors (economic, political and historical) might explain the different types of options in the construction of welfare systems?.

Welfare, Employment and Social inclusion: an European perspective

Benedetti, Rachele

Sociology, University of Pisa

Rosignano Solvay (Livorno), ITALY

Keywords

employment, citizenship, Social inclusion, Welfare State, European Social Model

The process of European integration represents a very complex challenge, specially with the recent enlargement of European Union, opening the debate about the kind and the ways to realise a solid process of social cohesion, having respect of "diversity" as opportunity and not as disadvantage.

In this perspective, this paper analyses the future of European Social Model, focalising our attention not on the economic dimension of this process, but on the social dynamic and challenges which all European societies are facing with. In particular, the attention will put on the process of social inclusion as the main objective of European social policies, in relation with the challenge of employment and citizenship. On the basis of this issues, the paper concerns a critical analysis about the future and possibilities to improve the social dimension in European societies, seen as a particularly balance between the preservation of the diversity and the promotion of the equality.

After a theoretical reflection on comparative studies of welfare state, the paper analyses in particular the topic of the Open Method of Coordination, the approaches of flexicurity and the Transitional Labour Markets, as tools to reflect both on methodological and practical aspects to face the challenge of European social change.

RN27

Regional Network on Southern European Societies

Albanian Women Immigrants in Greece

Koronaïou, Alexandra

Psychology, Panteion University of Social and Political Sciences Athens, Greece

Keywords

leisure, identity, Gender, Modernity, Migration

Modern Greece has always been a country of migration, similar to the rest of South Mediterranean countries. Since the Second World War, there has been a continuous migration flow from Greece to Western Europe, US and Australia. However, it is undeniable that the 1990s have been a testing period for the Greek state, which proved to be unprepared - administratively and socially - to accept the masses of immigration that flooded the country after 1990, specially from Albania.

The socio-historical framework used in this study addresses the use of free time and the meanings of leisure activities among Albanian women living in Greece over the last ten years. Discourse analysis draws out some dynamic aspects of leisure activities through which Albanian women demand their autonomy from patriarchal models of family life.

This paper investigates the use and the representations of free (and working) time among Albanian women throughout two main questions: a) Which is the role of leisure activities regarding the exclusion or the integration of migrants into the Greek society? b) Which is the role of women in the maintenance of their own cultural identity and, at the same time, in the integration into the host society and its values?

The research results shows the evidence of the growing importance for Albanian women of leisure time as an opportunity for more autonomy and independence in the midst of various social, economic and familial constraints. Leisure activities, especially in the public sphere, are increasingly demanded by women as a right to "a time of one's own" distinct from family leisure. This time represents a base from which Albanian women living in Greece fight against traditional stereotypes and roles, confront a male dominated culture and try to assume European post modern ways of life.

Balkan Region - An Inseperatible part of European Society

Kaltchev, Ivan

Philosphic, Sofia University Sofia, Bulgaria

Keywords

tolerance, dialogue, Balkan, conflict

The proposed report consists of two parts.

In the first part the author makes a laconic review of the actual state of Association of philosophers from South-Eastern Europe who was created in 2001 year in Bulgaria. The Association promotes and supports an integrated interdisciplinary approach to a wide range of problems and issues of the humanities. The Association realized 7 regional conferences after its creation. Our conferences contribute for the successful development of science and the forming of universal European spiritual and cultural velues. A philosophical analysis is proposed on specificity of the so-called Balkan mentality, as well as an multi-ethnicnal patern of developing the modern Balkan society.

The second part of the report is devoted to the last research project of our association "Conflicts and tolerance on the Balkans". This project is interdisciplinary and in the its realization participate many sociologists from all Balkan countries together with their colleagues philosophers.

Best and Worse in Mixing Associative and Government action in support provision to victims of domestic violence through professionals eyes

Cunha Silvestre, Maria João

*Social Communication Sciences (Comunicação Social), ISCSP-UTL Social and Political Sciences Institute of Technical University of Lisbon
Lisboa, Portugal*

Costa, Dália

*Sociologia, Instituto Superior de Ciências Sociais e Políticas da Universidade Técnica de Lisboa
Lisboa, Portugal*

Keywords

Portugal, welfare mix, partnerships

Associations and Voluntary sector in Southern Europe (RN27)

Best and Worse in Mixing Associative and Government action in support provision to victims of domestic violence through professionals eyes

Southern European societies have historical and cultural similarities that contribute to define civic society mobilization towards associative initiatives. Voluntary or third sector organisations acting on wellbeing promotion are changing traditional relations with state or public sector. Those interaction changes posit sociological questions about power and negotiation imbalance in boundaries definition.

Organizations are made of people who come together to rationally work toward a common purpose. As organizations of organizations inter-service partnerships bring together public agencies and civil society associations. One thematic in which this model of welfare mix by service provision is being developed in Portuguese society is family violence in what concerns specifically to victims support.

Social intervention in family violence situations is a paradigmatic case in which the complementary roles are deeply separated and quite well identified. The State reserves to himself the (primary) prevention tasks and assumes legislative and mandatory functions, while stimulates civic society to organize itself to assure direct intervention activities.

In practice, partnerships are emerging at local level linking community based and Government organizations.

Semi-structured interviews with partnerships managers (assuring functional dimension on horizontal changes) revealed their point of view about the advantages (strengths) and disadvantages (weakness) of partnership practice aimed to ameliorate system ability to respond to women's needs.

Data was analyzed using an interpretative approach applied to retrospective narratives on associative experiences beyond what was traditional in Portugal.

This evaluation provides some insights about potential change in what concerns to public/ private relations; development of new approaches and innovation who can shape social policies in domestic violence area.

This presents a challenge for comparative research among Southern European societies. Portuguese experiences in this area are not well documented.

Bullism as a behavioural way based on new and specific communicative and cultural models of identity's construction

Bartholini, Ignazia

Department of Sociology, University of Palermo Trapani, Italy

Keywords

identity, Bullism, communicative and cultural models

This aims to analyse the phenomenon of violence among minors as a peculiar emergent form of identity's construction. In the risk society of the liquid modernity conflicts are not made in order to have material goods but to have an untouchable, liquid and linked to the performance substance, that is identity. Violence becomes a modality of a forced identity recognising, of a wrong per-forming realization which goes from material word aggression to murder of the person involved to the Freudian pulsions of eros and thanatos in a relationship so considered by the agent.

Bullism is an emerging mode of do-suffer violence.

Even if bullism is considered strictly connected to communications among people of the same age- group, band, gang- we have to consider variables as gender, status, role which can be found among adults as well in order to understand its meanings. These meanings are received by children through communication with adults and later used in the relational contexts with people of their age.

However, you can assume that the violent behavior are also the product of the will by the minor to take on a role, an identity between the same age-range of viewers played the role of the bull.

The phenomenon involves the identity building of the subjects, that is to say taking specific social roles which make the definition of peculiar narrations possible.

The results of a quantitative research (based on administration of 400 questionnaires) conducted in secondary schools in the western Sicily in the current school year can hypothesize that made and received violence might be considered as a behavioural way based on new communicative and cultural models.

Violence in relationships between persons of the same age represents an instrument of expression and action aiming to clearly define, from the victim's point of view, the identity of the aggressor through his power and will.

We are in front o another way of show and make violence, out of the dyad means-goals and friend-enemy, which is increasingly present, above all in Western societies in relations of post-modern teenager.

Career paths of young graduates. Contributions for new (in) visibility of the work

Marques, Ana Paula

Sociologia, Universidade do Minho

Braga, Portugal

Keywords

Young graduates, Career paths, Work (in)visibilities

This paper aims to analyse, on one side, the employability of young graduates from diverse and contrasting scientific fields, namely, "Technology and Engineering" and "Humanities and Social Sciences", as well as the modalities of insertion in companies, particularly regarding the latter's practices of recruitment and selection. We will go ourselves to centre, over all, in the social constraints - logical of social reproduction, structure and functioning it system of high education and work market - and in the continued strategies of professional insertion, being distinguished the co-clarifying factors of the work (in)visibilities (e.g., gender, waiting time of the first job, activity sector, recruitment modalities, contractual situation, working hours flexible). We may presume that many of these young workers, in the beginning of a career and holders of high academic qualifications, base their professional performances on the autonomy and creativity, as well as they share also high organizational and professionals expectations, particularly those who are placed in highly competitive sectors (namely those of the New Technologies of Information and Communication). Nevertheless, the conditions and the processes of insertion and integration of these young graduated are extremely heterogeneous and depend on factors that escape the exclusive logic of the employability value of the diploma. In this sense, and in the frame of a deregulation of the wage relation and consequent expansion of atypical kinds of job, we may as well notice increasing rates of sub-employment and unemployment, which warn us about a growing vulnerability, discontinuity and rupture of the employment relations.

Changing welfare mixes and path dependencies: personal social services and the third sector in the Portuguese welfare system

Ferreira, Silvia

*Sociologia, Faculdade de Economia da Universidade de Coimbra
Coimbra, Portugal*

Keywords

third sector, path dependency, welfare mix, personal social services

Discussion on public service provision is currently on the agenda and point to the opening up for the responsibility for welfare from the privileged role of the state to a wide range of providers and from the collective to the individual.

Different political projects express the logics of different governance modes where responsibility and provision can be articulated through combination of state, market, community and the third sector. These projects take place in concrete contexts structured by institutional frameworks of particular welfare mixes shaped throughout time.

Articulating the institutionalist concept of path dependency and the strategic relational approach, I analyse changes currently taking place in the Portuguese welfare mix, focusing personal social services where third sector organisations occupy a prominent place as provider in the core of social services.

In Portugal, the division of labour in this area has been traditionally a place for contestation and articulation of different political projects. This can be seen in the development of the Portuguese welfare state and still contributes to current discussions. Broader changes in the framework for social services, including the discussions about social services of general interest, bring new elements to this debate, with particular relevance for the type of welfare mix of Portugal.

Through observing historical trends and recent changes and debates I describe some elements of institutional stickiness at the same time as noticing the relative flexibilities allowed by the existence of more than one path in the social protection systems. However even if the potential trajectories remain present, structural selectivities render some changes easier than others and some actors' interests more successful than others. I conclude with considering the possibilities of resonance of current European debates on the nature of social services.

Comparative research and construction of identities - the case of European welfare states

Tervonen-Gonçalves, Leena

*Tampere School of Public Health, University of Tampere
33014 University of Tampere, Finland*

Lehto, Juhani

*Tampere School of Public Health, University of Tampere
33014 University of Tampere, Finland*

Keywords

constructivism, Southern Europe, comparisons, collective identities, Welfare State

Everyday comparisons concerning different countries or nationalities are many times blamed of falling into broad generalizations or rebuilding stereotypes. The supposedly more sophisticated forms of comparisons, produced in the spheres of scientific practices, are typically called categorizations, typologies or models. Comparative welfare state research has been a dominant approach in the academic field of international social policy since 1970s. Scholars have divided Europe into different models of welfare production. In the beginning most studies concentrated geographically to Northern and Central Europe and failed to take into account the Southern part of the continent. Later on Southern model of welfare state has been called "rudimentary", "immature" or "peripheral", while "Nordic model" has commonly been regarded as the embodiment of the highest stage of welfare state's evolution? (Baldwin 1990).

Following Schram (1993) this paper aims at interrogating assumptions about identity embedded in the analysis of welfare states and thus enabling us to rethink questionable distinctions and biased interpretations that privilege some identities at the expense of others. Analyzing public policy documents as collective identity narratives (Yanow 2000) this paper explores the construction of welfare state identities in Portugal and Finland, especially in the domain of public health policy, in the context of comparative social policy research from 1970's onward.

Cooperation in the Social Sector: Structural Principles

Domingues, Ivo

*Instituto Ciências Sociais, Universidade do Minho
Braga, Portugal*

Keywords

paradoxes, Structural principle, organizational cooperation, perverse effects

Six portuguese IPSS (Social Solidarity Private Institutions) made a development partnership, under the European Program Equal in order to get the funds necessary for the certification of their Quality Management Systems. They had the City Hall and a consultancy private company associated to them. Their goals were the following: to test a method of SGQ certification in partnership, having as a referential the Norm ISO 9001:2000; to certify at least a department in each organization; to spread the Quality Management System around every other organization operating in the social sector in that region. The cooperation developed for the improvement of organization management was a complex, ambiguous and paradoxal process.

The research made proposes answer for the following questions: 1) How do organizations in partnership adopt and implement locally a global normative referential to promote the organizational development and the improvement of services to society? 2) How do social solidarity organizations organize, develop and share the individual value project in partnership? 3) How did the participation evolve and what are the rationalities adopted in the monitoring of the conduct by the different leaders of the organizations? 4) What are the structuring principles that organize the conduct of participants?

This analysis assumes a simultaneously comprehensive and structural form, trying to relate processes in different dimensions of the reality construction, articulate technical and social, organizational and normative factors. The organization of the social sector, which mission incorporates social solidarity, reveal few capacities to cooperate between them and collectively improve their individual performance. To the organizational mission of social solidarity corresponds the organizational practice of operational individualism, revealed in the exploitation of uncertainty zones in the execution of latent functions, in the materialization into paradoxes of consequences and into perverted effects.

Culture participative et identité nationale en Grèce contemporaine

Mademlis, Ilias

*Sciences d'Education, Université Paris 8
Paris, France*

Keywords

culture participative, association, identité nationale, professeur, Grèce

Notre intervention concrète a comme but d'étudier les attitudes des professeurs du secondaire concernant les fêtes nationales célébrées à l'école grecque par rapport à leur culture participative. Précisément, en acceptant que la participation bénévole des individus à certains groupes associatifs témoigne de leur volonté à contribuer activement à l'élaboration de la vie sociale et en même temps à favoriser l'émergence d'une culture participative opposée à l'individualisme de l'époque moderne, nous nous demandons de quelle manière et dans quelle mesure les professeurs de collège impliqués dans cette activité et cette culture participative sont plus influencés que les autres sur la question de l'identité nationale des Grecs actuels et sur la place des immigrants dans la société.

En réalisant 40 entretiens de professeurs qui organisent des fêtes nationales scolaires; dont 15 professeurs ont une activité participative, nous classons les professeurs de notre échantillon en deux catégories : les professeurs membres de certaines associations, de syndicats, de partis politiques et de collectivités locales et ceux qui n'ont pas ce type d'activités.

En comparant les deux catégories des professeurs nous pouvons étudier si finalement existent ou pas de différences concernant le contenu de l'identité nationale qu'ils cultivent par les fêtes nationales écolières et la participation des élèves étrangers dans ces fêtes.

Les questions principales de notre recherche sont : est qu'il y a de différence entre les deux catégories des professeurs concernant les grands courants idéo-politiques constitutifs de la sphère politique nationale? Les professeurs qui sont caractérisés par une culture participative sont influencés par les valeurs de la solidarité, de la tolérance et du pluralisme, de l'égalité et de la liberté individuelle? Est qu'ils envisagent les minorités ethniques et religieuses, qui se trouvent dans le territoire grec, avec respect et tolérance? Existente encore, entre les deux catégories des professeurs, les distinctions classiques entre public et privé, intérêt général et intérêts particuliers en assurant la supériorité en valeur du premier terme sur le second? Est qu'il y a de différence entre les professeurs qui participent aux associations laïques et les professeurs qui participent aux associations religieuses?

Deinstitutionalization of mental patients: when the third sector fills the emptiness

Nogueira, Claudia

*Centre for Social Studies, University of Coimbra
Coimbra, Portugal*

Portugal, Sílvia

*Centre of Social Studies / School of Economics, University of Coimbra
Coimbra, Portugal*

Keywords

mental health care, deinstitutionalization, third sector, Social Policy, health care system

A process of deinstitutionalization of mental patients is undergoing in the portuguese health system. In spite of hospitals are not accepting more patients, no other alternatives of care are being created by the state. The responsibility for answering patients and families' needs is mainly undertaken for organizations of the third sector. Associations of patients, relatives and health care professionals are the main providers of support in the area of mental health.

Although these organizations have a crucial role in the process of deinstitutionalization, their action only responds partially to the needs of patients and families. Financial problems, dependency of voluntary work and complex relations with the state are actual obstacles to their work.

This paper presents the results of a set of interviews with members of associations, analyzing potentialities and constraints of these organizations. Through this analysis we intend to discuss their place in the undergoing process of deinstitutionalization.

European construction through culture, mobility and people circulation: the case of ERASMUS students in Coruña University

Domingues, Joana

Sociologia, Universidade do Minho/Universidade da Corunha Covilhã, Portugal

Araújo, Emília

*Sociologia, Universidade do Minho
Braga, Portugal*

Keywords

mobility, Interculturaly, Erasmus students, "European construction".

This paper addresses the concept of interculturality starting from a research made at Coruña University involving ERASMUS students coming from Portugal, Poland and Italy. Drawing on an analysis of ERASMUS students nationalities, motivations and discourses about "integration" in Spain, it is our intention to shed some light on the way "European construction" may not only be achieved by the process of interchanging people with its modes of living and patterns of thought, but also by implementing politics of equality which may foster knowledge circulation as well as the reshaping of interchange programs and politics of integration. The authors assume, however that this new forms of cultural relationship are only culturally and politically valid insofar as they are neither conflictual nor holist but pluralistic in the sense that may valorize the legitimacy of diversity even if confronting with space and times becoming ever more homogeneous. In sequence, it becomes extremely important to explore the purposes, the expectative as well as the actors involved in a mobility decision as well as their understandings about the gains and the loses implied in a mobility action within Europe. Considering the existing differences and unequal levels of centrality of each european country, it is also relevant to consider the amount and the extension of these oportuny costs weither from an individual point view or each country interests and projects involving interchange of students.

Gender relations and employment in the 21st century

Pazarzi, Eleni Nina

Sociology, University of Piraeus Piraeus, Greece

Keywords

women, relations in labour, Globalization

In the beginning of 21st century, the transformation of socio-economic relations has led to a reality which is called "globalization", which is a complex process with various dimensions (economic, political, cultural, geographical etc.). The change in the global division of labor has become a central issue of interest and debates in various disciplines but many approaches have been criticized for not making reference to the gendered aspects of social and productive relations. Gender and work is a central issue of theoretical considerations and empirical research today. It is accepted that the impact of globalization on women has been both positive (i.e. in developing countries the participation in the labor market) and negative (i.e. the feminization of poverty). This presentation aims at contributing to the theoretical and empirical considerations of gendered relations in the labour market by presenting some basic parameters of this situation with special reference to the greek reality. Among them are: the conditions of women's employment, the horizontal and vertical occupational segregation, the gender pay gap etc.

Governance and youth in local contexts: social policies in front of the challenge of new connections with social work, sociological methodology and planning methods

Galesi, Davide

*Human and Social Sciences, University of Trento
Trento, Italy*

Keywords

Governance, Youth, sociological research, planning methods

The challenge of governance opens a new season in social policy, through which citizens share more power (and duties) with local authorities.

The reasons of this process are different. On the one hand, there is a lack of resources: the public bureaucracy calls profit and non profit agencies to share the burden of social interventions. On the other hand, there is a lack of rationality: local authorities need to communicate with the potential target of their policy, in order to discover problems, as well as resources and actors which can be activated for a communitarian solution.

When the target is youth, specific difficulties rise. Several researches point out an emerging mistrust in institutions, often connected with hostile attitudes. On this basis, local municipalities have strong difficulties in involving young citizens in planning projects oriented to the wider community, from the neighbourhood to the whole metropolitan area.

This contribution aims to illustrate methodological tools and results of an empirical intervention of political governance realized for youth (15-25 years) in a small metropolitan area (100.000 inhabitants) in the North of Italy (city of Bolzano), which aimed to plan interventions for the promotion of the quality of everyday life.

The empirical analysis demonstrates that developing the political governance with youth implies facing the connection between at least 2 challenges:

- defining new models of social and educational work, which aims to get in touch with youth, its informal groups and non profit agencies, in order to create the necessary trust which makes possible a clear agreement about deadlines, power and decision spaces, commitments, both of the public administration and of young citizens;
- building new path of sociological methodology: the classic model of action-research has to be integrated with the emerging planning methods, such as future workshops, in order to place side by side the analysis of the social context, with its needs and resources, and the empowerment of a new citizenship, which opens new ways of an active relationship with the local welfare system.

Humanitarian movement, charity and moral imagination

Musarò, Pierluigi

Sociology, University of Bologna Bologna, Italia

Keywords

responsibility, Development, Solidarity, victim

Our starting point is: the myth of development as economic and moral emancipation (Sachs 1991, Rist 1997), humanitarian assistance as a substitute for political initiatives and solutions (Vaux 2001, Rieff 2002).

The session will explore the influence of that the "spectacle of suffering" - the images of human misery dramatized by the media and upon which the humanitarian movements wish to focus attention - (Boltanski 1999, Cohen 2001) has on our "moral imagination".

As soon as the social imaginary shift from cooperation to humanitarian aid occurred, the paradoxes of globalization came out. As a consequence the boundaries of nations, markets, the common good, private interests, governing institutions and civil society have become confused. At the same time it has increased the distance between viewers and sufferers, the heroes? and the victims, between "us" and "them".

In our "social construction of reality", what relationship exists between the old imperialism and the new responsibility to protect victims? What difference is there between the "victim" to be helped, and the "illegal immigrant" to be rejected?

Moreover, globalization creates an integrated world and a cosmopolitan society (Beck 2002) in which we have a growing awareness of living in a world at the same time remarkably comfortable and absolutely poor (Sen 2000). The session therefore focuses on the relationship between our commitment as spectators-benefactors and our responsibility as citizenconsumers. When did Business become Solidarity? What is the link between our style of consumption and the misery of "others"?

Innovation and sustainability: possible links and fragilities in the automobile industry

Moniz, António

DCSA, FCT, IET, Universidade Nova de Lisboa Caparica, Portugal

Keywords

Portugal, organisation, sustainable development, Innovation systems

The information on the technological features of automotive industry and its implications for sustainability is not spread enough among academics or experts in related fields. However, innovation characteristics is discussed intensively. Also is considered as a key-sector where the more important and intense changes (technological, business, conception, organisational) have taken place in the last decades. It also represents one of the most important cultural elements in modern societies.

We conclude that to overcome this situation and problem, the focus must be developed on the integrative dimension of these technical and innovative aspects (construction, design and mobility) and on socio-cultural aspects, such as consumers' behaviour, urbanisation tendencies, multi-modular transport, values and infrastructures of communication and also attitudes in what concern mobility. Especially because from such interlinkage the concept of sustainability will become clearer, as well the field of application. The paper will focus also on the Portuguese experiments (studies on the future of the sector) on this knowledge field.

Italian "participated" social policies and active citizenship

Piga, Maria Lucia

Dipartimento di Economia, Istituzioni e Società, Università di Sassari Sassari, Italia

Keywords

participation, Welfare State, active citizenship, SOCIAL POLICIES, social cooperation

Is a national welfare system able to produce promotional actions about citizenship? The paper presents a case-study of Italian "participated" social policies, with a specific focus on activation of citizenship through the no-profit sector (social cooperation). The aim is to explain how citizenship activation happens within the Italian welfare model.

Recent changes in Italian social policies imply the shift from a centralized programming model to a regional one. Within that framework, new forms of participation and active citizenship are possible. The regional planning of the socio-sanitary care services will be analyzed with a particular focus on the critical nodes of integration between municipalities/territorial agencies; between social and sanitary care; between public actors and the several forms of private actors.

The empowerment of social actors changes into civic consciousness and culture of services to persons, in order to promote active citizenship. This approach defines the "participated welfare" as a territorial action where active citizenship "produces" welfare, beyond the idea of passive dependence on the State which re-distributes welfare. This is a new experience for Italy, where the State has always had a main relevance for delivering services for the persons. In this way citizenship recalls the concept of social investment. Thus, the so called "welfare of the abilities" produces services that can be seen as relational assets and educational welfare. Therefore, those services can become a lever that reconnects such dimensions as confidence, credibility, empathy. In this way, the stereotype of dependency of persons from policies may be turned upside down by recognizing the potential resources of persons and giving them a role in the process of construction of the integrated and participated social policies.

Latin language, cultural proximities and cultural domination: Southern European Metropolis and immigration, a comparative approach between Portugal and Italy

Aires Mesquita Vieira Ferreira, Ana Inês

*Mestranda em Ecologia Humana e Problemas Sociais Contemporâneos, Faculdade de Ciências Sociais e Humanas - Universidade Nova de Lisboa
Lisbon, Portugal*

Keywords

Immigration, Italy, Portugal, Southern European Metropolis

The construction of Metropolis carries an embedded question of dynamics and mobility on which migratory flows can be reflected. The Southern European reality, as particularly the portuguese and italian similarities and divergencies under the construction of Metropolitan Areas, might be problematised through the comparison between capital Metropolis - Lisbon and Rome - and smaller Metropolis - Oporto and Bologna - on matters like immigration tendencies, spatial, demographical and social-ethnic patterns of population distribution and integration on those Metropolitan Areas. After this comparative approach, an overall drawing of single and common features can be made, in an attempt to contribute to a type of recognition scheme on Southern European dynamics, social constructions and cultural proximities.

Línguas latinas, Conhecimento Sociológico e Diversidade Social

Vicente Baptista, Luís

*Sociologia, Faculdade de Ciências Sociais e Humanas - Universidade Nova de Lisboa
Lisboa, Portugal*

Romão, Ana

*Ciências Sociais e Humanas, Academia Militar
Lisboa, Portugal*

Keywords

Línguas latinas, diversidade linguística, sociologia

Nesta comunicação debatemos duas questões que se encontram intimamente ligadas: a relevância que a língua inglesa tem na correlação de forças nos mercados internacionais da língua e a forma como se reflecte nas Ciências Sociais, nomeadamente na Sociologia. Conscientes que a língua é um veículo decisivo na produção e na divulgação do conhecimento, os cientistas sociais não podem ignorar que a compreensão das sociedades implica as camadas de subjectividade associadas às línguas que dão expressão às vivências colectivas e individuais dessas sociedades. Há no entanto um risco real de subalternizar na comunicação científica o espaço para o debate nas línguas faladas e vividas nas sociedades em que os sociólogos trabalham. A importância das línguas latinas na Europa e no mundo justifica que os fóruns de debate promovam o interconhecimento científico e linguístico que permitirá expressar a riqueza e diversidade das formas de pensar e viver as sociedades humanas.

A reflexão que propomos leva em consideração a centralidade que a internet ocupa na comunicação sem fronteiras, assim como o seu potencial facilitador na (re)configuração de redes para o intercâmbio entre sociólogos e para a divulgação do conhecimento produzido. Interessa-nos, particularmente, explorar indicadores sobre a divulgação da sociologia na internet nas diferentes línguas. Com base na análise de dados empíricos a explorar na óptica da força dos laços fracos (Granovetter, 1973), equacionam-se cenários possíveis relativamente às vantagens e à viabilidade de congregar esforços entre as associações nacionais de sociologia dos países de línguas latinas, no sentido de viabilizar a promoção não apenas da diversidade linguística no âmbito da divulgação sociológica como também da diversidade de perspectivas de análise que resultam das preocupações associadas a contextos sociais concretos.

Medium-sized Knowledge Cities as a promoter of regional innovation system: focusing on Coimbra

Casaleiro, Paula

*Cities and Urban Cultures Research Group, Centre for Social Studies
Coimbra, Portugal*

Fortuna, Carlos

*Cities and Urban Cultures Research Group, Centre for Social Studies
Coimbra, Portugal*

Keywords

Regional innovations systems, Knowledge city, Knowledge based development, Medium-sized cities

In this paper we aim at exploring the opportunities and importance of knowledge medium-sized cities for the emergence of regional innovation systems (RIS). The concepts of knowledge city and regional innovation system are often associated to large urban agglomerations, excluding from this debate, fundamental areas in the European urban system, the medium-sized cities (Bell & Jayne, 2006; Haque, 2001). We believe, however, that these cities have a decisive role in the diffusion of technologies and knowledge and, consequently, in the promotion of innovation and a RIS: as they may adopt innovations emanating from the primary knowledge centres or even produce them, spreading them to their surrounding environment (Florida, 2008; Carta, 2007)

The purpose of the paper is also to provide a critical review of these concepts, based on the analysis of the Portuguese medium-sized city of Coimbra. We attempt to explore the potential of the city as a promoter of territorial development and of a regional innovation system, in the context of what we understand to be a knowledge city - a city that aims at knowledge-based development, by encouraging the continuous creation and renewal of knowledge and has both knowledge infrastructure and human capital.

Although presenting some gaps in coordination and organization, Coimbra enjoys a wide range of resources, both material and human: in 2008, the city had 19 higher education establishments and held 12% of the total of R&D institutions of the country (GPEARI, 2009); and about 22% of the active population were qualified professionals (INE, 2001). At the same time, Coimbra's productive structure is developing through the emergence of new activities intensive on knowledge and IT. The development of relations between university and enterprises has greatly contributed to this, namely through Instituto Pedro Nunes.

The presence of Universities, R&D and services, with a strong capability for innovation and creativity enhance the opportunities of the surrounding environment. Between 2002 and 2006, the number of enterprises in some of the surrounding smaller cities almost duplicated and the population also grown considerably (INE, 2003, 2007). Therefore, we sustain, Coimbra may trigger a regional innovation system in the near future.

Nationalist voices and the struggle of becoming: The case of native and migrant youths in Greece

Katartzi, Evgenia

Moray School of Education, Edinburgh University Edinburgh, United Kingdom

Keywords

Immigration, nationalism, Youths, identity construction, Greek society

In the context of internationalized economy, global capital flows and migration and of potent locality with its nationalist and fundamentalist voices, social life and subjectivities become increasingly fluid and fragmented. The paper analyses the intersectionalities between the local manifestations of the process of becoming and the wider social processes underlying and surrounding migration. It draws upon the narratives of 24 youths aged 16-19 with migratory and non-migratory background. Their narratives are analyzed as performative acts and cultural weavings constructed locally and intersubjectively, rather than expression of their essentialist realities. Following a critical narrative-discursive perspective, the paper focuses on the way the youths construct themselves while participating in asymmetrical relations of power and interactional and micro-political processes; the way they relate to themselves and to others and concomitantly the way they materialize their imagined relations and attachments through practices and discourses.

In the shadow of the omnipresent ethnocentric and monolithic Greek ideology and the widespread cultural racism, the paper argues that these youths engage in the weaving of their identities through a more or less ascribed, constrained and perpetually negotiated sense of belonging. Pessimism seems deeply rooted in adolescents' consciousness: distrust in politics and state institutions; disappointment for the lack of meritocracy and anger and resentment for the dearth of public figures capable of inspiring trust and of demonstrating genuine interest for the public good emerge as central themes in youths' narratives. The potent normative direction of dominant familistic mental schemata seems to lead to a sense of suppression, which in turn sometimes kindles a reflexive search of identity and sometimes ignites an unprecedented hostility towards what they perceive as "othered stranger". The latter dimension points to the ascription, expressive exploitation and unequal access to the sense of belongingness as determinants of becoming a certain subject in the Greek society.

Passing down family history in migrants' families as an identity resource for children

DELCROIX, Catherine

Sociology, Université de Strasbourg

Strasbourg, France

Keywords

Family, Migration, children, memory, identity

I have done different research projects focusing on the activities, or acting of Moroccan migrants as parents. Data collection was based on narrative interviewing of parents and children (young adults 16-25) in order to obtain detailed descriptions of activities, strategies and courses of action over time.

In terms of findings, one of the most relevant one has been on the effect of family memory. The interviews had allowed migrant fathers and mothers to tell their life story. Some of them had already told their story to their children in past occasions. But others had not, and it was the first time their children were hearing it. As I was moving from one case to another, I noticed something interesting: it was in these families where the parents had not passed on their story that some of the adolescent children had the most problematic conducts. These adolescents often expressed their rage against the social injustice that was done to them: they compared themselves to kids of their age in secondary schools, kids from middle class (French) families who "had everything". They thought it was totally unfair that they were unable to afford those things that "everybody else" had.

In families where parents had told their history, children viewed things differently. They saw themselves as the outcomes of a long, historical process whereby their parents had decided to emigrate in the hope of providing better life chances for them. In doing so the father had been forced to take very demanding jobs, and the mother, to live very far from her kin and her solidarity networks. But they had done it "for you, our children". The latter understood why they were in France - where they came from - ; and by ways of consequence they understood better who they were, and what they could hope for. The difference was sometimes striking.

Processes of Change and Social Development in Southern Europe. The Valencian Community (Spain) as object of Study

Raúl, Ruiz Callado

*Sociología I, University of Alicante
Alicante, Spain*

María Teresa, Algado Ferrer

*Sociología I, University of Alicante
Alicante, Spain*

Antonio, Muñoz González

*Sociología I, University of Alicante
Alicante, Spain*

Keywords

sustainability, Social change, innovation, Southern Europe, Development

In this communication are to the results of the I+D project "Processes of change and social development in the Valencian Community: characterization and sociological analysis of successful territorial initiatives in the creation of use and maximization of the well-being" (GVPRE/2008/318), financed by the Direction of Scientific Policy of the Valencian government, and in which the factors not exclusively economic have studied that take part in the processes of territorial development, trying to include/understand how the changes of articles of incorporation take place and specially those that they are oriented in the line of which it comes denominating "modernization" or, enunciated of more precise way, endogenous and sustainable territorial development, within the framework of the globalization.

In this sense, they are the three most excellent questions around which elements for the discussion are contributed:

I) you specify it of the models of development constructed from the local particularities and the active participation of the innovating agents, in front of the universalist models that make it depend on structural factors and that only understand the existence of a route towards the modernization.

II) the value that the non-economic variables have in the impulse of the processes of territorial development, and specially in the success of the entrepreneurs.

III) the paper that the actors carry out in the development processes, and specially its network of relations and the directions of value that constitute the nucleus of the design of their strategies.

Finally, they need which are the conditions that, in the scope of study, have made possible that the actions of the local entrepreneurs have been successful, impelling the innovation as much in the economic field as in social and the cultural one.

Professionalization in third sector: the case of Porto university graduates in Business Administration, Humanities and Social Sciences

Parente, Cristina

Departamento de Sociologia, Faculdade de Letras da Universidade do Porto Porto, Portugal

Keywords

professional integration, graduates, third sector, professionalization

Since the 1970s/80s the exhausted growth models of the Western world and the crisis of the Social State contributed to the surge of a number of both new and reformed organizations within the third sector. In 1997, a study promoted by the European Commission DGV, Pilot Action The Third System, Employment and Local Development, identified Portugal as part of a group of European countries where the third sector was a reality on the rise (CIRIEC, 2000). This communication aims at discussing the characteristics of professionalization within the third sector based on results of an investigation, led by the Instituto de Sociologia da Faculdade de Letras da Universidade do Porto, on the professional uncertainty of Porto's University graduates in Business Administration, Portuguese Literature, Sociology and Psychology, between 1999 and 2004. One of the central issues is to understand if the growth of this sector, in terms of employment volume, corresponds to a qualitative relation between work and employment. At the same time, the question of whether or not the third sector constitutes an alternative and a promising sector for graduates' future inclusion is raised. To answer to this question, and whenever possible, a comparison between third sector's characteristics of professional integration and the public and private sectors will be made.

Public places, collective challenges

Machado, Paulo

*Directorate-General of Internal Affairs, Ministry of Internal Affairs
Lisbon, Portugal*

Keywords

Social change, public spaces, social ecology of crime, anti-social behaviour

Crime prevention is both a serious and challenging task that requests our best. It is a challenge for our social organization and for social institutions. For if it's sure that an effective prevention will not eradicate crime, it is also true that crime, if not prevented and tackled, could affect badly our social life.

Living (feeling) in safety could be the reachable utopia of this century, in a free and democratic Europe. Let us conceive of safety as encompassing citizens' rights to be free from crime and the fear of crime, as well as their being protected against flood, fire, disease or injurious places changes. Let us also conceive of crime prevention as a "pattern of attitudes and behaviour directed both at reducing the threat of crime and enhancing the sense of safety and security, to positively influence the quality of life in our society and to help develop environments where crime or other anti-social behaviour" cannot flourish? This is the definition of crime prevention proposed by the US National Crime Prevention Council in 1997.

The paper intends to present some data collection on crimes reported to Portuguese law enforcement authorities, related to what we have been calling "street criminality". The analysis concerns all the municipalities with more than 50.000 inhabitants and in which exist cities with, at least, 10.000 residents.

Some cross national comparisons are made, intending to discuss the concept of anti-sociality urban pattern, consisting on widespread anti-social behaviours, related not only with socio-ecological determinants, but also with the globalization of the urban sprawl.

The meaning of such urban phenomena and impact in the Southern European cities and its public places is discussed.

Rationalization essays for supporting violent demonstrations

Dores, António Pedro

Sociology, ISCTE

Lisboa, Portugal

Keywords

violence, rationalization, uprising, europe, change

thematic session: "Varieties of collective violence: Motivations, actors and outcomes"

November 2008 Greek uprising has been presented as sustained several weeks' non sense violence. No consensual interpretation of this uprising or violence has taken course in Europe. Comments reveal the concern of repeated events can spread in Europe, given the expected social crisis. The need of violent demonstration - for fun, for showing different ways of dealing with the police, to complain against consumerism, and so on - is discussed by excluded sectors of the population, in Greece and in other European countries, comparing the events with May 1968 in Paris or the more recent car burning in several French towns and in other countries as well.

This paper will gather and present the explanations and justifications for what happened in Greece, using data to be uploaded by interviewing youngsters and local sociologists and journalists. Is it a violent demonstration goal to stop quotidian violence, as many warfare leaders claim to do with their won wars? Is it the violence in the demonstrations something marginal or the violence is a social need? Is it the violence socially condemned or understood and justified? Is it violence in the demonstration a mimetic social phenomena created by the environment circumstances? Institution regular functioning has been endangered by violence in the streets? Individual performances, as strange opinion expressing or showing uprising symbols, are developed or reprimanded and repressed?

Religious practices in everyday life. The case of Jehovah Witnesses

Niro, Fabiana

Sociology, Università del Molise Ferrazzano, Italy

Keywords

everyday life, Jehovah Witnesses, resocialization, religious practices.

The aim of this study is to investigate the resocialization process and the changes of the practices of everyday life as a result of the exit from a religious movement.

The individual, through the process of socialization, acquires, during the life, the basic models of behaviour, thought and action of its own socio-cultural environment. But the socialization involves the permanent renegotiations within all the subsystems of socialization, so the subjective reality is susceptible to changes.

This paper investigates the transformations in Weltanschauung, in the behaviour, in the social network and a redefinition of the self-image once one has left a religious movement. Through the study of a case, we'll analyse the degree and mode of change of the values and practices of everyday life, through the account of 23 former Jehovah's Witnesses, who lives in Italy and in Switzerland. This religious group is particularly interesting because they cannot divide their religious beliefs from their religious practice, and so it represents an anomalous case in a world in which the area of religious practice is more and more small.

Self-employment and the southern European social model: a reflection based upon the Portuguese case

Assunção, Fátima

*Sociology, School of Social Sciences, University of Manchester/CAPP-ISCSP, Technical University of Lisbon
Lisboa, Portugal*

Keywords

Southern European Countries, Portugal, Self-employment

The empirical relevance of self-employment in several advanced economies has been recognized in the last few decades. This has been especially true in relation to the four southern European countries (Greece, Italy, Portugal and Spain). In addition, several analyses have highlighted that the high levels of self-employment observed among these countries stem from some of the features that bring them together in the literature on the southern European pattern of employment. Among these, stand the relatively small structure of enterprises, familialism and the high level of informal economy that characterise the south European countries.

With this presentation, the author intends to reflect on the contribution that analysing self-employment in the southern European countries can give to the discussion of the employment regime typically associated with the southern European social model. The reflection starts with a discussion of the southern European social model, its elements and current pertinence as an analytical tool to better understand institutional diversity among the European landscape. Then it explores the stocks, recent evolution and characteristics of self-employment in the southern European countries, with a special reference to Portugal and its institutional context. Finally, it discusses the role that self-employment might play in the development of the employment regime that currently characterise the southern European social model.

Social Capital in the Spanish-Portuguese Border: The Model of the Raya Extremeña

Monago Lozano, Francisco Javier

DEPARTMENT OF SOCIOLOGY PhD student, UNIVERSITY OF EXTREMADURA
SPAIN,

Perez Rubio, José António

DEPARTMENT OF SOCIOLOGY. Professor of sociology, UNIVERSITY OF EXTREMADURA SPAIN, <http://www.unex.es/feet/>

Keywords

Social Networks, social capital, rural development, rural areas and border

Extremadura is a paradigm and standard in collaboration with the Portuguese border towns. This collaborative ties or social networks, generate a high social capital in social relations and a beneficial development. Hence, the basic objective that we pursue, is to analyze the state which is the capital of Extremadura in the line, focusing on rural areas on both sides of the border, through the perceptions of actors involved in development strategies rural.

Indirectly it is to delve into the foundations of the formation of social capital and to determine the degree of development capital that is the future of rural development policies, to implement ways to promote collective action in rural communities across borders.

The perspective from which we will be contributing to social capital development programs, is to avoid the bias that many economist of those programs have. Since it is repeatedly found evidence that the experiences of development, whose main objective was economic progress, ignoring the citizens' ability to implement strategies for social progress and preventing factors involved multiple aspects (social, economic, cultural) have failed.

We support that social capital has emerged in response to the failures of the economic ideas of development, and articulates a series of interactions or social networks among individuals, groups and institutions that can foster development. We highlight three interrelated aspects: culture, social structure and development as factors that influence, generate and play skills, attitudes and skills of the population, level of participation in governance, etc..

The empirical study we have made seeks access to the knowledge of some aspects related to the development of social reality, with major impact on the level of participation and partnership of the inhabitants of the area, using techniques of qualitative social research, with quantitative simulation with designed to implement a model for analysis of the peculiarities and characteristics of the capital of the county border of Extremadura and Beira Interior Norte, linked to the perceptions of relevant actors and institutions on its inhabitants.

Structuration of volunteering in the social sector - reproduction and change of practice

Domingues, Ivo

*Instituto Ciências Sociais, Universidade do Minho
Braga, Portugal*

Keywords

organizational change, Structural principle, social volunteering

Most of the social services in Portugal is trusted to the private organizations of social solidarity. Gifted with directions composed by people in a volunteering regimen, served by technical and auxiliary staff, generate various social answers in the communities in which they operate. Financed by the State and by clients, they possess relatively fragile financial staff. Volunteering allow more or less qualified human resources which allow it to reinforce the capacity to answer their clients' needs.

The integration of volunteers in the organizational processes, usually desired by management, raises new problems for the technicians who manage social valences. This study pretends to analyze 1) the perception of the advantages of the volunteer service for the organizations of the social sector, 2) the modalities of functional integration of volunteers in the organizational processes and 3) evaluate the effects of the social tensions and contradictions generated by the integration in the teams of social services.

All reflection founds itself in the structuration theory and in the dimensions of signification, legitimization and domination to understand the phenomenon of volunteering. Concretely, it proposes the reading of ways how volunteering, considered to be fundamental for the organizations of the social sector, is integrated in them, stimulating the reproduction and the change of practices, sometimes promoting the integration and the optimization of these human resources, sometimes promoting the disintegration and waste of these important resources.

Subcultures of Football Fans and Violent Hostilities

Marivoet, Salomé

*FCDEF, University of Coimbra
Coimbra, Portugal*

Keywords

violence, Football, subcultures, claques, supporters

The violence that was manifested in Portuguese sport, particularly in football matches, suggests an increase in tension at matches, arising not only from intensified rivalry, but also from increased distrust in the fairness assured at championships. The growing distrust, together with the dynamics of surveillance and supervision launched in the 1990s, have contributed to the activation of mechanical solidarities within groups with shared interests, in a context of opposition/confrontation or radicalization. This has been propitious to manifestations of collective violent revolt, and to the institution of forms of premeditated violence between some groups of ultra fans.

In the 1990s, there was an intensification of fan violence, led by some "claques" of ultras, particularly evident amongst supporters of teams competing in the Premier League. Some of these "claques" seem to have taken on the role of guardians of their respective clubs, pledging to defend it to the end. This attitude is therefore one of great hostility towards rival groups, a hostility which is stirred up by the groups' leaders' and transmitted by the media. However, the development of events suggests that violent hostilities between some "claques" are independent of the development of championships.

In the development of violent hostilities between some "claques", there has been an intensification in the forms of violence used, which in some cases have been extremely brutal with tragic consequences. The association of traditional stereotypical masculine values with the ultra mentality of the loyal militant fan will have created the conditions for an increase of violence within some "claques"; thus the brawls that occur have become a leitmotif for the autonomous reproduction of violent rivalries in actions activated by mechanical solidarities. This reality has also been noted in other societies, whether involving the ultra subculture or the hooligan one, in its casual version, as we also studied during the UEFA Euro 2004.

Target Governance and Social Risk: The case of the Portuguese Policy of Social Inclusion

Pereira, Maria

*International Relations, Technical University of Lisbon
Lisbon, Portugal*

Carla, Pinto

*Social Policy, Technical University of Lisbon
Lisbon, Portugal*

Mourão, Vitória

*Sociology, Technical University of Lisbon
Lisbon, Portugal*

Keywords

Risk, Social inclusion, reflexive modernization, Governmentality, social risk

Sociological literature underpins in what ways risk is a social construction meant to legitimize certain governmental practices. The goal of our paper is to discuss the Portuguese social inclusion policies within the framework of the growing theorization on the politicisation of social risk. Two conflicting theoretical approaches regarding risk politicisation will be presented: Beck's risk society thesis and post-structuralist Foucauldian approaches to risk and governmentality. We intend to debate what each perspective has to offer in what concerns the academic study of the articulation between social risk, the demise of the welfare state and the increasing individualization of social policies. We argue that post-structuralist risk theories offer a more consistent approach to the politicisation of social risk, because they do not reify the belief, central in Beck's approach, that individualization equals social empowerment. We shall validate our argument with the discussion of the content and effects of recent Portuguese social inclusion policies.

The city as a new social question. Heterotopic cities.

Martinelli, Monica

*Sociology, Università Cattolica Milano
Milano, Italy*

Keywords

place banalisation, global connections, dislocation, crisis of sociality, spirals of abandonment

The paper is referred to a study conducted in ten important suburban areas in the biggest Italian cities. The research was developed by two partners - Caritas Italiana and Università Cattolica Milano, Faculty of Sociology. Its aim was to observe the transformation of the urban horizon, its re-organisation of the traditional co-ordinates of space and time and their consequences on social life.

The study shows how the classical model - center of the town/suburban areas - is no longer valid. First, because of a heterotopic fragmentation which is a transverse phenomenon. Some parts of the city are showing new combinations of functions and populations: these are simply juxtaposed, with neither contacts nor communications. Secondly, because suburbs depend less than before on centers: while some places/populations are losing functions, suffering economic changes and weakening of sociability, others places/populations are wider connected elsewhere.

The metaphor of archipelago offers a more precise picture of the reality. Marginalisation processes are to be found all over in the city. Old suburbs and new critical areas can be mentioned as sensitive areas, far beyond their geographical position on the city map. In these contexts the consequences of globalisation are more visible and virulent, showing some convergence into a similar model featured by the same critical relations between globality/locality and inside/outside, institutional withdrawal, fragmentation and place banalisation, anthropological suffering and collapse of sociability.

One of the most virulent consequence regards the different forms of violence. Some areas are in the hands of big criminal networks. Other areas are totally enclosed: here violence has no sense, no direction, no targets - a nihilistic form of violence. Third, there are suburbs where the massive and fast connection with global flows give origin to a deep sense of insecurity. Lastly, there are some critical points of contact between inside and outside: here we can find a symbolic violence.

The study indicates that sensitive areas can be considered very interesting point of view to observe and understand urban changes. Cities become points of condensation in a liquid society.

The competitiveness of welfare systems analyzed through equity: a comparison between Italy and France

Vinci, Fiorella

Scienze Sociali, Università di Palermo - Facoltà di Scienze della Formazione

Palermo, Italia

Keywords

process, differentiation, equity, capabilities, legitimization

According to Esping-Andersen (1990), the french welfare system and the italian one belong to the same family of nations but they indicate two different characters: the first is more hybrid et less conservative than the second one.

M. Ferrera (1993), observing the particular and nepotistic character of italian welfare system, contributed to distinct clearly the french system from the italian one. But welfare systems more frequently represent dynamic processes that depend on continuous transformations and adjustments, and are exposed to challenges of competitiveness and to growing diversification of social needs. In this framework, the processes of implementation of european politics forms a legal and procedural frame which promotes hypothesis of convergence among several national welfares. Moving from the processual and dynamic nature of welfares and putting in the epistemological frame of public action sociology, the objective is exploring kinds of mutual adjustments among french and italian systems. If the most differential character and the most promotional function of welfares are the facets that mainly promote their dynamism and their competitiveness, how Scharpf remarks, we suggest to analyze these characters in relation to specific institutional conditions and to different processes of collective legitimization of equity principles. In particular, through a comparative research, we want to verify if competitiveness and dynamism can be favoured by an attentive differentiation among several programs, that is the chance to increase the number of subjects which suggest a welfare program, to multiply situations and occasions of suggestion/correction of the program, and to think about coherency between the finalities/configurations of programs and the capabilities/ambitions of interested subjects.

Concepting welfares not like political outputs but such as outcomes, that are interdependent from legitimization and organization of different democratic systems, and analyzing in a comparative perspective seems to be useful - as N. Bobbio defined - to think about a democratic practice.

The feminization of occupations in Greece: A sign of egalitarianism or loss of social prestige?

Vitsilakis, Chryssi

*Pre-school education and educational design, University of the Aegean
Rhodes, Greece*

Efthymiou, Ilias

*Pre-school education and educational design, University of the Aegean
Rhodes, Greece*

Vryonides, Marios

*Social Sciences, European University, Cyprus
Nicosia, Cyprus*

Keywords

Gender, feminization, Occupational classification, Greece

Challenging sex-role stereotyping and segregation in a country's occupational structure is usually taken as a step forward toward overcoming gender inequalities. It is, however, well documented that the feminization of occupations, apart from constituting a sign of egalitarianism, can have at least another consequence: as Goyder, Guppy and Thompson (2003) note, the feminization of an occupation can have negative effects on the prestige people attribute to it. The implications of the above for a South European society such as Greece is particularly important, given that cross cultural studies, such as the European Social Survey (ESS, 2004 and 2006), have indicated that, compared with North European societies, Southern European societies lag behind on a number of issues connected with gender (in)equality.

The proposed paper presents the findings from a sociological investigation of the way new and traditional occupations are perceived in contemporary Greek society in terms of their gender profile. More specifically, during the year 2006 the authors of the proposed paper conducted a national survey on nearly 500 participants, covering urban, semi-urban and rural areas. Forty occupations selected to map all levels of the ISCO-88 classification system were investigated for their gender profile; that is, how much people thought they were suited to men and women. Our analysis points to interesting findings regarding the way these occupations are perceived in contemporary Greek society by men and women respondents in terms of their gender suitability. This, in turn, is compared: (i) with the overall judgments people make about the respective social status of these occupations and (ii) with the importance respondents attribute to specific occupational classification's criteria. In the analysis we outline the implications of these results for further studying how available opportunities (educational and occupational) become accessible to men and women and provide insights about the current state of gender relations in contemporary Greek society.

The Role of Self-Help Organizations in the Community Health Governance: The Italian Case-study

Giarelli, Guido

FACULTY OF MEDICINE, UNIVERSITY 'MAGNA GRAECIA' CATANZARO, ITALY

Keywords

Health, Italy, active citizenship, COMMUNITY HEALTH GOVERNANCE, SELF-HELP ORGANIZATIONS

The paper will pursue the specific aim of analysing the role of citizens-users/patients/carers organizations in the community health governance arena in Italy both at national and regional levels using a theoretical approach based on the active citizenship paradigm and a participatory research methodology involving the self-help organisations themselves as an alternative to the prevailing consumerist paradigm rooted in health economics.

The acknowledgement of this more active role the patient plays in the health care system as an essential partner for health production brings this approach to elaborate a new participatory-democratic concept of active citizenship, aimed to fill the "democratic deficit" of such system by democratizing the health services through increased public participation in the health policy-making arena. Within this framework, the role of citizens-users/patients/carers organizations thus becomes central in promoting new forms of collective civic participation enhancing citizens' political awareness and empowerment about their fundamental rights and the contribution they can offer to the decision-making process in the health policy arena.

By the above approach, the paper will try to describe the Italian citizens-users/patients/carers organizations in the health arena by their development, aims, activities, internal structure and resources and to analyse the role the different types of citizens-users/patients/carers organizations play in promoting and/or representing the interests of citizens within national and regional health policy arena according to the preliminary outcomes of an integrated qualitative-quantitative national research project funded by the Ministry of Health : the regional level will be considered as particularly relevant for this purpose of the project, given both the historical differences existing in Italy among the various regions and the more recent political process of decentralization (federalism).

Finally, the chance of establishing in Italy a network of independent Regional Observatories on Health Citizenship run by the universities in co-operation with citizens-users/patients/carers organizations themselves and co-ordinated with the Regional Health Authorities, aimed to monitor the quality and equity of health care services and advocating citizens' rights to access appropriate care will be considered from the perspective of enhancing the active citizenship paradigm.

The role of the Church as an organizational institution of intercultural education in contemporary Greece

Koutidou, Evagelia

Faculty of Law, Aristotle University of Thessaloniki Serres, Greece

Keywords

Law, Intercultural Education, Orthodox Church of Greece, church foundations, prevailed religion

The present paper refers to the competencies which the political and, more specifically, the legislative power provides the Church, so that it can play an active role in the various spheres of social life, such as education, and influence them. It mainly concerns the role of the Orthodox Church of Greece as an institution that organizes the intercultural education in contemporary Greece and greek education abroad, as it is enacted by Law 2413/1996. The paper presents a small part of the outcome of an extensive research of primary research data, such as the text of the above mentioned Law, which has been critically interpreted.

The principal aim of this paper is to interpret the indefinite term "church foundations", in the name of which intercultural schools - that is schools almost exclusively for foreigner pupils or pupils with educational, social and cultural, which means also religious, particularities or special needs - can be founded in Greece, according to the Law. Secondly, this work aims to illustrate comparatively the parallel role that the same Law attributes to the "greek-Orthodox Church", concerning the organization of the greek education abroad.

Based on the above study, a great deal of questions arises. Is the Orthodox Church of Greece prepared to play the significant role that Law grants to it, that is to exert political power and influence social life, by organizing intercultural schools all over the country. Could it do so, with the same concern to succeed, as at the same time it contributes to the organization and support of the greek education abroad? Is it possible that the same Church helps, through intercultural education, people of different origins or religions to live together harmoniously, especially in a country like Greece, where the prevailed religion, according to the greek Constitution, is the Orthodox Christian? Could the Orthodox Church of Greece cooperate with institutions of other religions of non-European origin or other Christian Churches, in order to organize intercultural education in Greece? Could this be the pathway, for the greek society, heading to some kind of religious pluralism?

The third sector in Southern Europe. Trends and researches in Italy and Spain

Pedercini, Claudia

EDUCATION SCIENCE DEPARTMENT, UNIVERSITY OF VERONA VERONA, ITALY

Keywords

Theories, third sector, comparison

The analysis of the third sector as emerging phenomenon of Twentieth Century Societies continues to give life to the many intellectual debates currently rising at academic level.

This contribution wants to explore some of the more recent debates towards the European Third Sector, underlying at first the theoretic views of reference which allow to illustrate the variety of different approaches from a point of view both geographical and disciplinary. Furthermore, we want to define some lines of research that help to "decode" this phenomenon, sharing language and boundary.

Certainly, some of the most meaningful proposals arise from American, French and Anglo-Saxon literature which, especially in the most recent contributions, give rise to a "positive" definition of the third sector as a meaningful and essential actor in Welfare State systems.

Starting from this remarks, this paper wants to compare the situation of associations and voluntary work referring to two South-European Countries: Italy and Spain.

This comparison will develop the analysis of the phenomenon underlying some of the issues rising from both Italian and Spanish debates (development of civil society, spaces and places of third sector, institutionalization of the third sector, crisis of third sector, citizenship etc?). We will examine political, historical and economical contributions of the literature in order to give rise to heterogeneity and complementarity of definitions, problems and sectors.

Relational sociology approach will help to translate emerging debates and issues, into potentialities which enable to think about third sector as an evolving sector, constantly reaching out towards his definition of spaces and ways of working.

Moreover, we want to offer a picture of the phenomenon in terms of dimension and composition.

This contribution intends to analyze how the third sector identifies himself and relates with other sectors (State, Market, informal sector), highlighting in real terms the forms of participation of the third sector in issues of Welfare and describing internal goals (legitimacy, development of associative democracy etc?) and limits (lack of professionalism, financial dependence and a grooving lack of autonomy, disorientation, lack of identification).

Trajectories of Education and Migration between Morocco and Italy: Gender Identities and Agency in Female Narratives

Santero, Arianna

Scienze Sociali - Social Science, Università di Torino - University of Turin

Torino, Italy

Keywords

Gender, education, Migration, Italy, Morocco

The case study analyses the trajectories of Moroccan mothers who attend two Adult Education and Training Centres in Turin. The aim of the research is to explore how migrant women compose and represent gender identities and individual agency, using a multidimensional approach that includes three analytic levels: institutional (immigration law, rules for the recognition of foreign diplomas, education agencies, preschool facilities); meso-sociological (households and migrant networks); micro-sociological (individual traits such as age, educational qualifications, area of origin, motivations and expectations).

The Moroccan female paths are positioned in a stereotypical discourse about the women's proper rule in the social space. The mothers present their migration and education choices in relation to husband, to their children and the context. Usually they do not perform themselves as an autonomous agent.

Nevertheless the mothers of preschool children interviewed are not merely "dependent" migrants: they leave their country to expanding their capabilities. Also if they "follow their husbands", they contribute to elaborating the migration strategies, create intercultural relations and assure the family reproduction by strengthening a gendered system of transnational care exchange.

They participate in the courses to improve their Italian, to contrasting the stigmatization, to help their children at school and to increasing their work opportunities. The Education Centres have two rather distinct functions. On the one hand, they offer a second chance to those women who dropped out earlier in Morocco. On the other hand, they replace the Moroccan qualification with an Italian one. But the rules currently regulating the recognition of foreign degree are quite complicated: both educated and non-educated Moroccan women face the same difficulties of integration into the labour market. Some graduated mothers stop looking for a job because refuse the underemployment.

Female identities and projects are constructed in and through these migrant narratives. They are not fixed, but continually produced by their protagonists. The incorporation of heterogeneous stories into the migrant network help to spread a new stratified discourse about women's migration, in which the stereotypical representations of Moroccan femininity is being gradually re-invented.

Why Sweden Works Best. A Comparative Research on Some European Countries' Welfare States as seen from Below

Bertaux, Daniel

Sociology, CNRS, France

Strasbourg, France

Keywords

Welfare State, europe, Poverty

A comparative European research project on the concrete workings of Welfare States has brought some interesting findings. The core focus of this project - "BETWIXT" - was on how families with children living in deprived areas of large European cities were coping and had coped with difficult conditions of life. We chose seven cities (Lisbon, Torino, Toulouse, London, Dublin, Helsinki, Umea° in Sweden); in each we picked up one of the most deprived areas and made a monograph of it. Then we selected twenty-seven families living there and collected their case histories. All belonged to the manual working class and shared similar characteristics: disability of the father, or his unemployment, his absence (single-mother families), or immigrant status. Such features universally made everyday life difficult and threatened the actual becoming (devenir) of children, which were the main focus of parents' efforts in the long run. But similar handicapping characteristics led to highly contrasted outcomes: in Scandinavian-Nordic cities (Umea and Helsinki) and in Toulouse, families could rely on nationwide Welfare systems of public insurance - financed by all citizens through taxes, or by all working people through Social Security contributions - and on reasonably generous public assistance ("Welfare" properly said). In other cities (especially Dublin and Lisbon, but also Torino and London) solidarities tended to be restricted to extended kinship and perhaps neighbours, which was very often not enough to avoid pitfalls. Comparison clearly showed that, contrarily to ultraliberal false beliefs and propaganda, "the market" (that is, paid work) was not always providing the solution (because e.g. systemic discriminations on labour markets or the cost of private day-care centres); and Welfare benefits did not make people more passive but more active, as they felt (e.g. in Sweden) that their efforts would be eventually rewarded. As for "Family", supposedly the locus of solidarity in Southern Europe, either it was too poor to help or it appeared often to be the problem (as with alcoholic fathers, or stigma on single mothers). Nation-wide well-organised systems of solidarity such as the Swedish one stood out as providing by far the best arrangements.

Women and welfare in the South

Portugal, Sílvia

*Centre of Social Studies / School of Economics, University of Coimbra
Coimbra, Portugal*

Keywords

welfare regimes, Social Policy, care, women, welfare

The paper intends to show how the Southern model of welfare and, specially, the portuguese situation defies mainstream theories about welfare regimes. The role of family in social protection, women's care work, the impact of public policies for men and women are dimensions, traditionally forgotten, that assume a crucial importance when we discuss welfare production in southern european countries.

The paper characterizes portuguese welfare regime, arguing that women's situation is a key issue to understand its specificities within the South. High participation of women in the labour market, female responsibility for care work, low social transfers, insufficient social support infrastructures, strong "familism" in social policy - these are some of the factors that define Portuguese welfare regime and allow to discuss its similarities and differences with other southern countries.

RN29

Social Theory

A muddle concept: making sense of social capital operationalizations

Cabaço, Susana

*Instituto de Ciências Sociais, Universidade de Lisboa - Instituto de Ciências Sociais
Lisboa, Portugal*

Calca, Patrícia

*CIES - Centre for Research and Studies in Sociology (ISCTE), CIES - Centre for Research and Studies in Sociology (ISCTE)
Lisboa, Portugal*

Keywords

theory, social capital, operationalization

Social Capital is an ever-changing concept. The literature is so extensive and with so many clues for research that it is hard to elect one. Political Science, Economics, Sociology, Management, among other disciplines benefited from its applicability. However, we wish to reflect about the paths that some authors developed trying to conceptualise this idea. But more than that, we want to achieve a level of abstraction that permits us to comprehend some key aspects. In order to attain this goal, we propose to abridge some key approaches of the concept and analyse some of the possible analytical schemes.

This controversial concept has, though, a common aspect emerging from current debates: most of the literature tries to build explanatory approaches focusing mainly on sociocultural factors to explain political processes and phenomena. Nonetheless, empirical studies combine a broad variety of operationalizations of the concept, either measuring, for example, network involvement, trust, citizenship norms, among other dimensions. In our perspective, this is a fundamental normative concept because it is an attractive element for public policy making - positive connotation attributed to its presence in society and its causal role in civic attitudes and engagement.

As we noted this is a successful and widely diffused concept regarded by many as an instrument for social research. Several authors elaborated different theories of social capital, with diverse purposes in mind. Bourdieu (1980) presented a resource and group-centred approach, this effort was made in the attempt of edifice a theory of social reproduction (underlying material and symbolic resources). Coleman (1987), on the other side, intended to provide a framework to his argument social relations characterize the social structure and social capital is, in his perspective, a way to reconcile individual action and social structure. Putnam (2000) sustains that social capital refers to connections among individuals social networks and the norms of reciprocity and trustworthiness that arise from them. Although, for us, a fundamental questioning is how social capital should/ could be measured? We will try to shed light over the multiple operationalizations of the concept and try to extract and analyse the trends and analytical models proposed.

A Seance with Philip Rieff

Turner, Charles

Sociology, Warwick University coventry, UK

Keywords

order, Rieff, authority, belief

Philip Rieff's three volume magnum opus, Sacred Order/Social Order, started to appear just before his death in 2006. It was accompanied by a fourth volume, Charisma: the gift of grace (2007). An almost forgotten man - his last important work was The Triumph of the Therapeutic in 1966 - Rieff died without being able to witness the reception of his last works. Despite the fact that his is a faith based critique of modernity, Rieff continued to hold a title of professor of sociology and always called himself a social theorist. Concerned as they are with the aesthetics of authority and with the relationship between social order and belief, Sacred Order/Social Order and Charisma also deploy terminology taken from outside the social sciences, and thus raise questions about the limits of social theory. In particular they recall the challenge of Freudian approaches to those of Weber on authority and Durkheim on order. In this paper I will deploy arguments from the philosophy of the social sciences in order to assess the relationship between a hermeneutics of culture and cultural diagnosis that pervades Rieff's writings. I conclude that they are a failure, but a heroic failure that raises questions about social order that social theory has for a long time failed to address.

A second modernity: the cosmopolitan vision of Beck

Macedo, Lurdes

*Instituto de Ciências Sociais - Centro de Estudos Comunicação e Sociedade, Universidade do Minho
Braga, Portugal*

Keywords

second modernity, cultural contradictions, cosmopolitan vision

The thinking about the human condition in the modern age allows us to conclude that the modernity project is unfinished. New tools have been searched in order to a new approach of modern ideals. In spite of this, we feel that it is necessary to propose more active perspectives to cope with the modernity challenges.

Ulrich Beck's cosmopolitan vision proposes us the transparent interpretation of the world. In this vision, the differences and oppositions might be understood according to the principle that «the others» are, in their essence, similar to us. The cosmopolitan vision is a more sensitive approach to the to the current world conditions; so, it is able to understand the ambivalences posed by the cultural contradictions of the global age.

A Way out for Europe through the Concept of Societal Community

Soler Gallart, Marta

*Sociological Theory, Universitat de Barcelona
Barcelona, Spain*

Oliver, Esther

*Sociological Theory, Universitat de Barcelona
Barcelona, Spain*

Flecha, Ramon

*Sociological Theory, Universitat de Barcelona
Barcelona, Spain*

Keywords

Societal community, European community, Habermas, Parsons,

Sociological concepts can play a relevant role in building Europe as a community beyond state borders and the post-WWII division between East and West. Habermas proposed the concept of constitutional patriotism after abandoning the idea of guiding a communicative reorientation of the Parsonian concept of societal community. This paper sustains that Habermas' abandon was the result of his misunderstanding of Parsons' theory, and a dialogic reorientation of the concept of societal community is able to give a sociological orientation to the building of Europe.

Habermas clearly explains the role of the three revolutions already concluded in Parsons' theory: the industrial, the democratic and the educational revolutions detached the economic, the political and the cultural subsystems from the original community. There is still a fourth revolution, the expressive one, but Habermas argues that one cannot understand what this revolution will detach. He even gets angry with what he considers to be Parsons' mistake: "What we then find vexing is the fact that Parsons introduces the system of the basic conditions of human existence intention recta by way of supplementing the action system with three additional subsystems" (Habermas, 1987, p.255). In some works that not quoted by Habermas, Parsons clarifies that expressive revolution does not detach anything from the community but rather reintegrate economy, polity and culture within a new societal community.

Parsons thinks the societal community is more developed in North America than in Europe. He says, "One possible consequence of the pluralization of religion is reduce moral consensus. Value generalization has been much more important: the underlying moral consensus has persisted, but is defined at a higher level of generality than in the European societies that have institutionalized internal religious uniformity" (Parsons, 1977, p.193). For him, in order to develop its own societal community Europe should create a community identity with common principles among all citizens. But even after 1989, Europe has not been able to find such a common ground. Parsons' concept is useful to understand current difficulties and to provide orientations needed to overcome them, at the same time that a communicative reorientation of this concept is possible.

Actors and decisions: can theories help theorists make "rational" choices?

Cabrita, Miguel

*Department of Sociology, ISCTE
Lisbon, Portugal*

Keywords

Rational choice, decisions, individuals

Rational choice is one of the most relevant theoretical traditions in the social sciences and, while many of its basic assumptions have fuelled considerable theoretical and conceptual criticism and debates within sociology, it has established itself as a prominent perspective in the study of individuals and action. The core components of such an approach, as well as its potential and weaknesses, have been widely discussed, and while authors in this tradition have sought to produce important conceptual innovations to deal with criticisms and shortcomings, others have tried to incorporate some of its elements into other theoretical frameworks. If anything, structural changes in contemporary societies have only come to sharpen the need to improve instruments to accurately account for individual decisions and actions and how they relate to other dimensions of social life. In this presentation, an attempt is made to assess current prospects of debates around these issues, aiming to map some of the main critical points in such discussions and valid contributions that may help to overcome difficulties and limitations in this field. For this purpose, both rational choice theorists and critics will be put in perspective in order to discuss how can sociologists make further progress in understanding the complex links between social contexts and constraints, actors and action and, more specifically, the room for categories such as decision-making and choice in this framework.

Are Norms Limited to Human Beings? A necessary debate between sociology and evolutionary biology

Meleghy, Tamás

Department of Sociology, University of Innsbruck Innsbruck, Austria

Niedenzu, Heinz-Jürgen

Department of Sociology, University of Innsbruck Innsbruck, Austria

Keywords

social theory, normativity, biology, anthropology

Since Durkheim normativity has been treated as an essential medium for guiding human action and processes of social integration. Sociologists usually link this view with the belief that the normative coordination of action is limited to human beings. Recently, the latter assumption has fundamentally become doubted by biologists (ethologists; socio-biologists). On the basis of studies in the wild they suppose to provide sufficient evidence for a normative coordination of animal behaviour.

We would like to take this challenge seriously. With help of the analytical tools of sociology, we will try to clarify relevant differences between human societies and animals living in groups. In particular, with respect to the normative coordination of behaviour the question shall be raised, whether in the case of human beings the evolutionary heritage just increases in quantitative regard compared to a former mode of behavioural coordination, or whether we have to conceptualize a qualitative break within the evolutionary process. Finally, we will discuss to what extent the sociological understanding of normativity must be extended by concepts developed within evolutionary theory.

Civil Society Debate in Turkey: Discursive Struggles among the Intellectuals attempting at the Construction of Neo-liberal Truth Regime?

Al-Rebholz, Anil

Sociology, FGS (Frankfurt Graduate School for the Humanities and Social Sciences Frankfurt am Main, Germany

Keywords

knowledge production, Discursive Praxis of Intellectuals, Civil Society Debate in Turkish Social Sciences

The Western civil society literature is dominated by a dichotomic model of civil society vs. state (Keane 1988; Taylor 1990; Walzer 1995) which neglects the fact that the sphere of civil society itself can be an ambivalent and contradictory because of the cleavages, tensions and conflicts between different groups in it (Chandhoke 1995). The contradictory character of civil society sphere which is driven through power relations has been also widely neglected in the Turkish academic landscape. By the time, particularly since the widespread popularisation of the concept in mid 1980s civil society became to be used synonymous with a sphere within which different social groups coexist and live with each other peacefully and harmoniously representing the only source of democratic potential against a totalitarian centralist kemalist State.

Beyond the questioning of this simplistic and non-critical notion of civil society, this paper aims at analysing the civil society debate in Turkey, making use of Foucauldian critical discourse analysis approach, putting it in the frame of discursive and knowledge praxis of academic and public intellectuals. Accordingly the appearance, the rise and intensive usage of the civil society concept by the liberal intellectuals, academicians and journalists in Turkey, since 90s but also ongoing in 2000s in the political public sphere, will be examined in the framework of 'democratisation debate' and neo-liberal re-structuring of state-society relations in the aftermath of 1980 Coup D'etat (Yalman 2002; Erdogan & Üstüner 2002), that means as part of discursive strategies of construction of a neo-liberal truth regime in Turkey. Drawing on the Gramscian notion of Intellectual complemented by Foucault's discourse analytical approach, this paper interprets civil society debate in Turkey as struggle over societal meaning, and struggle over contested political realities among intellectuals competing for the validity of their version of social-political reality and therefore striving for discursive dominance. Thus, putting the struggle over the definition of social reality, i.e. the political discourse produced by the academic and public intellectuals in the centre of analysis, this paper aims at a better understanding of the complex relationship between power-intellectuals-knowledge production and the dynamics of this relationship.

Cohesion in the new economic and social conditions, new media, new public space

Panagiotopoulou, Roy

*Communication and Media Studies, University of Athens
Athens, Greece*

Keywords

social cohesion, Public Space, old and new media

In recent years the European policy concerning the media was directed towards a growing commercialization and privatization of the sector. Despite all declarations and expressions of good will the possibilities to create a European public sphere, as Habermas conceived it, or a public space remained has extremely restricted. Furthermore, the incremental enlargement of the EU member states has increased the challenges of integrating them into a common legislative and economic system.

The current financial and monetary crisis reveals ambivalent stances and anticipations regarding the EU cohesion. On the one hand, each country try to minimize the consequences of the crisis at a national level adopting distinct measures, and on the other, it becomes more and more obvious that effective solutions can only emerge from a common policy. In this case the media undertake a decisive role because they mediate in rebuilding consent and posing the prerequisites for a common encountering of the crisis. This is a new situation given the fact that the media never sustained cohesion among the member states in practice but only in rhetoric.

How will the EU communicative space develop regarding the possible set-up of a future public space? Is the current economic crisis a crash test for EU cohesion? Will this be the beginning of new common identifications and political priorities or will it signify the end of the vision for a European community? What will be the role of the national and international media? These are the main questions this paper will try to answer by examining the discourse about the emergence of a European public sphere and by monitoring the role of the media in mediating the economic policy in selected EU countries.

Complexity Theories in the XXI Century

Ruzzeddu, Massimiliano

*Studi Politici, University La Sapienza
Rome, Italy*

Keywords

rationality, complexity, paradigms

My paper will base upon my past researches on the use of Complexity Theories (CT) in the sociological thought.

From the 70's on, several authors thought that CT could help face the epistemic problems, that the former theoretical debate had found affect sociology.

Those problems belonged essentially to three categories:

- the limits of rationality in interpreting reality and foreseeing its evolution.
- the impossibility, for the observer, not to deform the observed object or the collected data
- the consequences over the social reality that a new scientific find might imply.

Although scholars like Morin claimed often that CT could overcome those problems, very often they did not achieve this goal; they only acknowledged that social reality is "complex", but could not yield theoretical tools that were as effective as the logics had been in describing mechanical phenomena.

Thus, CT became the theoretical base to reject mechanical- rationalism, on behalf, on one hand, of qualitative, hermeneutic methodologies and, on the other, of statistical-probabilistic calculations.

Now, the theoretical core of my paper will be an attempt to assess if and how Complexity Theories can be useful in the Sociological Theory in a different way.

According to Weber's thought, this implies assessing how much sociology can yield methodologically rigorous observations and an adequate level of objectivity even within those unavoidable epistemic limits. So that, I will outline a theoretic framework, which takes into account those limits. Then, I will try to explore for what objects, a "complex" sociology can provide the best performance. For example, a perfect modelling for phenomena like Globalisation, international risks, terrorism etc. is obviously impossible; thus, current sociological theory should assess at what extent is possible to comprehend them, which means assessing what level of ignorance is scientifically acceptable. A possible, cognitive strategy would drop the aim of seizing the ontology of those objects and focus on what strategies social actors have implemented, in order to face an increased social complexity and how they react to the incertitude, that those phenomena imply.

Contemporary organismic sociology (COS): substantive provisions

Franchuk, Victor

*Social management, Russian State Social University
Moscow, Russia*

Keywords

mechanism, social, model, sociology, organismic

COS represents attempt of modernization of organismic theory of G.Spenser on the basis new organismic model of a society (NOM) and the modern evolutionary theory.

The modern evolutionary theory (Lima-de-Faria) considers social evolution as process of speciation of societies with the help of universal mechanisms of evolution (selection and assembly, natural selection, disintegration). In result on the Earth consistently there were more and more complex social organisms. This process has convergent character.

According to NOM a society is considered as rather steady integrity showing reasonable behavior is similar to an alive organism. Reasonable behavior means ability of a society to answer calls adequately, or in other words, to satisfy the social needs, or to reveal and solve the social problems understood as a deviation from the standard social norms.

In each society there is a system of the base values (P.Sorokin) and the social mechanism (A.Compte) revealing and deciding social problems, and protecting base values and norms. The social mechanism solves social problems with the help of samples of public culture created by it as law, social institutes, social values and norms, innovations, organizational system and others SPC.

The social mechanism consists of two parts - state and not state ones. Last, includes institutes of a civil society (political parties, public movements, churches etc) is not less important, than the first part. Social mechanism consist also of political system and the executive mechanism. The political system plays the leading part in a society as it defines the most important problems and makes of the decision; gives the tasks to executive mechanism; forms socio-cultural spaces of a society; should protect base values and norms.

NOM must help in diagnostics and treatment (therapy) of ills of society. Comparison NOM with working society allows to carry out its diagnostics, to reveal lacks (pathologies) and realize elimination of these lacks by put into practice of new reforms. The last should concern, first of all, strengthening of system of base values and social norms corresponding to them, and also strengthening of the social mechanism of a society, including state mechanism.

Contemporary Social Theory: Aesthetics, Social Value and Social Improvisation

Sutherland, Allan

Nursing, Kyushu University of Nursing and Social Welfare Tamana, Japan

Keywords

social values, explanation, improvisation, aesthetics

Following Weber's value distinctions, a stream of contemporary sociology requires the division and separation of social practices, social values and culture from one another for the adequate treatment of each, then seeks their subsequent reintegration into coherent statements. The very disentangling of social practices, values, and culture tends to ascribe each dissimilar operating logics making their subsequent reintegration into coherent statements appear intractable. Aesthetic values and practices would seem to offer the most detached, disinterested (Bourdieu 1984, 1995) social value imaginable, thus sometimes viewed as underlying aestheticisation of social practices and consumer identities (Featherstone 2007). It is suggested that aesthetic practices of music making are integral with social practices more generally by examining Adorno's ideas of aesthetic development as imminent to the current theoretical and conceptual problem of musical materials as social located, and examining attempts to model social action through the metaphor of the improvising ensemble. Evidence is drawn from statements of contemporary improvising musicians Brad Mehldau, Evan Parker, and Derek Bailey, and interview data of international improvising musicians concerning music making and aesthetic change to investigate the relationship of aesthetic practices to social practices and procedures for evaluating adequacy and coherence within parsimonious and empirically based explanations.

Cosmopolitanism and social theory, as a contribution to the european sociology

Verpraet, Gilles

institut des sciences sociales, CNRS/ Université paris X

PARIS, FRANCE

Keywords

axiology and hybridation, Cosmopolitanism, cultural exchange, european societies

The first step analyzes the different dimensions of the cosmopolitanism in the sociological debate, as ethical cosmopolitanism, as cultural cosmopolitanism, as political cosmopolitanism. So can be specified, how cosmopolitanism issues contribute to new frames in cultural exchange and cultural integration, to the component of collective identity .The second purpose intends to assess the contributions of the cosmopolitan debates to European issue, not only as internal integration (national welfare and social cohesion) but also to specify the external modes of integration (migrations, cultural exchange with other countries).

This new axiology for cultural exchanges with appeal to global justice can be compared with each national development of the thematic (UK, France, Germany) between conception of social integration and visions for cosmopolitanism. In this frame, the thesis of Esping Andersen, U Beck and E Durkheim can be discussed. The meaningful sociological methodology combines purposively these two levels of analyzis.

Cosmopolitanism and the Sociology of Europe

Roche, Maurice

*Sociological Studies Department, Sheffield University
Sheffield, UK*

Keywords

europe, Cosmopolitanism, , sociological perspective

Cosmopolitanism has been recently proposed as a relevant sociological perspective for understanding European society, for instance in the work of Ulrich Beck and his colleagues. The paper reflects on this proposal. It considers the concept of cosmopolitanism and assesses its relevance in the sociological and social theoretical understanding of Europe in both normative and analytic terms. The paper argues that the cosmopolitan perspective has considerable potential sociological and social theoretical relevance and use providing it is interpreted i) normatively in 'minimal' or 'negative' terms, and ii) analytically in ways which focus on the 'coexistence' and 'complexity' characteristics of European history and sociality. The discussion draws on aspects of my new book 'Exploring the Sociology of Europe: An analysis of the European Social Complex' (2009, Sage, London).

Development and Deployment of Social Network Analysis: a Sociological Overview

Xerez, Romana

*Social Policy, Instituto Superior de Ciências Sociais e Políticas
Lisbon, Portugal*

Keywords

social network analysis, Sociology of Science, paradigm

How does social network analysis (SNA) matter to the sociological theory? This paper examines the emergence of SNA, its contribution to the development of sociological theory, and reflections to sociological methods. Lead by the sociological founding fathers such as Durkheim, Comte or Georg Zimmel, the late nineteen century was considered the pre-history of this emergent perspective. Although the relational perspective emerged with the first sociologists, only in the seventies it was recognized as a research field. This paper analyses the key seminal sociological contributions to SNA paradigm in three different periods. First, the pre-history. Second, the beginning with Moreno and sociometry; Manchester with European anthropologists; Harvard and Harrison C. White network. Third: the analysis of the emergent research field and its different paradigm features. At the same time some leading scholars, such as Wellman and Freeman with the goal of network analysis taking off created the journal, newsletter and conferences on this new field. More recently in the late 1990s but grounded in the 60s research, a group of physicists developed the paradigm of the 'small world problem' and examined the structural properties of social groups. The advantages of the graphic visualizations and computer software packages expanded SNA to different audiences and publics. What are the main key features to this emergent paradigm? How does SNA matter to sociology of science? How does Europe contribute to this state of the art? How has SNA been grounded in sociology? In a critical analysis, this paper provides a comprehensive overview of these research questions and examines substantive areas in which social network analysis has been applied such as: business, epidemiology, terrorism, urban studies, social policy or physics.

Dimensions of a civic consciousness: Mechanisms of social solidarity in contemporary Sweden

Jacobsson, Kerstin

School of Social Sciences, Södertörn University Huddinge, Sweden

Sandstedt, Eva

Department of Sociology, Uppsala University Uppsala, Sweden

Keywords

civic consciousness, Solidarity, Durkheim, social integration

Contemporary sociology is strong in conceptualising social life in terms of cleavages and differences, conflicts of interest or identity, mechanisms of segregation and social exclusion. It is much less concerned with conceptualising, let alone observing, the solidarity and social "bind" that exist also in our modern, complex and individualised societies. This type of social bond has little to do with community or Gemeinschaft relationships. The paper departs from Durkheim's conviction that there is a collective life also in Gesellschaft, which it is the task of the sociologist to study. It is, however, argued that Durkheim's notion of "organic solidarity" is unsuitable to capture this bond. Durkheim's notion of a "civic morality", which can bridge the moral codes of various social groups, is more useful. The paper aims at conceptualising as well as empirically investigating the social bonds and mechanisms of social integration/solidarity that exist in contemporary Sweden. For this purpose, the paper introduces the notions of "civic consciousness" and "civic co-feeling" as sociological categories. The paper also addresses the specific combination of individualism and collectivism that is distinctive for Swedish civic culture.

Emergence and Reduction in the Social Sciences

Rios, Diego

Philosophy and Economics, Witten Herdecke University Witten, Germany

Keywords

Emergence, reduction, micro-macro link, methodological individualism, explanation

The issue of social emergence in the social sciences has recently being the focus of much attention. Different social phenomena 'bubbles, organizations, impossibility results' have been identified as putative candidates for illustrating properly emergent social phenomena. Advocates of methodological individualism have shown an ambivalent attitude vis-à-vis social emergence, rejecting it on some occasions and embracing it in others. In this paper I will scrutinize the reasons for this ambivalence. I uphold three theses. First, I will argue that there are in fact two different notions of emergence weak and strong. Second, I will argue that only strong emergence is philosophically puzzling. Most examples used in the social sciences to support emergentism are examples of the rather inoffensive variety of weak emergence. Last but not least, I will argue that, once the distinction between weak and strong emergence is made, the ambivalence of methodological individualism vis-à-vis emergence can be eliminated: only the strong notion of emergence is incompatible with methodological individualism.

Ethical Capitalism and Its Cultural Logic

Cole, Nicki Lisa

Sociology, University of California, Santa Barbara Santa Barbara, California, United States

Keywords

Critical Theory, identity, consumerism, ethical capitalism, morality

In this paper I present a conceptual sketch of ethical capitalism and consumerism, which I argue now represent the dominant mode of capitalism and of culture in the United States. Ethical capitalism refers to the practices, relations, and ideologies that re-ect the central idea that relations of production and consumption should be forces for good, and benefit all involved. Ethical consumerism is a cultural mode in which we see the discourse of ethical capitalism manifested in the lives, identities, practices and thoughts of people in society. The central principles of ethical consumerism are that one must be thoughtful about one's purchases, and that certain things must be protected in the consumer decision making process; the environment, one's health, and the conditions of labor involved are the primary concerns. Building on the legacies of Marx and Gramsci, I employ critical cultural theories and theories of the postmodern to construct a theoretical framework for seeing and understanding ethical capitalism/consumption. Drawing on observations of our contemporary era and dissertation research currently underway in the ethical coffee market I argue that ethical capitalism normalizes a racialized, global division of labor that organizes both production and consumption of goods, and reproduces the system in the discourse and imagery of consumer goods, and in the everyday lives of people in the world. Simultaneously ethical capitalism is heralded as the champion of democratic development and human rights, yet it produces just marginal change in the lives of laborers and producers, and ultimately, serves to only deepen the grip of global capitalism and fuels inequality.

Europe as a part of a world society

Lindemann, Gesa

Institute for Social Sciences, Carl von Ossietzky University Oldenburg(Oldb), Germany

Keywords

European society, World Society, functional differentiation, borders of the social world

The talk discusses different understandings of Europe. Does the European society represent a specific type? Or do different types of society exist within the framework of Europe? Or is it appropriate to grasp Europe as a part of a world society, the political domain of which are structured in a quasi-segmentary way. These questions will be discussed from a theory-of-society-perspective, which combines the analysis of the borders of the social world (Luckmann, Plessner) with the theory of functional differentiation offered by Niklas Luhmann.

Europe seen from outside - Current challenges in general sociological theory

Keim, Wiebke

Dept. of Social Work and Social Policy, Fribourg University Fribourg, Switzerland

Keywords

Southern theory, internationalisation, epistemology

In historical perspective, sociology as an academic discipline - as opposed to social thinking more broadly - has emerged in Western Europe. In many cases, sociology has then expanded into the other continents via colonialism and imperialism. This exogenous origin of sociology in the global South has created problems of unequal relationships within the discipline in general, and more precisely problems of dependency and marginality of the Southern countries in sociological theory building.

The consequences of these historical developments have been severely criticized in the course of, roughly, the past three decades. However, these criticisms have more often than not been taken for merely political ones, that is for arguments against academic colonialism, scientific imperialism, orientalism, eurocentrism and Western intellectual hegemony or domination. Maybe the strongly political and/or ideological side of the discussion has led to a state of the debate where the epistemological challenge that these criticisms represent for our discipline has hardly been recognized as such. However, several recent publications have re-centred the debate and focussed more precisely on the theoretical and epistemological challenges of Southern theory production for sociology as a discipline (Alatas 2006, Connel 2008, Hountondji 2008, Keim 2008, Lander, 2000). Interestingly, the various approaches seem to be in communication via newly emerging academic South-South-connections. They thus lead to questionings about the possible emergence, or existence, of counter hegemonic intellectual spaces of communication and interaction.

In this paper, I will discuss some of the most important arguments put forward in the debate, relying on a selection of the most prominent ones among the mentioned recent publications. It seems more necessary than ever, today, to take into account these voices emerging from the South and their perspectives on European sociology as "seen from outside", as the debate around "internationalisation" or "globalisation" of the discipline has become a current feature in international encounters. I conclude on a provocative tone, stating that in a long term perspective, European theorists will need to take these arguments emerging from the global South seriously, if they want to avoid their own marginalisation and provincialisation.

European Society or European Societies: Methodology of Answer

Kirdina, Svetlana

*sub-division of evolution of social and economic systems, Institute of Economics of Russian Academy of Sciences
Moscow, Russia*

Keywords

theory, Institutional, Matrices

The answer to the main question of the 9th European Sociological Association Conference, 2009 depends on the methodology what is used for the sociological analysis of modern society. The paper presents the use of the Institutional Matrices Theory (IMT) for this analysis. Within the frameworks of IMT paradigm the European society can be considered from two points of view.

First, the same basic institutions predominate in the institutional structure of most European nations. They are the following:

in the economic sphere: institutions of market economy; in the political sphere: institutions of federative (federative-subsidiary) political order; in the ideological sphere: institutions of the ideology of subsidiarity which proclaims the dominance of individual values over the values of larger communities, the latter bearing a subsidiary, subordinating character to the personality, i.e. the priority of I over We.

In this regards we can say about the European Society what is different from Russian, Chinese or Indian societies because other basic institutions prevail in these societies. There are the following:

in the economic sphere: redistributive economy institutions (term introduced by Karl Polanyi, 1977). Redistributive economies are characterized by the situation when the center regulates the movement of goods and services, as well as the rights for their production and use; in the political sphere: institutions of unitary (unitary-centralized) political order; in the ideological sphere: institutions of communitarian ideology, the essence of which is expressed by the idea of dominance of collective, public values over individual ones, the priority of We over I.

Above-mentioned institutions play the additional or complementary role in the institutional complex of European society.

Second, the embodiment of the same basic institutions as well as proportions of basic and complementary institutions is discernible for European nations. E.g. the ratio of public and private property is higher in France in comparison with Germany. Or the federative political order is carried out in different political European models. From this point of view we can say about European Societies bearing no resemblance to each other.

European Society or European Societies? Critical and discursive perspective

Jablonska, Barbara

*Institute of Sociology, Jagiellonian University
Krakow, Poland*

Keywords

Critical Theory, Civil Society, discourse, European society/societies, symbolic power

The fundamental conference question: "European society or European societies?" will be considered in a communicative and critical perspective. According to the assumptions of many contemporary social thinkers (eg. Habermas, Baudrillard, Bourdieu, Czyewski, van Dijk, Fairclough) whose analysis concentrates on the communicative aspect of social reality, and civil society conditions in particular, the discursive aspect of theoretical and practical reflection on the mentioned conference problematic seems to be essential.

Thus, in the first part of my paper I would like to concentrate on the discursive aspect of the European social reality taking into consideration the principles of so-called CDA (critical discourse analysis) postulated by Teun van Dijk. Such a critical perspective will be used to develop two theoretical models of discourse - civil and uncivil one. The civil model of discourse is based on the prepositions of Jrgen Habermas theory of communicative action (especially his conception public sphere, communicative action, consensus, rational argumentation, Lebenswelt). The second model of the discourse, that is uncivil one, is constructed on the theoretical conceptions of two French authors: Pierre Bourdieu and Michel Foucault (especially the ideas of symbolic power, oppressive discourse, symbolic elites, exclusion, imposition of mental structures).

In the second part of the presentation the above mentioned theoretical constructions will be applied to the problematic of the public sphere development of European society / societies. The fundamental questions which will be taken into consideration are: 1) can we talk about one coherent European public sphere, or several public spheres on the national level?; 2) having in mind the importance of the communicative processes within European society/societies, the elements of which model of discourse predominates in European debates (such problem will be discussed on the base of two examples - the debate on the Constitutional Treaty and Treaty of Lisbon); 3). What are the critical postualtes (according to CDA principles) to identify positive and negative aspects of communicative processes within European society/societies?

In conclusion, the paper will present the potentials and possibilities of critical theory application to the problem of European society/societies conditons on the discursive level.

Existential Analytic and Sociology

Tasheva, Gallina

Sociology, University of Kassel Kassel, Germany

Keywords

coexistence, Heidegger, responsivity

Building on three fundamental ideas of social theory

- i) the classical sociological idea of singularity of social beings (Dilthey, Weber, Simmel, Mead, as well as the contemporary theory of actors developed by Boudon, Coleman, Hedström)
- ii) the existential-phenomenological idea of temporal structure and finite nature of human life as constitutive for the form of social life (Simmel, Heidegger, Levinas)
- iii) the ethics of alterity (Levinas, Derrida) - we will present a concept of existential-analytic understanding of sociology as a new critical and deconstructive analytic approach to global social fields such as coexistence, violence, war, human rights, reproductive processes of life and biopolitics, genetic engineering, and death benefit. The paper exemplifies this existential-analytic understanding of sociology with the notion and concept of coexistence - "being with" as mutual asymmetric relation of responsivity.

Experience Revisited: Searching for a critical notion of the concept of experience for the social sciences

Hertlein, Julia

*Department of Philosophy, University of Vienna
Vienna, Austria*

Keywords

experience, situated knowledge, Sociology of Knowledge, Critique of Science, Feminist Epistemologies and Methodologies

When Pierre Bourdieu asks for the objectification of objectivity - or more precisely for the objectification of the relationship of the observer to the observed - he underlines the necessity for self-reflexivity in the social sciences. In an attempt to escape the unproductive antagonism between subjectivism and objectivism in classical debates in the sociology of knowledge, he points out that only a critical objectification of the epistemological and social conditions of knowledge makes it possible to include both perspectives: a reflexive return to the subjective experience of the world and a objectification of the objective conditions of that experience.

The attention for the epistemological and social conditions of knowledge was also crucial for the early Eighties feminist critique of science. As suggested by them and by the sociology of knowledge and their claim that knowledge is socially situated, the underrepresentation of women in academia has consequences for the form and content of scientific discourse: on one level feminist thinkers tried to include "women's experiences" in their research as a rich source of understanding women's lives. On another level they began to analyse the various implications of androcentric epistemology, methodology, and conceptions of the female body, identifying them as hidden mechanisms of power that structure the scientific field.

In my dissertation research I seek a non-essentialist critical concept of experience for the social sciences. To do so, I draw on the critical debates of feminist epistemologies and methodologies (particularly in zones of tension, e.g. between feminist standpoint theories and poststructuralist approaches), on critical theory (e.g. "The Positivist Dispute in German Sociology") and the work of Bourdieu. Although the concept of experience has a central meaning for any anti-positivist and feminist critique of science (as well as for critical social science) there are few attempts at systematic examination and clarification. The concept of experience shall therefore be analysed from two perspectives: perspective of the "observed" and perspective of the "observer" and how these two "interact" during the performance of qualitative research in the social sciences.

In my contribution I will explore the concept of experience within the aforementioned (often controversial) theoretical directions and traditions.

Formal organisation and public observation

Beetz, Michael

Institute for Sociology, University of Jena Jena, Germany

Keywords

second order observation, organisation, modern society, Public, bureaucracy

European Society consists not just of various nations, but contains a broad variety of cultures, milieus and social fields. From a theoretical point of view, the question arises, whether there are general principles that characterize this current type of society. Indeed, as the paper will suggest, there are two essential mechanisms ensuring social order and structural flexibility at the same time: the institutionalization of decision making processes by formal organisations and the cultural mirror constituted by second order observation of the public. Both mechanisms can be traced back to 18th-century Europe.

According to the common view, organisations are associated with political bureaucracy, and public sphere is understood as a political force. But besides the interrelation between public opinion and the state, which constitutes "modern democracy", "capitalism" is based on public markets and formal hierarchies too (Williamson), even in the post-industrial era. Modern science relies on the one hand on bureaucratic institutions such as universities; on the other hand it is geared to the current state of research, which has to be observed by means of often-cited publications. Most of the achievements of modern society including mass media and educational system can be described as special forms of formal organisation or public observation. Since there are different types of organisation (army, university, church etc.) as well as different levels of the public, this may open up a comparative perspective for empirical research.

While classic sociologists did place much emphasis on related topics such as the bureaucratisation of society (Weber) or the quasi-religious function of public opinion (Tönnies), today it may seem a trivial diagnosis to point at these general principles of modern society. The paper should encourage a debate about the theoretical status of that kind of "simple but abstract" theoretical concepts, too. Can sociology still make use of it, or do a professional organisation of scientific research and the focus of public attention force to a more explanatory format and common topics?

From Innovation to Evolution: The Sources of Institutional Change

Kern, Thomas

*Sociology, University of Heidelberg
Heidelberg, Germany*

Keywords

Evolution, innovation, pragmatism, new institutionalism

When biologists talk about evolution, they typically refer to two mechanisms of change: genetic mutation and environmental selection. In the field of social sciences, the function of genetic mutation is usually ascribed to individual and collective actors who constantly attempt to innovate and establish new institutional solutions from which they believe that they will help to settle specific social problems. In the next step, the survival of this innovation largely depends on its "fitness" with the cultural and institutional environment. Over the past decades, the literature on new institutionalism considerably contributed to our understanding of the evolutionary dynamics which accompany this selection process. However, a review of the literature also indicates that ? beyond the field of sociological technology studies ? only little attention has been paid to the process of innovation that precedes selection and significantly contributes to evolutionary change.

Drawing on examples from the field of social movement research, this presentation aims at developing a theoretical framework for the analysis of the innovation process. In the first step, an outline of a pragmatist theory of action will be developed. Mead, Dewey, and Joas consider the actors' ability to reflect and reassess a situation when routines fail and expectations are disappointed as the primary source of human creativity. In the second step, it will be shown that the creation of innovative solutions is not an individual project. It is embedded in a social context of collaborative efforts. Recent accounts of social network theory stress that the probability for the emergence of new ideas and practices increases when previously separate groups begin to exchange information. In the third step, the attention moves to the normativity of innovative solutions. In particular, radical innovations always include value judgments that challenge the existing social order. These judgements are connected to alternative "visions" or "concepts" of society which exert a great influence on the innovation process by giving orientation to individual and collective actors. However, during the selection process, these sets of cultural orientation may considerably change.

From the disciplinary society to the society of control: surveillance over immigrants from Turkey in Germany

Topal, Cagatay

*Sociology, Middle East Technical University
Ankara, Turkey*

Keywords

CONTROL, immigrants, Deleuze, discipline, Surveillance

Surveillance over immigrants from Turkey in Germany is a means of inclusion and exclusion in order to portray them as "(un)suitable" foreign subjects. This surveillance is slowly but surely changing its character, which raises the question of whether this might be explained by the supposed shift from the disciplinary society to the society of control. The aim of this paper is to examine particular characteristics of the so-called disciplinary and control societies on the basis of surveillance over immigrants from Turkey. The paper offers an empirical complement to the Deleuzian perspectives.

Surveillance is related to a decision-making system that Germany exploits to direct life-productive capacities of migrant workers and immigrants into appropriate spaces. The surveillance practices of the German state in the post-WWII period were more associated with the characteristics of the so-called disciplinary society. Surveillance practices in the period of so-called political-economic restructuring during the 1970s, 1980s and the early 1990s were still showing the characteristics of the so-called disciplinary society. This was a transition period as well. The period was revealing the clear signs of the coexistence of disciplinary and control paradigms. At the turn of the 21st century, the surveillance practices of the German state were carrying fundamentally the characteristics of the so-called society of control. But, disciplinary measures were also in use. Today, German society seems to experience the early phases of the control paradigm rather than the late stages of the disciplinary framework.

In this paper, Deleuze's thesis is utilized as a guideline and at the same time is rendered as an object of sociological criticism. The paper does not examine surveillance over immigrants from Turkey in Germany on the basis of the characteristics of the so-called disciplinary and control societies. It questions the characteristics of the so-called disciplinary and control societies on the basis of surveillance over immigrants from Turkey. The ultimate aim of the paper is to assess the sociological relevance of Gilles Deleuze's thesis.

How to Perform Theatre by Talking About It: Toward a Cultural Pragmatics of Drama Critics

Roberge, Jonathan

Dept. of Sociology, The Center for Cultural Sociology, Yale University New Haven, CT, U.S.A

Keywords

Critics, Cultural Pragmatics, Theatre

The performative turn in the social sciences has had multiple implications of late, especially in cultural sociology. Drawing from the cultural pragmatics of Alexander, and from the work of Boltanski and Thevenot one could argue that the relationship between artists and publics gives rise to more complex networks of mediations. In this instance, states, associations, and all sorts of "hermeneutical powers" play an important role. More particularly, if theatre and social life are to mirror one another, this would prove to be impossible without the involvement of critics in the public sphere. It is thus our central argument that looking at critics' work should allow for a better understanding of how critical discourses evolve as a "competence" within culture and society. The quantity of critics in media has increased, driven by "liquid journalism" (Deuze), and the need for commercialisation, but this does not imply that criticism is "healthier" today. To the contrary, the new situation entails new problems, both practical and theoretical.

Theatre journalists form what Zelizer calls an "interpretative community" whereas the mechanism putting this community in motion could be best described as a "conflict of interpretations" (Ricur). Critics engage with artists, on the one side, and audiences, on the other, while the purpose of either negotiation is the struggle for their recognition. In this process, they display a series of justifications among which three are particularly noteworthy. First, critics constantly try to situate themselves in regard to the debate between high and low culture; and most often as the defender of the former. Second, it is important to look at the tension between subjectivity and objectivity, the use of metaphors, but also the need for clear standards. Third, one has to analyse where critics stand in the dispute over whether theatre should be considered for its fictional-aesthetic worth or its socio-anthropological value.

In the end, what is common to these three conflicts is that they are never able to provide any meta-criteria. Critical discourses remain normative and it is their deep meaning as well as their cultural and political consequences that have yet to be fully understood.

How to Theorize Social Emergence?

Kaidesoja, Tuukka

*Department of Social Sciences and Philosophy, University of Jyväskylä
Jyväskylä, Finland*

Keywords

social emergence, Bunge, aggregativity, Wimsatt, social system

The ontological concept of social emergence refers to processes in which many individual agents interact with each other in such a way that their interaction creates social entities which possess qualitatively new kinds of properties (i.e. emergent properties). The phenomenon of social emergence has already been discussed by classics of sociology such as Georg Simmel and Emile Durkheim. However, it remains controversial as to what exactly are the defining features of emergent social properties and how exactly the processes of social emergence occur. In more recent discussion in social theory and social ontology the concept of emergence has been used, among others, by Margaret Archer, Roy Bhaskar, Mario Bunge, Geoffrey Hodgson, Dave Elder-Vass and Keith Sawyer.

The aim of my presentation is to develop conceptual tools that can be utilized in dealing with processes of social emergence and emergent social properties both theoretically and empirically. Initially, I define the concepts of social emergence and emergent social property by using Mario Bunge's systemic approach to social ontology. I strive to show, however, that Bunge's definition of the concept of emergent social property is too weak for the purposes of such an emergentist social ontology, which rejects ontological and methodological individualism. Hence, I suggest that William Wimsatt's four conditions of aggregativity of systemic property and his conception of emergent properties as more or less non-aggregative systemic properties can be used in developing stronger varieties of the concept of emergent social property than those indicated in Bunge's definition of it. I also seek to demonstrate the usefulness of these conditions by providing sociologically relevant examples. To my knowledge, neither Wimsatt nor anyone else has systematically applied his conditions of aggregativity to social systems.

Ideological exploitation of critical theory

Mehin, Ibragimova

Sociology, The Institute of Philosophy and Political-Law Researches in Azerbaijan National Academy of Science Baku, Azerbaijan

Keywords

theory, critical, ideology, domination

It is well known, that the essential task and objective of the critical sociology since its origins has been and still remains elucidating (exposing) concealed ideological implications and mechanisms of domination and manipulation incorporated in different social phenomenon: social institutions (religious, political, ideological), epistemologies, axiological systems and so on. In other words, the ultimate task of critical sociology has always been to achieve (attain) the theoretical, conceptual context and more generally discourse, which allows social communication free of any violence, manipulation, control, that is ultimately and truly democratic communication. The examples (patterns) of such endeavors to construct, if not ideal, at least an optimal discourse (or at least conceptual context) are well known and justifiably recognized as essential stages in the history of critical theory. And each of these endeavors met the certain socio-cultural reality and responded that reality, its character. It is obvious, that Max Horkheimer's Critical Theory of society and Theodor Adorno's Negative Dialectics, and then Habermass' Theory of communicative action had much and important influence on theoretical and ideological discourses, and consequently on political discourses and practices. However it is easy to notice that the (ideological and institutional) mechanisms and instruments of domination and manipulation display an ability of adaptation and that of adjustment to the mechanisms and instruments exposing and destroying them. Mechanisms of domination and manipulation demonstrate very effective assimilation and exploitation of potentialities of critical theory, transforming the latter into ideological and political instruments of concealed violence. So the subject of our paper is to consider the question of what requirements must respond the critical discourse in order its potentiality, and its critical forces will not be turned against either its essence or its objectives.

Individuality and the formation of Social Rationality: points of critique in Horkheimer and Habermas

Marinopoulou, Anastasia

Political Sciences-University of Munich, Geschwister Scholl Institute for Political Science Athens, Greece

Keywords

Critical Theory, Individuality, Social Rationality

Any critique that Horkheimer and Habermas exerted on the politicization of the individual presented constantly a counterbalance of concern, which often served as the initiation for the critique on the consciousness formation of the individual. That was the investigation of the apolitical social behaviour of the masses. The emphasis in Habermas was placed on the reductionist role of the public sphere and of the political thought formation that allow the public only to participate in social decisions limited in their scope. The public, considered either consisting of individuals or as a whole, formulates opinions more in the form of mere agreement or disagreement and less as a complete political articulation of argumentation and exchange of opinions. This plebiscitary approach in which the existing social mode allows its subjects to exist politically is the initial point of reference for Horkheimer's and Habermas's critique of the individual.

Individuality is appropriated by humans when they become conscious of their capacity for self-reflection and to be aware of social reality, which can and should be the object of criticism and transformation for them. Especially, in terms of self-reflection the main point of concern for individuals is reason, which relies on people's expression of social needs and the will to move from realizing these needs to actualizing, or, better, satisfying them socially. Since the early Frankfurt School of Horkheimer to Habermas the point that is stressed with regards to the individual is individuation, which at the same time entails socialization of the individual when the latter approaches socially integrated forms of life. The individual is building on self-reflection and self-consciousness when realizing personal needs along with collective demands of a society.

Individual needs as considered by both Horkheimer and Habermas - despite Horkheimer's late emphasis on them - are not only socially interwoven but also deriving from personal concerns and interests. Therefore, they have to be realized and regarded as shared by conscious social members, which do not drop their individuality but simultaneously develop communal and cooperative claims.

Is there a European society? A sociological analysis of the theories of European integration

Kucia, Marek

Institute of Sociology, Jagiellonian University Kraków, Poland

Keywords

European society, European Union, theories of European integration

The process of European integration and its result - The European Communities (EC) and the European Union (EU) have been described, explained and predicted by a host of theories that belong to various branches of broadly conceived social sciences: international relations, economics, comparative politics, public policy, cultural studies, and, last but not least, sociology. The main theories of European integration include: functionalism, federalism, neofunctionalism, intergovernmentalism, theory of economic integration, supranationalism, liberal intergovernmentalism, new institutionalism; multi-level governance approach, and constructivism. This paper will argue that although none of these theories has dealt with a European society, all of them have presupposed or implied its existence and have dealt with its aspects and components. Basing upon the analysis of the selected writings in the mainstream theories of integration, this paper will attempt to characterize the agents, institutions, structures and processes of a European society as presented in these theories. On examining the historical development of the integration theories as reflections of the integration processes, the paper will argue that the European society was emerging as the European Communities and European Union were developing. At present, its agents include national governments, EU institutions, regional and local governments, companies, and people. Its institutions comprise European politics, economy, law, social security, the media, and education. Its structures of different kinds exist at the supra-national, inter-governmental, and sub-national levels. Its processes range from "inter-state bargaining" to "creating new supra-national centres" to which "loyalties" are shifted, from the "free movement of goods, capital, services, and people" to cross-border and inter-state migrations; the processes that lead to the social construction of new positions, roles, interests, and identities. In 2009, fifty one years after the coming in force of the Treaty of Rome establishing the EC, when the EU expects the coming in force of its Reform Treaty - the Treaty of Lisbon, despite negative sentiments in regard of the EU detected by public opinion polls, the European society is a social reality alongside the European societies of the EU member states and non-member states.

Is there a frame-analysis after Erving Goffman?

Vakhshayn, Victor

*sociology and political science, Moscow School of Social and Economic Sciences
Moscow, Russia*

Keywords

Bateson, Latour, Goffman, frame-analysis

Since the first publication of E. Goffman's "Frame analysis" (and perhaps even earlier - since the first works of G. Bateson on the framing of animals' communication), the tension between the theoretical issues of frame-analysis and its practical usage in empirical research has not weakened. As a fundamental social theory, frame-analysis provides a specific optics for studying social reality from the perspective of everyday experience organization. If E. Durkheim left to contemporary sociology an injunction to explain "social by social", so E. Goffman showed the ways to interpret "social as everyday". And that was the possibility to understand macro-social and macro-political realities from the "patterned interpersonal interaction" perspective.

At the same time, with a frame-analysis being a social theory, there are no specific methods of empirical data gathering connected with it. Neither Goffman, nor Bateson did offer any successive methodological programme - where exactly and how the frames and framing devices of social / political interaction are to be found. In other words, frame-analysis theoretical solutions do not say directly how the empirical frame-analysis research should be methodologically organized. That is why the further development of Bateson's and Goffman's ideas led to the inescapable proliferation of both the very notion of "frame", and the extreme diversity of research instruments: ranging from "mental structures" analysis (E. Zerubavel) to "talk-in-interaction" patterns (H. Sacks), from "political narratives" (M. Rein and D. Schön) to "material setting" (B. Latour). Relatively, these instruments can be divided into two groups - those that look for frames in discourses and narratives (having a propensity for narrative and discourse-analysis methods), and the ones that keep the notion of frames as structures that can be found in interaction itself (through the methods of involved observation).

We suppose that the further development of frame-analysis as a theoretical and methodological whole demands systematizing and correlating all methodical means which are used in empirical frame-analytical researches. In our brief report we shall try to make such connection: between frame-analytical theory and research practice, epistemological imperatives and methodological techniques.

Is there a limit to social theory effectiveness? Environment as a possible way of reshaping sociology

Boudes, Philippe

Sociology, Ladyss-CNRS / Paris Ouest University

Nanterre, France

Keywords

sociology, environmental sociology, contemporary theories, epistemology of sociology

The environmental question of the XXth and XXIst century has followed to the XVIIIth and XIXth century political and economical questions. This transformation can be seen through actual political challenges, as global environmental changes, and the general increase of environmental questions in social, economic and media sphere. Thus, what is the capacity of sociology to challenge this question, in which terms, and what is the finality of such an attempt?

Indeed, recent European theorists, as Giddens, Beck, Luhmann, Touraine or also Latour, Mol and Hajer have clearly given to the environment a central role. Moreover an environmental sociology already exists and has developed different theories to respond to environmental challenges from a sociological point of view. Some of these environmental sociologists have radically attacked the dominant classical sociology, enjoined it to have a more "environmentalized" posture and to promote a "green" sociology

This contribution wants to present some of these general and environmental theories, in order to clarify their relevance and epistemological dynamics. But overall we would like to propose a way of pacification between social and natural approach of environment in order to give each approach a specific task without denying their contribution to highlighting environmental challenges. The question to know if sociology has an epistemological limit regarding the environmental question will be finally discussed.

Key Invisibles in Visual Discourses: Beyond Castells' "basic thread of our social structure"

Ludes, Peter

*Integrated Social Sciences, Jacobs University Bremen
Bremen, Germany*

Keywords

Manuel Castells, Key Visuals, Visual Discourses, Key Invisibles, visual networks

Manuel Castells' theories of the emerging network society, mass self-communication and a new public sphere bridge the gap between communication and other social sciences. Correspondingly, Castells is the most quoted communication scholar since 2001 and the only one included in the Relative Ranking of a Selected Pool of Leading Scholars in the Social Sciences by Number of Citations in the Social Science Citation Index, 2000-2007, on rank 5, ahead of Ulrich Beck. Castells highlights information and communication technologies as major driving forces for re-configuring social interactions, institutions and basic conceptions of space, time, power, or identity. He emphasized already in 1996 that "image-making is power-making" and "flows of messages and images between networks constitute the basic thread of our social structure", but hardly followed up on this basic thread. Therefore, this presentation combines insights from social theory with a concrete empirical media contents study and aims at clarifying the following issues: (1) An account of mass mediated self-observations of the United States and Germany via TV annual reviews, 1999-2008, with a special focus on the presentation of state heads vs. common people in order to detect patterns and trends of power presentation ratios and types of "Key Visuals" of power relationships. (2) A specification of topics, types of actors and social situations and their analysis under the aspect of "Key Invisibles": this detection of (visual) neglects from 1999 to 2008 will be based on our quantitative content analyses and their comparison with other news analyses, news neglects detected by project censored or www.nachrichtenaufklaerung.de and the Human Development Reports from the same period. Combining these analyses shall lead (3) to the specification of this TV flow of images as a combination of Key Visuals and Key Invisibles: If image making is power making, mass mediated Key Visuals and Key Invisibles constitute a so far neglected data source for sociological inquiries into power (presentation) shifts.

Marx and the Radical Critique of Antisemitism

Fine, Robert

*Department of Sociology, University of Warwick
Coventry, UK*

Keywords

Hannah Arendt, Marx, Jewish Question, antisemitism

In the first part of this paper I contest the view that Marx's response to Bauer's essays on the Jewish Question was antisemitic or reproductive of anti-Jewish stereotypes. In the second part I reconstruct Marx's own analysis of antisemitism as an anti-hegemonic form of radicalism hostile to the values of bourgeois society. I argue that Marx, in ways later echoed by Nietzsche, linked antisemitism to a broader nihilistic undercurrent of the modern age that aimed to destroy the duplicity upon which society rested. In the final part of the paper I evaluate Marx's contribution to the critique of antisemitism and argue that its strengths and weaknesses are not generally well understood within sociology. I look outside sociology, to the work of Hannah Arendt, for a more comprehensive view.

Methodological nationalism as a tool for interpretation and scientific performance

Szaló, Csaba

Sociology, Masaryk University

Brno, Czech Republic

Keywords

methodological nationalism, sociological theory, cultural sociology

In the context of calls for reflexive sociology, the critique of methodological nationalism has emerged as a credible argument for refuting the modern conceptual identification of society with the nation-state. Early critiques revealed a theoretical weakness of methodological nationalism concerning its presuppositions about the internalist constitution of social change. Contemporary critiques claim that methodological nationalism is simply theoretically anachronistic nowadays. Both forms of critique build their arguments on realist epistemological presuppositions. My paper is going to explore alternative way of understanding methodological nationalism that builds on the interpretivist perspective of cultural sociology.

Nihilism and Cultural Cohesion: (Re)considerations of Jean Baudrillard

Harden, B. Garrick

Sociology, Texas A&M University College Station, United States of America

Keywords

Baudrillard, Postmodern Theory, Nihilism

Jean Baudrillard writes what could be considered requiems for modernism and authenticity in culture. Baudrillard illustrates postmodern culture through both the form and content of his writings. The evolution of his writings from Marxist and Structuralist critiques of consumer society (2004) up to his uneasy acceptance of the death of the enlightenment in his later works demonstrates a mourning for the loss of meaning in social interaction, language, technology and, more generally, the creation of cultural "forms" (Baudrillard, 2004; 2003; 2006; 2007; 1999; 2002; 1993). It is important to distinguish between postmodernism as critique and analysis and postmodernism as our current historical and cultural epoch. Breaking with other theorists and cultural critics, Baudrillard paints a nihilistic portrait of post-industrial culture. Baudrillard describes a nihilistic culture but this does not mean that his theory is nihilistic. Stating that Baudrillard's critique of postmodern culture is nihilistic is overly simplistic. The concept of a nihilistic culture seems oxymoronic at first glance; after all, culture implies patterns and structures and nihilism would connote the absence of such things. The loss of meaning would seem to imply the "death of society"; the implosion of boundaries that once provided organization and structure, however, instead of causing the dissolution of social and cultural forms it provides the "glue" to postmodern culture. In other words, the very aspects of nihilism in postmodern culture' anomie, ennui, alienation?denotes a loss of meaning that ironically provides a kind of anti-structure (in the same sense of anti-aesthetics in art [Foster, 1998]).

Notes on Bourdieu's Conception of Social Science: Between Positivist and Hermeneutic Knowledge

Susen, Simon

School of Geography, Politics and Sociology; Faculty of Humanities and Social Sciences, Newcastle University Newcastle upon Tyne, United Kingdom

Keywords

science, Bourdieu, Reflexivity, hermeneutics, positivism

The main purpose of this paper is to explore Pierre Bourdieu's conception of social science. To this end, the paper sheds light on the main epistemological and methodological presuppositions that undergird Bourdieu's defence of reflexive sociology as a scientific endeavour. In essence, the analysis demonstrates that Bourdieu's conception of science is based on a twofold concern: on the one hand, Bourdieu regards social science as a tool to explain the nature of the underlying structures which determine human actors' engagement with the world; on the other hand, Bourdieu considers social science as a tool to understand the nature of the field-specific discourses through which human actors interpret the world. In the former sense, the task of social science is to uncover the 'interest-ladenness' of the human world; in the latter sense, the task of social science is to examine the 'meaning-ladenness' of the human world. Exploring the problematic implications of this twofold endeavour, the paper makes a case for the view that the 'positivist' trust in the explanatory power of social science and the 'hermeneutic' reliance on the interpretive power of social actors are two irreducible components of Bourdieu's reflexive conception of social science.

On dialectical materialism and critical theory: between social philosophy (Sozialphilosophie) and social research (Sozialforschung)

Fornos Klein, Stefan

Sociology, Universidade de São Paulo (USP)

São Paulo (SP), Brazil

Keywords

Critical Theory, dialectical materialism, metatheory, Max Horkheimer, science

This paper leans on the present research for my ongoing doctoral dissertation, and addresses itself to the theoretical project outlined in the works of the so called "Frankfurt School". Bearing in mind the necessary relationship that, according to Max Horkheimer's views expressed in the inaugural lecture (1931) of his appointment as director of the Institut für Sozialforschung, should be established between the dialectical philosophical approach and the research methods offered through empirical social research, the presentation aims at focusing on his writings and essays of the decade of 1930, especially the first half, to further examine the characteristics of the kind of materialism he developed.

In this sense, if the evident proximity to the writings of Karl Marx and Friedrich Engels will be object of the study - although Horkheimer during this period never nominated his own theoretical work as being "Marxist", but always some kind of materialism, be it historical, dialectical or historical-dialectical - I understand it as significant also to shed more light on the less explicit but nevertheless existing proximity to sociological works. Hereby the attempt and the task lay on pointing out - in a few words - the relevance of, notoriously, the contributions brought forward by Georg Simmel and Max Weber, some traits of which can be acknowledged in this period. This endeavour is seen as relevant because of a second point: the fact that the most frequent dialogue with the "social sciences" - back then still near to the Diltheyan concept of "Geisteswissenschaften" - happened in the critical exchange with sociology, at that time a recently established and still developing scientific discipline.

Simultaneously it emerges as mandatory to point out some limits of this theoretic conception brought forward by Horkheimer, for which I shall dedicate myself to investigate some aspects of the tension present in one of his theory's milestones, concerning the concept of "domination of nature", that alters itself between a repressive and an emancipatory stance. This aspect is seen to be fundamental in contributing to the contemporaneous maintenance of a critical viewpoint.

On Habermas's Critique of Castoriadis and its Counter-Critique

Browne, Craig

Sociology and Social Policy, The University of Sydney Sydney, Australia

Keywords

Modernity, Critical Social Theory, Castoriadis, Habermas

This paper aims to explore the implications of the confrontation between the thought of Habermas and Castoriadis. As is well known, Habermas's The Philosophical Discourse of Modernity includes a critical excursus on Castoriadis, which is intended to buttress the preceding chapter's contention that "not even the linguistic turn of praxis philosophy leads to a paradigm change". Habermas finds that Castoriadis's notion of the imaginary institution of society fails to grasp the normative dimension of intersubjective praxis. By contrast, the work of George Herbert Mead enables, in Habermas's opinion, a superior appreciation of the connection between the 'intramundane learning' of everyday practices and the broader alterations in 'world-horizons'. Yet, Habermas's elaboration of the intersubjective paradigm of mutual understanding is undoubtedly open to a counter-critique. Even his reconstruction of Mead's theory subordinates some of the continuities that it has with the philosophy of praxis. In fact, Castoriadis's account of the imaginary institution of society can be seen to address questions that Habermas's theory left unresolved. It will be suggested that a constructive dialogue between the thought of Habermas and Castoriadis should commence from an analysis of Habermas's original reconstruction of the intentions of praxis philosophy in the program of knowledge constitutive interests. Habermas's later theory may have abandoned the core intentions of this program, but my analysis suggests that the outcome need not be considered intrinsically superior and that Castoriadis addressed somewhat similar questions from a different angle, such as the epistemological grounds of critique, the limits of the production paradigm, and the implications of the integration of psychoanalysis into social theory.

On the use and critique of Wittgenstein in the social sciences

Hermansen, Jens Christian

*Sociology, University of Copenhagen
1014 Copenhagen K, Denmark*

Keywords

Peter Winch, the linguistic turn, Social constructionism, Wittgenstein

Historically, the influence of philosopher Peter Winch on the readings of Wittgenstein in the social sciences has been enormous. Though this paper deals mainly with what Winch took to be the implications for the social sciences of Wittgenstein's late philosophy as well as the later critique of Winch in social theory, the wider and more recent influence of Wittgenstein in areas such as technology and science studies, social theory, feminist and gender studies and conversation and discourse analysis is also considered. Historically, the readings of Wittgenstein in the social sciences have taken the implications of Wittgenstein's philosophy to involve three general theses (what I shall call the three theses of the linguistic turn). According to these (a) social life is organised in and through language (the linguistic thesis), (b) language is a practical activity, a language-in-use (the practical thesis) and (c) language is an inherently social phenomenon (the social thesis). What the readings of Wittgenstein have disagreed on is what these theses involve and to which extent the social sciences ought to buy into them. According to what I shall call the critical turn i.e. the orthodox critique of the linguistic turn in social theory, the linguistic turn is a double-edged sword of both profound insights and limits; the claim is that the limits of the linguistic turn are the strengths of functionalist, structuralist and materialist approaches to the social sciences. The approach of the critical turn is to develop a more comprehensive social theory that is sensitive to these strengths and thus supersedes the limits of the linguistic turn. This paper suggests a different approach. Against the critical turn, the paper argues that the limits of the linguistic turn are identical with the very assumptions on which the adherents of the critical turn build their own (critical) theories, namely the thesis that language is an inherently social phenomenon. Drawing on newer readings of Wittgenstein in philosophy, the paper defends a linguistic turn in the social sciences that questions exactly that thesis.

One European Society OR Pluralism? A False Antagonism for Contemporary Sociology

Krossa, Anne Sophie

European Languages and Cultures, Lancaster University Lancaster, UK

Keywords

difference, the social, society

In contrast to the CfP, although (or even: just because) divisions in general become more salient - understanding "divisions" as processes, with changing topics and diverse, transforming types of salience -, it makes sense to look at "European society" as such. Instead of presuming that we can see "society" (and, hence, the "true" object for sociology) only if European nations are converging, resulting in an increasingly cohesive entity, it is crucial for contemporary sociology to give up a set of artificial assumptions on "nation" as well as on the role divisions/diversity play for "society".

The first problematic understanding to overcome is the one of "nation state" as a basis for society: the idea of the coherent nation state has always been a myth and attempt of construction; the social/society does not follow directly and one-dimensionally from any political form; nations are not the only unit for society; Europe's analysis via comparison of its nation-states or as a large nation-state (in the making) itself is, therefore, of confined use.

The dialectic of (possibly limiting) division and (potentially enabling) diversity is the core feature of contemporary social co-existence. This has to be considered as such theoretically, when thinking about society - "society" beyond being a mere derivative of "nation state".

The main theoretical consequence for the concept "society", particularly when asking for "European society", is a shift of focus: if difference is key, how can the idea of a necessarily particular "European society" be justified exactly on these grounds - without finally basing the idea on any essentialising or overly normative model of "unity"?

In order to answer this crucial question, which obviously goes beyond "Europe", we might reverse the argument for a moment, assuming that exactly the starting point "Europe" can be of outstanding use for research on "society" in general. On the one hand, Europe distances us from the "iron cage" of the nation state, on the other hand, diversity and division (perceived as both chance and risk) are quasi "inbuilt" features of our images of Europe. This promises good chances to address contemporary social complexities successfully - via "European Society".

Personal Relationships in Luhmann's Theory of Social Systems: A Critical Appraisal

Put, Bart

Center for Sociological Research, K.U.Leuven Leuven, Belgium

Keywords

personal relationships, Luhmann, symbolically generalized media, intimate systems

Personal relationships were never really among the core concerns of sociological research. Following Friedrich Tenbruck, this reluctance could be explained by persistent theoretical assumptions regarding both the sociological relevance and the sociological researchability of all matters personal. In this paper we will argue that the problem could be said to lie even deeper, namely in assumptions regarding the nature of sociological theory itself. The social systems approach of Niklas Luhmann will be presented as conceptually well equipped to deal with this threefold challenge. More in particular, Luhmann reconnects personal relationships to the problem of social order via the distinction between psychic systems and persons on the one hand and the theory of symbolically generalized media on the other hand. The latter route, however, we will argue, entails the danger of relapsing into the assumption that the personal is not conducive to sociological research. We will specifically try to tackle the question whether the problem of Nahweltbedarf, out of which modern day's intimate systems emerge according to Luhmann, should be considered a historically specific semantic construction or a problem identified by functionalist sociology. Both options are present in Luhmann's work, but both have very different implications for sociological thinking about personal relationships.

Plural Modernity: Changing modern institutional forms: disciplines and nation-states

Carreira da Silva, Filipe

Institute of Social Sciences, University of Lisbon

Portugal, <http://www.ics.ul.pt/instituto/?ln=e&pid=119&mm=2&ctmid=3&mnid=1&doc=31816889833>

Keywords

Jürgen Habermas, dialogical pluralism, nation-states, disciplines, Modernity

The paper begins with the assumption that modernity is undergoing a profound change. The focus is on the structural transformation of two modern institutional regimes: the academic discipline and the territorial nation-state. Both are said to be institutional regimes typical of modernity. Their demise as the predominant institutional forms in the realms of science and politics signals the end of the modern project, or at least the need for its profound redefinition. It is suggested that such a redefinition entails a radical conceptual shift in the social sciences and the metatheoretical expression of this shift is designated as dialogical pluralism. At a theoretical level, both modernization theories and the recent programme of "multiple modernities" are rejected: a plural modernity, with several distinct variants, seems a more promising perspective.

Prospects for a Post-Secular Sociology: Bauman and Habermas in Perspective

Burdziej, Stanislaw

Department of Social Studies, University of Warmia and Mazury Olsztyn, Poland

Keywords

secularism, Habermas, Bauman, theology, sociology

In Auguste Comte's vision, humanity progressed from theological to metaphysical to positive phase. This transition was to be mirrored by the replacement of theology and metaphysics by a new science of society - sociology. Comte's prophecy was quickly fulfilled - within a century the new discipline gained a near monopoly on expert knowledge about human society by successfully undermining the credentials of other systems - like philosophy and theology - to provide valid interpretations of social reality. This article analyzes sociology's secularist origin and foundation and asks whether a post-secular sociology is possible. While I reject radical views (such as John Milbank's) that call for the abolition of sociology, I claim that the discipline itself provides tools which can help re-formulate its scope, recognize its own limits and enter into a more fruitful dialogue with other discourses, such as theology. Recent turn in Habermas' approach to religion, as well as Bauman's work are considered briefly as explorations in such post-secular sociology: Bauman, in his larger project of a post-modern sociology, blurs the boundaries between sociology and theology, while Habermas separates them, simultaneously fostering communication between the two. Insisting that the religious needs to be translated into the secular, however, he preserves the hegemony of the secularist social science. This article tries to explore a third way out towards a post-secular sociology.

Psyche as the supplement of Luhmann's social systems theory

Urban, Michael

Faculty of Humanities, Leibniz University Hanover Hanover, Germany

Keywords

systems theory, social system, Luhmann, psychic system, structural coupling

Since the invention of sociology in the end of the 19th century the question how to describe the relation between individuals and society has been one of the central themes of social theory. Luhmann's theory of social systems has found a very specific answer to this problem in a fundamental differentiation between social and psychic systems. His theoretical description of social systems is based on the exclusion of people, individuals or humans. The sphere of the social is understood as a concatenation of communications which is capable to reproduce itself by its own operations in a self-continuing way. Adopting Maturana and Varelas term, this has been conceptualised as the autopoiesis of social systems.

Within this theoretical paradigm, the reference to the psychic has been constructed by the model of structural coupling. The way social systems process their autopoiesis has to fit to environmental conditions. The primary relevant environments of social systems are psychic systems, but there are no direct links between social and psychic processes. Social and psychic operations don't interact in any way. In Luhmann's social systems theory this theoretical figure has the function to open up a possibility of theoretical construction which excludes the psychic and allows a concentration on the description of the social as a sphere of pure social processes.

This paper makes a suggestion for a wider conceptualisation of psychic systems and their function in social systems theory. Based on the interpretation of Spencer Browns concept of form in Luhmann's late theory and its functional correspondence to deconstruction, the concepts of structural coupling and psychic system are understood as supplements in social systems theory. They provoke further extrapolation and elaboration. The autopoiesis of psychic systems can be conceived as concatenation of experience. This opens antagonistic perspectives of social systems observing their structural coupling with psychic systems, and psychic systems observing their structural coupling with social systems. This leads to a new systems theoretical understanding of the psychic experience of social conditions, as well as to new perspectives on some specialized types of social systems like education, therapy, and arts.

Reflection on the Textual Foundations of Social Science: Narrative as an Explanatory Scheme of a Sociological Knowledge

Borisenkova, Anna

*Centre for Fundamental Sociology, State University - Higher School of Economics
Moscow, Russia*

Keywords

Emplotment, explanation, Narrative, Sociological Knowledge

Since its appearance, sociology has justified its status as a discipline providing a unique body of knowledge. In the beginning it had to constitute its identification through the opposition of the objects «Natur vs. Geist» and «Natur vs. Kultur» or through the opposition of the methods «erklären vs. verstehen», later presented in different terms («hermeneutical vs. positive methods» or «interpretative vs. explanatory science»).

But the breakthrough in the philosophy of knowledge, accomplished by Thomas Kuhn, Imre Lakatos and Paul Feyerabend, has shown that all the previous debates about methods and objects can be considered as changing paradigms, resulted from the scientists' consensus. It has become obvious that there are no universal oppositions for constituting science's identity. Thus social science needs to develop a new philosophy to make clear foundations and emphasize its uniqueness as a science, explaining "the social".

The aim of this paper is to focus on the discursive and textual peculiarities of sociology, on the way the language and its rules structure the meaningful entities of a scientific knowledge. According to this approach (shared by social scientists and philosophers of different schools as J. Alexander and I. Reed, M. Foucault, H. White and others) scientific knowledge is presented as a language manifestation, taking the form of texts, performances and enunciations. The language theory of science is fruitful, and plenty of concepts aimed at analyzing knowledge could be developed.

However in the paper I propose a broad explanatory scheme for social science that is narrative in its foundations. In the base of this approach lies the assumption that sociological research can be reduced to a plot building. The narrative model focuses on such inner characteristics of knowledge as meaning, coherence and causality. The conceptualization of narrative is developed via theoretical tools: "meaningful configuration"; "emplotment" (P. Ricoeur); "narrative sentences" (A. Danto); "narrative explanation" (R. Aron).

A particular attention will be paid to the processes of sociological explanations of social events and actions which make the application of narrative obvious. Thus providing a relevant conceptual scheme and empirical examples the paper will point out a possible philosophical approach towards social science.

Scientific Specialization as Utopian Practice

Simon, Richard

Sociology, The Pennsylvania State University University Park, United States of America

Keywords

science, Knowledge, specialization, mannheim

This paper will attempt to reconcile scientists' adherence to professional norms of objectivity with the material and organizational requirements of collective action on the part of members of scientific specialties using Karl Mannheim's sociology of knowledge. Mannheim specifies that social-structural position is a primary determinant of the structure of thought. When scientific specialties are conceptualized as particular social-structural positions within the scientific field as a whole, Mannheim's sociology of knowledge becomes a powerful tool for understanding the behavior of scientists. One of the key insights Mannheim offers to explain how ostensibly disinterested scientists can act collectively on behalf of interests in their specialty is that location of a group in a social-structural position limits that group's ability to see the entire intellectual field, and so it tends to treat as factual only those elements of reality which are congruous with its own perspective: certain oppressed groups are intellectually so strongly interested in the destruction and transformation of a given society that they unwittingly see only those elements in the situation which tend to negate it. Their thinking is incapable of correctly diagnosing an existing condition of society (Ideology and Utopia, p. 40). Thus the struggle for capital in the scientific field may be conceptualized as the struggle between the ideologies of specialties which claim hegemony in jurisdiction over a particular interpretation of nature, and the utopias of competitor specialties demanding a restructuring of the scientific field which would allow them a place among legitimate science.

Selective interpretations of the social in social theory or "I wished those theorists had looked beyond Britain"

Simbuerger, Elisabeth

*Sociology, University of Warwick
Coventry, United Kingdom*

Keywords

British sociologists, selective interpretation, the social

Based on my doctoral research with thirty sociologists in England upon their self-understanding as sociologists, their claims and practices, my paper will deal with the theme of the selective interpretation of the social in social theory. Alongside synthesis and critique, the social was identified as one of sociology's key features by my respondents. Seeing the production of social theory as a key form of sociological practice, the social is however often conveyed in ways that do not look beyond a Western perspective. The paper investigates how sociologists often do not question this selective perception and how those who have come from other than Western backgrounds are very much aware of this selectivity. The paper finally raises the question of what a perspective could look like which does not express the social in a eurocentric way and how on the other hand classic, eurocentric authors could be revisited in this light.

Social action in the context of creativity

Gornostaeva, Maria

History and Theory of Sociology, Institute of socio-political research, Russian Academy of Sciences Moscow, Russian Federation

Keywords

interdisciplinarity, innovative methodologies, holism

Modern sociological action theories have to deal with the difficulties caused by the complexity of explanation of creative action. M. Weber has started the tradition of explanation of the reasons of action in terms of subjective intentions, which played an important role in establishing of sociology and studying human behaviour. But hereafter the position that considers internalities of the subject, his/her motives and intentions as the basic reasons impelling the activity led to difficulties in understanding the nascence of the new action. In reality, there are no exhaustive intentions which could explain the reasons of actions. Even being aware of the motives of a subject, his purposes and intentions we are not always able to predict the course of his activity. This problematics was touched upon in philosophical works of &nbsp;L. H. Davis, J. Austin, G. H. von Wright, G. Ryle, L. Wittgenstein, and in sociological works of &nbsp;A. Schütz, G. H. Mead, J. Dewey; it has been elaborated to the fullest in the modern neopragmatic approach of &nbsp;H. Joas, M. Emirbayer, A. Mishe. The creative, spontaneous character of activity was emphasized by pragmatists. I shall dwell on the analysis of social action offered by Hans Joas. In my view, this approach must be complimented by the knowledge of nature of human action that psychoanalysis gives us, in particular, its structural dimension developed by Jacques Lacan. Joas shortly mentions Lacan's theory, criticizing and rejecting its outcomes and its possible contribution to the development of the theory of creative action, whereas it has much to add to &nbsp; understanding of action in those three dimensions that Joas concentrates on: non-teleological intentionality of human action, its corporeality, and its primordial sociality.

Social Constructions - Arbitrary and Biased?

Gronow, Antti

*Department of Sociology, University of Helsinki
Helsinki, Finland*

Keywords

Social constructionism, Knowledge, action theory, naturalism

Sociologists often think that social constructions are arbitrary by their very nature. This conception implies that our beliefs can never be objective because they have historically been subject to change. Presumably this also means that there are no such things that exist independently of our constructions. Our constructions are, the argument continues, biased - or an ideological sham. However, all of these pessimistic implications are very problematic. I will tackle these issues by outlining a naturalistic inquiry into social constructions. First, social constructionism has a home in sociology of knowledge but it should not be used as an action theory. Namely, some of the confusion surrounding constructionism has to do with getting action and our beliefs about action mixed up. Second, knowledge is very often socially constructed but, as a general rule, its social nature testifies to it being reliable rather than being biased. This is because individual representations are more untrustworthy. The social nature of knowledge can fruitfully put to use and this realization has been the key to the success of science. Naturally, there always is the possibility of ideological biases but the inevitability of having a perspective on some issue is not the same thing as being biased. It is obvious that knowledge can change but this fact constitutes a problem only for friends of dogmatism and essentialism. Others are happy to admit that change is often for the good - also in matters having to do with knowledge.

Social Inequalities in European Society or European Societies? Methodological Nationalism Challenge for Social Inequalities Theorizing and Research

Babenko, Svitlana

Social Structures and Social Relations, National T. Shevchenko University of Kyiv Kyiv, Ukraine

Keywords

social inequalities, "Methodological Nationalism" dilemma, social perception of inequalities

Classical theorizing and methodology of the research on social inequalities is done within the frame of the "methodological nationalism". Sociological study and explanation of social classes, social mobility, causes and consequences of inequalities and institutions that regulate social dynamics of inequalities are done based on the study of the concrete society - national state. This "methodological nationalism" is rooted in the idea that social inequalities exist as a back side of the social equalities norms, standards, conceptions and attitudes. Norms towards social equality and legitimations of social inequalities are institutionalized mostly at the level of the practical culture, institutions and social informal and formal laws within the frame of the societies - national states. Social inequalities are not only unequal share of resources, social positions, statuses and opportunities, or any stable limits of the access to social goods. Only when there are the attitudes and notions of norms of social equality that legitimate definition of difference in distribution of resources, positions, statuses and opportunities as unequal, it could be stated that social inequality and the concept about it do exist. If there is no such a notion, it is more adequate to describe such phenomena as heterogeneity and differentiation.

The norms of equality, social justice, and, hence, social inequality constitute the frames of social perception within the practical culture of the society. Does it change its "national bound" in European integration process? Do people assess social inequalities and social justice the diverse way in different types of the European societies? Or the common visions and divisions would let us to argue the common space of the shared norms and values and the movement towards European society? The answers to the questions above is based on the data of European Social Survey (2002, 2004\5, 2006\7).

Social Inequality Reconsidered in the Interface of Phenomenology and Sociology of Knowledge

Dreher, Jochen

*Sociology, University of Konstanz
Konstanz, Germany*

Keywords

power, inequality, phenomenology, Sociology of Knowledge

Starting from Max Weber's "methodological individualism", the individual actor experiences the social world as a system or power hierarchies with its specific inequality stratifications that are incorporated within the social stock of knowledge of the corresponding social entity. The proposed analysis at the interface of phenomenology and the sociology of knowledge reconstructs typification procedures and systems of relevance that are effective within the constitution of inequality in which the individual actor is involved. Following the theoretical conceptions of Edmund Husserl, Alfred Schutz, Peter L. Berger/Thomas Luckmann and Pierre Bourdieu, I argue, that the constitution of inequality needs to be analyzed with reference to the subjective perspective of the individual actor within relationships of interaction in a specific social world. Furthermore, assuming a phenomenological standpoint studying the epistemological foundations of inequality, it can be demonstrated that consciousness is essential to the social life-world. It is conversely true, that sociality is essential to consciousness since consciousness is immersed in that social world before phenomenological analysis ever illuminates the structures of the life-world. Above all, I will argue that symbolic power relations (Bourdieu) within the dialectical relationship of human existence and society are responsible for the constitution of inequality among human beings. On the basis of the subjectively established capacity of consciousness of symbolization, human beings are able to communicate and objectify everyday transcendent ideas, such as political, religious, scientific, etc. thoughts. This way, social affiliations and power relations are established in the process of symbolization thus constituting inequality.

Social ontology and cultural sociology. A appraisal and critique of John Searle's social theory

Binder, Werner

*Sociology, Universität Konstanz
Konstanz, Germany*

Keywords

change, performance, intentionality, background, Narrative

The logical analysis of social reality by the philosopher and speech act theorist John Searle is a rich source for sociologists. The concept of collective intentionality, the distinction between constitutive and regulative rules, but also the role of declarations in the making of institutions belong to the most interesting features of his social ontology. My paper focuses on his idea of the background that has to be presupposed by any kind of intentionality, rule-following or speech act. His argument can be used to criticize utilitarian and normativist approaches in classical and contemporary sociology. Searle also provides a neurophysiological interpretation of this background. His interpretation is not only positivistically flawed, but renders also the concept of the background useless for empirical research in social sciences. Instead I will propose a cultural sociological interpretation of the background consisting of cultural forms like myths, narratives and imaginaries. This enables us to turn the background into a explanatory tool for social and cultural change. Such a research program requires and enables the use of different theories and methods from various disciplines, for example narrative theory from literary studies and iconology from art history. I will show the fruitfulness of such an approach with a case study on torture in the War on Terror. I will show that 9/11 had an impact on the cultural background that consequently changed the interpretation of the prohibition of torture. The ticking bomb scenario became plausible and torture at least debatable. This changed only with the Abu Ghraib photographs, were torturers were depicted at sadists and prisoners as helpless victims. At the end we will see that the analysis of cultural forms is able provide an explanation for recent changes in the modern moral order.

Sociological recoveries of critical theories on technology

Nascimento, Susana

*Cetcopra & CIES, Université Paris 1 & ISCTE
Lisboa, Portugal*

Keywords

technologies, Critical theories, Technical Phenomenon, Choice and Control

From critical standpoints we can work towards insightful examinations of our modern times, while concurrently proposing their concrete transformation towards other potential courses. In contexts of omnipresent, diffuse and complex technologies, it seems essential to fully grasp the essential character and particular conditions of our technical realms, while at the same time recovering a group of concepts and theories that may aid us to rethink and restructure these realms. We can embark on this endeavour from the ideas earlier pursued by authors like Adorno, Horkheimer, Marcuse or Habermas, in face of a pungent diagnosis of modern rationality, its prevailing instrumental logic, and its technical means of control and domination. As a consequence we may insist on the task of social enquiries to acknowledge theoretically and empirically the resources of specific societies, realize their potentialities, and dialectically discuss other modes of organisation to improve our social existences. But we may especially engage in this critical enterprise by recovering views associated with other social critics like Mumford, Ellul, Anders, Arendt, Winner, Mitcham, Borgmann or Feenberg. With due differences, all these authors have critically analysed technique as a specific social phenomenon, thus largely recognizing its intrinsic processes and their relation to social directions and purposes.

This paper will explore how a resurgence of past and present critical routes, with concepts such as instrumentality, non-neutrality, control, choice or autonomy, may grant major contributes not only to our present accounts of technological embedded societies, but also to the larger collection of critical theories. Our particular outlooks on technology may help us to raise specific questions on its designs, constructions and uses, its political forms and economic models, its innovation requirements, rationalization principles, cultural consequences, etc. But by the same token, within our general sociological frameworks these outlooks may also contribute to elucidate the wide range of connexions between our modern social structures and our technical systems and objects. With this intertwinement we should reclaim renewed spaces for critical perspectives somewhat amiss from present studies of technology, but also bring these views of technology once more into the foreground of sociological knowledge.

Sociology of Islam and Muslim Societies in Neoliberal Globalization

Keskin, Tugrul

Sociology, Virginia Tech Blacksburg, USA

Keywords

social theory, Islam, and Neoliberalism

Religious life and values are being replaced with economic life and values since the adoption of homo-economicus and the development of the industrial revolution. This new form of modernity has redirected us to a new system of social, political and economic interactions that has crystallized the role of individuals in a predominantly Western European system in which individualism supersedes an egalitarian-based mechanic solidarity.

On the other hand, Islam has never experienced its own process of internal modernization and secularization under capitalism, because the modern form of capitalism, Neoliberalism, did not reach Muslim-populated societies until the late 1950s. Therefore, Islam had not faced the challenges posed by complex economic structures until Neoliberalism arrived, to the detriment of Muslim societies, as late as in the beginning of the 1980s.

Following this chain of events, urbanization, education, critical thinking, secularism, and modernity began to emerge as a result of these new market conditions. Islam was faced with this new and externally developed phenomenon, perpetuated and forced by Neoliberal Globalization. New global market conditions also led to the formation of new types of political and social structures, based on the value of individualism. However Muslim society is based on egalitarianism, which has more in common with Socialist and community-based social structures than with the pure individualism inherent in Western Capitalism. In Islam, there is no individual, and the society or Muslim Nation (Ummah) exists in the mind of Muslims, and this consciousness itself constitutes the broader Muslim Society.

In this paper, I will try to explore the relationship between religion and modern forms of economic structure from the lens of Classical Social Theorists such as Marx, Weber, Durkheim and Simmel; however, I will also compare the issue from the perspective of Islamist Social thinkers such as Muhammad Abduh, Mawdudi, Sayyid Qutb, Hasan Al-Banna and Said-i Nursi. In this context, I must explore how economic structures shape and deconstruct religious systems, with the specific example of Islam of mind.

Sustaining tradition and making a difference: Jane Addams's writing on

Misztal, Barbara

*Sociology, University of Leicester
Leicester, UK*

Keywords

change, intellectual, memory, sociology of memory

The aim of the paper is to present the pioneering contribution of Jane Addams, one of the first female sociologists and one of the only three sociologists who received Nobel Peace Prize, to sociology of memory. The paper analyses The Long Road of Woman's Memory (1917) in which Addams showed the role of the remembering in old women's lives. Addams's innovative thinking about memory's activity as a selective agency in sustaining tradition and facilitating social reorganization brings to our attention memory's important role as a reconciler to life as well as memory's power to challenge existing conventions. While documenting the narrative needs of old women, Addams shows what the weight remembering and forgetting carry in shaping people's lives and documents the power of memory to restore dignity and give life meaning. Addams's appreciation of the importance of the relations between memory and justice is further evidence of her relevance to today's discussion of terms in which the value of memory should be evaluated. Addams's ability to put important issues on the public agenda and her ability to courageously uphold and act upon their core civic values earned her Nobel Peace Prize in 1931. The paper concludes by arguing that Addams's achievements demonstrate what social scientists can offer in the role of public intellectuals and shows what does provide intellectuals with the authority to speak to a non-academic audience.

The 'Case' and the Sociological Imagination: Toward a Critical Reconstruction

Langenohl, Andreas

Center of Excellence 'Cultural Foundations of Integration', Universität Konstanz Konstanz, Germany

Keywords

genealogy, qualitative methodology, epistemology, Imaginary, Case methodology

The proposed paper, giving insight into an ongoing research project, explores the institutionalization and the effects of sociological research labelled "qualitative". In particular it addresses the category of the "case" as encountered in sociological theory, methodology, and contemporary diagnoses in the second half of the 20th century. Its aims and perspectives are threefold:

(a) to apply the instruments of critical historical reconstruction, as they have been applied to the quantitative branch of sociological research, also to qualitative methodologies in which the notion of the "case" plays an important role. While the history of the social sciences has already turned its attention systematically to the emergence of statistical methodologies and survey instruments in (early) modern Europe and the United States (Alain Desrosières, Joshua Cole), it has so far not done so in regard to qualitative methodology. Here the project borders on epistemological research in law and literary studies on the history and genealogy of categories like "case", "example", "exemplum", etc.

(b) to reconstruct the relationship between case methodology and the imagination of modern societies. That there is an intimate connection between imaginary understandings of modern society and social science methodology has been profoundly demonstrated, for instance, with respect to the emergence of the "the average American" through quantitative survey research in the US (Sarah Igo). Has case methodology had a comparative effect? This question will be addressed through a discussion of professionalism that hinges sociological theory with social practice, where the notion of the "case" figures prominently.

(c) to discuss the relation of case methodology to symbolic power and domination in contemporary societies. A common critique of statistical methods has it that they are aligned with the "regulation" of modern societies. Yet, it remains to be asked whether case methodology has not been implied in regimes of domination, too. This might in particular be true for contemporary constellations of social control, in which the regulation of a normalized population is supplemented by a "case-sensitive" disciplining of deviant figures.

The End of Good Form: From Sociability to Creative Sociality, and the Consequences of this Transformation for Social Science

Toews, David

Sociology & Anthropology, University of Windsor Windsor, Ontario, Canada

Keywords

creativity, SIMMEL, sociability, sociality, socialmedia

The study of play and gaming in current social media has illuminated the conditions of new kinds of virtual communities that are coalescing around the norm of 'play with communication' (Danet, 2001), and the stakes for this community are higher than ever with the rapid global growth of computer-mediated communications. Social scientific concepts have been applied to make sense of these developments but have fallen short of the mark due to the apparent fragility, borderlessness, triviality, and inconstancy of these new media forms of interaction, despite the obvious transformative impact they are having on society and communication. The argument of this paper will be that the trouble with social scientific attempts to understand these new social realities is actually intimately connected with its own preoccupation with form inherited from the neo-Kantian founders of sociology. Simmel's concept of sociability, for example, deliberately conflates play with form in order to assert the existence of a 'pure' sociability that forms the benchmark of all sociality. Thus captured by Simmel is a common notion of sociability as the pursuit of good form, which is a kind of default source of unity in the discipline of sociology, compatible as it is for example with classic anomic theories of deviance. The hypothesis I will put forward is that the ethnographic data on social interactions involving new media rather supports the notion of a kind of principled unsociability. Principled unsociability would involve a suspension of the pursuit of good form for the sake of an inventiveness or creativity that can mark a fundamental difference in life. If actors using social media are bringing about a new social norm of 'creativity' which is unlike previously conceptualized social norms inasmuch as it has doesn't generate its own teleology and attendant practices that pursue good form, then sociology has to adapt and revolutionize itself to take account of an emerging meaning of unsociability that will have to be re-thought and re-examined.

The Europe Reflected from Looking-Glass Self and the Others

Demir Gürdal, Ayça

Education Faculty, Karaelmas University ZONGULDAK, TURKEY

Keywords

looking-glass self, ego, other

Several answers are possible to the question: a single European society or European societies dissimilar in point of nation, class, ethnicity, region, and gender? A likely answer can be given with reference to discussions resulting from political erosion of the concept of "society" which is central to sociology. In this sense, the question can be answered in the light of discussions about death of society, assumption of a central role by nation-states instead of society or resurrection of communities instead of society.

There is another possible answer: construction by the West of itself and the others, namely non-western societies, ontologically and epistemologically. The common and universal values shared under the conceptualisation of European society construct the notion of "being European" for all European societies epistemologically and ontologically, and convey what is similar and common in all European societies. However each geographical region and society exists with its individual differences under this common framework while Europe involves common aspects for the geographical regions and societies signified by the life-world itself. So, a second answer is possible to the question based on the duality of universality and localness.

Both answers are quite logical in the opinion of a sociologist viewing social reality from the perspective of western sociological concepts. If, however, the sociologist concerned is Turkish and sees the West from a geographical region to the east of the West, other answers may emerge. The answer is shaped around the concept of "looking-glass self" and the function of sociology is evaluated based on this concept in our study. The European societies and the European-Western rationality are represented by a looking-glass and the "self" looking at, standing against and being reflected from this looking-glass refers to the life-world in the land where a Turkish sociologist belongs to. The paper will be composed by evaluating the discussion, the European society or European societies, within the concept of looking-glass self and constructed with references to the concepts of ego-I and the other.

The Limits of Systems Theory

Welz, Frank

Department of Sociology, Innsbruck University Innsbruck, Austria

Keywords

phenomenology, systems theory, sociological theory

Whereas seventy years ago Edmund Husserl worried about the "crisis of European sciences", in the era of globalization neither "European societies" nor European society but world-society offers the appropriate frame of analysis in the view of Niklas Luhmann's systems theory. While both theories seem to be incompatible, I will compare both for analysing the limits of sociological systems theory.

In the 1990ies systems theory has become the most influential social theory in German sociology. While other approaches offer a few variables or some hypotheses on contemporary society that should be combined in an eclectic way, far beyond that Luhmann's theory of self-referential, autopoietic social systems offers concepts and a frame to analyse an all-embracing "world-society" including several social subsystems. Where are the limits of this approach?

My presentation will go beyond Habermas's well-known criticism that the out-of-date philosophy of the subject had been appropriated by systems theory. I will take a step forward and compare systems theory and phenomenology to show their structural affinity that will finally mark the limits of systems theory: (1) Both theories de-ontologize reality; both consider the world as horizon; (2) both do not ask the sociological questions on why and where but "how": they constitute phenomenologies of the presence; (3) finally, in the case of systems theory a poly-centric world of virtual realities is created that indicates the phenomenological limits of systems theory.

The Ottoman Contribution to the Rise of Capitalism and the Modern State

Gulalp, Haldun

Center for Global Studies, Yildiz Technical University Istanbul, Turkey

Keywords

Weber, Ottoman Empire, Modern State, Capitalism

Weber's theory of rational bureaucracy has dominated social science literature and been an important source of the eurocentric set of assumptions about the non-West, including the Ottoman Empire. In fact, many of the features that Weber identified as unique to western rationality, such as the centralization of the bureaucratic state, its record-keeping practices, its strict hierarchy and specialization of offices, and so on, characterized the Ottoman State. While it is true that the bureaucratic state in Western Europe arose only out of the centralization of political power that had remained fragmented after the collapse of the Roman Empire until the 'early modern' period, the Ottoman Empire already had a highly centralized taxation structure and a centralized standing army.

I argue in this paper that Ottoman military pressure forced the European powers to raise standing armies, requiring in turn the centralization of taxation, contributing eventually to the rise of the bourgeoisie and capitalism. While the Ottoman Empire had a stable system, where the only nobility was the state class, Western European political structure was fragmented into small principalities, which could only be turned into centralized states by relying on a socio-economic class other than the nobility. The Ottoman State had a strong capacity to tax without changing the local relations of production, while the state centralizers of Western Europe had to undermine the power of the nobility, in alliance with the newly rising bourgeoisie, in order to build their own capacity to tax and raise standing armies. In other words, capitalism contingently grew out of this combination of events.

This argument not only reverses the dominant eurocentric narrative, but it also revises the terms of several current critiques of eurocentrism. It rejects alternative accounts, such as the argument that the Ottomans were already on their way to 'modernization' independently of Western influence, or the argument that what is often described as the 'decline' of the Ottoman Empire was only a transformation and rejuvenation. It accounts for the Ottoman contribution to the rise of the European absolutist monarchies and treats the rise of capitalism and 'modernity' as a contingent event.

The Rise of French Existentialism: A Study in the Sociology of Intellectual Movements

Baert, Patrick

Sociology Department, University of Cambridge Cambridge, England, UK

Keywords

intellectuals, Sartre, existentialism

This paper discusses Sartre's notion of the engaged intellectual. This view of intellectuals implies that they are aware of their responsibility and at crucial points in time compelled to act politically. The paper traces the historical origins of this concept within the French intellectual scene, and it also explains the specific context in which Sartre developed and popularised this notion. In the process, the paper aims to explain the immense popularity of Sartre's version of existentialism and his celebrity status at the time. The paper aims to make a contribution to the re-emerging area of sociology of intellectual life.

The Role of the Intellectual and Creative Class in the Public Sphere

Lõhmus, Maarja

*Institute of Journalism & Communication, University of Tartu
Tartu, Estonia*

Keywords

intellectual, Journalism, Habermas, creative, totalitarian

What is role of media which shapes and values intellectuality and creativity? In society how do differ the roles of intellectual media and intellectual networks based on the media which are created in democratic system and which in totalitarian system? The role and meaning of the creative and intellectual class network in the society is a quite ambivalent. Colloquium presents comparative analysis of roles of intellectual and creative texts in totalitarian, closed society and in democratic civil society. From empirical media research it is evident, that the role of culture and intellectuality is steadily high in journalism; this is bearer of basic values and through that designer of identity. This role is ambivalent; on the one hand stabilizing and at the same time preparing for dynamic changes, developing toward changes, charting the changes. Paradox in philosophical perspective is that although journalism is as if a publication for actual political life and news, real, deeper news, meaning paradigmatic changes are being prepared likely by journalism and dominante discourses in journalistic texts, ad hominem experience of active creators of texts/ subjects (expert of living); the experience of journalists as experts of life provides the tone, that is powerful implicit influencer, but as a theme this has been kept quiet. Spheres of consensus, controversy, and deviance (D.Hallin) expand to methodical proportions, from which the pragmatic basis for contemporary social-philosophy of intellectual and creative texts is formed. Second principal dimension is in Habermas disquisition of Weber's objective rational public environment, to which Habermas opposes in turn value rational theory of communication. In his work Communicative action; Habermas argues with Weber, educes his own value rational theory of communication. On the basis of these theories and empirical material I present model of central role of intellectual and creative environment in distinct types of society, in distinct Public Spheres. Discussion is founded on analysis of empirical journalistic materials. Research material originates from study of journalistic content conducted in years 2004-2009 (Estonian Foundation of Science g5854).

The social site approach versus the approach of discourse/practices-formations?

Jonas, Michael

Sociology, Institute of Advanced Studies (IHS) Vienna, Vienna

Keywords

praxeological approaches, social practice, discourse/practices formations, social sites

Since many years praxeological approaches have gained increasing significance in the sociological discourse. A number of different approaches are viewed as the cornerstones of this sociological perspective including Giddens' structuration theory, Foucault's concept of technologies of the self or Bourdieu's outline of a theory of practice. According to these and other approaches a multitude of theoretical and of empirical studies have been created, which focus on the specific concept of social practice (soziale Praktik). In the sociological theory debate, Andreas Reckwitz's cultural-theoretical approach of discourse/practices-formations and Theodore Schatzki's site ontology approach have, in particular, significantly increased the explanatory power and the explanatory claims of a social theory based on this concept. The planned contribution will follow the aims to contrast central aspects of both approaches with other praxeological approaches, to compare both approaches and to discuss possibilities and restrictions of their explanatory power and claims.

The Societal Constitution of Europe: Matching Legal and Social Theories

Frerichs, Sabine

Centre of Excellence in the Foundations of European Law and Polity, University of Helsinki University of Helsinki, Finland

Keywords

legal theory, Integration, European society, social theory, constitutionalization

A sociology of European integration and the (emerging) European society has to take into account that today's Europe, as epitomized by the European Union and also the Council of Europe, is largely a legal, or even judicial, construction. At the European level, integration is thus based on "integration through law" and the core of the society to-be may be found in the "community of law" created by courts and legislators. Current debates on the constitution of Europe are just another instance of the supposedly legal nature of European society-building.

Yet, the legal side is only half of the story: Law rests on social foundations (as well as modern society may rest on legal foundations), and legal theories contain what has been aptly termed "hidden social theories". Legal practices rely on normative reconstructions of social realities, legal thinking builds on classical as well as contemporary social thought and, in the end, the legal field is nothing but a social field, enmeshed in struggles about power and meaning which make up society. Therefore, legal visions of the European society have to be matched with the state-of-the-art in sociological theorizing about Europe.

Two problems arise: On the one hand, "Europe" lacks understanding from both legal and social theory if it is to be taken seriously as eminent (legal and social) form of transnational integration processes. Law as well as sociology suffer, in this respect, from long-standing methodological nationalisms (including their international derivatives). On the other hand, the collaboration between both disciplines is inhibited by persistent dichotomies and demarcations that set the normative against the factual and the legal insider against the sociological outsider. Thereby, commonalities between both perspectives are neglected and mutual commitments overlooked.

In order to clarify the societal (i. e. socio-legal) constitution of Europe, this contribution aims to confront and combine the insights of theories from both sides of the rubicon, employing systems theory, discourse theory and field theory as well as different strands of constitutionalist theorizing. Last but not least, the performative dimension of these theories will be discussed - as scientific laboratories of "Europe in the making".

Theorizing Discretionary Informality in Law

Vogel, Mary

*Law, King's College London
London, UK*

Keywords

courts, Law, politicisation

After decades of resistance, one suddenly sees the rise of discretionary informality in law, especially plea negotiation, sweeping the globe. Some time ago Franz Neumann suggested that rising discretionary informality in law was key in explaining liberalism's and the rule of law's inability to prevent the rise of National Socialism in Germany during the 1930s. Expanded discretion, he claimed, opened the courts to politicization. My historical study, Coercion to Compromise has linked discretionary informality, especially plea bargaining, to counter-revolutionary dynamics and reassertion of elite power in the transition from republic to democracy in America during the 1930s. In this paper, I theorize the relation of discretionary informality to changing contours of democratic politics, social conflict and transformative dynamics of political reaction today.

Toward strengthening democracies and civil society - Freedom as responsibility

Kilanowski, Marcin

Department of Humanities, Nicolaus Copernicus University Torun, Poland

Keywords

Civil Society, responsibility, social solidarity, freedom, deliberative democracy

In the socio-political thought of both Habermas and Rorty we find reflections on the notion of freedom. They touch upon both how widely freedom should be understood and who is entitled to decide about using it in a given way. Consequently, their reflections integrate themselves with the discussion carried on by Isaiah Berlin in his essay Two Conceptions of Freedom. In my paper I present Rorty's and Habermas's critical approaches to the positive conception of freedom, in order to proceed to their subsequent specification of the negative conception which, in the context of their philosophy, may be called freedom as responsibility. Establishing such an understanding of freedom is crucial for appearance of deliberative democracy and for shaping philosophical basis of civil society.

Pragmatic philosophy of Rorty and Habermas is the one that presents a new understanding of the position of the individual in democratic society and allows us to redefine our understanding of the community and civil society. It allows us to broaden consciousness about our place in the societies or communities in which we live as well as our roles in them when achieving our individual happiness. The achievement of this happiness is of course dependent upon social conditions. This process can only occur when every individual has an equal chance for personal development and self-fulfillment and when appropriate changes have occurred in the political, legal and economic spheres as well in education. We should add that to support these processes we need certain reforms in the educational system, electoral system of many countries, health care, labour law and so on. The goal standing in front of us and democracies around the world is strengthening civic participation, public deliberation and the development of civil society based on liberal values and on the notion of freedom as responsibility. Ultimately, all of this can lead us to the development of social solidarity, deepening understanding for human rights and strengthening democracies. Only then we will be able to demonstrate to non-democratic societies that they should join the democratic camp.

Unintended Consequences, Old and New: a Typology

Nielsen, Torben Hviid

*Department of Sociology and Human Geography, University of Oslo
Oslo, Norway*

Keywords

unintended consequences, Robert K. Merton, Ulrich Beck

Robert K. Merton's neo-classic from 1936 characterized five distinct sources of unanticipated and unintended consequences. Standing on the shoulders of Merton a new typology of four types of unintended consequences (UIC) is outlined.

Merton's horizon was to understand and eventually reduce "dysfunctions" in modern complex society, partially using insights from the new sociology of knowledge. His five sources of UIC were consequently presented as parallel, of the same standing, but "tacitly" ranked, starting with the most widespread as well as easiest to reduce and ending with self-defeating predictions.

Following Ulrich Beck's concept of "Neue Nebenfolgen" and exemplified by the emerging climate crisis and recent developments in military technology and strategy, a "new" type of UIC, achieving intended as well as unintended consequences, is discussed. Beck's concept is embedded in his diagnosis of the Second Modernity and partly a metaphor from medicine and law, but the persistent coexistence and dubious tension between intended and unintended consequences is a novelty with implications for the character and function of Merton's five sources.

Merton's third and fourth sources immediacy of interests exemplified by Adam Smith's "invisible hand" and basic values exemplified by Max Weber's 'Protestant ethics' are (partly) desired necessities in modern societies. The reconstruction of their origin does, however, not explain their reproduction in contemporary society, where they - though still unintended for the individuals - are anticipated and used intentionally from a system point of view.

Merton's final sources self-defeating predictions (and self-fulfilling prophecies) are now habitually used reflexive and intentional, i. e. to avoid the unintended and/or to achieve the intended. The change is discussed on hand Our Common Future's "warning" from 1986 (intended as self-defeating) and 'The Bush Disjunction' from 2001 (intended as self-fulfilling).

Finally Merton's two first most "obvious" and "pervasive" sources ignorance and errors are reconsidered in the light of the agents - overt and/or tacit - adaptation and adjustment to new conditions and motivational structures, as well as of recent insights from rational choice and game theory.

Unstable Borders: On the Limits of Social Science

Mavridis, Iraklis

DEPARTMENT OF SOCIAL POLICY, PANTEION UNIVERSITY OF SOCIAL AND POLITICAL SCIENCES ATHENS, GREECE

Keywords

ideology, SOCIAL EPISTEMOLOGY, BORDERS, COMMON - SENSE

In this presentation we would like to deal with the boundaries and the limits between scientific and non - scientific forms of knowledge, especially in social science. The main issue here is scientific discourse and its other, whether this might be called common sense or ideology or even a naive empiricism which identifies being and appearance in the social world (e.g. society is what you see). Therefore although we admit there is a distinctive social scientific discourse we will argue all social scientific discourses can never be «clean» and radically «different» from other discourses; in fact they are constantly contaminated by and overlap with categories of common-sense discourse - but also those of ideology. Thus our approach to social epistemology is not so much a question of what is social science but rather what is not, an attempt to question the foundations of social sciences' scientificity (scientific - truth claims) by means of detecting their limits and borders; in this sense, the conditions of its possibility (theoretically, empirically, methodologically) are based primarily on what it attempts to exclude. We will argue that social scientific discourse is always inherently open and divided, never clearly and finally demarcated (but only in a relative and unstable sense) from its other(s) because it is always determined by the other of science; thus by definition it cannot be completely closed and consolidated (i.e. cannot completely exclude its other). Its borders and limits are always unstable and historically defined and in social science at least, we cannot have simple oppositions between e.g. knowledge / ignorance, science / common sense, science / ideology, rationalism / irrationalism, truth / misrepresentation but rather over-determinations, cross-contaminations, complex borders (borders: places of division and passage), delimitations, inclusions and exclusions. We will argue that social science works at the same time on the basis of, with, beyond and against common-sense discourses or ideology (but never without them). We would like to argue that these distinctions and delimitations constitute historically relevant conventions but at the same time their epistemological validity may exceed their historical origins (i.e rationalism in modern science).

Violence and Social Theory

McSorley, Kevin

Department of Sociology, University of Portsmouth Portsmouth, Hampshire, UK

Keywords

violence, Globalization, discourse

Violence escapes easy definition, defies straightforward understanding. It devastates, transforms and breeds. It is both prominent and hidden, aberrant and utterly mundane, senseless and sense-making. The ambivalence and elusiveness of violence is reproduced in sociological and social theoretical discourse, which variously struggles to contain it, as power or politics by other means, or preface it, as structural, collective, interpersonal. More often, it has simply been a haunting absence, misrecognized, compartmentalized and ignored.

This paper details an initial attempt to trace some of these discursive contours in the treatment of violence within social theory. In addition, it will pay particular attention to the changing nature of violence in recent decades associated with globalization. In an uncertain and ethnically mixed globalized world, violence has become an increasingly important idiom for generating certainty, a forensic means of establishing and refashioning sharp lines of identification. How does the emergence of such forms and instances of violence, and the commonalities and continuities across them, necessitate reconsideration of our understandings and theories of violence?

What Does it Mean to Be Socially Constructed? Ian Hacking's Take on a Mistreated Concept

Cotta, Diogo

*SOCIUS, SOCIUS-Centro de Investigação em Sociologia Económica e das Organizações
Lisbon, Portugal*

Raposo, Rita

*Social Sciences, ISEG-Instituto Superior de Economia e Gestão
Lisbon, Portugal*

Keywords

Social Construction, Ian Hacking, Fugue

Social construction is one of the most prominent concepts in contemporary sociology, particularly in the social studies of science field. At least ever since Berger and Luckmann published their celebrated essay in 1966, the concept of social construction has been applied to a myriad of subjects: from reality itself to knowledge, gender, women refugees and even deafness. Its appeal is certainly widespread, but so are its critics. There is arguably no other concept in social thought which has aroused so much controversy, as was clearly verified in the heat of the, ungraciously dubbed, science wars.

This paper presents a philosopher's take on this much maligned concept. Ian Hacking is certainly not a certified champion of social construction. In fact, he may be one of its harshest critics. Yet, his critical approach manages to salvage some important insights, as he discriminates between the, typically unrecognized, multiple senses in which the phrase is used. Thus, the paper distinguishes the social construction of objects from the social construction of beliefs about objects and, more decisively, from the interactions between those beliefs and the objects themselves. It then argues that this distinction helps us to overcome some inconsistencies inherent in the concept's familiar use by detailing an example taken from Hacking's historical-analytical work. Hence, the paper presents the story of a transient mental illness (fugue) that appeared in the end of the nineteenth century in Europe, flourished for a few years and all but vanished a few decades later. By examining the conditions (historical, social, political, cognitive, ?) that made this pathology possible, Hacking makes use of an existentialist stance to confer meaning to a concept almost rendered meaningless through its excessive use. In this sense, the paper highlights how the concept of social construction can still be theoretically useful and how, at the same time, it shouldn't be overused.

What is Legitimacy? Does it Matter? What happens when the concept of legitimacy is applied to political realities such as the European Union and the Lisbon Treaty?

Lindgren, Lena

*Sociology, Sociology of Law
Lund, Sweden*

Keywords

legitimation, European Union, Legitimacy, conceptual analysis

There seems to be general agreement regarding the relevance and usefulness of the concept of legitimacy in contemporary social theory. My paper calls this view into question, however, and argues for a renewed awareness of the inherent difference between normative and descriptive concepts and for the importance of keeping them separate. The point of departure here is current research on the alleged legitimacy crisis in the European Union. Most studies in the field illustrate what has been called "The normative turn in EU Studies".

The two rather common diagnoses of a lack of popular support for the European Union and diminishing electoral participation in it are discussed. Should we call this a "democratic deficit" or a "crisis of legitimacy" or both "The most commonly held view seems to be that the democratic deficit is the major cause of the legitimacy crisis.

The second part of the paper suggests the "process of legitimation" to be a viable non-normative theoretical approach. Whereas legitimacy, according to a standard definition, refers to the rightfulness of a political order, the term of "legitimation process" does not have any evaluative connotations. The by now classical work in this vein is Niklas Luhmann's Legitimation durch Verfahren (1969). Today's followers of this tradition are reviewed. It is asked why this analytical approach seems to have been less prominent than those more normatively oriented are. Scholars from quite different disciplines have analysed the democratic-constitutional "legitimacy crisis", globally as well as from a European perspective - almost all of them from a normative point of view and some with a political agenda. In the final section of the paper a brief assessment of Jürgen Habermas' contributions here - ranging from Legitimationsprobleme im Spätkapitalismus (1973) to Ach, Europa (2008) - in forming our thinking about legitimacy is ventured.

Whose Cosmopolism?

Bech, Henning

*Sociology, University of Copenhagen
Copenhagen, Denmark*

Keywords

cosmopolitanism studies, urban cultural sociology, politological aspect

During the last decade, a new kind of approach has been on the rise in international sociology: studies on cosmopolitanism. Many prominent sociologists and social theorists have intervened: Ulrich Beck, Paul Gilroy, Craig Calhoun, David Held, to name a few of the most well-known. However, it would seem that most have focused only on certain aspects of what the term "cosmopolis" might imply (and perhaps should imply). The predominant interest has been in the politological (or political sociological) aspect of the polis component, while much less attention has been given to the cosmos component as well as to the urban aspect of the polis component.

In this paper, I shall present some criticism of these omissions in cosmopolitanism studies. Moreover, I shall sketch some perspectives that might arise, if the component of the cosmos (world, Welt) and the urban dimension of the polis component is taken serious. More specifically, I shall look at the possible contributions of urban cultural sociology, sexuality studies and the sociology of religions (or more broadly, the sociology of "world views").

«Public sociology» in the past and the present: update of coordinates

Podvoyskiy, Denis

*Faculty of Social Sciences and Humanities, Department of Sociology, Peoples' Friendship University of Russia
Moscow, Russia*

Keywords

position of sociology in the West and Russia, sociologists and intellectuals, «sociological imagination», a principle «freedom from value-judgment», Public and social tasks of sociology

This paper is thematically closely connected with the general context of the newest discussion on intellectual project of «public sociology» suggested by well-known American sociologist Michael Burawoy. The genealogy of ideas describing various approaches to definition of public mission and applicability of a sociological science is schematically reconstructed in the paper. There are also examined a solving the designated question in early sociological doctrines (positivism, marxism), the Max Weber's theory «science as a vocation», the Frankfurt school critical theory, structural functionalism, alternative and reflexive sociology, and a number of other sociological paradigms. At the same time debates about a socially and public role of sociology are considered as a specific variation of theoretical and methodological polemic about the valuable bases of social sciences and humanities, a role of value-judgments in researches of social scientists, a correlation of scientific and ideological, objective and subjective, instrumental and critical components in structure of sociological knowledge.

RN30

Youth and Generation

"Elite" young Muslims in Britain: Generational location and political participation

Edmunds, June

Development Studies, University of Cambridge Cambridge, Cambridgeshire

Keywords

global politics, Generations, Muslim youth

Two paradigms on young western Muslims have come to dominate the popular imagination: the first (clash theory) contends that current conflicts between the west and Muslim countries will, inexorably, end in a major confrontation between Islam and the west and that Muslim youth, in the Middle East and Europe, are playing a significant role in this development. The second (deterritorialization theory) claims that young western Muslims, unsettled by the dislocations of globalization and modernity, are increasingly turning towards radical politics or pure Islam to resolve a crisis of identity resulting from being territorially dispersed. Between these lie more subtle approaches which acknowledge the differentiated currents among young western Muslims. This paper situates itself in this space: by focusing on a cohort of "elite" young British Muslims, it highlights an often overlooked current of thinking whereby sectarianism/localism has been replaced with a commitment to benign cosmopolitanism and universal principles such as human rights, reinforcing the view that ethnic politics and cosmopolitanism are not mutually exclusive. This cohort of young Muslims are less home-centred (i.e. transnational) than their parents' generation and more global in political orientation. This shift is explained by inter-generational differentiation based on a combination of generational experiences and resources which combine to forge an active, strategic generation.

"Lads, Chavs and Pram-Face Girls": Embodiment and Emotion in Working-Class Youth Cultures

Kehily, Mary Jane

FELS, The Open University Milton Keynes, UK

Nayak, Anoop

*Geography, Newcastle University
Newcastle upon Tyne, UK*

Keywords

working-class youth, representations, embodiment, affect

The representational may be an important field for all young people, but for those positioned on the margins of social exclusion, representations may have particular significance in a climate where citizenship is dependent upon economic productivity and embodied forms of social capital. The visual and discursive in particular, commonly encodes lack of respectability through a condensation of negative signs that carry powerful affects. We consider how these "affective economies" (Ahmed, 2005) are negotiated by young people through two case studies: "pram face" teenage mums, and "chav lads" from unemployed families.

Young mothers are signified in popular representations as "problematic", profligate and unable to lift themselves out of the "cycle of poverty". The stigma attached to early fertility is acutely felt by young women who fear being judged as "bad mothers". In the case of young men their bodies can also be rendered abject through long-term unemployment and criminal activity. This is seen when young men from working- and non-working backgrounds fiercely contest the emotional politics of class in times of "risk" and insecurity pointing to some enduring "structures of feeling" (Williams, 1973). Through our analysis of young mothers and lower class young men we consider how crime, disease, dirt and promiscuity are "sticky" signs that adhere to the bodies of disadvantaged young people regardless of their social practices. We argue that such tropes are imbued with affects that spill out into everyday life to produce symbolic and material geographies of youth. However, our ethnographic encounters intimate that young people are deeply aware of the visceral nature of these signs and attempt to displace such representations by re-imagining themselves as competent carers and active citizens. By disclosing this intimate "management of feeling" (Hochschild, 2002) we aim to expose how studies of gender, class, youth and ethnicity can benefit from a closer engagement with affect and emotion.

"Not that different" - Young people's attitudes to and experiences of contact with people from minority ethnic groups

Schubotz, Dirk

School of Sociology, Social Policy and Social Work, ARK, Queen's University Belfast Belfast, Northern Ireland, UK

Keywords

Minority ethnic groups, Northern Ireland, participatory research, peer researchers

Being one of the few European countries that experienced population loss due to outward migration in the 1970s and 1980s, coinciding with the Peace Process, in the previous decade Northern Ireland has experienced significant inward migration, in particular from Eastern European EU- accession states. This sudden inward migration has led to

In this presentation I will report on a research project funded by the Northern Ireland government to explore 16-year olds attitudes to, and experiences of contact with, people from minority ethnic groups in Northern Ireland. The research was jointly undertaken by the UK's National Children's Bureau (NCB) and ARK, a joined initiative by the two universities in Northern Ireland. A participatory mixed-methods approach was employed. Questions were asked of a large random sample of 16-year olds in the Young Life and Times (YLT) survey, which is undertaken annually by ARK. The 2008 YLT survey was followed up by more in-depth exploration of "Attitudes to difference" in seven post-primary schools across Northern Ireland. A short all-school survey was administered in these schools which part-duplicated questions asked in the 2008 YLT survey. Interactive focus groups were then conducted with 16-year old pupils in each of the seven schools. Finally, brief one-to-one interviews were conducted with young people from minority ethnic backgrounds. For the second part of the study ten peer researchers were recruited from participating schools and trained to work alongside the senior ARK and NCB researchers throughout the second part of the project. They helped to design and conduct the interactive focus groups and one-to-one interviews. Peer researchers were also involved in data analysis, writing up and dissemination of the project's findings.

In this proposed presentation I will report on the process of undertaking social research with peer researchers. I will also report on the main findings of the project.

'Breakdown' in out-of-home care for young people: incident or process?

Jakobsen, Turf

Children and family, SFI - The Danish National Centre for Social Research Copenhagen, Denmark

Keywords

identity formation, social relations, out-of-home care, marginalised youth

A number of (mostly quantitative) studies have shown that out-of-home placements for young people are surprisingly difficult to carry into effect. The literature often proves that disruption is not the exception to the rule when young people are placed in foster or residential care. On the contrary, up to 50 percent of placements are terminated unplanned, either because the young person leaves the place, or because the foster or residential home is no longer willing to look after the young person.

This paper investigates the dilemma of breakdown in teenage care, but from a different angle than most of the existing studies. Thus, "breakdown" is usually considered as an important incident that can be linked causally with a variety of factors, e.g. the "nature" or the background of the young person. In other words, breakdown is treated as a concept that is significant in its own right. Instead, this paper views breakdown in care as part of an intricate process of identity formation among troubled youth. Various elements play crucial roles in such processes, breakdown not necessarily being the most important.

The paper suggests that relations may be a fruitful point of departure, explaining the chain of events for young people in care. A relational approach - stressing the importance of networks in terms of friends, relatives, adult "role models", etc. - seems more suitable to account for the particularly difficult processes that troubled young people undergo in their search for meaningful social identities.

The discussion of this paper is based on a recent qualitative study of Danish teenagers in out-of-home care. The study involved interviews with 12 young people in care, their case workers, their caretakers, and in some cases their parents.

(Dis)courses to adulthood: Portuguese generational differences

Nico, Magda

Sociology, CIES-ISCTE

Portugal, http://www.cies.iscte.pt/investigadores/ficha\_completa.jsp?pkid=224&subarea=mestres

Keywords

Transitions, Generations, Adulthood

Mobilizing the changeable concept of adulthood, this paper presents the results of a research that aimed to identify and explain the main generational differences in courses to and of adulthood in Portugal (in a European context).

Having statistical data and literature review as the starting point of this analysis, it is fair to say that Portugal, being sub-protective or family-oriented, presents trends of transitions to adulthood that are simultaneously from, to and in the family, fact that makes the (dis)courses of family members particularly illustrative of the intergenerational differences and negotiations surrounding adulthood and of the analysis of the differences in pace, order and density of the transitional events.

The concepts of "linked lives" (Elder, 1975) and "contestable adulthood" (Horowitz and Bromnick, 2007) were very important to the analysis of the collected interviews to young adults "in transition" and their mothers or fathers, regarding the frequency, timing, overlapping and multiplication of transitional events. They allowed us to compare the "tripartition" of the biographies (Kohli, 1985) to the "do-it-yourself biographies" (Beck-Gernsheim, 2002), giving special attention to the fragmentation and reversibility of current transitions to adulthood.

The transitional events considered were: graduating (and going back to school), leaving home (and going back), finding a job (with interruptions), living with a partner (and alone), getting married (and divorced) and having children. We also analysed changes in the density of demographic events that characterises the period of "transition" to adulthood. More over, the discourses (collected through interviews but having a biographical character) provided several clues for the understanding of the negotiation of the adult status within the "Portuguese family".

A Question of Locality. Young adult's school-to-work transitions in three diverse Swedish municipalities

Lidström, Lena

Child- and Youth Education, Special Education and Counselling, Umeå University Umeå, Sweden

Keywords

biography, career guidance, locality, School-to-work transitions

This article emanates from a research project analyzing school-to-work transitions in a biographical perspective. 52 young unemployed adults (25-29 years) from three Swedish municipalities with highly varying socioeconomic/demographic conditions (a rural area, a well-situated and a vulnerable suburb) were interviewed. It is highlighted how the local context (and gender) influences their journeys through education, working life and career guidance.

Four different career patterns are identified (yo-yo-transitions, staying and moving mainly within either education, work or exclusion), which shape their past experiences, present situation and hopes for the future. These patterns are locally influenced. Young people in the rural area are over-represented in the yo-yo-transition pattern, while those in the well-situated suburb more often can be found on the educational road. Finally exclusion (permanent unemployment or absence of a stable job) mainly emerges among those living in the vulnerable suburb.

Rural interviewees feel restricted regarding local possibilities in education and working life, and demonstrate distinctive strategies. Respondents in the vulnerable suburb identify social capital as crucial to make one's way, while education has particularly high value in the well-situated suburb. The young adults' narratives illustrate that locality and gender are interwoven. For example, in suggesting future career goals some of them address critical problems in their community that differs between men and women.

Interventions when young people choose upper secondary school and varying unemployment schemes illustrate that public career guidance is shaped by, and reproduce, local structures. Young adults' main counter-strategy towards career guidance which is perceived as endangering personal goals is to avoid institutions/officials; to "manage by oneself". Other approaches differ due to local context and gender. Negotiation efforts are mostly done by men in the rural area and hardly at all by women living in the suburbs, while a misleading strategy is demonstrated by a few women in all three municipalities.

Individuals develop responses to local possibilities and limitations depending on economic and institutional structures as well as cultural values. What is "marketable" for a young adult woman or man in the three contexts varies, and contributes to explain the differences in individual strategies.

Academic or vocational? Decisions about continuing in education of majority and minority youth in Finland

Kilpi, Elina

*Department of Sociology, University of Oxford
UK,*

Keywords

minority youth, transitions within education, education, immigrants

European minority youth have often been found to be disadvantaged in their educational attainment compared to the majority population. However, there is evidence to suggest that although this may be the case for educational performance, educational attainment may be a different matter. Minority youth tend to have more ambitious educational plans, and controlling for prior achievement, they have been found to continue in higher tracks and attain higher levels of education compared to the majority. This is also the case in Finland, where children of immigrants are more likely to continue in academic upper secondary education than vocational education, particularly when their prior school performance and family background are taken into account.

This paper presents results from mixed methods research including statistical analysis of register data as well as qualitative data obtained from interviews of both minority and majority youth. The quantitative data is based on samples of students completing compulsory education between 2000-2004 and distinguishes eight immigrant-origin groups, as well as mixed, unknown and three Finnish-origin groups. The main focus of the analyses is on the differences in continuing to academic (or general) upper secondary schools versus vocational upper secondary schools. Dropping out of education is also touched upon.

Results from the quantitative analysis are further explored with qualitative material from interviews. At least 24 students in their final year of comprehensive school have been interviewed on their decisions of where they want to study. Half of these students have an immigrant background and the other half is a matched sample of Finnish-origin students. Although both minority and majority youth tend to follow their personal interests when applying to upper secondary, minority youth tend to stress their parents' wishes to a large extent. The higher ambitions of minority youth are also evident in the interviews. Minority students tend to have a clearer idea of what they want to do and thus continue in general schools in order to have better chances of going to university and achieving their goal.

Results from both the quantitative and the qualitative research will be mirrored against similar research in other European countries.

Adolescence risk factors for unemployment in adulthood. A 16-year prospective follow-up study

Kestilä, Laura

*-, National Institute for Health and Welfare (THL)
Helsinki, Finland*

Huurre, Taina

*-, National Institute for Health and Welfare (THL)
Helsinki, Finland*

Rahkonen, Ossi

*Department of Public Health, University of Helsinki
Helsinki, Finland*

Joutsenniemi, Kaisla

*-, National Institute for Health and Welfare (THL)
Helsinki, Finland*

Kiviruusu, Olli

*-, National Institute for Health and Welfare (THL)
Helsinki, Finland*

Berg, Noora

*-, National Institute for Health and Welfare (THL)
Helsinki, Finland*

Aro, Hillevi

*-, National Institute for Health and Welfare (THL)
Helsinki, Finland*

Keywords

Risk, adolescence, unemployment, life-course, disadvantage

Background: The life-course approach emphasises the contribution of circumstances in childhood and youth to adult well-being. Regarding adult disadvantage, relatively little is known of the earlier social, health-related and economic predictors of unemployment, and the pathways leading from adolescence to adult unemployment.

Aims: The aims of the study were a) to examine the effect of various social, health-related and economic adversities in adolescence on adult unemployment and b) to find out whether the effect is mediated through the respondent's education and family formation paths.

Data and methods: The data were obtained from a follow-up surveys in a Finnish urban age cohort from age 16 till 32 years (666 males and 805 females). Adult outcomes examined were current and long-term unemployment and adolescent risk factors included several socioeconomic (e.g. parental education and occupation, parental unemployment), educational (school grades, educational aspirations), social (e.g. relationship with parents, parental divorce, number of friends) and health-related (e.g. binge drinking, daily smoking, psychological distress) factors.

Results: According to the preliminary results, there are several adolescence predictors of unemployment in adulthood, such as poor school grades, the relationship with parents. The associations are partly mediated through the respondent's educational path.

Conclusions: The findings that various adolescent risk factors predict unemployment in adulthood suggest that preventive efforts should be targeted several domains of adolescent life.

Analysis of drug use patterns among Latvian youth within the framework of risk and protective factors

Koroleva, Ilze

*Department of Sociology, Institute of Philosophy and Sociology, University of Latvia
Riga, Latvia*

Snikere, Sigita

*Department of Sociology, Institute of Philosophy and Sociology, University of Latvia
Riga, Latvia*

Aleksandrovs, Aleksandrs

*Department of Sociology, Institute of Philosophy and Sociology, University of Latvia
Riga, Latvia*

Keywords

risk and protective factors, high schoolers, drug use

The paper presents an analysis of the use of (and initial experimentation with) addictive substances among youth, which is based on the results of two waves of the survey project ECAD (European Cities against Drugs), in the framework of program "Youth in Europe: Youth and well-being" which was conducted in 2006 and 2008. In particular, we identify the role of several risk and protective factors in the incidence and continued prevalence of drug use among 15-16-year-old high school students.

Among the important recent developments in the theory and practice of addiction prevention is the focus on risk and protective factors as the cornerstones of every prevention program. These factors act as both targets to be shaped by the program and as indicators to be used for evaluation. The framework is useful for describing the diversity of factors that act and interact to determine the incidence of the use of alcohol, tobacco and illicit drugs, as well it allows to analyse adolescent behaviours in the context of various influences. Grounding on approx. 300 variables factor analysis was performed separately for each domain of risk and protective factors. To isolate the direct effect of each factor and to determine the relative importance of various factors, multiple logistic regressions were used. The regular smoking, binge drinking and illicit drug were employed as the dependent variables, while the list of independent variables consisted of more than 70 individual-level, peer-level, school-level, neighbourhood-level, environmental and family-level factors.

The results of survey data analysis highlight the most important protective factors, which should be strengthened and facilitated in the development of addiction prevention programs, as well as point out the risk factors that should be inhibited in order to shield our new generation from addictive behaviours that are detrimental to its development and health. The knowledge obtained is a useful source of information for anyone involved in the protection of youth from harmful effects of psychoactive substances.

Apathy or protest - Youth, generations and political participation

Tuorto, Dario

*science of education, university of bologna
bologna, italy*

Keywords

young, political participation, Generation

A common representation of youth today tells us of a generation apathetic, disenchanted, distant from politics and, more generally, from the culture of engagement that have marked the biographic events of the older generations. In contrast with this negative image, other researches have put the attention on the changes which are occurring in the field of citizens involvement in politics. Young people have responded to the crisis of political parties and their traditional model of militancy shifting the interest towards new, more direct and unconventional political actions (protests, boycotts, mobilization through Internet) or towards other activities (volunteer work in social or cultural associations). This paper aims to reconstruct, with reference to the Italian context of the last decades, the main dimensions of civic and political engagement of young people, trends (last 3-4 decades) and determinants of political inclusion/exclusion at individual and contextual level. The paper intends to pursue two objectives. The first is to test different scenarios ("apathy" and "new activism") to find out which is more suitable to describe youth condition. The second is to compare forms and level of political involvement of the younger generation with that of the older generations in order to value whether the gap has widened over time and in what areas.

Artistic activity as a source for youth empowerment

Siivonen, Katriina

*Finnish Youth Research Network, Finland Futures Research Centre, Turku School of Economics
Turku, Finland*

Kotilainen, Sirkku

Finnish Youth Research Network, Research Centre for Contemporary Culture, University of Jyväskylä University of Jyväskylä, Finland

Keywords

Youth, well-being, empowerment, art projects, futures workshops

Artistic activity as a source for youth empowerment

Integrating good practices to societal planning "Storm" is a Finnish national project, consisting of several local projects, where artistic activities are considered as a source for well-being and empowerment for especially marginalized young people. The project's time span is 2008-2011 and it targets youths in ages from 13 to 17. Project is financed by Finnish Cultural Foundation.

Our task is to evaluate the effectiveness of these projects in a research program running concurrently with the art projects. In the first phase of the research, we are interested in the significances that the young are constructing from this cultural participation in to their everyday lives. Central questions are e.g. what kind of changes young people reflect regarding their social relationships, their social and cultural abilities, in addition to their attitudes for life, including arts' and culture. We will ask also what their hopes are for the future. In the preliminary results we have examples of well functioning art processes with an ability to increase self awareness of young people and thus give them possibilities for empowerment in their local societies.

Further, our task is to define some good practices among art projects, and to develop futures processes for integrating these projects to societal planning. In this work we will use futures workshops. In them a group of people are working together creating a common vision and strategic tools for reaching their vision. The facilitator helps them to start from critique phase with current problems and to go forward to imagination phase for finding new and innovative solutions to these problems. At the end of the process, facilitator guides the group to define means for realization of the vision.

We will organize common futures workshops for local political actors, NGO's, artists, and especially for young people. In our presentation we will give preliminary results from these futures processes.

Attitudes and values of the Finnish youth

Paju, Petri

*Youth Research, Finnish Youth Research Network
Helsinki, Finland*

Myllyniemi, Sami

*Youth Research, Finnish Youth Research Network
Helsinki, Finland*

Keywords

values, attitudes, living conditions

In our presentation we will discuss attitudes and values of the Finnish youth. As a basic data we use the Finnish Youth barometer. The Youth barometer is an annual publication surveying the values and attitudes of Finnish young people 15-29 years of age. The Youth Barometer series has been published since 1994 by the Advisory Council for Youth Affairs. Surveys provide follow-up data on the changes in youth attitudes since 1994, a sufficiently long time span for identifying trends. Barometer has been used to "test" some ideas that have occurred in political discussion, like the change of the suffrage age in different elections and on-line voting. Not only the answers, but also the questions reflect the time the surveys were conducted.

It is natural that changes and trends are of interest, but this should not obscure the fact that, in general, the values of young people are quite stable. The living conditions as such have changed, it is another issue, interesting as such, how much that is reflected in attitudes. Clear trends are few, even trends that one could suppose to be visible in data. We will also present some things which are significant just because they have not changed, at least not in any dramatic way. Comparisons we will make to other age groups and to other countries. Comparisons provide an opportunity to draw conclusions on national characteristics and generation specific ways of taking a stand on different issues.

We will concentrate on themes work, education, unemployment, consumption and livelihood. Partly because these are the themes that have been on the questionnaire from year to year. We will also discuss some specific themes of interest, for example how work and employment seem to be a value as such for the young, while at the same time unemployment is not considered to be that bad either. We will discuss trends and differences observed in comparisons, and will interpret the figures. We will mostly present figures keeping the young people of Finland as one group, looking for changes over time, between different countries and age groups.

Authenticity under influence: parents, peers and media behind students' vocational choices

Vieira, Maria

*Instituto de Ciências Sociais, University of Lisbon
Lisboa, Portugal*

Pappamikail, Lia

*Instituto de Ciências Sociais, University of Lisbon
Lisboa, Portugal*

Melo, Benedita

*Dep. Educação, Faculdade de Ciências, University of Lisbon
Lisbon, Portugal*

Keywords

risks, Authenticity, secondary education, Individuation, school choices

In contemporary societies, individuation is an experience as fundamental as it is problematic. It is carried out in a succession of trials (Martuccelli, 2006) which have implications in the choices made and decisions taken, in a greatly amplified space of freedom. Proving authenticity through self-determination has become a compelling obligation - the 'obligation to be free' (Dubet, 2002). But exercising individual autonomy carries with it risks, which are all the greater as perception of them becomes greater too.

However, building one's biography is not an exercise carried out without support. The modern institutionalization of biographical patterns places the individual within new boundaries and actors.

Given the obligation and length of attendance, school takes a crucial part in young people's biography. In fact, adolescents' individuation is largely based on the educational system, and expresses itself on several schooling options. This is particularly true when one reaches upper secondary education, as this attendance implies the definition of a personal project. In this case, authenticity is linked to the "obligation" of choosing - by means of a compulsory vocational choice. To define a personal project that gives sense to studies becomes the major problem secondary pupils have to deal with.

This paper aims to debate some of these issues. In particular, we intend to confront students' obligation to exhibit their authenticity by choosing a school path with their dependency on perceived multiple influences (family, peers, media, among others) to support their options.

Our empirical study is based on a survey applied in April 2008 to the universe of 1793 pupils attending 10th and 12th years of upper secondary education in 6 socially contrasting Portuguese public schools. Being part of a larger project on this issue - the research project "Open future: uncertainty and risk in school choices", funded by the Portuguese Science and Technology Foundation - the questionnaire included items concerning pupil's social background, school trajectories and academic choices. A data basis has been constructed and a statistical treatment of the information (SPSS package program) undertaken.

Back to the CCCS´ Youth cultures, leisure and social class

Tolonen, Tarja

*Sociology, University of Helsinki & Youth research network
Helsinki, Finland*

Keywords

Social Class, young people, leisure, locality

Back to the CCCS?

Youth cultures, leisure and social class

Docent, University research fellow Tarja Tolonen

Department of Helsinki, University of Helsinki

Latest discussions in youth studies have pondered if there is a relation between youth cultures, lifestyles and social class. In late 1970's up to early 1990's the work of CCCS (the Centre for Contemporary Cultural Studies) was popular among youth researchers in Nordic countries. Researchers from CCCS used terms such as subculture, counter culture and lifestyle which were seen as relating to their "parent culture" which was based on social class. In late 1990's and 2000, following the waves of "post modernism", there was much criticism over their interpretations of youth cultures as being part of their parent culture, and youth cultures were seen instead as part of global consumer culture. However, lately, these assumptions have been questioned as well. In this paper I ask how the leisure time lifestyles and cultural practises of young people could be interpreted: Are they global with local interpretations and how they can be socially and culturally contextualised? Do they have any relation to social class? And how gender and ethnicity could help to understand these issues further?

This presentation is based on ongoing research project Leisure time and social relations of young people, which is funded by the Youth Research Network in Finland. The data will consist of around 50 interviews of young people, from 13 to 17 years old, as well as youth workers and others working with young people. The data also includes ethnographic encounters (short term field work) in chosen locations (youth houses etc) in Helsinki in South and Kajaani in North West of Finland.

Blurred transitions: revisiting the significance of work and parenthood for young adults in Italy

Cuzzocrea, Valentina

Political Science, University of Cagliari Cagliari, Italy

Magaraggia, Sveva

Sociology and Social Research, University of Milan-Bicocca Milan, Italy

Keywords

Italy, transition, thresholds, parenthood, work

Almost everywhere in Europe, corresponding to the transformations in post-industrial societies, transition from youth to adulthood are being prolonged and de-standardised (White and Wyn 2008), and welfare measures minimised. This in turn puts pressure on parents and young people. Within the group of Southern European countries, Italy is characterised by low levels of welfare provision and reliance on the family as a form of support (Ferrera 2006). However, young adults in Italy constitute a case in its own right for a particularly delayed transition to adulthood. Not only scholars but also national and international press heavily attack them with the accusation that they have lost freshness and potential in public life. The question is then what conditions allow a young Italian to consider himself/herself an adult in the current cultural and social-political scenario.

International sociological literature on life cycle agrees in identifying five thresholds which have to be overcome in order to reach adulthood. Among these, we concentrate on obtaining a stable working position and becoming parent. Findings from our two different research projects strongly converge in criticizing the necessity, for the young adults interviewed, to refer to such thresholds. Within a situation of growing contingency, "yo-yo" modalities have been identified (Walther 2006) to interpret transitions which are not only prolonged and destandardised, but also uncertain and reversible. Pushing further in this direction, our interview material suggests to re-conceptualize the intrinsic value of reflexively "passing" turning points to consider oneself fully adult and to problematise adulthood itself as an unquestionable point of arrival.

Ferrera, M. (2006) "The Southern model of welfare in Social Europe " Journal of European Social Policy 6.

Walther, A. (2006). "Regimes of youth transitions. Choice, flexibility and security in young people's experiences across different European contexts " Young 14(2): 119-139.

White, R., and Wyn, J. (2008) (2nd Edition). Youth and Society: Exploring the Social Dynamics of Youth Experience, Oxford University Press: Melbourne.

Changes in educational ambitions during lower secondary school among Norwegian youths. Social class, gender, minority status

Hegna, Kristinn

Group for Youth Research, NOVA - Norwegian Social Research

Oslo, Norway

Keywords

Gender, education, Social Class, minorities, ambitions

Educational ambitions in lower secondary school are important for students' motivation and subsequent choice of academic track and higher education. Early ambitions are formed in a social context structured by social class, gender and minority status moderated or reinforced by individual experiences in school and friendships. This study analyzes changes in educational ambitions from 9th to 10th grade in a sample of 2500 Oslo youth. Are there differences in upward or downward changes in educational ambitions in groups depending on social class, gender and minority status? Do all groups show comparable coherence between ambitions and choice of academic track? The analyses show that majority working-class boys have the lowest educational ambitions in 9th grade, and that many of them even drop the ambitions they once had when they get to 10th grade. Minority background and female gender is related to higher ambitions in all comparisons between groups, but also to varying stability in ambitions. However, choice of academic track is not as strongly correlated to higher education ambitions among minority students. Structural barriers to fulfilling educational ambitions among minority students are discussed.

Choice between staying at school or entering the labour market: disadvantages faced by children from single-parent families

Alieva, Aigul

CEPS/INSTEAD and KU Leuven, International Master in Social Policy Analysis

Differdange, Luxembourg

Keywords

PISA, europe, schooling, single-parent family, education

The divorce rate in Europe is gradually climbing up, thus leading to an increasing number of children living with only one parent making up to 15-20% of all families with children. Using the OECD PISA data, the analysis confirms once again that their educational achievement is significantly lower when compared to the performance of peers with similar characteristics coming from two-parent families. These differences seem to be particularly large in Belgium, Denmark, Greece, Ireland, Netherlands, Norway, Sweden and Switzerland. In other countries like Finland, Iceland and Eastern European countries no such differences are being observed. Also, students coming from one-parent families show lower educational expectations. In nearly all the countries, the proportion of students who aim at finishing only secondary school or go for vocational track providing an access to the labour market is higher than among comparable peers from two-parent families. Fewer students aspire to continue their education beyond this level and number of those who would like to reach tertiary degree is significantly lower.

Analysis based on the PISA 2003 data includes 23 000 children from single-parent families in 23 European countries. Single-mother families make 85% of all the single-parent families. More frequently when compared to mothers in two-parent families, single mothers work full time, while the unemployment remains higher as well. As far as the PISA study is concerned, single parents differ neither in their nominal occupational status, nor in their educational level from parents in intact families. In other words, we cannot claim that parents of lower socio-economic strata are more often divorced, at least, not in case of the PISA data. Income is one of the main factors to explain differences in current as well as the future educational achievement<sup>1</sup>, for once it is being controlled for, both achievement and aspiration come closer to those of their peers from intact families in majority of the cases. The study aims to show the particular vulnerability of single-parent families and their children and to put forward more evidence in favour of a stronger child-centred policy in Europe with income re-distribution being one of its main tools.

Citizenship in everyday life - young Romanians' options

Anghelescu, Gina

Department for Youth Policy, Ministry of Youth and Sport Bucharest, Romania

Keywords

citizenship, mixed methods, constructed spaces

The aims for this research have been to reveal how the young people perceive and assume or appropriate the social space, and to grasp the significations invested by them into the citizen statute. On the daily life axis I have taken into consideration the local, national and European dimensions.

Using an associative technique proposed by A. S. de Rosa, I have asked 60 young people from Bucharest, Cluj, Constanta and Iași to evoke short-terms or expressions associated by them with the city of residence, Romania and Europe. With the youngsters from Bucharest I have carried out in-depth interviews. I was concerned with grasping the attributes of the personal networks as far as attachment and trust; in getting details of these possible forms of sociability with information about constraints, responsibilities, social learning. The interrogative area was gradually enlarged, but before each discussion about the other three types of social space, the association questionnaires were filled in.

According the findings, the attachment and trust are the attributes for the proximal life space. The daily pursuit of these young persons is divided between duties and entertainment. Although a part of them have declared that "one hardly knows what kind of person is best to be nowadays", all of them are preoccupied by gathering cultural capital - educational or professional.

The larger the area of reference becomes, the less are the aspects with a strong visibility for youngsters. Local space is conveyed especially by appealing to the infrastructure, resources and societal frame. National area is "filtered" through the perspective of the societal frame and of the resources, and the European one only by relating to societal frame.

The idea of citizenship in the daily life is diminished to the individual responsibility, the relation with the state institutions is less mentioned, or the remarks are negative. Depending on the social space for which it is constructed, the emergence of citizenship seems to be dispersed by the predominance/lack of the feeling of belonging, of the value options and of their need to clarify the idea of nation.

Civil and political participation of young people on election to European parliament 2009 in Slovak republic

Machacek, Ladislav

CERYs, UCM /University of ss.cyril and method trnava, slovakia

Keywords

participation, European Parliament, first/voters

At secondary schools in SR is studying 57.300 pupils in the age of 18 and on Universities in SR is studying on daily studies together 115.200 students in 18-23 ages. They will have the possibility for the first time to attend elections of 13 new member in European parliament (6.6.2009) for Slovakia. Special attention of sociological research (January and June 2009) is dedicating to problems of elections to European parliament. The aim of the research was to find out, how the first-voters are orientated in data of elections planned on the years 2009 and 2010 in Slovakia. The some questions are how are theirs intentions and real participation on presidential elections (March 2009), elections to EP (June 2009), election to regional counties (October 2009) and Parliament of Slovakia (June 2010). Research is the segment of the youth project Students european parliament in Slovakia. Project aim is to increase election participation of young people. In the year 2004 only 16,9% of slovak citizens attended the first election in EP, last place from all 27 members countries of EU.

Comparing scholastic performance between immigrants' children and natives in Italy: a spatial analysis

Di Bartolomeo, Anna

Department of Demography, Faculty of Statistics, University of Rome "La Sapienza" Rome, Italy

Guarneri, Antonella

Direzione Centrale per le Statistiche e le Indagini sulle Istituzioni Sociali, Italian National Institute of Statistics, Istat Rome, Rome

Muccitelli, Paola

*Direzione Centrale per le Statistiche e le Indagini sulle Istituzioni Sociali, Italian National Institute of Statistics, Istat
Rome, Italy*

Keywords

immigrants? children, scholastic performance, spatial analysis

The growing importance of migratory flows in Italy is reflected in the Italian scholastic system. Immigrants' children attending Italian schools are in fact more than 570 thousands, accounting for the 6.4% of the students and their yearly growth rate has been about 71.1% in the last ten years. Migrants and their children are unevenly distributed on the territory as the most attractive areas for them are the Northern regions, where the unemployment rate is relatively lower. There, the proportion of immigrants' children is significantly higher than on average - in Emilia Romagna, e.g., it reaches the value of 12%, while in the South this value varies between 1.2 - 2.3%.

Notwithstanding the strong incentives, immigrants' children do not perform as well as other students. On the one hand, the lack of regularity in educational tracks represents one of the greater concern; on the other hand, they are more likely to spend more time to complete their education path than their native peers. In summary, immigrants' children face worst educational experiences with respect to natives in all types of schools during the whole educational tracks.

This paper studies the performance gap between natives and immigrants' children by focusing on the geographical aspects. In particular, the aim is twofold. First, we analyze how the students' performances tend to differ among Italian regions and by immigrant status. Secondly, by adopting the spatial analysis methodology, we deepen the relationship between performances and school locations. More in details, the spatial analysis treats geo-referenced statistical data, in which the geographical localization of cases is the object of the analysis. The latter represents an innovative contribution, as geographical variables assume an explicative function abandoning their traditional descriptive role.

Detached or involved in public sphere? Biographical trails as catalysts or inhibitors of civic involvement

Kwiecinska-Zdrenka, Monika

Institute of Sociology, Nicolaus Copernicus University Torun, Poland

Keywords

biographies, detachment, civic involvement, Youth

Polish youth is less and less present in the public sphere. The reasons for this detachment are quite well recognized: glamour of the consumer culture pulling away young people from public sphere, the nature of democracy itself (the acceptance of lack of participation in public sphere); detachment as a burden inherited from previous generation socialized in the non-democratic system and often convinced of the facade character of the public sphere.

However, there is also quite a significant number of young people (and young adults) involved in public sphere (discussed here in categories other than those of participation in political elections), even though they are socialized and growing up in the same cultural and political context as those detached. What are the reasons for these in-group differences? What are the catalysts or inhibitors of youth civic involvement? Could it be their biographies? And if so, what biographical experiences leave trails that push young people to civic involvement?

These and other questions are answered based on empirical data. The results the paper is based on come from two sources: quantitative pseudo dynamic research of 16, 19 and 30 years old Poles and qualitative data from biographical interviews with young adults (30 years old).

Education and Citizenship in Portugal. Different configurations from the First Republic to nowadays

Henriques, Vera

Sociology, CIES / ISCTE

Lisboa, Portugal

Keywords

Basic Education Curricula, citizenship, education

The idea of civic education has been constantly present in the portuguese education curricula. However, the way this subject has been formulated in schools assumed different configurations over the time. Nowadays, a new subject, denominated Civic Education, is part of the basic education curricula and is defined as (?) a privileged space to develop the education towards citizenship, with the objective of developing the students' civic conscience as a fundamental element on the process of educating them to become responsible, critical, active and intervenient citizens, resorting, namely, to the interchange of life experiences between students and to their individual and collective participation in class, school and community. (Decree-Law 6/2001, January 18th, 5th article, point 3, paragraph c). It is important to understand the reasons which legitimate the existence of this issue in schools and to realize the principles that support him.

In this communication, I'll try to answer the following questions: (1) Why are the governments so worried about Civic Education for young people? (2) What are the reasons behind this increasing interest from the political authorities in Civic Education, with different configurations along the portuguese history? (3) What reasons give teachers and the school the legitimacy to infuse "civic values" in the students? Thus, I'll analyse the politics that implemented civic education in different periods of the portuguese history: the First Republic, the New State, the post-dictatorship years and the current period. Besides, doing a revision of the conceptions associated with civic education, I'll explore the social and institutional contexts that give meaning to them.

Ethnic Prejudices among Russian Young People

Puuronen, Vesa

Social policy and social psychology, University of Kuopio Finland,

Keywords

survey, russia, ethnic prejudices, Youth

The paper presents empirical results of a survey research (n=3996), which was conducted in four research sites in Russia. The sites were Republic of Karelia, Republic of Tatarstan and cities of Saint Petersburg and Krasnojarsk. The respondents were students of secondary schools and universities. The age range of the respondents was from 14 to 32 years. The vast majority of respondents were from 15 to 24 years of age. The aim of the study was to analyse the relationship between certain background variables (age, social class, educational level and gender) and ethnic prejudices in order to find out potential differences between Russian young people and young people in other countries in which these kind of studies have been conducted. The results show that in Russia the ethnic prejudices vary according to the social background, age, educational level and gender of the respondents. Older students were less prejudiced than younger ones, female students were less prejudiced than male and students from working class families were more prejudiced than students from middle and upper class families. In this respect Russian young people seem not to differ from the young people in other countries.

Happy-go-lucky young versus aspiring elderly: Determinants of satisfaction with life among three generations in the emerging consumer and information society of Estonia

Kalmus, Veronika

*Institute of Journalism and Communication, University of Tartu
Tartu, Estonia*

Keywords

consumer society, Estonia, quality of life, information society, Generations

This paper analyses generational continuities and differences in the strength of relationships between one aspect of the quality of life - subjective well-being - and the indicators of the consumer and information society in Estonia. The data derive from a representative population survey Me. The World. The Media, carried out in September to October 2008 (N=1507) among 15-74 year-old respondents.

In general, among other aspects of the consumer and information society, people's subjective well-being is primarily dependent on their material consumption opportunities. The youngest generation of respondents (aged 15-29) differs from middle-aged and older respondents mainly with regard to the fact that several orientations related to consumer and information society (e.g. versatile Internet use, consumerism and attributing importance to brands) are so widespread among them that they are not related to the differences in satisfaction with life within the group. For the younger generation, higher satisfaction with life is related to a lower level of concern regarding the influence of consumer society on young people as well as to an indifferent attitude towards the environment. In the case of the oldest age group (aged 55-74), the subjective well-being is highest among those who are able to and want to exercise environmentally friendly consumption.

We can interpret the relationships between the quality of life and aspects of consumer and information society from the standpoint of social adaptation which gives rise to two types of assessments. On the one hand, fast adaptation to the development of information and consumer society has a positive effect on quality of life in terms of subjective well-being whereas the feeling of "not missing the boat" plays an especially important role in the satisfaction with life of middle-aged and elderly people. On the other hand, there exists the danger of successful adaptation to social changes causing a tendency to take problematic phenomena for granted, thereby bringing about their normalization, especially in the eyes of the youngest generation.

How peer groups create social inequality. Distinctive practices in the context of gender, class, ethnicity and culture

Pfaff, Nicolle

Institute of Educational Science, University of Goettingen Berlin, Germany

Keywords

peer group, reconstructive research, preadolescents, cross-cultural research, social inequality

The paper presents first results from a cross-cultural study on peer-group practices of preadolescent pupil in contrasting social and educational settings in Brazil and Germany. Based on a distinction theoretical approach and referring to studies from the field from inequality research, school and youth research the reconstructive investigation aims on the production of social inequality in peer groups of preadolescent youth. Group discussions and biographic interviews have been carried out with preadolescents and analysed with the methodologic strategies of Grounded Theory and Documentary Method. Firstly, the study shows a broad variety on dimensions young people differentiate from others, including social categories, such as gender, class and race, but also other aspects, such as moral, religious or aesthetic matters. Secondly, it is shown how preadolescents generate these distinctive practices concerning their social identity and background. Thereby culture seems to be less important than gender and class. Finally, the special importance of the peer group regarding the development of distinctive practices can be demonstrated by the triangulation of biographic and group-related material.

In-between school and work in a post-socialist context: do-it-yourself biographies in search of meaningfulness

Simionca, Anca

Sociology and Social Anthropology, Central European University Budapest, Hungary

Keywords

Youth, individualization, post-socialism, transition from school to work, self and meaning

The profound change that both the educational system and the labor market in Romania have been undergoing in the past two decades seriously shattered the predictability of individual strategies and threatened people's capacities to construct a meaningful sense of self. An institutionalized way of undertaking the transition to the labor market is no longer provided for university graduates (as was the case during the socialist regime). I argue that a space for personal innovation, in which individuals actively explore and engage with their uncertain environments, is opened as a consequence. The years of university studies and the anticipated transition from school to work progressively became a laboratory of the "do-it-yourself" biography, in which various engagements with the available opportunities (like summer jobs abroad, NGO sector projects, conferences/summer schools, part-time jobs, students' associations) are tried out. Further, this experience is put to use in recurring attempts to construct one's sense of self. The institutionally induced awareness of the constructed nature of one's trajectory and the sense of personal responsibility for its crafting often become overwhelming and are viewed in negative terms. However, people's experiences indicate that the potentiality of creating at least temporary meaningfulness is also inscribed in the current situation.

This paper directly engages with the wider debate over the "extended reflexivity thesis" by bringing into discussion the case of individual transition from school to work in post-socialist Romania. It contributes to the need of empirically documenting the way the process of individualization and the contemporary changing nature of the self and its construction look like for individuals embedded in a variety of contexts. The empirical material on which I rely consists of qualitative interviews with university graduates from different cohorts. I provide a thick description of some of the main features of the current experience of graduating the university in Romania and also suggest dimensions on which the differences in the way the same turning point was constructed for the previous generations appear.

Inequalities among the "Disadvantaged" - Youth with Lower School Qualifications and their Transition Patterns into Vocational Training in Germany

Aybek, Can

Social and Political Sciences / Max Weber Programme, European University Institute San Domenico di Fiesole, Italy

Keywords

Vocational Training, Immigrant Youth, life course, Germany, Transition into Labour Market

The Second National Report on Education published in May 2008 in Germany states that even if controlled for several individual background characteristics in comparison to native-borns for 2nd/3rd generation immigrants it is less probable to attend higher secondary school tracks (p. 157-158). This leads to a concentration of young people from immigrant families in school types offering lower educational certificates. Furthermore, the report makes clear that the lower the educational degree obtained, the higher the chances of having problems in finding a place in vocational education and training (VET). But what if we compare native-born and migrant youth who all have "just" lower school degrees? Are there any differences between them with respect to the transition into VET?

Departing from these basic questions, at the Bi-Annual ESA Meeting 2009 in Lisbon I would like to present some selected results from my completed PhD thesis, in which I compared native-born and immigrant youth's inclusion into the VET system in Germany and analysed related public policy approaches. In my presentation the focus is going to be on the patterns of transition. I raise the following research questions: - What kind education/employment related activities are young people engaged in between the ages of 14 and 20? - How long does it take for them to enter vocational training once they start their search for VET opportunity? - Which individual/familial factors have an influence on entering vocational training sooner or later?

The results of my empirical analyses show that even within the group of "disadvantaged" youth important differences between native-borns and immigrants remain.

Intergenerational Dynamics and the Formation of National Identity: The Case of the Ukrainian Minority in Poland

Wangler, Alexandra

*Sociology, Field 5: Life-Course and Lifespan Dynamics, Bremen International Graduate School of Social Sciences (BIGSSS)
Bremen, Germany*

Keywords

Eastern Europe, Generation, history, minority youth, national identity

My qualitative study explores the perceptions regarding national identity and belonging. Unlike other minorities in Poland, Polish-Ukrainian relations belong to the most controversial and mythologized topics of post-war history. Of most interest will be the interpretation of the historical events before and after 1989 of members of three generations, especially the youth. Unlike their parents and grandparents who had been formed by the forced resettlement of approximately 140,000 Ukrainians to the north of Poland and the years of communist party rule, the young generation raised up in a new political system after 1989 (including Ukraine's gaining independence in 1991 and the Orange Revolution). Within the frame of these events and the rapidity of the changes national narratives and the understanding of belonging and nationality have become contested and reformulated. As significant changes in social and political structures shape each new cohort, considerable differences and discontinuities in behavioural patterns come to the fore. The president of the "Ukrainian Association in Poland", Piotr Tyma, alluded to the age-based patterns of identity formation. He opposed the traditional perpetuation of culture to the pop culture of the Ukrainian youth which is oriented on Ukrainian idols abroad or Ukrainian music bands in Poland.

The striking research question is: Which differences do exist regarding the comprehension of history and particular historical events before and after 1989 between the generations and how does it shape the national consciousness of the youth? Does the peculiarity of Ukrainian adolescents' everyday culture have an impact on the minority's perception and participation in civil society?

The study focuses on the main political, cultural and social influences on three generations' respective sense or experience of national identity, especially regarding the changes after 1989. This focus will irradiate the intergenerational dynamics in the context of minority organization structure, the interpretation of historical events and the European integration and thus analyzes whether and how the youth distances itself from the older generations within a new civil society.

Intolerance and aggression among Russian youth: "normal" and dangerous manifestations

Trotsuk, Irina

Department of Sociology, Peoples Friendship University of Russia Russia,

Keywords

aggression, ambivalent values, life situations

The quantitative survey based on a standardised questionnaire investigating youth's life situations, guiding norms and values, patterns of orientation and behaviour was conducted in 2007. The survey sample was representative of the sex, age, education, region and urban/rural residence of Russian youth. The results highlight indeed alarming trends of potential aggression among Russian youth, especially towards members of national minorities and illegal immigrants (mostly seasonal workers from former Soviet republics, mainly Ukraine, Central Asia and South Caucasus Republics, employed in the retailing and construction sectors). The Russian youth revealed themselves rather contrasted: on the one hand we see great hopes and expectations considering future educational and economic status; on the other hand the youth expresses a high degree of frustration and disillusion when assessing the way Russian authorities and the society as such function, when naming the "events" they are most afraid of, when identifying their most acute problems. But despite such a contrasted portrait of the generation and its ambivalent values risks of social disorder seem to be quite limited at least for the present. There is a huge amount of potential aggression but it doesn't splash out except through the emotional statements - the youth doesn't want to be part of any extremist movements or even to be identified with such. We are going to discuss various elements that determine how (secure or insecure) Russian youth feel about their present and future and will try to suggest interpretations of the situation revealed through the surveys taking into account the latest changes in economic and political spheres.

Inventing Adulthoods: A biographical approach to youth transitions

Holland, Janet

*Arts and Human Sciences, London South Bank University
London, UK*

Keywords

longitudinal, youth transitions, biographical

The Inventing Adulthoods Study is a 12 year qualitative longitudinal study of transitions to adulthood that commenced in 1996, an eventful period in social and historical terms. 100 young men and women (11-17 years old at the start) in five varied geographical locations, reflecting the very different socio-economic and cultural environments of young people in the UK, have been followed with up to six biographical interviews, complemented with other methods. The same team of researchers have followed the young people throughout, offering particular insights into the processes of transition. The resulting unique dataset has been highly productive both substantively and methodologically, and is in the process of being digitally archived, offering considerable potential for secondary analysis, data sharing, and cross cultural comparisons. I will introduce and discuss the methodological approach and some findings from the study. My intention is to showcase the archive, provide examples of secondary analysis already undertaken and consider possibilities for the future. It is of particular interest to explore the possibilities and potential for collaborative cross cultural investigations of young people's transitions to adulthood from this starting point.

It runs in the family? Why youngsters in the vocational tracks participate less in voluntary organisations

Smits, Wendy

Department of Sociology, Research Group TOR, Free University Brussels Brussels, Belgium

Keywords

participation, culture, intergenerational transmission

Empirical research has repeatedly shown that youngsters in the vocational tracks of secondary schools participate less in almost all types of voluntary associations. They participate less in youth and cultural organisations, in sport organisations and in social movements.

In this paper we try to explain that observation on the basis of the intergenerational transmission of participation in voluntary associations. Although it is clear that the extent of participation in voluntary associations, as well as voluntary work can be transmitted from generation to generation, the mechanisms behind the parental influence are not at all obvious. In the literature one can distinguish two main theories concerning the mechanisms of intergenerational transmission. According to the family socialisation theory, socially active parents produce socially active children. This can happen on two manners, via role modelling and value modelling. The effect of parental participation on children's participation (in the same kind of associations) is the core characteristic of the role modelling theory. Parents can also teach their children values that motivate them to participate or stimulate and support them to engage in associations. The second theory does not envision a direct effect of the parents participation on the children's, but is based on the intergenerational transmission of characteristics (such as the level of education) that influence participation in voluntary associations. This status transmission model poses that the relationship between parental and children's participation may be due to the transmission of socio-economic status rather than to a "modelling effect", because parents pass on social statuses to their children that can promote participation. In trying to explain why youngsters in the vocational tracks of secondary schools participate less, we will distinguish those two mechanisms of intergenerational transmission and will evaluate their respective importance. The analysis is based on data from a face-to-face survey (N=1212) of young people, 14 to 18 years old and of their parents. Multiple regression analysis and structural equation models will be used to test the hypotheses.

Job mobility, residential mobility and daily mobility among young: Is commuting a temporary adjustment? A case study in the metropolitan area of Madrid

Urraco, Mariano

*Sociología IV, Universidad Complutense de Madrid
Madrid, España*

Keywords

mobility, life planning., life-course, biography, commuting

This communication is intended to analyze, from the testimony from an experience of ongoing research, the phenomenon of commuting as a vital strategy adjustment, temporary or permanent, within a series of transitions experienced by young, in a socio-historical moment named "post", allegedly marked by instability, liquidity, fluidity, uncertainty. It provides a comparison between the Spanish case (specifically, Madrid), characterized by work for the event and in regard to the residential by delay in the emancipation and an ideal of home ownership, and other situations in Europe. Methodologically, it gives a voice to young people to offer their viewpoints on these issues that shape their life (and life-story) past, present and future. The quotidian pendulum movement is revised, finally, in the own terms of young commuters, along its biographical line, looking for patterns of intensity (sacrifice) and adjustment (conciliation), or ideals (and realities) of periodization of the process.

Juvenile school experience: what influence on the construction of sexuality's representations?

Raimundo, Alexandra

*Department of Sociology, ISCTE
Lisbon, Portugal*

Keywords

Sexuality, Youth, individualization, experience, secondary school

At a time marked by individualization, which "constructs" the social representation of youth, young people are asked to self-construct their personal life, authentically and expressively. To do so, one of the "tasks" that needs to be accomplished, is the construction of representations and experiences of sexuality, which became an important instrument and sign of personal and social development. To accomplish the objectives of individualization, Dubet (2004) argues that experience is essential; defending that youth is more of an experience than a role performed by young people. Several other authors argue that this experience is influenced by educators and significant others.

So, if we acknowledge that school is a privileged context to individualization, and that relationships and friendships, failure and success, are as important to individual growth as scholar apprenticeships, one might ask: how do juvenile interaction experiences at school (with the organization, teachers, other school employees, and peers) influence young students' construction of sexuality's representations, and experiences?

Leaving the Parental Home in Europe: Cultural Micro Foundations of Welfare Systems

Lützelberger, Therese

Department of Social and Political Sciences, European University Institute San Domenico di Fiesole, Italy

Keywords

culture, welfare regimes, transition to adulthood, institutions, leaving home

Recent years have seen an increasing scholarly interest in explaining why young Northern Europeans leave their parental home earlier than their Southern European counterparts. Many studies explain this variation with changes in the labour and housing markets, and the absence of state support for young people. In the South, these mechanisms encourage the young to postpone the departure from the home. Conversely, in the North young adults have more favourable opportunities to start their own households. Some scholars, however, focus on long-term cultural patterns of home-leaving and diverse social norms. This paper aims at integrating economic and cultural arguments in one institutionalist framework. Building on Fernand Braudel's idea of different time levels describing social change and continuity, this analysis merges the findings from adjacent fields of research on welfare states, family care, educational systems and historical demography. Additionally, the analysis is enriched with recent findings from the Eurostudent Survey and the European Social Survey. The results reveal that the patterns of spatial (im)mobility of young people are an essential component of welfare regimes with clear implications for the family-centred welfare system in the South and the strong welfare state in the North of Europe.

Leaving the Parental Home in Hungary and Western Romania before and after the Transformation

Murinkó, Lívía

Population Research Institute, Hungarian Statistical Office Budapest, Hungary

Veres, Valér

Sociology Dpt., Babes-Bolyai University Cluj Cluj-Napoca, Romania

Keywords

Romania, leaving home, young adulthood, Hungary

Rich sociological and demographic literature deals with the transition from adolescence to adulthood. Our frame of reference is the event-based approach that examines the timing of several key events, such as leaving the parental home for the first time, entering the labour market, marrying or having children. We examine and compare the timing of leaving the parental home in the context of the transition to adulthood on two samples of respondents aged 19-45.

Preliminary results indicate that leaving the parental home has become more and more postponed in subsequent cohorts in both Hungary and Western Romania (Transylvania). Significant changes began with respondents born around 1970. Men and women time the establishment of an independent household differently in both societies. Postponement is stronger among women; however, higher proportion of women lives independently from their parents at all ages and women leave the parental home earlier than men. The relationship between leaving the parental home and other important life-course events will also be examined.

Our sources of retrospective empirical data are the first waves of the 'Turning Points of the Life Course' panel surveys in Hungary and in the Western part of Romania where ethnic Hungarians reside (the survey in Hungary is part of the Generations and Gender Programme).

Data makes it possible to compare the transitioning behaviour of two groups of the same nationality and the same mother tongue in two neighbouring countries: Hungarians as the majority ethnic group in Hungary and Hungarians as an ethnic minority in Western Romania. The diverging contexts that these two countries offer for young adults to construct their lives will also be taken into account. The time horizon of the study is also noteworthy: older cohorts experienced most of the life-course events usually associated with coming of age before the transformation in 1989, while the youngest respondents reached adulthood within the framework of a completely new political, economic and social system.

Living in the state of permanent crisis. Voices of young generation from the former collective state farms in Poland

Binder, Piotr

*Institute of Philosophy and Sociology, Polish Academy of Sciences
Warsaw, Poland*

Keywords

Poverty, marginalization, rural youth, life strategies

The idea of collective state farms was an ideological, economical and social project of a soviet origin that at its peak reached in Poland the level of 6000 state farms, 500.000 employees (2 million with family members) and 25% of cultivated land. Comparing to other countries of the soviet bloc, like Czechoslovakia, Romania or Hungary where state farms accumulated approximately 60% of cultivated land, Polish version of collectivization could not have been called a successful one. Therefore sociologists strategically "discovered" those places only after the collapse of communist regime, and even after the decision regarding their liquidation was made by the parliament in 1991.

However the moment the collective state farms stopped existing as legal entities, they also stopped being a problem of the state preoccupied with various aspects of system transformation. They remained exclusively a problem of people living in the "parallel universe" of spatially isolated social and cultural deserts of housing estates of the former employees of the collective state farms.

Young people and young adults, people born just before or just after the liquidation of economically unjustified collective state farms, have to carry a heavy burden of their roots. Very often not being able to count on anyone's help they have to not only take care of themselves, even from early years, but also to support their parents, the forgotten victims of a social experiment. Although young people openly declare that they do not want to live the lives their parents have lived for the past twenty years, the choice of available positive scenarios is rather limited, and the threats they have to face - like danger of inheritance of poverty and marginalization, poverty of children, lack of perspectives in terms of education and job market, feminization of poverty or alcohol abuse - are rather serious.

The aim of the presentation is to focus on selected, fenomenologically representative to the group stories shared by the young inhabitants of the former collective state farms and reflect upon the possibilities of improving their situation as a group.

Mobility and spatial identity of young suburbans : what social interactions, patterns and representations, between field and town?

Goyon, Marie

ENTPE, LET UMR5593 CNRS / ENTPE

Vaux en Velin, France

Keywords

daily mobility, socialization, spatial identity, lifestyles, Gender

