

9th Conference of European Sociological Association

ESA2009

European Society or European Societies?

02 - 05 September 2009

Lisboa - Portugal

ISCTE - IUL

ABSTRACT BOOK

as per 5 August 2009

ISCTE IUL
Instituto Universitário de Lisboa
Lisbon University Institute

F C S H
FACULDADE DE CIÊNCIAS SOCIAIS E HUMANAS
UNIVERSIDADE NOVA DE LISBOA

Instituto de Ciências Sociais da Universidade de Lisboa

Associação Portuguesa de Sociologia

RN01

Ageing in Europe

"I'm busy, but I have time for myself" - Gender as a determining factor of active aging

Marhankova, Jaroslava

Department of Sociology, University of West Bohemia Czech Republic,

Keywords

active aging, Gender, leisure, life course, qualitative research

Data presented in this paper are based on qualitative ethnographic study of two centres in Czech Republic that offer leisure-time activities only for the elderly (for example educational courses, social activities, exercise programs, etc.). The participant observation was conducted for twenty months and more than sixty people (clients, employees) were interviewed during the research. These centres in Czech Republic represent space that is strongly centred round the idea of active aging. Despite the fact that active aging is nowadays represented by the state and provides of social services as the universal desirable way of aging, the majority of the clients of the center are women. This paper focuses on this gender difference in the lifestyle in old age. It points out that gender patterns are embedded the organizing of the daily running of the centers as well as in the idea of active aging itself. The paper highlights two explanations of gender differences in the attitudes towards active aging. The first is based on women's own explanation of why men are missing in the centers and are not so active in old age. The second stresses the gendered patterns during the life course. The paper explains the gender disproportion through the way people in the centers relate to the experience of aging. Women attending the centers share very similar lifestyles and positive attitude towards old age that stresses the possibility to fulfill time according to one's own wishes. This paper analyzes this attitude in the context of previous life biography to explain the role of gender in the lifestyle in old age. It also highlights the specific disciplination of the body through the idea of active aging that share some similar features with the way women's bodies are disciplined during the previous life course. The aim of the paper is to critically evaluate the idea of active aging and point out the crucial role of gender as a factor that influences the ability or/and willingness to age actively and the role of activity during the life course.

"Personalising Care": the implications for carers and care workers of policy developments in the England 2004-2009

Yeandle, Sue

CIRCLE, School of Sociology and Social Policy, University of Leeds Leeds, UK

Keywords

care, personalisation, carers, domiciliary care

Focusing on the care of older people, this paper considers the implications of two major policy developments in England: (i) the shift towards "personalised" care for those who require support at home - promoted as offering them greater choice, dignity and independence; (ii) an altered focus on carers, including the revised National Strategy for Carers 2008, designed to enable unpaid carers to access the information, support and services they require and to have "a life" of their own, whilst being sustained in their caring role.

The paper will explore the implications of these developments from the perspectives of: (a) England's 3.6m (unpaid) carers of working age (57% of them women), among whom 74% of men and 60% of women provide their unpaid care alongside a paid job; and (b) domiciliary care workers / personal assistants (employed by social care providers in the private, voluntary and public sectors, by agencies or as personal assistants), the overwhelming majority of whom are women.

Using a range of sources - the 2001 Census (data about carers and care workers, already extensively analysed by the CIRCLE team, University of Leeds, 2005-08); the Carers, Employment and Services study (completed by the Leeds team in 2007, including a survey of 1,909 unpaid carers); and the GELLM study of domiciliary care providers (part of the Gender and Employment in Local Labour Markets research programme, 2003-6) - the paper will examine the characteristics of these different providers of care to older people at home, their different roles and working conditions, and will discuss the ways in which emerging policy on the provision of care and support to older people in England will affect both their own situation and their caring relationships with the older people they support.

Policy developments since 2000 (when legislation extended Direct Payments schemes to older people) will be considered, and will include: the 2004 Carers (Equal Opportunities) Act, the 2008 national carers' strategy Carers at the Heart of 21st Century Families and Communities, and the range of social care reforms introduced in 2007-9 as part of the Social Care Reform agenda in England.

"The Way of The Cross Leads us to Each Other" -Religion in Social Connectedness of Finnish Older Adults

Spännäri, Jenni

Practical Theology, University of Helsinki Kotka, Finland

Keywords

religion, ageing, Finland, social cohesion

Different social, economical and technological developments could make generation a dividing line in the European societies. Different generations might have very different values, norms, attitudes and aspirations, resulting in difficulties in understanding possibilities and problems of the old and the young. Reacting to the changing demographic situation in larger part of Europe requires examining the ways older adults are connected to the society. Religious activities and spirituality have been noted to be of importance to a relatively high proportion of elderly persons in many parts of Europe. As well as being a personal or mental resource, religion could also work in linking the older persons to the society in various ways.

In this paper this phenomenon is made visible by analysing religious poems, prayers and aphorisms of Finnish older writers. Through religious forms of expression the writers were found to build connections with social groups both far away and near them, in past as well as present and future. These connections also stretch over generations to enable negotiating, updating and preserving values and norms between generations.

This finding suggests that religion could play a central role in binding older adults to the society. In addition the religious connecting could promote the social cohesion in the society. Thus the religiousness and spirituality of the older adults should be further examined in research to find out and support the ways the elders live a meaningful life as members of the society. This could also result to new ways of valuing the later life through its particular ways of participating and creating social cohesion.

A comparative analysis of long-term care for older people in Europe

Rodrigues, Ricardo

*Health and Care, European Centre for Social Welfare Policy and Research
Vienna, Austria*

Huber, Manfred

*Health and Care, European Centre for Social Welfare Policy and Research
Vienna, Austria*

Hoffmann, Frédérique

*Health and Care, European Centre for Social Welfare Policy and Research
Vienna, Austria*

Marin, Bern

*Work, Welfare and Wealth, European Centre for Social Welfare Policy and Research
Vienna, Austria*

Gasior, Katrin

*Work, Welfare and Wealth, European Centre for Social Welfare Policy and Research
Vienna, Austria*

Keywords

long-term care, informal care, old-age, formal care services

Against the backdrop of an ageing population, shifting health conditions and living arrangements of older people, long-term care has become an important issue to be addressed by social protection and health systems in Europe. Yet, statistical information on basic indicators, such as public expenditure, share of old-age benefiting from formal long-term care and their characteristics are either lacking or present a contradictory picture, as it is the case of EUROSTAT and OECD figures. Mandated by the UNECE and Member Countries, the European Centre for Social Welfare Policy and Research has been conducting empirical research that has sought to bridge this glaring hole of statistical data, complementing it with qualitative information on the main features of long-term systems in Europe. The present paper discusses results for on-going empirical research by the authors that provides new insights into long-term care for older people in Europe from a comparative perspective.

It seems evident that there is no single 'European' model of long-term care, but rather marked national differences in core dimensions of long-term care. Drawing on the unique dataset assembled, we are able to highlight how different policies impact formal care and their interaction with informal care, resulting in large differences of spending levels in Europe. Figures on the cost of institutional care in several countries raise questions about the affordability and accessibility of care for old-age people. The targeting and generosity of public resources, namely cash benefits, points to an apparent trade-off between generosity in the benefit amount provided and the number of those benefiting from it. In fact, particular attention is devoted on how the characteristics of cash benefits recently introduced in some countries can impact care provided within the family, or the creation of informal markets of care. This is complemented by an overview on the gender dimension in some core variables, such as on beneficiaries.

A policy of violence?- a reflection on ageing policy, on the example of Poland and Sweden

Wilinska, Monika

Department of Behavioural Science and Social Work, School of Health Sciences, Jonkoping University Jonkoping, Sweden

Keywords

violence, discourse, ageing policy, motive analysis

Abstract

The increasing body of research accentuates the role of public policies in defining and determining the lives of people. Likewise, ageing policies are found to be one of the essential elements that may put certain constraints on actions and identities of people who grow old. The rising question concerns then, the main objective of such policies. Who needs ageing policy? and Why? The aim of this article is to seek an answer to those two questions by examining the case of Polish and Swedish responses to an ageing policy. The study is embedded in the discourse theories, which recognize a discourse as a system of social practices and relations that have an immediate reflection in the way people act, think and identify themselves. Discourse of ageing is an example of such system, that encompasses a range of practices and relations apparent within various spheres of societal life. Ageing policy documents are considered to be one of the fundamental practices that belong to this discourse. Concurrently, this investigation is based on the analysis of the focal policy documents, in both countries, regarding the vision of ageing policy. The analysis of those texts is conducted in accordance with the key principles of a motive analysis. This method facilitates an inquiry into five domains, that constitute the core in understanding reasons underlying any activity, namely, actor, act, agency, scene and purpose. The results of an analysis are discussed in reference to the concept of objective violence that underpins our political and economic systems. This type of 'hidden' violence is found to sustain relations of dominance and exploitation. A number of apparent instances of objective violence against people, who grow old, are identified. The consequences of that are discussed in terms of a future shape of social policies and the lives of people who are affected by it.

Activation policies for the young old: an international comparison

Komp, Kathrin

*Sociology, VU University
Amsterdam, Netherlands*

Keywords

young old, activation policies, international comparison

During previous decades, the number of healthy persons past retirement age increased considerably. Those persons are commonly called the young old, because they combine characteristics of younger and of older persons. Like younger persons, they are physically capable of activity. Like older persons, on the other hand, their activities cannot be regulated through labour market policies any more. Welfare state reforms therefore often seek to find ways to steer the young olds' activities in favour of welfare production. They usually do this through activation policies.

Activation policies for the young old usually take two approaches: raising the mandatory retirement age and increasing the involvement in volunteering and informal caregiving. When persons participate in paid work until a later age, future cohorts become young old at a later age, and the size of the future young old population decreases. When the young old become more strongly involved in volunteering and informal caregiving, however, the current young old population increases its contribution to welfare production and takes on a changed social role. Both approaches thus influence the young olds' activities to different ends.

The present paper investigates how European welfare states strive to activate the young old. More precisely, it studies two questions: First, which approaches do welfare states take for activating the young old? Second, what causes welfare states to try to activate those persons? To answer those questions, the development in Denmark, Germany, Italy and the United Kingdom from 1990 on is studied. Explanatory variables are the size of the young old population, the reform pressure on welfare states and the kind of welfare state.

Preliminary results show that raising the mandatory retirement age is the most popular activation strategy, chosen when reform pressure and the appropriate kind of welfare state combine. This suggests two things. First, welfare states prefer bringing new population groups into their old sphere of influence, instead of developing new tools to activate new population groups. Second, activation policies reflect the situation of the welfare state more strongly than the situation of the population group they target.

Active ageing challenges and transitions from employment to retirement in Portuguese health professionals

ferreira, marianela

sociologia, flup

porto, portugal

Keywords

health professionals, active ageing, retirement

It is currently notorious, in Portugal, an interest on the individuals' permanency in the labour market on the part of the State and other political agents. Our communication focuses on the results of a research project on the representations and practices of health professionals (medical doctors and nurses), aged between 55 and 65, regarding active ageing and transitions from employment to retirement. Based on two case-studies (hospitals in the city of Porto), we will also discuss the relations between those professionals' stances and the organisational contexts within which they work.

Active Ageing: Deconstructing the Concept

Maia Silva, Sofia

Sociologia, Faculdade de Economia da Universidade de Coimbra Porto, Portugal

Keywords

ageing, life course, retirement, time use

This work seeks to reflect the emergence of new ways of ageing and of reorganization of time in retirement. These situations are observed at a time when new debates about the promotion of active ageing and reconfiguration of places of participation of elders arise all over Portugal and Europe. In this study a life course perspective is used to permit an analysis of the influence of social, institutional and historical constraints in the transformation of opportunities and experiences in time management in retirement. The recognition of this temporal dimension, socio-historically influenced, will be crucial in the analysis of the discontinuities of the life cycle and its cultural landmarks, namely, the entry into retirement. To further this debate, we will take into account some life stories and time occupation in the retirement of the older population in the city of Porto, interviewed in my Master's work.

Advocacies for frail and incompetent elderly in Europe

Koeller, Regine

Social Gerontology, Institut für Sozialforschung und Gesellschaftspolitik (ISG) Cologne, Germany

Engels, Dietrich

Social Gerontology, Institut für Sozialforschung und Gesellschaftspolitik (ISG) Cologne, Germany

Keywords

europe, comparison, ageing societies, advocacies, guardianship

In ageing societies, questions of participation of elderly people in social life and the possibilities of a self-determined life in old age are of high importance. Incompetent and frail people remain involved in many legal matters and participate in public and social life. Against the background of the demographic development, the requirements concerning advocacies for frail and incompetent elderly, who are in need of provisions to secure their legal protection and participation, increase. In addition to the demographic development, the family - traditionally the main institution with respect to the proxy of the elderly - more often adopts a background position in this context. Thus, the (welfare) state increasingly is confronted with the task of protecting personal rights of older and incompetent people. Societies have developed diverse institutions of advocacy for these people (e.g. guardianship). With the rising needs and requirements, institutions as well as the authorities themselves are under pressure to fulfil the growing demand. At the same time, they are forced to improve the use of alternative resources while simultaneously assuring the quality of the guardianship and advocacy. This scenario is largely the same all over Europe.

The project 'ADEL' 'Advocacies for frail and incompetent elderly in Europe' compares how different European (welfare) states secure legal protection and participation of frail and incompetent old people. Therefore, legal systems, organisational performance, and reform concepts in five countries are compared. The selection of the participating countries is led on the one hand by country-specific features concerning the demographic conditions and on the other hand keeping in mind Esping-Andersen's classification of welfare regimes. From the German-speaking countries Austria and Germany are involved (corporatist type). Denmark participates as a representative of the Scandinavian countries (social democratic type) and Spain as a representative of southern European countries (family-oriented type). From the new member states from Central and Eastern Europe the Czech Republic (transitional type) is part of the project.

First results of the project will be presented in order to contribute to the question how an adequate system of advocacy for ageing societies should be designed.

Age, paid work and morality

Pärnänen, Anna

*Work Research Unit, Statistics Finland
Helsinki, Finland*

Keywords

paid work, age, morality, generational contract

Older, around 50 to 65 year-old, employees have been the labour reserve that have been pushed out and pulled into the labour market when necessary. The pension system together with the unemployment security system have been the age-dependent institution in Finland through which the labour supply has been regulated. The aims of the pension policies have followed the rhythm of the changes of the labour market, although pension system reforms have also included some new social rights. At the moment the aim of the labour and pension policies is to prolong work careers and postpone exit from the labour market by two to three years. The main tool to reach this aim has been the pension reform of 2005.

But what kinds of moral presumptions does the system retain in regards to age and participation to paid work? Who has the right to paid work, and who has a duty? How have these presumptions changed with time? Firstly, I will discuss what kind of generational contract is written within the pension system. Secondly, in the light of my qualitative interview data I will investigate what kinds of moral conceptions there exist with regard to participation to paid work and to age. I will examine what kinds of choices concerning exit from work and staying at work were considered right or wrong ? just or unjust ? by the older employees, shop stewards and personnel managers interviewed.

Ageing and Quality of Life-related Policies: A Preliminary Review of European Initiatives on Assistive Technologies

Zamora-Monge, Gerardo

*R&D Department, INGEMA - Instituto Gerontológico Matia
Saint Sebastian, Spain*

Laskibar, Iker

*R&D Department, INGEMA - Instituto Gerontológico Matia
Saint Sebastian, Spain*

Cuartango Acha, Izaskun

*Urban Observatory, Fomento de San Sebastián S.A.
Saint Sebastian, Spain*

Urdaneta, Elena

*R&D, INGEMA - Instituto Gerontológico Matia
Saint Sebastian, Spain*

Galdona, Nerea

*R&D, INGEMA - Instituto Gerontológico Matia
Saint Sebastian, Spain*

Yanguas Lezaun, Javier

*R&D, INGEMA - Instituto Gerontológico Matia
Saint Sebastian, Spain*

Keywords

Health, ageing, assistive technologies, european policies

Almost every country in the world is deeply changing its demographic structure. By 2050, nearly 1.5 billion people will be 65 or over. Most of them will reside in today's less developed regions (1.2 billion). However, Europe will continue to be the most aged region worldwide. At present, Europe-27 countries hold almost 84 million people aged 65 or older (16.9% of the total population). The European Union has long reflected about the implications, challenges and opportunities set off by ageing societies, since political and socio-economical developments in European countries have allowed their populations to live longer lives. Nevertheless, longer lives do not imply better living conditions.

Increased life expectancy, for instance, has raised the prevalence of dementia, such as Alzheimer's disease, furthered dependency-related illnesses, changed family relations, and also added budgetary pressure to the already tight public resources. As a result, the Europe-27 old age dependency ratio is running a non-stop race from 22.5 in 1997 to 25.2 in 2007 and, as projected by Eurostat, to 50.47 in 2060.

Are health and good quality of life at risk? If so, what role can Information and Communication Technologies (ICT) play? Assistive Technologies (AT) could play a key role in social inclusion, independency and autonomy with regards to ageing and e-health.

The European Commission (EC) has put together great efforts towards the allocation of community resources on age-related research. Accordingly, the main instrument the EC has laid down for research, the UE Framework Programme, has been including ageing as one of its main topics since 1998 (FP5, FP6 AND FP7).

A preliminary analysis of the policy implications of AT-related projects and initiatives supported by the EC and other Spanish institutions will be carried out. The goal of this analysis is to overcome the difficulties to get homogeneous information on policies supporting AT at the local, regional and national level. It is argued that the findings of this analysis can enhance policy-maker's capabilities to mobilise stakeholders? and researchers? scope of analysis on the AT sector in Saint Sebastian, Spain.

Ageing people as innovators in senior service markets

Pekkarinen, Satu

*Lahti School of Innovation, Lappeenranta University of Technology
Lahti, Finland*

Hennala, Lea

*Lahti School of Innovation, Lappeenranta University of Technology
Lahti, Finland*

Melkas, Helinä

*Lahti School of Innovation, Lappeenranta University of Technology
Lahti, Finland*

Keywords

service innovation, housing services, Ageing people, user-driven innovation

Ageing of the population is such a powerful megatrend with many challenges and opportunities that it cannot be ignored when designing the future service structure. Getting old brings along many losses, for example decline of functional ability, but old age is also described as an active, autonomous and independent time of life, where people maintain their previous life-style or even engage in new activities. Today's ageing people are healthier and wealthier, and they can be considered as a notable consumer group with many hopes and needs. In the future, ageing customers are likely to be increasingly demanding payers of services that they consume. This is why it is argued to be vital to include ageing people in planning products and services.

This paper investigates ageing people as innovators in senior service markets. The central research question is: what are ageing people like as innovators? The research case is called 'the well-being centre concept for the elderly'. The idea in this case was to develop the service concept of a foundation providing homes for the elderly that was thought to be outdated and no longer corresponding to needs of future customers of the foundation in question. The research data were collected using a website where various types of participants were able to generate ideas focusing on five different elements: (i) living and restaurant services, (ii) well-being, (iii) daily activity, (iv) rehabilitation services, and (v) living environment. The biggest group among the 45 respondents were the elderly, who were retired and already using or would soon be using similar housing services. Other respondents were students of design, experts from the public and third sectors, and representatives of the foundation itself.

Studies related to 'third age' and productive ageing as well as user-driven innovation theories form the theoretical background of this study. The results show that ageing people had a positive attitude towards participating in the service innovation process, when given a chance to do so. They generated ideas actively and were more committed to the development process than the other groups. Ageing people thus have a lot to give as service innovators.

Ageing, agency and technology in everyday life

Jyrkämä, Jyrki

*Department of Social Sciences and Philosophy, University of Jyväskylä
Jyväskylä, Finland*

Keywords

Technology, everyday life, agency, old age care

Sociological discussions about human agency is becoming more and more important in the sociology of ageing. Based on some elements of Anthony Giddens' structuration theory and of so-called semiotic sociology my paper elaborates a heuristic agency framework for the analysis of use of technology in old age care. According to this framework it is important to distinguish between different modal dimensions of situated human action and to approach the activity of participants from different perspectives.

The paper shows how the model can be used when analysing action and its bodily, social and cultural aspects in everyday life situations. The model also affords the analysis of elderly individuals, the situations of their everyday lives, of various operational procedures and practices of geriatric care, the application of welfare technology, various physical and social spaces, or local cultures within geriatric care facilities and institutions.

One practical application of the model to the field of gerontechnology is the use of mobile phone cameras in informal care. In some cases, the person being cared for is monitored via mobile phone technology, and the caregiver can use the phone to call and check up on the person being cared for. From the agency point of view the situation can be examined from the perspective of both the caregiver and the person being cared for. Using the agency framework it is important to ask: What abilities and capabilities does the situation require? What wants and desires does it include? What kinds of obligations, limitations and possibilities does the situation create for the caregiver on the one hand and the person being cared for on the other? And how is the situation experienced? What kind of emotional dimension is involved? These types of questions can be applied to different technologies across situations, and examined from the perspective of professionals in the field of geriatric care and the entire service system.

Aspects of social exclusion: age as a core risk factor for social isolation

Aleksandrovs, Aleksandrs

*Department of Sociology, Institute of Philosophy and Sociology, University of Latvia
Riga, Latvia*

Rungule, Ritma

*Department of Sociology, Institute of Philosophy and Sociology, University of Latvia
Riga, Latvia*

Koroleva, Ilze

*Department of Sociology, Institute of Philosophy and Sociology, University of Latvia
Riga, Latvia*

Karklina, Ieva

*Department of Sociology, Institute of Philosophy and Sociology, University of Latvia
Riga, Latvia*

Keywords

Social exclusion, Elderly population, isolation indexes

The mainstream approach to ageing in Latvia so far was to treat it as a problem of one particular socio-demographic group - elderly people and pensioners. The objective of our research is to analyze ageing-related social isolation and social exclusion in the context of the whole society and to make comparisons with other risk groups (unemployed, disabled etc.).

The theory of social exclusion forms the theoretical basis for our analysis. The concept treats mechanisms of exclusion as a process of forcing certain groups out of the majority of society (Gidenss, 1998). Despite of wide variety of approaches to social exclusion all of them include three components: unemployment, poverty and social isolation (Gallie, 2004). It allows to see social isolation as one of dimensions of social exclusion and to measure their mutual relations. Social isolation is characterized by insufficient social ties ? weak social support from social relations and low participation in social groups. Social isolation strengthens the expressions of exclusion caused by poverty and unemployment. D.Gallie distinguishes three levels of social isolation: primary (relations within family and household), secondary (relations with friends and neighbors) and tertiary (participation in social life and social groups).

The link between social isolation, risk of social exclusion and age is analyzed by employing data from the project "Causes and length of unemployment and social exclusion" (ESF program in Latvia, 2007). The calculations of indexes of social isolation for all three levels of social relations are based on quantitative data (population survey, n=7787). Association between dimensions of exclusion and factors which increase the risk of it were calculated by employing multiple regression analysis. Cluster analysis was performed in order to combine different risk groups into categories while having exclusion and related risks in mind. The results of analysis show that exclusion dimensions are closely related to each other: high level of exclusion in one dimension is linked to high exclusion risk in the others. The most significant factors of social exclusion are: underdeveloped socio-economic environment and age. The most affected groups by the risk of social isolation are people in preretirement age and those already retired.

Balancing and negotiating obligations and responsibilities

Jolanki, Outi

*Social Sciences and Philosophy, University of Jyväskylä
Jyväskylä, Finland*

Leinonen, Anu

*Social Sciences and Philosophy, University of Jyväskylä
Jyväskylä, Finland*

Kröger, Teppo

*Social Sciences and Philosophy, University of Jyväskylä
Jyväskylä, Finland*

Keywords

working carers, qualitative research, responsibilities, Caregiving, older people

In many European countries public discussion revolves around how to organize the services and care of frail older people and who should carry the responsibility for giving care ? individual people or/and state and municipalities. At the same time people are expected to stay longer at work and delay their retirement in order to alleviate threatening labor shortage. In this research we approach these contrasting and partly conflicting issues by analyzing how working people discuss their own choices and intentions in relation to work and care-giving.

The data comes from face-to-face interviews of people who combine paid employment and helping or giving care to their elderly relatives. The data is collected in the Wocawo-project (Working Carers and Caring Workers. Making paid employment and care responsibilities compatible?) in urban and rural areas of central and southern Finland winter and early spring 2009. The analysis focuses on how people explain, legitimate and reason their willingness, intentions or decisions, either to stay at work and not to take up the role as full-time carer, or contrasting intentions and decisions. Discourse analysis and rhetoric offer tools to study how different arguments are brought up and discussed in interviewees talk. The interviewees are presented with number of topics and questions including meaning of work, experiences of combining work and caring, willingness to cut down work hours or leave work if caring situation would so require, and/or actions taken and decisions they have already made. In this context the interviewees also bring forward their views on the role of individual people vs. the role of state and municipalities in organizing the care and who in their mind should take the main responsibility for giving care to older people.

Care managers as administrators of the needs of the elderly - contradictions and diversity in Swedish eldercare

Andersson, Katarina

Department of social work, Umeå university Umeå, Sweden

Keywords

diversity, gender inequality, Care managers, eldercare, policy of legislation

Introduction

Swedish eldercare, which is predominantly publicly organised, is an arena for the implementation of political objectives such as gender equality and cultural diversity, which can lead to contradictions in care work practice. Since the early 1990s, the conditions to provide for the elder groups are continuously changing in Sweden. New forms of organisation, rationalisation, and strife for efficiency mean for one thing an increasing time pressure in care work. Today, freedom of choice and individual rights for the elder clients or costumers is leading concepts in eldercare. Within the context of organisational change and policy of legislation, these changes imply consequences and dilemmas on different levels and for different actors within eldercare. In this paper, focus is on care managers? representations of dilemmas that may occur when diversity is put in the fore.

Methods and materials

A new organisation reform with strong emphasis on the elderly as customers and a good freedom of choice is the applied concept in the investigated municipality in one of the bigger towns in the middle of Sweden. The empirical material consists of a survey answered by 29 care managers that comprises more than two third of all the care managers in the municipality. The open-ended questions were analysed discursively with focus on how care managers referred to dilemmas in meetings with elder clients based on gender and ethnicity.

Result

In needs assessments, the care managers have to follow the law and political standards equally. However, the managers gave unequal support to older men and women. Within this rationality of economy, older women are under-privileged. The analysis further reveals that the care managers? believed that elderly immigrants, compared to elderly ethnic Swedes, demanded different care solutions that were hard to fulfil. According to the care managers, one reason is that the immigrants do not understand the Swedish welfare system and how it operates.

Conclusions

Despite National goals on diversity, a homogenous standard is practiced in Swedish eldercare. Also, legislation with ideals of gender neutrality, further support the discourse of homogeneity. Thus, diversity within the context of eldercare seems to be contradictive as consequence.

Career transitions and trajectories of older school teachers in Germany and Britain: The influence of multi-level factors on employment and retirement decisions in later life

Schroeder, Heike

*Human Resource Management, Middlesex University Business School
London, UK*

Keywords

teacher, life course, late career decisions, Germany, Britain

The population in most industrialised nations is ageing considerably. This trend has been observed among school teachers to an even greater extent as countries such as Germany and Britain exercised hiring freezes or hired below demand during the 1980s and 1990s. Large parts of the teaching profession are therefore expected to retire in bulk within the next ten to 15 years, partly prior to national pension age. This is why school systems will be left without accumulated knowledge, and will face a substantial skill shortage due to a lack of sufficient amounts of university graduates. National governments will hence have to find ways to retain current teaching staff.

In order to do so, school districts will have to know which influence they might exert upon the career development and career decision making of older teachers. This is of relevance as research observes a destabilisation of employment careers and changes in the employment career patterns of individuals. While former traditional careers were characterised by long, continuous, linear, up-ward oriented employment that took place in just a few organisations, newer career models describe interrupted, heterogeneous employment careers in many organisations with upward, downward and horizontal movements as well as occupational changes.

Against this background it will be of interest to explore trajectories, transitions and turning points in the employment careers of those older teachers that will reach national pension age within the next five to 15 years. The proposed paper therefore aims to answer two questions: (1) how do careers of teachers evolve in later life in different national contexts, and (2) how do factors within the institutional, organisational and private environments of these teachers influence, support or hinder active career choices and passive career outcomes in two distinct welfare states, Germany and Britain.

These questions will be explored by a currently ongoing study that includes biographical life course interviews with secondary school teachers in two comparable school districts in Germany and Britain. Expected outcomes are an assessment of teaching careers in later life and a discussion on whether, how and why these careers differ in different national contexts.

Caregivers for old people and social class

Langa Rosado, Delia

*Faculty of Social Sciences and Law, University of Jaén, University of Jaén
Jaén, Spain*

Ariza Segovia, Sergio

*Faculty of Social Sciences and Law, University of Jaén, University of Jaén
Jaén, Spain*

Martínez López, David

Faculty of Humanities and Education Sciences, University of Jaén Jaén, Spain

Olid González, Evangelina

*Faculty of Social Sciences and Law, University of Jaén, University of Jaén
Jaén, Spain*

Keywords

carergivers, family cares, Welfare State, Social Class, elders

In this work we aim to offer an analysis of those who care for old and dependent people in Andalucía. We use a data base produced by the Andalusian Statistic Institute in collaboration with Andalusian Universities from a survey about familial networks. This survey took place in 2005 with a sample of 10.000 people.

In a first analysis of the data (Langa Rosado et al., 2007) we emphasized the great importance of the family (in relation to the extremely low presence of public sector and volunteering), and specially women in the provision of care for old people.

Now, in a more detailed exploitation of the data, we would like to know more about the heterogeneity of these caregivers, making an analysis of them from a social class point of view. Besides, we make use of another information not just referred to the whole family of the caregiver but to the caregiver himself. This kind of data is about his/her cultural level, labour activity and obviously, gender (La Parra, 2001). García Calvente et al. (2004) say in this respect that class inequality and gender inequality are clearly linked.

So in this paper we aim to approach to the sociological profile of caregivers from different angles. We would like to know why they care, how much time they dedicate to this, when they care, how this activity affects their lives and what is the familial structure of duties and rights from where they become caregivers. Besides we want to read all this activity from the social position where we situate the familial and individual strategies (Bourdieu, 1988) where the decisions of caring old and dependent relatives are adopted.

Caregivers' use of time: housework, personal life and labour. Analysis of data from the Spanish Time Budget Survey 2002-2003

Masanet Ripoll, Erika

Universitary Institute of Social Development and Peace, University of Alicante Alicante, Spain

La Parra Casado, Daniel

Department of Sociology II and Universitary Institute of Social Development and Peace, University of Alicante Alicante, Spain

Keywords

life spheres, labour, informal care, caregivers, use of time

This paper analyzes the use of time of caregivers in their life spheres (the labour sphere, personal life and housework) with the aim of contributing to knowledge about the effects and costs of health care in the daily lives of people care. The study is based on the analysis of data from the Spanish Time Budget Survey 2002-2003 carried out by the National Statistics Institute.

The results show informal care negative impacts in terms of personal time reduction, decrease participation in the labour market and increased overall time devoted to unpaid and paid work. Also, the results show the different impacts of informal care in the caregiver's daily life according to gender, age and household income level. Women and the older people are the most adversely affected in their daily lives when they care. Thus, the negative impact of care is higher in women in terms of personal and social time reduction and greater total work burden (the sum of paid and unpaid work). Similarly, among older caregivers their social and leisure time is more damaged because they devote time to care.

The data also showed a high presence of older caregivers. These aged caregivers spent more time on care tasks than younger caregivers. This means that potential caregivers are increasing among people over 65 years as a result of increases in life expectancy.

Changing Family Roles Of (South) African Grandparents

Tanschus, Nele Marie

Institute of Gerontology, Hochschule Vechta Vechta, Germany

Keywords

Africa, Family Roles, Grandparents, AIDS

This paper discusses the change of family roles in South African families based on a study of the available research literature. Images of the family and their functions have been altered by various simultaneously changing processes during the past centuries. Recently, the AIDS issue and its effects on the African family have drawn greater attention towards the family roles of the elderly.

In large parts of Africa the AIDS epidemic affects not only family members of the middle generation as the majority of HIV carriers but also the elderly. Infected members of the middle generation are often unable to provide support and care neither for their children nor for the elderly. In many cases, the elderly have to take over the parenting role and care for their grandchildren. That means informal care changes its direction from originally being given from the children or grandchildren towards the grandparents into care provided by the grandparents in order to help their younger relatives. But what happens if they need help themselves? In most countries in Southern Africa, the welfare system is not able to provide a decent support for all affected familial generations. Therefore, informal networks and intergenerational relationships become more important but also more burdened. For grandparents in Africa, the care for the younger might implicate various negative side effects which could cause aging to become an even more stressful experience reducing the quality of their later life.

Finally, this paper will discuss current social policy implications of help for grandparents caring for orphaned grandchildren and it will attempt to outline further research questions and programmes.

A cross-national perspective will be approached by trying to link the results from the literature work with experiences gained from a recent stay in Tanzania.

Combining Parent Care and Paid Work with or without Siblings: How do working carers argue the role of sisters and brothers?

Leinonen, Anu

*Department of Social Sciences and Philosophy, University of Jyväskylä
Jyväskylä, Finland*

Jolanki, Outi

*Department of Social Sciences and Philosophy, University of Jyväskylä
Jyväskylä, Finland*

Kröger, Teppo

*Department of Social Sciences and Philosophy, University of Jyväskylä
Jyväskylä, Finland*

Keywords

paid work, Siblings, Parent Care

The divisions of care responsibilities between the family, state, market and voluntary sector are changing in ageing societies. In Finland and in other countries there have been reductions in public welfare services and benefits over the past few decades, and the general trend has been towards the promotion of home-based care and family care.

At the same time people are expected to work more and extend their working careers. However, little is known how care responsibilities are shared within the family, e.g. between working sons and daughters of older parents needing regular help.

In addition, the discussions concerning ethics of care have emphasised the relational nature of caring: care is a relationship between the care-giver and the care-receiver and it is based on the interdependency of these actors. However, the relationships between siblings might be significant too, when we consider the life situations of middle-aged working people.

This paper will focus on the sibling relationships of people who combine paid work and family care for parents. How do people who have siblings organise the care of their parents, and how do they argue the helping or non-helping roles of siblings? What kind of source of resource or source of conflicts sisters and brothers might be for these people when they reconcile their role as a carer and their role as a worker? How do working carers who do not have siblings organise the care of their parents, and how do they argue the lack of siblings? help?

The paper will discuss these questions by using qualitative face-to-face interviews conducted in Finland in winter and early spring 2009 within the WoCaWo project (Working Carers and Caring Workers ? Making paid employment and care responsibilities compatible?). The interviewees are people who combine gainful employment and regular care for older next of kin. In this paper the focus is on middle-age working carers who help their ageing parent or both parents.

Community Wellbeing Index: A valid and reliable measure of subjective quality of life in older adults

Forjaz, Maria Joao

National School of Public Health, Carlos III Health Institute Madrid, Madrid

Fernandez-Mayoralas, Gloria

Centre for Human and Social Sciences, Spanish Council for Scientific Research Madrid, Spain

Rojo-Perez, Fermina

Centre for Human and Social Sciences, Spanish Council for Scientific Research Madrid, Spain

Martinez-Martin, Pablo

*National Center of Epidemiology, Carlos III Health Institute
Madrid, Spain*

-, On behalf of the Spanish Group on Quality of Life and Ageing

National School of Public Health and Center for Human and Social Sciences, Carlos III Health Institute and Spanish Council for Scientific Research Madrid, Spain

Keywords

community, older adults, quality of life, subjective wellbeing, validation

Background/Purpose: The International Wellbeing Index (IWI) is a measure of subjective wellbeing, developed as a tool for cross-cultural comparisons. It is formed by two subscales, the Personal Wellbeing Index and National Wellbeing Index. This paper aims at validating a new subscale, the Community Wellbeing Index (CWI) to assess the individual's level of satisfaction with the place of residence.

Methods: The IWI was satisfactorily applied to survey the global quality of life of a community sample of 1106 older adults residing in Spain. A middle-level subscale was developed, the CWI, referring to the satisfaction with several aspects of the city or place of residence. Rasch analysis of the CWI was performed using the RUMM2020 software on a random subsample of 300 cases. The following attributes were analysed: reliability, differential item functioning by gender, unidimensionality, internal construct validity, response category ordering, and scale targeting.

Results: Of the initial 12 items, two (wealth distribution and life in general in the place of residence) displayed misfit to the Rasch model and were therefore removed. Since the response categories of most items were disordered, items response categories were rescored. The resulting model displayed an excellent fit, with a Personal Separation Index of 0.90 indicating a good reliability, an interaction chi-square of 44.72,  $p = 0.28$  indicating no significant difference from the Rasch model, an item fit residual of  $0.263 \pm 0.984$  ( $M \pm SD$ ), and a person fit residual of  $-0.874 \pm 2.076$ . All items were free from gender bias. Further tests of unidimensionality revealed the presence of two factors: one comprising social conditions, social services, support to families, and leisure items; and the other formed by trust in people, belonging, and security items. An exploratory factor analysis in principal components with varimax rotation replicated the 3-factor structure of the IWI.

Discussion/conclusions: The CWI is a valid and reliable measure of subjective wellbeing related to the community as assessed by older adults. Further research with this promising measure should focus on cross-national comparisons.

Comparative Patterns of Commitment: Old Age Interest Groups and their Members in the Swiss Welfare State

Lambelet, Alexandre

IEPI, University of Lausanne

Lausanne, Switzerland

Keywords

Interest Groups, Welfare State, Social Participation, biography, ageing

Many researchers have shown that the number of Old Age Interest groups has strongly increased in Western countries over the last 30 years (Pratt, 1993 ; Charpentier & Queniart, 2007). This increase is perceived sometimes positively, sometimes negatively, but is rarely structured with an analysis of the values or of the goals carried out by the members of such organizations. Researchers (Day, 1998; Binstock, 1997) give us in particular little information on the reasons why the elderly decide to get involved. In this paper we would like to question the diversity of the 'types' or 'reasons' of commitment that we can find in such organizations and therefore offer some elements to understand the 'form' or the 'direction' that these organizations take.

The possibility of the commitment of elderly persons in Old Age Interest Groups can be in connection with several determining elements: the associative or militant offer available for the elderly, the public image of the groups, which is always variable, and the social characteristics and careers of the members (Fillieule, 2001). Analyzing biographical interviews carried out with members of the main Old Age Interest Groups in Switzerland has enabled us to study how members become involved in these organizations, what place this involvement occupies in their life, what kind of activity they pursue there and finally what connections can be made between their social characteristics and the role they can play in these organizations (Gerth & Mills, 1954). Our paper will show that these organizations are less a place where the strict concerns of the pensioners are defended than places where the people who were involved in different types of organizations during their life can carry on their life-long struggles. Similarly the choice of the 'modus operandi' by the Old Age Interest groups is less strictly structured by the present situation of the elderly than by their experiences in other social organizations. Thus new types of explanations can be given to the emergence and the positioning of the Old Age Interest groups.

Conceptualizing the neighbourhood as a dynamic social space: older people as actors in place-making

Buffel, Tine

*Adult educational sciences, Vrije Universiteit Brussel
Brussel, Belgium*

Verté, Dominique

*Adult educational sciences, Vrije Universiteit Brussel
Brussels, Belgium*

De Witte, Nico

*Adult educational sciences, Vrije Universiteit Brussel
Brussels, Belgium*

De Donder, Liesbeth

*Adult educational sciences, Vrije Universiteit Brussel
Brussels, Belgium*

Dury, Sarah

*Adult educational sciences, Vrije Universiteit Brussel
Brussels, Belgium*

Keywords

elderly, community, neighbourhood, citizenship, place-making

This article offers a selective review of a broad range of social science literature examining the neighbourhood as an important setting in everyday life for the elderly. The main purpose is to explore several theoretical perspectives for studying older people's neighbourhood as a dynamic social space. Although in recent years there has been a renewed interest in the concepts of social cohesion and (local) community among both academics and social-policy-makers, most research has not focused on life span or gerontological issues. However, understanding the links between contemporary debates about the way space is involved in 'learning to live together' and central concerns of social and environmental gerontology, may provide clues about how to incorporate an inclusive sense of citizenship which recognises the full societal contribution of older people into a conceptual framework of the social environment. The argument is developed that mainstream gerontological research concerned with neighbourhood and community issues in old age has often been informed by an uncritical reliance on assumptions and images about older people as merely help and support subjects. It is argued that an interpretation of the neighbourhood as a social space beyond its potentially supportive role may open up interesting perspectives for exploring new practices of citizenship in old age. Rethinking the concept of social space as a potential expression of human agency in later life could break new ground for recognizing older people as actors in place-making. This place-based aspect of citizenship can possibly be understood as an important dimension of social inclusion because older people are no longer marginalised from a process of which they are part. A key argument of the paper, however, is that the extent to which older people are able to actively shape and (re)construct their environment is related to the dynamics of late-life inequality. The conclusion provides some basic elements to lay out a conceptual model for understanding the role of neighbourhoods as dynamic, multi-dimensional, socially and historically contextualised processes that both shape and are shaped by the experiences of older people.

Conformity and resistance in older women's life stories

Snellman, Marie-Louise

Department of social work, Umea university Umea, Sweden

Keywords

life course, strategies, older women, conformity/resistance

The main objective of the presentation is to highlight aspects of conformity and resistance as described in older women's oral life stories. The life stories are part of an ongoing dissertation project, at the Department of social work, Umea university, Sweden. The data consists of ten women's life stories, aged 75 to 85, living in the rural countryside in the county of Vasterbotten in northern Sweden and the region of Ostrobothnia on the west coast of Finland. The meaning of old age cannot be separated from the rest of the course of a person's life, and by conducting life story interviews ageing as a process is emphasised. Life stories not only give us information about the individual, but also about cultural and societal conditions in two similar, but still different countries. Hence, the purpose of the presentation is to make visible women's diverse circumstances during life course, at both a structural and individual level, and how these are articulated through different strategies of adaptation and/or opposition.

The women taking part in the study are all born and raised in an agrarian community. During the women's life course the society has undergone many transformations. The Second World War, modernisation and the development of the welfare state are some of the changes that have taken place during their life course, as well as reassessment about women's work and family life. Despite many similarities between the two countries, there are also disparities that must be considered when trying to understand and interpret the life stories of these women. The national economical conditions after the Second World War were completely different, which has also influenced political and ideological attitudes and values about men's and women's responsibilities and positions. How such circumstances have shaped strategies of conformity and resistance used by women in different situations, concerning i.e education, work and relationships is therefore of interest to investigate.

Consequences of obligations: Family care for elders with Pakistani background

Moen, Bjørg

*Migration and minority research, Norwegian Social Research (NOVA)
Oslo, Norway*

Keywords

Family, Health Care, elderly, migrants

People with Pakistani background constitute one of the biggest migrant groups in Norway with nearly 30 000 persons. The first Pakistani migrants came to Norway in the 1970s, and are now approaching old age. In Norwegian-Pakistani families the tradition of family care for elderly people continue to be an obligation, despite Norway's well developed public care system. Few frail elderly with Pakistani background use institutions like nursing homes or retirement homes. The care for elderly people may impose a heavy burden on younger people, who also may have jobs and children to take care of. This paper will explore the consequences of caregiving for various members of Norwegian-Pakistani families. How do they manage their daily life with elderly people in need of care, and why do they continue this duty in a welfare state like Norway?

The Norwegian public care system may be less adapted to elders with migrant backgrounds, because the health care system is adjusted and organised in accordance with ethnic Norwegian elders' need. This may be one reason why few elderly people with migrant background use public care institutions. There may however be other reasons as well, at least in families with Pakistani background. Elderly people expect their adult children to take care of them in return for their caring of them. This obligation can be described as a generation contract, a lifelong reciprocity of caregiving in the family. In Pakistani families this requires that at least one of the sons, preferably the youngest, stays with their parents and take on the financial and social responsibility for elderly parents. When the son marries his wife becomes the daily carer for parents-in-law. This may be a necessity in Pakistan where welfare services are scarce, but is less required in Norway.

Constraints for uptake of telecare services in Slovenia

Dolnicar, Vesna

*Faculty of Social Sciences, University of Ljubljana
Ljubljana, Slovenia*

Nagode, Mateja

*/, Social Protection Institute of the Republic of Slovenia
Ljubljana, Slovenia*

Keywords

new technologies, old age, telecare services

Contemporary societies are facing two striking trends: widespread population ageing and rapid diffusion of new technologies. Since old age usually correlates with diminished abilities and health, we are embracing the potentials of technological advances to enhance health, abilities and relationships. However, the abilities, needs, aspirations and contextual environments of older people vary greatly. The aim of the proposed paper is to give an overview of the main subjective and objective constraints and motives of the Slovenian older adults for using basic and advanced telecare services. Different factors of the acceptance of the telecare services will be considered and their potential influence will be contextualised particularly within Slovenia, but also compared across several European countries.

Even though in Slovenia there are long waiting lists for entering the residential care and the diffusion of ICTs in general among the oldest population segment is on the average EU level, the uptake of even the basic ICT (social alarm) is very low (there are less than 1 percent of people aged 65 or more using the basic social alarm). The paper will provide insights into what might be specific reasons for this low adoption of telecare services in Slovenia. This research question will be investigated within the general conceptual framework of an 'ecological' model (Sixsmith et al., 2007). The underlying argument of this model is that the activities that comprise a person's everyday life are shaped by a range of different factors, including attributes of the person and attributes of the immediate and wider socio-cultural contexts. These personal and situational factors operate together in a functional, 'ecological' relationship to facilitate or constrain a person's activities.

Research results will be presented on the basis of secondary data review on the national and cross-country level (authors are involved in several national and EU-level projects - e.g. ICT and Ageing, SOPRANO - which will allow also a cross-country analysis and exploration of differences across different social welfare systems).

Demographic Change, Welfare, and Intergenerational Transfers: Globalization and Late Careers in Local Communities

Lin, Mei-Ling

sociology, National Open University, Taiwan Kaohsiung, Taiwan, Taiwan

Keywords

late careers, labour markets and retirement, ageing labour forces, longevity and culture of ageing, intergenerational equity and solidarity

The shift towards a technology and knowledge-based economy may hit older workers harder since there is growing demand for multi-skilled and flexible labor. Global forces shape the employment landscape in ways that are not conducive to older workers' job prospects. The declines in fertility and increasing life expectancies have an effect on population structures. An active employment policy is central to the vision of becoming the competitive and dynamic knowledge-based economy in the world capable of sustainable economic growth with greater social cohesion. As the social contract is being renegotiated, economic rules change and intergenerational redistribution patterns are adjusted. Attention to the economic aspects of population aging and implications for the social contract and intergenerational equity, has grown into a preoccupation. The welfare state is gradually replaced by a new workfare state that the government's aim is to rebuild the welfare state around work and by the creation of an active society. Policy responses to these population changes will influence the economy, intergenerational equity and social welfare for decades. Local communities, Taiwan faces the challenges of an aging population and a transition to market institutions to deal with the economic consequences of aging. There are themes related to ageing experience, intergenerational relations, economics and social policy, and the culture of ageing. Demographic pressure is forcing Taiwan to face challenges concerning intergenerational fairness and social cohesion. This paper presents an analysis of the dynamics of demographic transition in Taiwan, and combines aspects of social change as well as the development of social inequality in later life, and describes the economic implications of an aging labor force. This paper provides a mixture of theoretical and empirical analyses of the macroeconomic and policy implications of population aging. Using data derived from the national survey on family income and expenditure, and drawing upon the framework of the national transfer accounts system, we shall estimate the changing age profile of intergenerational transfers of resources over the period from 1980 to 2007. The analysis is an effort to understand how these changes will interact with population aging to influence economic growth and intergenerational equity in Taiwan.

Design of Environments for Ageing

Kuenemund, Harald

Institute for Gerontology, University of Vechta Vechta, Germany

Appell, Jens-E.

*Branch Lab Oldenburg, Fraunhofer-Abteilung Hör-, Sprach- und Audiotechnologie
Oldenburg, Germany*

Appelrath, Hans-Jürgen

*Systeme im Gesundheitswesen, OFFIS FuE-Bereiche IuK-Systeme im Gesundheitswesen
Oldenburg, Germany*

Boll, Susanne

*Multimedia und Internet- Informationsdienste, OFFIS FuE-Bereich Multimedia und Internet- Informationsdienste
Oldenburg, Germany*

Eichelberg, Marco

*IuK-Systeme im Gesundheitswesen, OFFIS FuE-Bereich IuK-Systeme im Gesundheitswesen
Oldenburg, Germany*

Erdmann, Birte

*Zentrum Altern und Gesellschaft, Hochschule Vechta
Vechta, Germany*

Fachinger, Uwe

*Zentrum Altern und Gesellschaft, Hochschule Vechta
Vechta, Germany*

Felber, Juliane

Institut für Psychologie, Friedrich-Schiller-Universität Jena Jena, Germany

Gövercin, Mehmet

*Forschungsgruppe Geriatrie der Charité, Humboldt, Universität Berlin
Berlin, Germany*

Hein, Andreas

*Hardware/Software-Systeme und IuK-Systeme im Gesundheitswesen, OFFIS FuE-Bereiche Eingebettete Hardware/Software-Systeme und IuK-Systeme im Gesundheitswesen
Oldenburg, Germany*

Haux, Reinhold

Universität Braunschweig und der Medizinischen, Peter L. Reichertz Institut für Medizinische Informatik Braunschweig, Germany

Heuten, Wilko

*Multimedia und Internet- Informationsdienste, OFFIS FuE-Bereich Multimedia und Internet- Informationsdienste
Oldenburg, Germany*

Hohmann, Volker

*Systemtechnik, HörTech Kompetenzzentrum für Hörgeräte-Systemtechnik
Oldenburg, Germany*

Huber, Rainer

*Systemtechnik, HörTech Kompetenzzentrum für Hörgeräte- Systemtechnik
Oldenburg, Germany*

Hülsken-Giesler, Manfred

Arbeitsgruppe Pflegewissenschaft, Universität Osnabrück Osnabrück, Germany

Kiy, Matthias

*Institut für Sonder- und Rehabilitationspädagogik, Carl von Ossietzky Universität
Oldenburg, Germany*

Marschollek, Michael

Universität Braunschweig und der Medizinischen Hochschule, Peter L. Reichertz Institut für Medizinische Informatik der Technischen Universität Braunschweig und der Medizinischen Hochschule Braunschweig, Germany

Meis, Markus

*Systemtechnik, HörTech Kompetenzzentrum für Hörgeräte- Systemtechnik
Oldenburg, Germany*

Meyer, Jochen

*Informationsdienste, OFFIS FuE-Bereich Multimedia und Internet- Informationsdienste
Oldenburg, Germany*

Nebel, Wolfgang

*, OFFIS FuE-Bereiche Eingebettete Hardware/Software-Systeme und Mikrosystemtechnik und Nanohandhabung
Oldenburg, Germany*

Neyer, Franz J.

*, Institut für Psychologie, Friedrich-Schiller-Universität Jena
, Germany*

Okken, Petra Karin

*, Zentrum Altern und Gesellschaft, Hochschule Vechta
, Germany*

Plischke, Maik

, Peter L. Reichertz Institut für Medizinische Informatik der Technischen Universität Braunschweig und der Medizinischen Hochschule Hannover

, Germany

Remmers, Hartmut

, Arbeitsgruppe Pflegewissenschaft, Universität Osnabrück
, Germany

Schilling, Meinhard

, Institut für Elektrische Messtechnik und Grundlagen der Elektrotechnik, Fakultät für Elektrotechnik, Informationstechnik und Physik, TU Braunschweig
, Germany

Schulze, Gisela C.

, Institut für Sonder- und Rehabilitationspädagogik, Carl von Ossietzky Universität Oldenburg
, Germany

Steinhagen-Thiessen, Elisabeth

, Forschungsgruppe Geriatrie der Charité, Humboldt-Universität Berlin, Ärztliche Leiterin des Evangelischen Geriatriesentrums Berlin
Berlin, Germany

Tegtbur, Uwe

, Institut für Sportmedizin, Medizinische Hochschule Hannover
, Germany

Thoben, Wilfried

, OFFIS FuE-Bereich IuK-Systeme im Gesundheitswesen, Oldenburg
Oldenburg, Germany

Wahl, Friedrich Michael

Department Informatik der der Carl-Friedrich-GauB-Facultät, TU Braunschweig, Institut für Robotik und Prozessinformatik
, Germany

Winkelbach, Simon

Department Informatik der Carl-Friedrich-GauB-Facultät, TU Braunschweig, Institut für Robotik und Prozessinformatik
, Germany

Wittrock, Manfred

, Institut für Sonder- und Rehabilitationspädagogik, Carl von Ossietzky Universität Oldenburg
, Germany

Wolf, Klaus-Hendrik

, Peter L. Reichertz Institut für Medizinische Informatik der Technischen Universität Braunschweig und der Medizinischen Hochschule Hannover
, Germany

Wolf, Lars

Department Informatik der Carl-Friedrich-GauB-Facultät, TU Braunschweig, Institut für Betriebssysteme und

Keywords

AAL, Gerontechnology, Technology

The ageing of society challenges not only the financing of social insurance systems, which is mostly focused in public discussions, but also regarding basic conditions for successful and productive ageing, care of high age people, support of family caregivers, social participation and, in particular, the retention of independence and the preservation of quality of life in general. The possibilities in this field to intervene by means of technical developments involve a wide variety of topics like prevention (primary, secondary, tertiary) and rehabilitation, compensation (e.g. age specific losses in sensory perception), physical, social and psychic support of the elderly as well as their networks (e.g. in daily routine or communication) - and not least the generation of improved data bases and communication structures for medical science and supply.

The paper provides an overview on the subject and presents first results from the "Lower Saxony Research Network Design of Environments for Ageing - Information and Communication Technologies for Promoting and Sustaining Quality of Life, Health and Self-sufficiency in the Second Half of Life - (GAL)" that aims to identify, to enhance and to evaluate new techniques of information and communication technology for design of environments for ageing.

Please Note: The Authors are

Harald Künemund (presenter) with Jens-E. Appell, Hans-Jürgen Appelrath, Susanne Boll, Marco Eichelberg, Uwe Fachinger, Mehmet Gövercin, Reinhold Haux, Andreas Hein, Wilko Heuten, Volker Hohmann, Rainer Huber, Manfred Hülsken-Giesler, Matthias Kiy, Harald Künemund, Michael Marschollek, Markus Meis, Jochen Meyer, Wolfgang Nebel, Franz J. Neyer, Petra-Karin Okken, Maik Plischke, Hartmut Remmers, Meinhard Schilling, Gisela C. Schulze, Elisabeth Steinhagen-Thiessen, Uwe Tegtbur, Wilfried Thoben, Friedrich Michael Wahl, Simon Winkelbach, Manfred Wittrock, Klaus-Hendrik Wolf & Lars Wolf

Determinants of formal home care use: the influence of individual life circumstances and family context

Schenk, Niels

*SODEM, NIDI
The Netherlands,*

van Gaalen, Ruben

*SRS/SET, CBS
The Hague, The Netherlands*

Keywords

the netherlands, registry data, informal care, formal care

The nature of the association between formal and informal care is hotly debated in the research literature. Most studies focus on differences between countries in informal care, and draws on cross-national patterns to determine the role of formal care in shaping intergenerational solidarity. Central questions are whether formal and informal care are substitutes, or rather complement one another. The evidence is largely indirect: direct measures of both formal and informal care are sparse. Furthermore, most data pertain to the aggregate level. Scholars using micro-level data on formal and informal care suggest that in most European countries the two forms of care are complements rather than substitutes. However, this research does not show under which conditions informal care becomes a viable alternative for formal care, and how changes in individuals' lives change these conditions. In this paper we determine to what extent formal and informal care are interrelated, and how the relationship between the two can best be described. As a measure of formal care we use formal home care registry data from the Netherlands which contain information on the type and intensity of care provided by the state. The registry data are then merged with survey data from the Netherlands Kinship Panel Study (NKPS). This combination of datasets provides us with the opportunity to test at the micro level how the availability of various types of family members and relationship quality with these persons affects the degree to which elderly people rely on formal home care. We furthermore determine how changes in the lives of the elderly such as health status, and changes in the availability or relationship with family members, affect formal home care use.

Does cohabitation provide weaker intergenerational bonds than marriage?

Nazio, Tiziana

Social Sciences, Turin University Torino, Italy

Saraceno, Chiara

Wissenschaftszentrum Berlin für Sozialforschung, WZB Berlin - Tiergarten, Germany

Keywords

marriage, Cohabitation, intergenerational support

In this paper we explore whether the increasing emergence of cohabitation instead of or before marriage weakens family ties and intergenerational solidarity as suggested by previous research, based however, on a not clear distinction between different forms of cohabitation. We study the extent to which the partnership form entered by adult children (cohabitation vs. legal marriage) affects the frequency of contacts and visits between them and their parents. With empirical evidence from the Multiscopo survey (2003) for Italy and the British Household Panel Study (2001), we test the hypothesis that marriage might provide a more favourable locus for solidarity, exchange and emotional support between generations than cohabitation, as suggested by the, not well developed, literature. If long-term cohabitations were compared with marriages, and the age of partners controlled for in both situations, results might differ. We test several hypotheses in two countries - the United Kingdom and Italy - in which cohabitations are differently developed, and use multilevel analysis in acknowledgment to the nested nature of family ties.

Does the supply of public care services towards the very old affect labour force participation of their children?

Gautun, Heidi

*Institute for Labour and Social Research, Fafo
Oslo, Norway*

Hagen, Kåre

*Department for Public Governance, Norwegian School of Management
Oslo, Norway*

Keywords

Elderly employees with care obligations, public services, Norway

In Norway, as well as in the other Nordic countries, little systematic knowledge has been established on how frequent elderly employees experience a squeeze between own work and care obligations towards their parents, and to what extent this predicament affects their behaviour in the work sphere. Some research has been undertaken in other western countries that maintain welfare models other than the Nordic one. This paper presents findings from an initial study, which has surveyed the situation in Norway. We also ask: does a high level of supply of public elderly care services toward the elderly, affect the work participation pattern of their children? We present results from a nationwide, representative survey of 2000 men and women aged 45-65 who have one or both parents alive, undertaken in the spring of 2007. Seven out of ten said they assisted their parents during the past 12 months while also taking part in paid work. Of these 57 per cent reported a dual pressure resulting from work and care obligations. Our data suggests that there is a positive effect of welfare services provided to the very old on the employment output of the young elderly.

Dynamics of Portuguese population and professional workforce and ageing at the work

Tomás, Licínio Manuel Vicente

History, Philosophy and Social Sciences, University of the Azores Ponta Delgada, Portugal

Keywords

age, Active Population, Values of Age in Work, Workforce Ageing

The present communication paper tackles the issue of the ageing professional workforce and social and its social implications considering the ageing trend of the active population in the Portuguese context. The phenomenon of aging and its implications are anticipated, today, its shadow on the people who work and more specifically on the different social and work environments.

The dynamics of the workforce, both in the Portuguese and the European level showed to be more an expression of legitimate sharing between generations and different social forces that dispute, at a social scale, the employment.

The study of the evolution of the Portuguese active population among the five latest censuses shows the population aging, but not a distortion in the sense of rejuvenation. This is the result of major changes in the structure of the active population. In terms of demographic analysis of the labour force saw a trend of rejuvenation. This result is due mainly to the increase in population of women in the workforce younger and early departure of older workers.

Social age as well as active population are not natural categories, but social constructs deducted from characteristics and rights related to age and levels of pay and discounts social activity. Moreover, as Rémi Lenoir (1976) wrote, following Maurice Halbwachs, the age is a biological and socially manipulated manipulável. Age is, from the outset, an empirical and one of those characteristics which is unsuspected by our social and cataloguing of our brand identity. Advanced age has never concerned more people and the benefits and harm of age as alleged or disputed (Gauthier, 1986).

Our intention is to demonstrate that the population is an economic category that does not use chronological age but the age as defined by the law to impose duties or remove them before the job, than what is usually considered as work.

Early retirement indicators on the institutional level: clustering countries based on policy measures

Denaeghel, Kim

*Sociology, UA (University of Antwerp)
Antwerp, Belgium*

Mortelmans, Dimitri

*Sociology, UA (University of Antwerp)
Antwerp, Belgium*

Keywords

retirement, Institutional indicators, policy, Cluster analysis

In almost all European countries and the USA, the employment rate of older workers (aged 50 and older) has declined over the last fifty years (Morris & Mallier, 2003). This poses threats to the sustainability of social security programs in many countries. As a consequence, several governments have worked out policy measures to increase the activity of older workers and to end early exit. Possible solutions that have been studied in the literature are: a rise of the normal pension age, closing special early retirement programs, a reduction of the generosity of disability benefits and a reversal of gradual and part-time retirement (Ebbinghaus, 2000). Some countries that will be studied in this paper, contribute to an early exit culture based on financial benefits (Schmäll, 2003) while others have an active ageing culture which supports older workers to continue working (Gold & Saurama, 2004).

This paper will examine how different types of countries cluster based on policy measures. The added value of the analysis is to extend previous research by studying policy indicators over different countries and over time. We will analyse a large set of policy indicators from different resources (e.g. EUROSTAT, OECD,?) with data from nineteen countries using cluster analysis. The countries that will be studied consist of the EU-15 plus Switzerland, Hungary, Poland and the United States. Most of the data are available year on year from 1996 until 2007.

Based on previous research, we expect that institutional indicators such as the legal retirement age and life-long learning strategies in a country will play a major role in the early retirement decision. Differences between countries will be looked at in the diverse analyses.

Emergence of romantic relationships in old age

Lumme-Sandt, Kirsi

*School of Public Health, University of Tampere
Tampere, Finland*

Uotila, Hanna

*School of Public Health, University of Tampere
Tampere, Finland*

Keywords

Media, marriage, older people, relationships

Different aspects in the life of older people are changing rapidly. These changes are reflected in popular media and new identities of old age are constructed through media. In this paper we are interested in how romantic relationships of older people are dealt with in the most popular general-interest magazine for people over 50 years of age in Finland. The data comprised the volumes 2006-2008, (54 magazines, 69 articles).

The analysis focused on the following questions by using discursive reading: In what way is written about lifelong marriages, sex, divorces, re-marriages, cohabitation, widowhood and single life in old age? Are there differences on how long marriages or new relationships and cohabitation are valued? How are widowhood and single life seen in old age?

Our preliminary analysis revealed that a wide range of romantic and erotic life was represented in articles from secret love affairs to Internet dating. But the vast majority of articles were about heterosexual relationships, old ones or new bliss. The overall amount of articles about relationships increased each year. When there were articles about widowed or divorced people, mostly the focus was on finding a new partner. A few happy and content single persons were all female and mainly some sort of creative people. Although different kind of ways of life are possible and were dealt with seemingly objective way, having a relationship was constructed as a normative way of life in old age.

European society is ageing

Gennai, Francesca

*of sociology and social research, University of Trento
Trento, Italy*

Rodeschini, Giulia

*sociology and social research, University of sociology
Trento, Italy*

Cristoforetti, Antonio

*social research, Regional institute of study and social research
trento, Italy*

Keywords

time use, elder people, life courses, ageing

European society is ageing. By 1995, 70 million people over the age of 60 have been living in the Union, almost 20% of total population. Till 2020, this figure will rise to 25%; the number of people 80 years old and older will more than double. But we do not know enough about how elder people manage their time or how they organize their everyday life. The aim of this paper is to discuss on how old people actually spend their total time basing on a longitudinal study with older people from age 66 to 86 who life independently.

In discussing elders' time use, some authors suggest three different segments of the total time budgets: 1. personal care, 2. productive activities, and 3. leisure activities. People spend their time for the personal care, such as personal hygiene, eating, and sleeping. Productive activities are mainly characterized by their outputs and which can be delegated to a third person without losing value (for example paid work or voluntary work, home maintenance or housekeeping). In later life, leisure activities have become an important theme since the older age group has a lot of available free time. Leisure activities are characterized by such values as personal amusement, relaxation, self-fulfilment and socialization. Starting from these considerations, firstly we will show the importance to rethink the time segmentation illustrated upon adding to the remembrance activities. And secondly, we will focus on four different strategies used by the elders to divide their time and, consequently, we will propose four trajectories that elders' everyday life could follow: the trajectory based on care activities, the trajectory based on productive activities (paid or not paid), the trajectory based on remembrance activities, and the trajectory based on leisure activities finalized to personal enlarge.

Exploring the sense of neighbourhood: personal resources, opportunities and constraints - Evidence from the Belgian Aging Study

Buffel, Tine

*Adult educational sciences, Vrije Universiteit Brussel
Brussels, Belgium*

Verté, Dominique

*Adult educational sciences, Vrije Universiteit Brussel
Brussels, Belgium*

De Witte, Nico

*Adult educational sciences, Vrije Universiteit Brussel
Brussels, Belgium*

De Donder, Liesbeth

*Adult educational sciences, Vrije Universiteit Brussel
Brussels, Belgium*

Dury, Sarah

*Adult educational sciences, Vrije Universiteit Brussel
Brussels, Belgium*

Keywords

sense of neighbourhood, community, elderly

Introduction: Aging is often associated with an intensification of feelings about place and local community. Most research dealing with concepts such as 'neighbourhood attachment' and 'sense of community' has observed that older people show a stronger sense of neighbourhood than their younger contemporaries. This paper proposes, building on earlier work dealing with spatial aspects of citizenship, that it may be useful to differentiate not only between, but also within social groups and stages of life. Various authors stress that there are different types of local community attachment, each reflecting different combinations of resources, personal needs and places in which people live. However, the extent to which older people differ in the way they integrate in local communities has received minimal research attention. From the perspective of critical gerontology, this paper examines the degree to which variation in local community attachment can be explained through significant inequalities within the older population.

Methods and materials: Using data generated from the Belgian Aging Study (N=46.989) a multivariate regression model was tested with socio-demographic characteristics, personal resources, physical and psychosocial aspects of vulnerability as independent variables, and a local community attachment scale as dependent variable.

Results: Multivariate regression analysis revealed that age is not significantly related to local community attachment, calling into question the widely accepted idea that a person's attachment increases with age. The findings indicate that psychosocial aspects of vulnerability, particularly loneliness and feelings of insecurity, are the strongest negative predictors of community attachment. Length of residence is significantly related to increased attachment, whereas physical frailty and the need for everyday mobility assistance have a significant inhibiting effect.

Conclusion: Further exploration of variation in local community attachment - each reflecting different combinations of personal and environmental opportunities and constraints - may provide deeper insights into the dynamics of late-life inequality.

Extending working lives: opportunities, constraints and individual expectations in an ageing society

Cancio Oliveira, Teresa

CIES (Grantholder), ISCTE

Portugal, Portugal

Keywords

life course, retirement, active ageing, ageing public politics

For the last 3 decades the period spent in paid work has been shrinking, with early exit at the upper end and the extension of schooling at the lower end of the work life contributing to this outcome from both directions. The period spent in retirement is also expanding in both directions, as a result of early exit and increasing life expectancy. Thus, what has been the standard "threefold life course" is being massively reorganized, relations between age groups and generations are being redefined and expectations concerning retirement and later life are suffering changes.

Recently, European countries have been implementing a set of measures and recommendations to promote and support extension of working lives in order to face concerns with economic growing and social protection in future. Portugal is not an exception, also having carried out some measures concerning age of retirement. Those measures have had its first step with Ministers Council Resolution 141/2006 of 25th October.

The proposed PhD research project focuses on the analysis of the processes of transition to retirement, in a setting of increasing life expectancy, development of political and institutional arrangements aiming to promote longer lives at paid work and changing social representations about ageing and retirement.

The study will be developed, mainly, at the following levels: 1) At the workplace context (meso level), age management practices and employers' attitudes through older workers will be analyzed and characterized, questioning how both contribute to achieve goals sat at macro level. 2) at the individual level the focus will be on older workers (older than 55 years old) expectations and future plans concerning life after age retirement and how they evaluate opportunities and conditions to extend working lives at workplace.

In regard the meso level, data will be collected, mainly, by structured interviews with human resources managers in different organizational settings, in order to compare activity sectors placed either in private or public domains. At the micro level the inquiry will include biographical interviews with workers older than 55.

Family care of older people in Portugal: caring trajectories and their meanings.

São José, José

Educational Sciences and Sociology, Faculty of Humanities and Social Sciences (University of Algarve) and Institute of Social Sciences (University of Lisbon) Faro, Portugal

Keywords

older people, informal care, caring trajectories, meanings of care

The presentation is based on the results of a PhD dissertation carried out at University of Lisbon in 2009. The research, of qualitative nature, focused on the topic of family care for older dependent people, more precisely on the caring trajectories and their meanings. The results obtained revealed a diverse and complex social reality, both in terms of the practices and in terms of the social representations. The transitions to the caring trajectories were carried out in different ways and at different timings. Besides this, they had a plurality of foundations (or reasons): from unconditional filial duty to love. Some of the carers interviewed have caring trajectories of short duration, whilst, on the opposite end, other carers have long caring trajectories. Caring through time took different paths; having in some cases implied a gradual increase of time and energy spent on care and, on the opposite end, implied a gradual decrease of time and energy spent. It also became evident that, whilst in some cases, carers are able to reconcile caring with other life trajectories, in other cases, caring may produce interferences on other life trajectories and/ or may suffer interferences from these. Furthermore, this research was able to capture several meanings associated with the caring trajectories, which go from ?gratification? to ?oppression?. The diversity and complexity found relates with multiple factors, both of micro-social nature (e.g. level of individual resources) and of meso and macro-structural nature (social class, gender, etc). The study of caring through time and of its meanings also contributed to enrich the knowledge related with some important sociological questions, such as the degree of control carers have in the construction of their caring biographies, the importance of affection in these biographies and the role of family in the satisfaction of the older persons? needs.

Family composition as determinant of informal and formal support among the elderly: the influence of children's divorce

Colman, Elien

*Department of Sociology, Ghent University
Ghent, Belgium*

Bracke, Piet

*Department of Sociology, Ghent University
Ghent, Belgium*

Keywords

elderly, family composition, divorce, informal support, formal support

Family composition as determinant of informal and formal support among the elderly: the influence of children's divorce

Colman Elien & Bracke Piet

Ghent University

Department of Sociology

Previous research indicates that children are not only an important source of informal support, but they are also engaged in a "bridging process", acting as agents seeking formal help for their parents. In most of these studies, children's characteristics are not taken into account. We try to build on this literature by bringing the children's marital status into focus. More specifically, we examine whether the amount of informal and formal support elderly parents receive is influenced by the proportion of divorced children. A divorce potentially disrupts intergenerational ties. We hypothesize that, as a result of an erosion of family ties after divorce, parents of divorced children receive less support from their children. Based on the "bridging hypothesis", we can expect that parents of divorced children receive less formal care, because children are important gatekeepers for searching formal support. On the other hand, building on the "hierarchical compensatory model" we can hypothesize that parents of divorced children receive more formal support, substituting for the smaller amount of received informal support. Because these processes are likely to be influenced by country characteristics like the organization of formal care, differences between countries are also explored.

In this study, we use the data from the two waves of the Survey of Health, Ageing and Retirement in Europe (SHARE). In total, the SHARE covers 11 European countries, containing information of 19309 older non-institutionalized individuals at two moments in time. Multilevel analysis are carried out. At the individual level, the central variables are social support, formal support, family composition, limitations with activities of daily living, mental and physical health. Age, gender, education and socioeconomic status are added as controls. At the country level, divorce rate and health care supply are added as controls. The results are discussed.

Firm-level policies and late career transitions in Germany, Japan and Britain: A qualitative case study approach in the chemical, steel and retail industries

Schroeder, Heike

*Human Resource Management, Middlesex University Business School
London, UK*

Flynn, Matt

*Human Resource Management, Middlesex University Business School
London, UK*

Muller-Camen, Michael

*Human Resource Management, Middlesex University Business School
London, UK*

Higo, Masa

Center for Ageing and Work, Boston College Chestnut Hill, USA

Yamada, Atsuhiko

Economics, Keio University Tokyo, Japan

Keywords

Retirement expectations, Japan, Germany, Britain, HRM

Demographic developments will lead to an ageing of the workforce in most industrialised countries as fewer young people enter the labour force. At the same time, research observes that individuals show divergent retirement behaviour across countries. OECD data found that individuals tend to leave the labour market well before reaching the national pension age in both Germany and Britain, but that individuals stay in work well beyond national retirement age in Japan. Literature has discussed the influence of institutional systems such as the labour market, social security systems and pension systems on the propensity to stay up until or beyond retirement age. However, research has not yet investigated the potential role of firm level Human Resource Management policies and practices in influencing retirement perceptions, expectations and behaviour of individuals across countries.

This paper will aim to close this gap by exploring how older workers in three countries, (Britain, Japan and Germany), and in three industries (retail, chemical and steel) perceive and conceptualise their last years in employment as well as their transition into retirement in light of employers' attitudes towards older workers as well as in light of corporate age management policies and practices.

To do this, we will firstly use available quantitative datasets to outline how employers in all three countries perceive the capabilities and performance potential of their older employees. Secondly, we will draw on qualitative interview data from two projects, funded by the British 'Economic and Social Research Council' and the 'British Council' respectively. Semi-structured interviews have been conducted with HR managers, line managers and employee representatives in the respective countries and industries on their organisations' age management policies and on how these are being implemented. Based on individual interviews and focus group interviews with older workers in these countries and industries, we will explore how older workers perceive these HR policies and their influence upon their own individual late career and retirement expectations and behaviour.

From a Bodily paradox to (Age)coded bodies: On Embodied Gendered Ageing

Krekula, Clary

Institution of Social Work, Karlstad University Karlstad, Sweden

Keywords

women, beauty norms, Gender

There is a growing interest in the significance of social positions such as gender, age, class and race/ethnicity to how embodied experiences construct gendered conditions for old age. In this paper I will draw attention to a body-related paradox on old women's relation to their bodies. On the one hand, we have the assumption that women's aging is influenced by beauty norms that praise youth, and on the other, studies showing that older women's attitudes towards their bodies are far more positive than has been suggested. Departing from three focus group interviews and twelve individual interviews with women in ages 70 years and older, I will illustrate the presence of (1) Double bodily dimensions, that are used to a greater or less extent in performances of identities, (2) The body as a process interpreted over time and space and (3) Double perspectives on bodies, e.g. the presence of many different reference groups. Analyses of these results with the concept of age coding - practices of distinction that are based on and preserve representations of actions, phenomena and characteristics that are associated with and applicable to defined ages sheds the light on how individuals take advantage of manifold and ambivalent norms and reference groups in order to construct embodied gendered aged identities.

Gay and Lesbian Aging: How social networks and the experience of stigmatizing affect the need for and access to health and age-services

Nuland, Bjørn Richard

*Institute for Labour and Social Research, Fafo
Oslo, Norway*

Keywords

Norway, lesbian, Welfare State, aging, gay

Lesbian and gay elderly make up a minority group that up until recently has been invisible in public policy, academic research and even within the gay community itself. Very little research has been conducted on social networks and support for aging lesbians and gays. However, traditional gerontological models of 'normal aging' have in recent years been challenged by a growing awareness that individual and society diversity across the lifespan leads to multiple different realities later in life.

Though older lesbians and gay men will in part share a common reality with all older people, the structural organization of sexuality privileges heterosexuality over other forms of sexuality. It can therefore be assumed that older lesbians and gay men will experience later life differently from their heterosexual counterparts. For instance, elderly lesbians and gays are significantly less likely than heterosexual women and men of comparable age to be in partnered relationships and to have children - the two groups most frequently called upon to provide care for a dependent elder. In the absence of a partner and of children, on whom are these older gay men and lesbians likely to call for support in the event of a health or any other crisis? How does their social location and group membership affect the risk of isolation and loneliness in later life? Do elderly lesbians and gays experience discrimination and non-acceptance forcing them back 'in the closet'? Answers to these questions will inform us not only about the needs of the gay and lesbian elderly, but also about how these needs challenge the present structure for the welfare state provision of care.

The case for this paper will be Norway, and it aims to problematize issues for lesbian and gay elderly based on research primarily the US and Canada, two countries who has produced empirical research concerning gay and lesbian aging. The issue of gay and lesbian elderly will be connected to how a social democratic welfare state, based on unity, equality and universal services, is equipped to meet increased diversity and pluralism in lifestyles, values and priorities in the elderly population.

Gender and the impact of care-giving on sleep in Italy and the UK

Arber, Sara

*Department of Sociology, University of Surrey
Guildford, UK*

Bianchera, Emanuela

*Sociology, University of Surrey
Guildford, UK*

Venn, Susan

*Sociology, University of Surrey
Guildford, UK*

Keywords

caring, sleep, Gender

Despite extensive research on care-giving for frail older parents, partners, and other relatives, there has been little research examining how care-giving at night impacts on carers' sleep quality.

This paper draws on qualitative interviews with 50 women aged 40-80 in Italy, and 60 men and women aged 65+ in the UK<sup>1</sup>. The interviews focused on self-perceptions of what influences interviewees' quality of sleep, and were not specifically designed to examine how care-giving impacts on sleep.

A major theme emerging in both countries was how care-giving adversely affected sleep. Care-giving for parents and elderly relatives had a major impact on women's sleep in Italy. Whereas, care-giving for partners affected both older men's and women's sleep in the UK. We propose a typology of how care-giving affects sleep comprising: (1) Effects on sleep of providing direct physical care at night. (2) Sleep disruption or 'light' sleep because of care-givers' anticipation of having to provide physical care at night. (3) Sleep interruptions through worries and anxiety about the well-being, current ill-health, or future situation of the care-receiver. (4) The 'legacy of care-giving', which interrupted carers' sleep for lengthy periods after care-giving ceased. The paper highlights how gender influences each aspect in the UK, and differences with Italy.

The relative lack of welfare provision for frail older people in Italy is implicated in high sleep disruption associated with care-giving for parents in Italy, while in the UK the normative nature of spousal care is a key factor. We conclude that intensive co-resident care-giving for partners and other relatives can severely disrupt care-givers' sleep, adversely affecting their well-being. The impact of care-giving on sleep has hitherto been neglected in research on informal care.

1. Funding from European Union (MCRTN-CT-2004-512362), and New Dynamics of Ageing initiative, a multidisciplinary research programme supported by AHRC, BBSRC, EPSRC, ESRC and MRC (RES-339-25-0009)

Gender effects of European pension reforms

Ginn, Jay

Centre for Research on Ageing and Gender, University of Surrey GUILDFORD, England

Keywords

Pensions, Gender, Reforms

Womens pension prospects are influenced by their increasing employment in most European countries and by women-friendly reforms implemented in the past decade. Yet gender convergence in pension income may be offset by other reforms introduced to curb the cost of state pensions and increase saving through private pensions.

This paper examines recent gender-relevant pension reforms in EU countries, using official statistics on state and private pensions and focusing on Britain, Ireland and Malta.

Grandparent roles and welfare state context: a Nordic country in comparative perspective

Hagestad, Gunhild

Economics and Social Science, University of Agder Kristiansand, Norway

Herlofson, Katharina

*Ageing and the life course, NOVA
Oslo, Norway*

Keywords

Welfare State, role, grandparenthood

In many ageing societies, nearly half of young children have four grandparents. Yet, contemporary images of grandparents are full of contradictions. For example, in North American discussions, they have been declared 'childsavers' - but also called redundant.

How much consensus do we find regarding a grandparent role in different European societies?

How is the role enacted in different societal contexts? Can welfare regimes help us account for variations in role enactment across societies? What appears to be key functions of grandparents in a Nordic welfare state - Norway?

These are key questions explored in this presentation.

Data and Methods

For a comparative backdrop, the presentation builds on material from the SHARE study, which includes questions on perceptions of the grandparental role and reports on grandparental behaviour.

The examination of Norwegian grandparenthood builds on two waves of the Norwegian Longitudinal study of life course, ageing and generations

(NorLAG). The first wave (NorLAG1 2002/2003) includes questions about what grandparents should do (N=5589, age 40-79). Analysis from the second wave (LOGG/NorLAG 2 2007/2008, age 18-84) focuses on grandparental support to young families. Respondents who have at least one parent living and children aged 0-10 are included (n=3508).

Findings

We find more consensus regarding role expectations than we observe uniformities in grandparent behaviours. Specifically, the availability of parental leaves and public child care seem to result in a 'reserve army' function being a central aspect of grandparenting in Norway. Ninety per cent of the respondents said grandparents should support adult children in their role as parents. Among respondents who were grandparents of children under 12, two-thirds reported taking care of grandchildren at least once a month.

Among respondents with children aged 0-10, about half reported receiving help with childcare from their parents. There were no significant differences between men and women, but help from mothers was mentioned twice as often as help from fathers. Lone mothers received more help from parents than women living with a partner. Divorce in the grandparent generation significantly reduced help to children and grandchildren. This trend was particularly clear for grandfathers.

Grandparents and women's participation in the labour market

Albuquerque, Paula

*Economics, ISEG - Technical University of Lisbon / CISEP
Lisbon, Portugal*

Keywords

childcare, ageing, labour market, Grandparents, women.

Abstract

Conciliation of work and family life is a challenge to most women. Also, population ageing demands a larger participation of women in the labour market, but this may have negative effects in terms of fertility, unless child care facilities are easily and cheaply available.

In some countries, although not in Southern European countries, women make significant use of part-time schedules as a way of balancing work and family life. Informal care, typically care by grandparents, is an alternative. It is cheap, and possibly compatible with non-standard labour schedules.

In this paper we want to find out how important childcare by grandparents is to the women's participation in the labour market in South European countries, including Portugal. We empirically evaluate the verification and the significance of such effect.

The existence of a grandparent caring for a child may not be a truly exogenous variable: many grandparents care for their grandchildren so that the mother may be in the labour market. If she decided not to have a job, it is possible that these grandparents would not be taking care of their grandchildren. Because of this potential endogeneity problem, we use a switching probit.

How do we treat our frail elderly? Insights on the Portuguese case

Lopes, Alexandra

Department of Sociology, University of Porto Portugal, <http://www.lettras.up.pt>

Keywords

elderly care, familialism, social care

The paper will introduce the main features of the social policy instruments available in Portugal to tackle the needs of the elderly, particularly those that have special needs and are dependent on others for their daily activities. The focus will go to the more recent trends in social policy design and it will show the reproduction of a marked familialist approach in the choices that have been made on that matter. Furthermore, the paper will discuss the implications of the current policy framework, both for the elderly and for their families, highlighting how it is gender averse and how it leaves the elderly unprotected. Data will be presented and discussed to depict the main traits of the living conditions of the Portuguese elderly. The paper will end by debating the «false kindness» behind the concept of familialism and how it can be appropriated by policy makers to justify the absence of comprehensive responses in terms of welfare provision in old age. All the analysis will include some comparative insights, taking as comparisons the european space and the South European countries in particular.

Impact of informal caregiving on caregivers wellbeing: gender differences

Larrañaga, Isabel

Health Departament, Basque Government San Sebastian, Spain

Martin, Unai

Sociology 2, Basque Country University Leioa, Spain

Begiristain, JMaria

*Health Departament, Basque Government
San Sebastian, Spain*

Valderrama, M.Jose

*Enfermeria, UPV
San Sebastian, Spain*

Arregi, Begoña

Sociology 2, UPV Laioa, Spain

Bacigalupe, Amai

*Sociology 2, UPV
Leioa, Spain*

Keywords

informal care, social support, health inequalities, Gender inequalities, Health-related quality of life

Background: Given the fact that informal caregiving has traditionally been provided by women, most caregiving-related studies have focused on women. However, as the population ages and demand for dependent elderly care increases, the number of males involved in caregiving activities has risen. Other studies suggest that female caregivers face higher levels of stress and report lower levels of well-being compared with male caregivers. Nonetheless, there is no answer to whether these gender disparities reflect mere gender differences concerning general well-being rather than caregiving-related issues. This paper describes informal caregivers' characteristics, quantifies the effect of caregiving activities on caregivers' health, and determines whether this effect differs by gender.

Methods: A descriptive study was carried out based on the Basque Health Survey 2002. Physical and mental health, use of health services, social health and health related quality of life (HRQL) indicators were compared among caregivers (n = 836) and non-caregivers (n = 5.706). Age-adjusted logistic regression models were applied to assess the association between caregiving and health status by sex and socioeconomic and occupational position.

Results: Female caregivers showed worse results in 6 out of 10 indicators compared with non-caregiving women, whereas male caregivers showed worse results in only 4 indicators compared with non-caregiving men. The association between caregiving and poor health results was stronger in women than in men, except for social health. When caregiving intensity was considered, greatly burdened men showed similar or even higher risk of poor HRQL than women (physical in men: OR = 3.0; CI 95% 1.4-6.3; women: OR = 2.3; CI 95% 1.5-3.5; mental in men: OR = 2.5; CI 95% 1.4-4.3; women: OR = 2.5; CI 95% 1.7-3.7) and lower social support (affective support in men: OR = 2.6; CI 95% 1.5-4.6; women: OR = 1.5; CI 95% 1.0-2.3). However, the risk of sedentariness, lack of sleep, greater use of health services and mental illness remained higher for female caregivers.

Conclusions: Caregiving damages the health of informal caregivers, but the risk among female caregivers is higher due to the greater intensity of caregiving burden. As mens caregiving burden increases, gender inequalities decrease or invert.

Intergenerational solidarity and parent-child proximity in Europe. A comparative analysis on the Gender and Generations Survey (GGS)

Mortelmans, Dimitri

Sociology, University of Antwerp Antwerpen, Belgium

Heylen, Leen

*Sociology, University of Antwerp
Antwerpen, Belgium*

Keywords

intergenerational solidarity, comparative analysis, generations and gender survey

The geographic proximity between parents and their adult children is a key element of intergenerational solidarity. Not only does the actual level of care between parents and adult children depend on this geographic proximity. The geographical distance can itself be considered as an expression of intergenerational solidarity. This geographical distance between parents and their adult children knew some major changes during the past decades. The most drastic change from the perspective of intergenerational solidarity is the decline in multigenerational households as well as the increase of people living alone, especially at old age. From a pessimistic perspective, these changes would reflect 'the decline of the family?'. On the other hand, more optimistic studies state that 'intimate but distant? relationships still allow for high levels of support. Furthermore there is a high degree of diversity in the geographical distance between parents and their adult children across Europe. Intergenerational co-residence is higher in the southern and eastern Europe, whereas in the northern and western Europe intergenerational co-residence as well as living close to one's parents is less likely. Generally, these changes raise the question whether the geographical distance between parents and their adult children (still) reflects intergenerational solidarity? To which degree does the potential need for support as well as the norms versus intergenerational support explain the geographic proximity? Does this differ within and between countries? Explicit attention is paid to the reciprocal nature of family relations as both the respondents need and the parental need are considered. Other features which are taken into account are the socio-economic resources, the marital history of both the respondent and the parents, the number of siblings, gender and age. For the analyses data from the Generations and Gender Survey are used. The cross-national nature of this data offers the possibility to test for macro differences with regard to geographic proximity and its antecedents within Europe since the countries strongly differ with respect to their culture, demography, political history and economic prosperity.

Intergenerational solidarity and social cohesion: the limits of private financial transfers within family

Fleury, Charles

Population et emploi, CEPS/INSTEAD

Differdange, Luxembourg

Borsenberger, Monique

Population et emploi, CEPS/INSTEAD

Differdange, Luxembourg

Keywords

social cohesion, private financial transfers, intergenerational solidarity, Family

In several European countries, ageing and the risk of conflict between generations create many concerns about social cohesion. The financing of pension regimes, based on repartition, is in the heart of the preoccupations. Societies are afraid that members of the new generations, less rich and less numerous than those of the previous generations, will refuse to pay for their predecessors and question the generational pact which has prevailed for more than half a century. Actually, many observers put this risk into perspective. They show that the public transfers to the elderly also favor the youngest generations, which benefit from generous private transfers within families. They demonstrate that in response to generous public transfers in their favor, older people informally proceed to a rebalancing, redistributing a part of their resources to their descendants. The aim of our presentation is to question this argument, by pointing out some of its limitations. Using the Luxembourgish household panel data about financial private transfers received by young households from their family, we will show that if private transfers can reduce intergenerational disparities, they contribute to increase inequality. For the most part, private transfers essentially benefit natives and the wealthiest categories. For a country like Luxembourg, where more than 40% of the population is from foreign country, this is an important fact. Indeed, we will show that immigrants, in particular those who come from Portugal (15% of the population) and those from countries outside EU15, are less susceptible to benefit from this kind of transfer, while their income, their level of schooling and their social and occupational status are weaker too. Our results, put in parallel with another European results, will lead us to identify certain limitations of the corporatist regimes in assuring social cohesion.

Intergenerational solidarity on the societal level in European countries

Kasearu, Kairi

Institute of Sociology and Social Policy, University of Tartu Tartu, Estonia

Kutsar, Dagmar

*Institute of Sociology and Social Policy, University of Tartu
Tartu, Estonia*

Keywords

intergenerational solidarity, Cross-national Comparison, social cohesion

The paper concentrates on intergenerational solidarity and how it is revealed on formal and informal levels across Europe. The intergenerational solidarity is understood as an indicator of social cohesion between generations influenced by normative, structural and functional factors of the society. The purpose of this paper is to investigate how changing social contexts affect social integration, well-being of different generations and solidarity between generations across European countries. It is supposed that the patterns of intergenerational solidarity vary within and between European countries according to diverse sociopolitical backgrounds, welfare systems and family cultures. We hypothesized that in Eastern-European countries compared to Western Europe intergenerational solidarity is lower on societal level while the intergenerational support flow is still important on the family level. The expectations and obligations regarding care giving and public support from welfare programs across generations in different countries is studied by using international datasets of the European Social Survey (Round 3).

Intergenerational Transfers, Life Course Events, and Social Inequality. A Longitudinal Comparison of Gifts and Bequests in Germany

Leopold, Thomas

*Nationales Bildungspanel NEPS, Universität Bamberg
Germany,*

Schneider, Thorsten

*Juniorprofessur für Soziologie mit Schwerpunkt Bildungsungleichheit im Lebenslauf (Vertretung), Universität Bamberg
Germany,*

Keywords

transfers, intergenerational solidarity, gifts, bequests

The paper addresses two deficits of the sociological literature on private financial transfers between the generations: the lack of a longitudinal perspective and the insufficient account for gifts as intergenerational transfers inter vivos. In Germany, gifts are highly private and leave more scope for decision-making than the regulated bequests. Thus, gifts are better suited to test theories on family solidarity and transfer behavior. Our analysis focuses on larger gifts, which parents and grandparents give to their children and grandchildren. To support the analysis with a comparative reference, we include bequests in order to highlight similarities and differences between both types of transfers. We refer to Szydlik's model of intergenerational solidarity on need and opportunity structures as a theoretical framework. In our account, bequeathing is characterized as behavior which is not necessarily purposive, highly restricted by normative and legal obligations, and cannot be reduced to an economic frame of reference. Gift-giving is assumed to be purposive action driven primarily by economic needs of the receivers, but also by non-material aspects of family ties. Hypotheses for both types of transfers are tested with retrospective data from the German Socio-Economic Panel (SOEP). Using event history models we investigate the effect of changes in the life course on the chances of receiving transfers. The analysis for bequests confirms the results of previous research: increased chances to receive an inheritance and increased amounts inherited for high social strata, late birth cohorts and persons with few siblings. Our analysis of gifts yields new results: women are considerably disadvantaged; in high status families gifts are more common, but the received amounts are lower (here, donees can expect an additional inheritance, whereas large gifts replace bequests in low status families); from a life course perspective, increased chances to receive a larger gift occur immediately after marriage and also after divorce. The discussion outlines an extended model for the explanation of transfers inter vivos, which broadens the scope of the analysis to include reciprocal aspects of intergenerational transfer behavior. Older generation's financial gifts are related to the younger generation's opportunities to offer instrumental transfers of help and care.

International retirement migration and ageing abroad: Life cycle perspectives on successful ageing

Kaiser, Claudia

Centre for Ageing and Society, Department of Gerontology, University of Vechta Vechta, Germany

Keywords

life cycle approach, International retirement migration, successful ageing, elderly Germans

International retirement migration has grown fast during the last decade. Retirement migration is conceptualized as a type of amenity-led migration resulting from the individual's strategy to improve his/her quality of life. In the search for better environments, elderly migrants prefer areas with climate benefits and attractive landscapes. These areas most often coincide with tourist destinations, especially in regions dominated by mass tourism. Since the rapid increase of international mobility in general and international tourism in particular, places in the Mediterranean (i.e. Spain, France, Italy or Portugal) but also around the world (like Thailand, South Africa or Florida) have become attractive retirement destinations for elderly Europeans.

After providing descriptive data on elderly Germans abroad, this paper will investigate retirement migration in a life-course perspective by contrasting the migrants' original decision to take up a retirement home abroad with their changing needs when growing older. It is therefore concerned with both the younger and later stages of old age. Three main aspects will be addressed:

- Which have been the motivations associated with the decision to take up residence abroad?
- How suitable are the migrants' present living environments with regard to the changing needs when growing older?
- Which are potential risk factors in the adjustment process to age-related problems?

The paper concludes with a look at the implications of the findings both for the individual retirement migrant but also for the destination areas.

Knowledge and information on ageing and gender: developing a contextual database at an European level to support policies formulation

Gomes, Inês

*Centro de Estudos de Sociologia da Universidade Nova de Lisboa, Universidade Nova de Lisboa
Lisbon, Portugal*

Fernandes, Ana

*Centro de Estudos de Sociologia da Universidade Nova de Lisboa, Universidade Nova de Lisboa
Lisbon, Portugal*

Keywords

Gender, ageing, comparative research, contextual determinants

Demographic ageing has been creating formidable challenges and new interrogations for economic development and social cohesion. The European Maggie project analyses indicators of quality of life among the population aged 65 and more years old to reveal gender gaps and their explaining factors. It focuses on changes due to renewal of cohorts. Quality of life is measured on health conditions, economic resources, family situation and social integration. On each of them, objective indicators of living conditions are confronted with perceptions by the persons of their own situation.

The analysis of the social contextual determinants for quality of life of the elderly has become a priority. The development of comparative approaches as a tool to map the European heterogeneity is crucial for the understanding of societal factors, like public policies, in the diversity of individual trajectories.

We aim to identify and analyse at an European level the main contextual determinants of the quality of life of the elderly, from a gender perspective, in order to provide answers for public policy development and gender equity goals. An analysis is conducted on the capacity that the actual international databases have to inform the ageing process from a gender perspective. Missing areas of information and other relevant methodological issues are discussed.

Liberating Age: Images of Ag(e)ing in Contemporary Film and Fiction

Eisner, Beate

English & American Studies, University of Potsdam Germany, <http://www.uni-potsdam.de>

Keywords

South Asians, Migration, cultural representations, Ag(e)ing

‘Old age is a gift from God when spent in dignity, as in this country. I prefer independent life. I like to live on my own instead of living with relatives.’

(Gopal Singh, age 72, Punjabi Sikh, Fremont, California; in Lamb 2007)

‘Are you teasing me or what, Manmohan? You know I do not like to follow these Western customs. But what else can one do when one is a foreigner in America and one’s daughter has insisted on marrying a local fellow?’

(70-year-old male protagonist in Boston, in Rishi Reddi’s ‘Justice Shiva Ram Murthy’, 2007)

The above quotations illustrate some of the complexities inherent in the process of aging in transnational conjunctures as it applies to contemporary South Asian elderly migrants in the United States. These aging migrants primarily immigrate late in life for purposes of family reunification and thus have to reconcile conflicting ideologies about traditional notions of aging in India and ‘American-style’ modes of aging in the ‘West’. This process of re-negotiating aging in the South Asian diaspora is a matter of public reflection both in the United States and in India and the twin phenomena of aging and migration are increasingly explored in contemporary film and fiction.

This paper examines how literary and cinematic narratives have represented issues such as acculturative experiences and intergenerational relationships of transnational aging migrants, thus facilitating an understanding of how the intense meanings accruing to aging and migration have engendered alternative, even liberating approaches to aging in the South Asian American diaspora.

Life extension as life long learning

Andersson, Janicke

SMI, Istitution for the study of Society and Welfare Norrköping, Sweden

Keywords

self- technologies, life-long learning, life-extension

The aim of this paper is to examine some questions about knowledge and the concept of 'lifelong learning' raised during the work with my thesis. Questions to be discussed are whether everyday knowledge and information about how one ought to live in order to obtain a healthier and longer life can be viewed as a form of 'life long learning?'. How can one interpret the field of life extension in aspects of education and governing strategies? With new technologies we are transforming the cyborg from the divergent to the normal. The study includes advisory literature from the 18th century till present times either written in, or translated to Swedish. In my thesis I explored discursive changes in conceptions of life course and ageing. In a sense life span embodies the boundaries of human existence, but furthermore, it symbolizes the system of reason of human existens in the name of the life-span. Hence, notions of the life span can reveal images and apprehensions of ageing and life itself. Meta level discourses of the life span provides information on apprehensions of the human existence. Historical handbooks, and literature on life-extension, provides interesting field for the study of ageing and humanity. My findings points out that we are approaching or constantly creating new ways of looking at and discipline the ageing process. The ageing process and the way to a longer life has become a field for educational strategies involving self technologies. Many of these technologies are founded on long lasting myths and legends that are constant even in contemporary advisory literature. The late modern model of advisory literature demands constant education and refection over life, identity and related fields. In this aspect our late modern lives have become a project of life long learning. Today we do not believe in pre-designated life-length we only believe in life extension. We do want the paradise but we want it here on earth, and we want to be in charge.

Life story in institutional contexts - looking for a past and a future

Ylilahti, Minna

*Department of social sciences and philosophy, University of Jyväskylä
Jyväskylä, Finland*

Keywords

life course, agency, rehabilitation, Biographical Work, life history

This paper focuses on describing the reflective storytelling of middle-aged rehabilitation customers. The data comes from a larger study of ageing workers experiences of rehabilitation and experienced situation in personal life course. The qualitative data includes interviews and other conversations of rehabilitation customers. Entering rehabilitation means that one's personal life, various circumstances in one's life history and assumed future are evaluated and focused on alongside the physical status. In this paper the narration of life will be approached from the point of view of agency, communication and recollection.

This type of agency opens up view on the human life course, self and personal history as a reflected and structured component of the self. Biographical agency is based on one's emotional experience of time and space in a social situation. In the context of interaction in rehabilitation the ways of framing one's personal history were connected to the relationship of one's current life situation and individual agency. Old age and future expectations were constructed by means of images of the physical body, capability and work. As emotional experience, aging seemed to concern feelings of insecurity, dependency but also freedom.

Loneliness and social isolation of older Poles

Kubicki, Pawel

Institute of Social Economy, Warsaw School of Economics Warsaw, Poland

Keywords

Social exclusion, Loneliness, elderly people

Aims:

- To recognize the problem of loneliness and isolation of older people in Poland
- To identify causes of loneliness and isolation of older people
- To understand the cultural differences of the loneliness and isolation
- To identify possibilities of overcoming loneliness and isolations of older persons

Methods:

- desk research
- Individual in-depth interviews with 15 older people over 65 years,
- 3 Focus groups with older people and service providers
- CATI representative sample (1000 persons) of older adults age 65+

Results:

- Research in progress (projected end date: IV/V 2009)
- Initial results point to a crucial role of the emotional state of seniors and their income level. These results have been checked for factors limiting loneliness, such as family contact, friends and hobbies.

Male Caregivers in Self-Help-Organizations for the Elderly

Braukmann, Stephanie

Fachbereich Sozialwesen, Universität Kassel Kassel, Germany

Keywords

Welfare State, Ageing Society, Male Caregivers

Germany as a democratic welfare state is subject to ongoing transformation processes including demographic change, increasing lifestyle diversity and shifting gender relations.

In view of this, both politics and the scientific approaches have become more attentive to the way the 'third' and 'fourth' ages of life are structured, giving rise to debates on the necessity of developing new ways of dealing with the increasing demand for care work, a field in which the resources and skills of the elderly themselves receive increasingly attention.

The proposed paper is based on the results of a qualitative study funded by the Fritz Thyssen Foundation which analyses the opportunities and risks presented by the convergence of newly re-structured social insurance systems in western welfare states with current demographic change.

The paper deals with voluntary care work provided by elderly citizens, with a particular focus on male caregivers, a subject in which until now scant research has been done in sociology, gerontology and gender studies. In-depth interviews carried out as part of the study with both male and female volunteers in self-help organisations for the elderly reveal that males engage in an unanticipated amount of reproductive labour in the voluntary sector.

Compared with previous studies on males caring for spouses, the reasons stated by our male interviewees for engaging in care-work areas different as the tasks and amount of care-work they carry out. However, our data also suggest an overlap in the statements made by the two groups, in particular when it comes to the interpretation and evaluation of reproductive labour by the interviewees, obviously influenced by their personal biographies and their male identities. In view of this, this paper will discuss this overlap in light of the qualitative studies carried out by Kirsi et al. in Finland on elder males giving care for their spouses. As well as delivering empirical results, the paper will discuss the research design applied to the study and theoretical implications for care work conceptions.

Multiple Older Parent-Adult Child Relations: Assessing between and within Family Variation in later Life

Mahne, Katharina

*German Ageing Survey, German Centre of Gerontology
Berlin, Germany*

Huxhold, Oliver

*German Ageing Survey, German Centre of Gerontology
Berlin, Germany*

Motel-Klingebiel, Andreas

*Research, German Centre of Gerontology
Berlin, Germany*

Keywords

transfers, intergenerational relations, variance

The parent-child bond in later life is generally characterized as close and supportive. Although it is assumed that there is a huge variety of relationships between older parents and their adult children, most of the research up to date examined particular parent-child dyads or children grouped as a composite. Therefore, this study attends to multiple parent-adult child relations, and focuses on variation between and within families. On the one hand, emotional closeness is assessed as an indicator for the overall quality of the relationship. According to Ward (2008), mixed quality of parent-adult child relations within families can be expected as a common pattern. In addition, monetary transfers towards children are examined. It is well established, that parental resources, children's needs as well as relationship quality contribute to the probability of transfers (Motel & Szydlik, 1999; Motel-Klingebiel & Mahne 2009). Given the fact, that increasing numbers of siblings lower a child's likelihood of receiving a transfer, it is assumed that within family variation concerning transfers is lower than between family variance.

Analyses are based on the second wave of the German Ageing Survey (DEAS), a nationally representative multi-purpose study of the German population aged 40 and older. The subsample for our analyses consists of participants with at least two adult, non-cohabiting children, resulting in a number of 3,660 dyads. Variance component analysis is used in a multilevel intercepts only model.

Results show significant between and within variance for both emotional closeness and transfers. Between level variance is higher than within level variance each with closeness and transfers, pointing to different family patterns. Looking at the within level, variance is higher for emotional closeness than for transfers. Therefore, it is assumed that it is more common to experience different relationship qualities, whereas parents tend to treat their children equally in terms of financial support and that transfer probabilities are primarily based on the older givers' resources. Such results back the assumption of an amplification of social inequality by private intergenerational transfer within the family.

Norwegian Sandwich. On the prevalence and consequences of family and work role squeezes in midlife

Daatland, Svein Olav

*NOVA, Norwegian Social Research
Oslo, Norway*

Veenstra, Marijke

*NOVA, Norwegian Social Research
Oslo, Norway*

Lima, Ivar A

*NOVA, Norwegian Social Research
Oslo, Norway*

Keywords

Midlife, Role conflicts, Family care, Generations

Population ageing challenge profoundly the current balance between generations. Governments are responding with policies to promote active ageing (i.e. later retirement), intergenerational solidarity (i.e. family care), and equal (gender) opportunity. These ideals may conflict in midlife when family obligations can be hard to reconcile with paid work. Yet we know little about the prevalence of role squeezes, and even less about the consequences. This paper describes the prevalence of different forms of family and work configurations in the Norwegian case, and analyses adaptive strategies and social outcomes.

Analyses are based on data from the joint NorLAG and LOGG studies (n=ca 15 200, age 18-84).

Preliminary findings indicate that around 75 % of the population aged 35-50 are located in-between children and parents, falling to about 50% in the mid-50ies, of which four out of ten have parents in need of help. Most of them are still in paid work and seem able to reconcile work and family obligations, although some – mostly women (daughters) – adapt by assuming part-time work. Only few have both parents and children in need of care at the same time – 6-7 per cent at the highest between the ages of 35 and 45.

The paper also discusses the extent to which paid work is a burden or a relief for family carers, and more generally, what the consequences of role squeezes are for social integration, quality of life, and health.

Occupation, health behaviour and mortality

Seitsamo, Jorma

Promotion of Work Ability and Health, Finnish Institute of Occupational Health Helsinki, Finland

von Bonsdorff, Monika

*Promotion of Work Ability and health, Finnish Institute of Occupational Health
Helsinki, Finland*

Keywords

elderly worker, ageing, lifestyle

There is strong evidence that even though educational level is associated to mortality and morbidity, a large proportion of differences in mortality are explained by health behaviour and other lifestyle factors. The associations are complex, and more studies are needed to clarify the role of each factor.

The purpose of this study was to examine longitudinally the associations between occupation, work characteristics, functional capacity and health behaviour of middle-aged employees and all cause mortality.

The study material is comprised of a longitudinal questionnaire study of Finnish municipal workers which was conducted at the Finnish Institute of Occupational Health in 1981-1997. At the baseline, all participants (n=6257) were occupationally active. In 2009, the vital status and dates of death were added to the data. By then, 2020 respondents had died.

The dependent variable was the time from 1981 to the year of death or to the end of the follow-up. The measure of functional capacity covered issues of managing daily activities. Health behaviour (i.e. alcohol consumption, use of tobacco, physical exercise), characteristics of work (responsibility for others, physical workload), marital status, occupational group, and the age, at which a person began his/her work career were also used in the analysis.

Kaplan-Mayer method was used to estimate the survivorship functions for the levels of occupational group. The hazard ratios of all cause mortality were estimated using Cox proportional hazard model with time varying covariates.

The results showed that there were strong differences in mortality between occupational groups. When other factors were added into the models, the role of occupation diminished and the strongest predictors of mortality proved to be functional capacity and smoking. Also work characteristics (among men) and marital status (among women) were important.

It seems evident that occupation alone does not explain mortality. Health behaviour and functional capacity are more important. The significant role of mental characteristics of the work suggests that also working life qualities may have long-term effects on mortality.

Old age and the city. Social change, ageing and old age in an urban environment

Machado, Paulo

*Division of Social Ecology, National Laboratory of Civic Engineering
Lisbon, Portugal*

Keywords

urban places, ageing process, socio-ecological environment, Social change

The scientific concern of the paper is to render the ageing process of the Lisbon population and the social conditions of old age within this context more intelligible, by delving into the social change factors attached to it. The initial question mirrors this concern: how are social changes suffered by the Portuguese society and leading to the ageing of its population and to a change in the social position of the elderly reflected in the City?

The theoretical assumption underlying the research postulates that the ageing process of societies is currently an element that generates uncertainty in present times and a risk generating factor for future societies.

The paper puts forward a multifarious proposal to describe the social framework of ageing and of old age in the city of Lisbon. Several syntagmatic axis illustrating the relationship between the elderly and the City are equally presented. It is an interpretation puzzle on social change and on how the latter is shown by this urban territory, particularly in the aspects immediately associated to the residing elderly population.

The results stress the singularity of the ageing phenomena of the Lisbon population and identify a social framework that will eventually require new social and technical responses to mitigate the risks deriving from ageing in the city.

Some cross-national figures are presented to demonstrate the effectiveness of the urban ageing process in the European countries.

Particularities of Russian Pensioners' Living Standards

Lezhnina, Julia

*Department of socio-economic research, Institute of Sociology, Russian Academy of Science
Moscow, Russia*

Keywords

Poverty, Russian pensioners, living standards

Aging population characterized by increasing rate of population that needs state support and decreasing rate of those who provide it, leads not only to raising the burden of state social expenditures, but also to drop in the level of pensioners' support. Such a situation raises actual risk for elderly population to find themselves among those ones with poor quality of life. In Russia this risk is especially actual.

Based on materials of three INTAS projects devoted to the problems of social policy (1995-2006) the report provides the results of analyses of empiric data including:

? Russian Longitudinal Monitoring Survey, panel research, 2005-2007 (more than 12000 respondents every year);

? three pan-Russian surveys (2006, 2008 and 2009) (nearly 2000 respondents each of them).

According to the results:

- The majority of pensioners due to the low government transfers is concentrated in low-income segments of the population that does not guarantee them an adequate level of consumption, including the possibility to use vital services, for example health care;
- Russian pensioners' health is much worse than the health of their peers from the developed countries (Euro-Quol (EQ-5D) methodic was used along with other methods): in Great Britain 36.5% of people aged 61 are healthy, in Russia - 8.2%. So health of this group requires additional costs for treatment and care;
- Pensioners' standard of living decreases also because of exhaustion of resource potential, particularly durable goods that can't be renewed because of lack of money;
- Reduction of contacts after retirement reduces access to resources of social networks and possibility of solving some problems with their help that negatively affects the living standards;
- Due to the widening of the gap between salaries and pension payments pensioners turn from «providers» of the households (as, in some cases, it was in the 1990's) into households' «dependant load» and remarkably reduce its standard of living.

In general the report indicates that bad economic situation of Russian pensioners is a bright demonstration of disability of social policy to fulfill its liabilities. By the way this situation has been only worsening in current world economic crises.

Past inheritances and inheritance expectations in Europe

Vogel, Claudia

Centre for Research on Ageing and Society, University of Vechta Vechta, Germany

Keywords

international comparison, SHARE, inheritance, old age saving, intergenerational transfers

The global crisis of the financial markets has not only destroyed assets worth of billions of Euros but also inheritance expectations to a comparable extent. This has clearly negative consequences for those who rely on their family's fortunes as provision for one's old age. Past inheritances contribute to old age saving substantially as findings from the German Ageing Survey show: among the German population aged 40 to 85 about half reported receipt of an inheritance amounting to 70 000 Euro on average. Furthermore, beneficiaries are often already retired themselves when they inherit, due to the observable increase in life expectancy.

The focus of this paper is to compare past inheritances and inheritance expectations throughout Europe and to discuss the relevance of inheritances for old age saving. The Survey of Health, Ageing and Retirement in Europe (SHARE) contains strictly comparative data for the elderly population of 15 European countries from Scandinavia to the Mediterranean and provides a unique opportunity for studying inheritances and its most important correlates in the population aged 50 and above.

Patterns of Intergenerational Solidarity in Europe

Raab, Marcel

Sociology (Chair of Demography) / National Educational Panel Study, University of Bamberg Bamberg, Germany

Ruland, Michael

*National Educational Panel Study / Research Department E1 - Education and Employment over the Life Course, University of Bamberg / Institute for Employment Research (Nuremberg)
Bamberg, Germany*

Schmidt, Christopher

Sociology (Chair of Demography), University of Bamberg Bamberg, Germany

Keywords

intergenerational solidarity, parent-child relations, crowding out, welfare/solidarity regimes

From cross-national studies like OASIS (Old age and autonomy: The role of service systems and intergenerational family solidarity) and SHARE (Survey of Health, Ageing and Retirement in Europe) a large body of literature dedicated to international comparisons in the field of intergenerational solidarity has emanated over the last decade. With regard to the crowding-in versus the crowding-out argument a lot of articles classify the European states in accordance to the extended welfare regime classification of Esping Andersen and hence distinguish between the 'social democratic' states of Scandinavia, the 'conservative' countries of Central Europe and the 'family-centered' Southern European nations.

Although the classification initially was developed for the comparison of welfare states it is applied by a lot of researchers in the context of intergenerational solidarity. Surprisingly, this often happens without theoretical reasoning and multivariate empirical validation. Our paper aims to tackle these two lacks.

Motivated by Reher's article on family ties in Western Europe, we are questioning the suitability of Esping-Andersen's classification in order to separate intergenerational solidarity regimes in Europe. Instead of his classification we suggest a much simpler division into just two regions: Southern European countries on the one hand and the center and the north of Europe on the other hand.

To uncover these intergenerational solidarity regimes within families in Europe, we use SHARE-data and hierarchical cluster analysis. The selection of cluster variables is based on the theoretical and empirical considerations of Bengtson and colleagues. Due to data restrictions we focus on the structural, the normative and the functional dimension of solidarity. Our findings suggest that Reher's rather simple approach is more appropriate to cluster European countries than Esping-Andersen's classification. Although the statistical stopping rules favor a two-cluster solution our results do not completely contradict the classical 'North - Continental - South'-classification. Hence, we argue that researchers should not use any classification without context-specific theoretical arguments and/or empirical findings justifying their decision.

Perceptions of pension systems and expectations of own retirement ? A pan-European comparison

Hofaecker, Dirk

Institute of Family Research, Otto-Friedrich University Bamberg Bamberg, Germany

Heien, Thorsten

Social Policy Research, TNS Infratest Munich, Germany

Frommert, Dina

*Referat Befragungen zur Alterssicherung, DRV Bund / German Pension Fund
Berlin, Germany*

Keywords

demographic ageing, retirement, attitudes, survey data

In recent years, the topic of early retirement has loomed large on the European public policy agenda. As recent data by Eurostat (2006) confirm, half of all men and women in Europe leave active employment before age 61, i.e. well before reaching mandatory national retirement ages. The strains which this trend has posed on the sustainability of national pension systems has led to numerous political reform attempts to reverse the current early exit trend, mostly through cutback in the attractiveness of early retirement options and pension system generosity. By these means, the ambitious goals of the European Union's Barcelona target (i.e. to lift average retirement by five years) and the Stockholm target (i.e. to raise employment rates among workers aged 55-64 to an average level of 50%) are to be reached by the year 2010. Difficulties in reaching this aim, however, indicate that a mere shift in pension system generosity may not suffice to fully reverse early retirement.

One possible explanation of this discrepancy may be that political reform proposals yet are not in line with European citizen's perceptions, expectations and wishes regarding their own retirement transition. Against this background, our paper intends to provide an up-to-date overview of attitudes towards retirement within Europe. Using most recent data from the Eurobarometer studies (Eurobarometer 60.3 respectively Candidate Countries Eurobarometer 2003.5) as well as the European Social Survey (Wave 3), we will analyse at which ages European citizens wish and expect to retire, which type of retirement transition they favour (full vs. gradual) and under which conditions they would be willing to delay their retirement plans.

Following this descriptive overview, we will then turn to a comprehensive analysis of the determinants that influence individual retirement preferences, ranging from individual level factors (such as age, employment status, education) as well as factors of the societal context (such as characteristics of national welfare states and pension systems).

Based on these results, we shall finally provide a critical review of the degree to which current retirement expectations correspond with European pension reform programmes and what measures could be taken to better reconcile both.

Poland: No Country for Old Men? Or: on social construction of old age

Stypinska, Justyna

Sociology, Jagiellonian University

Krakow, Poland

Keywords

Social constructionism, old age, typifications

?Social life and individual action are grounded in meaning: yet meaning is always and everywhere a cultural construct?

Max Weber

Age, next to sex and race, is one of the social characteristics of human species, which is instantly identifiable in the process of social interaction. Although, we are not immediately able to guess the age of the partner, we are capable of discerning whether he or she is young, old, or middle age. At the same time cognitive ?typifications? , such as ?poor old lady?, ?young fellow? or ?young greenhorn?, which influence the course of interaction are being used.

Next to the interactionist perspective an institutional approach should be considered, since the chronological age is one of the social characteristics permanently used in various databases, such as those in health care system, insurance companies, banks, schools, associations etc. The omnipresent bureaucratic system is largely contributing to creation of age-related society, where being 30 or 55 years old precisely delineates the position of an individual in the society, and the types of activities she or he can carry out within the normative social order.

The paper attempts to answer the following research questions: What does it mean to be old in Polish society? In what way is old age being constructed in the course of social interactions? What are the major areas where old age is being constructed? What are the main social institutions involved in the process of constructing the age?

The paper will provide the reader with theoretical background to the research questions, but more importantly, it will present some empirical evidence . ?Gazeta Wyborcza?, Polish daily newspaper, started a series of articles concerned with old age, which was in passionately commented by net surfers. This vast amount of ad hoc empirical material was later analyzed and constituted for empirical evidence for this paper. Being aware that this sort of empirical research would not satisfy stringent methodologists, I nevertheless decided to incorporate it into the text as it embraces the practicalities of the problem in question, and not only the theoretical peregrinations.

Positive and negative impact of caregiving for elderly parents on working carers - an ethnic comparison

Halperin, Dafna

*The Center for Research and Study of Aging, University of Haifa
Haifa, Israel*

Lowenstein, Ariela

*The Center for Research and Study of Aging, University of Haifa
Haifa, Israel*

Katz, Ruth

*The Center for Research and Study of Aging, University of Haifa
Haifa, Israel*

Keywords

Caregiving, Elderly parents, Ethnic, Role balance, Work-family conflict

Introduction: This research examined the impact of elder care on working carers in mid life in two ethnic groups in Israel. Specifically, impact on life and job satisfaction. The increase in the aging population, caregiving role for an elderly parent is added to other roles of midlife adults. In Israel, as in other Western countries, changes in family structures are occurring, even though, Israel is still a familistic society. The Jewish and Arab populations are similar in some aspects like familial traditions and filial obligations regarding elder care, but different in other respects such as personal resources or utilization of formal services. Additionally, the Arabs are a society in transition from a traditional, rural and familistic community moving towards modernity.

Design and Method: The sample included 326 male and female employees, Jewish and Arabs caring for an elderly parent. Data were collected through personal interviews with a structured questionnaire which included the following areas: work-family conflict, role balance, job satisfaction, life satisfaction, demographics and health condition.

Results: The results revealed that while the work-family conflict was negatively correlated with life satisfaction and job satisfaction, the role balance was positively correlated only with life satisfaction. Moreover, significant differences were found between the two groups. Among the Arabs, the work-family conflict was higher, and the role balance lower, compared to the Jewish sample. In addition, job satisfaction was higher among the Arabs, but non significant differences on life satisfaction were found.

Conclusion: The main findings point to the positive as well as the negative impact of combining work and care, and ethnic differences in this context. The changes occurring in the Arab society may explain the higher level of work-family conflict, There is a need to help family members in caring for their elders. Therefore, we have to develop new policy on the state level, as in the workplace. Moreover, there is a greater need to expand and develop more formal services for working carers in the Arab population.

Quality of employment for older workers in Europe

Kovács, Ilona

*Social Sciences, SOCIUS-ISEG-UTL
Lisbon, Portugal*

Cerdeira, Maria da Conceição

*Social Sciences, SOCIUS-ISEG-UTL
Lisbon, Portugal*

Keywords

active ageing, Quality of employment, Social models

Quality of employment for older workers in Europe

The demographic pressure and the sustainability of the social protection systems put the increase of older workers employment at the top of the EU political agenda. Recent data point out that the employment increase of the 55-64 age group has been one of the most dynamic aspects of the EU labour market, rising 7.8 percent from 2000 to 2007. However, there is a great ignorance about the quality of jobs held by this age group. The early retirements are often underpinned by a speech holding older workers culpable for not being able to adapt to technological and organizational changes. The strong asymmetries in the employment rates among European countries refute such simplistic explanations suggesting, rather, the importance of the different national approaches to active ageing. This paper has a purpose to explore these questions analysing some of the dimensions of the job quality of the older workers, using results of the fourth European Working Conditions survey carried out by the European Foundation for the Improvement of Living and Working Conditions in 2005, in 31 European countries. The results show that there are great differences between countries. These differences are closely related with the specificity of national institutions and social models.

Quality of Life in Ageing Societies: Italy, Portugal and Turkey -Cross-country Comparisons of Conditions of Elderly

Arun, Özgür

*Sociology, Middle East Technical University
Ankara, Turkey*

Cevik, Aylin

*Sociology, Middle East Technical University
Ankara, Turkey*

Keywords

Portugal, ageing, Italy, quality of life, Turkey

In the world, the changing in demographical structure toward increasing the older population has influenced individuals, families, communities as well as societies. Therefore, it can be said that ageing is both individual and social phenomena. In this sense, not only the individuals but also families, communities and societies have been faced with ageing phenomena.

It is well-known that Western countries meet with ageing earlier than Turkey. ?For instance, Sweden has undergone ageing process in 85 years, France in 115 years. The latest prediction appreciate that Turkey will undergo the ageing process in 15-20 years.? (National Research Council, 2001). In this sense, could we operationalize the conditions of elderly in Turkey that has rapid ageing process with the help of the other countries having different experiences of ageing? Has the ageing that changes from individual to individual exhibited different characteristics in each society or are there any similarities among the countries in terms of ageing process? Does the quality of life of elderly give us a clue to grasp the conditions of ageing process in Turkey with comparing Italy and Portugal that has different stories of ageing?

In this study, the quality of life of elderly in three aging countries, which are Italy, Portugal and Turkey, will be tried to compare and with the help of this comparisons we attempt to display the conditions of elderly in the countries having the different ageing process. These countries are chosen with respect to their proportion of elderly population in the Mediterranean region and will be analyze by using data of European Quality of Life Survey 2004.

Reciprocal Social Support in Older Adults: Secular Trends and Longitudinal Changes over a 16-year Follow-Up

Lyyra, Tiina-Mari

*the Finnish Center for Interdisciplinary Gerontology, University of Jyväskylä
Jyväskylä, Finland*

Lyyra, Anna-Liisa

*Department of psychology, University of Jyväskylä
Jyväskylä, Finland*

Lumme-Sandt, Kirsi

*School of Public Health, University of Tampere
Tampere, Finland*

Heikkinen, Riitta-Liisa

*the Finnish Center for Interdisciplinary Gerontology, University of Jyväskylä
Jyväskylä, Finland*

Keywords

social support, longitudinal study, cohort study

Background: Studies of long duration and cohort comparisons offer the opportunity to determine whether there are changes in reciprocal social support in older people and to study different cohorts of older subjects at the same chronological age. Making use of gerontological population studies in Jyväskylä, Finland we investigated secular and longitudinal changes in reciprocal social support in 65-74-year-old men and women.

Methods. 362 persons born in 1919-1923 were interviewed in 1988, 1996 and 2004. Longitudinal analyses were conducted in a 16-year follow-up in three measurement points. 635 men and women aged 65 to 74 years (born in 1914-1923) participated in baseline study in year 1988. From those, in the second interview occasion in year 1996, 410 men and women participated and in year 2004 260 took part in the study. Reciprocal social support was studied on the basis of the frequency seeing one's children and grandchildren; and perceptions of the adequacy of these contacts and by asking the respondents how often and in how many different tasks they helped someone.

Results: Cohort comparisons showed that the frequency of seeing one's children and grandchildren had decreased in the most recent cohort, and the number of contacts was considered inadequate. Longitudinal analyses showed that although meaning of children as the closest persons increased, the meeting with them became sparser. Helping others is more common in the recent cohort, but in longitudinal analyses it decreased with advanced age.

Discussion: Finnish people at retirement provide social support more readily than before, but they do not get social support as much as they want from their offsprings. This might indicate that in an individualistic society instrumental help is given when needed, but informal intergenerational interaction is not valued as such. There is a need for actions to further promote the intergenerational exchange in older adults both in individual and societal level.

Recruitment across ethnicity and nationality in elder care

Rostgaard, Tine

Social Policy, SFI - The Danish National Centre for Social Research Copenhagen, Denmark

Keywords

Migration, care workers, ethnicity

Danish municipalities seek to overcome shortage of staff in the elder care sector amongst other by recruiting care workers among the ethnic population in Denmark and across the borders. The article investigates the municipal recruitment strategies and practices as well as the experiences of top and middle managers in terms of care workers' skills and ability to work in a Danish care culture.

The findings show that how and whether the care organisations decide to 'do ethnicity' and 'do nationality' differs greatly between organisations. Recruitment from cross-border countries might be accompanied by extensive language courses and assistance to get settled, but to a lesser extent includes considerations about national care culture specificities. In contrast, there is somewhat more awareness about cross-cultural differences between care workers of Danish and non-Danish ethnic origin. Findings also confirm that care work requires basic skills such as language skills but also a thorough understanding of cross-national and cross-cultural care cultures.

The article is based on interviews with top and middle managers and care staff in 3 municipalities in Denmark.

Representations of elderly in Lithuanian media

Rapoliene, Grazina

Sociology, Vilnius University Vilnius, Lithuania

Keywords

Family, income, Mass Media, Lithuania, elderly

Relevance. Research problem. According to the ethno-linguistic vitality theory, the strength of social groups, apart from other factors, is defined by the institutional support and especially by the representation in the media. The media reflects and shapes public opinion and attitudes. How are the identities of elderly reflected and constructed in the Lithuanian media?

The objective of this research is to sketch a portrayal of elderly represented in Lithuanian media.

Data: 1106 publications of 2007 mentioning elderly people on the internet portal Delfi in Lithuanian were studied. The hits with the keywords old, elderly, pensioner, old age, ageing, old man (woman), etc were analysed. Some one third of the selected texts were from the same portal Delfi, other were extracted from regional newspapers (Klaipeda and Kauno diena), news agency ELTA and other.

Research method. The analysis was carried out using content analysis software Hamlet: establishing the frequency of the most commonly used keywords. Also, with the help of cluster analysis the contexts related to elderly people were singled out.

Research results and discussion. When describing elderly people, now more often than in the past the words old man, old woman are preferred, referring to the age of the person or the family status (those who have grandchildren) and not the words pensioner (male or female) that have a connotation of a burden to the society.

Contrary to the trends in the USA, the representation of women in the analysed material was more frequent than the men.

In the cluster text analysis dendogram the relationship between the keywords pajam* (income) and senatv* (old age) was demonstrated. The topic of pensions is dominant in the texts but it is disclosed without mentioning elderly people themselves as if pension issues are more relevant to the employed rather than pensioners. The fact that old age people were not mentioned in the publications discussing pension issues demonstrates that their role is underestimated in our society.

Resources, evaluations and social contexts - diversity and inequality in later life in a multi-level perspective

Motel-Klingebiel, Andreas

*German Centre of Gerontology, German Centre of Gerontology
Berlin, Germany*

Huxhold, Oliver

*German Centre of Gerontology, German Centre of Gerontology
Berlin, Germany*

Keywords

social inequality, quality of life, Standard of Living, ageing in context

Socio-economic status and resources and evaluations are pre-conditions for quality of life, autonomy and life planning in later life. The changing balance between age groups in ageing societies lead to a re-allocation of status, goods and positions - and therefore to a shift in inequality patterns. It also may lead to changes in trajectories into later life and new dynamics in later life courses. This is true for objective resources as well as for subjective evaluations and expectations of future dynamics. Both shape older people's behaviour in consumption and social participation but e.g. also influence retirement decisions, saving behaviour and social relations. These evaluations are connected to standards of comparisons on different societal levels. Hence, analyses must take into account the multi-level context of national points of reference as well as municipalities, neighbourhoods, social networks, birth cohorts and life courses. This presentation will, firstly, review the discussion on diversity and inequality dynamics in later life, discuss concepts and measures, and will, secondly, assess to what extent such dynamics in later life are effected by the dynamics of contexts. Empirical findings from multi-level analyses in a cohort-sequential and longitudinal perspective will be presented. Empirical analyses from prove independent impact of different context levels and their development over time on objective and subjective measures of economic well-being (and others) and its future development. This presentation will apply cross-sectional and longitudinal data from the German Ageing Survey.

Reversing early retirement: Different patterns on the same trend

Spross, Cornelia

International Comparisons and European Integration, Institute for Employment Research/ Institut für Arbeitsmarkt- und Berufsforschungs (IAB) Nuernberg, Germany

Kraatz, Susanne

FH, Fachhochschule des Bundes Mannheim, Germany

Keywords

Conservative welfare states, European comparison, Early retirement, Older workers

The labour market situation of older workers in Europe has increased over the past years. Most countries have reversed the trend of early retirement towards a strategy of active ageing by implementing reforms to change the current early exit pathways in order to reintegrate older people in the labour market, but with differences in the timing and reform process. However, the employment upswing of older workers cannot only be related to such political factors. Other factors like economic frame conditions or the institutional setting, i.e. the availability of other regulations to favour the early leave through other benefit systems have to be taken into consideration to identify differences among countries. With this deeper view, the achievements of the successful countries must be seen under another perspective. In a first part, this contribution will shortly focus on these issues.

Nonetheless, the differences concerning the development and the reversal of the early retirement trend among different types of welfare states are already known (e.g. Maltby et al., 2004). More of interest are the distinctions among countries of one type of welfare states, in particular the conservative ones. They show less progress in reintegrating older workers in the labour market compared to social-democratic and liberal countries, where early retirement never played that important role. The development in the conservative countries followed a different pattern instead: The focus laid on the use of passive security measures rather than active labour market measures. Moreover, structural problems on the labour market were solved by reducing the labour force over early retirement. However, the highly practiced use of such instruments led to a dilemma: A reversal of this trend was hard to achieve because of the deeply rooted attitudes and interests as well as the acquired social rights of social partners, employers and employees together. The second part of this contribution is going to concentrate on the differences concerning the trend reversal of early retirement in three conservative welfare states, namely Germany, the Netherlands and Austria.

Settings that make users: An ethnographic account of telecare for the elderly

Sánchez Criado, Tomás

Departamento de Psicología Básica, Universidad Autónoma de Madrid Madrid, Spain

Casián Yde, Nizaiá

Departament de Psicologia Social, Universitat Autònoma de Barcelona Bellaterra, Cerdanyola del Vallès, Spain

López Gómez, Daniel

Estudis de Psicologia i Ciències de l'Educació, Universitat Oberta de Catalunya Barcelona, Spain

Keywords

users, elderly, telecare, Ethnography

From the point of view of developers, designers, providers and policy makers 'the user' seems to be the key element in telecare services. In this paper we would like to discuss this assumption by presenting preliminary results from an ethnographic research currently being held in two telecare services of the same provider in Catalunya and Madrid (Spain), as part of the EFORTT-FP7 project, devoted to the study of the implications of the introduction of remote care technologies worn, installed or embedded in the homes of older citizens. During the information-acquisition-installation process of every telecare service (held by providers, the future user and family members) both providers and installers constantly stress the importance of 'the user'. It is him or her who must want the service and sign the contract, with whom the particular home location of the device has to be negotiated; it is 'the user' who has to communicate his or her needs, illnesses, expectations about the service; and it is ultimately him or her who has to operate the service. That is, everything is set for and from the user. Through some ethnographic examples of home telecare device settings, in this paper we would like to show how a series of elements are arranged around the future user as a sort of choreography, an almost dramaturgical setting that is being performed around the person, configuring him or her as the main character. What we want to put forward is that the process of setting the device is not a mere technical activity of placing the device inside the home and making it work. In it the future user has to negotiate plenty of things with relatives, caregivers and telecare technicians, such as rhythms of life, the location of the device and its relationship with different spaces of the dwelling or the relationships of the device with other objects in the house and other technologies. Our empirical insight is that through the technical configuration of the service, what might actually be configured is 'the user'. Hence, maybe it is not the device but the user what is set.

Sexuality, Age and Care in an Inner City Borough

Cronin, Ann

*Sociology, University of Surrey
Guildford, Surrey, UK*

King, Andrew

Faculty of Arts and Social Sciences, Kingston University Kingston upon Thames, UK

Keywords

Sexuality, care, ageing

This paper focuses on the complex interrelationship between sexuality, gender, caring and community amongst a sample of older lesbian, gay, and bisexual (LGB) adults, aged 50-73, living in an inner-city borough in the UK. Drawing on qualitative research data obtained as part of a collaborative research project between academic researchers and a local authority equality team, it focuses on quality of life issues, institutional support and/or barriers to accessing care in later life experienced by this group of residents. To this end, the paper contributes to a small but growing body of research that has sought to increase understandings of sexual diversity in later life. However, rather than adopting an approach, which may view sexuality as a 'problem' in later life, or another sociological variable that needs to be explored, the paper argues that older LGB adults experiences indicate important issues relating to care, support, community and social networks applicable to all adults, whatever their sexual orientation. Indeed, the paper argues that rather than marginalising their experiences, the biographical narratives of older LGB adults can inform sociological debates concerning ageing in contemporary, late modern society, whilst simultaneously extending our understandings of what it is to age. The paper concludes, therefore, with recommendations for both policy makers and practitioners who are concerned about sexuality and care in later life, together with sociologists concerned with gerontology more generally.

Stability, adaptability and fragility of the elderly care "configurations" over time: in Belgium, 1994-2002

Masuy, Amandine

Unité d'Anthropologie et de Sociologie, Université Catholique de Louvain Belgium,

Keywords

Belgium, care configuration, longitudinal analysis, informal care, intergenerational solidarities

In the ageing Europe of today, one of the key issues is to ensure sustainable community care for the elderly. If the family remains, most of the time, the first and the main care provider, the care 'configuration' will depend on the needs (health status, age, etc. ), the resources (presence of spouse, children, formal care services, etc.) of the elderly and their evolution over time (declining health or acute disease, lost of the partner, etc.).

The originality of this paper is twice. First, it uses Belgian panel data to study informal care. Second, it studies changes of care 'configuration' rather than changes in a specific care characteristic.

This research uses nine waves of the Panel Study of Belgian Households (1994-2002) to study the determinants of changes in family care configuration over time. The study sample is restricted to the 639 panel-respondents aged 65 or more in 1994 and having received care from their spouse or children at any wave of the survey.

In the first part, we will present and discuss a typology of care 'configuration' based on the number of effective carers, the kind of activities concerned (ADL, IADL, both), the relationship with the elderly (spouse, daughter, son) and the use or not of formal care as a complement.

In the second part, we will try to explain why some care configurations are more stable over time than others. We will also try to identify the determinants of changes of the unstable configurations and to assess whether changes can be considered as indicator of adaptability or fragility of the informal care network.

Preliminary analyses show that 85 percent of the sample received care for more than one wave. Among them, 79 percent experiment changes in one or another care characteristic. Changes in care type (informal, formal or mixed) are the most frequent. The number of carers tends to increase with the intensity of care 'between waves' care division (replacement of a sole carer by another) is less frequent than 'within wave' care division (repartition of care load at a given wave).

Storytelling, ageing and ethnicity in a rural Tornedalen, North Sweden

Tapio, Tarja

*Philosophy and Social Sciences, University of Jyväskylä
Jyväskylä, Finland*

Keywords

ageing, ethnicity, storytelling, Tornedalen

In my paper I am going to illustrate the way storytelling is used as a research method in researching ageing and ethnicity based on values and norms adapted significantly in the context of the traditional way of life in Tornedalen. The research took place in a rural village in North Sweden, in which people belong to an ethnic minority called Tornedalers. I have used storytelling as a method for several reasons. Understanding ethnicity is crucial in understanding resources of everyday life of aged, though it is problematic to ask older people about ethnicity since the term ethnicity is not commonly used in the context of the everyday life. Therefore, stories are viewed as knowledge rooted on collective memory of the local generation (Jyrkämä 1995), which participated the research providing information considering elements of which values and norms are consisted.

Secondly, the mother language spoken in the village in which the research took place is an oral language. Therefore even though participants speak meänkieli daily, they can not read or write it fluently or at all. Also they feel that they are unable to express their experiences and knowledge based on Tornedalen way of life appropriately in majority's terms. Therefore using storytelling in a native mother language includes empowering aims. Thirdly, participation in the process provided an opportunity to enjoy the flow of the traditional storytelling and commemorating together. This was an important point in the structurally aging village in which every third inhabitant is retired and living alone in their own house.

Seven older Tornedalers participated in the research process that follows John Heron's (1996) co-operative inquiry principles. Thus the contents or the plots of the stories or narrative processes are not directly concerned as data as they would be in the case of qualitative or narrative study. Storytellers have reflected on the main research themes that emerged during storytelling in subsequent group interviews. Several crucial elements for understanding resources for everyday life of aged in Tornedalen emerged on which norm and value based ethnicity is interwoven, for example 'connection with nature', which was the key theme of the research.

Strategies for promoting active ageing in Europe: a review of the literature

Cancio, Teresa

CIES, ISCTE

Lisboa, Portugal

Keywords

active ageing, attitudes to retirement, public policies on ageing, age management practices

In the context of the ageing of the working population in Europe, concerns about social protection, economic growth and the future of the labour supply have given rise to a number of recommendations and political initiatives aimed at encouraging people to continue working until later in life.

Where employment rates for older age groups and the average retirement age were concerned, in 2006, Portugal's situation was relatively comfortable compared to the rest of the European Union. Nonetheless, levels of schooling and certified qualifications in Portugal are particularly low in the older groups of the working population and so questions like lifelong learning, productivity and job quality are acquiring an important strategic dimension.

These questions raise the issues of 1) the role of employers and the importance of organisational age management strategies to promote the sustainability of employment of the working population aged over 45 and 2) social attitudes of employers and employees to lowering or raising the retirement age.

On the basis of these issues, we conduct a sociological study with a view to making an analysis of institutional and organisational opportunities and constraints and of expectations and social attitudes in the transition to retirement.

The article presents a first state of the art of Portuguese and international bibliography review based on what a conceptual model of the study was construct. We plan to show how the relationship between ageing and the labour market has been conceptualized in Europe, systematise the answers that social policies have been putting forward and compare them to the situation in Portugal. In particular, we wish to situate and characterise the reality in Portugal with regard to the social and academic profile of older workers and concrete public measures that have been applied.

Strengthening self-confidence in own training competencies. Special focus on ageing workforce

Baron, Stefan

*Jacobs Center on Lifelong Learning and Institutional Development, Jacobs University Bremen
Bremen, Germany*

Schömann, Klaus

*Jacobs Center on Lifelong Learning and Institutional Development, Jacobs University Bremen
Bremen, Germany*

Keywords

Peer effects, Learning climate, Ageing workforce, Further training participation, Self-confidence in training competence

The increase of actual retirement age gives a new impetus for 50 + years old employees to re-invest in their skills. In near future an employee aged 55 years has a work horizon of at least 10 years. That is often more than one quarter of the whole working life. Nevertheless, recent training data shows a decline in participation rate for older employees. Our guiding question is how to strengthen it.

Since costs and benefits are comparable for different age groups, subjective reasons, like different likelihood for a status decline and individual self-confidence in own learning competencies, become important mechanisms in training decisions (cf. Breen/Goldthorpe 1997, Esser 2001). Specifically older employees often feel less self-confident in their competencies and perceive a lower likelihood for status decline than their younger colleagues.

These factors are largely determined by the overall learning climate in the working environment. We therefore assume that direct supervisors and peers can help to strengthen self-confidence in own training competencies, and hence to influence employees' training behavior. From our point of view, a better understanding of this relationship is essential for improving participation rates in further training.

Indeed, in multi-level regression models with data from our interdisciplinary demopass-project we found that peers and direct supervisors have a positive significant influence on self-confidence in own training competencies. Interestingly these effects were especially strong for older employees aged 45 plus. For this group perceived management support and team's learning climate are important factors for strengthening self-confidence. Thus, our results can give clear recommendations for increasing the training participation of an ageing work force. People are more likely to engage in training if they expect to perform successfully.

The Age Dimension of European Immigration: A New Challenge for European Societies

Barbulescu, Roxana

Social and POLitical Sciences, European University Institute San Domenico di Fiesole (FI), Italy

Keywords

European immigration, age discrimination, convergence, aging societies

European societies are increasingly aging societies. However, aging societies debate has failed to consider that contemporaneous European societies are immigration societies. This paper addresses the age distribution(s) of immigrants in Europe and suggests that there are clear cut cleavages among the immigrants' age groups. Moreover, contrary to the immigration tradition and policies of the member states, across Europe the age of the immigrants converges towards young adult age. Employing Eurostat data, the paper shows that despite the European non-discrimination legislation and, in addition to the age discrimination on the labour market, immigration into Europe has significant negative age dimension. Overall, half of the immigrants are under 29 years of age and only 11 % are age 50 or over. The median age of total reported migration in 15 EU member states was 28.8 years old, for the return nationals it reached 30.3, and for EU citizens was 29.9, meanwhile for non-EU citizens it was only 27.7 years old. For the last citizenship group, there are three years of difference with the returning nationals and one and a half years difference with EU citizens. Thus, the findings show that as immigration is more formally regulated, the age of the immigrants decreases. The paper finds that, on one hand, this is due to the policies of admission (family reunification, student visa and guest worker programs) negatively select on age; on the other hand, the paper claims that in the absence of a protective system against discrimination acting at the international level, age is regarded as a proxy for welfare dependency and low productivity. The age discrimination at admission also generates unintended social consequences such as failure in reuniting families with grandparents who could contribute to childcare and increase fertility among immigrants. It also generates severe unbalancing between the working population and the elderly and the children i.e. the most vulnerable categories in home societies. Consequently, the work recommends the introduction of a weighted quota system for aged immigrants in Europe. The results support an agenda for a better understanding of the "fuzzy logic" of immigration patterns in increasingly convergent European society.

The Apple Doesn't Live Far from the Tree: Geographical Proximity Between Parents and Their Adult Children in Europe

Isengard, Bettina

Institute of Sociology, University of Zurich Switzerland,

Szydlik, Marc

Institute of Sociology, University of Zurich Switzerland,

Keywords

Proximity, europe, Generations, Solidarity

Geographical distance between parents and their adult children is one of the most basic prerequisites for many forms of solidarity among generations. Proximity facilitates personal communication, help at home, support of grandchildren, as well as care. Conversely, spatial distance limits the possibilities of inter-generational solidarity, except of financial transfers. Although living distance between parents and their offspring is important for intergenerational solidarity, little is yet known especially about country-specific divergences and convergences. For this reason, we investigate spatial distances between generations in a number of European countries. Which individual characteristics of both generations and which family structures influence geographical proximity between parents and their adult children? Are there differences between countries, and if so, how can they be explained? The empirical analyses are based on the second wave of the Survey of Health, Ageing and Retirement in Europe (SHARE), including 13 European countries, ranging from Denmark and Sweden to the Netherlands, Belgium, France, Germany, Austria, Switzerland, Italy, Spain, Greece, Poland and the Czech Republic. On the basis of multi-level ordered logistic regression models, for example, one finds that individual needs and opportunities of parents and children are strong predictors for geographical distance between households. Family structures play an important role, too. Nevertheless, substantial country-specific differences can be observed, for example, spatial distance between parents and their adult children is especially small in Southern European countries and in Poland.

The challenge of reconciling work and care for an elderly dependent parent: the Portuguese situation

Samitca, Sanda

Sociology, Institute of Social Sciences, University of Lisbon Portugal,

Wall, Karin

*Sociology, Institute of Social Sciences, University of Lisbon
Portugal,*

Keywords

work-life balance, employment, elderly, care giving

As a general phenomenon in Europe, the ageing population also concerns Portugal. One of the consequences is an increasing number of dependent elderly people due to various chronic diseases. This situation has considerable implications for families, frequently called upon to provide caring tasks. Since the latter are most often provided by women and considering the high rate of female employment in Portugal, how do families face this situation? And how do they experience it?

In this paper, we present the results of a study which is part of an EU network (including France, Germany, Italy, the Netherlands and Sweden) on workers caring for dependant elderly persons.

Drawing on qualitative interviews with carers who are in full employment, the main aim of this research is to understand how families manage to reconcile both demanding tasks: employment and caring. Adopting a work life balance perspective, we examine the main difficulties carers have to face and the main care arrangements they set up. Moreover, considering the existing policy responses and services, we also present the formal and informal resources carers rely upon in order to face the conciliation challenge. Finally, focusing on the subjective dimension of the experience we analyse how carers feel and whether and how they experience stress.

The combination of informal care for the elderly and employment - Social inequality and rationality

Preuß, Maren

*Institut für Gerontologie, Hochschule Vechta
Vechta, Germany*

Keywords

opportunity structures, social milieus, combination of caregiving and employment

Currently, two profound transformations occur at macro structural level, which will have a long lasting influence on care provision for the elderly within the family context. On one hand, the demographic trend is connected with an increase of those people in need of care. On the other hand, in some European countries a rise of female labour market participation can be observed, in particular for the age group between 50 and 65 years.

The contradictory social developments lead to an increasingly number of people - predominantly women - who will be confronted with two conflicting areas of responsibility: employment and care for older relatives. Both spheres show different time structures and work loads. Due to the current socio-political framework and employment conditions it is exceedingly difficult to reconcile both spheres in Germany. Thus, informal carers are forced to decide on whether or how to combine both spheres. The societal change even questions the future of the traditional family oriented care model in Germany, which is based on the acceptance of informal care provision by family members.

The contribution aims at presenting a theoretical framework which allows to reconstruct and to explain the process of decision making related to the conflicting priorities of informal care and gainful employment. Based on the assumption that individual decisions are embedded in the context of existing opportunity structures variables which affect the opportunities will be defined. Empirical data indicates that the opportunity to combine both spheres is strongly influenced by the social status of the potential informal carer. Within the theoretical framework social status is defined by the classification of different social milieus. To create a comprehensive framework for the analysis of the decision-processes a modified rational-choice-theory by Esser will be combined with findings of an empirical research on care orientations of Blinkert and Klie based on their concept of social milieus. On basis of the theoretical framework conflicts related to the combination of care and employment and their embeddedness in dimensions of social inequality will be shown.

The effects of active ageing policy and practice

Midsundstad, Tove

*Institute for Labour and Social Research, Fafo
Oslo, Norway*

Keywords

active ageing policy and practice, Early retirement, workplace measures, retention

The effects of active ageing policy and practice

There are few studies analyzing how employers' policy and practice may influence the retirement decision. Further on, most evidence of companies' active ageing policy and practice comes from different case studies, documentation of so-called good practice and real-life examples from different companies across the EU. Hence, the major evidence is based on the subjective opinions of management and workers.

This paper examines whether or not active ageing measures at the workplace actually play a role in retaining older workers in the labour market in Norway. The main research question is: Do older employees in enterprises with an active ageing policy and practice retire later than older employees in enterprises without such practice? The results from the analysis are expected to yield important input to the ongoing debate about how to persuade older worker to prolong their working life.

I use data from a representative survey from 2005, mapping the prevalence of companies' active ageing policy and practice in Norway. Based on the results from this study, 1000 persons between 62 and 67 was interviewed in 2006 about their retirement plans and behaviour; 500 from enterprises offering special measures to retain employees above the age of 62 (the early retirement age in Norway), for example bonuses, reduced working hours, retraining, reduced work load and easier job tasks (experimental group); and 500 persons from enterprises without such measures (control group). The research question is investigated using logistic regression, controlling for a whole range of worker and firm characteristics, like individual health and working ability, income and fortune, sex, age, education, social class, civil status, working conditions and work load, and different organizational and managerial factors.

The impact of welfare state institutions on the early retirement patterns in Europe: a comparative analysis using the ECHP and the EU-SILC

Petrovici, Carmen

Methodology and Statistics, Tilburg University & CEPS/ INSTEAD Tilburg, The Netherlands

Keywords

discrete choice modelling, early retirement behaviour, welfare state institutions

The purposes of this paper are twofold: first, it aims at evaluating the role of the welfare state institutions on the early retirement behaviour in Europe; secondly, it tests if the impact of the welfare state on the early retirement patterns changed during the last decade, using the ECHP, the EU-SILC and macrodata from OECD and EUROSTAT.

In order to assess the flexibility of the social security system we created an eligibility index using the different characteristics of the pensions system by pillar and by gender. For the generosity of the welfare state we used as a proxy the replacement rates of the different benefits.

In order to evaluate the welfare state change over 10 years period in what concerns pension policies, we compared the situation from 2006-2007 (using EU-SILC) with the one in 1996-1997 (using ECHP) and macrodata for all the countries for which we have information in both datasets. Using discrete choice modelling enabled us to include alternative exit routes such as unemployment or disability in our multinomial logit models. We have estimated a basic model with the socio-demographical and job related control variables, an institutional model and a welfare state regimes model with which we will test at the micro-macro level the results of our cluster analysis at the macrolevel. Since our representative sample consists of senior workers from the age of 45 to the age one year prior to eligibility for statutory pensions, we cover most of the transitions out of the labour market including those under the threshold used in previous studies.

We tested the way countries cluster according to these characteristics of the welfare state on 26 European countries. The results show that the generosity of the social security system is an important pull factor of the retirement decision. Compared with the situation in 1996, in 2006 the borders between regimes types became blurred, our results supporting Börsch-Supan (2006) conclusion on the diversity of the European states in their generosity towards elderly.

The intention to retire early. A comparative study between employees of different European countries.

Bral, Liesbeth

Research Centre for Longitudinal and Life Course Studies (Cello), University of Antwerp Antwerp, Belgium

Ponnet, Koen

Research Centre for Longitudinal and Life Course Studies (Cello), University of Antwerp Antwerp, Belgium

Boudiny, Kim

Research Centre for Longitudinal and Life Course Studies (Cello), University of Antwerp Antwerp, Belgium

Mortelmans, Dimitri

Research Centre for Longitudinal and Life Course Studies (Cello), University of Antwerp Antwerp, Belgium

Pasteels, Inge

Research Centre for Longitudinal and Life Course Studies (Cello), University of Antwerp Antwerp, Belgium

Keywords

multi-country perspective, well-being, Early retirement, Gender and Generations Programme Survey

The ageing of the working population combined with an ongoing early retirement trend is a major policy concern in many OECD countries, since they will threaten living standards and put enormous pressure on the financing of our social protection systems (OECD, 2006). In order to retain older people in employment and to develop adequate policies that stimulate work participation among older employees, an increasing amount of research is devoted to the determinants of people's early retirement intentions. However, most of these studies focus on financial and health related determinants (Smyer, M. A., & Pitt-Catsouphes, M., 2007), (Kalwij, A. & Vermeulen, F., 2008).

The purpose of the present paper is to further examine the determinants that might influence the retirement intentions of older workers. Therefore, we expand previous studies in two different ways. First, we examine income and health related variables as well as several subjective characteristics (e.g. satisfaction with work, psychological well-being, locus of control,...) that might determine early retirement intentions of older employees. Second, we use data from the Gender and Generations Programme Surveys (GGPS), a large representative panel survey, which allowed us to examine differences in early retirement intentions between several European countries. More specifically, we selected respondents aged 45 to 59 years from five European countries (France, Hungary, Bulgaria, Georgia and Germany).

Consistent with previous research, age was found to play a major role in subjects' intention to take an early exit from the labour market. In addition, our results underline the importance of subjective variables (e.g. work satisfaction). The relationship between financial and psycho-social variables will be further discussed from a multi-country perspective.

The interplay of law and innovation in ICT-supported independent living of older people in the USA and Europe - a case comparison

Timmers, Paul

*DG Information Society & Media, European Commission
Brussels, Belgium*

Keywords

innovation, independent living, public policy, legislation, AAL

Over recent years, public policy has increasingly been stressing the growing potential of independent and assisted living solutions for older people. Expectations are high that new technologies including information and communication technologies (ICT) will help to realise a triple win: increased quality of life, new business opportunities, and reduced cost of health and social care. To stimulate technological innovation, national governments in Europe and elsewhere and the European Union provide significant R&D support, such as through the Ambient Assisted Living (AAL) program and the EU's 7th Framework Programme.

It is well recognised that the perceived potential can only be realised if technology innovation is combined with non-technological innovation e.g. innovation in information provision to elderly persons, social communication and community support, care service delivery, business models, and also in partnerships. Social and market legislation, for example the regulation of reimbursement schemes is a major conditioning factor in particular for these forms of innovation. Legislation and innovation should take into account changing perceptions and practices of aging. What is needed is to combine insights of the sociology of aging, innovation, and public policy.

This paper presents some results of a comparative study of cases from the USA and Europe in the field of ICT-supported independent living of older persons, analysing the interplay between legislation and innovation in order to inform future public policy design.

The Nature and Dynamics of the Relationship between Migrant Carers and Older People

Walsh, Kieran

Irish Centre for Social Gerontology, National University of Ireland Galway Galway, Ireland

O'Shea, Eamon

Irish Centre for Social Gerontology, National University of Ireland Galway Galway, Ireland

Keywords

Migrant carers, older people, caring relationship, reciprocity, communication

Migrant care workers make a substantial contribution to older adult care in many developed nations. Even in this uncertain economic climate, the reliance on foreign carers appears to be unwavering. However, an understanding of the relationship dynamics between migrant carers and the host country care recipients is absent from research, practice and policy domains. With an increased emphasis on person-centred care for older people, the relationship between the care provider and the care recipient is often considered to be a key determinant of the quality of provision. Factors embedded within the socio-cultural and socio-linguistic perspectives of different nationalities mean that the nature of the caring relationship is likely to be influenced by migrant carers caring for older people. The direction of that influence, and the subsequent implications for the experiences of migrant carers and the older people they care for, are unknown. This paper explores the relationship between older people and their migrant carers to address these knowledge gaps.

The research draws on data gathered for Ireland as a part of the cross-national study on the "role of migrant health and social care workers in ageing societies". Ireland's past history of emigration, the relatively homogeneous older adult population (with respect to ethnicity and religiosity) and the recent development of inward migration, offer an interesting context for this research. Information was collected using semi-structured interviews with 40 migrant carers (nurses and care assistants), semi-structured telephone interviews with 16 employers and three focus groups with older adults (prospective and current users of care).

The findings indicate that the relationship between migrant carers and older people is complex, with both challenges and opportunities. Difficulties around acceptance are concentrated in initial periods and underlined by issues of communication and cultural competence. Some discrimination towards carers was evident, but typically did not characterise the carer-care user relationships. Conversely, a strong theme of reciprocity and kinship, and evidence of shared experience with respect to migration, emerged from the research. The findings underscore the importance of the caring relationship and the richness of the interaction between an older person and their carer in a multicultural caring environment.

The new German labour market policy and older welfare recipients: Activation or "active ageing"?

Zaleska-Beyersdorf, Joanna

Joblessness and Social Inclusion, Institute for Employment Research Nuremberg, Germany

Keywords

ageing societies, joblessness, labour market policy, subsidized employment, event history analysis

The study I would like to present focuses the question to what extent elderly unemployed welfare recipients take up gainful employment. With the implementation of the law "Social Code II", Germany switched to a more activating welfare system. Incentives for individuals to offer their work capacity have clearly increased. Therefore it becomes more difficult for elderly unemployed to retire prematurely from working life. But the question is if there exist enough opportunities enabling older jobless people to take up a sustainable employment.

My analysis is based on administrative data of the German Federal Labour Agency and provides detailed information about individual and household characteristics of the 40- to 58-years-old unemployed welfare recipients. The study explores if there are distinctions between different groups of recipients regarding their transition chances into employment. Certain characteristics affect the job matching processes and therefore individual job prospects: qualification, previous employment history and disability status. Another question regards the quality of the jobs elderly take up: Does this employment guarantee a life without additional state subsidies?

Examining transition chances of older welfare recipients, some of the theoretical hypotheses must be thought over: For instance it can generally be expected that individuals with higher educational level have better chances to find a job than low skilled workers. But higher educational attainment accompanied by long joblessness can result in small chances of finding a job because of the skilled-biased technological change. As elder welfare recipients are often long-term unemployed, one cannot unambiguously assume a positive correlation between skill levels and re-employment chances.

The study starts from the premise that taking up a social insured employment in the later phase of life course improves the quality of life by making it for older people possible to participate in the cultural and material goods of a society. The results of the event history analysis will give an insight into the question if the new German activating labour market policy leads to inclusion of older recipients into the gainful employment system and enables them to realise the idea of "active ageing".

The places for ageing in parliamentary speeches

Kaskiharju, Eija

*Faculty of Social Sciences, University of Jyväskylä
Jyväskylä, Finland*

Keywords

political oratory, places for ageing, MPs, Finnish society

This presentation discusses the places for ageing in Finnish society. The data consists of 309 parliamentary speeches covering this topic from 1950 till 2005. A place for ageing refers to a local authority home, an old people's home, a nursing home, own home or other forms of dwelling.

However, to date there is no research available in Finland that would theorize the aspects of dwellings where the elderly reside. Therefore I chose Michel Foucault's idea of heterotopia as a theoretical framework that was combined with John Agnew's formulations of place mechanisms. The mechanisms, that affect the places, are economic, political, and social in nature. The research method consists of theory based quantitative content analysis.

The purpose of the research is to study what the MPs speak about the places of ageing and the mechanisms affecting them. The idea is to create knowledge that is on the theoretical and conceptual level. The analysis produced seven thematic periods. In my presentation I first describe the data, research question and theoretical framework. Then I concentrate on the results of the analysis.

The Role of Education in Managing Chronic Illnesses and Its Effects on Quality of Life

Reibling, Nadine

*Sociology, Graduate School of Economic and Social Sciences
Mannheim, Germany*

Keywords

chronic illness, quality of life, inequalities, socioeconomic status

Although old age is not necessarily associated with a decline in health, chronic illnesses – often in a co- and multimorbid form – are common ailments in later life. Gerontological research suggests that physical morbidity is among the most important causes for the development of functional limitations. Research has also shown that the development of chronic illnesses in old age is closely linked to socioeconomic status. Better-educated and more affluent citizens are less likely to develop chronic illnesses. Consequently, higher socioeconomic status helps maintain a better quality of life by decreasing the risk of morbidity.

While previous research established this relationship, it stopped short of investigating the effect socioeconomic status has once an illness is present. This research remedies this shortcoming by examining the effect socioeconomic status has on the extent to which an illness reduces the quality of life. This paper argues that socioeconomic status, approximated by an individual's educational attainment, provides crucial resources that can be employed to manage chronic illnesses. Specifically, patients with higher education have more social support, are more effective at navigating healthcare systems, and are more capable in adjusting day-to-day activities to match the limitations of their illness.

Using the second wave of the Survey of Health, Ageing and Retirement (SHARE), I analyzed the influence of education on the existence of functional limitations for groups with different numbers of chronic illnesses. Consistent with previous studies, the results show a lower prevalence of functional limitations for persons with higher levels of education. These inequalities could be a result of different levels of morbidity. However, the effect of education does not only persist but increases after adjusting for the number of chronic illnesses. Inequality is therefore highest when people suffer from two or more chronic illnesses and lowest when they have no chronic condition. These results indicate that although chronic illness reduces the quality of life, this loss is moderated by socioeconomic status. Consequently, better-educated Europeans maintain a higher quality of life, not only by reducing the risk of morbidity but also by better managing existing conditions, especially when they occur as co- and multimorbidities.

The role of home help in the field of formal care for older people in Slovenia

Nagode, Mateja

-, Social Protection Institute of Republic of Slovenia
Ljubljana, Slovenia

Smolej, Simona

-, Social Protection Institute of the Republic of Slovenia
Ljubljana, Slovenia

Keywords

community care, home help, formal care, residential care, older people

Care for older people in Slovenia was initially based on residential care, mainly in old age homes that also have the longest tradition. On the other hand, community care services developed more intensively only in nineties, especially home help. Nowadays Slovenia, like other European countries, strives to assure such living conditions that would enable older people to live independently at home as long as possible. In this regard, home help became the strongest and most developed social care service and has an important role for people that are due to different reasons (age, invalidity) not capable to take care (domestic and personal care) for themselves. Also, home help as the main social care service in community care has (should have) significant influence on decreasing the pressure on services in residential care. In every regard, home help is still not enough approachable (formally and geographically) to all people who need that kind of services. There is a great need and demanding task to develop, support and expand the service of home help. Consequently, The Social Protection Institute of the Republic of Slovenia started to monitor the implementation of home help on yearly basis. The monitoring embraces all municipalities. Recently this is the only quantitative analysis that is based on 100 % response rate and the results arouse a big interest in the professional public.

The paper outlines the circumstances of care for older people and the possible services within residential and community care. The main focus will refer to different aspects of the home help implementation (providers, users, funding, different services). The paper presents main constraints of home help regulation and practice in Slovenia and also the main challenges and trends in this field.

The Secret of Senior Home Help

Moravcová, Lucie

Institute of Sociological Studies, Faculty of Social Sciences of Charles University in Prague Praha 5 - Jinonice, Czech Republic

Keywords

responsibility for care., altruism, seniors, home help, caregivers

My paper deals with the issue of family home help for seniors (informal care) in the Czech Republic. It concerns primary home caregivers who take care for their parents/partners, eventually organize this care. These primary caregivers mostly decided on caring at home (not in an institution) for a senior.

Basically, the paper is a report from a research which was conducted in two phases: First of all the analytical phase was conducted (2006) the core of which was a representative research of adult population in the Czech Republic. Standardized questionnaires about conditions and circumstances of home help for seniors in 800 households in the Czech Republic were used as a method of data collection. This phase was succeeded by a qualitative research phase (2007-2008) which used in-depth interviews with primary caregivers as a method of data collection.

Data analysis has verified my hypothesis that primary caregivers behave altruistically. Care-givers sacrifice themselves a lot which leads to their physical and psychical exhaustion, but on the other hand it enables the adjustment of care to senior needs at the same time. The adjustment proceeds on two levels: personal level (primary care-giver and other family members) and technical level (adjusting of environment and equipment of the household to senior and care needs. Care-giving brings inner recompense to care-givers (good sensation, clear conscience). The decision-making process showed to be emotional. Accepting the responsibility for the situation and care-receiver is the primary act in the process of decision-making. Caregivers' feel of responsibility dissolves intensively in all areas of care. Other important factors of emotional decision-making process are perception of care as a matter of fact and as a reciprocal process. A relationship that care-giver has with senior and negative attitudes towards institutionalized forms of care are also important while deciding. Factor analysis revealed two kinds of reasons. I called them 'altruistic' (matter of fact, reciprocity, love) and 'utilitarian' (partner, environment) reasons.

The social relationship in nursing homes

Guedes, Joana

Social Work, Instituto Superior de Serviço Social do Porto Matosinhos, Portugal

Keywords

elderly, nursing homes, social relationship

In the qualitative study presented we want to show the way life concerning the experience inside a nursing home and the consequences of that process at social relationship level. The transition into nursing home demands a rupture with the previous life and ties. It becomes important to think and reflect about his inner constructed world through his social experience and his individual and subjective representations, specially when the context of these relationship changes and it's possible to doubt the individual existence as an individuality. We believe, therefore, that the inner conscience will also depend on the relationships established throughout several integration stages in the nursing home.

The used methodology was focused on an intensive study, bringing together various information-gathering techniques: observer-participant, formal and informal interview, direct and methodical observation.

The main principal variable analyse was the social climate of the old-age equipment and the elderly relationships network. This social climate is related with relationships among residents and staff and relationships between the residents. We are specially interested in point out some obstacles that have a negative interference inside the social climate.

As the elderly do not represent a socially homogenous group, we can underline the social dissimilarities that marked the life path and their material, cultural and relationship resources; different reasons associated to the entrance in nursing home; difficulty in sharing the same private space; the heterogeneity in terms of health status. These reasons, as well as the challenge regarding the face of death, favours the superficial ties and the withdrawal from the world.

Concerning relationship among elderly and staff, they are based on a certain distance between elderly world and staff world. These interact with the residents only in brief moments during the day. The remaining time is dedicated to instrumental tasks. It would be important to consider some factors of professional motivation, such as adjusted wages, investment in training and continuous reflection about the work.

Representations mostly devalued around aging, age distances, culture differences and a relationship which does not preserve the elder identity contribute to significant differences of powers and to "colonial" and fatherly relationship.

The usage of ICT by the elderly in Lisbon: Motivations and Attitudes

Barbosa Neves, Bárbara

*CAPP - Centre for Public Administration and Policies, ISCSP - UTL (Institute of Social and Political Sciences, Technical University of Lisbon)
Lisbon, Portugal*

Amaro, Fausto

*CAPP - Centre for Public Administration and Policies, ISCSP - UTL (Institute of Social and Political Sciences, Technical University of Lisbon)
Lisbon, Portugal*

Keywords

Lisbon, elderly, , ageing, ICT

Europe is experiencing two significant societal trends, ageing and Information and Communication Technologies (ICT) use and impact in all human life activities. In this framework, the European Union i2010 plan intends to promote an inclusive Information Society, developing policies capable of involving and empowering all citizens. One of these areas of eInclusion policy is precisely ageing: ageing well in a European Information Society, taking advantages of ICT tools to improve the elderly' quality of life. However, the elderly are the most info-excluded group, in terms of age range. It's also commonly assumed that they are technophobic. Therefore, we first need to assess the attitudes and motivations of senior people towards ICT, in order to gather enough data to develop suitable policies to bridge the digital divide and to tackle this specific einclusion and well ageing goals.

This paper presents findings from a random stratified sample of 500 individuals over 65 years old, living in Lisbon, Portugal. We conducted a survey and semi-structured interviews to analyze the elderly usage of ICT, namely mobile phones, computers and Internet and their perceptions of it. The majority of the interviewees (72%) owned a mobile telephone, while computers were only used by 13% of the respondents and Internet by 10%. Results and its implications are here discussed.

Towards a Humanistic Gerontology: Methodological Issues in 'Seeing' Visual Images of Ageing

Fairhurst, Eileen

*Research Institute for Health and Social Change, Manchester Metropolitan University
Manchester, UK*

Keywords

visual images, Humanistic gerontology, methodological

This paper adds to a growing corpus of knowledge on photographic images of ageing. Visual images are extraordinarily powerful, but also extraordinarily ambiguous, and interpreting them underlines the need for gerontology to confront profound ethical and political questions. At the same time there has been an emphasis, especially by policy makers, on positive ageing. Images abound of examples of older people 'doing' positive ageing. Unlike previous studies, the one reported here examines photographs which were produced explicitly as part of a 'positive images of ageing' campaign in Manchester. As part of this, calendars have been produced which aim to question stereotypes of older people. The calendars are available on Manchester City Council's web-site and, as such, are located within a specific social and political context. The paper explores some of the different interpretations of positive ageing which the makers of the calendars conveyed and shows how the reader's political and moral views also influence how he or she reads the pages they see. Specifically, the paper outlines the purposes of the campaign, examines the relationship between images and text (for instance, captions and quotes) and concludes by posing methodological matters raised for the development of a humanistic gerontology.

Tracing the link between "feeling at home" and quality of life in residential care settings for older people

Cooney, Adeline

School of Nursing and Midwifery, National University of Ireland, Galway Galway, Ireland

Keywords

long-stay care, Home, quality of life

This paper will explore the concept of "home" and its significance to residents' quality of life (QoL). Straussian grounded theory was used to examine residents' experiences of residential care, whether they experienced a sense of home and how this impacted on their QoL. Data were collected using semi-structured interviews with 61 residents living in seven residential care facilities. These settings reflected different types of residential settings in Ireland. Most residents attempted to generate a sense of "home" in the residential setting. "Finding Home" was conceptualised as the core category. The core factors crucial to "finding home" were: "continuity", "preserving personal identity", "belonging" and "being active and working". It was evident that some participants felt at home in the setting while others did not, also that there was a greater chance of residents feeling at home in some settings than in others. Participants who felt at home reported that they lived life on their terms. The qualities they associated with feeling at home were: continuity, privacy, self-expression, activity, feeling useful and valued. These qualities were enhanced or constrained by the physical environment of the setting. The social environment was also key and feelings of warmth and ease were associated with homeliness. Feeling part of the group promoted a sense of belonging. Staff attitudes and approach to care delivery were powerful determinants of residents' experience. The individual's expectations, past experience and involvement in the move coloured their experience of living there and determined the ease with which they settled. The paper will conclude by presenting the "Theory of Finding Home" (ToFH) in residential settings. This theory is offered as a mechanism to help understand and enhance residents' experiences of residential care.

Transfers Between Generations in Western and Eastern Europe

Brandt, Martina

*MEA, University of Mannheim
Mannheim, Germany*

Deindl, Christian

*Institute of Sociology, University of Zurich
Zurich, Switzerland*

Keywords

Family, Welfare State, intergenerational transfers, europe

Progressive population ageing all over Europe leads to an increasing political and sociological interest in families and especially intergenerational relations. Comparative research plays a major role for understanding the interdependencies between culture, state and family. It may thus help to solve societal problems emerging from a changing balance between old and young.

Our presentation will focus on the influences of welfare state characteristics on the exchange of money and time between adult generations in Europe. Previous research has already confirmed the existence of several Western 'European societies' regarding intergenerational relations. Northern Europe is characterised by a high level of sporadic support while in Southern Europe assistance is rare, but very intense, whereas Central Europe lies 'not only geographically' in between those two poles. The second wave of SHARE now also includes two Eastern European states (Czech Republic, Poland) aside from eleven Western European countries (Austria, Belgium, Denmark, France, Germany, Greece, Italy, the Netherlands, Spain, Sweden, Switzerland) and thus provides further insight into the role of public support for private transfers in the family all over Europe.

As a consequence of the hierarchical structure of the data, multilevel models will be employed to trace intergenerational support patterns back to characteristics of relations, persons, families and states, from north to south and west to east. These analyses show, that the welfare state has considerable influences on private intergenerational transfers, even if different individual resources, needs and family characteristics are considered: The more public support for families and people in need, the more likely money and time are transferred between elderly parents and adult children. Thus, even if two former socialist regimes are taken into account, the so called 'crowding in'-thesis is supported analysing the likelihood of intergenerational transfers.

Understanding Precarity in Old Age: Income Poverty or Well Being for Effective Policy Making

Kalaycioglu, Sibel

Sociology, Middle East Technical University, ANKARA, TURKEY

Keywords

precarity in old age, well being, welfare, quality of life

Poverty as a multidimensional concept also has a relevant age dimension hence ageing diminishes the capacity to work and earn. In developed countries the combination of strong social security systems, well-developed capital markets, and small households contribute to higher living standards for the elderly, relative to the rest of the population. These conditions are not replicated in many developing countries, where pensions systems are weak and mostly favor the non-poor and the elderly usually live in large extended households sharing the budget with a large number of children.

In developing countries the traditional safety net for the elderly is the extended family. On the other hand, the extended family was never a perfect safety net especially when their own children were too poor to support their parents. Recent developments have led to older persons emerging as an increasingly visible vulnerable group. The elderly may become the prime breadwinners and/or caregivers. The risk of poverty may be particularly high especially if older persons are engaged in the informal economy. Poverty of elderly increases with changes in welfare policies and privatization of care services. Also measuring poverty with current income proves to be not a sufficient strategy since it leads to biases in understanding individual welfare.

The paper argues that well-being is a better and new concept for understanding precarity in old age which is based on variables such as health, education, access to housing and basic infrastructure and a pension system which affects the quality of life. These variables have a positive correlation with income, but not sufficient due in part to the impossibility of buying some attributes of well-being. The social security system and care services are also contributing factors to understanding welfare in the old age. Living arrangements of elderly are also significant. Also attitudes towards elderly and cultural perceptions of ageing in the society is another dimension influencing the well being of old persons which is again not determined directly by income.

The paper is based on research conducted on elderly in Turkey and compares two possible approaches for understanding precarity in old age.

Voluntary and Involuntary Early Retirement in Germany - The effects of labour market structures and gender

Reichert, Timo

*Professur für Bevölkerungswissenschaft - chair for population studies, Otto-Friedrich-Universität Bamberg - University of Bamberg
Bamberg, Germany*

Zapf, Ines

*Professur für Bevölkerungswissenschaft - chair for population studies, Otto-Friedrich-Universität Bamberg - University of Bamberg
Bamberg, Germany*

Koenen, Felix

*Professur für Bevölkerungswissenschaft - chair for population studies, Otto-Friedrich-Universität Bamberg - University of Bamberg
Bamberg, Germany*

Keywords

transition to retirement, involuntary early retirement, tertiarization, labour participation of older workers, pension system regulations

The trend towards ever earlier retirement has been one of the most important labour market developments in the past fifty years (Hofäcker & Pollnerová 2006). Together with the general trend towards demographic ageing, there will be a strong decrease in Germany's overall work force, resulting in a constantly growing group of pension recipients. However, retirement transitions are not necessarily always voluntary, but could also be involuntary, i.e. driven by the lack of further employment options. By this distinction between voluntary and involuntary retirement, one could possibly identify unused labour capacities which - if activated - may increase employment among older workers.

Previous cross-national analysis show (Dorn & Sousa-Poza 2007), that especially continental European countries are strongly affected by involuntary early retirement. Our analysis using the first wave of the 'Survey of Health, Ageing, and Retirement in Europe' (SHARE) confirm this picture but additionally highlight that sex, region, employment sector, and the size of the enterprise are important determinants of the distinction between voluntary and involuntary early retirement. The risk of involuntary early retirement is significantly higher for men, employees in bigger enterprises, and employees in Eastern Germany. Especially men working in the secondary sector are to a large extent involuntarily early retired as a consequence of firms' extensive rationalisation efforts. On the other hand, women working in tertiary sector employment where rationalisation pressures are less pronounced are mostly voluntarily retired.

Why are we still working - Explaining differences in older persons' workforce participation by individual-level characteristics

Boehm, Stephan

Institute for Leadership and Human Resource Management, University of St. Gallen St. Gallen, Switzerland

Karlsson, Martin

Fachgebiet VWL 6: Angewandte Oekonometrie, Technical University of Darmstadt Darmstadt, Germany

Keywords

demographic change, Older workers, retirement behavior

It is commonly agreed upon and has been empirically shown that in most OECD-like countries the percentage of older workers still being an active part of the workforce decreased significantly over the last 30 years. This trend sets serious pressures on national economies as it intensifies the effects of the demographic change. Reasons for this decrease have been identified in form of effects of globalisation (e.g. over-representation of older workers in shrinking economic sectors) and more recently in so-called institutional filters on the national level (e.g. pension systems, re-training activities, etc.).

While these new findings shed additional light on the late career decisions of older workers, they still seem to miss certain aspects of a holistic model of retirement behaviour. In fact, research still seems to be centred around national and institutional factors that influence retirement behaviour. As the decision regarding continued employment or exit from the workforce is a highly personal one, it seems promising to integrate further individual-level variables into an overall retirement model.

For example, it seems plausible that a person's health status influences his/her decision towards continued employment. Similarly, his/her individual savings as well as intra-family money transfers should play an important role in this regard. Also, practical family obligations like having to take care of children, parents, or partners should be analyzed as they might directly influence the amount of available time and indirectly the decision towards retirement/continued work. Besides such rather "hard" individual factors it seems worthwhile to investigate potential "soft" triggers of retirement decisions such as prevailing emotions (e.g. feeling happy, feeling sad) or future expectations towards retirement (e.g. liking to have more free time vs. fear of being bored).

By doing so, we strive to develop a more comprehensive and truly interdisciplinary understanding of older workers' retirement decisions based on both economic theories and findings from organizational psychology. For testing the study hypotheses we draw on a large empirical data set that contains representative data from both OECD and non-OECD countries.

Widowhood, Gender and Depression in Later Life

Schaan, Barbara

Mannheim Research Institute for the Economics of Aging, University of Mannheim Mannheim, Germany

Keywords

widowhood, SHARE, longitudinal, Gender, depression

Objectives: I investigate the gender-specific effect of widowhood on depression among older people within a European context. So far the literature reveals mixed results with some studies indicating worse mental health of men after bereavement, others showing that women are more severely affected by widowhood and still other studies conclude that there are no gender differences in depression after bereavement at all. Methods: I estimate fixed-effect regressions using the first 2 waves of the 'Survey of Health, Ageing and Retirement in Europe' (SHARE). The SHARE data consists of more than 43,000 respondents in 14 European countries; for the analysis in this paper I analyse a balanced panel of 7,393 respondents who were married in wave 1 and are either continuously married or widowed in wave 2. Results: Respondents, who experienced bereavement between the two waves, report significantly more depressive symptoms than those continuously married. There is a gender-specific effect of widowhood, pointing to the direction that widowhood constitutes a more severe threat to the mental health of men, but this effect is not significant. This effect does also not differ among the different countries in the sample. After holding constant a variety of control variables, among them financial problems, the effect of widowhood on mental health disappears. Widowed persons who report a happy marriage in wave 1 show more symptoms of depression, widowed persons who reported being a caregiver for their partner in wave 1 report less symptoms of depression, but both effects turn out not to be statistically significant.

Wisdom among Older People: Exploring Social Consequences of Virtue

Edmondson, Ricca

School of Political Science and Sociology, National University of Ireland, Galway Galway, Ireland

Keywords

wisdom, ageing, virtue

Building on the author's ethnographic work tracing cases of wise behaviour among older people in a range of European settings, this paper begins to apply some questions from 'positive psychology' to the social-scientific study of ageing. Wisdom has traditionally been regarded as a virtue, but it is a virtue with a difference. Both in historical accounts and among contemporary psychologists, its exercise has been held to depend in part on the operation of other virtues, such as humility, tolerance, respect for others or orientation to the common good. This paper argues that more extensive understanding of the social operation of virtue is now required in the social sciences. Virtues are increasingly discussed in philosophy (and connected with social traditions by MacIntyre among others), politics (where their contributions to social capital are interrogated by commentators such as Putnam, Uslaner or Dekker), and positive psychology, notably in the work of Seligman. But empirical work in this connection tends to depend on techniques such as self-rating questionnaires or responses to pre-designed vignettes composed by investigators. If we examine wise behaviour and its component virtues in situ in everyday social settings among older people, what social phenomena can we trace? Martin (2007) warns against pitfalls for psychologists in this connection: 'canonical cravings?', the 'slide to subjectivism?', and various 'additive problems?'. Can these pitfalls be avoided by social scientists in attempts to identify social causes and consequences of virtues involved in the exercise of wisdom among older people?

RN02

Sociology of the Arts

"Historical Trauma": Representations of Combat Soldiers as Occupiers in the Israeli Theater

Barkai, Sigal

Faculty of the Arts, Tel Aviv University Kfar Saba, Israel

Keywords

Trauma, Occupation, Masculinity, Israel, theater

Kaja Silverman has used the term "historical trauma" (Male subjectivity at the margins, 1992) in her analysis of post World War II Hollywood cinema made in the 1940s. These films characterized combat soldiers as men who lost faith in their society's "dominant fiction".

Certain plays which were written in Israel since the "Six Day War" (1967) represented harsh psychological conflicts and moral dilemmas of soldiers as occupiers. Israeli soldiers who had to spend their military service in the occupied territories came back with evidence of a severe identity split, between the Jewish, liberal and humanistic education they received throughout childhood and the reality of oppression of civil Palestinian population in the "West Bank".

The Israeli theatre has been one of the first artistic mediums to notice the wrong doings of the occupation and the ideological and moral difficulties it had inflicted upon Israeli society.

In my lecture I plan to describe some of the male characters which appear in three Israeli plays: Comrads tell stories about Jesus by Amos Keinan, 1972, The Governor of Jericho by Joseph Mundy, 1975, and Ephraim goes back to the army by Itzhak Laor, 1984. These plays focus on issues of injured masculinity they represent bitter disappointment from the image of the heroic soldier established by the Zionist ethos. The "historical trauma" was expressed in plays that smashed norms and common beliefs and severely opposed the establishment.

Trough these plays I will illustrate changes in societal acceptance of the Israeli combat soldier as a leading image of hegemonic masculinity. I will describe dilemmas that have occurred since the beginning of the occupation and become more and more actual as years go by. I will show the implications of subversive and critical artistic texts on socio-political issues in Israel. I will also, try to touch upon the impact of the continuous state of war on men who are both soldiers and theatre creators.

"If you meet them in the street, join them" - The role of public art and redesign of public spaces in Zagreb

Krnic, Raseljka

*sociology, Institut of social sciences Ivo Pilar
Zagreb, Croatia*

Mijic, Ivana

*Sociology, Institut of Social Sciences Ivo Pilar
Zagreb, Croatia*

Keywords

Globalization, public art, Public Space

Neoliberal globalism has created the problematics of redefining public space, its definitions, use and purpose in the former socialist countries as well. "The death of the cities" phenomenon has marked the end of the 20th and the start of the 21st century and is predominantly perceived as a direct consequence of globalization. Public spaces, seen exclusively as economic value, are redesigned as "non-places" limited to a certain part of the population, which takes away their characteristic of something "public" as a possibility for creative, free and critical questioning of city life. The commercialization of public spaces has created an atmosphere of passive consumerism for the high-purchasing-power elite, impenetrable for all the unfit, marginal social groups that disrupt the stylized façade of city "non-places".

If we perceive public space as an "arena of the political", then any public art is consequently a potential expression of the political, an aesthetic manifestation of resistance to the withering away of city life. Public art today represents a complex form of artistic expression, so in theoretical discussions we find different definitions and interpretations. Thus Annalisa Cattani, speaking of this phenomenon, among other things, identifies one type of public art as "Public Art as de-design": it consists of art actions that seem to be superfluous; they create a sort of disturbance, in order to de-structure stereotypes and passive ways of living. Public art goes this way beyond the personal gesture of the artist, transcends pure subjectivity and responds to the urban, social and political structure that defines a given place. In late 2008 Zagreb hosted the third annual "Operation: City" - a three-week-long series of events organized by the Zagreb independent culture scene. This paper is a case study based on interviews with the organizers of the manifestation and the artists who took part in a series of public artistic interventions called "If you meet them in the street, join them". With this research we will try to show how those artists and organizers perceive the role of public art as an instrument of questioning and critique of these changes that take place in "transition city".

"Violence at Work: Marina Abramovic"

Levy, Clara

*sociology, Université Nancy 2
Nancy, France*

Quemin, Alain

Sociology, Université de Paris-Est, IUF Champs sur Marne, France

Keywords

violence, bodyart, legitimation

We intend to study the theme of violence in the works and performances of the Serbian visual artist Marina Abramovic. A member of the body art movement, Abramovic mainly worked on her own body (and that of her partner Ulay) by cutting it, beating it, hurting it and being so violent to her own body that she sometimes fainted, and even took lethal risks that needed spectators to intervene in order to stop the performance.

We will first describe the refinement of the violences that the artist administers to her own body by analysing a few of her most significant performances. Then we will analyse Abramovic's discourse on the violence of her works and show that there is a plurality of interpretations (for instance, power relations and triangular domination between the two artists and the public references to the repressive Yugoslavian society under Tito's governments?). Then we will focus on the way that Abramovic's work is received and perceived by the general public (above which internet users who comment the videos of her performances on such sites as Youtube) as by the social world of contemporary art (a social world in which, the artist, who received the golden lion for the best installation at the Biennale of Venice in 1997, is very legitimate).

A Calendar of Ornaments. Temporal Features in Decoration and Art

Korolainen, Kari

Faculty of Humanities. Finnish Language and Cultural Research, University of Joensuu Joensuu, Finland

Keywords

ornament, Home, calendar, artification, art

Ornaments are universal and commonplace in everyday environment and in art. Here, ornaments are studied from the perspective of visual and material culture.

In this paper, I look at ornaments from the temporal point of view. I study festival seasons and calendar periods, and examine how they have an effect to the practices of everyday decoration. The aim of my paper is to prepare a comparison between chronologies of everyday ornamentation and art from the view point of artification. Artification refers here to the processes where practices from art-world are represented in non-art-world, and vice versa. This paper relates also to my doctoral thesis, which deals with the relationship between ornaments and artification.

The temporality of ornaments is studied at first, literally in daily brochures, thus for example, ornamental pillows are the most common piece of an everyday ornamentation. Ornaments have also recurring characters; such as floral motifs, richness of forms, and glitter. On the other hand, daily brochures have a distinct pace when comparing to the practices of everyday life: Christmas-lights are still on, in February, although the brochures show up the next summer season already.

Due to the fact, that the emphasis in literal perspective is a bit peculiar, I specify ornament closely and analyse it theoretically in the second part of my paper. Thereafter I study the temporal paradigms of ornamentation in context of interior design and home. Investigation is aimed closely to the places where ornaments are presented.

Ornaments can be public and private, at the same time. However, decorations are often articulated elaborately in do-it-yourself style, also instructions for ornamentations are common. Therefore, the personal attitude, and the act of decorating are often highlighted.

The summarising part of my paper deals with artification and decoration: I compare temporal and spatial aspects of ornaments to the sphere of art. Practices of art and decoration meet in many ways, but cultural and institutional segregations are made as well. Decoration can be thought as a practical domain, where artification occurs, partially. Especially, the act of decoration is very close to art-like activity.

A Whole Life Job: the complex working lives of musicians in North East England

Coulson, Susan

Sociology and Social Policy, Newcastle University

Newcastle upon Tyne, UK

Keywords

musicians, artists, cultural sector, creative work, artistic career

The North East of England is a formerly heavily industrialised region where culture/the arts now occupy a central place on the policy agenda. Little, however, is known about the lives of the cultural workforce on whom such policies depend, despite their being held up as exemplars of the new "creative class" – autonomous, adaptable, entrepreneurial, innovative. Drawing on research involving all genres of musician in the North East region, this paper reveals a more nuanced picture, highlighting the ambiguities of a musician's working life. Musicians must reconcile the pursuit of an aesthetic calling with survival in a highly contingent and overcrowded market; learn to compete in the music world while building a reputation based on collaboration and cooperation; and maintain a long-term attachment to their chosen occupation in the face of unstable incomes, low pay and fragmented and discontinuous career trajectories. A musician's working life is experienced as a "whole life job", enacted across formal and informal sectors, the public domain and the household; and constrained by place, time, gender, taste and prevailing discourses. Musicians are sustained through some of the more negative aspects of an artistic career by the intrinsic rewards of their work and what some call a sense of vocation. It is this aspect that calls into question the extent to which the notion of the "creative worker" as exemplified by musicians/artists can successfully be translated into other contexts.

Aestheticization of Everyday Life and Postmodern Cities

Paone, Sonia

Social Science, Faculty of Political Science University of Pisa Pisa, Italy

Keywords

everyday life, aesthetic, postmodern spaces

Aestheticization of Everyday Life and Postmodern Cities

Sonia Paone,

Faculty of Political Science, University of Pisa (Italy)

The expression aestheticization of everyday life underlines the growing value that aesthetic perception has assumed in the actions and choices of everyday life. According to Featherstone (1991), the concept of aestheticization of everyday life can be explained in terms of several factors: the effacement of the boundary between art and everyday life and the plan to transform life into a work of art. Finally aesthetic sensitivity has been amplified by the increase in the number of images and the information flow due to globalization.

This paper presents a series of reflections on the aestheticization of everyday life and postmodern urban landscapes.

In particular, it emphasizes the reduction and commodification of public space due to the centrality that consumption spaces have assumed in the city. Moreover, it emphasizes the standardization of urban landscapes that is strictly connected with the logic of hyper-consumption. It will also consider the accentuation of the division in groups which is the result of elective/selective processes in the city (gentrification) and the diffusion of exclusive lifestyle communities (gated communities).

Aesthetics and Art Sociology: for a New Theoretical Platform

Ratiu, Mara

*Theory Department, University of Art and Design in Cluj-Napoca
Cluj-Napoca, Romania*

Keywords

contemporary art, aesthetics, art sociology

Contemporary art is commonly defined as a continuous proliferation of heterogeneous practices and discourses that has for already long time banished any possibility of theoretical or - at least - instrumental consensus. Hence, the relevance of the traditional theoretical approaches of the artistic realm - art history and aesthetics - has been constantly questioned during the last decades, while social sciences and particularly sociology took the floor in analysing the unprecedented diversity of the artistic practices. The aesthetical discourse has been accused - and therefore dismissed - of placing its major present-day foci - the aesthetic experience and the judgement of taste - under philosophical jurisdiction (Schaeffer:2000), whereas art criticism as mediator of art history has been referred to as being in critical condition (Searle: 2008). On the other hand, the social sciences' approach to contemporary art, though producing new and consistent knowledge, is by definition reluctant when normative matters are at stake.

Within this context, this paper investigates the legitimacy of the traditional theoretical approaches - mainly aesthetics - versus the profusion and influence of social sciences - principally art sociology - with respect to contemporary art. Consequently, the paper is cross examining the methodological instruments of the two disciplines as well as their fundamentals in connection with the multifaceted contemporary art phenomenon. The hypothesis of this paper is that the continuously reshaping artistic practices, interconnected with the new world order (Stallabrass:2004), claim for a new theoretical fostering that transcends conventional discipline division of tasks. Therefore the major aim of the paper is to argue that the most appropriate approach to contemporary art is a new platform combining normativeness of philosophical aesthetics and empirical and conceptual findings of art sociology.

Aesthetics strategies and sociological shifts. Bodies, sex and gender in the practices of women artists from the sixties and the seventies, in Europe and US

Barbut, Clélia

Île de France (75), Université Paris 3 - Sorbonne Nouvelle France,

Keywords

Gender, power, Knowledge, intern analysis

Early in the sixties, the first performances gave a glimpse of how a great part of the late twentieth century artistic objects would become: embodied. During the following decades, woman artists in particular incessantly turned their practices towards body policies in artistic representation; quite frequently, they focused on its sexed and gendered structures. In those works, bodies no longer appear as static forms but rather as dynamical sites, relaying interaction processes as subjectivation or objectivation, empowerment, awareness-raising and individuation. It seems that though such practices are obvious as objects for sociological investigation, an appropriate qualitative approach, starting with intern analysis, has to be specify. We will argue here that from these bodily practices, one can get onto contemporary shifts in sociology of arts, challenging both its fields and methods.

Some of the recent (crediting intern analysis) proposals in sociology of arts suggest to question how artistic objects get their status (Zolberg, 1997), considering them as processes (Esquenazi, 2007), in which the physical forms would only be steps in broader social becomings; moreover, attention should be paid on how they express their production, and interpretation contexts. We will point out that through body art objects, this approach might be narrowed on precise types of social relationships: one may study the empowered and normative conditions of artistic practices first, and then their potential epistemic impact in terms of knowledge.

We might argue first that studying artistic production contexts, one has to pay attention to the material and symbolic coercion weighting on artistic gestures: indeed, many women artists used explicit and critical strategies, accusing the fact that the feminine presence in the art worlds has often be reduced to the position of passive objects. But still, the unfolded presence of those bodies in their works (alternatively staged through their biological, but also their cultural and technological intricacies) evokes various enunciative positions about corporeity: it appears that these positions came up, at the same time, in other social fields. We will focus on the discursive field, questioning the appearance of bodies, sex and gender in some contemporary western theories (among others: Butler, Haraway, Héritier).

An art to "use value": The New Patrons of the Fondation de France

Jean-Paul, FOURMENTRAUX

*Sociology, Lille 3 University and EHESS Paris
PARIS, FRANCE*

Keywords

Art and Society, Public Space, Territory, Mediation, Citizenship.

Since the 1990s, French public policy and/or private contributions are intended to broaden the scope of the arts and increase the benefits to society through a commitment to "democratization of culture": an enrichment of the offer and open to practices that were not previously recognized as part of Fine Arts (dance urban design, architecture, landscape, cooking ...). In this period the Fondation de France proposes to reconsider the "use value" of art. The action program of the New Patrons, designed by the artist François Hers, allows citizens facing social or developmental issues in a locality to get contemporary artists involved in their preoccupations through commissioning a work of art. Its originality is based on a combination between three main players: the artist, the citizen as patron, and the cultural mediator, acting together with the public and private partners involved in the project. Up to the present time more than 200 commissions for works from every artistic discipline have come to fruition or are being implemented in France, in all parts of the country, under the New Patrons scheme. Other projects are being developed in Italy, Belgium and various European countries.

Mobilizing case studies, we question the issues and tensions related to the implementation of this program. How the New patrons shape the relationships between society, its artists and their works in a contemporary way to create a new art scène ? By systematically putting demand ahead of offer, the role of the player ahead of that of the spectator, how this New Patrons initiative can takes a new look at the usual procedures followed in the case of private or public interventions in the field of contemporary art ? Taking this as a privileged object of study of the redefinition of relations between art, society and territory, the challenge of this communication is to consider three levels of consequences: the change of scale of artistic creation, the interactions among the art and society, the emergence of new actors in the production and promotion of the arts.

Anthropological Film, Film and Interpretation, Film and Social Sciences, Image and Knowledge

Menezes, Paulo

Sociology, University of São Paulo

São Paulo, Brazil

Keywords

Rouch, Image and Knowledge, Film and Social Sciences, Film and Interpretation, Anthropological Film

This paper analyze an iconic films from documental cinema in their relationships with the Social Sciences (Les Maîtres Fous, Jean Rouch) based on the theoretical assumptions made by Foucault in his text What is an author? having also as reference the typological modes of documentary films proposed by Bill Nichols. Based in these assumptions, takes theoretical position among the various possibilities of different Sociologies of Art, in the direction pointed by Adorno in his polemics with Lukács, for a "reading against the grain", trying to reconstruct the concepts and tessiture (texture) of social discourses by the internal analyses of art works. Deals consequently with the constraints that the author as a function and the name of an author promotes in the direction of a search of an internal logic that defines from the outside the art work and its insertion in an greater coherent totality called "Work of an author". In this direction we interpret these films as Discourses and not as the films of their Directors. The option for this way force the analyst to catch an epistemological detour where the films are no longer seen as evidences of their stories (a ritual description) but inquired in the fundamental concepts of its filmic narration, dialectic units of form and content. The analysis remarks the elements and circumstances that allow the construction of a conceptual frame that places and constitutes the Other as "other" centered in the concept of civilization.

Remarks also the principles and elements imbricated in the options assumed by the director/author in order to constitute a filmic narrative discourse as a general truth about the "other". This allows to apprehend that there is another discourse that permeate the story of the African ritual that conceptualizes the participants and constitutes their position in the world in a more vigorous way as it is disseminated as tessiture of discourse and not as a visible evidence.

A discourse that seems to be "neutral" by the use of the artifice of the Voice-of-God narration but that at the same time pushes their moral propositions to an extreme.

Are 'Children' the New 'Social Inclusion' in British Cultural Policy?

Alexander, Victoria D

Sociology, University of Surrey Guildford, Surrey, United Kingdom

Keywords

children, arts support, State Support for the Arts, Arts and Politics, Art Museums

Gordon Brown's Labour government announced that schools must provide all British children with five hours of "high quality culture" each week. In the words of the Children's Secretary, Ed Balls, "All children and young people should have the chance to experience top quality culture - whether that is seeing a play or dance performance, learning a musical instrument or producing some creative writing." The announcement coincides with a shift in the rhetoric in government documents from Arts Council England, the Department of Culture, Media and Sport, and elsewhere. These documents have moved toward a focus on children (and the creative economy) as priorities for arts funding; the emphasis on social inclusion, which was prevalent under the previous government of Tony Blair, has virtually disappeared.

This paper reports on one aspect of a larger project on cultural policy in the United Kingdom examining trends toward the marketisation of public-sector arts, increasing government intervention, and a growing emphasis on managerialism. The project focuses on the analysis of government documents and policies relating to the arts and arts organisations. This paper looks at the implications of changing government rhetorics with respect to social inequality, and poses some questions. For instance, is a focus on children an indication of the dismissal of the current generation of socially excluded? Does a focus on the creative potential of children contribute more effectively to commercial interests in the creative economy than a focus on social inclusion? And might efforts to raise the cultural capital of every child actually increase social inequality? Drawing on Bourdieu, I suggest that students from backgrounds with higher cultural capital may be more successful in drawing benefits from the mandated hours of arts exposure and participation as compared with children from backgrounds poorer in cultural capital.

Art and Oil: Visualizing Globalization

Stewart, Janet

School of Language and Literature, University of Aberdeen Aberdeen, UK

Keywords

Ranciere, oil, Globalization, art

This paper sets out to provide a phenomenological account of art's encounter with globalization, focusing on the ways that artistic and aesthetic phenomena change and challenge existing means of conceptualising globalization. Globalization itself is a highly contested term, and yet in much existing literature on globalization, whether political, economic, social or cultural, there is one recurrent theme: the idea of the invisible, couched in terms such as "flows", "globalizing forces", and "surface appearances" (which render invisible that which they conceal) (e.g. Simmel 1903; Bauman 2000; Mendieta 2001; Harvey 2005; Sassen 2007). An important strand of sociological writing on globalization sets out to render the invisible visible, and in this, it is close to a form of artistic practice that offers oppositional strategies to the invisibility of "globalizing forces" through subscribing to what we could call a "politics of presence". This chapter explores art's encounter with globalization by analysing the work of a number of artists and collectives (Ursula Biemann, Owen Logan, Ernst Logar, Art not Oil), for whom the oil industry forms the source and repository of issues related to globalization that can be rendered visible through artistic practice (such as connections between oil cities, security, and surveillance). Their work suggests that art has the potential to challenge the "delimitation of the visible and the invisible" that characterises globalization as an "aesthetico-political regime" (Ranciere 2006). In using this definition of globalization and in its focus on individual artists, this paper seeks to contribute to a sociology of art that places the role of the aesthetic at the centre of its enquiry. It does, however, also entail reflection on the limits of artistic critique of this kind, recognising, in particular, the ways in which forms of "aesthetic distribution" (galleries, curators, museums, journals, newspapers) and the artists' materials are enmeshed with the oil industry.

Art and Trauma: Methods of Inquiry, Dialogue and Transformation

Frostig, Karen Frostig

Lesley University, Lesley University Cambridge, United States

Keywords

Trauma, memory, dialogue, art, transformation

As a visual artist, researcher, writer, therapist and social activist, I use The Vienna Project to address a series of questions: How can art address traumatic memory, negotiate transnational identity and facilitate new dialogue? Reworking the relationship between artist, object, and audience, how can art activate change and deepen social engagement? Has art become the new locus for human interaction and communal transformation?

The Vienna Project begins in 2003, when I received a packet of sixty-eight letters, written by my grandparents to my father, between 1938-1941 before their deportation to Riga. I received the letters just four days before the deadline to file an application for post-war restitution from Austria's General Settlement Fund, and seven months before the death of the last Holocaust survivor in my family. Becoming the latest guardian of these letters and filing the claim for post-war restitution opened the door for me to begin the grueling process of reassembling my family's Holocaust history, while dealing with my emerging transnational identity as an Austrian citizen.

Traveling to the forsaken homeland, I used a Nikon digital SLR, to clinically document an emotionally charged encounter with Vienna, the city where my father grew up, and the outskirts of Riga, the city where my grandparents were murdered. The digital images were then developed into a series of memory panels that read as dark time corridors, mixing text with image and memory with a critical look at contemporary Viennese culture.

The Vienna Project discusses a sequenced process of engagement, moving from an initial phase of online research to an ethnographic model, evolving further into new media cultural production. The project has inspired numerous collaborations, as well as stimulated new dialogue between children of perpetrators and children of survivors. Functioning as artist, researcher, educator, and activist, the paper documents my effort to preserve my family's memory within the larger context of genocide awareness and prevention.

Art Dealers and Museum Directors: Friction at the Boundaries

Peist, Nuria

History of Art, University of Barcelona Barcelona, Spain

Keywords

museums, Sociology of Art, art dealers, Consecration, Modern Art

In the first half of the 20th century, a new order arose in the art world that continued to develop throughout the rest of the century. The mechanisms of achieving success for the artists did not experience a radical change; however they underwent a transformation within the very paradigm of modern art. The way to achieve fame was and still is related to the interaction of artists with the legitimizing agents, commonly called mediation.

We look at a representative example from a particular moment of modern art -the middle of the 20th century during the period of institutionalization of the vanguards- through the relationship established between Paul Rosenberg, Pablo Picasso's art dealer, and Alfred Barr, the first director of the first major modern art museum in the world, the MoMA of New York. The way in which both agents challenged the organization of the first retrospective of the artist is a model of the struggles, tensions, and exchanges of power between two phases on the road to the modern artist's success: the informal, represented by the first critics, dealers, and collectors, and the consolidation, exemplified by the first museum directors and the authorized specialists responsible for writing the original monographs about artists and modern styles.

Through the analysis of this critical moment and its peculiarities and frictions, we propose to undertake a comparative analysis with a case of the social organization of the art world in Barcelona. If today, in fact, both access to fame and relationships between and with legitimizing agents have experienced significant changes, above all related to the velocity in accumulation of reputation, we hypothesize that the avenues to power and the increase in capital dedication by the legitimizing agents continue to be the reasons for access to success by current artists. This comparative analysis will permit us to establish an evolutionary line that leads to a hypothesis of the reality of organization of art in the present time.

Art Experiences and Participatory Culture: the Performance Paradigm in SecondLife

Boccia Artieri, Giovanni

Sciences of communication, University of Urbino "Carlo Bo" Urbino, Italy

Gemini, Laura

Sciences of Communication, Univeristy of Urbino "Carlo Bo" Urbino, Italy

Keywords

performance, SecondLife, participatory culture

The aim of this speech is to analyse SecondLife as a privileged place to observe the evolution of the art system in contemporary society (Luhmann). The art function, that is its ability to produce new forms, to communicate observations, to carry out removed possibilities, has always found its most interesting challenges in technological and media languages. On the one hand, they are the places for an artistic experimentation but, in the other one, art is a context where to experiment with media and technology potentiality.

In particular it will be underlined how within the online world art territories are more and more expanded towards the last boundary of the overcoming of the difference between the artist's acting and the audience experience in the name of the mixed-media performance and of centrality of the participatory and co-productive dimension to the process of the event creation.

This paper shows the outcome of an "in world" ethnographic research about art and performances concerning with the works of some of the most important figures of the artistic research in SL (Gazira Babeli, Second Front, Moya, 01.org, etc.). That research underlines the relationship between the avatar/spectator, who becomes a part of the performative mechanism, and the participatory cultures arising around the performative works/actions and generating widespread creativity as User Generated Contents: posts, books, videos, photos. Those "grassroots" contents of the artistic experience circulate outside SL through the web networking the possible experiences of the spectators/performers.

Art in SL seems to accomplish one of the main aims of the Historical Avant-Garde: art as life, a central and "active" - at a cognitive and experience level - role of the spectator. From the representation to the performance (Turner, Schechner).

That is an important example to understand, through art as a social system and a place of observation of society itself, the evolution of the communication and the audience's change of its positioning perception in communication, therefore the relationship between individual and society.

Art field in Norway in the XIX century and the construction of a national identity: a case study on Alfred Emil Andersen

Correa, Amelia

Sociology, University of São Paulo (USP) - Brazil

São Paulo, Brazil

Keywords

artistic trajectory, Alfred Emil Andersen, norwegian painting, nationalist movement

This paper, part of my doctorate research in sociology of art, deals with the "European part" of the trajectory of the Norwegian painter Alfred Emil Andersen (Kristiansand, 1860- Curitiba, 1935) who settled in the southern state of Paraná, in Brazil, in the end of the XIX century (around 1893), where he became very famous and known as "the father of Paraná's painting". Andersen was a naturalist painter, who studied in the Royal Academy of Fine Arts in Copenhagen, and was in a way to a promising career in Scandinavia when, during a trip with his father (who was a ship captain), they made a technical stop in Brazil, where he ended up staying - and painting - for almost 45 years.

To do that, we will have to go back to the art field in Norway in the end of the XIX century, known as the golden age for their artistic movements. Also, it is very important to recover the Norwegian nationalistic movement, where the visual arts played an important role in the construction of the national identity. Andersen's paintings of the period are documents of the influence that the Norwegian Romantic Movement had on him, with the will to reconnect the country with his cultural heritage, instead of connecting with other European nations by modernization. An opposition of this posture was held by an internationalist perspective carried by painters like Christian Krohg and Edvard Munch, that soon became the vanguard and occupied the dominant positions in the art field of Norway. The conflicts and difficulties of the period might help to understand Andersen's decision to live in South America, where he had less competition, as the art field was not yet configured. On the other side, his artistic formation and his social backgrounds should have influenced his vision and representation of the new world.

Art for everybody or for the privileged few - self-definition and self-representation of the contemporary art scene

Szanyi, Agnes

Social Communication Doctoral Program, University of Pecs, tranzit. hu Budapest, Hungary

Keywords

Curators, contemporary art field, self-representation

Analyzing the rejection or incomprehension of contemporary art in the wider society, one will sooner or later face the gap that runs between the public's definition of and expectations towards contemporary art, and that of the most significant agents of the contemporary art scene, that is curators, art critics/art theorists, directors of institutions, gallerists, not mentioning contemporary artists. To understand the nature and the real depth of this gap one has to investigate these different expectations and definitions. Some earlier researches have attempted to explore the attitudes and expectations of the public regarding art in general, but very few investigations aimed at revealing how the contemporary art scene itself seeks to build up its self-representation and legitimacy, and how it defines the aim and role of its own activity.

In my paper I am introducing the results of an interview-series I have conducted among representatives of the Hungarian contemporary art field - on contemporary art here I mean the progressive, cutting edge art practices that are assigned like this by the professionals. I made numerous in-depth, semi-structured interviews with art professionals working in bigger and smaller art institutions, asking them about the significance of contemporary art in our societies, the role and position art aims to gain, about their attitudes regarding their own roles as art professionals, and regarding the audiences.

From these interviews a complex image is emerging, reflecting the attempts of the contemporary art scene towards institutionalization and legitimization.

Art of the 1960s. A challenge to Pierre Bourdieu's notion of art reception

Zahner, Nina Tessa

Institut of Cultural Science, Faculty of Philosophy and Social Science, University of Leipzig Leipzig, Germany

Keywords

Bourdieu, Reception, art field, 1960s

Pierre Bourdieu develops his theory of art reception with strong reference to Erwin Panofsky iconology. Following Bourdieu's reception theory aesthetic capital, as specific form of cultural capital, is central to the decoding of art works. Due to this, knowledge in art history allows the recipient to understand an art work appropriately. Art thus art becomes an element of power. It is an highly educated intellectual elite that defines - via the discursive use of references to art history - what a specific society recognized as art. This cultural elite therefore shapes a specific part of the construction of the shared reality of society. In the 1960s a number of artists were challenging this idea. They were producing art that could easily be understood as it either referred to the everyday knowledge of the recipient or to contexts that the artists themselves provided. Some of these artists were even questioning the very idea that an artwork is constructed of signs. To these artists, the perception of an artwork is not an act of decoding but an individualistic act of intentional perception where subject and object cross each other. The paper will present selected examples of these artistic practices. It will become clear that this kind of art was questioning the dominating ideas of perception within the field and thus the elitist conception of art, held by the art critique and the intellectual elite of the art field of the time. From a theoretical point of view, the interesting question is, if these practices are challenging Pierre Bourdieu's notion of reception and thus his art field conception in a more fundamental manner: When art works do not refer to a distinct body of knowledge in art history, does this challenge Pierre Bourdieu's central role of cultural capital within the art field? Or are the methodological skills one needs to relate to a contemporary art work just another form of cultural capital? It will be the central topic of the paper to discuss how these knowledge forms differ and what this means for Pierre Bourdieu's notion of reception and his art field conception.

Artification and Its Impact on Art

Naukkarinen, Ossi

School of Visual Culture, University of Art and Design Helsinki Helsinki, Finland

Keywords

aesthetics, aestheticization, applied art, instrumental value, artification

The paper deals with a cultural phenomenon that can be called artification and especially with issues that should be taken into account when doing research about it. The neologism artification refers to situations and processes in which something that is not regarded as art in the traditional sense of the word is changed into something art-like or into something that adopts features of art. The phenomenon is closely linked with aestheticization processes.

The possibility of spreading artistic ways of thinking and acting to fields and activities outside of art per se has repeatedly been discussed by various writers over the last decades (e.g., Lotte Darso and John Hartley). The typical point of departure is that there is both art and non-art, and when certain aspects of art (e.g., creativity) are applied to some non-art context, the non-art context (e.g., education, marketing, or scientific research) instrumentally benefits from this. However, it is often the case that even the most fundamental concepts of this approach are left ill undefined. What is meant by the word art? What aspects of art can be used?

Moreover, despite the range of this discussion to date, a topic hardly ever touched upon is what happens to art in such processes, even if art is accepted as one of the central fields of culture. This is the main focus of the paper: how does art itself - both applied and traditional art - may change through such processes? And how are these changes manifested in ways of discussing art (on the conceptual level), in art institutions (education, museums, etc.), and in art practices?

The goal of the paper is to open up some perspectives over how artification affects art on each of these three levels (conceptual-linguistic, institutional, practical) and especially to propose points of departure for studying the phenomenon further. The paper will not present final research results but will reflect on the starting points that are already used in the research project Artification and Its Impact on Art that started in three Finnish universities in the beginning of 2009.

Artist Residency: Psychiatric Unit

Heald, Karen

Faculty of Arts & Society: Contemporary Art and Graphic Design, Leeds Metropolitan University Leeds, UK

Liggett, Dr Susan

North Wales School of Art and Design, Glyndwr University Wrexham, UK

Keywords

time, Psychological Resonance, sleep, Psychiatric, art

Working in a UK based NHS hospital, Heald & Liggett, two contemporary artists, collaborate with patients and staff in an adult psychiatric unit, engaging with arts and science audiences.

The purpose of this research will be to enquire into the politics of location/feminist psychoanalytical theories/psychological resonance and the philosophical complexities of arts and science collaborations. Heald & Liggett's collaboration involves working in a 71-bedded acute inpatient psychiatric unit. The artists' workshops, with patients and staff, include initiating sleep dairies, alongside video projections, pinhole camera and painting workshops. The themes will be sleep/dreams/moods/creativity, and time, and the patients/staff relationships to them. They will investigate Kristeva's texts, in particular, Women's Time (1979) and Revolution in Poetic Language (1974). Kristeva makes the point that female subjectivity seems linked to both cyclical time (menstruation/pregnancy/repetition) and monumental time in sense of eternity (motherhood/reproduction/genetic chain). Extremely potent, considering that some patients are suffering from postnatal depression. The research also explores "psychological resonance", a particular part of the creative process that conjures up the idea of movement between something experienced (object) and it's impact on the individual (subject).

Heald and Liggett are collaborating on ideas relating to a "space" a "in-between-ness" and "cyclical time". Heald's "dream films" create ambient environments, where the audience is unsure as to whether one is asleep or awake, or perhaps even in a state of "in-between-ness". Liggett found "in-between-ness" relates to the stage in the creative process where the artists in her research could not articulate in words exactly what they were intending in their work. The dream state described as occupying "in-between-ness" could also be akin to "psychological resonance", the movement between "sites' or 'states of being', that exists, but are intangible and difficult to articulate. Exploring Winnicott (1994) and Witkin (1974) Liggett suggests that there are three areas of related experience, the subjective, the objective and what Winnicott calls 'potential space'. This 'potential space' Liggett sees as having similarities to "in-between-ness".

Heald and Liggett will present their concepts/ongoing work with the patients/staff, drawing on ideas relating to audiences, culminating in a joint exhibition at the hospital in 2010.

Artists and policymaking process: "unacknowledged legislators", or "mad, bad and dangerous"?

Glinkowski, Paul

Engine Room, Chelsea College of Art, University of the Arts London London, United Kingdom

Keywords

politics, policy, artists

The Recommendation concerning the Status of the Artist adopted by the General Conference of UNESCO at its twenty-first session, in Belgrade, on 27 October 1980 (and re-endorsed in 1997 by a UNESCO convened World Congress as "the principal text relating to the Status of the Artist") included a number of "Guiding principles" that emphasise the importance of including artists, and of facilitating their inclusion, in the policymaking process. The Recommendation urges that Member states should "have the opinions of artists" taken carefully into account in the formulation and execution of their cultural policies. To this end, they are invited to make the necessary arrangements for artists and their organizations to participate in discussions, decision-making processes and the subsequent implementation.

The evidence suggests, however, that artists often have only a very limited or marginal involvement in the policymaking process of UNESCO Member states. In fact, their concerns and interests are often less visible in policy discussions than might be expected. In the UK, for example, Robert Hewison and John Holden of the policy thinktank Demos have written: "In spite of the economic and social significance of their output, artists lack visibility in crucial ways - They do not sit easily within the structures and methods that government - both central and local - have adopted to measure what they consider to be important - It is as though visual artists are invisible.

Through an analysis of the contested and mutable roles attributed to the artist as a public figure in Western cultural and philosophical discourse - from the indictment of poetry and theatre and the arguments for their banishment from the ideal polity elaborated by Plato in the Republic, to Percy Bysshe Shelley's claim in his A Defence of Poetry, 1819, that "poets are -the unacknowledged legislators of the world," to the contributions made by artists to the politically committed cultural avant-gardes of the 20th century - this paper sets out to examine why it might be that, despite the 1980 UNESCO Recommendation, artists are often not viewed as welcome or necessary participants in the policymaking process.

Artists, Singularity and Recognition; a Decade in Portuguese Visual Arts

Conde, Idalina

*Department of Sociology, ISCTE - CIES
Lisboa, Portugal*

Keywords

singularity, artists, Recognition, portuguese art world, visual arts

This paper presents the framework and the main results of a research guided by the notion of singularity in portuguese visual arts: its crucial role in artistic identity and the respective process of recognition. We cross the last decade by comparing two panels of top artists and mediators (critics and curators) approached in 1997 and 2007 by interviews, career analysis and portraits of contemporary art collections, naturally contextualized in overall dimensions and evolutions of this art world. This mapping considers institutions, networks and other organizations, markets, mediations and professionals, but also aesthetic trends and discursive lines in the critic, essays, exhibitions and programming agendas, so relevant to understand contemporary art, professional practices and criteria in recognition.

Centering the study on singularity, the modes by which is conceived, expressed and promoted, notably by specific gatekeeping processes, we expect to highlight its conceptual and operational uses by the art world, but also to reflect about tensions between sociological and "ground" perspectives: how to deal with this concept both problematic and nuclear; connoted with constructions and charismatic celebrations (and individualistic) as with an essential tautology for the individuals that remains in contemporary art, certainly in that ideological sense but equally for genuine meanings of identity?

In fact, as we will see, singularity still remains in the "ground" as an ideal and/or one personal achievement, even if it was reframed within other professional and intellectual conditions, despite all apparent refusals or deconstructions that questioned both notions of author (since Barthes and Foucault) and biography in artistic identity (especially with the modernism). In parallel to many changes in references and tools: new paradigms in art theory and iconographies, electronic media, network and group activity as basis for creativity, etc.

The paper will point, then, this re-shaped and re-placed singularity, its contextual inscriptions and trajectories in Portugal, and its plural meanings - from the "ground" to sociology. We mention, yet, that this research was supported by the Calouste Gulbenkian Foundation in 2006-2008 and some aspects are included in a project proposed to the National Foundation for Science.

Arts and economy: problems of a distinction.

Neckel, Sighard

*Institute of Sociology, University of Vienna
Vienna, Austria*

Keywords

Rules of the Artistic Field., Arts and Economy, Financing the Art World, Economization of Arts, Artistic Markets

It is a general statement in sociology that modern society is functionally differentiated, i.e. that the social world is divided into different fields which respectively operate according to special social rules and cultural codes. Arts and economy as well are subject to specific norms and regulations that are not to transcribe from one social sphere to the other. The economy in modern society is orientated on money making opportunities whereas the artistic field historically emerged not least in acts of renunciation of business and financial success. In fact, the dissociation from the economic sphere might have always been an idealization since the visual arts needed the demand on markets in order to free themselves from the patronage of throne and altar. But as long as the economic demand was not the equivalent of an aesthetic judgement the field of arts remained delimitable from business. Nowadays, a distinction between visual arts and economy seem to be possible less and less. On art markets today, the aesthetic value and the financial yields are barely to separate from each other. More than ever - so the main thesis of my paper - the sales value of art in itself matters as the decisive judgement about the artistic value, too. In my talk central elements of this development will be reconstructed. I argue that the economization of arts has been accompanied by the dissolution of art terms. One consequence was that economic revenues could be considered as aesthetic signals. But there are limits of an economization of arts, too. Not least for economic reasons itself, actors in the field of arts must be interested in the dissociation from economics in order not to turn from an artist to an ordinary business(wo)man in public perception. The symbolic dimensions of arts still requires strategies of publically distance oneself from the sheer interest in financial gains.

Arts and Politics: how illustrated postcards were used for propaganda purposes in European societies

Oliveira, Maria Madalena

*Department of Communication Sciences, University of Minho
Braga, Portugal*

Martins, Moisés

*Department of Communication Sciences, University of Minho
Braga, Portugal*

Keywords

arts, politics, propaganda, illustrated-postcards

There is a generally held belief that postcards are a kind of marginal media. However, for many decades they were one of the most frequent means of communication and way of sharing images. «The postcard», explains Tom Phillips, «was the phone call of the early part of the century, the mode of making arrangements, placing orders or just keeping in touch». Their interest is, nevertheless, not closed only in the interpersonal sphere. The truth is that, as many other visual arts, postcards were also taken over by ideological movements and governments. Given that the golden age of postcards coincides with many dictatorial regimes and changes in forms of governing in many European countries, illustrated cards are also a key source of understanding how image was used for propaganda purposes.

In fact, it could also be said that postcards provide one of the most important visual inventories since the end of the 19th century. Many categories of pictures may be identified when looking at them, as there is a wide range of registers on various topics. From cinema, to architecture, crossing fashion, advertising and humour, illustrated postcards had a strong impact in the 20th century European societies. In the political field, it would be inaccurate not to recognise the role these particular instruments of communication played in terms of ideological propaganda. That's why it would be quite wrong to ignore them when aiming to understand how propaganda services used visual arts to diffuse political ideals.

Taking into consideration especially European dictatorships (namely the Portuguese and the Spanish regimes of the middle 20th century), this paper intends to analyse a sample of postcards concerning these regimes. The main objective is to examine how postcards' pictures were used for political goals. On the other hand, this research intends also to explore how satiric images (that are still a kind of artistic productions) became parallel ways of a kind of discourse against the official stream.

Attitudes of Young Artists toward Public: Communication vs. Romantic Paradigm

Zilinskaite, Viktorija

Stratification department, Institute for Social Research Vilnius, Lithuania

Keywords

Artist-public relation, creative industries, art as communication

The presentation will analyse attitudes of young artists towards their work of arts and public. Tension between artist and public is created through educational system. Quality of artistic education system - art schools and art academies - in Lithuania is positively evaluated by experts, while artistic subjects in general education system is still based mainly on Romantic paradigm of art. Contradiction between two images of art - communication and reality sui generis - puzzles formation of creative society and positioning of creative industries.

The research of young artists was carried out for analysis of their professional integration. Graduates of Vilnius Academy of Arts were interviewed about their professional carrier and attitudes within five years after graduation. It is interesting to notice, that a lot of young artists indirectly show their identity with Romantic paradigm of art. While professors stress importance of context, communicative and critical aspects of art, the research showed that longer studies were related to bigger risk to have romantic image of art.

Tension between work of art evaluation criteria and conceived customers' (purchasers, public) expectations is seen even more in applied arts. Attitudes of existing or prospect public are less important than those of other artists or art critics. Distance between artist and public is seen in artists attitudes to present-future evaluators. Eternal value of art seems to be much more important than present demand. Such attitude contradicts image of art as a form of social critics stressed in Academy.

The presentation is based on an empirical research and will analyse various artist-public relation determining factors.

Authority and Orchestration in the literary field. A Network Approach

van der Eerden, Maya

Department of Language and Culture Studies, Tilburg University Tilburg, The Netherlands

Keywords

social network analysis, orchestration, authority, symbolic capital

Extensive research has been conducted on the production of symbolic capital in the literary field. Formation of a reputation and ultimately the consecration of a literary work in the history of literature can be considered the product of critics' judgments. This consecration takes place through the process of orchestration, a term coined by Bourdieu (1990). Bourdieu's concept of orchestration, in which critics gradually attune their judgments, is in fact a process of consensus formation. During this process critics with authority are believed to play crucial roles: The authority ascribed to their judgments makes other critics attune their judgments over time.

Van Rees (1987) argues there are several institutional factors that determine critics' degree of authority, such as memberships of jury's, the prestige of the magazine or paper, the scope, wide and frequency with which critics publish. Most subsequent studies assume that consensus is reached by the institutional factors of critics. Based on those assumptions the reputation formation of authors and artists are studied, rather than the reputation formation of critics themselves.

The actual process of consensus formation and the different positions taken by critics are still rather unclear though. As a matter of fact there seems to be two different concepts of authority. First there is the concept of institutional authority as shortly noted above. Second there is a concept of authority that explains why authority has a crucial role in the process of consensus formation. Martin (2002) argues that a person A's authority is that another person B believes that he should be influenced by what person A holds to be the case, at least within some demarcated realm. This definition provides an indicator of the consensus process.

The proposed paper scrutinizes the different positions critics take in the consensus formation. Are the critics with most followers also the critics that resemble the institutional factors of authority?

The research makes use of content analysis of reviews which data are used to perform social network analysis. This analysis makes it possible to distinguish between the different positions critics take in the consensus formation.

Beyond Verfransung: Reflection of Interdisciplinary Cultural Phenomenon in Mauricio Kagel's Antithese für einen Darsteller mit elektronischen + öffentlichen Klängen (1962)

Mikawa, Makoto

Don Wright Faculty of Music, The University of Western Ontario London, Ontario, CANADA

Keywords

Anarchy, Synthesis, Verfransung, Grenzüberschreitung

In the face of trans-boundary between art genres, where technical, material, and theoretical concepts of musical composition are now partly hybridized with those of other fields in art and vice versa, Theodor W. Adorno analyzes the ongoing upheaval with a catchword Verfransung [infringement or straying off course]. This term first appeared in an essay Die Kunst und die Künste (1966) [Art and the Arts]. While his insightful observation with profundity of aesthetic thought depicts well the early phase of the interdisciplinary phenomenon and its process, analyses for that of musical composition leave debatable issues worth reconsidering. Already four years earlier than the publication of this essay, an Argentinean-German composer Mauricio Kagel presented a significant interdisciplinary musical work Antithese for one performer with electronic and public sounds (1962) where upon his compositional concept exceeds the framework of Adorno's conception of Verfransung of arts. Consisting of electronic music, acting on stage, and graphic notation, Antithese synthesizes these components from different art genres without losing their individual identities, and the synthesis forms a unity of the work. Kagel's brief explanation of the structural characteristic that "anarchy is omnipresent" is a striking, pregnant description that allows us to examine the relevancy of his "anarchy in music" in relation to Adorno's perception of Verfransung tendency of the arts. Taking into account innovative aspects of Antithese as a harbinger of new musical structure and form with interdisciplinary compositional approach, this study attempts to identify omnipresent anarchic characters both in the material and aesthetic domains. I will also demonstrate through an analysis the structural design that attains the unity of these characteristic components. Finally, these analyses will substantiate how Kagel's creative force with sharp cultural observations from a perspective of anarchy provides incentive for developing a new musical form and how different the aesthetic direction of the composer is from that of Adorno, with regard to the chaotic phenomenon of frontier crossing of art genres.

Body And Visual Image - New Readings: Deconstruction, medium and immediacy

Pereira, Anabela

*Sociology, ISCTE
Portugal,*

Keywords

Visual image, Body, Immediacy

The interest in body images alongside a concern for their reception and repercussions on the viewer has an exceptional innovative dimension - one that echoes the program conveyed by contemporary theory through which a new significance of the World Image and World Knowledge is launched. It gathers not only Art Theory, Image Criticism, Body Interpretation but also Narrative Perspectives.

Making this position explicit, our conception of body image criticism begins with the analysis of the form, which articulates the authority attributed to the medium in which it is located, the narratives problematic, as well as the nature of the body's immediacy in the world, consequently producing a new paradigm which is essential to a better understanding of the images. To make mediation a formal problem, it is necessary for an individual to realize how absolutely impossible it is to explain visual content and its effects, whether in the realm of arts and technology, science or politics without a discussion of their contexts, forms, and histories.

In visual culture, it becomes history by drawing attention to the visual object's nature, rather than the role of the viewer/critic, or the embodied subjectivity of the author or subject. This second approach to visual images claims the importance of identity in the sense that every interpretation differs according to the subject position. "Far from suggesting that an explanation follows from a particular identity according to some essential or defining characteristic, this [approach] assumes that subjectivity is always in a state of flux and that while all knowledge is situated, it is never fixed" (Haraway, 1988).

Virtually or aesthetically speaking, body imagistic and cultural knowledge are located and never permanent. Expressive bodies, arts and sign languages achieve (im)possible readings due to volatile subjectivities. Given that the human figure has always been artistically exploited in its formal and anatomic visions. We will then present a template sign for the meanings and dominant interpretative paradigms of body's visual image, approaching the implicit diversity and fragmentation in postmodern narrative perspectives and their communicative accomplishments.

Constant and Simultaneous Reflexivity as a Dance Professional Competence. Discovering, locating, seeing, visualizing and evaluating the dancing body and its parts

Bassetti, Chiara

*Sociology and Social Research, University of Trento
Trento, Italy*

Keywords

performance, Body, dance, Reflexivity

The paper focuses on the particular reflexivity requested to professional dancers and on the ways in which it comes progressively learned and evolves during dance training.

The paper derives from my multisite ethnography on the professional world of dancers. Data include interviews as well as fieldnotes and video-recordings of the everyday activities of two Italian dance companies and related schools, where - in order to better understand dance training a/effects - I also enrolled in dance courses.

What professional dancers must be able to do is to look at their moving body as external observers, not as integrated beings, and to evaluate it. They have to do so (a) constantly - during theatre performances, rehearsals, lessons, exercises - and (b) at the same time they are moving and dancing, while usually we lack reflexivity when we are engaged in practical courses of action.

As the paper shows different resources are exploited - and taught to exploit during dance training - to this end: proprioception, self-perception/vision and self- imagination/visualization. The first one is physical, corporeal, and implies gradually discovering one's own body and its parts; learning to allocate pain in it/them; learning to perceive its/their position in space, as well as their mutual position. The latter two are visual: whereas musicians can hear the sound of their playing, dancers can only re-view their work by performing and looking at their own moving body reflected in a mirror and/or visualized in their mind. While self-vision - with the issues that it implies about perception of identity/otherness - brings to a reflected (moving) image, self-visualization - through the use of metaphors, the personification of body's parts and the attribution to them of an intentionality that normally pertains to the subject as whole - brings to an ideal one.

Finally the paper focuses on the ways in which these reflexive resources assume different relative relevance in different situations (synchronically) and times (diachronically), interact and mutually evolve - together with one's own body conception - until allowing the performing professional to know if the ideal image corresponds to the one s/he could see in a possible mirror.

Contemporary Trends: Between Public Art and Guerrilla Advertising

Cattani, Annalisa

Dams, University of Trieste Imola, Italy

Keywords

art, Advertising, guerrilla

One of the most interesting form of contemporary art is Public art. Born as a form of guerrilla art, the term refers today to works of art in any media that have been planned and executed with the specific intention of being sited or staged in the public domain, usually outside and accessible to all. It can be divided into three main genres: permanent site specific, temporary site specific, audience specific, according to the form and to the aims of the projects. The first and the second are generally characterized by installations realized in collaboration with public or private institutions, inspired by a given or chosen place. The third are often much more people oriented. This form of public art is designed to encourage audience participation and sometimes tries to affect and to shape the relationships of a particular area. It is often the voice of marginal cultures and very often it still promotes guerrilla projects, which try to gain space, even without permission, outside the institutional white cube.

Advertising shows something similar in the so-called guerrilla advertising, which avoids the institutional displays in favour of unexpected performances and perturbant installations, which are not immediately recognizable as commercials. It was born as the voice of creative but low budget agencies, but now as it happens in public art it is used as a new trend even by rich and famous brands such as Nike.

Does guerrilla advertising put into question contemporary art creativity or is it just "the face of the same medal"?

Cosmopolitan Individualism: Omnivorousness as Cultural Border-Crossing

Mathias, Matthew

*Sociology, Emory University
Atlanta, USA*

Keywords

cultural consumption, individualism, omnivorism

Bourdieu's Distinction (1984) posits that a market for cultural goods exists, whose logics stratify society into cultural elites and the hoi polloi. For Bourdieu, knowledge of high culture is handed down between generations, stratifying access to valuable resources and opportunities, thereby reproducing the socio-economic hierarchy. Research has extended Bourdieu's conception of cultural consumption by suggesting a more nuanced concept: omnivorism. This research contends that omnivorism is the current method of high status arts consumption (Peterson and Simkus 1992; Peterson and Kern 1996; Bryson 1996). The homology between socio-economic position and cultural consumption is replaced by a heterology (Garcia-Alvarez, Katz-Gerro, and Lopez-Sintas 2007). Much of the literature contends that status and class drive cultural consumption. This argument is my point of departure. Using survey data from the Americans Perceptions of Artists Survey (2002), I contribute to the theoretical understanding of omnivorism by exploring broader cultural-institutional factors impacting levels omnivorousness.

The omnivore literature has not fully explored social networks' impacts on cultural consumption (DiMaggio 2004). Omnivorousness, not simply an individual consumption pattern, represents a cultural theme characteristic of the West, and present throughout the world. Cultural institutionalists see models of individualism as the dominant formulation of identity, anchoring the individual in society and serving as a motor for distinction (Frank and Meyer 2002, Frank, Meyer, and Miyahara 1995, Frank and McEneaney 1999). This argument borrows from Durkheim's The Division of Labor in Society (1984) and Simmel's "Individuals and Freedom" (1971) and "The Metropolis and Mental Life" (ibid.). Durkheim's individualism is the least common denominator in highly differentiated societies, while Simmel's is the dominant form of self-preservation, expression, and affiliation in modern polities.

Conceptualizing omnivorousness as cultural border crossings, the frequency individuals participate in high and low cultural events, I aim to show how individualism shapes omnivorousness. The results support my argument: controlling for class (income) and status (education), urbanity, dense arts networks membership, and voluntarism, indicating a Durkheimian "religion of humanity", increase levels of cultural border crossings. I argue that a "cosmopolitan individualism" provides a cultural foundation for omnivorousness, suggesting that cosmopolitan omnivorism is the modus operandi of high status cultural consumption.

Could Pop Culture be considered as Art Heritage? Japanese Manga as artistic creation

Sabre, Clothilde

Sociology- Anthropology, Lille 1 University Villeneuve d'Ascq, France

Keywords

manga, Globalization, heritage, museum, tourism

For more than ten years now, it is acknowledged that Japanese pop culture productions have become successful worldwide. Manga (i.e. Japanese comic book) is a huge part of these industries of entertainment, with high sales and large audience. Nevertheless, it would be simplistic to consider only this aspect of the phenomenon: though manga is a cultural industry and a mainstream production, it could be considered also as a form of art. For example, about its origin, specialists pointed out that this pop culture object is affiliated with the Japanese pictorial tradition, like woodblock print. In addition, the famous artist Hokusai is designated as the one who created the word "manga". Then we can see a will to establish the artistic affiliation of manga and then to consider it as an artistic and cultural creation, not only just a pop culture goods. Hence, to go further with that theme, we can have a look at the "International Manga Museum", a museum established in Kyoto in 2006. Indeed, trying to analyze the implication of that kind of museum leads to raise the question of considering manga as art and including this form of art to a making of heritage process. Among the observations I have made in that museum (fieldwork, summer 2008) I have noticed elements which led me to see this museum as a very important place where the process of artistic recognition and heritage consideration are in progress. Nevertheless, these kinds of considerations about manga are quite recent: for a long time, manga has been criticized and underrated by Japanese public opinion. Indeed, that process is clearly linked with globalization of Japanese pop culture and its consequences, particularly in terms of tourism and cultural highlights. Foreign tourists are coming in Japan with the will to see and enjoy pop culture, because that is a more and more important part of their image of the country. Then, the purpose here, from an anthropological point of view, is to make the link between global success, foreign praise and the gain of cultural and artistic respectability for manga in Japan.

Creative Infrastructure and Art Market: Practices of Support to the Arts and their Consequences. The Case of Romania

Ratiu, Dan Eugen

Philosophy, Babes-Bolyai University

Cluj-Napoca, Romania

Keywords

art market, artistic creativity, arts support, creative infrastructure

This paper provides a systematic analysis of the creative infrastructure and the art market in Romania, focusing on the interactions between practices of support to the arts and artistic practices. The notion of "creative infrastructure" refers to the extent to which a society supports artistic creativity by public and private policies and practices that aid the development of artists and the maintenance, enhancement, and possibility of artistic endeavours (Galligan and Cherbo). Successive governments in post-communist Romania assumed the support to the arts as almost exclusively (public) task. Policymaking and implementation disregarded actors from private sector (business and non-profit organisations) and the art market. State intervention in the artistic field was also justified in "ethical" terms of avoiding the market or correcting its inequities.

The main goal of this paper is to further the understanding of roles played by practices - public or private - of support to the arts and the art market in shaping artistic practices and developing new forms of artistic expression. A secondary objective is to evaluate the impact of practices of support on the dynamics of cultural participation and consumption. The research is based on personal observation and data analysis, as well as on secondary analysis of surveys on cultural market (Concept Foundation 2000), on mediators such as contemporary art galleries and on cultural consumption (Centre for Research on Culture 2005-2008). The approach is comparative, the case of Romania being considered in global context: the changing regime of contemporary art (R. Moulin) that is the increasing interdependency between the cultural field (homologation, hierarchy) and the art market (transactions), and the globalization of the art market. The relevance of the research goes thus beyond this particular case. Its findings will be used to renovate the conceptual framework of arts policy, by reframing cultural action from defensive policies to creativity policies aiming at the sustainability of environments for artistic creativity, including their survival in the art market and safeguarding diversity.

Cultural Diversity in the Globalization Context: The case of the Korean film industry

Chung, Jinwon

*Sociology, Emory University
Atlanta, USA*

Keywords

Concentration, cultural policy, cultural diversity, Film industry, Globalization

Cultural diversity has been a crucial issue since the impact of globalization has been widely discussed. It is a common claim of opponents of globalization that it decreases cultural diversity by expanding of Western media production into other nations. Previous research studies focusing on the effect of Western cultural products have often overlooked other factors such as the internal dynamics of media market and a governmental policy in other nations. This study intends to provide more comprehensive explanation about cultural diversity in the context of globalization by considering the missing parts. While considering the internal dynamics of market concentration of foreign cultural products as well as the effect of cultural policy on a local cultural industry, this study examines factors that affect the cultural diversity within the context of globalization.

The literature on media production offers competing accounts. From the cultural imperialism thesis and the cyclical account on media industry, the negative effect of market concentration would be expected which is to say that high concentration decrease diversity. The resource partitioning argument and the open system account provide another view - namely that concentration would have a positive effect on cultural diversity. On the other hand, it is also expected the cultural policy in a nation would have an independent effect on cultural diversity in the media industry aside from the market concentration.

The data used in this study comes from "Korean Cinema Yearbook" (1977-2007) published by the Korean Film Council (KOFIC). It includes statistical data and extensive information about films which are produced and distributed in each year. Since the first yearbook (1977) contained data from early 1960s, the researcher could cover years from 1962 to 2007.

I find that increased number of foreign films had a negative effect on the number of Korean films produced. However, I also find that increased market concentration in the film industry had a positive effect on the number of Korean film produced. Cultural policy has either a negative or no effect. Implication of these findings for future research will be discussed.

Cultural globalization and the practice of translation: Technologies, standards, and routines of audiovisual translation in four European countries

Kuipers, Giselinde

sociology and anthropology, university of amsterdam

Amsterdam, Netherlands

Keywords

comparative, cultural industry, Globalization, Media, translation

Translation is often used as a metaphor for what happens when people, ideas, and object move across boundaries. However, this paper will analyze the actual practice of translation, as a crucial but often unnoticed contribution to globalization processes and transnational flows.

Using data from interviews with translators and translation specialists, along with observational data of translation practices, this article analyzes the standards, routines, and practices of audiovisual translation (e.g. film, television, gaming) in four European countries: the Netherlands, Italy, France, and Poland. Different technologies for audiovisual translation have been adopted in these countries, each having their own possibilities and constraints: dubbing in France and Italy, subtitling in the Netherlands, and a voiceover (for television) and subtitling (for cinemas) in Poland. This paper will, first, sketch the development and working of each of these translation systems, within the larger cultural and media field. Second, it will focus on the actual practice and standards for audiovisual transnational in these four national contexts: how are cultural imports translated and adapted? What happens in dubbing and voiceover studios, and in translation offices? How do translators understand their relation with the content, genre, and provenance, of the source "text"? How are translation practices embedded in institutional contexts? And how do these practices, standards, and routines differ cross-nationally? Each translation technology has specific consequences, but using the cases of Italy and France, two dubbing countries, I will show that even the same translation system can lead to very different effects in different institutional and cultural contexts.

Culture and Cohesion. How cultural operators access regional development funds in Poland

Riepe, Anna

*Applied Cultural Sciences, Leuphana University of Lüneburg
Brussels, Belgium*

Keywords

Structural Funds, Socio-economic development, cultural projects, actors strategies

In recent years, discourses around the role of culture, the arts and creativity for socio-economic development slowly spread. It is more and more accepted that the art sector is not only a "nice to have" but also an important element of social AND economic prosperity.

On EU level, Structural Funds are the main instrument for cohesion. They represent a third of the EU-budget and therefore come only second to agriculture support structures. As the expectations of culture as a positive factor for socio-economic development is increasing, culture, the arts and the creative sector in general should have a standing within Structural Funds. Still, projects will only "fit" if they contribute to socio-economic development.

Poland is one of the countries openly supporting cultural projects within Structural Funds and therefore was chosen as case study.

Taking this as a starting point, the following question is raised:

What kind of strategies do cultural operators use to access Structural Funds?

Within the framework of sociological Neo-Institutionalism (NEE/INGRAM 1998), I focus on different levels of interaction and the role of formal and informal norms to support the analyse of the drivers, facilitators and barriers that can explain the application process of cultural operators in Poland.

Disciplinary imperialism or analytical wrestling: Rethinking semiotics, aesthetics and sociology

Kupferberg, Feiwel

Culture, Language and Media, Malmö University Malmö, Sweden

Keywords

epistemology, sociology, aesthetics, semiotics

In his book Structuralist Poetics, Jonathan Culler argues that from a literary point of view, everything can be seen as a "text". The everyday world is a text, culture is a text and literary norms (genres) as well as conventions are texts. From a sociological point of view everything, not the least the literary and artistic worlds are seen as partial empirical realities ("social fields" or "institutions") which are at the same time "social constructions." Now looking on the world as a text which is to be deciphered by some competent reader or as empirical realities that have already been constructed socially by actors who are themselves endowed with different kinds of habitus and equipped with different degrees of social and symbolic capital and accompanying strategies of distinction, is obviously something different. On the other hand, the two approaches amount to the same thing in the sense that both seek to impose a particular perspective on the world. The question I want to raise in this paper is if there are some epistemological advantages in trying to replace the usual, "elevated" way disciplines go about trying to make sense of the world (which we could call "disciplinary imperialism") with something more "down to earth" that we could call "analytical wrestling". With the latter I mean that you so to say step down from your imagined throne and try to "grab" the other in a more open-ended contest. You emerge yourself in the perspective of the other, but not completely, you then return to your own perspective but somewhat shaken or changed. What would such a way of approaching the issue of aesthetics and sociology contribute to both? Could something new emerge out of such analytical wrestling, something that contains elements of both perspectives at the same time?

Electro-Acoustic Music Composers and Creative Transformations of Sonic Memories of the World

Marontate, Jan

Communication, Simon Fraser University Burnaby, Canada

Keywords

electro-acoustic music, collective memory, sonic art

This paper examines the sociological dimensions of the artistic legacy of a project in electro-acoustic communication that has been underway for almost forty years. The study draws on interviews with electroacoustic composers who created a collection of ethnographic field recordings known as the World Soundscape Project (WSP). The WSP grew out of communication researchers' concerns about noise pollution but rapidly evolved into a documentary project about disappearing sonic memories of the world and, subsequently, an artistic resource for the composers in their own creative work. The archives include a collection of audio field recordings of public spaces in urban locations, and the sounds of specific types of places outside of urban areas (such as sounds of a working mining town), photographic documentation of the sites where the field recordings were made, and textual descriptions of sounds of the past in literature. The paper will discuss the transformation of researchers' definitions of "noise", ways of characterizing "sonic environments" and critically analyze the challenges of using historic collections of ethnographic field recordings in sociological research about artistic production, technology and cultural change.

eMotion: mapping museum experience - or: How to measure the reception of the art

Wintzerith, Stéphanie

Free lance visitor research and evaluation, Wintzerith - Evaluation for cultural institutions Karlsruhe, Germany

Tröndle, Martin

Institut for Research in Art and Design, University of Applied Science Northwestern Switzerland, Academy of Art and Design Switzerland, <http://www.mapping-museum-experience.com>

Keywords

audience development, museum research, reception of art, artistic research

Moving inside the exhibition, being moved by the works of art, interpreting and sometimes even discussing them is mainly what visitors do in an art museum. While the main factors influencing the behaviour of museum audiences are relatively well known, their emotions and their cognitive activity remain a mystery. An interdisciplinary team of scholars and museum professionals started the eMotion project to investigate the physical, emotional and cognitive dimensions of the art exhibition visit.

eMotion is supported by the Swiss National Fund and Ubisense and is both a scientific research project and an artistic experience. The aim is to analyse the emotional and cognitive activity of visitors to an art exhibition while looking at works of art. A new technology is developed first to locate the participants precisely inside the exhibition, second to measure their skin reactivity and heartbeat as signs of emotions and cognitive activity. A questionnaire gathers further information about the participant visitors and their practice in the museum.

Where exactly do the participants have their peaks of arousal, both emotional and cognitive? Are those due to the works of art, their environment, both in combination or external factors? Do some works arouse more reactions than others? What about the same piece of art exhibited at different places in the museum? In other words, how strong does the context influence the perception of the art? And what makes out the art experience?

These are but a few questions that will be closely looked at while analysing the gathered data. eMotion is due to be conducted in June and July 2009 in the Kunstmuseum St. Gallen (Switzerland). During this time, the data will also be processed in order to create a real time work of art integrated in the museums' exhibition. Each member of the team has a particular approach and needs to integrate the collected data in his/her own discipline, which makes the project even more enriching and thrilling. You will be the first to know about the findings of eMotion!

Flânerie as a way to explore urban space. Dilemmas and perspectives

Nuvolati, Giampaolo

Dept. of Sociology and Social Research, University of Milan Bicocca Italy,

Keywords

flâneur, social sciences, city

The notion of flâneur - employed since the late 19th century to designate poets and intellectuals that critically observed people's behavior while strolling among the crowd, and codified in the Walter Benjamin's influential work on the Passages of Paris - is once again of central interest (in sociology, philosophy, architecture, literature, and cinema) as a tool for identifying a specific mode of travel and exploration of places, a particular type of reflective relationship with people and spaces. Anthony Giddens, Zygmunt Bauman, Mike Featherstone, Keith Tester, Ash Amin and Nigel Thrift are only some of the contemporary thinkers who, from startlingly different vantage points, have addressed the topic of flâneurs. The paper tries to define the main characteristics of the flâneur/flâneuse (as artists or writers vagabonding and describing the urban life) in the past as well in the contemporary societies and to investigate his/her potential role in the social sciences. Although, starting from the School of Chicago, there are strong links between the city as a concrete spatial and social milieu and as a narrative context, the connections between sociology and flânerie have often been obscured by the desire of sociology itself to claim its credentials as a scientific discipline. Today, the post-modern crisis of scientific rationality, ideology and metanarratives makes stories increasingly important in order to properly interpret society, reinforcing the links between sociology and the narrative approach. Therefore the paper deals with some dilemmas and perspectives for developing a more general approach oriented to discover the concrete usefulness of flânerie in the sociological field. In the paper an ongoing didactic experience finalized to improve students' flânerie for interpreting the urban life in the metropolitan area of Milan will be presented.

Follow me into the temple of art ! : A sociological account of the performances of multiple museum guides

Lai, Chia-Ling

Graduate Institute of Futures Studies, Tamkang University Taipei, Taiwan

Keywords

senses, Museum Guides, mobilities, human and non-human hybrids, forms of capital

Current studies on art and museums, paying little attention on the long lasting but recently transformed practices of multiple museum guide services' from panel introductions, guidebooks, personal guides to the audio-visual guides, fail to explore how the significant intermediate dimensions intervene not only the museum installation but also its consumption and reception. This research analyses the historical development of guidebooks to its current technological form performed by audio guides, due to the social trends embodied in multiplication of senses, human and non-human hybridisation, time-space flexibility and cultural industrialisation; and also its multiple uses by different visitors, considering the speed of the visit, human and non-human relationship as well as visitor's capital accessible to the exhibition based on one current case study.

Drawing upon Actor-Network Theory, Bourdieu's theory of practice and Urry's theory of multiple mobilities, this study concerns how guide services perform as the tool of regulation when providing freedom and individualised mobile options. Based on "Splendor of the Baroque and Beyond: Great Habsburg Collectors- Masterpieces from the Kunsthistorisches Museum Vienna" exhibition held in the National Palace Museum in Taipei in 2007-8, this research not only explores the production of museum's multiple guide services by interviews and discourse analyses of guides concerning the tempo, sound and the control of references, but also how different visitors appropriate various guide services based on in-depth interviews and fieldwork in the museum.

Forging Familiar Paths - Cast of Finnish art policy

Sokka, Sakarias

Social Sciences & Philosophy (Cultural Policy), University of Jyväskylä JY, Finland

Keywords

path dependence, intellectuals, state, art, power

My paper explores the institutionalization of Finnish (state's) art policy and, in this frame, the promotion of Finnishness by the means of art. I pay particular attention to the politicizing and politicking aspects, and, therefore, to the role of (public) intellectuals in defining and refining the normative and teleological aspects embedded in the constellation of the national art policy and its instruments. With reference to the concept of path dependence, I trace a starting point for my analysis back to the 19th century, but pay particular attention to the situation during the 1920s and 1930s, when first instruments for public art policy were normalized. Many still existing instruments of art policy have their origins in the period in question here.

The processes of maintenance and modification of once chosen policy lines, in short, are interesting questions for my research. I show some crucial points of interconnectedness between formal organisations and less formal communities with an expertise and interest in art and art policy. In addition, I analyse the characteristics of the image of national culture that the intellectuals (re)produced through their actions, taken in the expertise positions they held. Hence, I shed light on 1) the actions taken in the (both, formal and less formal) expert positions, 2) the control mechanisms used in guarding the formal expert positions, 3) criteria used in identifying artistic quality, 4) the justifications of national cultural policy, and, finally 5) the significance of the intellectuals in securing / challenging given policy lines. My viewpoint assumes a close relation between power and production of culture.

I base my analysis on reading of primary sources, both from archives and from printed materials. As a result of my analysis, by and large, I attempt 1) to explain the degree of path dependence in the development of Finnish art policy (before the WW II), 2) to understand theoretically the shaping of institutional formations, and 3) to clarify the relation between nationalism and formation of cultural policy in Finland.

From Art experience to art as experience: how three monographic art's museums re-construct their spectators

de Cecco, Emanuela

Faculty of Design and Arts, University of Bolzano Bolzano, Italy

Keywords

aesthetic and sociology, art and public sphere, artists, arts and audience

If the museum of modern and contemporary art preserves among its high assignments the task to build a collection that has to maintain its value also in the future, nowadays it is not strange for this institution the necessity to increase its spectators and, on this point, malls and theme parks have a lot to teach.

With this proposal - emerged in the making of a research project finalized to investigate different relationships between art and public sphere - I would like to go one step further and to analyze one additional typology of art spectatorship.

I'm thinking to a shift, where the museum doesn't communicate with its audience borrowing suggestions from the shopping malls or theme parks, but assumes modalities taken from the experience marketing, intertwining these modalities with those characteristic of the movie's consume.

I want to analyze from this perspective three museums/studios respectively dedicated to three important artists of the XIX century, museum/studios built where these artists lived and worked: Paul Cezanne in Aix en Provence, Giovanni Segantini in St. Moritz (and in the close village Maloja), Pellizza da Volpedo in Volpedo, a little town not far from Milano.

The common trait is the recent acceleration of the identification's process of these places with the memory of the artists, a memory expanded outside the museums, with the building of tourist routes, paths and strolls where the spectator has the possibility to see "with his/her own eyes" what the artists saw with their "own eyes" and then transformed in masterpieces. Tourism, experience marketing and media are important, but what I would like to introduce is another way to think, look at, meet the artwork.

From Art to Community: The Implications of Arts Participation for Civic Participation

Dowd, Timothy

*Sociology, Emory University
Atlanta, USA*

Coward-Bucher, Carrie

Benedictine College, Sociology Atchinson, USA

Keywords

arts participation, civic participation, cultural capital, Bourdieu

Pierre Bourdieu's scholarship has inspired multiple streams of research. One notable stream addresses, in particular, the implications of cultural capital for various domains of life - including domains of art (e.g., training in and engagement in musical activities) and civil society (e.g., voluntary service). Relatively little research, however, addresses the implications of cultural capital across domains. This inattention is particularly notable as it obscures the theoretical richness of cultural capital. Indeed, Holt (1997) reminds us that cultural capital is both abstract and concrete - with the former involving a "set of generic transposable characteristics" dispositions, skills, sensibilities, embodied knowledges concerning the body, beauty, creativity, individuality, achievement and so on - that together compose the habitus of cultural elites. Meanwhile, cultural capital becomes "concrete" when used in field-specific ways.

We explore the "transposability" of cultural capital by investigating its implications across two domains, particularly as it flows from artistic participation to civic participation in the city of Chicago. Of course, other literatures have addressed the issue of civic participation by examining why people volunteer. Some suggest that social capital plays a role. In other words, people who are well connected are the most likely to volunteer. Others emphasize the importance of human capital. They suggest that those with higher education and prestigious jobs are most active in the community (e.g., Wilson 2000).

We address such claims - as well as the implications of cultural capital - by drawing on a unique survey, The Arts in Everyday Life. This survey allows us to gauge, for instance, how the frequency of civic participation is shaped by the diverse networks that arts participation allows (social capital) and the diversity of skills that it imparts (cultural capital). As a result, we are able to see how engagement in artistic activities transfers to engagement in community life. This allows us to discuss both the concrete interplay between the arts and their broader environment and to shed some empirical light on particular aspects of Bourdieu's theoretical argument.

From combating to supporting pop music. The paradox of municipal music education in Sweden 1940 to 2000

Lindberg, Boel

School of Humanities, Växjö university Växjö, Sweden

Olofsson, Gunnar

School of Social Sciences, Växjö university Växjö, Sweden

Keywords

Hagstrom's music, combating popular music, Private music education, public music education, hegemonic cultural adaptation

In 1997 Sweden was the third biggest exporter of popular music in the world. This astonishing fact has often been explained as being the result of the large investments in municipal music schools that took place in Sweden from 1940. The explanation holds an interesting paradox. Most municipal music schools began with the aim to teach young people appreciate more valuable music (i.e. classical) than the popular music of the entertainment industry. Around 1940 there was a large debate on the "Dance-floor-misery". Christians and conservatives attacked the public amusements available in abundance, arguing that they led to moral shallowness among the youth. It was especially young people's contact with dance and popular music offered in open-air dance-floors and dance-pavilions that caused most harm.

The debate began in 1938 with an official letter to the Government from the bishop of Växjö. It led to the forming of a Royal committee assigned to find ways to decontaminate the unsatisfactory state of the entertainment industry. In Växjö the Church and the municipality joined forces forming a Youth Council. Its main achievement was to start a music school in 1947. During the 1970s it became one of the most successful in Sweden, thanks to its tolerant views on modern genres and instruments used in popular music. By 1980 it had driven a once prosperous music school run by the town's largest music shop out of business. This school ? Hagstrom's music school ? had started in 1944. Its main aim was to meet the demand for education on instruments like accordion, guitar, saxophone, keyboard and drums, instruments used in popular dance-music.

The Växjö case elucidates the process that led the once detested popular music to become accepted and fully incorporated into the curricula of the municipal music schools. This process will be linked to the thesis that a hegemonic culture has somehow to adopt prevailing views and tastes among the dominated in order to survive (cf. Gramsci, Williams).

From Identity Politics to Dismodernism- Changes in the Social Meaning of Disability Art

Solvang, Per Koren

Faculty of Health Sciences, Oslo University College

Oslo, Norway

Keywords

Disability art, identity politics, disability movement, minority art

Disability art emerged out of disabled people's political movements in the US and UK in the early 1980s. Cultural expressions became a part of an ongoing activity to create unity and pride among disabled people. In this process, art has gained an important position in the identity politics of the disability movement, in a manner comparable to the relevance of arts and culture in the feminist movement and in black people's movement.

The cultural theorist Lennard Davis has called for the end of identity politics and the beginning of dismodernism. Disability must be seen as a lens to understand the world and not primarily as a collective identity to identify with. The paper tries to shed light on how disability art affiliated artists enact their positions as disabled and as artists in this climate of post identity politics.

A total of 30 disability art affiliated artists in the UK and US have been interviewed, for the most part working in the visual and performing arts.

The artists interviewed believe that disabled performers can provide an arena for identification and aspects of a shared culture, but they see disability culture as relevant only to a small portion of disabled people. However, the idea of a common culture is important for those who identify, and it represents a potential for those who do not, for example people impaired in adult years.

There is a strong idea among the artists of two phases in the development of disability art. The first phase is closely related to the emerging disability rights movement in the late 1970s and early 1980s. The idea of the present situation as a second phase of disability art is characterised by wanting to perform and show for a mainstream audience, combine disability issues and non-disability issues, and finally; professionalism and more subtle artwork are replacing the in your face cabarets and stand up. But this is hampered by disability as culturally de-valued and the fact that art production by disabled artists tends to be medicalized as therapy.

Horizons and Timelines

Heald, Karen

Faculty of Arts & Society: Contemporary Art and Graphic Design, Leeds Metropolitan University Leeds, UK

Haywood, Paul

Contemporary Arts Research Group, University of Salford Salford, UK

Liggett, Dr Susan

*North Wales School of Art and Design, Glyndwr University
Wrexham, UK*

Keywords

Timelines, Horizons, Contemporary Landscapes, art

Referencing three artist practices that manage the concept of the landscape from the perspective of human experience.

This comparison of motive explores; perpetual memory/cultural time and space/landscape as a membrane between experiences; something/nothing, mass/absence, body/aura. Initially conceptual, the artworks explore the graphics of line/colour/form with the poetic relationship between human perception and cultural conditioning represented in the concept of the horizon.

Haywood is fascinated by environments and horizons that evidence obscured history and traces of colours, weathered by natural process and human interaction. His work represents a location, a time and an interaction with an environment, through chromatic ingredients that infuse the palette of the landscape, which he then edits to a limited key of colours. Currently, using lens based media, he selects colour on the horizon, which is then filtered to merge tone into an overall sense of colour, confused by distance and a lack of focus (Train/Window/Industrial Landscapes series). Heald elaborates timelines and choreography for the camera, transforming everyday movements into dance-like passages with the assistance of the slow-motion effects, reminiscent of Haywood's Train series, which depict the dancing lines of the horizon. The slowing down of Heald's film, references poetics and time, recognising Kristeva's writings, on time (1979) and the semiotic chora (1974). Liggett's, paints surfaces with veils/layers and gestural brush marks. The depiction of geographical barriers including horizons, create, metaphors for weathering/ageing/movement/time/creative or psychological barriers.

Liggett's repetitive horizontal line paintings (Sea series, First/Second/Third Attempt) formulate a working method inducing a meditative inspirational state. Oblivious to time during creative insights, Liggett sees this as akin to losing track of western linear time and being lost in the horizon that is the body. In The Dream Space Heald slept in Japanese "capsule" hotels/ryokans/Buddhist temples, accessing simultaneous timelines/zones, capturing the transient/surreal nature of dreams. These performances encapsulated, through colour and movement, an "in-between-ness" that relates to the chora. Heald and Liggett will explore cyclical and monumental time through ideas relating to "eternity" or "transcendence" exploring the horizon of the body/aura through painting and film.

Within their presentation the artists will discuss, the differences/similarities between horizons/timelines within their work.

How collective reading practices shape and subvert gender identities

Albenga, Viviane

Sociology, EHESS

Paris, France

Keywords

reader clubs, caring, self, subversion, Gender

This presentation aims at showing how collective reading practices, grounded on exchange of books and on talks about books, shape gender identities. We will emphasize on how the technologies of taste construct what we could call a caring self, as the sociologist Beverley Skeggs named the construction of oneself based on caring, in opposition to the concept of the possessive individual. The theoretical frame that we will use is inspired by the way Beverley Skeggs links up feminist theory of ethics of care with the Foucauldian concept of caring of oneself.

We will focus on three reading clubs, in contemporary France, in Lyon. The reader club A is grounded on oral reading of short abstracts of novels and poetry. The club B is based on talks about novels or essays and takes place in a public library. Last, the club C is a BookCrossing group: it means that members release books in public places, but most of the time they exchange books between them upon an Internet site. Middle-class women are the most numerous and implicated members.

Reader clubs members are characterized by their caring for oneself. Caring for oneself is necessarily caring for the others and women, by their gender socialization, are more likely to develop a caring self, including in reading practices. These reading practices, grounded on caring, can be inverted in a personal project. This project can be the creation of a literary site, it can be going on writing for several members, and it can also be a professional project. By holding up a caring self, collective reading practices enable to challenge gender boundaries, even if some divisions remain about writing and being a literary judge. Indeed, the trajectories of reader clubs members do not fit with gendered divisions at the time when they take part in the clubs. And the very configuration of reader clubs, in extenso a public space where women are more numerous and qualified, could challenge the gender system, if more men stayed in these clubs.

In what way is the music of Dmitriy Shostakovich political?

Maes, Francis

*Musicology, Ghent University
Gent, Belgium*

Keywords

Music sociology, soviet culture, art production

The music of the soviet composer Dmitriy Shostakovich is an ideal case to study the interaction between art and social context. His music has been explained as heavily influenced by political factors. The composer was obliged to respond to the vicissitudes of a totalitarian regime. Since the times of glasnost, the political meaning of Shostakovich's music has been read as an act of dissidence. While it stands above question that the composer could turn his music into a voice of opposition, it is equally clear that such an exclusively dissident reading cannot account for many facets of his art. Beside a force to contend with, the soviet system created the institutional opportunities for the development of Shostakovich's talent.

The proportion in his work between the voices of the establishment and of personal dissent remains to be determined. A possible approach should start with a better understanding of his sociological make-up. The standard interpretation relies heavily on the romantic ideal of the artist, whose identity is defined by the criterion of autonomy. With the rise of sociological studies of soviet culture, the image of Shostakovich as a heroically independent mind is losing ground.

What makes Shostakovich exceptional, however, is the way in which he succeeded in redefining the significance of high art for a new society. While the regime subordinated art to radical functionality in service of the rituals of state, Shostakovich succeeded to safeguard the position of high art as a means of human expression. It is precisely this quality that endeared his music to his soviet audiences. The political meaning of Shostakovich's music should be searched for in its quality of multifaceted human commentary on the rigidity of official ideology. The question transcends the search for hidden political messages into a broad definition of the significance of aesthetic values under totalitarian conditions. The case of Shostakovich could help to refine the production of culture paradigm by demonstrating the subtle ways in which artistic production and context interact.

Innovation and experimentalism in cultural mediation: the case of Casa da Música's Education Services

Quintela, Pedro

Sociologia, Faculdade Economia Universidade de Coimbra Porto, Portugal

Keywords

Innovation., Cultural Equipments, Cultural Politics, Cultural mediation

The role of mediation and mediators on the modelling of cultural practices is an interesting issue for sociological enquiry. In present days, given the growing importance that cultural practices are assuming in urban contexts, the so-called "educational services" of arts organisations assume particular relevance. They represent one of the main tools for the cultural mediation strategies proposed by arts organisations, aiming the attraction, development and guidance of audiences for arts and culture. The education services' activity is in general still deeply anchored to an idea of cultural mediation as "social imperative". This is inspired by French republican's tradition on cultural politics, which highlighted the centrality of a generalised access to art and culture, as a democratization tool of cultural practices and also, in this way, strengthening social cohesion.

This paper intends to analyze Casa da Música - an organisation created during Porto 2001 - European Capital of Culture - as an interesting case study, focusing on the cultural mediation role that has been developed through their Education Services. We'll analyse the sui generis outlines of some of the main projects developed by this Service, which incorporate an "experimental" dimension in what concerns dealing with audiences and working out with them new ways of approaching creativity in music. The paper will discuss to what extent these projects are innovative in relation to dominant and traditional practices of mediation in the music field. Taking this specific case as a point of departure, we will discuss more broadly the ongoing changes in the mediation strategies of arts organisations, namely those working in the music field. The discussion will highlight the way arts organisations strategies are adapting to the ongoing transformations in contemporary music scenes, namely those related with the growing importance of new technologies and the ever-changing relationship between creation and consumption dimensions.

Internet, Interactivity and Power: Theoretical Reflections on the Online Encounter of Art Institutions and their Audience

Beyl, Joke

*Communication sciences, Vrije Universiteit Brussel
Belgium,*

Bauwens, Joke

*Communication sciences, Vrije Universiteit Brussel
Brussels, Belgium*

Keywords

art, internet, interactivity, power relations, theoretical reflections

This paper deals with the theoretical question whether the interactive Internet articulates the encounter of art institutions and art consumers more fiercely and, as a result, enhances the hybridisation and the equalisation of the power positions of both actors. The arts can be conceived of as a place of encounter between the work of art and the beholder and, as a consequence, as a sphere that is embedded within power relations and structures between the artist, the art institution and the beholder. Departing from Dewey's analysis (Art as experience, 1958) of the chasm between the act of art production and the act of art perception it could be assumed that the interactive Internet is a means of reconstructing a complete and comprehensive aesthetic experience. According to Dewey, this type of experience needs to be based on a mutual recognition of the act of producing and the act of perceiving and should be characterised by an impassioned occupation of the human mind with the world of objects. In order to construct a theoretical framework that can be helpful to understand shifting power balances in the field of the arts, this issue is approached in an interdisciplinary way. In this context, two theoretical approaches to power relations in a digital and interactive environment are discussed. On the one hand, several scholars (Jenkins, Deuze') highlight that both producer and consumer are playing a vital role in the online creation of content. These scholars stress that a shift in producer-consumer relations is actually taking place. On the other hand, it is argued that this new consumer freedom is in fact a false freedom (Jarrett, Van Dijck'). It is stated that the interactive Internet does not imply a radical change that allows users to act freely and as such to wield power on a producer level. Rather, it is believed that existing power relations are being reinforced. As a consequence, it can be questioned whether the interactive Internet, which implies that everyone can participate, is a place in which art users are on an equal foot with art institutions.

Is a sociological analysis of works of art possible?

Lévy, Clara

*54, Université de Nancy 2
Nancy, France*

Quemin, Alain

77, Université Paris Est Champs sur Marne, France

Keywords

epistemology, interpretation, sociology of artworks

Is it possible to undertake a sociological analysis of works of art? This text pursues this line of thought by considering the arguments for both the negative and positive answers to this question. It attentively examines the main arguments exchanged by the supporters and detractors of this sub-discipline of the sociology of art, notably those relating to the problem of interpretation (how does one sociologically verify this process when it is applied to a work of art?) and to the ways of presenting evidence. The discussion of these various arguments does not lead to the conclusion that it is absolutely impossible to heuristically explore the sociology of artworks in a pertinent way, but to an insistence on heightened vigilance and the formulation of certain principles for the use of sociologists who engage with such an object, if sometimes without the requisite caution.

Is Arts Policy to the benefit of the Autonomous Artist? The Position of Artists in Flemish contemporary Arts Policy

Segers, Katia

*Centre for Studies on Media and Culture (CEMESO), Vrije Universiteit Brussel
Brussels, Belgium*

Schramme, Annick

Arts Management, Department of political Science Management, University of Antwerp Antwerp, Belgium

Keywords

artistic autonomy, Flemish arts policy, Role and position of artists, Effects of subsidies, Policy paradox

The role and position of artists in Western arts policies is much debated within academic and policy literature. Whereas Anglo-Saxon literature focuses on the role of artists both as cultural entrepreneurs and as symbol creators in the (regional) development of cultural industries, the ongoing debate in continental Europe is about the benefit of government support for the autonomous artist. Recent attention paid to the artist, follows a period in which continental European cultural policy makers focused mainly on aspects of arts participation and arts management. Previous international research shows that efforts on the level of marketing and changes in organisational structure have not been effective in increasing audience attendance, nor in creating cost efficiencies. On the contrary, they had the paradoxical effect that overhead costs have raised.

These findings raise important questions for the role and position of the individual artists. This paper aims to examine the recent situation of individual artists in Flanders. The Flemish performing arts are flourishing as never before: the Arts Decree of 2004 provides a solid statutory framework, subsidies have been raised significantly since 2001, and the number of artistic companies and productions has increased. One of the novelties of the Arts Decree is the greater attention to the artist. Besides professional arts organisations, individual artists are now also eligible for subsidising. Consequently, artists are no longer compelled to embed their artistic work within an organisational structure in order to qualify for public funding.

In this paper we will examine to what extent the growth of the arts budget since 2001 has been to the benefit of the artists. This research is based on a data-analysis of unpublished source material on cost and income structure of Flemish arts organisations and the evolution of subsidies and labour costs within these budgets. This research leads to conclusions that are relevant not only to the Flemish situation but also of importance in an international perspective. Our findings confirm the internationally noticed paradox: the more the arts have been embedded within organisational and management structures, the more the situation of the individual artists has become vulnerable.

Literary writing process and epistemology of artistic practice

Zembylas, Tasos

*Institute of Culture Management and Culture Studies, University of Music and Performing Arts, Vienna
Vienna, Austria*

Keywords

practical learning, literary writers, knowing how, competence, artistic process

Professional authors need to have, in addition to literary competence, various dispositions (such the ability to engage in strategic action and have access to various networks) that are to some extent similar for all free-lancers. The sociology of professions investigates these dispositions. However, it is difficult to define literary (i.e. artistic) competence, because the process of acquirement is mostly informal and literary works are not-standardized products. Moreover the idea of artistic excellence is highly normative.

In a research project based on case-studies and interviews we focussed on the micro structures of the writing process, highlighting the epistemic structure of literary writing. In the center of our interest were practical experiences and problem centred processes that occur during the act of literary writing which, in the long term, result in the formation of the writers' professional literary competence. The term 'competence', as we conceived it, does not refer to a particular aesthetic literary quality, which would be the expression of literary judgement by an audience. Competence in our study refers to a heightened ability to cope with the specific problems and demands of the writing process. Such competence is acquired through practice and is maintained and expanded by constant exercise.

In my presentation I will discuss more epistemological and less sociological issues; however, the insight into the writing process - in general into an open-structured creative process - is definitely interesting for arts sociologists who investigate the artistic practice and the process of becoming a professional writer.

Local Arts, Heritage and Nature in the mountains of Northeast Algarve

Francisco, Maria Luísa

Sociology, FCSH UNL

Lisboa, Portugal

Keywords

rural areas, Local Arts, Algarve

The narration of the past, the maintenance of collective memories is a way of survival of the populations from the northeast Algarve - South Portugal. In the mountains of the Northeast Algarve we found ancestral local arts transformed into pieces of art, using what nature provide, from roots of rock-rose to stream stones, from plants such as oleander and linen to scurf of corncob. Raw materials are used to create objects more or less creative.

Are they handicraft, are they art? Handicraft has a collective sense; it is learned and passed on from generation to generation. Art is not learnable; it has a more individual sense.

Where is the frontier between the two? Are not all artists, artisans at the same time? Is handicraft the learnable part of the technique and art part of the technique that is not teachable, because it is connected to the artist's inner discovery?

In any case, a rural identity is intrinsic and is represented through a simple language and through a connection to nature as an almost divine entity. Alongside, there is an immaterial heritage full of legends, tales and prayers showing fear of God and respect to spelled Moorish women.

The creators of the objects are mainly old, have learned with their ancestors and continue to make those objects as a ritual that allows them to keep their mental sanity. The same happens with agriculture, which in the past was the essence of their maintenance, and which they keep at a very short rate in order not to lose such contact, such balance.

The humbleness with which they present their works is touching; such is the grief of having no one who wants to learn such crafts. Some younger persons began other crafts but with purchased raw materials. The objects and respective raw materials will be presented in the poster.

Margin the Border: Streetart in Kosovo and Serbia as an Example for European Societies in Transition

Herrschaft, Felicia

Institut für Gesellschafts - und Politikanalyse, Goethe University, Fachbereich Gesellschaftswissenschaften Frankfurt am Main, Germany

Keywords

Methodological Issues in Artistic Research, Artworld, artists, Streetart

To analyse visual culture in societies in transition like in Kosovo and Serbia a method mix is necessary to understand through the personal and visual impressions of streetartists in what state these societies are. Artists in post-war societies recover sources of vulnerability for new expressions in their society. These articulations stand in contrast to the efforts of the international community in stabilizing the political situation in Kosovo and Serbia. Artists in Kosovo and Serbia are erecting signposts indicating a break, the new perspectives of a society through their remembrance. Memories carry the social as an existential form like the taste of a past society. To Bruno Latour the plurality of the existential form of the social is just a fact, that has been ignored by sociology ever since, because she engaged herself too much in the task of modernization, instead of developing controversies, to stabilize and investigate its political relevance. In order to break the continuity of the network of knowledge he suggests throwing ourselves into the open ocean: our common unawareness. "It's as if at some point you had to leave the solid land and go to sea." (Latour 2005: 244). On a journey through a landscape of networks, that consists of empty rooms, wires, subways, airports, termite canals in the sociology of the social, the question arises, what substance, what mass actually holds the whole together? This background, the open sea of an unfathomable mass, is called "Plasma" by Latour, under which he understands, what "is not yet formed, not yet measured, not yet socialized, not yet engaged in metrological chains, and not yet covered, surveyed, mobilized, or subjectified." (ibid.) To comprehend it we have to point our attention at the outside, achieve an infinity for this between that is unknown, like a memory that contains a moment of recognition.

Memorials and Counter-memorials: Gender, Motherhood and Art in the Israel Contemporary Art

Guilat, Yael

Art Department, Oranim Academic College israel,

Keywords

Countermemorial, Women- Artists, Memorial -discourse, Motherhood

The memorials perceived as the heart of sculpture in Israel until the 80's were a homologous field in examining the male hegemony both in the field of art and in the national field. The fact that women are so scarce, both as an image and as creators of memorials, was explained based on their place in the national order of priorities. Towards the end of the 90's, a new, challenging, perception of motherhood cracks and unravels traditional feminine roles in the national order, as well as representing this conception publicly both in art and in direct political action. From that time the activity of organizations such as Women in Black, Four Mothers, and Shuvi expressed (beyond the different political positions) the feminine maternal claim wishing to make itself present and voice different opinions regarding questions of security and the military "which women do not understand"? These organizations, especially Four Mothers and Shuvi, like Female Artists as Yehudit Matzkel, spoke as "the soldier's mother", that is - within the national order of priorities they wish to take back that which has been taken away from them: the own soldier, the own son, who should be potentially a dead soldier. The theme of trauma and anticipation of trauma fed the work of Yehudit Matzkel Drora Domini, as well as that of artists such as Arianne Litman-Cohen and Rachel Giladi which I will examine during the lecture. Together they draw a new art perspective as well as they deal with the question about the place of women (from the maternal position) in the discourse of memorials in Israel. This perspective will serve me in the presentation and analysis of the works, and through it I shall try to characterize the voice and modes of action of women artists in the bereavement and memorialization discourse. According with the concept of "counter-memory" this art's corpus could be understood as a kind of "counter-memorials", a strategy of resistance and dissidence.

Museum of Modern Art in Warsaw or keeping up with Europe

Gruszka, Anna

Institute of Sociology, Adam Mickiewicz University Poznan, Poland

Keywords

nation state, new museology, Museum of Modern Art in Warsaw, post-communist identity, european identity

This paper will focus on the problem of planned Museum of Modern Art in Warsaw that is going to be built in the very heart of the Polish capital with an intention to modify the image of the city and to create its new international icon. This controversial and already famous investment, to a large extent inspired by the spectacular examples of Western European museums and the dream of "Bilbao effect" will be made in the historically specific area, strongly marked by the times of communism: the Museum will replace the old bazaars on Defilad square and will stand next to the Palace of Culture and Science (Pacac Kultury i Nauki) ? today's inglorious symbols of Warsaw.

First of all, the project, being a part of gentrification process of the capital's center raises such problematic issues as: will the new museum, pretending to the role of a European institution, be capable of dealing with the space so largely marked by the Polish nation's history, especially with the Palace of Culture and Science? And then, does the victorious project of Christian Kerez have the potential to create a new public space (Chantal Mouffe), open to the citizens and to the fluctuation of thoughts, ideas, values, identities and meanings or is its hermetic, modernistic architecture going to create another closed, exclusive space (Michel Foucault)?

Even more importantly, the analysis of the Museum of Modern Art in Warsaw will be the starting point for the reflection on how such an object, strongly entangled in power relations, conflicts of interests, ideologies and imagologies (Mark C. Taylor, Esa Saarinen) reveals the Polish desire to transform the image of post-communist city and country into the Western European ones. This reflection will lead to inquire to what extent this desire seems to be realizable and whose really dream it is. Finally, it will try to place those issues in the debate on the specificity of today's Polish identity in the context of uniting European society, simultaneously inquiring about the role of the nation state in today's museums' narration or in the new museology practices. (Mieke Bal, Victoria Newhouse)

Music and gender in the Greek music folk revival. The case of female musicians today

Hatzipetrou-Andronikou, Reguina

Sociology, Ecole des Hautes Etudes en Sciences Sociales, CMH-PRO

Paris, France

Keywords

women musicians, modern Greece, folk revival, sociology of music, Gender

This paper deals with female musicians, instrument players, in Greek folk revival today. In the "traditional" version of folk music in Greece women were only signers or dancers and were not playing instruments. The Greek music folk revival that starts in the 1970's but becomes wider during the late 1980's, gave in a sense the possibility to women to play traditional Greek instruments. This revivalist phenomenon got in Greece a pedagogical component which is the State Music schools. Greek traditional music is taught in these schools both by instrument lesson as well as by theory classes and group performance. The State Music Schools being state secondary schools they have as much female as male pupils. In this case coeducation gave the opportunity to young girls to have access to an exclusively male world, the music playing. In the same time, professional socialisation was made very early for both girls and boys as the folk music revival in Greece was, during the 1990's growing and offering job opportunities to young musicians. Inside this time and space context the Greek music revival movement included some young female musicians inside its community.

This paper is based on interviews made with female musicians starting their professional career in this milieu during the late 1990's and early 2000's. Through their experience and the analysis of the interviews and the history of this particular music revival we propose to discuss significant issues concerning music and gender in Greece and in music revivalist contexts.

Music as human identity indicator

Matulionis, Arvydas Virgilijus

Stratification, Institute for Social Research Vilnius, Lithuania

Keywords

music, identity, instability, mass culture

Global instability is a feature of the modern world. This is particularly evident during the economic crisis. Any human being feels instable not only because of economic problems, but also because of the "unclear" demographic indicators such as gender, race, family, place of residence, which were previously unquestioned. The problem of personal identity becomes more significant. The culture in general and music to be more precise can serve in order to reduce the tension of instability and to form personal identity. Immaterial values of culture can become the vectors of support to displaced human identity. Filled with emotions music can become an effective means of reducing stress. We can speak about various kinds and genres of music, however in this presentation we concentrate only on folk music. In post-soviet empire the promotion of national music performed by ethnographic bands, was a means of expression of sovereignty in order to resist the implementation of denationalized soviet model of society, but the significance of folk music has not been underestimated in post-communist Europe.

We can distinguish at least two main aspects. Firstly, it is a form of resistance and a counterbalance towards denationalizing cosmopolitan uniformity. However, this does not mean archaism, as folk music is not just a repetition of the past forms of art but also a constant innovation. This is especially important for active promoters and performers of folk music. Secondly, this is a challenge to mass culture and consumerist society in general. Even high quality mass culture serves only for-profit aims and the commoditization of society. The preservation of national identity is especially important for small countries such as the Baltics: Lithuania, Latvia and Estonia. Music, and especially Song and Dance festivals, which are unique in the region, help us to define ourselves as Lithuanian, Latvian or Estonian. On the other hand, folk music is important to ethnic groups as well. It helps to maintain the sense of national identity to Polish, Russian, Jewish, Karaite and Tartar, and other peoples residing Lithuania.

On arts initiative and artistic policy: a history of institutionalisation, financing and artistic programming of the Belgian "factory of sounds" - the National Radio Institute and its orchestra - between 1929 and 1960

Segers, Katia

*Department of Media Studies, Centre for Studies on Media and Culture, Vrije Universiteit Brussel
Brussels, Belgium*

Van Den Buys, Christine

*Royal Conservatory of Brussels, Erasmus University College Brussels
Brussels, Belgium*

De Cang, Lien

*Department of Media Studies, Centre for Studies on Media and Culture, Vrije Universiteit Brussel
Brussels, Belgium*

Goessens, Lieselotte

*Royal Conservatory of Brussels, Erasmus University College Brussels
Brussels, Belgium*

Keywords

Public broadcasting institute, Production of culture paradigm, Institutional history of arts organisations, Artistic policy and programming, Public support of the arts

This paper aims to investigate the interaction between institutional, political and financial conditions and artistic policy of arts organisations. The question to what degree institutional factors are influencing or even shaping artistic policy is central to the "production of culture" paradigm. Whereas a lot of empirical work has been done from this perspective in most European countries, no similar research exists in Belgium.

Being part of a larger research on the history of private and public arts initiative in Belgium, this paper is devoted to the Belgian public broadcasting institute, the National Radio Institution (N.I.R./I.N.R.) and its orchestra, the Big Symphonic Orchestra between 1929 and 1960.

The N.I.R./I.N.R., founded in 1931, created its Big Symphonic Orchestra in 1935. This orchestra was recognized as one of the world leading orchestras between the two world wars until the 1960s. In this specific period it was innovative for its live performances and broadcasting of modernistic music of composers like Stravinsky, Bartok, Prokofiev, Milhaud, Hindemith and Berg. Departing from the political context outside the institute and its history of institutionalisation, financing and political control (impact of the broadcasting associations of the political parties), this study investigates the impact of these conditions on artistic policy. Vice versa, the impact of artistic choices on political support and policy measures regarding the broadcasting institute will be demonstrated. Aim is to illuminate specifically how and why the N.I.R./I.N.R. moved from a broadcasting organisation focussing on entertainment and light music - being a "factory of sounds" - to a high cultural institute that gave birth to this famous symphonic orchestra, the first fully subsidized symphonic orchestra of Belgium.

On the one hand this research will enlarge the historical and empirical knowledge of the Belgian/European public broadcasting organisations, on the other hand this research aims to contribute on a theoretical level to the questioning and refining of the "production of culture"-paradigm. It is based on a quantitative analysis of historical data sources (from the archives of the N.I.R./I.N.R. and of the political parties), collected and centralised in a relational data bank, developed in a preliminary stage of this research project.

Performing Arts in the Scope Of Mobility: new profiles, practices and roles for artists in the EU

Farinha, Cristina

*Art and Economy, Utrecht School of the Arts
Porto, Portugal*

Keywords

entrepreneurship, mobility, cooperation, networks, skills

Artists have been pioneers of freedom of movement long before the EU was established. However these professionals face many obstacles when working around in Europe. Artistic activities seem prone to mobility, being less regulated by national and organisational frameworks thus more flexible and adaptable to different work contexts and partners. But on the other side, the sector is fragmented in a large number of micro and small organisations and self-employed workers, to whom staying alone in the international scene is quite a hard job.

Besides political, economical and professional arenas, the issue of mobility is also being intensively discussed within the social sciences that focus on how mobility comes along a system of constraints and how its right to use might be imposed and conditioned. Mobility is being analysed as a social capital and a resource that leads to new behaviours but also reflects and reproduces previous social and spatial inequalities along with its own intrinsic ones.

Therefore mobility should be addressed in terms of accessibility. The ability to work internationally depends on individual backgrounds and qualifications as well as institutional conditions. One essential hindrance to cross-border artistic collaboration work is the lack of strategic, management and relational skills. In this way, I argue that obstacles to mobility are inherent to personal and professional profiles so that economic and political supportive frameworks are insufficient to promote these workers mobility.

The analysis of motivations, conditions and consequences of artistic work in the contemporary performing arts sector at the European level allows clarifying what acts in as barriers and how mobility is nowadays changing professional practices, profiles and roles.

Postcards: the "stamped picture" in the history of art

Correia, Maria da Luz

*Université Paris Descartes - Faculté des Sciences Humaines et Sociales, Sorbonne; Universidade do Minho - Instituto de Ciências Sociais, CEAQ (Centre d'Études sur l'Actuel et le Quotidien) - Université Paris Descartes, Sorbonne (Paris, France); CECS (Centro de Estudos de Comunicação e Sociedade) - Universidade do Minho (Braga, Portugal)
Paris, France*

Keywords

popular culture, postcards, history of art, consumption and advertising

The illustrated postcards, which can be seen in a way as moving images (since they are sent through the postal system), are a visual arts document and a popular culture icon. We aim to revise the different roles of these marginal and fragmentary media in the history of art since their emergence in the XIXth century.

As it developed at the same time as photography, the postcard became a crucial device in the building up of the photographic vision of the landscape and in the conception of portrait. Being contemporary of the work of art in the age of its technological reproducibility (Walter Benjamin), postcards are also an important support to Malraux's Imaginary Museum: owing to their small price, they provide a democratic access to art images. Often appropriated by avant-gardes, the postcard also concurred to the decentralisation of art.

The art nouveau authors, the italian futurists, the dada movement, the surrealists, the Flux members, the pop art and the New York Correspondance School are some examples of avant-gardes who have used the postcards as a material and a structure for their artistic manifestations. Nowadays, the postcards are continually renovated and used by graphic designers and visual artists. Postcards make up a democratic vehicle of expression (specially appealing for young artists), a subversion tool towards museums as well as a source of inspiration (in order to approach different contemporary subjects). On the other hand, contemporary cultural institutions choose postcards as a privileged object for their different strategies. Popular events such as Linden Postcard Show (Australia) and RCA Secret (UK) take profit of postcards qualities, concerning artists' participation and public impact. Furthermore, contemporary museums have been integrating postcards in their exhibitions: Walker Evans and the Picture Postcard in the Metropolitan Museum of Art in New York is the most recent example. At the same time, this petite monnaie de 1- art [petty cash of art] (Paul Eluard) is controlled by advertising industries (from mass tourism to art institutions), and serves their purposes efficiently. The postcard has become a profitable consumption object because of its chic and cheap or kitsch mimicry of art.

Production, Ready-made and Reproduction: Considering Transformation in Art Works and Art Worlds through the Researches of Damien Hirst, Jeff Koons and Takashi Murakami

Caliandro, Christian

DADI - Department of Arts and Industrial Design, IUAV University Venice, Italy

Sacco, Pier Luigi

DADI - Department of Arts and Industrial Design, IUAV University Venice, Italy

Keywords

art market, Artwork, Art Theory

The paper proposes to analyse the increasingly relevant relation between the production of the art object, the art system and the market in defining the contemporary artwork. The methodological and conceptual tools include art history, art theory, sociology of arts and economics of art.

In the first part, the research will investigate the internal functioning of the artwork during the last four decades, as it has been defined by scholars such as Arthur C. Danto, Michael Fried, Rosalind Krauss, Alexander Alberro and Pamela M. Lee. It will also try to explain its interrelations with the social and economic changes (Jameson, 1991; Anderson, 1998) and with the subsequent transformations of the art worlds (Becker, 1982). This introductory section will describe the role and the perception of the contemporary work of art through the lens of the interrelations between art object, real object and auratic presence (also beyond the traditional function of status symbol), from the appearing of Andy Warhol's Brillo Box (1964) and minimal to conceptual art and the formulation of the Pictures' aesthetics (Crimp, 1980).

The starting point of the second part is constituted by the last outcomes of Damien Hirst, the work "For the Love of God" (2007) and the Sotheby's auction "Beautiful Inside My Head Forever", held at London in September 15-16, 2008, which had a surprising and symbolic consonance with the deflagration of the current global crisis. The aim of this section is to demonstrate that this auction has not been a simple selling of artworks, but was an artwork itself.

The other authors, considered in the third and last part, will be Jeff Koons and Takashi Murakami, with a particular attention to their strong linkage to other creative territories and cultural industries, like entertainment, design and fashion. Jeff Koons' "Hanging Heart" and Murakami's Louis Vuitton bag are good examples of art objects deeply connected with the real world through new modalities. Their strong physical presence becomes the spectacular equivalent of the more rarefied and enigmatic auratic quality.

Productive Misunderstandings? On Contemporary Art and Science Collaborations

Glauser, Andrea

Department of Sociology, University of Berne Berne, Switzerland

Keywords

social differentiation, science, arts support, artistic innovation, art

A striking feature of contemporary society is its differentiation into a variety of cultural fields, with each field - such as science and art - characterized by a particular logic of its own, without being completely independent from the others. Such differentiation involves processes of specification, globalization and increasing complexity, which is sometimes conceived as an omen of a world falling apart. Yet differentiation does not solely imply increased dissimilarity. It also involves an enhancement of possible interdependences and cross-references amongst cultural fields.

In recent years, the relations between art and science have provoked a remarkable "disquiet" and have been negotiated in books, lectures and exhibitions. These developments are fed by the fact that the respective fields at one and the same time are both different and share some common features, especially an orientation towards innovation. Artists and scientists are often seen as society's creative core. Therefore, these rapports are typically combined with the hope of shifting boundaries of situated knowledge and of a significant "enlargement of the universe of human discourse" (Clifford Geertz).

This paper investigates collaborations between artists and scientists in the context of artists-in-labs programs that became a central element of arts support in recent years. Encounters between artists and scientists may effect a "broadening of horizons". A crucial question thereby is: Does it affect central problems and aspects of the respective practices? May such collaborations extend artistic and scientific practices from the inside out? Or do they rather have the character of general extensions of merely personal experiences? Because the artistic as well as the scientific fields are in themselves highly differentiated, the discussion is based upon the assumption that it is (at least temporarily) necessary to bracket the collective subjects "art" and "science" and to take the specific constellations into account instead.

Promoting Children's Culture - Artistic assessment and peer evaluation and/or regulation and policy steering

Rensujeff, Kaija

*Research Unit, Arts Council Of Finland
Helsinki, Finland*

Keywords

Arts policy, Regulation, children's culture

When the state allocates resources for promoting children's culture, it defines special forms of activities as worthy of support. In this meaning, the government installs a scale of best practices for the artists and other cultural practitioners working in the different art forms. Consequently, this kind of method may be in conflict with the fundamental autonomy of art. The projects receiving grants and subsidies may emerge as tools to implement other goals as artistic value. The peer evaluation process in the system of arts councils is meant to assess mainly the artistic quality.

The subcommittee of children's culture was established in 1987 by the Central Arts Council in Finland. The subcommittee consists of members of the National Councils of Arts (9 art forms). It awards grants and subsidies annually for the costs incurred by the implementation of projects in the field of children's and youth culture. There are two forms of support delegated by the Ministry of Education to the Arts Council and further to the subcommittee of children's culture. The other one is intended for artists, work groups, critics, art pedagogues and researchers, and the another one for organisations (associations, foundations, co-operatives, municipalities, companies etc.) Recent years, the ministry of education and subcommittee of children's culture has launched notification of priorities in the beginning of each application process. The policy program for the children's culture (2003-2007) has been as a main focus in the support granting process.

The data consists of statistics of applications and supported projects by the subcommittee of children's culture 1987-2007. The contents of applications submitted for the year 2007 are analysed as a case study. This paper observes i.a. target groups and children's role in the working plans of the applications and supported projects for the year 2007, and discuss the effects of intervention of regulation and autonomy of art as different resource allocation guidelines. Also, the appreciation of making children's culture is discussed on the grounds of numbers and statements.

Public Art, community, Territory: Artistic practices in contemporary public spaces

Mazzucotelli Salice, Silvia

Dipartimento di Sociologia, Università Cattolica del Sacro Cuore Milano, Italy

Keywords

representation, Public Space, public art, re-enchantment, public role

This paper contributes to the sociological debate concerning the problems of contemporary urbanism and the crisis of the collective nature of public space. The transformed relationship between the city's physical form, its production systems and the different ways in which public space is used nowadays creates new areas for social identities' elaboration.

On the one hand both modernity and post modernity consider the market and the space as the key forces in shaping cities' physical and symbolic features. On the other hand also the power and its exercise contribute to landscaping. As a result conflicts and negotiations between those aspects define the physical and the social landscape in every city. In this context, architectural styles and urban strategies adopted reflect the elites' wishes and wills instead of being the outcome of negotiation practices between "public" and "private" sector according to the original meanings of the words. Thus the "collective" nature of public space seems condemned to death and appointed to a progressive loss of meaning.

The growth of certain contemporary artistic intervention in urban public space, however, seems to question these hypothesis. According to a qualitative survey whose first phase has been completed in the United States in late 2008 and which was aimed at describing the institutionalized system of American public art, I argue that the rise of this artistic movement involves a process of «re-enchantment» of the world and I suggest, according to the early results of the second phase of my research which is in itinere in Italy, that this trend is detectable also in my country: existing practices of public art, shifting attention from the object to the process, from the tangible reality to the narrative and from the physical space to the living space, underlines a desire, among certain groups of cities' inhabitants, to re-emphasizing the "soft" qualities of cities.

Contemporary public art, in short, requires a redefinition of the "public" role of art and artists: testing new strategies of symbolic communication in public space and searching confrontation with the local dimension turns this artistic avant-garde into an innovative formula of representation of the territory.

Reflections on Art and Science Collaborations

Pizanias, Caterina

Engineering and Psychology, University of Calgary Calgary, Alberta, Canada

Keywords

Knowledge, publics, ethics, aesthetics, good

Institutions are increasingly encouraging multi-disciplinary collaborations/exchanges between artists, scientists, and their publics as a means of fostering equitable social change. Such collaborations are hailed as positive and desirable but much of the discussion is anecdotal and undermined by a lack of ethnographic research and/or critical reflexive examinations of the wide variety of concrete art worlds and scientific institutions

This paper will focus on a recent collaboration between artists, legal experts and scientists that resulted in an art exhibit entitled "Imagining Science: Art, Science, and Social Change" that took place at the Art Gallery of Alberta in Edmonton, Alberta, Canada, from November 15, 2008 to February 1, 2009. It will raise some pertinent questions that might allow a critical examination of such collaborations, such as: who benefits from these collaborations; what sort of knowledge is produced; how boundaries determined and /or crossed; how do artists and scientists understand their publics; how are the aesthetics of art negotiated with the ethics of science; how does each understand their "public" and what is its "good"? These are but a few of questions connected with the topic of art and science collaborations that social scientists are compelled to ask before addressing even the possibility of collaboration between art and science, let alone its desirability as a vehicle for social change.

Self-illusion of the unforgettable aesthetic experience in art museums

Pérez Rubiales, Elena

Centre d'Estudis i Recerca d'Humanitats, Universitat Autònoma de Barcelona Bellaterra (Cerdanyola del Vallès), Spain

López-Sintas, Jordi

Business Economics, Universitat Autònoma de Barcelona / Centre d'Estudis i Recerca d'Humanitats Bellaterra (Cerdanyola del Vallès), Spain

García Álvarez, María Ercilia

Management, Universitat Rovira i Virgili Vila-seca (Tarragona), Spain

Keywords

self-illusion, museums, unforgettable aesthetic experience, Authenticity

Visiting an art museum represents an activity of cultural consumption where the viewer has the possibility to enjoy an aesthetic experience that, in some cases, we will define as unforgettable because of the intensity of the emotions caused and its persistence to live on time. In this piece of research we have studied the way in which consumer's aesthetic experience interacts with the authenticity of works of art to produce an unforgettable aesthetic experience. Starting from the modern hedonism to understand that consumer's self-illusory behavior will influence the quality of the aesthetic experience rather than the quality of the experience itself. Our research design tries to analyze whether authentic works interact with the aesthetic experience and how it interacts. We have conducted 21 interviews with regular visitors of art museums, which are digitally recorded and, later, transcribed ad verbatim. Transcripts and no textual comments recorded during the field work have shaped the data sources for our project, analyzed with a phenomenological approach and with the help of computer assisted qualitative data analysis software (CAQDAS). We found that original works share with copies their ability to identify the viewer with the cultural principles expressed by the author but differ in their ability to link the viewer with the artist and the context surrounding the production of the work. Thus, the consciousness of seeing an authentic work against a copy affects the illusion of the aesthetic experience, and it does not depend on the individual's level of appropriate cultural capital but on consumer's knowledge about the original piece of art and its author.

Social Networks and Production of Culture in a Global Environment

Baltzis, Alexandros

Dept. of Journalism and Mass Media Studies, Aristotle University of Thessaloniki Thessaloniki, Greece

Keywords

cultural industries, Social Networks, cultural production, arts, Globalization

Understanding globalization as a complex social phenomenon, this paper takes a different stance from both the cultural imperialism paradigm and the fragmented empiricism of several micro-level approaches of the arts. It is based on the approach of the arts as forms of communication, as systems for the creation, production, dissemination and reception of symbolic forms. In this context, the paper explores several features of globalization that affect both the arts and their sociological approach in numerous noteworthy ways.

These features include the introduction of alternative modes for the production of symbolic forms, associated with the development of digital technologies, the convergence of different forms of communication and the broader changes in communications. They also include the collapse of the barriers in cultural exchanges, the opening of the cultural markets and the increasing importance of the global multimedia conglomerates - developments that entail new regulation problems, concerns about cultural diversity and the freedom of expression, as well as the intensification of the global cultural asymmetries.

It is argued that, nevertheless, these same developments created a new condition, reinforcing the proliferation of social networks and their eventual emergence as an alternative mode for the production of culture. The paper focuses on these peculiarities, supporting that globalization - even in its current, neoliberal form - affected in various, contradictory ways all six facets of the production of culture and created many more possibilities for the study of informal and alternative art worlds that have been hardly explored in the past. The paper holds that in these circumstances it is the responsibility of the sociology of the arts not only to study them, but also to suggest ways for their support and development.

From this point of view, the paper takes also a different stance from both the enthusiastic support and the complete rejection of the market mechanisms in the cultural field, as well as from the Internet Nirvana Theory. Its main argument is that cultural and educational policies are needed to support further democratization of the artistic realm, counterbalancing the forces of an uncontrollable market rather than eliminating it whatsoever.

Sociology and Art on the Subject of Dwelling. Similarities and mutual Inspirations

Skowronska, Marta

Social Sciences Department, Institute of Sociology, Adam Mickiewicz University Poznan, Poland

Keywords

Home, sociology, art, privacy, dwelling

Contemporary Art and contemporary sociology seem to bear certain resemblance in terms of themes, goal and techniques. Understanding Art is becoming increasingly difficult without the knowledge of social context while sociology starts to use techniques predominantly connected with the Arts, such as photography and film sociology becomes more and more interested in the relations between humans and the material world. What is more, Artistic practices and sociological thought often revolve around the same subjects. One of these subjects is home and dwelling. Both sociology and Art are deeply involved in a debate over different concepts of dwelling characteristic for contemporary society. Analyzing a few Polish and British artistic projects concerning concepts of privacy, intimacy, modernity, nostalgia, modern functionalism and media control, I will try to show not only how interwoven sociology and Art are, but also the inspiring and encouraging role of Art and its contribution for understanding the contemporary world.

Strategies and aesthetics: Responses to exclusionary practices in the public art sector

Bos, Eltje

School of Social Work, University of Amsterdam Amsterdam, The Netherlands

Trienekens, Sandra

Amsterdam School of Social Work, University of Amsterdam Amsterdam, The Netherlands

Keywords

cultural diversity, race, the netherlands, Exclusion, public art sector

This paper starts from an analysis of the Dutch public art sector; an analysis of a) cultural policy rhetoric, b) the distribution of public funding allocated to cultural diversity, and c) the accessibility of publicly funded arts institutions, reveals the marginal position of non-western artists and art organizations. The analysis provides ample basis to reflect on the question whether the Dutch public art sector can best be understood as characterized by exclusion on the basis of racism, religion or culture. Next the paper shifts the focus to lived experiences, because non-western artists are obviously no passive victims of exclusionary practices, but respond in various ways to the public arts system. On the basis of interviews and an analysis of the non-dominant art sector, we discern three main strategies: the "I'll stick to my group" strategy, i.e., catering (with private funding) for one's ethnic group predominantly with repertory theatre plays or traditional music of the country of origin. In these instances there is a strong, linear relation between the artwork and ethnic identity. Second is the "art/identity is politics" strategy, which expresses a strong - highly political - relation between the artwork and ethnic identity. These artists fight for a position in the public sector "as they are". Third is the "beyond identity" strategy, which is exercised by artists whose identities coincide with Braidotti's description of nomadic subjects. The multicultural traces in their artwork need not be named, nor the quality of the work judged on the basis of those traces (only). The paper discusses current examples of all three strategies. The analysis of the public and non-dominant art sectors shows that even for those who are "beyond identity" it is incredibly hard to escape the dominant (Western-European) routines and perceptions in the public art sector - i.e., exclusion based on a complex mixture of race, religion and culture - that forces one into a protective instead of a pro-active, creative position with regard to one's artwork and identity.

Struggles on Symbolic Boundaries

Cveticanin, Predrag

Sociology, Faculty of Philosophy, University of Nis Nis, Serbia

Keywords

symbolic conflicts, symbolic boundaries, Cultural and social inequalities in Serbia

The article "Struggles on Symbolic Boundaries" presents a summary of the results of the qualitative research within the study under the same name. The study deals with the interrelatedness of cultural and social inequalities in Serbia and the symbolic conflicts through which these relations are given shape. The article is based on 54 semi-structured interviews with respondents from six towns in Serbia (from the far north to the far south of the country) sampled according to occupation/education, gender and age. Albeit conceived of within the Bourdieusian theoretical framework, the research deals in particular with what Bourdieu has referred to (in "Distinction") as secondary stratifying factors (and what the research of authors such as B. Skeggs, F. Anthias and H. Bradley is grounded in). Considering the specificities of Serbian society, the core of the article presents a report from the four symbolic battlefields on which cultural wars in Serbia are waged: the educated vs. the uneducated; urban groups vs. recently urbanized and rural groups; residents of the "European" North of the country vs. residents of the "Oriental" South of the country; and "cosmopolitans" vs. "patriots".

Television drama canonized: critiques of Israeli tv dramas, a case of art field construction

Lavie, Noa

Sociology and Anthropology, Tel Aviv University and The Academic college of Tel Aviv - Jaffa Tel Aviv, Israel

Keywords

art, criticism, television, canon, drama

This paper examines the formation of television as an art field. It uses the Israeli case of television drama series, as an example for the way artistic value is produced. One of the ways for examining the formation of an art field is by observing the construction of the artistic canon. As artistic criticism is a major way of granting artistic value to an art product, I analyzed reviews of three highly successful television drama series in Israel, these series were critically acclaimed and gained high rating, during the years 2000-2007. I analyzed reviews published in two daily newspapers and in two entertainment magazines. The series I focused on are: "Love Hurts", "The Bourgeoisie" and "In Treatment".

By focusing on discursive categories that designate artistic quality - such as "authenticity," "political content," "intellectualization," "the creators," and others - I found that there are no definite criteria for television dramatic quality. For example - a drama series can be defined as being "authentic" for dealing with specific Israeli cultural institutions such as the Israeli - Palestinian conflict. On the other hand, "authenticity" can also be defined as televising so-called "universal" human dilemmas, such as love and individualism. Nevertheless, a television drama series is defined as being of high quality when the money invested in it is more than the money its creators are making of it.

Another major finding emphasizes the fact that the field of television drama series production in Israel is dominated by Jewish-European men, who struggle over and hold most dominant positions in the field, including the ones with the power to consecrate and define the canon.

Territorial Dimensions of the Symbolic Production of Culture: The Case of Visual Arts Reporting in France, Germany, the Netherlands and the United States, 1955-2005

Janssen, Susanne

Dept. of Media and Communication / Dept. of Arts and Culture, Erasmus University Rotterdam Rotterdam, Netherlands

Keywords

comparative analysis, Globalization, Journalism, visual arts

The contemporary art world seems to be characterized by globalization and the nationality or country location of the artist appears to play a subordinated role in the process of producing and distributing artworks. Applying this trend on newspaper coverage on arts and culture brings up the assumption that newspapers have come to devote much more attention to foreign or non-domestic arts and culture than they used to. However, the internationalization of visual arts reporting is likely to vary considerably across countries. This paper will analyze long-term developments and cross-national differences in the international orientation of visual arts reporting in so-called quality newspapers. The research covers four countries, France, Germany, the Netherlands and the U.S., and four reference years: 1955, 1975, 1995 and 2005. Using content analysis, the paper focuses on differences and longitudinal changes in the amount of newspaper coverage given to domestic and foreign artists and artworks, and the national origin of the artists under discussion.

The "Europeanization" of Cultural Policy in Modern Turkey: An Historical and Anthropological Approach

Fazlioglu Akin, Zulal

Arts Policy and Administration, Ohio State University Columbus/OH, USA

Keywords

Europeanization, Governance, cultural policy

This paper is an historical, cultural, and anthropological study of the governance of cultural institutions in modern Turkey within the framework of the EU-Turkey relations. In this context, my proposed project focuses on the relationship between the Europeanization of cultural policies and state formation in Turkey in general, and on the Turkish cultural industry in particular.

Turkey's membership in the EU has been a contested issue since 1963. The conditions of becoming a member-state as set by the EU constitute a framework which requires changes and adaptations on several critical political, legal, economic, and social spheres in contemporary Turkey. While such spheres of negotiations have become a litmus test for Turkey's European compatibility, the cultural differences between Turkey and the EU member-states, Turkey's historical and cultural heritage as well as the discussions around the European identity all point to the cultural dimension as an equally significant factor that could help (or hinder) Turkey's possible membership. Thus, my paper's aim to examine the cultural dimension of Turkey's membership bid comes to the fore as an attempt to explore this unique phenomenon through the lens of cultural policy analysis. The larger question my paper deals with at the national and supra-national level is how cultural policy is employed as an instrument for nation-states to achieve domestic and foreign political goals. In this context, I seek to investigate how "Europeanization" of cultural policy 1) transforms the cultural industry in Turkey, 2) opens up possibilities to explore the importance and role of the nation-state in the historical evolution of cultural policy. At the national level, I plan to carry out an inquiry through two major domains in the cultural industry: Museums as permanent component of cultural heritage industry and the European Capital of Culture: Istanbul 2010, as a one-time "cultural project," that will bring the "European turn" to Istanbul and create an international awareness of Turkey's integration into Europe. In this vein, these two cultural venues appear to be of great importance in Turkey's EU integration process, especially in the field of cultural policy.

The "fado" of the Portuguese haute culture: the erudite music as a mirror of semi-peripheral and border culture characteristics

Fernandes, Diana

*Núcleo de Estudos do Estado, do Direito e da Administração (Permanent Observatory of Portuguese Justice), Centro de Estudos Sociais
Coimbra, Portugal*

Keywords

Colonialism, semi-periphery, border culture, haute culture, erudite music

This paper presents some brief reflections on what can be seen as manifestations of colonialism in a scenario of hegemonic/neo-liberal globalization within the northern (European) space, specifically in Portugal, a "semi-peripheral country" with a "border culture" (Boaventura de Sousa Santos). And, as a consequence, in whose cultural life predominate cultural manifestations of a hegemonic matrix, and, may I add, in the most canonical fashion.

The precise object of these reflections is an "haute culture" (Bourdieu) manifestation: the erudite music. Which is achieved by a statistical and thorough analysis of the musical agendas for the 2008-2009 season of the two more emblematic showrooms in Portugal that are the only ones providing this offer exclusively: the São Carlos National Theatre and the Gulbenkian Auditorium. Thus confirming the hegemonic presence of composers, as well as maestros and interpreters, of such matrix. In summary, of what may be called "italogermanicrussianfrench" imported products.

In a context of democratization of cultural practices, operated during the last decade through the redefinition of the production and diffusion's organizational models, as well as the hierarchies of the various cultural expressions, I observe a mimetic posture, which is symptomatic, in face of the referred imposition and import of cultural products.

Whole in whole, the fate (the "fado") of Portugal as a "semi-peripheral country" is perceivable in its cultural offer. The "colonization" of such "haute culture" spaces, their actors and, most of all, of their offer, maintains the externality of the patterns and cultural actors, in detriment of national ones. Mirroring the affirmation of Boaventura de Sousa Santos that our frontier is not "frontier", it's "border".

The art worlds margins: networks of the portuguese blogger-poets

Grácio, Rita

*Núcleo de Estudos Culturais Comparados, Centro de Estudos Sociais
Coimbra, Portugal*

Keywords

Portuguese poetry, blogs, blogger-poets, network theory

This paper presents some results of a sociological research about Portuguese poetry. The subject of the study is the Portuguese poets who are creators and promoters of a blog, who do not belong to the Portuguese literary canon.

The study proposes the articulation of network analysis with two well-known theories in the sociology of arts - the "field theory", of the French sociologist Pierre Bourdieu, and the "art world's theory", of the North American sociologist Howard Becker -, exploring some of the limits and advantages of these theories in the Portuguese context, a semi-peripheral one (Boaventura de Sousa Santos). I believe that contributions of network analysis introduce very important questions in the area of the sociology of arts, and specifically, in the "nonfield" of sociology of literature (Griswold).

Based on a qualitative methodology - interviews with non-canonical blogger-poets - I seek to understand the role of the social networks in the "(self)recognition", "training", "[amateur] literary careers", and "identities" of the Portuguese blogger-poets, attempting to understand what makes these networks move by focusing on two dimensions: cooperation/conflict and recognition.

By specifically focusing on blogs, this research intends to understand how individuals construct themselves and are recognized by "others" as poets through this new "dispositif" (Foucault), which is technological, linguistic and social.

The autobiographical role of aesthetics in poverty contexts

Trasforini, Maria Antonietta

Departement of Historical Sciences, University of Ferrara (Italy) Ferrara, Italy

Keywords

Visual culture, Ethnography, Narration, Poverty, aesthetics

The possession of art objects - and even more the art collecting - has been until now theoretically classified as cultural/expressive consumption practice, and analysed as a distinctive class behaviour, where people with more or less competent taste, as effect of social, cultural, and economic condition, can afford to buy a (normally expensive) art work. The beauty - as quality "generally" connected to art objects - seems therefore to be tied to property and wealth. But what happens in a context of economic poverty? Does it exist "beautiful" where property of objects is precarious or absent?

The paper will present and discuss some results from a research on aesthetics and poverty, recently carried out in Milano (Italy), interviewing a sample of Italian and immigrant people, living in indigent conditions. Using ethnography observation in the houses and the instruments of visual culture (with the use of photos), the research has inquired into the role, the characteristics, the meanings and the functions of some particular objects displayed during the encounters (i.e. daily objects, pictures, religious images, clothes etc.), that the interviewees defined as "beautiful". The described "aesthetic object" turned out to be polysemic, contiguous to the concept of usefulness, rituality, relation - as anthropology of art suggests. This aesthetics in action, describing the relationship between individuals and some particular emotional daily objects, seems to function as unusual autobiographical tool. Methodologically, the progress from the self of interviewee to the transitional object, has produced a narrative freedom to account for a personal or family history. So, also in a context of poverty (relative or absolute), some objects - described as beautiful - , seem to carry out the complex function of public representation of self, a function of narration and documentation of the past, displaying a role of genealogic continuity (with the family or with the culture of origin in the case of immigrants) and finally a role of emotional control and practical connection with a present difficult daily life.

The composer as aesthetic agent: Paul Hindemith in Germany

Sutherland, Ian

School of Music, Memorial University of Newfoundland St. John's, Canada

Keywords

aesthetics, agency, music, Reflexivity, self

Recent scholarship within the sociology of art and the sociology of music specifically, has focused on reflexive projects of the self. This paper seeks to extend this inquiry through a consideration of music creation (composing) as integral to such projects - how composers are aesthetic agents. Bull, in his article "No Dead Air! The iPod and the Culture of Mobile Listening" explores how music consumers use "privatized and mediated sound reproduction" to mediate the self and the world through individually created soundworlds (2005, p. 347). Denora in Music in everyday life (2000) argues the - ostensibly "private" sphere of music use is part and parcel of the cultural constitution of subjectivity, part of how individuals are involved in constituting themselves as social agents' and how "private music consumption" informs debates around aesthetic reflexivity (pp. 47-48). This paper explores the use of music in reflexive projects of the self but redresses an imbalance inherent in the literature placed on music consumption. Here I consider the centrality of composing, traditionally defined, in aesthetic reflexivity as individuals engage in self reflexive projects not just through musical consumption and appropriation but through musical creation.

Drawing upon recent literature in the sociology of music as well as theoretical work on the self and aesthetic reflexivity (Beck et al.1994 - Reflexive modernization; Giddens 1991 - Modernity and self-identity; Lash and Urry 1994 - Economies of signs and spaces) this paper contextualises the work of composer Paul Hindemith from the early Weimar Republic through to his emigration from Nazi Germany in 1938. Using Hindemith's letters, artifacts of his contemporaneous reception and his aesthetic products - both what he composed and what he chose not to compose - the creation of music is seen as the active ingredient in his reflexive project of self. Hindemith's musical activity is that of an individual framing his past, living his present and constructing his future through the creation of aesthetic products; an aesthetic agent living through music.

The Denial of the Reception of Women in Baroque French Music: New Discoveries of Women Musicians in the Relation of Court and Church

Halley, Jeanne

Music, University of Texas San Antonio USA, <http://www.esa9thconference.com/>

Keywords

Court and Church, Women convent composers, French Baroque music, Reception studies.

This paper explores the denial of the reception of women composers in Baroque French Music, and presents a new discovery -a woman composer in a convent with relations to the French court. Until recently no French nun composers were known. In 1997, an archival discovery was made, a Processional from a famous Abbey, listing a Magnificat by a woman amongst the most famous composers of Grand and Petits Motets. The convent abbess, related to Louis XIV, was Adelaide d'Orleans, the daughter of the Regent. I visited the archives, examined and photocopied the Ms. Her Magnificat has been added recently to the electronic archive of French Motets. Famous seventeenth century women composers are now being rediscovered. During the 1980's, the editing of Elysabeth Jacquet de la Guerre's music brought new interest to the music of the period revising our former knowledge of the social context of musical production of the Baroque. This underscores that there has been a recurrent denial of women's role in Baroque music. A sociology of knowledge/reception studies approach displays that since then, although successful during their lifetime, women composers vanished from the canon. In the late 1600's women's compositions were published in the most renowned collections; newly created French national academies including the Opera opened to women who received the right to perform onstage as professionals. All this ended with the Convention Nationale and the Napoleonic Code of Law. Studies on music by women were initiated again toward the end of the nineteenth century, but the role of women as composers in France was erased again. In this context, we explore our findings on the Abbey and the role of women in Baroque music. Women from the aristocracy and bourgeoisie populated Benedictine convents. Abbess Adelaide d'Orleans, raised at this Benedictine convent, introduced a new brilliance to the religious services by inaugurating instrumental accompaniment. A nun was the principal organist of the Abbey which implies that she had learned improvisation and composition. This paper reevaluates our understanding of gender roles in the French Baroque.

The Graffiti Mediator: Debating the Recent Remakes of a Transnational Artistic Practice

Ferro, Lígia

*Centre for Research and Studies in Sociology - CIES, Instituto Superior de Ciências do Trabalho e da Empresa
Lisboa, Portugal*

Keywords

cities, Graffiti, Mediation, Transnationality

The so-called hip hop graffiti has been a determinant to the expression that takes place in contemporary urban public space. It arose in the late sixties of the last century, intimately connected to the hip hop culture, which was the cultural statement of a particular ethnic identity, that of the residents in New York's ghettos (who were segregated from the higher spheres of society and thus expressed their opposition to the domain and privilege of the white majority), in a wider context of a multi-ethnic city and of a multi-ethnic nation. In Europe, graffiti became very popular in Paris in the nineteen eighties. Later, this practice expanded to the entire globe.

Graffiti has been studied from several points of view but the main fields of work normally focus on the subcultural and marginal character of this practice or on the process of institutionalization that has touched certain graffiti's dimensions and actors in multiple urban contexts. Beyond these two perspectives, we are working on graffiti practice starting from the experiences of mediation carried out by some groups of graffiti artists in the city of Lisbon, Paris and New York, making an effort of transnational comparison of data.

Nowadays, graffiti writers are taking the initiative by developing projects to rehabilitate degraded spaces in poor neighbourhoods. In Lisbon, particularly, we have the example of an informal group of graffiti artists improving these degraded places by painting pieces inspired by the local culture, doing a collective work along with the population. We are interested on the mediation role of these graffiti artists, also to understand the recent mutations of graffiti practice. Artistic practices related to discourses of illegality and marginality (like graffiti), were rapidly reshaping over the last few years. These days the understanding of these sort of practices are central to think the question of conflict mediation. This research is being carried out in the background of the course of the International Doctorate Program in Urban Anthropology of ISCTE (Instituto Superior de Ciências do Trabalho e da Empresa - Lisbon) and the Centre for Research and Studies in Sociology (CIES).

The Impact of Religion and Social Orientations on Visual Arts Appreciation

van Eijck, Koen

Dept. of Arts and Culture Studies, Erasmus University Rotterdam Rotterdam, Netherlands

Keywords

religion, social orientation, taste, visual arts

This study investigates visual arts preferences in a manner that contributes to the field in two ways. First, we included characteristics of respondents that differentiate not so much between those with highbrow or lowbrow taste (as do, e.g., education and age) but that differentiate between people with a more traditional versus a more modern taste. We thus incorporated religious orientation plus six social orientations (utilitarian and expressive individualism, solidarity, communitarianism, social isolation, and social disorientation) in our models. These items indicate elements of people's more general outlook on life, or habitus, which are likely to affect - or be expressed through - their specific cultural taste. Second, cultural taste is not measured using survey questions about participation in general cultural categories, but by presenting respondents with nine colour plates depicting different visual art styles. Our results were obtained using a Flemish sample of over 2500 adult respondents. The analyses show that there are clear relations between religion and, especially, our set of social orientations on the one hand, and preferences for more traditional versus more modern art styles, on the other. Traditional styles are mostly appreciated by catholic respondents and atheists (or: non-religious liberals), albeit probably for different reasons. The atheists also appreciate the modern works more than any other group. In addition, for modern works, we see a clear negative relation between appreciation scores and being more religious in general. As for the social orientations, solidarity and communitarianism are most clearly positively related to the appreciation of traditional works of art. These orientations were negatively related to the appreciation of modern styles, as were utilitarian individualism and social disorientation. Our study demonstrates that 1] it is necessary to differentiate between (legitimate) artistic styles in order to understand cultural tastes; 2] we need other background indicators than the usual set of sociodemographics in order to understand cultural taste differentiation in any substantial detail; and 3] the same work of art can be appreciated for different reasons by different people and thus be embedded in different taste patterns.

The organizational field of popular music festival in Italy

de Benedittis, Mario

*Studi sociali e politici, Università degli Studi di Milano
Milano, Italy*

Keywords

space, cultural production, Music festival

The paper aims to analyze the realm of popular music festivals in Italy, moving from their progressive transformation toward a more institutionalized level of the organizational field, and focusing on the complex relationship between author-public-event, going beyond the distinction production/consumption, looking at the event as a "mise en scène" resulting both from the activities of professionals that constructed an "orchestration of media" and the meaningful activities of public. The spaces in which the event occurs has an important role too.

The arguments are based on a research conducted through qualitative interviews with organizers, promoters, musicians, journalists, and sessions of participant observations at several popular music festivals in Italy.

The role of artist's experience in a research

Tainio, Matti

Department of Visual Culture, University of Art and Design Helsinki Helsinki, Finland

Keywords

artistic research, Sport, visual arts, aesthetic experience

In my paper, I'll present a case study of research where artistic work is a significant part of the whole. The objective is to deal with the possibilities of combining artistic work with more customary research methods. My special interest is in the potential of opening up the artist-researcher's experience when focusing on the artistic work. The artworks are going to be exhibited and evaluated as a part of the research, but what is the role of the artistic work behind the works? As an artist-researcher I find including artistic activity to research meaningful and necessary, but how does it contribute to research as a whole?

The case study I'm presenting is the first artistic project included in my research concerning the relations of the visual arts and the sports. This project was an artistic inquiry of distance running. Instead of observing running from the quantitative viewpoint of measuring and exercise or as an ethical enterprise, I made an effort to treat it as an artistic possibility and very much as an aesthetic and social entity. I didn't only monitor other runners, but also myself as an active runner. The project was exhibited in gallery space, images are available at my website (www.mattitainio.net/Ontherungallery.html).

My premise is the artistic work as an aesthetic process, an experience, where the raw material is formed to the artworks as well as the forming of the material changes the way artist understands the subject matter of her work. If the artist is an artist-researcher, she should be able to decode and use this comprehension in her research, not only the analysis of the finished works of art. In my work, I see the artistic work as a way of formulating questions, which cannot yet have formed verbally. The finished works have the possibility to provide the answers. For me, this is the most significant benefit of combining the artistic work with my research. The problem is how to make this tacit portion of the artistic practice visible in the written research. I'm suggesting that it is not visible when observing the works of art only.

The role of the music in the German extremist right-wing movements

Pierobon, Chiara

Sociology and Social Research, Università degli Studi di Trento Longarone - BL, Italy

Keywords

right-wing extremism, grounded theory, Music Propaganda

As addressed by Eyerman and Jamison (1998: 160), "the construction of meaning through songs is a central aspect of collective identity formation and (...) collective structures of feeling are actually made and reorganized, in part, through music".

Based on a deep description of the main features, modes of distribution and consumption practices of Rechtsrock (Right-wing music), the paper will frame the conspirative and penally punishable activities of nowadays nationalistic movements in the Bundesrepublik Deutschlands focusing on the central role played by music in giving cohesion and coherence to this widespread scene.

German extremist movements represent a significant example of political propaganda through music. In the past decades, right-wing parties have registered a dramatic decrease in youth participation and trust in traditional political models. To contrast this tendency, a new strategy was adopted and several small groups and organizations were created at a regional level; nonetheless, the governmental prohibition of reconstructing any organization which could remind of the Nazi party made particularly hard their survival. All these fragmented units needed a common ideological denominator as well as a way to keep in touch with each other without being bothered by any legal complication. And, it was in this context that music was chosen as effective means of propaganda, as powerful homogenizing element, as privileged way to reach young and potentially new adepts of the extremist right-wing scene.

Four will be the foci of the paper: the Rechtsrock groups, the songs, the concerts as socialization event and the audience. In particular, the analysis will pay close attention to the songs' content. Through a grounded theory, by using NVivo qualitative software, it will be possible to discover and analyse the most common topics, words and symbols characterizing their music production, thus deeply penetrating into the ideology, the process of identity formation and the structure of feeling of these movements.

Coherently with a framework that looks at music as significant and largely resource for academic observes, the paper will underline how the sociology of music represents an extremely effective and strategic means for the examination of complex phenomena such as extremist and xenophobic movements.

The Ruins of Mitteleuropa: An Investigation into the Cultural Blueprints of the Centre

Gafijczuk, Dariusz

*Sociology, Trinity College Dublin
Dublin, Ireland*

Keywords

music, Cultural Identity, Central Europe

In recent years, especially with the enlargement of the European Union, the European collective identity has been struggling for an adequate description of the new status quo. With the enlargement came not only a new physical frontier further to the East, but also the uncomfortable but necessary prospect of re-connecting with the European Community's conflicted memory of its imagined Centre. In this sense, the essential aspect of building a new reality of integration also involves the re-invention, or at least a re-vision of Europe's focal point. It is this indecisiveness or hesitation as far as Europe's mobile Centre is concerned that in the end, and in a self-contradictory fashion, might prove to be the most stable, democratic and enduring aspect of Europe's self-image.

The present paper attempts to learn something about a historical moment of one of Europe's centres by thinking about a sample of its music.

The text juxtaposes the Hungarian composer Béla Bartók's and the Czech composer Leos Janáček's theory of music. Both of these well known figures present us with opposite cultural and artistic identities. Bartók's music rests on the re-enforcement of the centre through ethno-musical research, which is then integrated into his high art of contemporary concert-hall music. This attempt looks for the centre away from both the extremes of traditionally pastoral image of folk and country life and the harsh reality of modern metropolis. Bartók's musical solution of the problem is characterized by a hybrid condition of reconciling nature (found in folk music, for instance) and modern culture of the metropolis.

Janáček's project of integrating subjectivity into sound through his technique of speech-melody (sound based on naturally spoken language) and his cosmopolitan vision of modern politics, seems to undermine such reinforced notion of centrality. Janáček is a model figure not only because he attempts the most comprehensive and uniquely successful bridging of music proper and the culture of spoken language, but also because he is consistently on the periphery of the cultural and political margin itself.

The paper concludes with the proposal for a theoretical reformulation of the concept the Center, culturally speaking.

The Socially Valued Practice of an Aesthetic Life for Improvising and Jazz Musicians

Sutherland, Allan

Nursing, Kyushu Univeresity of Nursing and Social Welfare

Tamana, Japan

Keywords

uncertainty, identification, Instrumental Attachments, Aesthetic Careers

Survey data from a global sample of improvising and jazz musicians reveals around 34% do not evaluate their careers not yet established despite having pursued a musicians career for 16 years on average, 4% assess their careers maybe now or becoming established after an average of 21 years working as musicians. Of the 66% who reported they considered their careers established, having taken an average of 12 years to reach that stage, many experienced volatile incomes from their musical activities, with uncertain, or infrequent performance opportunities. This paper focuses on the qualitative reports of musicians from 10 countries concerning their attachments to their instruments, most report experiencing anxiety over performance and creative abilities, and personal and social dislocation when unable to access or play their instruments for 2 -10 days, their ambitions to ever improving their instrumental capacities and musical creativity, and their embedded social interactions with collaborative and mentor musicians, performing to responsive audiences, and relations with others within the artistic or cultural social world. These attachments, social relation and cumulating investments of capacities and opportunities toward music, limiting alternative career opportunities, partly explain their persistence with careers as improvising and jazz musicians, and the music's past creativity,

The Socio-Artistic Configuration of StreetArt in Israel

Trajtenberg, Graciela

School of Government and Society, The academic College of Tel Aviv-Yaffo Yaffo, Israel

Keywords

Public Sphere, new artistic forms, classification of arts

This paper presents an ongoing study concerning Streetart in Israel after the year two thousand. Graffiti - as either images or lettering, scratched, scrawled, painted or marked - has existed in Israel for a long time. It has usually appeared as a response to social circumstances and has been characterized by being spontaneous, performed in restricted areas and as a result of specific political situations. Such was the case of the massive graffiti making after the assassination of Prime Minister Ytzhak Rabin, when one of the outside walls of Tel Aviv City Hall, next to the place he was killed at, became the "canvas" of graffiti inscriptions.

Since the onset of the year 2000, Streetart in Israel has been slowly emerging as a new form of visual expression. That is the case of the Israeli West Bank barrier that has become a site for graffiti. Streetart in Israel reminds us the artistic practice carried out in other societies, like the materials used, the keeping of artists' identity secret or the debate about the commercialization of the artistic form.

Through an analysis of the social-artistic characteristics, such as the sources of the Israeli artistic practice, the claims made by both individual artists and artistic collectives, the present study will make it possible to reveal the particularities of this new Israeli artistic form.

The Visual Arts And The Mediated Public Sphere

Vega, Judith

Faculty of Philosophy, University of Groningen Groningen, The Netherlands

Keywords

DEMOCRACY, citizenship, Public Sphere, Mediation, Visual culture

Processes of mediation have been central to modern life and its public sphere. The modern public sphere is an essentially mediated publicity, as public opinion formation has been dependent on a host of mediating devices. Mediation favours democracy in providing and engendering civic practices of argumentation - without mediative practices no civic practices, no citizenship in its civic, participatory or deliberative sense.

Art is often understood as remaining outside this complex of mediated publicity, considered to be a realm of the imagination with no clear ties to the argumentative realm of publicity. The public sphere, however, is not just about arguing on content, it is also about embodied presence. And it is not so much the textual media as rather the visual media that would be the quintessential spaces where this dimension of public life is being represented and mediated. The realm of the visual imagination - in the broad sense of both "high" and "low" visual culture - provides us with representations, or configurations, of public presence, that is, the ways bodies situate themselves in space and in relation to each other. Nineteenth- and twentieth-century painting, cinema, and advertising all vie for the representation of bodies-in-public-space.

I am interested in how the mediations of public opinion and of public presence could be drawn together conceptually. How to draw the visual arts into the theory of democracy? I will discuss some sources of the theoretical perplexities involved, by inquiring into a number of theories that have been developed on the mediated nature of modern publicity, conceptualising it as for instance discursive, phantasmagoric, spectatorial or recitative publicity. I will track the suitability of these various approaches for addressing the mix of textual and visual mediations that characterizes present-day's public spheres.

Three cases: how the artist's visibility is shaped by the primary distributors

Jaakkola, Maarit

Dpt. of Journalism & Mass Communication, University of Tampere Tampereen yliopisto, Finland

Keywords

media publicity, Professionalism, criticism, cultural journalism, cultural newspaper departments

In art criticism as well as in arts journalism, the artist must basically resort to an asymmetrical constellation in communication. Especially when the journalist or the critic reports on the artistic work he or she functions as a self-legitimized definer of the artistic production. Nowadays, certain institutional actors, the so-called primary distributors such as gallerists, managers, curators and communication officers, attempt to pre-define the object and to affect the arts journalist's reporting. This does not always result in a satisfying outcome as different values are at stake. My aim is to scrutinize three cases from cultural departments in Finnish newspapers where the journalistic text is based on a bulletin in order to explore some collision points in the patterns of arts reporting.

The cases are chosen on the basis that some misunderstandings between the journalist and the artist (i.e. conventions of the artworld) have occurred. The cases are from Finnish regional newspapers with an established cultural department and deal with contemporary dance and visual arts. The texts are regarded through the whole journalistic work process with the help of the following questions: 1) What were the basic assumptions of the journalistic ideation (genre, point, method)? 2) Was any direct contact between the artist and the reporter established? 3) How was the information acquisition realized? 4) How and why did the artist feel misunderstood and how did the interpretations and justifications differ from each other?

The cases are situated in the context of the two-sided professionalism of cultural journalism. There are principally two ways of treating the object in newspaper journalism. Both the system of journalism as well as the system of criticism legitimate their goals in different ways. The cases in question are contextualized with the help of a description of these journalistic systems which is grounded in an organizational ethnography that I conducted in the cultural department of the largest Finnish national newspaper in 2005. The study suggests that the relation between the traditional newspaper universalism (the tradition of journalism) and specialist expertise (the tradition of criticism) is being re-defined, which may result in new ways of reporting.

Traditional Music Practices and Social Interactions

Anne-Cécile, NENTWIG

Sociologie, Laboratoire CSRPC-ROMA Grenoble II LYON, FRANCE

Keywords

sociology of music, social interactions, Traditional Music

What do individuals seek to discover through taking part in amateur musical activity? Apart from an interest in a particular traditional musical instrument or repertoire such as "world music" or "traditional" music, what do people gain from practicing amateur music? The aim of my present doctoral study is to explore the relationship between a particular musical practice and specific values and symbols which together encompass a specific "way of life." My presentation will explore how one particular kind of amateur music functions: traditional music. More specifically, this paper will examine the social relationships which form around learning and performing a traditional music repertoire. How does an individual engage with traditional music? What expectations develop around the practice and performance of a particular repertoire? My research aims to explore the ways in which particular traditional musical tastes are formed and to describe the effect of this process of attachment to a particular musical form upon the whole ensemble of an individual's cultural practices. In other words, this project explores how music interacts with social identity to represent and create a particular world view. As a study of the sociology of music, this work offers an analytical framework which is highly relevant - exploring amateur artistic practices in terms of how they interact with the social identity formation of their public audience.

Based upon interviews, classroom observation and a statistical investigation carried out as part of the doctoral thesis, this paper will provide an insight into the ways in which music is learned and acquired within oral music traditions; adopting a sociological approach. It will also illustrate how amateur musicians engage with these learning and performance processes. The paper will address the question of how to define traditional music forms; it will then build upon this starting point to consider the manner in which individuals become "amateur musicians." This will be followed by a discussion of learning techniques and the effects which attachment to particular traditional music forms has upon individuals. Finally, the paper will conclude by analysing the consequences which this kind of "musical passion" can have upon individual lifestyles.

Transforming art history elitism: a dialogical experience from the other women in Barcelona

Mendoza Morteo, Marlen

Sociological Theory, University of Barcelona Barcelona, Spain

Keywords

women empowerment, arts, dialogical learning

One of new tendencies around artistic practices is democratization in terms of learning and understanding arts. In the context of art history as a discipline, this means that "the making of" interpretation and explanation of visual arts ought to be oriented towards bigger audiences, especially towards ones that have been traditionally excluded from the mainstream of art history. According to Thomas Crow (2007), one of the most recognized historians of art, this process is not always achieved. It is because a democratizing way of understanding and practicing art history is related to the necessity of expanding audiences. While from the beginning it has been widespread that art history is the sum of "sublime moments" only studied by selected and reduced audiences. This means opening new spaces of reflection, discussion, dialogue and participation of voices traditionally silenced by the dominant culture. Reorienting an elitist discipline, as the art history, towards the idea of art for all also means empowering people who have been marginalized and excluded from the most elitist spaces of art. This paper presents from a sociological perspective, the case of a women's group who have started the "dialogical artistic gathering" in a school for adults in Barcelona. As pioneers in Spain and probably in Europe, this is a successful experience of dialogical learning (Flecha et al. 2008) which combines theoretical and practical principles of the critical pedagogy (Freire, 2006; Giroux, 1997; Kincheloe, 2008; Macedo, 2006; Steinberg, 2001) and it is the result of the dialogical literary and musical gatherings (CONFAPEA, 2008). From this experience it is stated that women audiences "less qualified" in terms of specialization and more hybrid but always interested, are able to build empowering process which shed light on the old ways of making and teaching art history, and also contributing to increase instrumental and academic learning. Based on the dialogical artistic gatherings, it is possible to talk about the democratization of artistic practices because they provide a local and successful example, extending also to other European contexts where social cohesion and thirst for living, feeling and understanding art are needed, extending inexperienced audiences.

Transnational realities in the Cinema of the last decades: Portugal as a case study

Monteiro, Paulo Filipe

Faculdade de Ciências Sociais e Humanas, Universidade Nova de Lisboa Portela LRS, Portugal

Keywords

National identities, Portuguese Cinema, transnational networks

Some people say that Portuguese Cinema was a French invention. They are referring, of course, to the "new wave" of Portuguese films, which started to be recognized, mostly through the work of our oldest filmmaker, Manoel de Oliveira, in the early sixties, with retrospectives held in the French Cinémathèque. Ever since, Portuguese films have won presence, recognition and sometimes prizes in the major European festivals: a recognition that they hardly receive in Portugal, where even the cultural elite will often say Portuguese Cinema doesn't exist, which might be a way of saying it is not significant or hasn't much value.

This legitimation that cannot be obtained internally and comes from other European countries has effects on the characteristics of Portuguese films, as we will try to show. But it paradoxically requires these works to be "Portuguese", for it is the difference, almost the exoticism, that is appreciated.

As a counter-movement to this delicate situation, some artists and decision makers have started in the eighties to fight for the investment in large European co-productions: some of these were tried, with large budgets and meagre results. But this could not change the image of Portugal nor of Europe, for such films emulate American movies.

A last variable to be considered are the transnational programs for financing European or Hispanic cinema, for they are trying to create new international networks. Do they produce films different from those made with national funds? Does it still make sense to speak of a national film, when in this expensive medium a condition to their existence is almost always a co-production between several countries?

In the past as in the present, how Portuguese is Portuguese cinema?

Underground music scenes: starting a musician career or partying with friends?

Gomes, Rui Telmo

-, Observatório das Actividades Culturais
Lisboa, Portugal

Keywords

creativity, popular music, underground, liminality

In recent years, new popular music acts have made themselves known in Portugal through their self-producing strategies (publishing with their own small labels and promoting shows on their own). Cooperation networks (Howard Becker) within different small musical scenes (Andy Bennett) engage young musicians, amateur and professional gatekeepers and audiences (gathering friends mostly). Those networks combine conviviality, artistic production and ritual performance - and are referred to as the underground. One key aspect to be addressed is the balance between identity practices and professional aspirations. On the one hand, authenticity is a recurrent issue among underground musicians and drives them to make music meaningful to their peers. On the other hand, young musicians find themselves in a liminal (Victor Turner) stage in their lives trying to translate their creative output into a way of living.

Vocation and the Artist's profession in the age of complexity

Tessarolo, Mariselda

General Psychologie, University of Padua Padova, Italy

Keywords

Differences between artistic and non-artistic professions, Artist's vocation, Artist's profession

Background - The transition from modernity to post-modernity marked an important turn in the artist's profession. After the first change - in the Renaissance with the shift from the guild corporations to the liberal arts which led to the concept of the artist as a genius - the second occurred in the 20th century when Beruf (vocation) underwent modifications not only in the way artists conceived of themselves, but especially in the relationships they had with others: interaction with the public (and not vocation) came to the fore in the evaluation of the artist.

Aims and method - A questionnaire with interval scale questions was administered to 180 university students, who were asked to 'compare' the degree of talent, extravagance, sensitivity, fame, income, prestige and vocation in some artistic (musician, painter, sculptor, architect) and non-artistic (doctor, lawyer, teacher) professions. Frequency and Variance analyses were carried out on the results.

Results and Conclusions - All the compared professions show the need for a specific and indispensable vocation. The result emerges from the lack of statistically significant differences among the compared professions. Most of the questions asked did not reveal differences between artistic and non-artistic professions, with the exception of the questions on talent, extravagance and sensitivity, which highlighted qualities attributed more to artists than to other professionals.

When is Artification?

Shapiro, Roberta

*EHESS, MCC, Laboratoire d'anthropologie et d'histoire de l'institution de la culture - LAHIC
Paris, France*

Heinich, Nathalie

*EHESS, CNRS, Centre de recherches sur les arts et le langage - CRAL
Paris, France*

Keywords

art, artists, art worlds, artification, social construction of art

What do Renaissance painting, circus, jazz and photography have in common ? This paper addresses that question by introducing our forthcoming edited book on artification.

In homage to Nelson Goodman ("When Is Art?", 1977) it is our ambition to build a grounded theory of artification "i.e., the transformation of non-art into art" and describe the processes by which objects, practices and ideas are transformed into art, and people into artists, both in their material form and in the way they are identified by society at large. We shall present (1) a theory of artification and (2) the monographical data on which it is founded.

What are the pertinent sectors, operators, and actors of artification -

Consider sectors of social life. Crafts, industry, entertainment, sports and religion, for example, are more or less prone to artification at different points in history. Today religious artefacts are extremely prone to their transfiguration into art, while this is rarely the case in sports or industry.

We also review the indicators or, in a more active sense, the operators of artification, that both conduct change and let people know that transformation is underway. Operators are discursive, aesthetic, legal, technical, institutional, and organisational : hip-hop gets called urban dance ; jazz is written onto musical scores, improvisors are called composers and paid rights ; producers import forms from established art.

Many social actors are concerned. Producers may seek to assert themselves as artists or be unwittingly « discovered » by mediators. Dealers, collectors, curators, and critics define and confirm artists ; agencies allot funds. Artification is accomplished when the public at large shows appreciation.

From these findings we establish typologies of artification. The process can be durable over the long term : the transformation of Renaissance painters is a case in point. In other instances artification can concern only part of a productive sector (cinema, photography), or meet resistance from certain social groups for technical or philosophical reasons.

The main consequence of artification is to enlarge the art world. It also legitimizes and authenticifies practice and favours individualization.

Finally, the study of artification opens new avenues for theoretical reflexion.

RN03

Biographical Perspectives on European Societies

"Civil Society Organisations" Spanning boundaries'. The biographical impact of civil society organizations on Europeaness

Nagel, Ulrike

Institute of Sociology, University of Magdeburg Magdeburg, Germany

Schuetze, Fritz

Institute of Sociology, University of Magdeburg Magdeburg, Germany

Schroeder, Anja

Institute of Sociology, University of Magdeburg Magdeburg, Germany

Keywords

Biographical Work, Civil Society Organisations, european identity

"Civil Society Organisations"Spanning the boundaries? The biographical impact of civil society organizations on&nbsp;Europeaness

Civil society organisations are an important feature of public arenas within Europe playing a remarkable role in processes of governance. We define civil society organisations as legal non-profit entities, which pursue a common purpose in the public interest. In our project we are researching the activities and the biographical impact of organizations which are spanning countries and/or have a specific European or cross-border context:"reconciliation" groups as of Polish and German people bridging the gap of World War II and the Holocaust, conflict resolution groups in Northern Ireland, human rights organizations, and environmental groups spanning the boundaries between national interests in face of global ecological risks. We are investigating the activities of groups whose members, while pursuing a shared interest, start from culturally, politically or religiously opposed positions. In these contexts a change of perspective might be fostered by Europeaness as a common denominator for deliberation. But we may also observe forces at work, like biographical and national feelings of belongingness, of difference, or of unique individual experiences or dedications, which retard or even forbid the transitory processes of reciprocation and universalization inherent in the evolution of collective identities such as a European identity.

Those of us dealing with the CSO "sensitized group" intend to develop and maintain a special relationship with the targeted organisations. They will receive feedback from the research findings from an early stage. By these means, the organizations will be actively involved in development of the research conclusions and at the same time their work will be effectively supported in the arena of public debate.

Coordinator: Dr. habil. Ulrike Nagel

Otto-von-Guericke University, Magdeburg ulrike.nagel@ovgu.de

"Heroicized victims": How non-Jewish women in Austria embed National Socialism and the post-war period in their biographies?

Pohn-Weidinger, Maria

*Sociology, Institute of Advance Studies, Vienna
Vienna, Austria*

Keywords

National Socialism, post-war period, female biographies and discourse

The issue of this presentation is embedded in the specific Austrian discourse on National Socialism, which is led along the lines of a myth of victimisation. Thereby, Austria is picked out as the "first victim" of Hitler-Germany. In the sense of a reversion of perpetrators and victims this discourse offers an opportunity to deny responsibility for the involvement of Austrian people in the Holocaust. Since the 1980ties a creeping transformation of the national discourse of victimisation has taken place. Responsibility and guilt are more and more picked out as central themes. But, parallel to this transformation another discourse has been established, picking out women as victims of war simply because of their gender and because they made sacrifices in the process of Austria's reconstruction during the post-war period. These non-Jewish women are referred to as the generation of "ruins women" ("Trümmerfrauen") and as sacrificed heroines by the actual political and public discourse. This also implies the necessity of publicly remembering the post-war time by blinding out the time before 1945, which also means not to pick out the direct and indirect involvement of women in the National Socialism.

This specific Austrian situation is the background of this presentation, which mainly focuses on an analysis of female biographies of the generation of "Trümmerfrauen". These women are referred to as "generation" because they were born before 1928 and thus experienced National Socialism and the post-war period as girls or young women. The meaning of National Socialism and the post-war period for the Austrian biographies and in which way this meaning corresponds to gendered discourses of victimisation will be worked out in the presentation. Guiding questions will be whether the current public constructions of "Trümmerfrauen" as sacrificing heroines change the perspective on the and the way of integrating the mentioned historical events in the own life story and memory, or whether other individual experiences or discourses have a stronger impact on the biographical embedding of the National Socialism and the post-war time in biographies told by former "Trümmerfrauen".

A sense of belonging - walking, place making and performative praxis

O'Neill, Maggie

Social Sciences, Loughborough University Loughborough, UK

Myers, Misha

Performance, University College Falmouth Falmouth, Cornwall, UK

Keywords

biography, ethno-mimesis, performance

This paper elicits a dialogue between the walking arts practice of Misha Myers (www.wayfromhome.org) and the ethno-mimetic research of Maggie O'Neill (www.makingtheconnections.info). The paper discusses our respective research projects. O'Neill and Hubbard's (2008-9) AHRC funded research in the East Midlands which used Misha's walking arts practice and participatory action research and arts practice (ethno-mimesis) to explore experiences and processes of 'belonging' with four groups of migrants working in partnership with four community arts organisations; and Misha's practice based research project 'Homing Place' involving inhabitants of Plymouth, UK who are refugees and asylum seekers in participatory practices she refers to as 'conversive wayfinding'.

We focus attention on the ways that performative, and arts based methods can re-invigorate biographical methods and explore the tensions between research and art as methodology. We also discuss the way that performative methods offer strategies for challenging the dynamics of power that undermine or override the potential of equitable exchange in participatory methods.

Art in Action: Exploring Poetry Slam with Ethnographic Discourse Analysis

Gregory, Helen

Psychology, University of Bath Bath, England

Keywords

biography, poetry, Ethnography, discourse analysis

The RN3 conference in Krakow in December 2008 stimulated much debate around the ways in which social scientists can study art, artists, performance and biography. This paper considers some of the issues, concerns and innovations which were addressed by delegates. Particular attention will be paid to: the merits of interdisciplinary research (combining especially sociology, psychology and the arts) the epistemological and theoretical underpinnings of such research what counts as a "text" the performative construction of auto/biography and identity and challenging the micro/macro divide.

These points will be discussed with reference to a recent study on the global phenomenon of poetry slam. Slam is a knockout oral poetry competition, in which poets perform their own work in front of a live audience. Slammers are judged on the quality of their performance and poetry by judges who are typically randomly selected members of that audience. The research at hand focuses on slam in London and Bristol in the U.K., and New York and Chicago in the U.S.. The study uses discourse analytic and ethnographic tools of enquiry to explore how slam participants mobilise poetry, informal conversation and other forms of action to weave stories about themselves and others.

It will be argued that these auto/biographies work both to construct individuals' identities, and to help them to negotiate the status hierarchies which structure their daily lives and interactions. Ethnographic and discourse analytic approaches can thus be combined to produce an informative and sensitive account of the construction of identity in everyday interaction. I will contend that such in-depth explorations of micro level interaction are essential if we are to achieve a full understanding of the macro level social structures and processes which they help to constitute. After all, as Mead (1934: 37) notes, "history is nothing but biography, a whole series of biographies".

Reference:

Mead, G. H. (1934) Mind, Self and Society from the Standpoint of a Social Behaviorist. In, Morris, C. W. (ed.) Works of George Herbert Mead. Volume 1. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

Becoming a visual arts teacher in a multicultural European city

Kupferberg, Feiwel

Culture, Language and Media, Malmö University Malmö, Sweden

Keywords

teachers, visual arts, multicultural cities

A core competence as well as central part of the identity of future teachers in the arts, is the problem of how to teach visual methods. What are visual methods for, how can one motivate youth to learn visual methods and how do you engage your students in a dialogue or communication about the role and functions of art and visual methods in contemporary societies that feels relevant for the younger generations? In this paper I will present the oral as well as written and visualized reflections by nineteen coming school teachers made over a period of one and a half years of training in the teaching of art . I will look at how they have coped with these issues both in their own education to become teachers of art and in their attempts to apply some of the theories, ideas and methods they learned at Malmö University during their periods of practical training in different schools in and outside Malmö. Since the town of Malmö is the 'immigrant port' of Sweden, Malmö itself as well as its schools can be seen as natural laboratories of how visual methods in teaching interact with the increasingly multicultural context of contemporary Europe (more than fifty per cent of all school children are recent immigrants or children of recent immigrants).

Becoming Cosmopolitanisms in Europe - A Symbolic Interactionist Approach

Armitage, Neil

Institute of Social Change, University of Manchester Manchester, United Kingdom

Keywords

symbolic interactionism, Cosmopolitanism, personal communities, researcher's own background

Cosmopolitanism has resurfaced within social science as a framework to conceptualise and research the dynamics of contemporary social change. European social theorists discussing the potential of this framework, not solely as a critique to methodological nationalism, argue it enables a clearer understanding of Europe from both within and beyond its borders.

With no clear consensus upon what constitutes cosmopolitanism and how it is embodied at an individual level through certain values or capacities, a method was designed to explore and if possible draw out any common cosmopolitan denominators in young European's enumerative biographies. The method is based upon two theoretical premises from Symbolic Interactionism, firstly selves are social and contextual where individuality arises through Whom we interact with, What we do and When and Where these social activities take place. Secondly values or capacities are socially learned in interaction, a constant process whereby the self at any time point is a reflection of its accumulated experiences and future aspirations.

The data generation design draws upon writings on cosmopolitanism and contemporary research on friendship. The Stoic philosophers suggested we think of our selves surrounded by a series of concentric circles; with the first representing close family out to fellow countrymen and beyond, ultimately to humanity as a whole. The cosmopolitan objective is to draw the outer circle towards the centre (Nussbaum 1994). Spencer & Pahl (2006) applied a similar visualisation on researching personal communities, with the circles representing diminishing relational closeness. Instead using self-ascribed "critical moments" or turning points in young Europeans transitional biographies to construct personal communities (Henderson et al. 2007), a methodological discussion with particular focus upon the researcher's own background in the data generation process is exemplified from interviews carried out with young British and Spanish adults residing in Madrid and Manchester.

The paper argues that any investigation into the embodiment of cosmopolitanism, its biographical becoming needs to generate data upon the Whom, What, When and Where of individuals social interactions, experiences and aspirations. And that the Symbolic Interactionist perspective is well placed to contribute, methodologically and theoretically to examine becoming cosmopolitanisms in Europe.

Biographical Processes and Supranational Identity Formation in a European Context

Miller, Robert

School of Sociology, Social Policy, and Social Work, Queen's University Belfast Belfast, United Kingdom

Schütze, Fritz

Institute of Sociology, ISOZ, Otto-Von-Guericke University Magdeburg Magdeburg, Germany

Domecka, Markieta

School of Sociology, Social Policy, and Social Work, Queen's University Belfast Belfast, United Kingdom

Schröder, Anja

Institute of Sociology, Otto-von-Guericke University Magdeburg Magdeburg, Germany

Keywords

europe, biography, identity

The current state-of-the-art research into European identity has been driven mainly by a 'top down' elitist perspective that focuses upon the development of an identification with 'Europe' through centrally-driven policies originating from within the European Commission. Biographical research can provide wider insights into the evolution and meanings of European identities from the 'bottom up' perspective of the individual.

The first decade of the twenty-first century may be seen as a crucial point for the European continent. On the one hand, the demise of the division between 'capitalist' western and 'socialist' eastern Europe, the continued expansion of the EU coupled with the need for the European states to act together in a globalized world as a single economic and political entity can be seen as powerful centripetal forces in which the ideals of the Enlightenment and a common European culture have a revived relevance. On the other hand, developments such as the collision between an expansionist NATO and a resurgent Russia, the violent resurgence of ethnic and nationalist passions transcending the nation-states borders and the revival of religious fundamentalism are powerful centrifugal forces that could fragment the continent. Whether real or 'imagined', contrasts between communities of identity 'local, regional, national, ethnic, linguistic, religious' can be either a source of reaffirmation in which the shared 'otherness' of the 'stranger' provides a positive counterpart to one's own standpoint or a source of xenophobic reaction to the 'incomprehensible alien'.

We focus on biographical identity, which is neither solely solid and fixed nor completely fluid and contingent but rather a combination of both. Identity functions as an internalized cognitive schema or habitus of stored meanings and modes of reacting to the world that enables one to maintain continuity and remain 'the same' over time. At the same time, identity is a process in which one's self-conception is transformed over time during the course of life experiences that take place within a changing grid of multiple groups, interests, loyalties and responsibilities. The retention of balance between these two 'continuity and change' can be seen as an ongoing biographical process of identity work.

Cross-cultural experiences and exchanges: capacities and identifications

Paadam, Katrin

School of Economics and Business Administration, Tallinn University of Technology Tallinn, Estonia

Ojamäe, Liis

*School of Economic and Business Administration, Tallinn University of Technology
Tallinn, Estonia*

Siilak, Kristel

School of Economic and Business Administration, Tallinn University of Technology Tallinn, Estonia

Oper, Jaanika

School of Economics and Business Administration, Tallinn University of Technology Tallinn, Estonia

Keywords

cross-cultural exchange of capacities, inter-field experiences, identity building

Europe has become a widely open cultural space for various exchanges in multiple fields of everyday human conduct. Thus understanding of the ways these cross-cultural exchanges which occur within the context of various activities relate with or affect individual identity building as well as identifications on a broader scale of Europe, is assumed to gain increasing theoretical as well as practical significance. More specifically, the paper discusses adult individuals' immediate personal experiences in another country they have moved to for different reasons and under various circumstances of their lives; be it a carefully designed individual strategy or an adventurous move. The paper therefore observes, in particular, how people perceive such culturally heavily loaded time-space transformations linking their entire life experiences in actual physical as well as in symbolic terms. It is argued that regardless of an initial motivation for moving individuals tend to get involved in an enlarged circle of activities beyond field boundaries - an inevitable effect of relatedness between fields of human conduct (a parallel to career studies) as well as of inter-field convertibility of individual capacities. The originally Bourdieusian convertibility thesis suggests an attempt to build the analysis of European identities on the study of capacities gained in the experience of cross-cultural exchanges.

The paper draws on the preliminary analysis of the data collected in Estonia within the framework of EU FP7 'Euroidentities'. The selected biographies, avoiding stereotypical approaches, represent individuals having moved to Estonia since after the last profound political change in the nineties.

Cross-generational helping patterns

Hämäläinen, Hans-Mikael

*Department of Social Policy, University of Helsinki
Helsinki, Finland*

Roos, J P

*Department of Social Policy, University of Helsinki
Helsinki, Finland*

Keywords

Generations, family cluster, extended family, nuclear family, helping patterns

We are interested in what kind of helping patterns and kin solidarity between generations can be found in contemporary Finland. According to the interview material, there can be found several different types of helping patterns in contemporary Finnish society. In the analysis these has been condensed into three types of helping patterns, which are here called nuclear family, extended family, and family cluster model.

In the nuclear (with very few family members) family type assisting is quite limited. Help is mainly exchanged between the closest relatives, which here refer to parents and children. Helping situations are random and support is usually given in the case of acute need. Due to the irregularity of helping situations, the forms of assistance are restricted in a few types of help. In this model help is mainly given in one direction; from baby boomers to their parents and (grand)children.

In the extended family type help occurs on a broader scale. Help is exchanged between parent and their (grand)children as well as between siblings and in some extent between some others close relatives. In this model assistance is need-based but it is given regularly in many kinds of situations. The forms of help are quite diverse, including several types of practical help and financial aid. Help also goes more ? than in the previous type ? in both ways between relatives.

In the family cluster type help takes place on very wide scale of situations and it?s given on continuously basis. Help is exchanged between parents, children, siblings and other ? close and more distant ? relatives. Due to the diversity of helping situations, the forms of help are also very varied. They include several forms of practical help and financial aid. For this model it?s characteristic that help can also be highly organized between relatives.

What makes this interesting from a biographical perspective is that there are very different biographical patterns underlying all these models. We shall discuss in our paper these different patterns extracted from the in-depth interviews.

Educational and other encounters: narratives of mobility and the biographical significance of international study and training in Europe

Davis, Howard

*School of Social Sciences, Bangor University
Bangor, UK*

Baker, Sally

*School of Social Sciences, Bangor University
Bangor, UK*

Day, Graham

*School of Social Sciences, Bangor University
Bangor, UK*

Kowalska, Marta

*School of Social Sciences, Bangor University
Bangor, UK*

Keywords

europe, biography, Higher Education, identity, Erasmus

The European dimensions of higher education have developed through an ever-expanding set of research, teaching and infrastructure programmes. The EU Erasmus higher education mobility programme in particular has directly influenced the learning experiences of some 1.9 million students since 1987. Mobility also takes place outside Erasmus, the result of individual initiative rather than institutional schemes. However they occur, individual mobility and career paths merge with wide-ranging European strategies for economic competitiveness, innovation, modernization and cultural cooperation. Previous studies suggest that a period spent abroad not only adds new dimensions to academic learning but is likely to contribute to the acquisition of language and intercultural skills, and self-reliance. Internationally mobile students are more likely to have international careers, a cosmopolitan outlook and more developed awareness of European citizenship. The paper reports on analysis of data from biographical narrative interviews conducted by the seven research partners in the Euroidentities project. The selected interviewees were expected to be 'sensitized' to European identity issues by their educational experience in another country. The data is examined for evidence of biographical work continuing some time after the experience of educational mobility. Methods of autobiographical narrative interviewing and analysis allow an assessment of the degree to which educational mobility is integral to the telling of individual life stories and the ways in which individual trajectories are linked to the opportunities and constraints of collective life in the complex spaces of interaction between European societies and cultures. The analysis provides a way to understand these processes from the perspective of the individual. It demonstrates that identification with the 'European project' is not a foregone conclusion of educational mobility. Identity formation is more likely to be expressed through biographical work on topics including language, travel, career, cultural difference, and of course personal relationships. Understood in this way, European identity is not necessarily articulated as attachment to the institutions, civic life or symbols of the EU. It suggests that caution needs to be applied to aggregate-level data and generalized concepts of Europeanness.

Euroidentities: Transnational Workers in the European Union

Andrzej, Piotrowski

*European Culture Research, University of Lodz
Lodz, Poland*

Kazmierska, Kaja

*Institut of Sociology, University of Lodz
Lodz, Poland*

Gurdala, Agnieszka

*European Culture Research, University of Lodz
Lodz, Poland*

Waniek, Katarzyna Waniek

*European Culture Research, University of Lodz
Lodz, Poland*

Keywords

biography, collective identity, Migration, europe

Transnational workers in the European Union are those people whose labour market activity has resulted in a significant amount of cross-European experience. This category includes: economic migrants who has spent a significant portion of their life working abroad in another part of Europe, businessmen for whom cross border contacts and markets are essential, or people whose move for work-related reasons has led to making links in the 'host' country beyond those that are solely job-related. The preliminary findings of the research based on the detailed analysis of the autobiographical narrative interviews with transnational workers within the EU indicate that while some have used the structural opportunities of the European market to successfully proceed their professional careers (with higher wages or positions) others have been limited in their attempts to develop and maintain their social capital abroad. The former case concerns people who have moved to another European country with the intention of improving their economical situation or skills in the fields still deviating from European standards in their homelands. There are also people whose great need for adventure fuel their eagerness to travel, learn and discover. For them Europe usually provide an excellent chance for better life This line of biographical development is called a progressive (opening or stretching) biographical profile. The latter case refers to both unskilled and highly-skilled individuals having a strong desire for recognition and prestige (or aspiring for them) who have left their country of origin in order to flee or overcome their personal problems and experienced defeats. Yet settling in another country does not alleviate their predicament, quite the opposite results in loosing their relatively high social standing, shrinking professional opportunities and a consequent accumulation of difficulties and constrains. For them Europe rather block their biographical careers by means of illusory possibilities. Systematic atrophy of interaction networks, social bonds, spiritual sensitiveness as well as a systematic loss of life orientation ? paradoxically accompanied by personal economical success may follow. In order to describe this kind of biographical experience the notion of a regressive (closing or shrinking) biographical profile is applied.

Exploring transformations of worker identities by analysing biographic narratives from industrial worker in Nuremberg (Germany)

Meier, Lars

*Joblessness and Social Inclusion, Institute for Employment Research
Nuremberg, Germany*

Keywords

Biographic narratives, identity, industrial worker, place

Industrial works seems to be an element of former times in West-Europe as it is mostly represented in decline and loss. Images of closing factories and notions on individualisation are going hand in hand in indicating not only various changes in the socio-economic realm but demonstrating a lost of workers identity. With the upcoming of post-structural identity concepts and the shift in identity research on gender, ethnic and race the identity of class fall into oblivion. This applies especially for research and discussions in Germany.

My contribution will take the transformations of workers identities under scrutiny. It will demonstrate that these changes are accompanied by conversions of urban places which are important for everyday life, for feelings of belonging and for the memories of the industrial workers. How these transformations in the socio-economic and in the spatial realm infected workers identities will be discussed. In contrast to other studies the crossover of different identities like class, gender and ethnicity is considered.

This study is based on data gained by empirical research as part of the EU-project SPHERE. Identity formations are analysed by long narrative interviews with former and with current industrial workers in Nuremberg and by observations at urban places with significance for the workers memories. Thus the argument will be underlined by interview material and photographs.

The research is located in Nuremberg (Germany) what has a long history of industrial work. Here industry has lost thousands of jobs while there was a small job growth in the service sector. Today besides of industrial plants and well renovated structures some run-down buildings are present. The area is characterised by an above average unemployment rate which include many former blue collar workers and a high proportion of migrants. These changes are reflected in the workers narratives on the basis of personal experiences and feelings of belonging with reference to the southern quarters of Nuremberg. In their narratives it becomes palpable that worker identities today are different but not irrelevant for everyday life and for senses of belonging.

From biographies to social processes. Longitudinal case study analysis

Pranka, Maruta

*Institute for Philosophy and Sociology, Latvia university
Riga, Latvia*

Keywords

biographies, social processes, case

The paper is based on analysis of the biographical approach possibilities in the research of social processes in case study. Material of a longitudinal study records the life stories and information of personal archives of almost all the inhabitants of a single apartment building (consisting of 20 flats) in Riga. The project is realized by the researchers of National Oral History Project of the Institute of Philosophy and Sociology of Latvia University. The biographies reflect the time period from 1936 to the present, and the resulting life stories reconstruct the inhabitant's lives as they relate to that building and its history. The large amount of information allows examining of different social processes - change of gender roles, problems caused by denationalization process, memories of forced migration etc. are subjects in life stories. Returning home that was lost due to the occupation and subsequent migration processes, is the object and the goal, being reality and symbol of the end of migration. The political and economic changes beginning in 1990 when Latvia regained the Independence brought about new aspects of social processes - changes of residence due to denationalization, as well as repatriation. The political changes in 1990 pushed the breakout of memories of the generation born in 1920-ies and make possible the transmission of memories of a whole generation. The collected life stories reveal memories which were discussed only in a closed private space during the soviet time but became available in social space after regaining of Independence.

A life story is created in the teller's present social environment, but it carries influences and experiences from his/her past relationships. The creditability of life stories in the research of social processes is based and tested on both content and social relationships.

How to present biographies of the Baltic people at the international level

Aareleid-Tart, Aili

Centre for Contemporary Cultural Studies, Tallinn University Tallinn, Estonia

Keywords

Baltic nation, Life stories, problems of editing

1. Bases of this paper consist of my experience to compile and edit a book 'Baltic Biographies at Historical Crossroads' mostly with authors from Lithuania, Latvia, Estonia.

The qualitative research has been done by indigenous Baltic scholars who have exclusively focused on whichever country they are familiar with. But there are definite advantages and drawbacks related to being an integral part of the society you investigate. Namely, there is the danger of turning the interviews into a collaborative interaction aimed at re-constructing a shared history. This effect is less present when the researcher comes from the outside. Our enlistment of Finnish, Swedish, German, and British colleagues should guarantee a broad understanding of the local peculiarities of Baltic life stories.

2. Estonia, Latvia and Lithuania are often lumped together in a much too simplistic manner. Even though their 20th century trajectories share considerable similarities, they carry with them different historical legacies and identities. They also belong to diverse linguistic groups and congregations (Catholic vs. Protestant). Doing biographical interviews researcher must be very careful to follow national specifics of particular respondent.

3. In investigating the Soviet past of Baltic respondents any researcher must have in his/her mind that these people had never been Soviet-inclined and usually played games of ideological hide-and-seek. There developed a peculiar coexistence of 'right' and 'wrong' in individuals, a partnership of diametrically opposite poles where one side praised Soviet mentality while the other simply ignored it. This is very challenging for investigator to open individual plurality of the manifestation of so called 'double mental standards'.

4. Every rapid change in the history of Baltic peoples causes a mushrooming of respective to each epoch vocabulary, which in Lithuanian, Latvian and Estonian taken separately have been unique. Most of respondents have used mother tongue told their stories lived through the first independent (1917-1940), the triple occupational (1940-1944) and the Soviet period (1944-1991). The problem for editor is the comparative work with expressions and words from these told stories, such as similar social realities could manifest in languages of Balts quite differently.

Identity transmission in a migratory setting

Ganga, Deianira

European Researchers in Migration and Ethnic Studies, HERMES Alcamo, Italy

Keywords

intergenerational, Migration, identity, qualitative, Family

Title: Identity transmission in a migratory setting.

Author: Deianira Ganga

Abstract

Intergenerational identity transmission in a migratory setting represents the site of continuous contrasts and negotiations.

This paper is based on a qualitative research analysing the processes of ethnic identity transmission among three-generational families of Italians in Nottingham, UK.

During the fieldwork, respondents of the three generations considered cultural traditions and language use as salient characteristics of their ethnic identity.

However, through the years, cultural phenomena within the community seem to have undergone important transformations. If, through the generations, processes of integration take place and language shift naturally occurs, these do not seem to be directly linked to an identity crisis at either the individual or group level. While the members of the older generation conceive themselves as the guardians of the cultural / ethnic identity of the community, members of the second and third generation seem to demonstrate - on some occasions - allegiance to the country of ancestral origin, the country of residence, and a European supra-national identity, which encompasses the previous ones and reduces the risk of feeling 'torn' between the two.

Life histories and migration trajectories: Brazilian immigration in Portugal. An overview, presentation of data and analysis of flow mobility

Coêlho, Christiane

CIES, ISCTE

Lisboa, Portugal

Keywords

mobility, Brazilian immigration, transnational flows, life histories.

European societies have been characterised by an important presence of transnational migratory flows. The nature of these flows will be analysed starting from the study of Brazilian immigration in Portugal. During the last ten years the presence of Brazilians has increased tenfold in this country. (Malheiros, 2007). Since 2007 Brazilian have become the first foreign community residing in Portugal, in terms of population. We will provide an overview of Brazilian immigration during this period, present some data aiming towards a characterisation of the community and will finish with a detailed analysis of its migratory flows.

Memories Continued and Interrupted: Generations and Social Memory in Latvia

Bela, Baiba

*Institute of Philosophy and Sociology, University of Latvia
Riga, Latvia*

Keywords

biographical perspective, Cohort generation, transmission of memories

Biographical research in Latvia clearly shows the importance and relevance of concept 'cohort generation' (Mannheim 1952, Riley 1988, Miller 2000). Research by National Oral History project shows the place of historical events in individual biographies and in social memory of particular cohort generations in Latvia.

The history of last 100 years in Latvia is marked by several turning points (foundation of independent state, Soviet and Nazi occupations, renewal of independence, joining of NATO and EU). These events opened as well as limited different opportunities of individual life courses, as well as are remembered differently by different cohort generations. Memories of one generation not always is successfully transmitted to and accepted by next generations - life story studies in Latvia shows, that not only Holocaust studies brings questions of transmission of memories to the forefront.

In the paper will be discussed the case of cohort generation, born in 1920s and 1930s in Latvia, who experienced the loss and the renewal of independent Latvia, the 2WW and the split of Latvians in homeland Latvians, living in LSSR, and exiled Latvians, living in the West. We can speak about two different groups with different social memories within one cohort generation. The focus of analysis will be on the transmission of memories by both groups, but differently due to different historical/political contexts. The discussion will be focused on strategies of transmission of memories and difficulties in this process (due to political context as well as due to new generations' fresh contact (Mannheim, 1952) with memory heritage of cohort generation, born in 1920s and 1930s), experienced by both groups of cohort generation before and after 1990s. Minor theme, but important within context of ESA conference issue, is the notion of European identity, developed in memories by both groups of explored cohort generation.

Men in male-dominated manual occupations in Norway: a comparative perspective on work orientations, social mobility and gender relations in two educational cohorts

Vogt, Kristoffer Chelsom

Dep. of Sociology, University of Bergen, Norway Bergen, Norway

Keywords

working class, life course, men, life histories

The data consists of a preliminary survey (N:270, rr:45%) providing an overview of the cohorts' work-life trajectories, and approximately 30 biographical interviews. By March 2009, the survey and 11 interviews have been completed.

First some brief notes on the relevance of the project for the group topic of "Towards Theory of European Society". Norway has one of the strongest welfare states in Europe, and is also one of the most equal countries when it comes to social mobility and opportunity structures. However, perhaps contrary to what one may expect, the gendered division of labour remains rigid, especially in working class occupations, and male dominated manual occupations are often still "passed on" from father to son. Intergenerational social mobility is low at the bottom of the educational hierarchy.

I hope to present some preliminary findings/theories at the ESA conference. I will analyze how questions of social mobility are related to conceptions and practices of gender. I will further outline some traits of the men's subjective opportunity structures and some guiding principles of their work-life trajectories. I aim to show that the men's work orientations (on the micro-level) can be used to analyze some structural traits of the labour market and educational system (on the macro level). I will also present some preliminary theories of how the men's life course patterns are connected to structural economical changes, and how the issues these men face in their everyday life practices can be used to understand wider societal changes. I will try to address specifically the range of the theories developed from the project, e.g. how its findings can be used in develop theories of society in a wider European context.

Returns to Places of Birth as biographical work supported by different family generations

Kazmierska, Kaja

Institute of Sociology, University of Lodz Lodz, Poland

Keywords

memory, Generations, biography

Returns to Places of Birth as biographical work supported by different family generations.

If we are to refer to the history of post-war Poland, massive displacements were experienced by many nations and ethnic groups. Three of them: Poles, Jews and Germans (among many others) seem to be the most spectacular when we consider not only their human and individual but also political, historical, social and cultural meaning. The trauma of relocation, whether by choice or by force, affected many lives. In many cases spatial and temporal distance from homeland has lasted for decades. And it is not until recently that we can observe intensive travelling to birth places. Many of those who have decided to visit their homeland describe this experience as "a return". The idea of visiting homeland is the result of a long process and complicated biographical work undertaken in order to come to terms with one's biography. Biographical work on emotions, memory combines the past and present experiences. These general frames are then shaped by particular and unique individual biographical experiences. At the same time they are also formed by collective identity and memory since a return is a rather "mono-ethnic" experience influenced and strengthened by specific socio- cultural circumstances.

I concentrate on a case of Jewish returns to Poland. By returns I mean visiting place of birth after 40-50 years. This phenomenon refers to those Shoah survivors who left Poland after the war. On the basis of narrative interviews with those who have returned I analyze their biographical, identity and memory work. It is undertaken within the family context. Children and grandchildren give or doesn't give the support of this activity. In my paper I show different kinds of biographical work undertaken by survivors and their families in the process of returning.

Seeing Community in a Multicultural Society: Teaching about Peopling of Global Cities

Krase, Jerome

Sociology, Brooklyn College, City University of New York Brooklyn, New York, United States of America

Keywords

Migration, teaching, Urban, comparative, Visual

The visual methods I use in my teaching enable students to appreciate and understand community in multicultural urban environments. At the City University of New York my classes are offered to a very diverse student body whose own biographies and home neighborhoods are a rich source of knowledge and experience that can be used to enhance learning from other more and less conventional sources. Much of my work is comparative; based on research and lecturing in European, as well as other cities. Here I wish to demonstrate how might the methods I use in New York City be applicable for European venues. I will try to demonstrate how one might integrate high and low-tech visual teaching technologies with more traditional modes of observation and explanation, particularly as I train my students in the "practice of space," or the relations between spatial forms and social practices in terms of how either or both change in response to the constraints of space and place. Attention will specifically directed toward the CUNY Macaulay Honors College Freshman Seminar "The Peopling of New York City" in which I employ a "Visual and Virtual" approach to examine some of the neighborhood communities created and maintained by the various people who have come to NYC over the past four centuries. During the semester the experience of Original, Old, New, and Newest Immigrants are compared at many different levels and in many different formats. One technique is visual ethnographic (still and video camera) field study of vernacular landscapes transformed by new migrants. Another is the creation of illustrated student autobiographies of migration contained in "There to Here" essays. Students also explore migration and diversity as represented in popular visual media in individual and collaborative class projects. An important product of the course is a website or wiki created by the students which includes their own work as well as a visually enhanced class project about the historical and contemporary experience of a particular neighborhood of their choosing. The presentation will feature examples of these activities and student work (with their prior permission).

Spatial Semiotics of Difference in Urban Vernacular Neighborhoods

Krase, Jerome

*Sociology, Brooklyn College, CUNY
Brooklyn NY, USA*

Shortell, Timothy

*Sociology, Brooklyn College, CUNY
Brooklyn NY, USA*

Keywords

Visual, vernacular, Urban, semiotics, methods

As noted by Krase and Hum (2007), visual sociology of changing urban neighborhoods is not merely an aesthetic exercise of matching images to important ideas. Cities on every continent have been deluged by the rapid influx of large numbers of people and products from cultures different from native-born residents. Although diverse people frequently live within the same large-scale political boundaries, the real test of community takes place during the course of everyday life on the streets, in the shops and public spaces of neighborhoods. Because of globalization, increasingly, "cultural strangers" share common environments. For sociologists, the question of how different – possibly even hostile – groups live together in smaller-scale city, town, and urban neighborhood environments becomes more and more important. At present, examination of the visual semiotics of difference is especially important as native European cultures interact with Islamic culture. How does the presence of markers of the being-in-space of recent Muslim inhabitants change the meaning of vernacular neighborhoods? The semiotics of Jakobson can help make sense of the ways in which people incorporate the various meanings of social differences into their own narratives. Visual data on the vernacular landscapes of neighborhoods in the US and Europe will be presented as examples of the different kinds of semiotic markers. These urban spaces are filled with signs of collective identity and, often, group conflict. In the physical environment, architectural details, commercial signs, graffiti, among other things, signify the flows of people and culture. So too do social practices, such as commercial transactions, socializing, and commuting, in the public spaces of urban neighborhoods. Our analysis reveals distinctive visual representations of social interactions marked by religious or cultural differences.

Krase, Jerome and Tarry Hum. 2007. "Ethnic Crossroads: Toward a Theory of Immigrant Global Neighborhoods," Pp. 97-119 in Ethnic Landscapes in an Urban World, edited by Ray Hutchinson and Jerome Krase. Elsevier/JAI Press.

The "War-Generation" in the period of Cold War. Biographical experiences and political action in Eastern and Western Germany after 1945

Schiebel, Martina

*Fachbereich 09 - Cultural Studies, University of Bremen
Bremen, Germany*

Keywords

Generational Unit, Generation, social memory, Cold War, Biographie

This generation, born in Germany between 1920 and 1936, World War II had interrupted their school or (beginning) occupations. The younger socialized in the National Socialist Youth Organizations. After 1945, they could return to civil life and peace. Using empirical findings of my biographical research, I could show, that a more differentiated view on this generation is necessary.

First the paper shows, using the example of a biographical study of East Germany's Workers' and Peasants' Colleges in the 1950th how the reciprocity between biographies and institutional field has a generational forming force. This institution was part of the anti-fascistic frame of mind and therefore at the same time supports a "fascism prophylaxis". In this institutional context a generational unit (Mannheim) arose, linked by both the suffering from common life historic experiences (World War II; National Socialism) and also the willing to engage in for a better future in GDR. This has developed a life-long generational sense of belonging with the institution and GDR. After German unification, they felt discredited.

Secondly the paper will focus on a comparable generational unit in Western Germany, we found in my current research about political action and political biographies between 1945 and 1968 in East and West Germany. People belonging to this unit wanted to establish a peaceful and new Germany after 1945. They acted in the context of West German Communist Party. Soon different concepts of the enemies were established in the political culture in East and West during the time of Cold War. People arrested in the 1950th in West Germany because of anticommunist tendencies. This three aspects, first their war experiences, secondly the experiences of arrest in the 1950th and last but not least the fact, that they are still suffering until today, had formed their self-definition: They see themselves as the forgotten victims of the Cold War.

In both cases described above, these processes are constitutive for biographical constructions, and intergenerational interactions, two. The main question of the talk would be the connection of biographical experiences, the origin of generational units, special forms of self-presentation with changing political frames and social memories.

The Challenge of Translation and Analysis in Biographical Research

Pilch Ortega, Angela

Department of Educational Science, University of Graz (KFU Graz) Austria, Graz

Keywords

method, Biographical Research, translation

The 9 th ESA Conference in Lisbon

September 2 nd ? 5 th 2009

European Society or European Societies

Research Network 3: Biographical Perspectives on European Societies

Abstract for Session 4: The Language(s) of Europe: Issues of Meaning and Translation in European Biographical Research.

The Challenge of Translation and Analysis in Biographical Research

(from Angela Pilch Ortega)

Based on the experience of different kind of empirical studies (in Austria as well as outside from Europe) the paper will focus on the challenge and problematic of translation of narrative material in biographical research.

There are two challenging aspects of translation of biographical data which I would like to discuss:

The first methodological aspect will focus on the question how narrative life stories can be translated and which kind of criteria should be considered. The process of translation can be identified as a first step of interpretation and is connected with the transaction of acquirement oscillating between formal criteria of language (grammar) and the hermeneutic knowledge of the interviewee (meaning her/his personal capability, styles of speech and the collective schemes of interpretation).

The second aspect I find challenging and enriching is that some of my interviewees have narrated their life stories in a second language. How can researchers handle narrative material, which is not given in the mother tongue? Arising from the methodological implication above my theses to bring forward to discussion is that it is vital to consider for analysis that the mother tongue structure will influence the second language narrative strongly. That means the research will have to deal with the interviewee?s mother tongue as well.

In my paper presentation I would like to show examples of narrative interview data referring exactly these aspects.

The Here and There of Things. S(h)ifting Fragments of a Narrative Identity

Given, John

Health Community and Education Studies, Northumbria University Newcastle upon Tyne, UK

Keywords

identity, Narrative, multimedia, autobiography.

The Here and There of Things. S(h)ifting Fragments of a Narrative Identity.

? I have such admiration for people who can recount their lives in autobiography, because the connections are so complicated. I would never be able to straighten it out.?

John Cassavetes.

This presentation will explore the fragmented and performative qualities of memory and identity. Adopting a semi auto/biographical perspective and using multi media materials the presentation will invite the viewer to sift through and ?create ? their own interpretation of these autobiographical fragments

By creating a series of discrete but related ?thumbnails? each with its own storied ?hinterland the presentation attempts to draw the viewer into a series of speculations about the relationship of these narrative fragments to the various lives that left these traces.

Based on a series of family photographs together with audio and video recordings the material is digitally manipulated and interpreted through the use of poetry together with musical elements derived from voice and speech fragments.

John Given March 2009

Through farmers' biographical narratives: towards diversity in the European identities

Draganova, Mariana

Communities and Identities, Institute of Sociology Sofia, Bulgaria

Jeleva, Rumiana

*Sociology of Science, Institute of Sociology
Sofia, Bulgaria*

Keywords

identity, collective European identity, farmers' identity, biography construction, collective actions

The paper is based on the research work in the frame of the Euroidentities Project that studies the evolution of the European identity using the biographical 'bottom-up' processes of identity construction in the everyday life of the European 'ordinary' citizens. The paper will focus on the 'Farmers' - one of the five 'sensitized groups' that are studied.

Farmers have a long tradition of dealing with European legislation, with the economic movements of the European agrarian market and with lobbying for their interests through their associations and political parties.

The farmers' group is heterogeneous in terms of social structure, values and identities. The construction of biographies of farmers from the 'old' and the 'new' Member states has different grounds and diverse development modes. In contrast to other 'sensitized groups' who may be more mobile to incorporate European identities, farmers could be defined as a more static group who are strongly affiliated with the national due to their bonds to a certain territory and land. This applies especially to farmers from the new Member states (NMS) whose resident-identities are still stronger compared to the collective European identity. 'Self' and local-bonded identities and individual prosperity still dominate over other collective civil and moral values. Hence, the 'identity work' of farmers from the NMS towards the construction of new interconnections is important for present and future EU integration.

In contrast, the farmers in the 'old' EU states have internalized the European norms and values. Their biographies have emerged and developed in other political, economic and value systems, that are historically linked to the European. Generally, West-European farmers have more 'associative habits', they tend to be more socially included, and they are organized in associations that express their concerns and demands to the EU CAP. These identities have evolved for years through their individual biographical experiences, and in an interactive process within the common EU market and environment.

Researching the diversity in the biographical narratives of the farmers on national level, as well as in a cross-national aspect, is expected to produce effective comparative analysis of the European identity construction.

Time as a dimension for understanding European diversity

Araújo, Emília

*Sociology, University of Minho
Braga, Portugal*

Keywords

time, Narrative, memory

Starting from the idea that time dimension is absolutely important to further understand european dynamics, diversity politics nowadays, this paper intends to discuss the theoretic links between time and identity underlining how can social sciences approach present day social reality through the perspective of time. The paper uses information provided from several documental sources which address the main social queries of present day societies as well as future ones and assumes the need to include in social research the dimension of time, duration and temporality. The paper also envisages to present a coherent view on studies of time underlining the possibilities of treating it as an independent subject of study by which social experience of the world is hermeneutically understood.

Towards Social Theory based on Biographical Research

Boldt, Thea

Faculty of Social Sciences, University of Goettingen Goettingen, Germany

Fischer, Wolfram

Sozialwesen, University of Kassel Kassel, Germany

Keywords

social theory, Biographical Research, plenary discussion

The subject of this plenary discussion with Wolfram Fischer is based on the question whether biographical research is capable of creating social theories.

The underlying thesis is that discourses on European societies which has a power to influence a broad discussion about social problems are not based on singular case studies but on research results, which can be generalized in form of social theories. Therefore biographical research that aims to have an impact on broader discussion about European societies shall not ignore the fact, that its research results without being skillfully generalized might not be considered as representative for understanding wide range of social problems and therefore won't influence social policies responding to these problems.

The session aims to give an overview of relation between biographical research and social theory.

The main goals are:

- 1.to clarify the role of biographical structuring processes for development of social structures
- 2.to examine biographical descriptions and self-descriptions as a modern times cultural practice to produce meaning or make sense of social reality by expanding restless self-references
- 3.to exemplify systematic ways of theoretical generalization based on qualitative and biographical research results in particular

Translation and the exegesis of terms in transcultural biographical research

Overland, Gwynyth

Institute for Religion, Philosophy and Society, Southern Norway Hospital Trust / University of Agder Kristiansand, Norway

Keywords

Research Methodology, refugees, translation

The paper addresses issues of meaning and translation that have arisen in an on-going PhD project, Trauma and Resilience - a Refugee Perspective. The project directs the salutogenetic question - not, why are these people sick, but why are they healthy? - to three samples of survivors of the Khmer rouge period who seem to be doing "remarkably well" (Antonovsky, 1987:64).

The fact that the interview data came into being as Khmer text brought up the need for a special form of analysis. The biographical accounts of the research participants are recorded in Khmer, together with translations to either Norwegian or English. The translation process raised the issue of the exact meaning of words even more pressingly than usual. The answer to the dilemma was an exegetical analysis of the words: during a back-translation session an interpreter, in double-checking the work of another interpreter, revealed the layer-upon-layer meanings of seemingly simple Khmer concepts. This was a revelation. Later I found the process described as exegesis in the work of Richard Mollica (theologian and psychiatrist) as satisfying the need to make as explicit as possible the precise meaning of a passage. "This uncovering process and seeking of the historical origins and meanings of words and phrases that can bring [us] closer to the world of the actual storyteller" (Mollica, 2006). In Mollica, the focus is on words used to describe traumatic events; here it is on words used to describe events and values - not only in traumatic situations, but also in everyday life - which are analysed to yield up their multiple levels of cultural meaning.

In this process of multiple back-translation it has become clear, not only that a number of central terms have layer upon layer of meanings, but also that these terms are in some way bearers of answers to the salutogenic question. The paper will give empirical examples and trace the argumentation leading to this conclusion.

Visual studies of social problems: teaching and research

Romanov, Pavel

Center for Social Policy and Gender Studies, Center for Social Policy and Gender Studies Saratov, Russia

Iarskaia-Smirnova, Elena

Social Anthropology and Social Work, Saratov State Technical University Saratov, Russia

Keywords

biography, teaching, Visual, social problems

Visual sources play a growing role in social research and in teaching as they offer new routes to understanding the past and the present. The ways to construct and define social problems as well as approaches to solving them varied in different periods of history. To do so, it is important to challenge an ideological base of such concepts that often are taken-for-granted, to learn how to consider images as a means to conceive the world, as an important form of social knowledge. What are the differences on men's and women's labor? How these distinctions were represented in certain sources and for which purposes? What is the mainstream image of disability in different periods and how it can be challenged? Photographs and episodes from the films, posters and cartoons depicting various images of people in the roles of parents and workers, carers and patients, can be used not just as illustrations or representations but also as an important element of a studied context ? as important as official documents or personal narratives. Engaging students and people representing silent groups into the visual production and analysis has an empowering effect not only because of channeling the trauma and suffering through creative practices but also because private experience becomes narrated and politically meaningful. The aim of this paper is to contribute to the discussion on public sociology training by providing an overview of experiences, theories and methodologies on the visual, by collecting and building knowledge based on visual material and demonstrating in particular its relevance to the study of human behavior, social networks and welfare policies.

Which language should I use when writing on my research?

Roos, J.P.

*Department of Social Policy, University of Helsinki
Helsinki, Finland*

Keywords

language, local, lifestories

Language change is easy. Whole peoples are known to have changed their language in a few generations. We are now in the process when the scientific community is changing its language into English. This is, however, highly regrettable. For several reasons: in social sciences and especially when doing life stories, the original texts are in the local languages. They are often also only interesting for the locals. This is due to certain intrinsic qualities of the life stories, which are both universal and timeless AND very local and contextual. The universal and timeless part is usually stuff which requires special qualities to be interesting. Another problem is the translation of the original texts to English. It has long been my dream to create a site for European (later worldwide) lifestories. This would however require lots of resources.

Another problem is reporting. Why should I try to write to other than my own Finnish audiences about problems that interest mainly these Finnish audiences? In a worst-case scenario I am writing my text in English, which nobody will read, only to get a university job in Finland.

This is absurd. In my presentation, I'll try to resolve this problem...

Working with bilingual community researchers: issues from a research project

Temple, Bogusia

School of Social Work, University of Central Lancashire Preston, England

Keywords

biography, translation, community researchers, bilingual, language

In this paper I discuss some methodological issues in working with a Polish "community researcher" in an ESRC funded project on language and identity. I argue that researchers need to consider more than issues of technical language proficiency when selecting bilingual researchers.

Research across a diverse range of communities has established that divisions within communities influence who community researchers are able to interview and how the interviews are carried out. When more than one language is involved many researchers across a range of disciplines have shown that language is used to represent and to construct identities. Different languages may have different connotations, for example, in relation to the use of emotion. Translations need to be the subject of scrutiny in research and these issues have been discussed within narrative and biographical research by Temple, Riessman, Blommaert, and others. However, when analysing the effects of writing about research participants in a language they did not use, researchers also need to take on board research which suggests that changing language may involve a change in how people perceive themselves and are perceived by others. Changing the language used to represent people therefore has epistemological and methodological considerations around representing others. The research discussed here suggests that participants recognised the importance of language for helping to shape who they were. They also used spoken language to recognise divisions within and between communities by analysing the ways in which people used language, including for example, accent, lexicon and the use of diminutives in speech. The importance of language for self and other identification suggests that the selection of bilingual community researchers who are at the heart of this process needs to focus on more than "proficiency" as narrowly defined grammatically "correct" language to include sensitive issues around language use and proficiency in identifying and addressing language differences and their consequences for research.

I discuss one approach used in the research to show how the research team began to address issues of representation to illustrate my points.

RN04

Sociology of Children and Childhood

"Born with skis on your feet" - or becoming Norwegian?

Nilsen, Randi Dyblie

Norwegian Centre for Child Research, Norwegian University of Science and Technology (NTNU) Trondheim, Norway

Keywords

children, inter-generational relations, Multiethnic day-care centre, skiing and out-door life

In Norway, (cross-country) skiing is framed by notions that are taken for granted and interwoven with discourses of Nature and out-door life (friluftsliv). "Born with skis on your feet" is an expression that underscores the significance of skiing as a marker of national identity. From about 2-3 years of age many children start to ski both in contexts of family and day-care centres. This paper presents an analysis of data from field-work at a day-care centre in a multiethnic neighbourhood. Both minority & majority relations, intra- and inter-generational relations are focused on. I will explore how diverse subject-positions are created within practices connected to skiing and outings "in Nature". By elaborating on situations in daily life where relations between children and adults intersect with (ethnic) diversity, processes of cultural (re)production will be illuminated. This paper is conceptually grounded in the Sociology of childhood, and further explores the theoretical assumptions of constructing identities and doing ethnicities.

"I am not like rally, really, really disabled". Exploring Identities of Young Disabled People at School

Kelly, Berni

Sociology, Social Policy & Social Work, Queen's University Belfast Belfast, Northern Ireland

MacArthur, Jude

Research, Donald Beasley Institute Dunedin, New Zealand

Gaffney, Michael

Centre for Research on Children and Families, University of Otago Dunedin, New Zealand

Keywords

Identities, Youth, disability

This paper is based on an ethnographic study exploring the identities of nine disabled young people (11-14 years) in schools in New Zealand. The researchers observed these young people at school and conducted semi-structured interviews with the young people, their parents and relevant school staff. The study draws on disability theory, geographies of youth identity and the sociology of childhood to further develop understanding of young disabled people's identities. This paper will present findings on young disabled people's identity experiences at school, including their views on the integration of impairment and disability into their sense of self and how others see them. Social relational aspects of the construction of identities will also be explored, including the impact of complex peer and teacher relationships at school.

Findings reveal that whilst young disabled people prioritise youth identities, their efforts to "fit in" alongside non-disabled peers can be compromised by disabling school cultures and structures that emphasise impairment as a master identity. In addition, youth consumer culture and preoccupation with aesthetic ideals served to ostracise and exclude disabled young people. As a result, young disabled people often experienced non-recognition or mis-recognition in their interaction with peers and adults in their daily school lives. However, young disabled people in this study also demonstrated agency by developing various strategies to challenge oppression and present a counter-narrative to disabling and exclusionary discourses at school. In the context of complex and changing peer and adult relations within school, young disabled people negotiated multiple identities and representations of self depending on learning needs, social contexts and school practices.

It is suggested that peers and adults at school can play a key role in counteracting imposed master identities and challenging disabling discourses that detrimentally impact on self-identity and positive self-esteem. Creating further opportunities for recognition and affirmation at school helps to strengthen this counter-narrative. Such developments within schools will require more active engagement with diversity issues and critical social model thinking, alongside efforts to promote the psycho-emotional wellbeing of all young people at school.

"It didn't always work": children's narratives of employment, unemployment and changing family practices

Ridge, Tess

Department of Social and Policy Sciences, University of Bath Bath, England

Keywords

lone-parent, care, family practices, un/employment, Poverty

For children in the UK who are living in workless, lone-mother families the risk of experiencing poverty is high. The government's strategy to reduce child poverty has relied heavily on welfare-to-work programmes, and increasing compulsion for lone mothers can lead to them entering low-paid employment in unstable labour market conditions. Underpinning this policy objective is a central assumption that employment is the best route out of poverty for children and their families. However, the impact of mother's employment on children's everyday lives, especially in lone mother households is uncertain. To explore these issues this presentation draws on new empirical findings from three waves of a qualitative, longitudinal study of low-income working family life. The study involves interviews with children (and their mothers) which explore the impact of low-income maternal employment on family life and living standards over time. The paper draws on child-centred qualitative interviews to explore the narratives of those children whose mother's entry into the labour market was either unsuccessful or unstable. It examines how children experienced their mother's employment, changing family practices, and the impact of "failed" work transitions on their well-being and their perceptions of the value of work for them and their families.

"There are many worlds in the world": Childhood, Participation and Sociology

Tomás, Catarina

*Education, IESF and University of Minho
Braga, Portugal*

Keywords

children, Childhood, participation, Rights

This paper aims to listen and read, as in interpreting, children's discourses about their rights and representations of themselves, other children, children's rights and the world they live in. The work starts by posing a few questions: how do children see the world they live in? What do they think about the way they act in that same world? What kind of images and concepts do they have about their rights, themselves and others, including other children, in a context and process of cultural and symbolic exchanges? These questions were translated into a sociological research which comprises three main themes: globalization, childhood and children's rights. It is about seeing children as social actors and making them present through their experiences, this way contradicting the current displaced, unfocused and marginalized look over childhood.

The field work with children and their teachers took place in public school in Portugal and Brazil.

'Why do you think nobody wants to play with Emma?': Persona dolls, participatory methods and methodological issues in researching young children's views on exclusion

Konstantoni, Kristina

Education, University of Edinburgh UK,

Keywords

young children, Exclusion, identity, participatory methods, personal dolls

This paper is based on a doctoral, ESRC funded, research project which was interested in listening to young children's views (aged 3-5) regarding their constructions of identity and difference. Emphasis was also given to children's constructions of exclusion. The broader aim of this study was to listen to children's views in order to develop early years practice, particularly in terms of social justice and equity, in ways that would reflect and respect children's lives. During this research, through the use of ethnographic methods, a plethora of rich and in-depth conversations and experiences with children took place. Naturalistic observations, informal conversations and participatory methods, like drawing activities and doll activities, were used in order to capture the complexity of children's identities, views and experiences.

In this presentation I will discuss one of the activities I used with the children, the Persona doll activity and the methodological challenges that I faced. For this activity, six personas were created, three girls and three boys, all with different characteristics and identities, reflecting in that way the diversity of the children in the nursery. Each doll was given a name, age, country and language. The dolls had stories to tell the children about their lives, one happy and one sad story. Through informal discussions children were invited to express their views about the problems the dolls were facing in their stories. By opening up the discussion to the children, and with reference to their own experience, the children provided a plethora of ideas regarding reasons of exclusion and discrimination that take place at the nursery level. What were the challenges that I faced in terms of using participatory methods though? How can such methods link to children's real lives? What are the advantages and disadvantages of both naturalistic and participatory techniques? Are we minimising adult power through participatory methods? To what an extent is the researcher directing or influencing the scene or children's views? This paper will seek to answer all of the above by reflecting on my personal research experience in early childhood education.

A model to take part The childhood rights. The institution of the civil society at Trento in defense of them *of Sociology and social science, University of Trento

Carvajales Bresque, Huenu Anahi

Trento, Italy*

Keywords

cooperatives, civil organizations in Italy, childhood rights, IP in education, pedagogy.

This article want to explain how social organizations in particular the social cooperatives at Trento (a city of north east of Italy) implement model of social education to take part in the defense of childhood rights.

This paper present at first, how the history of the development of social work at Trento is so significant, in the construction of a web of solidarity that could be able to change the perceptions of scholar institution about problems of unease childhood.

At secondly how a new vision of intervention it could be possible through the application of new models of social intervention, new models that comprise the construction of appropriate individual programs and an application of new theoretical principles of pedagogy, that this organization continue to create doing them work.

Methodological frame include case studies and depth interviews.

A short trajectory of research in strange territories

Madeira, Rosa

Ciências da Educação, Universidade de Aveiro Aveiro, Portugal

Keywords

"infancy", "politics", "globalization"

A short trajectory of research in strange territories

The understanding of issues related to Infancy invoke more and more the impact of economic social and cultural globalization on the Children's Life. However, this reference is not always accompanied by clarification about how we think the relations between these two universes of concern and social knowledgement. We will reflect about that relation, considering the results and difficulties that we found in our research practice as one team of this project about social-symbolic production of the infancy [1]. The process of generation of data about how the Children has being constructed as object and /or as subject, in the international, european and national political documents in this permitted us to observe this relationship. In this communication we will intend to share some results and issues that emerged in the our first analys of the national documents. We also bring to the discussion about decisions with which we overcome obstacles due to the multiplicity of sources and to the diversity of functions and languages constituent of this material. We hope that the mention and discussion about this obstacles that, at the first moment, discouraged us in the exploration of this area, may raise the interest for this macro social relations, that we found as the place where it is necessary to claim that the increase of children?s visibility, corresponds to the improvement of their living conditions and participation as citizens.

[1] The referred data are related with the area of politics of the ongoing research project, called ?A Infância e a sua educação nas políticas internacionais, europeias e nacionais, nas produções académicas e nos currículos de formação inicial de educadoras de infância e professores do 1º ciclo do ensino básico (1995-2005)?, supported by FCT (POCTI/CED/61355/2004), members of research team from Faculdade de Psicologia e Ciências da Educação of Oporto University, Education departments of the Universities of Aveiro and Minho.

Above else do not snitch

Andersson, Kjerstin

Department of Child Studies, Linköping university Linköping, Sweden

Keywords

Aggression Replacement Training, Peer intervention programme, Masculinity, moral reasoning

This paper investigates how 'snitching', or reporting someone to the police, is discussed by young men at a Swedish youth detention home who are taking part in Aggression Replacement Training (ART). ART is a peer intervention programme directed at violent and anti-social youth, originating in USA it has become increasingly popular in Sweden. Previous research has argued that some intervention methods are more effective than others in decreasing youth recidivism and identified 'what works' in intervention programmes. Recidivism is argued to be conditioned by pro-criminal attitudes and weak problem-solving, etc. Therefore, it is considered important to work with reducing anti-social attitudes and replacing criminal behaviour with more pro-social alternatives. The ART programme aims to give 'anti-social youth' the chance to enhance their skills and is in that sense a programme that 'works'.

This paper analyses two ART exercises and ensuing discussions on whether it is right to tell on someone. In 1975, Wieder identified the 'Convict code', stipulating: 'Above all else, do not snitch'. 'Code' should here be understood as a secret understanding stressing solidarity between inmates. Some thirty years after Wieder's study, snitching is still relevant in young men's lives in a comparable institutional context in Sweden. The paper investigates how the programme is intended to invoke change in aggressive youth by training them in moral reasoning by discussing moral dilemmas closely related to the youths' own experiences. The article analyses how alliances are created between the young men, and how the discursive context positions both the young men and the trainers. It is argued that both the pupils and the trainers draw on discourses of masculinity. The paper shows how the intent of the ART exercise to alter 'anti-social youth's' criminal discourse may cement already fixed perceptions and establish alliances between young men. The analyses show how gendered notions of victims and offenders are affirmed. The paper shows how sticking to the convict code facilitates positioning oneself as knowledgeable within the field of criminality. Moreover, how drawing on the code regulates the relationship to other men and how it polices one's own behaviour, as well as that of others.

Ambiguities in children's citizenship: a dialogue between theory and children's voices

Fernandes, Natalia

*Instituto de Estudos da Criança, Universidade do Minho
Braga, Portugal*

Keywords

participation, citizenship, children

The debate about children's participation as well as their citizenship have been rhetorically invoked in recent times, wasting itself in prescriptive legal pronouncements of an adult oriented education for citizenship, or in social practices oriented in function of adult interests, where children have no place.

The demands for the construction of a distinct reality where children can be understood as a citizens of rights, with agency over their daily life, requires a reflexive attitude and an openness to change the socializing contexts of children, or in other words, a redefinition of what Flekkoy (1997: 109), calls democracy workshops. Traditional perspectives regarding parentality and the models influencing the professional practices as children remain to a large extent depending on the perspectives that see children as essentially incompetent, subjected to social regulating norms administrated exclusively by adults, even when they act in the child's best interest.

There is a clear need to reflect critically about the social norms and the prevailing assumptions about who the child is, about the paradoxes, dilemmas and implicit contradictions in the policies and practices of children's participation, so that it can be possible to overcome situations that involve children engaging with social norms that perpetuate deeply unequal social relations between adults and children.

Considering these assumptions, we tried to understand with children the meaning that this (non) image of citizen assumes for them, mainly from their self representations as subjects of rights and participation, as well as the legitimacy and visibility that they assume in their daily life.

Assessing European Childhood from Multiple Perspectives

Bühler-Niederberger, Doris

*Sociology, University of Wuppertal
Wuppertal, Germany*

König, Alexandra

*Sociology, University of Wuppertal
Wuppertal, Germany*

Keywords

Sociology of childhood, social construction of childhood, methodology

No other book was more stimulating for a sociological view on childhood than Philippe Ariès' Centuries of Childhood. By demonstrating the historical variance it deconstructed the naturalness and obviousness which was claimed for the normative pattern of childhood before. But, the view remained eurocentric. In our project Growing up in Kyrgyzstan and Germany patterns and conditions of childhoods we attempt to gain insights into characteristics of European childhoods which (while still being a matter of course) might have remained hidden also for today childhood sociologists.

The project incents and assembles research done by Kyrgyz and German young scientists doing research either in their own or the other country but always in the intensive exchange of tandem partnerships. The aim is twofold: In a theoretical interest we are looking for a more thoroughly analysis of childhoods between global influences and locals adaptations, between universal knowledge production and local everyday life exigencies. In a methodological interest we aim at insights into the influence of researchers' point of view on research results, and consequently attempt to use 'the other' and the others to sharpen the view on 'the own' and to overcome blind spots

Asylum-seeking Children's experiences of their social networks

Lähteenmäki, Minna

Department of Education, University of Helsinki Mertie, Finland

Keywords

Asylum-Seeking, Social Networks, children

Asylum-seeking Children's experiences of their social networks

My doctoral thesis will propose to address the day-to-day life of children who seek asylum in Finland together with their families in the context of Finnish refugee reception centres and schools. I shall consider the significance of family, the reception centre and preparatory education in a situation where the asylum-seeking child is trying to cope with her or his difficult condition. Another strain of the study will concentrate on the support provided by networks and the children's own experience of their lives in the midst of their asylum-seeking process - on how they reflect their present life on their past and future.

My presentation will discuss asylum-seeking children's experiences and thoughts of their social networks and relationships. I consider children's backgrounds and their experiences how the isolation of the centres and the prejudices of other people influence in the everyday life of children. I will also discuss what their own family, relatives and the ethnic group means to the children during their asylum-seeking process and what kind of support can a refugee centre, a school, an afternoon group and friends give to the children. As a material I will use twelve ethnographic interview and field notes which are produced in one Finnish reception centre, in two preparatory school groups and in an after-school group in 2005-2006.

Between distinction and inalterability: (RE)thinking Child Research Methodologies

Fernandes, Natália

*Instituto de Estudos da Criança, Universidade do Minho
Braga, Portugal*

Tomás, Catarina

*ESEF e LIBEC, IESF e Universidade do Minho
Braga, Portugal*

Keywords

children, Research Methodologies, Participatory Methodologies

Debates on methodological possibilities of developing research with children have been demanding, in recent times, a rethinking of epistemological and methodological dynamics and postures. Some of those questions consider it from differentiated positions. Some defend the necessity to develop methodological perspective different for the analysis from children's social and cultural worlds; other defend that the investigation of these worlds does not imply different attitudes from those adopted for the analysis of adults social and cultural worlds. This communication, locating itself in the first approach, intends to discuss the methodological reinvention in childhood research, carry out by the Sociology of the Childhood. It defends that it is not sufficient to consider children as research subjects, being fundamental to consider them as participants of the research process, in spite of all the ambivalences, obstacles and critics that can be appointed. It defends, also, that children's specificities also demand different research methodologies.

Beyond cultural relativism in the sociology of childhood: the human rights approach

Alanen, Leena

*Department of Educational Sciences, University of Jyväskylä
Jyväskylä, Finland*

Keywords

human rights, relativism, Childhood

The growth of sociological interest in children and childhood has coincided broadly with the development of the modern children's rights movement, suggesting that they probably share some common social breeding ground. Curiously however, apart from some observations that there seem to be parallels in their notions (e.g. the emphasis given to children's agency in the sociology of childhood and to children's right to participation in the children's rights discourse) not much dialogue has taken place between the two discourses.

The emergent field of the sociology of human rights provides a promising platform for engaging in such a dialogue. This paper explores how discussions in the sociology of human rights might contribute to the conceptual development of the sociology of childhood.

One key problem in conceptualizing children's rights lies in the multiple definitions of childhood and the (cultural) relativism that versions of socio-cultural constructionism (prevalent in the sociological discussion of childhood) unavoidably bring to sociological understandings of childhood. The paper discusses some of the developments in the sociology of human rights that provide resources for overcoming the relativism that is troubling in theoretically advancing the sociology of childhood.

Categorization and classification of children: the orphan

Turmel, André

Sociology, Laval University Québec, Canada

Keywords

categorization, classification, orphan

The research question at stake relates largely to the institutional categorization and classification of orphan children: do we learn something specific when we look closely at the moving and muting category of orphan over a historical period of time. If so, what? In this communication, I shall examine, firstly, the issues relating to categorization and classification of neglected children, by focusing on orphans, as the epitomized form of uncared for children. Secondly, I shall investigate the characteristics of the children - their family's condition and their social environment network - assigned to a Canadian Industrial School in Québec city headed by a religious order between 1870 and 1950. Thirdly, some sociological perspectives underpinning child negligence will be examined and problematized; in XIX and XX c. classificatory mania, one can observe a painstaking form of monitoring these children by classifying them into categories as a first stage of their care. This incursion into the historical sociology of child carelessness will provide adequate a basis to put the actual debate relating, for instance, to Aids orphans in its socio-historical perspective.

Child labour in the Italian press: an analysis

Quartiani, Diana

*Social and Political Studies, Università degli Studi di Milano
Milan, Italy*

Keywords

public opinion, discourses, child labour

Child labour is a topic highly relevant and ethically ambivalent because of the debate on the conditions of contemporary childhood and on the economic inequalities in a globalising world.

The power to giving names to things makes it possible to build a framework in which these names are meaningful.

This means that giving name to child labour can be considered as an action giving form to an object that takes different figure, depending of the statements that describe him, it shall appoint and identify.

How the issue of child labour in the Italian public opinion is defined.

The analysis of the Italian daily press, particularly the most widespread, allows to define the prevailing views and the main manner of framing the issue.

Then the main frames were highlighted that make up the discursive space within which every argument must be placed, in order its likelihood is accepted.

On the one hand a main frame is found, in which child labour is seen as a problem, against which is necessary to fight, and on the other hand, a parallel tendency to hiding the individuality of the children who works.

Child Poverty and Conditional Cash Transfers in Turkey

Gürses, Didem

Humanities and Social Sciences, Yildiz Technical University Istanbul, Turkey

Keywords

Turkey, Child poverty, Conditional Cash Transfers

Turkey has been experiencing a radical transformation during the last three decades. The neo-liberal policies implemented during the 1980s, the impacts of the financial crises and the process of globalisation have caused new forms of social stratification, new types of employment and cultural dynamics to emerge. As a result of these developments the incidence of poverty has increased and children being the most vulnerable group in the society have been deeply affected. In Turkey, 28 per cent of children or about 5.6 million children face poverty. This paper firstly aims to provide a short overview of child poverty in Turkey. The situation of the children will be considered in relation to maternal and child health, education and child labour.

After the 2001 financial crisis, the Government adopted a proactive attitude in the struggle against poverty and Conditional Cash Transfers (CCTs) were adopted. CCTs make payments to households that meet specific conditions or undertake certain actions and aim to break the intergenerational transmission of poverty, through investing in the education and health of children. The second objective of the paper is to review the current state of CCTs in Turkey and evaluate their impacts on child poverty. The study will present a descriptive and analytic overview of the programme; will explain its components and discuss major aspects of its design and implementation. The focus will be on education indicators of the children receiving CCTs and try to find out whether any positive change on enrolment ratios of children, especially the girl children benefiting CCTs, has been realized.

The purpose is to generate an information base for comparative studies on the prospects and potential difficulties of implementing CCTs in country settings similar to Turkey, with special attention to what can be learned from the experiences. In the last section of the paper, challenges faced by the programme will be identified and main findings and policy implications will be discussed.

Child protection system: tensions, biological bias and children's rights

Cruz, Raquel

*Sociology, CIES/ISCTE
Lisboa, Portugal*

Sousa, Isabel

*Sociology, CIES/ISCTE
Lisboa, Portugal*

Torres, Anália

*CIES, ISCTE
Lisboa, Portugal*

Keywords

children's rights, child abuse, Child protection system, child neglect

In this paper we discuss the main findings of an evaluation study about the child protection system in Portugal. The evaluation drawn (2007) included the case study of 26 child protection committees from different regions of Portugal and a systematically approach to all the institutions that locally dealt with those committees - courts, health centres, schools, social security, private solidarity institutions of the social sector. The main goal was to have a vivid picture of how the system really operates: since the moment of the report of the child neglect or abuse until the measures undertaken by the child protection committee's. The study also included the analysis of 260 reported cases, the child protection systems of other countries and a content analysis of child neglect and abuse reported in the media.

Selecting some findings we may say that, firstly, there were several positive improvements, since 2001, and mainly that cases of children at risk are nowadays increasingly reported. But a lot of difficulties persist: prevention measures often fail and there is an obvious lack of quality and quick responses from institutions. Several factors, discussed in the paper, contribute to the fact that adoption is much less used than it could be. Secondly, professionals don't have specific training and deal with great difficulties. The necessity of parents consent in order to act makes intervention in emergency situations difficult and very frequently put children even at greater risk. Thirdly, the model of "community intervention" displays great difficulties in coordinating the intervention of each community agent.

Finally, the global principles of orientation and intervention are differently interpreted and applied. Different conceptions and interpretations about family, the "child best interest" and biological bias often imply collision of rights. Problems like the power of certain institutions over others, or even political parties' influence, affect negatively the work of prevention and child protection.

After the field work developed, and having had a more close perspective about how the system operates, we will discuss sociologically the main findings trying to access if and how children's rights and interests are really protected.

Child-led research on trust in social work Methodological reflections and preliminary findings

Warming, Hanne

*Department of Society and Globalisation, Roskilde University
Roskilde, Denmark*

Keywords

Child-led research, social work, trust, method

This paper reports from an explorative qualitative child-led examination of trust, which constitutes a first phase sub-project of a larger research project about trust in social work with children and youth.

Child-led research draws upon the new sociology of childhood that emphasises that research about children needs to include and give priority to the perspectives and knowledge of the children themselves qua their active participation, ideally in all stages of the research process from formulating research questions, over design, empirical work and analysis to dissemination. The approach is linked to the growing commitment to empower children, as well as to the epistemological insight that children possess a certain kind of knowledge about their own life and perspectives. The child-led research approach draws attention to and aims at working with the power relation existing in participatory research with children. Thus child-led research aims at child initiated and led cooperation between children and researchers rather than just using the children as informants. The paper discusses dilemmas and methodological dilemmas, challenges and potentials of fulfilling these aims.

The larger project, in which the child-led examination of trust is constituted a first phase sub-project, takes its point of departure in previous research findings about children's frustrations arising from distrust in social work. The objective of the first phase sub-project is to provide knowledge about children's perspectives on trust, participation and citizenship: What do the children themselves see as problems, which possibilities, potentials and challenges do they find important, and what kind of research questions does this raise? The purpose is to facilitate children's voice in the discourse about social work, and to let this voice inform and challenge the pre-understanding of the larger project. Based on reflections and experiences from this research, the paper discusses the intentions, dilemmas, potentials and methodological challenges of Child-led research. This includes a review of preliminary findings and a discussion about how these findings can influence further research about trust in social work.

Childhood and Bio-politics: Researching children as "life-forms"

Lee, Nick

education, university of warwick coventry, uk

Keywords

Health, climate change, bio-politics, Childhood

Rose (2006) identifies a traditional social scientific focus on the study of "forms of life" and argues that, in view of key bio-technological developments, attention should now also be given to the social scientific study of "life-forms". This paper will describe this "bio-political" strategy and explore implications for childhood studies.

It is far from obvious that "bio-politics" should interest students of childhood. After all, the founding gesture of many social science research programmes has been the "rescue" of topics from universalising, naturalising accounts. This gesture has been especially strong in childhood studies where the "bio" has so often been viewed as a universalising screen that needs to be removed to gain access to the diversity of childhood "forms of life".

This paper will argue that it now makes sense to view the "bio" itself as a site of diversity and so to develop a critical view of it as a potential site of intervention alongside the familiar range of "social" diversities (gender, class, ethnicity) and susceptibilities (socialisation, peer pressure). Illustrations will be drawn from current UK policy makers' "health behaviour change" agenda, an european debates on climate change and sustainability and bio-technology.

Childhood perspectives of child labour: listening to the voice of children

Darbaz, Bade

*Sociology, University of Essex
Colchester, United Kingdom*

Keywords

children's rights, Childhood, child labour

Childhood perspective of child labour comes from children-centred discourse, which focuses on children's rights and best interests in order to encourage their own initiatives. According to Liebel (2004) the trend in research on children's work has changed from an adult-centred perspective to a more child-centred approach, which means to give importance to what children think or feel about a range of issues that affect their lives. However, a conflict appears out of this argument. How does childhood approach solve the problem of "children should be allowed to work because they want to work"? Would listening their voice always be the right thing to do? Do they want to work because the work is beneficial for them or because they need the money it brings? Is there any adult influence that shapes the demand for work? If children claim that the work is positive for them, how do we exactly know that it is positive? If the work of the child brings long-term health effects, should they still be allowed to work? Thus, giving the core importance to the voice of children and prioritizing it can mean ignoring these types of questions. However, according to ILO, children are still growing and have special characteristics which needs to be taken into account when defining workplace risks to them so, "in the case of child labour, the concept of "work hazard" needs to be child-centred focusing not only on factors of immediate jeopardy, but also those that menace child development over the long term." (Bequele & Myers, 1995: 6) This paper investigates and discusses the conflict appears from prioritizing the voice of children and for and against arguments of childhood perspective of child labour issues.

Childhood, subjectivity and power in science fiction

Pechtelidis, Yannis

Early Childhood Education, University of Thessaly Thessaloniki, Greece

Keywords

power, Childhood, Subjectivity, cyborg

The theme of this essay is the interrelationship between representation, technoscience and childhood explored through the image of the cyborg. In so doing, I analyze Steven Spielberg's famous movie «Artificial Intelligence», where the central hero is a cyborg child. Drawing from Foucault, I apply discourse analysis in order to claim that the boundary figure of the cyborg is important in both childhood studies and cultural studies because it provides new ways of thinking about the relationship between culture and machine, people and machine, etc. Through the image of the cyborg I will point out different aspects in sociology of childhood concerning the relationship between childhood, scientific subjects and the material worlds of artefacts and natural bodies, which have traditionally been cast in the role of passive objects.

This reading of «Artificial Intelligence» raises interesting questions about «childhood»:

Do cyborg images reproduce cultural stereotypes about childhood? Do they reflect dominant beliefs about what a child is and what it is supposed to be? Do cyborg children inhabit conventional children roles (passive, dependent, irrational, immature)? Can the childhood essentialism of fictional cyborgs be transformed into a non-essential image for contemporary children? Is there any way that the cyborg image could be used strategically to intervene in childhood studies?

Cyborg images are already interpretations. My paper is yet another. My interpretation of cyborg images seeks to show how these images claim to render the problematic combination of human and machine unstable, yet in effect fail to do so. My reading shows that the dominant representation of cyborgs reinserts us into dominant ideology by reaffirming western bourgeois stereotypes of childhood, gender, human and machine. The cinematic imaging of cyborg child might suggest new visions of unstable identity, but often does so by upholding childhood stereotypes.

To this end, the challenge is to think about how we can examine identity in such a way that the ongoing process of its construction will empower children's place in our era.

Children and participation: theoretical and methodological perspectives from the Sociology of Childhood

Scalabrin Coutinho, Ângela Maria

*Instituto de Estudos da Criança, Universidade do Minho
Braga, Portugal*

Colonna, Elena

*Instituto de Estudos da Criança, Universidade do Minho
Braga, Portugal*

Agostinho, Kátia Adair

*Instituto de Estudos da Criança, Universidade do Minho
Braga, Portugal*

Keywords

participation, children, Sociology of childhood

This communication, in the field of Childhood Studies, namely in the Sociology of Childhood, considers children as social actors and childhood as historical and cultural construction. Children's participation has been discussed in different disciplinary areas and the debate shows a diversity of perspectives that needs to be explored in order to confront the multiples meanings of the concept. We intend to present three research projects that are being developed in different social contexts: two studies related to children's participation in educational contexts, namely nursery and preschool: one with children between 0 and 3 years old in Portugal and the second involving children between 3 and 6 years old in Brazil and Italy. The third study focuses in children's participation in institutional contexts as primary school and in the family, in the periphery of Maputo. Our purpose is to develop a more deepen comprehension about children's participation, considering the theoretical background and research data from the three research that are being developed.

Children need Brothers and Sisters to Feel Good. Sibship Ensures Enrichment of Relationship

Brock, Inés

Childhood Studies, University of Applied Science Magdeburg-Stendal Germany, <http://www.ines-brock.de>

Keywords

resilience, sibling relationship, social resources, emotional capital, multiple relationship enhancement

The sibling relationship is the most long-lasting kinship relationship and the most intensive experience of closeness and intimacy during childhood. For children growing up in families with siblings this results in manifold bonding and communication experiences, relieving the strain on parents in many respects as well.

In presenting the results of an empirical case-study ? the thesis of the author - the enrichment of relationship will be described. Especially in families with more than one child we can observe that the variety of relationships and the diversity of characters and temperaments can enrich the quality of child-child relations. Growing up with siblings entails many special advantages which I call Multiple Relationship Enhancement. This Enrichment of interpersonal relationships strengthens resilience and emotional capital.

- Siblings orientate themselves on each other in the acquisition of language, role-playing, socialization and imitation learning
- Siblings gain many benefits in the development of empathy, social competence and strategies of conflict resolution
- Sibship ensures co-construction of reality and can merge their resources
- Siblings? coexisting competition intensifies creativity and openness to experience
- Intimacy and love create affective closeness and manifold internal representation of attachment pattern (in addition to parents-child-attachment)
- Children demand for justice in the family, gain frustration tolerance and knowledge of dependencies, show solidarity and behave with respect

All these social phenomena occur in the horizontal level in the subsystem of the siblings within the family. The strengthening of social resources, solidarity and resilience will be explored with the help of emerged categories following the method of Grounded Theory. The paper argues finally that symmetrical reciprocity, dyadic coping, and the capability of loving and ability of affection lead to Multiple Relationship Enhancement which isn't substitutable in any other social context of interaction. Nowhere else the inner bond between children is so strong, in positive as in difficult times.

There is a tremendous lack of sociological research about sibship in childhood. This contribution will help to close this gap - empirically based and theoretically funded.

Children's access to public space in today's London

Briebe, Catalina

*Early Childhood and Primary Education, Faculty of Children and Health, Institute of Education, University of London
London, UK*

Keywords

Public Space, children's rights, London, Children's citizenship

The present study is a small-scale research which focuses on exploring and understanding how children's access to public space in central London is limited. Different studies carried out in Britain and elsewhere in Europe have shown a growing interest in children's general use of space, describing how this is changing (or not) and how the children themselves negotiate their use of it.

In this study the aim is to uncover different forms of limitation of access and/or use of public space children of any age are subjected to, with an emphasis on the processes of segregation of children. This will be tackled from the perspective of parents and of the researcher, ultimately interpreting the results within a citizenship and rights framework.

The research uses a qualitative approach which consists of combining semi-structured interviews with six mothers (and fathers if available) of children aged three to six years old, as well as visual methods to create a photographic report. The study will focus on the borough of Camden and parents are invited to participate on a voluntary basis through a 'snowball effect' after the first interviews are secured. The data will be analysed according to the Grounded Theory in order to create categories of understanding, comparing the information gathered from the interviews and the photographs and integrating them. The research will be carried out during the months between March and July of this year.

Children's epistemological and sociological concepts about books and reading or... how peer groups organize books stacks reveals what goes on in children's minds

Madureira, Cristina

Ciências da Educação, Faculdade de Psicologia e Ciências da Educação da Universidade do Porto Porto, PORTUGAL

Keywords

Ethnography, children, Sociology of childhood, children's books

Children's books categorization by children in peer group is a task that reveals how and what children think about these books. Children's discursive consciousness (Giddens, 1984) is approached by means of understanding the personal experiences they share in peer groups. Physically involved in stacking the books children construe a discourse by interweaving manipulation of artefacts and interaction with peers. Children use texts and images in the books in order both to orient their practice and sustain their discourse. Stacking books in different categories provides an arena of permanent negotiation of intersubjective meanings and demand some clarification of those meanings.

By the end of a two years long ethnography in a kindergarten with ten 4-6 years olds, boys and girls, the researcher talked with the children, sitting on the floor with them surrounded by the classroom children's books. For the first time she asked questions about those artefacts. From the conversations two sorts of children's concepts emerged: epistemological concepts and sociological concepts. Learning versus Listening, Telling versus Reading, and Adults versus Children, Boys versus Girls are some of the children's dichotomies that deserve adult's attention when dealing with children and books.

This strategy of accessing children's discourses about children's books allows the perception of their modes of appropriation, signification and ressignification of children's books as cultural symbolic products made by adults. Together with a participant observation of the peer group this approach anchors children's discourses in their actual daily social practices of children's books use within the context of kindergarten classroom.

Children's Everyday Lives and Food Practices in Residential Care: Juggling Tensions Between "Home", "Institution" and Workplace

Punch, Samantha

*Applied Social Science, University of Stirling
Stirling, Scotland, UK*

McIntosh, Ian

*Applied Social Science, University of Stirling
Stirling, UK*

Emond, Ruth

*Applied Social Science, University of Stirling
Stirling, UK*

Dorrer, Nika

*Applied Social Science, University of Stirling
Stirling, UK*

Keywords

residential care, food practices, children

Perceptions of the "normal" or "average" family home as the social environment for the upbringing of children often inform how residential care staff seek to create a home for children in care. However, conflicting with the ideal of the family home is the regimentation of children's everyday lives through rules and structures which mark the home as an institution. This paper looks at rituals and routines around food in three residential care homes to illustrate how this divide between the family home and the institution is attempted to be bridged. Within residential care, food can be perceived as a key for the creation of a nurturing "family-like" environment but it often also constitutes the site where the institutionalisation of everyday life is most visible and where power asymmetries are played out across and between the generations. Daily interactions around food highlight the difficulties of juggling the tensions of residential care homes being a workplace, an institution and a home for children. The paper draws on ethnographic data collected in three residential care homes for children in three age groups (9-13, 12-16, and 16-18 year olds) in Scotland.

Children's participation in the traps of cultural diversity

Liebel, Manfred

*Institute for Global Education and International Studies, International Academy (INA) at the Free University Berlin
Berlin, Germany*

Saadi, Iven

*Institute for Global Education and International Studies, International Academy (INA) at the Free University Berlin
Berlin, Germany*

Keywords

children's rights, participation, citizenship, cultural diversity

The core "participatory rights" codified in the UNCRC are based on the idea of an individual right to speak and be heard on issues affecting the child. At the same time the child is socially represented as a being separated from the adult world, but in the process of becoming a (complete) adult. The right of the child to speak and be heard is restricted to "matters affecting the child", which in practice regularly precludes the child from political and economic responsibilities.

By contrast, in many ("non-Western") cultures the child is represented as an integral member of the community, maybe with particular characteristics, but not strictly separated from the "adult" members of his or her community. Depending on existing and constructed capabilities (that are not necessarily measured against a chronological age), children are expected to take over specific tasks that are important to the community. These tasks can be of social, economic or political nature, and at the same time rules giving children control over specific goods.

Concerning the children's standing in and the influence on society, we consider whether such patterns regulating the relations of the child and the community can open spaces for children's participation that takes place outside of the narrowed conceptual horizon of a "Western" notion of participation, and children need not wait until they become adults to be considered as responsible and acting members of society. Children's participation here is not understood as a specific type of communication with children that is to be punctually arranged for specific purposes, but as a seminal element of a daily, meaningful and essential agency. Irrespective of how participation is understood, it has to be voluntary and carried by mutual respect to be meaningful.

The paper discusses the concepts and practices of participation in different cultural, economic and political contexts. It asks, on the one hand, if the "participatory rights" codified in the UNCRC can be understood and implemented in an intercultural sense, and, on the other hand, if children's agency in "non Western" cultures can partly be understood as a manifestation of potentially transformative rights claiming by children.

Children's Programming: what children might expect from television

Pereira, Sara

*Communication Sciences Department, University of Minho
Braga, Portugal*

Pinto, Manuel

*Communication Sciences Department, University of Minho
Braga, Portugal*

Keywords

children, quality, citizenship, television, young audiences

This paper aims to present the main results of a research project carried out at the Communication and Society Research Centre, University of Minho. The research consists of a comparative analysis of the programming for children broadcasted by the four Portuguese terrestrial channels (RTP1, RTP2, SIC and TVI) over the course of a year (October 2007 - September 2008) and aims to identify the main trends in children's programming.

The study is based on two important pieces of evidence which justify the importance of its execution: (a) several national and international studies on the relationship between young people and the media show that, in spite of the changes that have occurred in the media field, television continues to play an important role in children's everyday lives, being an important learning resource and a vehicle for contact with the surrounding world; (b) television broadcasters have responsibilities towards children. This statement is reflected in certain decisions and obligations which have become laws (Portuguese and European broadcasting laws).

This paper aims to present data resulting from the analysis of television schedules for children in terms of broadcasting hours, slots, programme genre, format, programmes' themes/contents, countries of origin and target audience. We will also discuss the data coming from the qualitative analysis of the ten children programmes most preferred by this audience. This analysis allowed to identify the ingredients that a programme must have to captivate children's interest and attention.

In the light of this data, we intend to examine what children might expect from television and in what extent TV can meet children's needs, mainly of those who have no access to cable TV and, consequently, to dedicated channels.

This discussion will be complemented by the results of other research project about children's perceptions regarding the television programmes broadcasted for them. This second study was conducted with 6-10 years old primary school students of the district of Braga (North of Portugal) and the data was collected by focus groups interviews. One of its main purposes was to listen to children in order to understand what they think about their own "box".

Children's subjectivity and welfare: (in)visibility and voice

Ferreira, Manuela

*FPCE, University of Porto
Porto, Portugal*

Sarmiento, Manuel Jacinto

*IE, University of Minho
Braga, Portugal*

Keywords

methodology, children's welfare, children social inclusion

The definition of norm(s) that tend to become exclusive reference(s) comes as consequence of experts' knowledge production about children's welfare, within diverse plans - theoretical, normative, statistical, documental, which is sustained in criteria of comfort and human development, rooted in values and references that are induced through successive consensus about the idea of social welfare conveyed by modernity.

It is mainly expressed in dimensions that concern "provision" rights, as well as "protection". That is why existing indicators, produced by reference to normatively oriented social categories or dimensions, may scrape social actors' subjectivity, to which it refers and suppress their experiences and life conditions' diversity. The "objectifying" of life conditions and suppression, in data collection work of social actors' voices is expressed, in the case of children's welfare indicators, by adult centred, normative and out of context approaches, predominantly (if not exclusively).

To understand childhood as competent generational category, recognized in its alterity and constituted by culture producer subjects - dimension that is present in children's participative rights - allows to figure out another perspective towards knowledge building about children welfare: the one that intertwines objective, structural and "normative" indicators with the auscultation of children's understanding about their personal and social welfare.

In this view, knowledge production about childhood and children implies methodological renovation that wills to apprehend children's ways, processes and understandings, making large resource of ethnographic and participative methodologies. It must have particular acuity to the knowledge of children who are kept at the Welfare State social conditions' margin? - migrant populations, socially excluded, ethnic minorities, homeless children, sexual or work exploitation victims, etc. - but of the poorly known so-called "normal" children as well.

An insight at those "other" children corresponds to the recognition of an "other" Europe more aware of its margins and seen through the observation "other" that only children can provide.

In this paper we will try to deconstruct more common forms of knowledge about children's welfare and we will try to make the foundations for new ways of social indicators' building genuinely attentive to children's life conditions and subjectivities.

Children's Life Spaces in the City

Lourdes, Gaitan

Faculty of Political Sciences and Sociology. Experto en Políticas Sociales de Infancia, University Complutense Madrid Las Matas (Madrid), Spain

Maria, von Bredow

FACULTY OF POLITICAL SCIENCES AND SOCIOLOGY. EXPERTO EN POLÍTICAS SOCIALES DE INFANCIA, UNIVERSITY COMPLUTENSE MADRID Madrid, Spain

Keywords

city, children, autonomy, Activities

Today, a majority of the world's children lives in cities: compound by physical spaces and structures that entail both constrictions and opportunities for both children and adults.

The social environment represents an important issue for children; it emerges spontaneously in their discourse, especially in relation to the possibility that it provides for establishing interpersonal relations to peers and adults. In what sense does the current urban model facilitate or obstruct these contacts? What kind of resorts do children employ in order to achieve their objectives? What sort of coping strategies do they make use of?

The exploration of the space outside home is also a way for children to leave the private sphere and enter the public one, a way of making themselves visible and discover their own capacity of personal autonomy. What possibilities do children living in cities have to engage in explorative adventures? How do they avoid the risks of the public space? How do they negotiate their spaces of personal autonomy?

With these and other questions in mind, the study on the life of children and adolescents in the city of Madrid was carried out, using as principal informants the subjects of study themselves; in order to get closer to their routines, the facilities and barriers encountered in their daily life. The final purpose was to find out how they perceive the accessibility of the city and its public spaces as well as mapping their relation networks and the places they frequent and favour.

The results of the study shows that children are sensitive to problems that affects common coexistence, and especially the respect for traffic rules, the tearing up and bad use of common areas and buildings, and issues regarding the environment.

Through their discourse, children show that they are competent to live a child-life in an apparently hostile environment, the big city. They don't dream of an idyllic past, a city that is not longer what it was, they live today and they wish to share their experiences and be taken into account.

Citizenship of pupils with intellectual disability in lower secondary schools in Norway

Sagen, Line Melboe

Department of Health- and Social Sciences, Harstad University College Harstad, Norway

Keywords

citizenship, school, intellectual disability

In Norway all children have the right to be educated in local public schools independent of having special needs or not. This paper is based on a PhD-project which focuses on the social situation and participation of pupils with intellectual disabilities in school. The purpose of this paper is to explore the citizenship of these pupils in school. The data are based on fieldwork comprising both interviews (N=56) and participant observations. Ten interviews with pupils with intellectual disabilities were carried out at seven secondary schools in different regions of Norway. Interviews were also carried out with their parents or guardians, employees at the pupils' schools and counsellors at the educational-psychological support services. The pupils attend special education schools, sections of special education at mainstream schools and mainstream schools. The interviews and field notes are analysed from a hermeneutic perspective.

The findings show that when it comes to citizenship, the informal participation of pupils with intellectual disability is much more extensive than the participation of their peers. For instance the disabled pupils have influence both on what their curriculum shall be, how to work with different subjects, and whether they stay in class or work on their own outside class. When it comes to formal participation in pupil democracy, the disabled pupils participate much less than their peers. Some pupils are not even allowed to attend. Furthermore the findings also shows that the employees pay quite a lot of attention to the disabled pupils well-being at the present (as 'beings?'), and less attention to making good use of their potential and future possibilities ('becoming?'). This imbalance is quite interesting since all pupils by Norwegian law have the right to develop their abilities and qualifications, at the same time as they have got the right to attend school environments that promote their well-being. These findings tell us something about the citizenship of these pupils.

Constructing childhood in the scout movement - a presentation of a new research project

Westberg Broström, Anna

Dept. of Child and Youth Studies, Stockholm University Stockholm, Sweden

Keywords

Child Perspective, Child and Youth Science, Sweden, Scout Movement

The scout movement was founded in England 100 years ago. Today, it is established globally and has 38 million members. The Swedish branch of the movement is coeducational and it is based on voluntary work, membership fees and support from the state. The scout movement organizes the free time for many children, youth and adults in Sweden. It is a milieu and a context where children are being trained. The movement contains both traces of continuity and change. In that way it can say something about the development of society. The aim of this paper is to present and discuss the design of a coming research project about the scout movement. The study, which further develops some of the research questions arising from my dissertation research, seeks to contribute with knowledge about how childhood is being constructed. The aim of the thesis was to describe children's own perspectives on being scouts and to describe the scout movement as a cultural phenomenon (Westberg, 2007). In the coming study, I will study the leaders' perspectives on the children. Instead of studying the movement in general I will study the movement's construction of childhood and its view of knowledge in particular. The project aims to study a culture which is created for children. What does the movement think is best for children? How is childhood constructed within the scout movement? These questions are of particular interest in a time when the movement tries to modernize itself to suit a wider target group among the population.

Constructing the viewer, making the citizen: young people's relationship with TV news

Pereira, Sara

*Communication Sciences Department, University of Minho
Braga, Portugal*

Pinto, Manuel

*Communication Sciences Department, University of Minho
Braga, Portugal*

Keywords

citizenship, young people, television news, current affairs

This paper aims to discuss young people's relationship with television news. As David Buckingham (2000: vii) has pointed out, "news has become our primary means of access to the public sphere", not only for general public but also for the youngsters. In Portugal, television news broadcasts are watched everyday by a large percentage of families, accompanying their dinner time. This means that children watch daily news as well. But, we may ask, what news do they watch? What are these news items about? What news stories do they prefer? What do children value in news? What values do the TV news transmit?

In order to answer these research questions we analysed the young people audience rating (4-14 years old) of news bulletins of two Portuguese TV channels - the main public channel (RTP) and the private channel with highest audience ratings (TVI). The data collected cover the entire year of 2008, involving 366 news bulletins of each channel. We have considered for analysis a sample of five news stories with the highest rating among young people in each daily news bulletin (data source: Marktest's people meter). These news stories have been compared with those most rated among adults aged 35-44 years old (corresponding, grosso modo, to the age of young people's parents).

This paper provides an account of how young people relate to television news and what kind of news stories attracts the interest or attention of this audience. Discussing the results, we intend either to reflect about how television constitutes the viewer as a citizen and as a potential participant in the public sphere or to understand what citizenship and what idea of human rights are being constructed through TV news.

Cultural Diversity in Children's Lives: Biculturalism and processes of Mutual Accommodation

Scholtz, Jennifer

Children's Research Centre and the Trinity Immigration Initiative, Trinity College Dublin Dublin 2, Republic of Ireland

Keywords

mutual accomodation, Integration, children's social networks, biculturalism

The concept of biculturalism or transculturalism has traditionally referred to the skills and competencies which young people from immigrant or ethnic minority groups develop in order to successfully negotiate life between two or more cultural worlds. It is widely argued that the development of such skills has a critical role to play in minority children's adaptation and integration into a new community as well as in promoting positive relationships both between and within different groups. However, public policy at national and EU level increasingly recognises that 'integration' cannot be a one-sided endeavour but must involve 'mutual accommodation' between the host society and newcomers.

This paper aims to explore the realities of these processes of mutual accommodation within children's everyday lives in Irish society using the example of 10-12 year old Irish and newcomer girls attending school in North Inner-city Dublin. It will report findings from classroom based fieldwork in three schools in the Dublin North Inner-City involving participant observation and interviews with children. This fieldwork was conducted between January and June 2008 as part of the first phase of the Trinity Immigration Initiative's Children Youth and Community Relations project 'Learning Together' at Trinity College Dublin (<http://www.tcd.ie/immigration/community/index.php>). The 'Learning Together' study has been conducted in a unique time and context as immigration to Ireland is a relatively recent phenomenon, allowing us an insight into the experiences of immigrant and 'local' children in host communities with little prior experience of cultural diversity.

Emerging findings indicate that developing relationships and fostering interaction, collaboration and exchange between children from different cultures, ethnicities or religions within schools involves more than just promoting an ethos of equality of rights or positive attitudes towards diversity. Rather, it requires the development of bicultural skills and competencies by children from both immigrant and majority society communities. This has considerable implications not only for the focus of public policies but also the direction of future research.

Day-care centre as integrating social institutions for disabled children in Norway

Lundeby, Hege

Funksjonshemming og samfunn (Disability and Society), NTNU-samfunnsforskning (NTNU-Social Science Research) Norway,

Ytterhus, Borgunn

Department of Social Work & Health Sciences, Norwegian University of Science and Technology (NTNU) Norway,

Keywords

day-care services, cooperation, Integration, disability

In Norway, as in most European countries, integration of disabled children in school and day-care services have been the official politics for years. There has further been political agreement that day-care centres are particularly important for disabled children, and in Norway, most children with impairments are offered some sort of pre-school day-care services. The main organisation model has for a long time been integration into ordinary day-care services. Lately, there has been a growth in day-care services available for all children, and today, 94 % off all Norwegian children aged 3-5 received day-care services (Statistics Norway 2007). In a running study, we ask how present day day-care services ensure its mandate as an 'integrating institution' as regards disabled children. It seems to be a tendency towards an increase in some groups of disabled children being segregated in particular day-care services in order to gather special competence among the personal. In this project, we ask if we can trace a recession of the integrating processes and ideals in present day practises and organisation.

Concretely, parents of all children born in 2002, 2003 and 2004, with a broad selection of physical disabilities, learning disabilities and multiple disabilities, and registered as receivers of a cash benefit for people in need of special care or supervision, are invited to participate in a survey. Invitations will go out to parents of about 1300 children in late February 2009. One quantitative questionnaire will go to parents and another to personnel in the child's day-care service. The aim of the study is to get information on physical integration (how the services are actually organised for these children today), cooperation and interaction (between parents and personnel, as well as with other services and societal institution), and inclusive thinking and practises (how the children's everyday life within the institutions are organised and planned by the personnel in order to ensure actual integration).

Results from the study will be presented and discussed with particular focus on the question of if and how disabled children are considered as part of the plurality of most children in Norwegian day-care centres.

Developing the Childrens Rights Approach: Findings in the Case of Costa Rica

Rodríguez Pascual, Iván

Sociology and Social Work, Universidad de Huelva Huelva, Spain

Keywords

children, Rights, Social change

The text describes the achievements, setbacks and resistance in a society with a markedly complex institutional set up during the change process, from a traditional or other point of view based on the principles of convention on children's rights. Following the example of Costa Rica it was necessary to verify in what manner the emancipating view and radically new way of looking at childhood proposed by the CRC collided with the reality, still considered to be reticent, to learn from the process to be implemented in other societies.

Digital divides and new "private" frontiers: children and the internet

Nunes de Almeida, Ana

*University of Lisbon, Instituto de Ciencias Sociais
Lisbon, Portugal*

Delicado, Ana

*University of Lisbon, Instituto de Ciencias Sociais
Lisbon, Portugal*

de Almeida Alves, Nuno

*ISCTE, CIES
Lisbon, Portugal*

Keywords

internet, children, digital divide

Contemporary discussions on children's uses of the internet is very often centred in three main problems. First, in a scenario of a recent and intense ICT diffusion in schools and families (specially those with children), sociologists sustain that the main digital divide between children is no longer found in the access (in "haves and have nots"), but has been transferred to the modes of appropriation, the quality of its use. Second, essentialist perspectives concerning technology are to be denounced, because context matters: gender, social origins, age are factors that introduce inequality and diversity in practices and values. Third, technological innovation and privatization, encouraged by competitive market prices and parents' ambition to provide their children with educational tools and a safe environment, contributed to undermine traditional frontiers between public/private spheres and reinforce the dominant ideology opposing stranger-dangers domains vs. the sanctified home.

Inspired in these three theoretical axes, this paper discusses Portuguese children's uses, appropriations and representations about internet. It is based on the data of a survey launched in May-June 2008, applied to 3049 children (aged 8-17 years old) studying in public and private schools located in contrasting areas of the country. It is particularly focused on the results of a cluster analysis, through which three user profiles emerged: "the diligent student", "the tenacious player" and the "all-round cybernaut". The profiles are analyzed and their association with contextual and structural variables is illustrated, in order to demonstrate that (i) children's internet uses, appropriations and representations are not just individual or technological affairs (ii) in Portuguese late modern society inequalities still exist at the level of access, although diversity concerning uses are prominent (iii) home frontiers are under intense transformation, due to the new roles children actively play in the internet.

Disasters we have had! The importance of place when interviewing children

Gibbs, Lisa

McCaughey Centre: University of Melbourne, University of Melbourne Carlton, Victoria, Australia

MacDougall, Colin

Flinders Public Health and Southgate Institute for Health, Society and Equity, Flinders University Adelaide, South Australia, Australia

Block, Karen

*McCaughey Centre: VicHealth Centre for the Promotion of Mental Health and Community Wellbeing, University of Melbourne
Carlton, Victoria, Australia*

Priest, Naomi

*McCaughey Centre: VicHealth Centre for the Promotion of Mental Health and Community Wellbeing, University of Melbourne
Carlton, Victoria, Australia*

Prosser, Lauren

The Cancer Council Victoria and Diabetes Australia - Vic, University Melbourne Carlton, Victoria, Australia

Waters, Elizabeth

*McCaughey Centre: VicHealth Centre for the Promotion of Mental Health and Community Wellbeing, University of Melbourne
Carlton, Victoria, Australia*

Keywords

methodology, children, qualitative

There is a growing literature on methodologies to engage children in research but less attention has been paid to important ways in which interview places and spaces affect the conduct of the interview and the analysis of the data. . Interview location can greatly influence power relations and contextual distractions. Given the vulnerability of children, the theoretical, ethical and pragmatic issues of place also need to be considered.

This presentation builds on child public health research conducted by the authors, then uses theory and published studies to analyse the place-based issues in relation to home, school, clinical and community-based studies. For example, home based interviewing can often give rise to a difficult choice between interviewing in a family space where children's responses are mediated by other's presence versus the privacy of a bedroom which is generally considered an inappropriate location for interviewers to be alone with children. The success of school-based discussions can be influenced by whether they are located in a neutral room, a fun space, or a room associated with a disliked subject or teacher. Similarly, data collected in the process of community based activity may be more useful than structured data collection activities such as interviews or focus group discussions.

Successful and unsuccessful experiences will be reported and discussed against a backdrop of theory and published studies as a means of understanding the issues for children, parents, supervising adults and researchers, and exploring how researchers can approach the sometimes difficult question of how to nominate an interview place.

Does Religion Count ? Children' Well-Being and Family Life Among Adolescents in a Postsocialist Country

Kovacs Ma, Eszter

*Institute of Behavioral Sciences, IV. Doctoral School, Behavioral Science Program, Semmelweis University
Budapest, Hungary*

Piko, Bettina F.

*Department of Behavioral Sciences, University of Szeged
Szeged, Hungary*

Keywords

religiousness, social support, protective factors, Family

Spirituality has changed and gotten a new meaning recently. In every person's life a demand appears for spirituality and rituals. The question is how people treat this phenomenon in the everyday life. Because of the effects of secularization the previous dominance of religion declined and new waves of religious movements were established. Our aim is to have an outline of what religion means for today's adolescents and what opportunities of religious behavior they can choose in a postsocialist country. Furthermore, we would like to understand how religiousness as a main field in the value system may provide security and guidelines in life; and the way how these may be connected to healthy adaptation in the family. The present study (N=881; 44.6 females) reports on Hungarian adolescents' religious denominations, their religiousness and religious attendance with attention put on sociodemographic and socio-economic background. We attempt to reveal the connection between respect of parental values, parental control and social support regarding religiousness. Results suggest that adolescents' level of religiousness is rather low. 41% presented themselves 'not religious at all'. Others mentioned several denominations from traditional churches to the 'new age' groups like Buddhist, Adventist or Followers of White Magic. The level of religious activity is also low. 49.8% chose the response 'never' for frequency of going to church. Respect of parental values, parental control and perceived social support scores were higher among more religious and more religiously active adolescents. We may conclude that adolescents' religiousness is closely related to family lives and parent-child relationship.

Enhancing Children's Citizenship through Participation: An analysis of professionals, policies and practices

Pinkney, Sharon

Social Policy, The Open University Leeds, UK

Keywords

participation, policy, children, welfare, professionals

Enhancing Children's Citizenship through Participation: An analysis of professionals, policies and practices.

The paper contributes to debates about the advancement of children's rights within contemporary European social welfare contexts. It seeks to discover some of the organisational dynamics involved in the participation of children and young people in social welfare decision making. It examines the ways individual professionals negotiate, communicate and manage their own emotions in this difficult and challenging arena of work with children. Furthermore it also explores the institutional responses to children's participation. Finally it evaluates whether participation has become part of the new public management of welfare within Europe.

As children and young people become more skilled at presentation of self in formal and informal decision making arenas, professionals are having to come to terms with the dilemmas and anxieties this raises for them. This shift in focus with the professional at the centre allows further exploration of the complex professional and organisational dynamics at play in this arena of social welfare work with children.

This analysis of the adult/professional roles in participation is necessary and integral to children's participation being further developed in future. The wider context is of advancement of children's rights within contemporary European social welfare contexts.

The paper draws primarily upon research data from the UK but also includes preliminary data from the authors study in Norway (2009-2011). Norway is generally acknowledged as one of the leading countries in developments on children's rights with the establishment of the first children's rights commissioner. As a result it has been viewed as a beacon of children's citizenship. Many countries in Europe as well as internationally have looked towards Norway when developing their own services for children. This study will examine the way professionals facilitate and negotiate participation in Norway . It will also aim to identify Norwegian principles and practices that may be transferred to children's participation policy and practice within the UK.

Ethics of the relationship between the researcher and the informant in observational study of children with developmental disabilities - theoretical considerations

Olli, Johanna

Department of Nursing Science, University of Turku Finland,

Salanterä, Sanna

*Department of Nursing Science, University of Turku
Turku, Finland*

Keywords

children with developmental disabilities, observational study, Research ethics

This presentation reviews the ethical questions of the relationship between the researcher and the informant in observational study of children with developmental disabilities. Ethically sound methodological solutions are discussed.

The most important ethical principles of researcher are principles of beneficence and non-maleficence. However, it is not easy to put into practice or even define those principles in observation studies of children with developmental disabilities. Every human being's right to freedom, safety, privacy and equality in treatment must be taken into consideration when these principles are defined and practiced. The researcher must also pay attention to the child's level of development. Basically ethical behaviour of a researcher is about a respecting attitude towards the informant. Therefore, the relationship between the researcher and the informant is an important subject of examination in observational research.

The relationship between an adult and a child is usually imbalanced power relationship at a basis. In an observation study children must be treated like children, but not in a way that adults normally do treat children. Ordinarily adults are the ones that give information and permissions on behalf of the child, but actually in observation study the child is the informant, who should be asked for permission. Carrying out an observational study is always somehow intrusive, thus the child's assent is important. Even a small child's participation in a research should be voluntary. The child's refusal should be respected, even if his/her reaction would not seem as rational behaviour. It is possible to get an assent from a child in pre-linguistic level with non-verbal methods. Getting an assent is not a one-time performance, but should happen continuously during the observation period. The researcher should regard the child with respect during the whole observation period. The child with developmental disabilities needs preparation for the ending of the research relationship, because changes are difficult and because the end of the relationship might cause sorrow to the child. In conclusion, an observational study of children with developmental disabilities requires of researcher as follows: experience of working with children, sensitivity of perceiving child's reactions and thorough examination of own attitudes.

European Child Welfare Systems - comparative analyses on the meaning of family and the outcomes for children in institutional or foster care

Cunha, Sandra

Sociology, ISCTE

Quinta do Conde, Sesimbra, Portugal

Keywords

adoption, Child Welfare Services, Family, europe, Child Protection Legislation

Child protection practice has undergone major changes in the last decades in several European countries. Although country specific laws have been strengthened and somewhat homogenized by the ratification of several international conventions, the most important being the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child from 1989, national protection proceedings show slightly different practices between countries and different outcomes on the placements of children at risk and on decisions concerning adoption.

In Portugal, due to recent highly mediatized cases concerning the withdrawal of children custody from biological families and placement of children into foster or institutionalized care, discussion about what exactly defines and constitutes a family has risen, not only among specialists but also within society and public opinion. Definitions of family based on biology and blood ties compete with more social conceptions of family where the emotional links are given more importance.

This debate has highlighted the coexistence of diverse definitions and conceptions of family, but most importantly, has revealed the importance that these different views of family relations undertake on the processes of decision making about the placement of children after leaving institutional or foster care and on decisions concerning adoption. Although Portuguese legislation specifies that all measures on children's lives should take into account the child best interest, this notion of what's best for the child appears to be left to the personal judgement of judges and social workers and to their more biological or social definitions of family and conceptions of family relations.

Through the analysis of child protection systems of several European countries, this paper tries to understand if different conceptions of family emerge from the several legal frameworks and more specifically if the different weight or importance given to biology and genetic ties in defining family mean different practices among Child Welfare Services and different outcomes concerning children placement after leaving foster or institutional care.

In sum, the scope of this article is to assess if whether we can talk about one European Child Protection System or if, instead, we have a multitude of different child protection procedures among European countries.

Experiences and aspirations for how we live citizenship

Larkins, Cath

Social Work, University of Central Lancashire Taurinya, France

Keywords

participation, Rights, citizenship, Recognition, responsibilities

From May 2008 to February 2009 the research project: Children, Citizenship and Europe, has worked with fifty-five children from marginalized groups: gypsy travellers, young carers, disabled, minority ethnic, looked after and refugees. Taking place in Wales and France with children aged 5 to 13 years, the research processes supported these children to reflect upon their experiences and aspirations for lived citizenship. Using words, action, videos and pictures, each group explored, reviewed and created a series of claims for rights, responsibilities, respect, membership and change.

This paper will explore the children's citizenship claims with reference to the following questions:

What rights did children from all participating groups deem important and what rights were group specific?

What responsibilities did they hold?

What did they see as enabling or impeding their experience of the lived citizenship they aspired to?

The paper will then discuss the issues raised by the children's research in the context of existing interpretations of children's citizenship. Echoing much of the literature (e.g. Lister (2008)), but from their perspective, examination of the participating children's research suggests that understandings of children's citizenship might be furthered by consideration of the interplay between issues of access and resources; respect, recognition and fairness; and participation.

References: Lister, R. (2008) 'Unpacking Children's Citizenship' in Children and Citizenship, A. Invernizzi & J. Williams, eds., Sage, London.

Experts of Their Own Lives: The Voice and Representation of Children and Young Adults

Haanpää, Leena

*Turku Center for Child and Youth Research, University of Turku
Turku, Finland*

Ehrs, Camilla

*Turku Center for Child and Youth Research, University of Turku
Turku, Finland*

Keywords

youngsters, participation, well-being, citizenship, children

Lately, both political and societal interest have been devoted to participation of children and youngsters. This is directed to civics, hearing, leisure activities and voluntary participation. They have a right to participate in decision making that promotes development of the society. Their right to influence decision making that concerns them is emphasized in several legal instruments. Respect for the views of the child is one of the core principles of the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child. According to the Constitution of Finland (731/1999) the public authorities shall promote the opportunities for the individual to participate in societal activity and to influence the decisions that concerns him or her. This obligation applies to children and youngsters as well.

The importance of children's and youngsters' views is also emphasized in the Finnish Government policy program for the well-being of children, youth and families (2007). The main goals of this program are to strengthen children's and youngsters citizenship, participation and possibilities to influence. Strong expectations are put on the willingness of citizens to actively and voluntarily participate for common good. From the point of view of child and youth studies this means that except for giving children and youth the possibilities to influence attention must also be paid on how institutional expectations and individual willingness meet. Are children and youth capable, in respect to their age and life experience, of making all these decisions and promoting active citizenship?

At Turku Institute for Child and Youth Research at the University of Turku a project 'Youngsters in focus' offers responds to this national societal and political demand. Research project produces information about the living conditions, thoughts and desires of children and youth. The research was carried out at schools of Southwest Finland in November 2008 and it aims to strengthen the participation of children and youth. The survey targeted 6th and 9th grade pupils at schools in Southwest Finland (N=2700). The paper focuses on Finnish children's and young adults opinions on their possibilities to participate and influence their own lives. Comparisons with Swedish studies on the same topic will be made.

Families with Children and the Changes on Societal Atmosphere in Finland

Harrikari, Timo

*Department of Social Policy Studies, University of Helsinki
University of Helsinki, Finland*

Keywords

Social Policy, Finland, children, Childhood, concern

Since the economic recession of the 1990's the Finnish social policy has been permeated with post-expansive economic policy, new public management and new types of techniques of responsabilisation. As these Anglo-American origin influences have become to be a significant resource in Finnish social policy, the question arises, to what extent they have also showed their way into Finnish child welfare policy?

This paper addresses the changes in societal atmosphere, political interest and societal reactions towards children and families with children in Finland 1970-2006. Utilizing parliamentary records (N=8521), the paper is focusing 1) how the themes of discussion, political goal-setting and the ways of intervening have changed. Furthermore, causes for a change are analyzed. Records are standardized by Mp's (N=2200) cultural and political capital. Methods are quantitative content analysis and logistic regression analysis.

The results indicate a gradual change from wide-range family and cultural policy towards the post-expansive politics of order, concern and fear.

The paper is based on a chapter of Finnish-speaking monograph Stigmatized by Risk. Children and the Young in the Politics of Concern and Early Intervention published in 2008.

Family Law in Germany since 1998: towards an autonomous child?

Schutter, Sabina

*Sociology, University of Wuppertal
Berlin, Germany*

Keywords

children's rights, Custody Law, Filiation Law

The child has been in the focus of family law changes since 1998 in Germany. But is it thus getting more acting options or are the changes limited to a rhetorical view on children as objects of family trials? The Family Law Reform Act of 1998 in Germany was followed by several changes in various aspects of family and custody law. Since these changes in law were named like 'children's rights improving law' it is interesting to know whether children's rights have actually been improved and which international conventions could have led to and are referred to in this development.

The law changes I am focusing on are: 'small' custody for step parents (2001), law of proscription of violence and the change of child alimony law (2001), law of improving children's rights (2002), change of custody law for non-married parents (temporary regulation) (2003), challenge of paternity for biological non-legal fathers (2003), visiting rights for biological fathers (2003), Alimony Reform Act (2007), right to test paternity (2008).

My main research deals with the right to test paternity which was established in Germany in 2008 as a reaction to a judgment of the German Federal Constitutional Court. This could be considered as the climax of a development of family law dealing with children's rights on the surface but in fact limiting children's range of action and consolidating the normative function of biologically related families based on a married, heterosexual (as heterosexuality being the condition for biologically related children), and monogamous couple. By basing citizenship on genealogy, the side effect of this legal focus is the increasingly excluding character of migration law.

I want to discuss whether these changes can be seen as a linear development justified by/based on similar lines of argumentation. In which ways are children debated as subject or object and what are the outcomes of the law changes for children and other family members, where family is seen as children and other persons having either a legal and/or biological and/or social relation to the child?

Financially oppressive fathers have children

Näsman, Elisabet

*Dep. of Sociology, Uppsala University
Uppsala, Sweden*

Keywords

neglect, Poverty, financial abuse, economic violence

Economic abuse, financial/economic violence and economic coercion are concepts used in international research on men's violence against women, when conceptualizing men's actions of financial power in intimate relationships. Focused research in this area is rare and the issue is often marginalized in research on violence or completely invisible as is often the case in research on women's poverty. Even more remarkable is the almost total lack of interest in this issue from a child perspective. Children are in the violence and poverty research, where this issue is approached, seen mainly as an economic responsibility of women or completely neglected. Financially oppressive men are not seen as fathers. The same lack of visibility of the connection between these men's actions and their children is found in research on child abuse and neglect. Especially research on neglect is a "mother-blaming" field of research. This paper tries to bring these issues together in an analysis of earlier research, a task that also makes it necessary to approach a number of theoretical issues since there is a lot of conceptual confusion and lack of clarity in the ways this issue is discussed. A child perspective is used to contest that the focus of research on this matter is on adults as providers and provided for, rarely including children as individuals and actors.

Foster children's family relations - What are important family relations to a foster child?

Hämäläinen, Kati

*social work, University of Jyväskylä
Jyväskylä, Finland*

Keywords

family relations, Foster care, foster child, foster family

Today it is often emphasized that children's voices should be heard in research. Thus far in Finland foster children have been rarely interviewed for purposes of research. Opinions are usually asked of adults who have experience of being in foster care, or social workers. As a researcher I am interested in children's perspectives. The results of my studies showed that children are able to speak openly about difficult subjects and can produce important and valuable information about their lives. Only foster children themselves can describe their experiences of their relationships within their family and their conception of the family.

In this paper I will present some preliminary results of my ongoing doctoral research, which focuses on the foster family from foster children's point of view. My research questions are: 1) What kinds of experiences of their family relations do the foster children have? 2) What is a foster child's family? Main question in this presentation is: What are important family relations to a foster child? The target group of this research is 13 foster children aged 7 to 12 and it includes both boys and girls. As a method I used focus interviews, social network maps and diaries. In this presentation I will concentrate mostly on the results of the interviews and the social network maps.

Biological family relations seem to be important to foster children, but they are also very contradictory. Foster children have right to be in contact to their biological parents regularly during the foster care, does it make the situation of the child difficult? Is she or he constantly between two parents? Or can a child feel rich because of having two families? It is an interesting question why the biological family relations are so important to foster children, even though their parents have neglected them? Would it be different, if these children were adopted and not in constant contact to their biological parents? Would it be easier situation to foster children?

From "genuine childhood" to "age compression": a qualitative content analysis of the representation of children in fashion advertising

Ironico, Simona

*Istituto di Consumi, Comportamento e Comunicazione d'Impresa, IULM University
Milan, Italy*

Keywords

Gender, Advertising, fashion, representation of children, qualitative content analysis

Print ads in the Italian fashion magazines Vogue Bambini and Mood Kid (years 2007-2008) were content analyzed to examine the conventions of representation of children. The findings of the study revealed a continuum ranging from what has been labelled as "genuine childhood" to what has been labelled as "age compression". At the one end of the continuum, children were portrayed as innocent, pure and spontaneous; at the other end, children were portrayed as replicating grown-up appearances, attitudes and behaviours, including precocious sexualisation. Moving along the continuum, four subcategories were identified: "Bon Ton", "Play", "Street Style" and "Lolita". Furthermore, the study emphasized the role of children's wear design and promotion in the gendering of the identities for boys and girls.

German Finnish Children and Adolescents and Relationships to Finland

Karhunen, Anja

Department of Sociology, University of Joensuu Joensuu, Finland

Keywords

conditions of growth, transnational, social process, citizenship

German Finnish Children and Adolescents and Relationships to Finland

The aim of my forthcoming PhD research project is to study the second generation children in transnational German Finnish families in Germany. The focus of my research is to understand the experiences of German Finnish children and adolescents who acquired Finnish language mainly from their Finnish mothers and formulate a conception of conditions of growth into Finnish society and Finnishness. The data of this longitudinal study consist of interviews with 11 German Finnish children from 10 families. The children have told me their experiences of acquiring Finnish language, culture, and society which are changing and becoming deeper during their growing older. Acquired Finnish language is a basic condition and added to that through the content analysis of the data I have found functional, social, and emotional conditions of growth. More specific consideration of these conditions focused on children's social relationship, developmental process of independence, and finally, orientation of nationality. In my presentation I will discuss about meaning of emotional bound to Finnish people and environment because preliminary findings suggest that affective experiences contribute to the orientation of nationality. Especially, I will focus on the alternative of national orientation; to be a cosmopolitan citizen, a Finnish orientated or a tourist in Finland?

Growing Community: the social impacts of a school-based kitchen garden program

Block, Karen

Melbourne School of Population Health, University of Melbourne Victoria, Australia

Gibbs, Lisa

*Melbourne School of Population Health, University of Melbourne
Victoria, Australia*

Townsend, Mardie

Faculty of Health, Medicine, Nursing & Behavioural Sciences, Deakin University Burwood, Australia

Macfarlane, Susie

Faculty of Health Medicine Nursing & Behavioural Sciences, Deakin University Burwood, Australia

Keywords

children, school, social

School gardening and garden-based nutrition programs are seen as having the potential to improve children's nutritional and health status as well as positively influencing social and environmental behaviours. However, the evidence base assessing these impacts is limited and is usually focused on health and nutritional outcomes. This presentation will explore the social impacts of a school-based kitchen garden program on students and the broader school community.

The authors are conducting a mixed-method longitudinal evaluation to examine the processes, impacts and outcomes of a kitchen garden program initiated by Australian celebrity chef Stephanie Alexander. The program has been operating in 27 primary schools across the state of Victoria and is currently being expanded nationally. The Stephanie Alexander Kitchen Garden program offers children the opportunity to grow, harvest, prepare and share fresh, nutritious, seasonal and delicious food. The program objective is to provide a pleasurable experience that will positively influence children's food choices, attitudes towards environmental sustainability and working relationships with other children and adults.

This presentation will focus on the qualitative data from this study, which suggest that participants value the social impacts of the program as highly as the nutritional. Focus groups and interviews were conducted to elicit the views of children, teachers, parents, program volunteers, school principals and kitchen and garden teachers from six schools that had been running the program for one to two years.

Some of the attributes of the program valued most highly by study participants went well beyond its immediate objectives. Opportunities for experiential and integrated learning, teamwork, building social skills, social connections and links between schools and their communities were seen as particularly important. Observed increases in student engagement and confidence were also key themes and seen by many as particularly valuable for 'non-academic' or 'challenging' children, some of whom had few other opportunities for experiencing 'success' at school. The program was seen as directly benefiting not only the children but also the other stakeholder groups by creating a 'learning community' in which all could be involved.

Hearing children's voices beyond the adult influence

Gibbs, Lisa

*McCaughey Centre: VicHealth Centre for the Promotion of Mental Health and Community Wellbeing, University of Melbourne
Carlton, Australia*

Block, Karen

*McCaughey Centre: VicHealth Centre for the Promotion of Mental Health and Community Wellbeing, University of Melbourne
Carlton, Australia*

MacDougall, Colin

Flinders Public Health and Southgate Institute for Health, Society and Equity, Flinders University Adelaide, South Australia, Australia

Gold, Lisa

Public Health Research, Evaluation and Policy Cluster, Deakin University Burwood, Victoria, Australia

Davis, Elise

*McCaughey Centre: VicHealth Centre for the Promotion of Mental Health and Community Wellbeing, University of Melbourne
Carlton, Victoria, Australia*

Holland, Dionne

School of Health and Social Development, Deakin University Burwood, Australia

Townsend, Mardie

Faculty of Health, Medicine, Nursing and Behavioural Sciences, Deakin University Burwood, Victoria, Australia

Staiger, Petra

School of Psychology, Deakin University Burwood, Victoria, Australia

Macfarlane, Susie

School of Psychology, Deakin University Burwood, Australia

Halliday, Jennifer

School of Health and Social Development, Deakin University Burwood, Victoria, Australia

Waters, Elizabeth

McCaughey Centre: VicHealth Centre for the Promotion of Mental Health and Community Wellbeing, University of

Keywords

methodology, children, qualitative

A child centered or "citizen child" approach to research focuses on the child's perspective of their own experiences or potentially of broader issues including adult issues. Much has been written about child-based methodologies to work with children in a way that is ethical, age appropriate and effective in eliciting rich data. The challenge in hearing children's voices is to take into account/minimise the inevitable influence of adults as gatekeepers and interpreters of children's worlds.

This presentation reflects critically on a range of child and family-based studies conducted by the authors, including child obesity prevention intervention and research, sociocultural influences on child social inclusion, evaluation of a national school kitchen garden program, health economics valuation studies, and children's views of physical activity. The presentation will outline the team's critical reflection on the effectiveness of methods that take into account researcher, parent and teacher influences on child responses. Examples of adult influences on process include: teachers instructing children regarding what piece of creative work they should use to represent their views of a school-based intervention; parent interruptions during a child interview; children repeating adult descriptors of the value of an intervention ("it was good because it was hard work"); children providing views that contrast with those of adults such as dismissing adult views that TV watching replaces active play. The presentation adds to the evidence supporting the choice of methods that assume that children have the capacity to engage with adult concepts. In particular, the presentation shows how children engaged effectively in evaluation methods using economic concepts in relation to a school-based kitchen garden program involving an Australian celebrity chef: in which children lucidly propose what they would be prepared to trade in order keep the program within their school.

The capacity of research methods to capture multiple perspectives including children's perspective of their own issues, adults' perspective of children's issues, and/or children's perspective of adult issues is an important feature of child-based research but requires researchers to reflect critically on their methods and data analysis.

How children are seen to behave at home and in day-care? Daily diary method with young children, their parents and day-care personnel

Lämsä, Tiina

Family Research Centre, University of Jyväskylä
Jyväskylä, Finland

Rönkä, Anna

School of Health and Social Studies, JAMK University of Applied Sciences
Jyväskylä, Finland

Malinen, Kaisa

Family Research Centre, University of Jyväskylä
Jyväskylä, Finland

Keywords

everyday life, diary method, images of childhood, adults' perceptions of children, children's drawings

Sometimes parents get surprising news about the child's day in day-care: "Is that how my child behaved?" Every family member, including the child, carries experiences and emotions from their own different life spheres with them. We all act in a different manner depending if we are at home or in other surroundings. The interpretation of our behaviour depends on both the environment and the person making the analysis. It is common that discussions are held at home and in day-care concerning the child and his/her wellbeing. Sometimes a consensus is reached, sometimes the views differ. The purpose of this presentation is to describe how children are seen to behave at home and in day-care, to explore the possibilities of producing data from various perspectives using diary method, and to partly lower the barrier of discussion between parents and professionals, and to perceive the parents and day-care personnel as competent informants in the research field. There is also a methodological focal point: How can be captured the relevant aspects of children's daily life?

In this study data was collected within a family study conducted in Finland. The research project called Palette is funded by the Academy of Finland. The project focused on how daily family dynamics, everyday family situations and the different voices in the family can be captured by using different diary methods. The data concerning the children (n=54) were collected using a daily diary and a questionnaire on demographics and factors related to day-care and family life. The one-week diary phase began on Monday morning and ended on the following Sunday evening. Children, aged 1 to 6, did not keep their own diaries because of their young age, but their parents and day-care personnel used a paper-and-pencil diary to collect data on the child's moods and daily activities. Information about children is therefore influenced by adults' conceptions and images of childhood in general, previous experiences and present observations. Children participated by drawing and telling stories. In the analysis the adults' perceptions of children are examined through the descriptions written in daily diaries.

If You're Happy and You Know It: Young Children's Construction of Emotions

Harden, Jeni

School of Health and Social Sciences, Edinburgh Napier University Edinburgh, UK

Keywords

children, emotion, embodiment

Abstract for ESA 2009

If You're Happy and You Know It: Young Children's Construction of Emotions

Sociology of Childhood (sociology and children's minds)

Dr Jeni Harden

Childhood is constructed in our society as a time of emotional development and also of emotional vulnerability and so risk. Indeed, there is growing concern around children's mental health with estimates that up to 20% of children in the UK suffer from mental health problems (Mental Health Foundation 2005). Yet limited attention has been paid to children within the sociological literature on emotions. Emotions are regarded within sociology, not as instinctive, biologically driven gestures, but as 'social things' which are controlled and managed in our everyday lives (Williams 2001). Williams argues that emotions provide a link between many of the dualisms tackled by sociological theory, most notably between mind and body. To explore children's understandings of emotions it is important to explore the contexts and relationships which shape this understanding. Children's emotions can be understood as constructed and experienced through processes of negotiation and management in everyday life. This paper will present findings from research with 6-7 year olds in Scotland. Observation with a school was carried out over a 3 month period and individual and group interviews were conducted both in school and in the home. The paper will discuss the ways in which children construct emotions through interactions in the school context; identify key discourses children use to conceptualise emotional well-being; and discuss children's views and experiences of the management of emotions. The data are drawn from a UK based study but raise issues for comparison in wider European contexts.

Informal Education and Volunteer Work of Pupils

Corsten, Michael

Institute of Social Sciences, University of Hildesheim Hildesheim, Germany

Schierbaum, Anja

Institute of Social Sciences, University of Hildesheim Hildesheim, Germany

Keywords

Informal Education, Development of Pre-Adolescents, Social Conditions of Childrens Development

Most research on Volunteer Work is focussed on adults. In our study we investigate in the transitions of pre-adolescents who are joining informal educational practices or education-related volunteer work and who are aged between 11 and 14. We have collected everyday-life-narrations of about 70 pupils via focused interviews. It is a panel study with three time points of data collection (2008/9; 2010, 2011/12). The topics of the interview reach from descriptions of their family life, school experience, friendship, leisure activities, and, of course their voluntary activities.

The study aims to reconstruct how these early developments of the young adolescents vary by and can be explained by the social conditions given in their family, milieu and school background. It is also intended to estimate the impact of the informal educational processes and/or voluntary work which they are joining in.

Our contribution gives insight into the results of the first panel. It shows typical contrasts of the conditional matrix (sensu Anselm Strauss) of the everyday structuring of pre-adolescents.

Interviewer-Respondent Interaction and Interactive Skills of Children aged 5 to 11 in Face-to-face and Telephone Interviews

Vogl, Susanne

Department of Sociology, Catholic University of Eichstaett-Ingolstadt Eichstaett, Germany

Keywords

telephone interviews, methodology, researching children, face-to-face interviews, interactive skills

Researching children and seeing them as competent informants raises several methodological issues. We know very little about their cognitive, verbal and interactive skills in interview settings. To tackle problems of construing adequate research instruments and create encouraging settings for children (of different age groups) we need to take those skills into account. An interview setting is in most cases something totally new for children. At the same time it requires specific interactions and skills. Interactive skills depend on the experiences a person has. With age the experience in interactions grows and forms a framework for acting in new settings as well. A child gets gradually socialised into a society and learns about ritualised, expected and adequate interactions (in different contexts). Patterns evolve and are abstracted from specific settings and persons. This gives the freedom to handle new situations with strangers, like interviews.

On the basis of qualitative semi-structured interviews conducted face-to-face and on the telephone the interactive abilities of children aged 5 to 11 were tested in the specific setting of an interview situation. They were then analysed employing quantitative and qualitative techniques. Each of the 56 German children was interviewed twice, once on the telephone and once face-to-face. Altogether 112 interviews resulted. All interactions occurring within the interviews were coded according to the Interaction Process Analysis (Bales, 1950). Interactions are distinguished between positive and negative social-emotional behaviour, questions and answers. This rich data was analysed regarding the interviewer-respondent behaviour and the interactive skills of children. Do the respective interactions fit? What are problems and where do they evolve? Is there a difference in interactional patterns and resulting problems regarding age, sex or mode? We found that all those factors have an impact and for a successful and for both satisfying interview they have to be taken into account while designing studies and questionnaires, setting up interview situations.

Interviewing Children from Enclaves of Poverty

Golczynska-Grondas, Agnieszka

Dept. of Applied Sociology and Social Work, Institute of Sociology, University of Lodz Lodz, Poland

Keywords

ethical issues, in-depth interviews, children, enclaves of poverty

The rate of child poverty in Poland is the highest in EU countries. Lodz, with 750.000 inhabitants is the third largest city in Poland. The studies on poverty and social exclusion are conducted in this very city and the Lodz region from the early 1990s. Last years several enclaves of child poverty were identified in urban and rural areas in Lodz's vojevodship. At the beginning of 2009, within the research project titled -Strengthening opportunities and weakening transmission of poverty among inhabitants of towns of the Lodz province -, 50 in-depth interviews were made with the children supported by the welfare system. The interviewed children are pupils of the 6th grade of grammar school. All of them come from socially excluded families. The interviewees have been questioned on their everyday life, educational career, living conditions, neighbourhood, family issues, social networks, their problems and dreams. These interviews have been conducted by sociologists and doctoral students. It was the first experience the research team had in interviewing children within the framework of sociological research. The situations of the interviews made with deeply deprived children have provoked many important questions about the interviewer's social role and professional responsibility. The paper will present the ethical and methodological problems connected with researching children endangered by the process of marginalization.

Living in the Suburbs: Urban Violence from a Child's Perspective

Carvalho, Maria João Leote de

SociNova/CesNova-Centro de Estudos de Sociologia, Faculdade de Ciências Sociais e Humanas, Universidade Nova de Lisboa

Lisboa, Portugal

Keywords

violence, delinquency, risk society, Childhood, urban areas

This presentation examines the forms and impact of urban violence in some neighbourhoods in the suburbs of Lisbon, Portugal, from a child's perspectives. Sociological interest in urban violence dates back from past century and it's an increasing topic in public discussion in contemporary societies. Nowadays, the perception of living in risk societies is strongly diffused, and the fear of violence affects our everyday life. Living in an urban area is as much as negotiating relationships with others as experiencing material places and spaces. In this way, children have emerged as a key source for understanding social dynamics and social changes. Rooted in recent developments of childhood studies that recognize children as social actors, situated in a particularly historical and spatial context (Corsaro, Christensen, James, Qvortrup, Montandon, Almeida, Sarmento among others), the currently ongoing research carried out with financial support provided by the Fundação para a Ciência e Tecnologia (SFRH/BD/43563/2008) aims to a better understanding of children's socialization processes in communities looked as multi-problematic. The six neighbourhoods covered in this study were chosen because they experience relatively high levels of social deprivation. The contexts where someone lives influence the options you have, and as families influence the development of their own, they also suffer the influence of the space where they are living (McIntyre, McCord). The prevalence of certain patterns of social relations and networks, specially those that promote the access to illegal opportunities (Seaton et al.), deserves a particular regard in this research. Using ethnographic and child-centred research methods to explore children's own accounts of their lives, the preliminary findings pointed out that violence affect them in many forms. Some of them emerge not only as victims, but also as agents of violence and crime in early ages. Children's drawings, photographs, and texts bring up the way they represent living in poverty, social exclusion, domestic violence, deviance or crime. The stigma associated to neighbourhoods socially and spatially segregated should be seen in the context of other wider contemporary social changes. Specifically the ideas of fear, reflexive modernity and social risk will be used to analyse the phenomenon. (Preferably as POSTER)

Men and Fathers - Children's place in men's lives: Childlessness among men is rising.

Jensen, An-Magritt

Dept. of Sociology and Political Science, Norwegian University of Science and Technology Trondheim, Norway

Keywords

Family, wellbeing, good childhood, children's everyday life

Men and Fathers? Children's place in men's lives:

Childlessness among men is rising. This paper explores ambivalence among men to having children in rich countries. Children delayed, reduced and avoided more among men than women. What does this tell us about children's place in men's lives?

Methodological Issues in Researching Childhood and Children's Lives and its Consequences for Child Policy

Dr. Betz, Tanja

*Arbeitsstelle Kinder- und Jugendpolitik, Deutsches Jugendinstitut e. V.
München, Deutschland*

Keywords

children as informants, child policy, Children's Surveys, reflexive childhood research

Children's Surveys are an increasingly common access to the research of children's lives and childhood.

Some childhood researchers are convinced that Children's Surveys allow to listen to children as persons of their own right. They see Children's Surveys as the direct and outspoken information of children about their life. Based on the results of the research findings a "briefed" child policy could be developed.

However, the adults' conceptions and images of children and childhood flow into childhood studies, i.e. into the conceptual considerations as well as into empirical research design, selection of indicators, method of collecting data and interpretation. The access to children and childhood has little in common with an "authentic" description - unaffected by adults - of the actual life of children. In fact, the constructions of childhood are connected with the (public) images of childhood today and the adult scientists' conceptions about "a successful life of a child". Amongst others, this constructions become obvious through the reference to concepts of children's needs, the sample and the concrete research questions.

It is essential to reflect these images, assumptions and constructions more intensively within the quantitative research process and to explore the effects of these images - in particular for specific groups of children which are of equal political relevance. This, in fact, evokes the question of how claims of child policies can be derived from these research findings.

Mobilising capitals´ Migrant children´s negotiation of their everyday lives in Irish primary schools

Devine, Dympna

Education, University College Dublin

Dublin, Ireland

Keywords

voice, Social and Cultural Capital, migrant children, agency

As a country of relatively recent immigration, Irish schools now have a considerable number of first generation immigrant children. This paper considers how such children contribute to processes of capital accumulation through their negotiation and positioning in school. Drawing on the concepts of social and cultural capital, as well as inter-generational analyses of children´s role in the structuring of everyday life, the paper highlights migrant children´s strategic orientation to their primary schooling, positioning themselves in order to maximise the exchange value from their education. Social class, gender and ethnic status were identified as significant to the strategies adopted, and how children coped with their positioning as ethnic "other" in school.

Notions of a Proper Child in Finnish Day Care

Alasuutari, Maarit

Teacher Education, Unit of Early Childhood Education, University of Tampere Tampere, Finland

Keywords

Gender, childhood conceptions, day care

Considering and respecting for the individuality of the child is one of the guiding principles of Finnish day care services. This principle is exercised, among others, in an individual educational plan that each child in day care is provided with. The plan is drafted in collaboration with the child's parent(s). The parent-practitioner discussion about the child's educational plan constitutes an arena where conceptions of child and childhood are constructed and defined. In Finland the individual plan seems also to correspond with the assessment and evaluation of the child. Consequently, the planning produces and implies conceptions of normalcy and deviance in children and childhood.

The paper is based on a qualitative research. It investigates the conceptions of a 'proper' child in Finnish day care. It examines what are the notions of an appropriate girl and a suitable boy in the institutional order of a day care center. Thus, the paper discusses the discursive space created for an ordinary child and the gendering of this space. The data consist of 33 audio-taped parent-practitioner meetings in three Finnish day care centers. The data have been transcribed verbatim and it is analysed from the perspectives of social constructionism and discourse analysis. The results reveal, among others, how the notion of a proper child is negotiated by considering the child's relationship to the practitioners. They show also that play is used as a means in defining the proper and improper conduct of a child and that it is regarded in terms of gender.

On the street: researching childhood and sexuality in Brazil.

Calaf, Priscila

Departamento de Antropologia, Universidade de Brasília, Brazil Brasília, Brazil

Keywords

Childhood, sexuality., Street kids

This paper aims to discuss childhood and sexuality. Values like freedom, keenness and bravery arouse during my fieldwork with a group of street kids in Brazil. Our considerations (mine and the street kids?) focused representations about childhood and sexuality as those who could operate such values. Reflections over representations, on the Social Sciences scenario, about street kids and the possibilities of constructing an Anthropology of Childhood (s) took part, as well as considerations on various different age categories and concepts. In this sense, I try to understand how, for the group I studied with, the perennial sexual disposition is a fundamental factor in the construction of both male and female identities in a way that the knowing- about- sex status constitutes proof and condition of being something more than a child. On the realm of sexuality as a means of acquiring a state of deeper knowledge and circulation through the "adult world", other questions are presented, aroused by the exercise of a positively valued active sexuality. In this sense, I try to present some methodological viewpoints concerning the research of "children" and childhood.

Parenting styles and family structure as risk factors of adolescents' sexual abuse

Soo, Kadri

Institute of Sociology and Social Policy, University of Tartu

Tartu, Estonia

Keywords

family structure, risk factors, sexual abuse, parenting style

The current paper aims to examine the relations between parenting styles, family structure and sexual victimisation among adolescents. The empirical data are drawn from a large international survey "The Baltic Sea Regional Study on Adolescents' Sexuality" which was carried out in Norway, Sweden, Estonia, Lithuania, Poland and Russia in 2003-2004. The survey was conducted as a paper-and-pencil survey among high school and vocational school students. The sample of present study includes altogether 12.868 young people from Norway, Sweden, Estonia, and Lithuania. The respondents were at age 17 - 19.

Binary logistic regression analysis was performed to test associations between arguments and predicting variable (being a victim) separately for each country. The results indicated that high parental closeness and providing support in the case of personal problem of a child significantly decrease the probability of sexual abuse for each country. Caring and control by parents are also significant risk factors of victimisation, however, not for each country. A remarkable result is that the respondents living by themselves have a higher risk of abuse than those who live by both parents.

In conclusion, the current paper demonstrates that deficient parental support, consideration and social network increase the minors' defencelessness and vulnerability to external dangers. Consequently, the problem of "invisible parents" essentially influences the well-being of young persons.

Particular Tendencies and Socio-Domestic Aspects of the of Juvenile Delinquency in Romania after 1989 to Nowadays

Fabian, Andrea

*Social Work, Babes-Bolyai University, Cluj-Napoca, Romania
Cluj-Napoca, Romania*

Rusu, Dan Octavian

*Social Work, Babes-Bolyai University, Cluj-Napoca, Romania
Cluj-Napoca, Romania*

Keywords

social and psychological factors, juvenile delinquency, transition period

The end of socialism, for Romania as for other countries from East-Central Europe was the end of social equality and the beginning of the appearance of new social strata, many of them showing no linkage with meritocracy. Thus, social results of the transition were massive insecurity and loss of trust. In such a context was expectable that the rate of delinquency in general, and that of juvenile delinquency in particular, will rise.

The general purpose of the research was to present the evolution of juvenile delinquency in Romania after 1989, with some of its social and psychological aspects. We use a comparative perspective: the general, Romanian framework will be compared with local situation occurred in Cluj county. The theme of the research has been studied from the domestic sociological point of view, using sociological and psychological methods. Our intention was to research the socio-domestic aspects of juvenile delinquency, as a social phenomenon, by analyzing the anti-social acts, by reporting them to the multiple aspects of maladjustment, disorganization, chaos and marginality that are existence in the society.

Beside presenting the existent information and data regarding this phenomenon, this paper contains also the results of the made analysis regarding the dynamic and tendencies of general and juvenile delinquency in the country, in the transition period, as well as the results of the made analysis regarding the dynamic and the tendencies of juvenile delinquency in Cluj county during 1989-2006. The presentation is based on an extensive study of 420 delinquent juveniles (and 420 non-delinquents youths for the control group), whose data on family situation, education, age, etc were analyzed and the youngsters were also tested with psychological tests. The results were compared with previous research data on Romanian population. An integrative model was tested, in order to analyze the social and cognitive determinants of delinquency.

Photo-interviewing: Usefulness in Understanding a Migrant Child's Perspective of his Culture

Dar, Anandini

Childhood Studies, Rutgers University Camden, United States of America

Keywords

methodology, Migration, culture, children, photo-elicitation

Photo-interviewing: Usefulness in understanding a migrant child's perspective of his culture

This paper explores photo-elicitation and auto-driven interview as significant tools in social research with children. Scholarship on the use of images in child research generally concur that photo-elicitation and auto-driving work well in removing inhibitions during the interview, help maintain lasting records in a non-verbal format and provide avenues for understanding the child's perspective. Many advocates of this methodology and approach emphasize how the use of images temper the imbalance of power between (adult) researcher and child and thereby addresses the interpersonal dynamics that often impinge negatively on the research relationships and contexts.

Drawing upon a case study of Raj, a 10-year-old, first generation South Asian boy, I argue and demonstrate that in addition to the benefits mentioned above photo-elicitation/autodriving also engender exploration of complex concepts like children's identity, culture and identification in the context of migration with the child. I argue that Raj's identification with his culture(s) and daily activities as presented pictorially assists in grasping the multiplicity of cultural identities that he embodies, experiences and performs. Indeed, these methods figure in his articulation of these various identities. I also address issues of privacy and re-presentation of photographs as evidence, despite consent and assent of the child and his parents, as concerns that need to be kept in mind while using this methodology.

Portraits of children from Europe in the Portuguese press

Oliveira, Maria Madalena

*Department of Communication Sciences, University of Minho
Braga, Portugal*

Pereira, Sara

*Department of Communication Sciences, University of Minho
Braga, Portugal*

Martins, Paula Cristina

*Departamento de Ciências da Educação da Criança, University of Minho
Braga, Portugal*

Ramos, Rui

*Departamento de Ciências Integradas e Língua Materna, University of Minho
Braga, Portugal*

Keywords

Media, Journalism, children at risk, photojournalism

More concerned with subjects affecting the social order than they would have been in other times, newspapers today give a special emphasis to subjects concerning childhood. At least, since the Convention on the Rights of the Child (UNICEF), various domains of social life, like health, education and justice, reclaimed reiterated attentions on the development of the human being in its first years of life.

More aware, thus, of thematic concerning the child, journalists have been contributing so that for childhood to become a visible issue in the public space. In addition, the visibility of judicial affairs is spreading and becoming truthfully mediated, especially when the topic is children at risk. In fact, child maltreatment is today, probably one of the most frequent topics of news on children, at least in Portugal.

Considering the universality of this issue all over the World, we seek, for this paper, to know when European children become items of news. For which reasons does childhood gain an informative potential in transnational terms?

To answer these questions we are analysing all 2008 editions of four Portuguese newspapers in terms of textual information as well as of photojournalistic reports. Selected daily by a lexical criterion, news reports are classified in a database for content analysis. We aim so to estimate the frequency of stories concerning children, as well as to analyse the story topics and the geographical origin of the issue or of the happening. We will also be able to examine for which topics newspapers use photographs and when the reports come in the front page.

This research is part of a project we are carrying out at University of Minho under the title 'Representations of childhood? media discourses on children at risk?'. Focused on the characterisation of news on children, the identification of actions, agents and contexts considered to be of risk, this project searches for the recognition of trends and differences in media coverage and the examination of how risk constitutes a significant factor in visual options.

Portuguese migrants in Germany: how deceiving can be integration?

Nunes, Ângela

*Sociologia, CIES/ISCTE e Instituto de Educação da Univ. do Minho
Lisboa, Portugal*

Keywords

Migration, children, anthropology, minorities, Portuguese

This paper presents partial results from an on-going project focused on Portuguese migrants in Germany, which aims at observing the impact migratory process has on children's lives, how do they (re)construct identity, understand and respond to diversity and change, and what role do they play in family integration in the host society and in maintaining links with their home country, language and culture. Portuguese are Europeans, mainly Christians, apparently do not disturb public order and are considered 'good migrants'. Yet, 'mother' tongue is quickly forgotten and school achievement is low, or, if successful, they tend to quit identifying themselves as Portuguese. Are these stereotypes or do they correspond to statistics? Combining anthropological theoretic and methodological approaches with the interdisciplinary Childhood Studies this paper calls attention to the need of long term empirical research and proximity with communities and their children, procedures which are largely limited by present data protection rules. Quantitative information provided by governmental surveys is not enough to picture reality, especially not the one of children belonging to less visible groups, either because they are in small number when compared to others, do not belong to 'mainstream' research or do not have their particular situation clearly considered by public policies.

Positioning the Criminal Child - Relational Dynamics of Norm-breaking and Societal Reactions

Pekkarinen, Elina

*Department of Social Policy Studies, University of Helsinki
Helsinki, Finland*

Keywords

delinquency, child welfare, critical realism

Crimes committed by children often rise strong societal reactions. In Finland children that persistently offend, have traditionally been directed to child protection welfare, which aims at not only protecting, but also upbringing of these children. This presentation is based on a dissertation research, which aims at describing how the communities and institutions participate in the process of a child becoming labelled as deviant. How is a child who persistently offends, positioned by the communities and institutions surrounding his every-day life? What kind of societal reactions are directed to, and social structures constructed around, these children? How does the child's history reflect the institutional atmosphere of the era?

The theoretical framework of the study is based on Roy Bhaskar's critical realism and Edwin M. Lemert's societal reaction theory. The aim of merging these two theoretical viewpoints is to formulate a structural, relational and dynamic way of defining the positioning of the children in the differing communal and institutional settings with which they are involved. Thus the analysis illuminates the relational dynamics of the different mechanisms that affect the positioning the child. The research data consists of individual children's social work case-files, which are theoretically selected from the social welfare agency's archives. The empirical analysis is based on Derek Layder's model of adaptive theory.

This presentation aims at describing the theoretical framework of the study through an individual case-study of Ali, an immigrant boy involved with the child protection welfare in the early 2000's. The case-study describes and theorises, how Ali's position gradually shifts from the one of a traumatized child, to the one of a violent and feared other in the settings of his every-day life.

Professionals as key holders: Children with communication difficulties and their right to participate in everyday life activities and play in Norwegian kindergarten

Aamot, Ingvild

Norwegian University of Science and Technology, Department of Social Work and Health Science, Queen Maud's College Trondheim, Norway

Keywords

power, participation, everyday life, children, disability

Main focus in the study is on children with so-called social disabilities (aged 3-6) in ordinary day-care centres in Norway and their possibilities to participate, be heard and make decisions within everyday life and play. The aim of this ethnographic study is to understand what kind of power mechanisms occur when children with social disabilities interact with adults and mainstream children in Norwegian day-care centres, emphasizing on participation, children's own voices and decision making. The study is based upon the new model of children and childhood and the relational model of disability and is anchored in CRC (Convention on the Rights of the Child) and CRPD (UN Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities). CRC increased focus on children's participation and it is being referred to as the starting point of children's participation into Norwegian legal framework, and led way to The Kindergarten Act (2005) and National Framework Plan (2006). The process of implementing CRPD in Norwegian law is an ongoing process and a result of a prevailing discourse on disability. Focus group interviews with staff members, child interviews as well as field notes give empirical data for the analyses. The staff's interpretation of the term participation is often reduced to represent children's rights to make practical decisions here-and-now. This study shows that day-care staff has power to define how, when and in which way the children with social disability are able to participate, influence and make own decisions in play activities. By own personal involvement and interaction in play with social disabled children the staff hold the key to participation and social access to mainstream children's activities. They can also close the door to interaction and participation by interruptions, focus shifts or 'training'. Observed practice and fragments from interviews will be discussed in light of Bourdieu's terminology and perspectives.

Reading as a Factor of Primary Socialization of Modern Russian Children

Kolosova, Elena

*sociological department, Russian State University for the Humanities
Moscow, Russia*

Keywords

book preference, reading, socialization, Childhood, content-analysis

The article deals with the characteristics of children's reading as a factor of primary socialization of modern pupils and based on armchair research and content-analysis of text-books and encyclopedias for pupils. The structure of book preferences of modern pupils, found during the research, is extremely significant from socialization point of view. Gender stereotypes about professions, found in children's books, could be put down to two groups of stereotypes – connected with family roles and professional according to sex. And another group related to the differences of the content of each work. Currently, there are trends to weakening of these stereotypes, in spite of their seeming stability. As the developing literature together with text-books play significant role in the primary gender and professional socialization of pupils, they need examination of language and illustration to undergo, in order that children could receive full notion about life, roles and relationship between sexes and about people's professional activities. A lot of factors influence on choosing some kind of book, one of which is children education. It means both family upbringing and school education, as two main agents of socialization. Finally, the author of the article divides the process of socialization into three interrelated actions – education, self-education and bringing up, that influence on the versatile development of the child's personality.

Reconceptualising Children's Empowerment in Early Years Daycare Provision: A Comparative Analysis

Pringle, Keith

SOCIOLOGY, UPPSALA UNIVERSITY
Uppsala, SWEDEN

Näsman, Elisabet

SOCIOLOGY, UPPSALA UNIVERSITY
Uppsala, SWEDEN

Keywords

empowerment, power, daycare

Whilst there has been less focus in childhood studies on early years (3-5 years) compared with older children, there is also growing policy/research awareness that children's early years experiences may have profound consequences in terms of later power resources (including action patterns, understandings of the world). This paper outlines a proposed European research project focusing on empowerment of children in day care institutions in 4 strategically-chosen countries: Czech Republic, Norway, Sweden, UK. The study explores children's situation in terms of gender, ethnicity, class within an intersectional/foucauldian/ postmodern feminist/post-colonial perspective where age relations between adults and children represent a pivotal power dimension. The empirical focus is on how policy documentation, parents, practitioners and children define empowerment regarding children in day care institutions rather than on our own definition(s). Centrally, we focus on how children come to understand themselves and one another as gendered/classed/'raced' and aged subjects. Thus, we can interrogate the dissonance and or/overlap with adult constructions of 'the empowered child' - what that looks like and how adults facilitate or (wittingly or unwittingly) compromise children's sense of empowerment within specific contexts. Finally, and more broadly, this study will also contribute to more nuanced models for understanding comparative welfare formations.

Reflecting on research in schools: decisions and dilemmas

Johnson, Peter

School of Sociology, Social Policy and Social Work, Queen's University, Belfast Belfast, Northern Ireland

Keywords

methodology, school, peers, adult gaze

Much childhood research is conducted within a school environment, largely because of the readily available stream of potential participants which are lying in wait. However, the heavily adult-structured nature of the institution is often seen as exerting a negative influence over the research process ? an influence which any researcher must seek to overcome. This paper aims to reflect on some of the problems and pitfalls involved in researching underage alcohol consumption within twelve different Northern Irish schools. The impact of adult gatekeepers, the physicality of the research location and pre-existing assumptions of both teachers and pupils all impinge upon the data produced. However, the paper proceeds to argue that attempts to recondition the institutional environment do not necessarily engender data which better approximates to ?reality?. Crucially, the impact of the adult gaze does not start and finish at the school gates. Following on from this, the paper stresses that while the adult-child division is certainly important, this must not detract from the peer identity battles which also shape the attitudes and responses of research subjects. The concluding argument suggests that the tendency to regard the school as a setting which presents unique challenges neglects the fact that, in Goffmanian terms, different fronts and roles are adopted in contrasting situations. As such, regardless of the age of the research participants or the location of the data collection, access to an individual's backstage self will more than likely remain elusive.

Reflections of a child

Van den Cruyce, Nele

Communicatiewetenschappen LW SCOM CEMESO, Vrije Universiteit Brussel Elsene, Belgium

Keywords

Health, Childhood, history, image, discourse

Throughout the last century, the conception of childhood has changed significantly. Children evolved from miniature adults working in factories to more or less autonomous actors with rights of their own. This transformation entailed an alteration in the way that society perceives childhood and in the way that people think children should be handled or cared for. Because of this evolution, the image of the average, healthy child has evolved.

This process has been documented on a macro level, cf. industrialization and the changes on the family level. The transformation of the societal discourse about childhood and the evolution in the way that children and childhood are portrayed, is overshadowed by these larger study domains, but nevertheless sociologically equally interesting. After all, social scientists are increasingly treating children and childhood as specific research domains. In an attempt to contribute to this evolution in sociology, this paper focuses on exactly these transformations in the Dutch-speaking part of Belgium from 1950 to 2000. The main research goal is to unravel the historical, societal discourse regarding a healthy childhood and to find out how the average, healthy child was portrayed during this time period as part of the visual sediment of this discourse.

A methodological instrument based on visual content analysis and more specifically rhetorical analysis was created in order to statistically analyze advertisements, containing information about the appearance of children and the societal concerns surrounding them. Because of the typical female bias concerning the topic of childhood, the magazine Libelle, being the earliest women's magazine publishing in Belgium, was chosen as the data source for this research. A representative sample of advertisements was constructed for each decade, so that the research results could be historically compared.

The societal health discourse has had many faces throughout the investigated time period and by that the reflections of the average, healthy child indeed altered too. With attention to the larger socio-economical and cultural context, the major transformations in the imaging of the average, healthy child and childhood are marked out.

Socializing relations in the family: A comparative study of domestic texts from Norway and China

Wærdahl, Randi

*Department of Sociology and Human Geography, University of Oslo
Oslo, Norway*

Haldar, Marit

*Faculty of Social Sciences, Oslo University College
Oslo, Norway*

Keywords

socialization, comparison, family relations, text

Socializing relations in the family: A comparative study of domestic texts from Norway and China

Since the school reform of 1997 Norwegian schools have used teddy bears and 'teddy-diaries' as a common tool to bridge the transition between family and school for pupils entering school for the very first year. The entries in the written diary usually in the form of stories from the teddy bear's experiences in the children's home are shared with the others in class, as well as with the school and other families who receive the book. As a text material for research teddy diaries represent highly normatively saturated domestic stories from families with six-year-olds. In addition to ten diaries retrieved from Norwegian schools, written in 2006 and 2007, we have initiated a process where ten teddy diaries were produced in first grade classes in six schools in the centre of Beijing, China, in the fall of 2006. Each diary contains approximately 25 entries. We have approximately 250 entries to analyze from each country. In this paper we will focus on the roles, status and tasks given to the visiting teddy bear in the two country settings, and the qualities and qualifications that are inscribed into the stuffed animal. MCD as a tool for analysis can shed light on a child's internal and relational position within a family, and how the socializing agency of the family is ingrained in these relations. The presence of the teddy bear is a catalyst for these domestic stories, as the children tell their story to the teddy as well as give voice to the teddy's own story. A comparison will reveal a cultural difference in internal family relations, providing different settings for socialization practices.

Talking about children's strategies to show resistance to teachers in preschool

Markström, Ann-Marie

Department of Social and Welfare Studies, ISV Norrköping, Sweden

Keywords

preschool, parent-teacher conference, children's resistance, social order

This paper highlights the face-to-face interactions between parents and teachers in parent-teacher conferences in the Swedish preschool and how the teachers talk about the behaviours and characters those not are appropriate and not expected for children in a preschool setting.

The focus of the paper concerns how teachers talk about the children's resistance to the social order in preschool and especially how children show resistance to the teachers.

The empirical material consists of twenty audio-taped conferences included in a larger study of parent-teacher conferences in a Swedish preschool setting. The analysis reveals five different strategies concerning the talk about childrens' resistance to the practitioners and the institution: physical resistance, emotional resistance, social resistance, verbal resistance and resistance through repulsion and avoidance. In addition, the article discusses what is expected of a "normal" preschool child.

The Dimensions of Child Labour in Agriculture and its place in the Work Life in Turkey

Gulcubuk, Bulent

*Dept. of Agricultural Economics, Ankara University Faculty of Agriculture
Ankara, TURKEY*

Keywords

child labour, Agricultural labour, Child labour in agriculture, Seasonal labour, Migrant labour

As it is seen in the whole world, child labour is an important problem also for Turkey. Growing up next generations in a healthy manner and happy is one of the most important prerequisites to become a contemporary society. Due to their circumstances children, who work in agriculture have a specific place in child labour. First these children are in the first place regarding disadvantaged groups in terms of working and life conditions, relations with society, education and health problems. Families, who have small land and/or no land subsequently do not get adequate income, look for work via moving to regions where more agricultural works are available as seasonal workers to maintain and work. When families, who are seasonal agricultural workers, move to other regions to work, they also take their children with them because of the economic and social conditions. Therefore children start to work in agricultural works, which are not suitable for their age, to make contributions to family economy. Children, who are in agricultural works, have more than 40% in the total child labour in Turkey. These children work mainly in hoe and harvest related with cotton, nut, citrus, sugar beet, tobacco agriculture in different parts of Turkey. Children Most of the children, who work in agricultural works and in the worst conditions, are under 15 that are not suitable to work according to ILO Conventions and for such works. These children, who are deprived of education opportunities and do not continue or start their education live particularly in the Southeast and East Anatolia Regions. In addition, these children live 4-7 months period in a place different from their original living space. They live in tents without having basic necessities. From the principle of Social State Law principle the tools of 'special social policy' should be applied to these children who are the most desperate group regarding the future.

The intersection of children's rights and journalism - an analysis of the Portuguese scenario

Marôpo, Lidia

*Ciências da Comunicação, Universidade Nova de Lisboa/Universidade de Fortaleza
Lisboa, Portugal*

Keywords

children's rights, Journalism, identity, news representation, subjects of rights.

A new identity construction, like children as subjects of rights, takes time to be socially legitimate and to be converted into generalized social practice. Almost two decades after been approved the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child (CRC) - an International document valid as Law -, the task of fully implementation is still in its beginning.

The media, the main and sometimes the only way to diffuse debates about the social world, is a fundamental actor in this process of identity construction, specially the news media. As an essential tool of democracy, it has an important role to promote and protect the Human Rights, including the children's Rights, and the CRC is an instrument for this change. Three articles in that document refer directly to the media and points towards more journalistic attention to childhood issues, to a greater children's participation as source of information and to the preservation of their privacy in topics that affect their interests.

The goal of this article is to improve the understanding about the intersection of journalism and children's rights. How has this recent perspective been framed by the news media? What are the patterns and trends on children issues coverage? What is the nature of media' practices? How are the journalists and news sources perception of this debate? To answer those questions, this article analyses the journalistic production in Portugal, one of the first countries to ratify the CRC, and some of the findings of in depth interviews with Portuguese journalists and individuals used by the media as sources of information.

The Place of Non-Parental Adults in Children's Out of School Lives

Milne, Sue

Centre for Research on Families and Relationships, University of Edinburgh Edinburgh, Scotland

Keywords

child-adult, relations, relationships, neighbourhood, 'public workers'

Data from a recent study of child-adult relations and relationships in relatively deprived areas of a Scottish city suggest that "relationships" with individual adults, other than with parents, were not particularly important to the children. With a few exceptions, they did not seek out such adults and generally indicated a preference for spending time with other children. However, knowing and being able to identify with adults in the neighbourhood, through familial and familiar connections, was very important to children's sense of self and to their feelings of belonging to a family and within a locality.

When moving beyond their neighbourhood without adult accompaniment, to visit swimming pools, cinemas, and retail facilities, the children had opportunities to observe and experience contacts with range of "unknown" adults, and with "public workers". This experientially confirmed their conceptualisations of adults as a separate social group occupying a higher status than children.

The study took place in the context of concern about distance between child and adult worlds generating negative stereotypes and distrust between the two social groups and a specific interest in children's perspectives. A multi-stage, multi-method study was undertaken with children aged 10/11 years living in the relatively deprived, "Social Inclusion Partnership" (SIP), areas of a Scottish city. Ethnographic participation was undertaken with Year 6 children in one school, followed by paired and individual interviews with 17 of these children. A survey was then conducted with 375 children in primary schools across the SIP areas.

The relationship between children's patterns of media usage and their perceptions of the European Union

Slavtcheva-Petkova, Vera

Social Sciences, Loughborough University Loughborough, United Kingdom

Keywords

European Union, children, Media, identity

The paper will present the preliminary findings of a pilot study on the relationship between children's patterns of media usage and their perceptions of and identifications with Europe and the European Union (EU).

Two main issues are explored. First, the general patterns of media usages of children as self-reported and reported by their parents are outlined. Media are said to be one of the four main agents in the socialization process and especially important in agenda-setting on topics people do not know much about. Previous studies on identity formation in childhood clearly emphasise the important role media play in the process but few (if any) actually explore the subject. Moreover, in the United Kingdom the majority of newspapers is overtly Eurosceptic, and attempt to play a key role in influencing the government's position and public opinion on key EU-related issues.

Second, the study reveals whether and what children and their parents know about the EU, how they feel about their country's membership, European people and member states. Another major finding is how salient the European identity is in comparison with other identities in childhood, such as gender, age, nationality, ethnicity, human-ness. The study also compares the relationship between children and their parents' media usages and between their knowledge of and identification with Europe and the European Union. Finally, the paper addresses key methodological issues raised by the pilot study.

The study is a first step of a research aimed at establishing the relationship between dominant media representations and children's perceptions of the EU.

The right to work as an "unwritten right" of children

Liebel, Manfred

*Institute for Global Education and International Studies, International Academy (INA) at the Free University Berlin
Berlin, Germany*

Keywords

working children, child labour, children's rights

The paper explains how the right to work - not codified in the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child - is conceptualized and justified by working children's organizations. The study is based on a discourse analysis of their communications. In these documents, a variety of arguments for the right to work can be found. Reference is made to the children's experiences, which reach from exploitation and humiliation by employers to criminalization and persecution as consequence of laws and measures against child labour. Centred on children's perspectives, the paper questions traditional conceptions of child protection and emphasizes the capacity of working children to create rights of their own and to implement them by organizing themselves. Children's rights are understood as a result of social interactions and questioning of adult-centred legislation. What needs to be taken into account are the own visions and efforts of children to create rights according to their concrete life experiences, and their specific interests.

Trust and power in social and pedagogical work with children: Theorizing (adult's facilitation of) children's participation and citizenship

Warming, Hanne

*Department of Society and Globalisation, Roskilde University
Roskilde, Denmark*

Keywords

social and pedagogical work with children, citizenship, participation, power, trust

This paper theorizes the relation between trust, power, participation and citizenship in social and pedagogical work with children. The point of departure is acknowledgement of participation as a fundamental right of citizenship, combined with the empirical observation, that children - in distinct ways - narrate (mis)trust, (dis)empowerment, and degrees of participation and citizenship as interconnected.

Five theoretical approaches are examined for their contribution to a theoretical understanding of the relation between trust, power, participation and citizenship in social and pedagogical work with children, namely Gerald Delanty's conceptualisation of citizenship, Niklas Luhmann's conceptualisation of trust, Axel Honneth's theory of recognition, Pierre Bourdieu's theory of practice and Michel Foucault's conceptualisation of neo-liberal governance, i.e. governmentality. It is suggested that these theories, together - though from one perspective mutual complementary - constitute a complex and comprehensive theorizing of the relation between trust, power, participation and citizenship in social and pedagogical work with children, as these theories together offers a framework for critical analysis of trust and power in adult's facilitation of children's participation and citizenship, addressing different levels of participation (cf. Hart's ladder of participation) and various dimensions of citizenship.

Trust, control and separation in children's after-school care

Strandell, Harriet

*Department of Sociology, University of Helsinki
Helsinki, Finland*

Keywords

after-school time, trust, discourses, CONTROL, practices

In Finland, young (6-9 year old) school children's after-school time has come under state legislation and regulation relatively late, in international comparison. The implementation of the Act on school children's morning and after-school care in 2004 reflects changes in welfare politics and systems of governance starting in the 1990s, changes which foreground productivity, efficiency and flexibility also in public administration, social inclusion, and the need to "invest" in children. The implementation was surrounded by public discourses portraying the risks children run into when spending after-school time in and around their homes and forcefully arguing for a reorganisation of children's after-school time.

In this paper, the social construction of children's after-school time will be discussed as the interplay between discourses, institutional practices and material conditions shaping children's experiences and agencies in after-school care. The "after-school case" is discussed as a reflection of, and a way of dealing with cultural ambivalence resulting from the emergence of new arenas for children's agency. These arenas are opened up by contemporary economic, cultural and technological changes, resulting as well in new uncertainties about the distinctions between children and adults and about children's proper place in society. How these uncertainties are approached and dealt with in the after-school case will be discussed in terms of (diminishing) trust and new forms of social control aimed at minimising risk in children's everyday life and maximising children's safety and social inclusion. The concepts of "separability" and "separation", and the difference between them (Nick Lee), open up a critical perspective on these discursive constructions and institutional practices framing after-school activities.

Urban Spaces and Childhood: Urban Contexts of Childhood Socialization in Lisbon Metropolitan Area

Orta Jacinto, Fátima

Master's degree student in Urban and Environmental Regeneration, School of Architecture - Technical University of Lisbon

PORTUGAL, <http://www.fa.utl.pt>

Keywords

socialization, safety, Childhood, autonomy, urban spaces

Integrating childhood sociology and urbanism in a theoretical-empirical way, this research (i) examines children's living experience in five economically, culturally and spatially contrasting urban environments of Lisbon Metropolitan Area and (ii) aims to outline urban planning and design solutions that allow a reinforcement of children's autonomy in their specific urban settings. On the first stage, we use a school-based survey of primary schools in five urban neighbourhoods: Brandoa, Encarnação, Fernão Ferro, Prazeres e Telheiras (as defined by the school areas). This survey is based on a self-answer questionnaire applied to 247 children attending 2nd, 3rd and 4th school year and 180 parents, which tries to grasp both the objective and subjective dimensions of children's daily urban experience, autonomy and safety. From the general conditions of urban experience, a special attention is given to children's use of urban public space and facilities, their spatial mobility to and from school and their overall satisfaction with the neighbourhood, either with the aspects related to the daily experience and usage of urban spaces, or their satisfaction with social relationships connected to the activities performed in the neighbourhood. For the evaluation of conditions of urban autonomy and safety we use a questionnaire, focusing on parent's and children's perception of the 'dangers' of urban life. On the second stage, the results of the survey are statistically analysed and compared by neighbourhood, and correlated to specific 'urban metrical indicators', as a result of other actual researches, such as population density, areas of public, semi-private and private open spaces, with and without everyday social interaction, dimensions and areas of sidewalks and walkways, etc. The central question is whether the structural properties of local urban space form a vital dimension of childhood socialization and, if so, to which of these properties we should pay more attention when planning and designing our cities. The statistical results indicate significant variations by neighbourhood in how children use urban public space in Lisbon Metropolitan Area, that we can also confirm in correlations between the urban indicators, children's autonomy of movements and their perception of fear related to the urban public spaces.

Us and Them - Teenagers Constructions of National Identity in Cyprus

Leonard, Madeleine

Sociology, Queens University Belfast Belfast, N. Ireland

Keywords

teenagers, Cyprus, national identity

This paper is concerned with exploring children's constructions of national identity in Cyprus. It is based on focus group interviews with 20 Turkish Cypriot and 20 Greek Cypriot children aged between 13-15 years of age and the research was carried out during 2008-2009. This focus is timely given recent political developments in Cyprus including the accession of the South to the European Union, the 2003 opening up of the border crossings, the stalemate around the Annan Plan and the increasing national and international pressure to find a solution. Despite a burgeoning research focus on Cyprus, the attitudes of children to the future political status of the island remains muted. Children are often portrayed as passive victims of adult conflicts and their own experiences and perceptions are often sidelined by adult focused research agendas. Yet since children have lived their childhoods within a social, cultural and historical framework produced by the 1974 division of the island, research within this context could provide a useful understanding of how children construct and negotiate their national identities within a constantly shifting wider world during a particular stage of the life cycle. National identity is considered here as a social identity that acts on the individual along with other social identities such as gender and age. Within politically contested societies, the salience of national identity is likely to be intense. While socialisation is likely to play a major role in the formation of national identity,, this obscures the extent to which children play an active role in constructing a multiplicity of childhoods. The paper will explore the capacity and willingness of children to engage in a critical reflection of constructions of national identity and will explore their perceptions of how national identity is transmitted, perpetuated and challenged across generations.

Using the Internet to give children a voice: an online survey of 10 and 11 year old children in Northern Ireland

Lloyd, Katrina

School of Sociology, Social Policy and Social Work, Queen's University Belfast Belfast, Northern Ireland

Keywords

survey, participation, internet, children

Over the years, researchers from different disciplines have utilised a wide variety of research methods to assess the views of children. Particularly common are qualitative methods such as focus groups and small group discussions. Much rarer are large-scale quantitative surveys, which are a valuable way of comparing data from across different age-groups, countries and over time. One reason for this may be the high cost involved in carrying out face-to-face interviews. Additional factors may be that such surveys are also time-consuming and difficult to coordinate. Postal surveys may be particularly unsuitable for children due to the level of reading skills required, as well as the difficulty in acquiring a representative sample. Cognizant of the difficulties of carrying out surveys with children, a number of researchers have used computer-assisted self-administered interviews (CASI) in schools. CASI enables questionnaires to be child-friendly and fun to complete. The main drawback with this method of carrying out survey research with children is the issue of confidentiality, since responses are held on a database located on the computer. One way of overcoming this is to use the Internet; the respondent's answers are entered into a remote database accessible only to the researchers which offers reassurance to the children that their friends and teachers cannot see their responses. To test the feasibility of carrying out a large survey using the Internet in schools, we carried out a pilot survey of the views of children in Northern Ireland in June 2008. There were two notable innovations; firstly, it was a survey of all Primary 7 children (age 10 and 11 years), and secondly, it used the Internet to gather the information which has not been done on this scale before. The paper will discuss how well this method for collecting information from children worked in practice, the quality of information received and the response rate achieved. It will also consider lessons learned for future KLT surveys and for other surveys with children using a similar methodology.

Voice and Exit in Children's Lives

Suenker, Heinz

Department of Educational and Social Sciences, Wuppertal University Wuppertal, Germany

Keywords

Social Development, children's rights, Politics of Childhood, DEMOCRACY

Against the background of Hirschman's concepts of voice and exit in social analysis and the analysis of agency the paper deals with the question which approaches in the field of politics of childhood and realisations of children's rights in their lives support a democratisation of all areas of society (including everyday life and institutions). This is relevant to discussing the question of what allows real social development, i.e. developments based on reflexivity, competence of social judgement and action competence of every citizen.

In the end the paper tries to mediate debates and research results in the fields politics of childhood and politics of education aiming at a concept of education (Bildung) to emancipate the one and the all.

Vulnerable children in family law proceedings: professionals' approaches and children's strategies

Eriksson, Maria

Department of Sociology, Uppsala University

Uppsala, Sweden

Keywords

violence, participation, family law

Drawing upon a Swedish study of vulnerable children as social actors in family law proceedings this paper explores family law investigators' approaches to children, and children's strategies in encounters with these professionals as well as the investigation process as a whole. The discussion is based upon thematically structured interviews with children whose father has been violent to their mother. The different kinds of investigator approaches reconstructed from the children's narratives span from an approach enabling a high degree of participation, to one excluding the child from participation; and from an emphatic and child-oriented approach to a distant, adult-oriented one positioning the child as a "disqualified adult". Children's strategies span from accepting the way they are included- or not included - in the process to open protest and attempts to achieve a higher degree of participation. The child informants' descriptions of themselves as unwilling, unavailable, or openly protesting, tend to coincide with the position as "disqualified adult": to get neither influence over the investigation process nor care and empathy from the professionals thus seems to be the most problematic position from children's point of view. As regards children's experiences of violence these have rarely been a topic for dialogue between child and investigator. The children have mainly been approached as "protected victims", "invisible victims" or even "unprotected victims" as is the case when the children's own victimisation has become visible to investigators but they are left without protection. This sample of interviews suggests that the most challenging task for investigators in family law proceedings may be to make children's vulnerable position visible and at the same time offer them a high degree of participation, that is: the challenge is to approach children as simultaneously victims and actors.

What do children and young people mean by "participation", and why do they do it?

Thomas, Nigel

School of Social Work, University of Central Lancashire Preston, UK

Keywords

participation, agency, intergenerational

The proposed paper forms part of an ongoing inquiry into ways of understanding children and young people's participation. This particular paper is based on ethnographic research with several formal and informal groups of children and young people in England and Wales. The paper will draw on a combination of observation, participant observation, interview and survey data, to explore children and young people's conceptions of participation and their motivation to take part in different projects and organisations. The consequent analysis aims to put these different understandings in the context of (a) the social backgrounds and the lives of young people and (b) sociological theories of structure, agency and intergenerational relations.

working vulnerability. Agency of caring children and children's rights

Wihstutz, Anne , Germany

Philosophical Faculty III Education, Martin-Luther-University Halle (Saale) Germany, <http://www.philfak3.uni-halle.de/>

Keywords

young carers, children's rights, vulnerability, agency, strategies

Interdependent relationships between children and parents, siblings and other kin have not been a central issue in the discourse of modern childhood in Europe. The focus was set on the individual child as dependent on his or her parents. With the new paradigm in childhood studies and the view on children as social actors, children's agency and their active participation in social relationships have been subject to a growing number of empirical studies. The situation of children involved in regular and substantive care of their (chronically) ill or disabled parent/s has been of special interest to UK scholars of childhood. Young Carers have since then been included in the Children Act 1989, in the Carers (Recognition and Services) Act and in the Carers and Disabled Children Act. Social and Political Intervention is based on the concept of children's vulnerability. Young carers are considered 'children in need' and therefore especially vulnerable.

Based on a recently released empirical study on children and adolescents in care for their ill or disabled parents in Germany (Metzing 2007) I discuss children's experience of interdependence in view of the discourse of a 'good childhood'. The paper focusses on structural (e.g. legal) constraints to children's agency and on strategies children develop against the background of children's rights discourse and the notion of 'vulnerability of children'. Special emphasis is put on social-networkings and kin- and family understandings by children. Finally I ask in how far social-political programmes support caring children's agency and participation as social citizen.

Young workers risk perception: exploring risks faced by young children at work

Anderson, Seonaid

School of Social Sciences, University of the West of Scotland Paisley, Scotland

McKechnie, Jim

School of Social Sciences, University of West of Scotland Paisley, Scotland

Hobbs, Sandy

School of Social Sciences, University of West of Scotland Paisley, Scotland

Keywords

Risk, children, work, accidents

Child work in Britain is an issue given little attention and often treated as something from Britain's historical past. However, recent research has demonstrated that most adolescents work while still attending school. Such a majority experience is worthy of attention, with a view to clarifying the possible costs and benefits to the young people working. One such cost is the accidents and injuries young workers sustain in their first experiences of work. Previous research has found that adolescent workers are more likely to experience accidents than adult workers. Adolescents' risk taking behaviour and perception of risk have been examined in other areas such as drug and alcohol use, sexual activity and driving behaviour. In this paper, the consideration of adolescent risk taking and risk perception is extended to their employment. The piloting of a new method of recording adolescents' perception of risk in relation to their part time jobs is discussed. A previously created risk perception card sort method for eliciting risk perception is examined in light of its transformation into a paper and pencil version. The results of applying this version are discussed with respect to issues such as gender, adolescent development and liability to accidents.

«Here it's like in a family». Children's everyday life between care, fun and control in spaces for children

Satta, Caterina

Department of Sociology, University of Padua

Pisa, Italy

Keywords

everyday life, Child-Adult relations, Children's spaces, Representations of Childhood, Care-Control

My contribution aims to explore children's everyday life in children's everyday spaces focusing on three peculiar educational settings: a residential childcare centre (Children's House), a quarter based Toy Library and a child play area inside a paediatric hospital. Both settings are made and represented as ideal places in giving a "proper care" to children situated, by adults, on different levels of an imaginary scale of needs. The first one to children in need of a familiar environment where to live, the second one to children in need of places for playing freely and the last one to those in need of play for recover.

Moving around these different childhood's landscapes the study, based on an ethnographic research, aims to analyse the different representations of childhood constructed inside these spaces by diverse child-adult relations. Despite their different goals and functions what seems to keep constant among these spaces is the shape taken by child-adult relations as an educative relation with soft and invisible power disparity between children and adults. Through different frames (education, play and care) children and carers contribute in the construction and re-construction of a contemporary Italian childhood where an important role is still played by the images of the family and the familiar relations as a powerful model in the construction of a "good" childhood. On the other side the public space is constructed as unsafe and dangerous compared with the private one. But, which kind of relation do they evocate when they speak of a familiar model? Based on which dimension?

The paper aims to deconstruct some of the elements composing this Italian childhood and to reveal some of his assumptions related to the traditional representations of the "child in need" and to the specular one of an adult in charge of its care.

RN05

Sociology of Consumption

"It's more than just the food itself": Expectations and intermediation in the field of eating out

Dulsrud, Arne

*SIFO, National Institute of Consumer Research
Oslo, Norway*

Vramo, Lill

*SIFO, National Institute of Consumer Research
Oslo, Norway*

Keywords

eating out, convention theory, innovation, standards

By applying the field of eating out as a point of departure, this paper investigates the interface between consumer expectations and quality of service offered by suppliers. Eating out is an arena characterized by consumers often having vague and contradictory expectations, while the service offered by suppliers often lack predictable standards relating consumer expectations to experienced quality. In this respect eating out challenges the communication process (or the lack of communication) taking place between consumers and suppliers in the market place.

Relying on qualitative interviews with consumers, we explore how they understand and conceptualize eating places as social spaces. Do consumers' wishes, values and objectives correspond with the design and service of the eating place? Are there tensions between them or are they directly at variance? This discussion may be crucial not only for those who formulate concepts for eating out, but also for the study of standards and conventions regulating the interaction between consumers and suppliers under circumstances of ambiguity. We apply convention theory and regard the interface between consumers and suppliers as series of negotiation processes that takes place around expectations, experience and social function. This approach relies on the assumption that all production of goods and services presupposes a common "language" that organise and coordinate expectations between suppliers and customers. We explore the interface between consumers and suppliers in terms of time, price, socialising and experience. Based on these dimensions, we analyse eating out as "spheres of possibilities". Our discussion partly supplements and partly extends existing theories of convention.

"What are we to do with new affluence?" The making of Tapiola garden city in the postwar Finland

Pantzar, Mika

*Dept. of marketing and management, Helsinki School of Economics
Helsinki, Finland*

Keywords

Planning, Governmentality, Garden City, Affluence

The proposed presentation elaborates the various ways the standard of proper consumption and good life was defined when "the first internationally known garden city Tapiola" nearby Helsinki was developed some 50 years ago. Today the Tapiola consisting of 20.000 inhabitants is a rare persistence of Ebenezer Howard's original term "garden city". When Tapiola's planning began there was a great eagerness to copy model that had proven good elsewhere: As we finally catch up with the West, we asked ourselves: What are we to do with new affluence? We can't eat more. There is a limit to the automobiles and gadgets we really need? So I started to persuade my countrymen that we should build a suitable and beautiful environment for everyone. (von Hertzen in von Eckardt, 1967, 351). Tapiola's construction was modeled especially on examples from Sweden (housing design, collective spaces, electrical and heating systems), Denmark (garden design, landscaping), Great Britain (new suburbs along the garden city ideology, new town movement), and the United States (roads for light traffic, schooling system based on youth activity). Multidisciplinary planning teams for Tapiola were the first in Finland to include sociologists and home economists. A general organic model was used to integrate various professions. Ambiguous concepts such as "neighborhood units, biological model and dormitory suburb" were repeated by the leaders of the movement. It was especially Lewis Mumford whose texts emphasizing demises of passive lifestyle got introduced to the developers of the city. No surprise, it was young people who became objects of this discourse. The presentation reflects the views of the Scandinavian institutional theorists who emphasize that in order for an idea to travel across an organizational field it must be separated from its institutional surroundings and translated into an object such as a text, a picture, or a prototype. Indeed, the number of films, books and newspaper articles, the data of this study, was quite notable in Tapiola's case. Another theoretical source this presentation is based on is governmentality discourse suggesting that "gardening" autonomous actors is worth studying.

Access and appropriation: consumption practices among Portuguese low-wage women

Marques, Emília Margarida

-, Centro em Rede de Investigação em Antropologia (CRIA)
Lisbon, Portugal

Keywords

Consumption, Portugal, appropriation, provisioning, working-class

Based on an ongoing Anthropology post-doc research on work, consumption and identity among low-wage manufacturing and retailing female workers in the Lisbon metropolitan area, the paper focuses the ways by which those women manage their consumption practices - namely, their object appropriation work - between perceived choices, possibilities and needs. Self-presentation directed consumption (clothing and accessories, footwear, hair-dressing, etc.) is particularly under focus.

The provisioning approach (modes of provision, systems of provision - Warde, Fine) is taken as a key conceptual tool, for it allows a proper contextualization of consumption practices in the multiple economic, social, cultural, ideological frameworks within which consuming subjects develop their agency. Two chief questions are addressed: income levels, access paths and politics of choice / combination between (use, exchange, identity...) values; construction of meaning along the diverse systems of provision, consumers' "mythologies" (Appadurai) and the field of possibilities for consumers' appropriation practices.

Data are built through ethnographic fieldwork among and in-depth interviews with relevant subjects.

Are you really sure you do not want another piece of cake? How people react to dietary changes of family members

Terragni, Laura

Akershus University College, Akershus University College and SIFO (National Institute for Consumer Research) Lillestrøm, Norway

Keywords

society, food, nutrition

Previous studies have shown that it is not easy to introduce changes in dietary habits. Theories and models for behavioural change focussing on individuals' motivations appear inadequate to explain the reasons why one may succeed or fail to modify a diet. As the sociological literature on food consumption points out, this is due to lack of an encompassing analysis of the social aspects of meals consumption. More than individual choices, the food that is eaten, how it is eaten, by whom, where and when, reflect social values, groups identities, system of care and power and consolidated practices. Changes in dietary habits, hence, can be regarded as events that challenge values and routines and within a family. What happens when a family member or a close friend changes its diet? How people involved cope with these changes? Based on qualitative interviews with people that have made efforts for changing their diet and with other adults member of the family (or close friend), the paper discusses how families deal with dietary changes and analyse the experiences of planning and consuming meals when different dietary regimes coexist within a family. The data presented in this paper are part of a wider study ongoing at the Akershus University College (part of the research program 'Food, nutrition and society?'), aimed at understanding the barriers in introducing dietary changes among population groups with different gender, ethnic and social background as well as different motivation for dietary change.

Bank Lounges. A Case Of Brand Materialization

Kravets, Olga

*Business Administration, Bilkent University
Ankara, Turkey*

Sandikci, Özlem

Business Administration, Bilkent University Turkey,

Keywords

bank, consumption spaces, virtuality, materiality, Brand

The post-industrial era, characterized by the growth of knowledge-based, services-oriented industries, is marked by the trend toward weightlessness (Rifkin 2000, 47). Banking is often cited as an example for the accelerating virtuality across entire industries (Callon 1998). In recent years banks across the world have been trimming down 'real assets' such as branches, instead growing a network of mobile portals and urging customers to carry on all transactions virtually (Knights, Noble and Vurdubakis 2007; Singh 2004). In our study, we find an intriguing (post-)development that seemingly contradicts this trend—some banks appear to proliferate auxiliary services, such as airport lounges, through which they seek to (re)establish physical ties with some customers. As banks divest direct 'real assets,' making their core business increasingly virtual, they seek to solidify their brand identities in diverse material forms (Miller 2005).

A particularly interesting case is that of bank lounges located at airports, spaces typified as postmodern 'non-places' fostering a sense of timelessness, placeness and mobility (Augé 1995). These customer-only lounges offer amenities at no/minimal cost; moreover, they re-present a physical space in which a virtual bank along with its brand promise can, if momentarily, be materialized. We use Garanti bank lounges in Istanbul and Ankara airports as a case. We collected data through ethnographic observations, interviews with managers and documentary research.

We find that in a material and experiential way, Garanti lounges present, communicate, and enhance the brand identity. In particular, the brand's ethos of mobility and stability is translated in and enacted through the lounges' positioning in airports, living-room-like design and home-like services. Overall, we suggest that materialization acts as attempts to install some order to the uncertainty and disorder engendered by virtuality and mobility. By putting physical boundaries and by presenting the intrinsically ambiguous socio-cultural meanings in the manifold material forms, banks seek to make their brand identities intelligible and accessible to customers.

Between ethnicity and mother tongue: Self-images of the Swedish-speaking minority in Finland

Heikkilä, Riie

*Department of Social Policy, University of Helsinki
Helsinki, Finland*

Keywords

bilingualism, Distinction, ethnicity, Finnish Swedes, taste

The Finnish Swedes, Finland's main linguistic minority, are internationally speaking a very interesting group. Counting for only about 300 000 people scattered around the coast and with a notable overrepresentation in the Helsinki area, the Swedish-speakers form only about 5,5 percent of the overall Finnish population. Moreover, the Finnish Swedes shape in many ways a social and cultural world of their own, having not only right to public services in their mother tongue but also possessing their own cultural products, newspapers, TV and radio channels, editors and institutions.

Despite of its small size, the linguistic minority is socially speaking very important: first of all they have been statistically shown to live longer than the population majority, to be healthier and have longer marriages, among many other positive attributes. This positive image is further corroborated by the common stereotype that Finnish Swedes represent a more legitimate or 'better' lifestyle and taste than the population majority. Together these conceptions have led to a mythification of the Swedish-speakers: in reality, for instance the occupational structures of the language groups are strikingly similar, and in almost any similar field, the Finnish Swedes are very heterogeneous – and more and more often completely bilingual.

My research draws on a focus group study that serves as a pilot research for the Bourdieu-inspired (and Bourdieu-critical) project Cultural Capital and Social Differentiation in Contemporary Finland. Altogether 26 focus groups among different groups of the Swedish-speaking minority have been interviewed across the country, focusing on questions on several cultural fields, taste and finally, identification with their language minority, the Swedish-speaking world of Finland.

This paper concentrates mainly on the last part of the focus group interviews. What does it mean to be a Swedish-speaker in contemporary Finland, and is it appropriate to speak of an ethnic group? My aim is to sketch a cultural grammar of the Finnish Swedes: how is 'Swedish' identity produced? The research shows that in many cases, the language-based identity is built from outside and that the idea of monolingualism is a mere product of middle class cultural goodwill – from both sides of the language boundary.

Between singularities and contexts: the (relative) autonomy of cultural consumption

Silva Cruz, Isabel

Instituto de Sociologia, ISFLUP - Instituto Sociologia Faculdade de Letras Universidade do Porto Matosinhos, Portugal

Keywords

sociological portrait, actors plurality, consumption practices

The aim of this paper is to present a sociological portrait (Lahire, 2004) of a woman born in a family with low economic and culture capital (Bourdieu, 1979), but highly politicized. In order to draw the portrait we use biographical interviews that focus on several socializations (e.g. family, school, work, friends and leisure time), contextual interactions, others significant as well as consumption practices.

The study shows that both the socialization context and the social capital are important to overcome the limits of materialistic social conditions. It also emphasizes the need to re-elaborate the concept of cultural capital, namely at the level of the substantive theory on popular cultures (Costa, 1999). Furthermore, the portrait reveals moments of 'biographical ruptures' that correspond to changes in her trajectory such as marriage, divorce, immigration and change of job, which highlight the adjust in behaviour according to specific social contexts. Also, the duality of social roles (wife and mother vs. worker) becomes visible.

Since childhood, she developed a taste for cultural consumption (books, cinema, exhibition, museums) that was fostered by her father and godmother. Despite her income, she always managed to develop strategies that allowed her to consume this type of good. Therefore we observe that in contemporary societies cultural consumption is not dependent on economic capital.

Between uniqueness and standardisation - gated community as an complex consumer product

Gadecki, Jacek

The Faculty of Humanities, AGH University of Science and Technology Krakow, Poland

Keywords

lifestyle, uniqueness, gated communities, Consumption

The reorganization of time and space, reconfiguration of local and global and finally, the role of everyday choices and lifestyle, which are the background of the late modernity, get together in the Warsaw gated communities. The paper presents how this new urban form is used by different actors: both individual and institutional to promote new modes of consuming and experiencing urban fabric and how gated communities are able to construct new identities. The process of gating is analyzed by investigating highly marketized discourses that have taken place for last 12 years in Poland. By critically dissecting process of gating author points out to the sophisticated way of creating image of new product at the housing market. The exceptional cases and solutions prepared to interest clients, such as panic rooms or extra heated roofs cannot change the actual character of GC which base on standardisation. This kind of physical space, despite all external attributes of differences and highly aesthetic character must assure the predictable environment for potential buyers.

Building an ethically oriented consumption: children produced objects and critical consumption

Quartiani, Diana

Social and Political Studies, University of Milan (Università degli Studi di Milano) Milano, Italy

Keywords

child labour, discourse, Solidarity, ethical oriented consumption

The acquisition of consumer goods is not only a matter of satisfying material needs, but also a way to express the need for relationships and recognition, in short an act of production of meaning. This is particularly emphatic and explicit in the so-called ethically oriented consumption (e.g. fair trade), where the act of buying brings to a redefinition of the social meaning of the economic action.

But what products are suitable for such ethically oriented consumption? In other words, what products can be associated with the adjective "ethical"?

The answer to this questions implies actions of sense making (production of meaning) shared by a group of individuals on the basis of criteria relating to the characteristics of products and production processes. Thereafter, certain characteristics are selected as preferred, leading to the acceptance or exclusion of products depending on the compliance with such criteria.

The paper aims at showing the process of selecting the features that make a product suitable for "ethical" consumption, in the specific case of products employing children labor force, starting from the consideration of the access path of objects produced by children in the circuit of fair trade.

The findings are based on the analysis of documents relating to the distribution in Italy of objects produced by the movement of child workers Nats (ninos y adolescentes trabajadores), and through qualitative interviews with members of organizations that support this movement.

The main result is that, in the context of fair trade, the discourse concerning production and distribution of objects produced by children finds its main source of meaning in the particular relationship of solidarity established between the members of the organizations and the movement of child workers Nats. This brings to a new evaluation of the possible "ethical" dimension of child labor. In this context, the choice of criteria for the selection of "ethical" products implies a continuous act of subversion and redefinition of mainstream frames (e.g. media) that define child labour as an unacceptable practice.

Butter in, butter fried, butter on top: Change of food habits and social network relations

Halkier, Bente

*Communication, Business and Information Technologies, Roskilde University
Roskilde, Denmark*

Jensen, Iben

*Communication, Business and Information Technologies, Roskilde University
Roskilde, Denmark*

Keywords

Social Networks, food, Practice theory, nutrition

Abstract for 'Sociology of Consumption' workshop at European Sociological Association (ESA) conference in Lisboa, Portugal, 2.-4. September 2009.

Butter in, butter fried, butter on top: Change of food habits and social network relations

In Denmark, there is a strong tradition for public nutritional communication campaigns and advice, but there is an equally strong tendency not to take cultural differences into account when planning and implementing such efforts. Thus, efforts at communicating nutritional messages usually do not take into account neither how food is embedded in everyday life nor what the resources of the consumers in question are. To change food habits is very difficult. Food practices are mostly taken-for-granted routines, closely tied up with social relations. In a qualitative empirical project, we have studied the food habits and the understandings of healthy food in Danish Pakistani families, sampled according to illness in the family and job in health care. The main argument of the paper is that the reproduction as well as the transformation of food practices is embedded in the social networks of the food practitioners as one important part of the multirelational organisation of food practices. Hence, the analysis of the nutritional changeability of food habits in relation to social networks is done from a practice theoretical perspective.

Children's development as consumers of fashion: an ethnographic study

Ironico, Simona

*Istituto di Consumi, Comportamento e Comunicazione d'Impresa, IULM University
Milan, Italy*

Keywords

ethnographic study, co-shopping, fashion consumption, children, consumer development

The present contribution examines the experience of using ethnographic methods for investigating children's development as consumers (McNeal 2007) of fashion.

After an explorative study on the communication stimuli children are typically exposed to in apparel retail settings, 60 children (2-4, 5-7 and 8-10 years old) and their companions have been unobtrusively observed in 10 children's wear stores of Milan. The ethnographic work emphasizes how children can learn their consumer role through the interaction of both social and environmental influences. Specifically, social influences include co-shoppers (parents, siblings, other relatives and peers), other consumers shopping in the store and sales personnel. Environmental influences include products, product labels, display units, furniture and in-store communication tools such as catalogues, posters and other PoP materials. Furthermore, the paper analyses contents and mechanism of learning about fashion, consumer behavior and consumer culture.

Class, Cultural Capital, and Consumer Identity. Practices of Wine Consumption

Rössel, Jörg

*Sociology, University of Zurich
Zürich, Switzerland*

Pape, Simone

*Sociology, University of Zurich
Zurich, Switzerland*

Keywords

cultural capital, class, Wine, identity

Several scholars in consumer research (Russell W. Belk) and social theory (Anthony Giddens, Ulrich Beck, Zygmunt Bauman) have stressed the importance of consumption for the construction and enhancement of subjective identities in contemporary societies. This means, however, that everyday decisions about what to buy and to consume are loaded with affective and normative meaning, which may lead to stress and anxiety related to consumption. Warde has forcefully argued against such a perspective and has emphasized that traditional class and income-based restrictions are still important for consumption, so that the relationship between consumption and identity formation should not be overestimated. Furthermore, contemporary consumption practices and decisions are usually grounded in social networks and lifestyle patterns. Therefore, even identity relevant consumption decisions usually do not have embarrassing or anxiety-enhancing consequences. Up to now, there has not been much empirical research addressing this important theoretical controversy.

This paper deals empirically with this discussion in the sociology of consumption based on a standardized survey of wine consumption practices in Germany. The survey data enable us to assess the importance of wine consumption practices for the construction and enhancement of subjective identity on the one hand and the relevance of feelings of anxiety and embarrassment concerning consumption choices on the other. Furthermore, we analyze empirically the influence of class, different forms of cultural capital, social networks and life style on wine consumption practices and their consequences for subjective identity and feelings of anxiety.

Consumer policy, consumption practices and consumer society

Wahlen, Stefan

Dep. of Economics and Management (Consumer Economics), University of Helsinki Finland, <http://blogs.helsinki.fi/wahlen/>

Keywords

consumption practices, consumer policy, everyday life

Governmental consumer policy is influencing everyday consumer practices to some degree. The state is trying to reduce or remove disadvantages that citizens occupy as consumers. As governmental high-level plan intended to guide consumption processes, consumer policy reflects to a minor degree social consumption practices. Nowadays, consumer policy is substantially founded on narrow individualistic conceptions of the consumer. Therefore, this paper tries to elaborate on how social practices are shaped by consumer policy and thus consumer society as a whole.

Ethnographic diary data scrutinizes consumption practices against the background of consumer policy regulations. Consumption practices as a nexus of understandings, procedures and engagements constitute the material culture as basis for regulation. Principally focussing on markets, consumer policy influences consumer society to an important extent disregarding other issues such as gender or ethical consumption.

The delineation of consumer policy conceptions moreover assists the development of an understanding of the interdependencies between consumer policy and consumption practices in everyday life. The development of consumer policy emanates from classic liberal free trade thinking aiming at opening and liberalisation of markets. In 1992, consumer policy became a joint European policy with the intend of creating a single European market. In 2001, the BSE crisis aroused interest on consumer policy, as food safety and healthy living environments became central to the European Union's objectives of continuously improving the quality of life for all European citizens. Hence this paper emphasizes interdependencies between a macrostructure of society and practitioners in routinised consumption practices.

Consumers' mode of categorising organic products and the social situation of households: the case of Denmark

Hjelmar, Ulf

Institute of Governmental Research, AKF

Copenhagen, Denmark

Keywords

risk perception, Organic food products, consumer demand

The research project is part of the DARCOF II Programme, Consumer Demand for Organic Foods - Domestic and Foreign Market Perspectives. The overall objective of this project is to explain the demand for organic food products at the household level, focusing on the extent changes in the level of demand for organic food products can be accounted for by changes in the social situation of households, changes in ways of conceiving organic products, and the influence of new information.

This paper will focus specifically on the case of Denmark where the trend within the last 10-15 years has been that still more Danish consumers have become incidental buyers of organic foods resulting in a comparatively very high proportion of "organic consumers" seen in relation to other European countries. What role has consumers' mode of categorizing organic food products played in this development and to what extent does the social situation of households bear any significance? Consumers can be motivated by a number of concerns, including a concern with themselves (an "egoistic" value orientation) or a concern with wider societal issues (an "altruistic" value orientation), and the study will analyze which kind of reasoning exerts most influence on purchasing behavior in different social groups.

The paper is designed with a view to developing links between the theory of categorisation as developed in cognitive sociology with behavioral frameworks. Especially the concept of "risk perception" will be developed through the paper with the aim of describing the "mental models" of how different consumers reach their assessments of risks. It will be argued that the "cognitive deficit" approach is insufficient in order to understand consumers' conception of food risks and consumer behavior and a contextualized approach, including sociological input, will be discussed.

At an empirical level, the research project employs a qualitative method of sociological investigation. A screening questionnaire administered by telephone interview has been developed and employed for the purpose of recruiting a relevant group of respondents who have subsequently participated in a personal interview. In total 15 interviews form the basis of the analysis.

Consumer`s Riskological potential like characteristic of economic behaviour

Romanova, Maria

Sociology, Lomonosov Moscow State University Moscow, Russia Federation,

Keywords

Gender, Sexual orientation, consumer`s behaviour

Under world depression market`s competition is worsening and entrepreneurs find themselves in a critical confrontation. They are forced taking into account more consumers personality for more effective activity.

I`ve done a research in 2007 into sexual orientation`s influence on consumer`s behaviour. Results of this research have showed dependence between gender, sexual orientation and consumer`s behaviour. Based on this dates I`ve done a research into dependence entrepreneur`s risk upon goods directed on target group.

Groups differentiation based on sexual orientation. Research was made in Moscow, Russia. Clothes Fast Fashion market was researched. Two scales were made. Every parameter of scale is sphere of value distribution. First poles apart were masculine and feminine consumption style. Second poles apart were homosexuality and heterosexuality based on Kinsey`s Scale. Four types of consumer`s behaviour were got. The tool of research was Theory of Social Pole.

Feminine is a type of consumer`s behaviour describing spontaneous kind of buying mode with long choosing in a shop.

Masculine is a type of consumer`s behaviour describing good prepared kind of buying mode with unflexible choosing in a shop.

Riskological potential of every group was exposed based on several indicators: inclination to innovation, consumer`s rationality, consumer`s activity and channel of getting information about goods.

Riskological potential is the whole characteristics of consumer or group of consumers, which have an influence on risk cutting demand for goods.

The results of my research could have wide use in business for cutting entrepreneur`s risk

Consumer's Place in the Mall: Reflections of the Global and the Local in four Shopping Malls in Ankara

Tutalar, Laçın

*Sociology, Middle East Technical University
Ankara, Turkey*

Keywords

Globalization, social control, shopping malls, manners, social differentiation.

Shopping malls first appeared in Turkish major cities in the late 1980s and concentrated in urban space in the last decade. They have addressed socially and culturally differentiating groups; and, they have mediated a privately experienced, urban public life. In this article, I follow theoretical discussions around the interaction of the global and the local. Drawing upon the findings of a qualitative study conducted in 2007 with sales clerks working in four different shopping centers in Ankara, the Turkish capital, I try to illustrate the interaction of the global with the local, through changing conceptions of time and space at the local level. Focusing on the case of Ankara, I argue that such change in ways of which urban life is experienced means increased physical and social mobility in the city. At the same time, it inflates the value of time and money for many people. With this perceived mobility comes changes in behavior, such as pretentiousness, inclination to consume the image by touching commodities more, and, a fretful, bossy attitude towards the shop employee. Examples come from consumers' use of time in the mall and ways of communicating with shop clerks. These changes in consumers' behavior are also meaningful to deal with social control and strangeness felt in the mall space, but they are not experienced homogenously by diversely urbanized consumers or those with rural origins.

Consuming Distinction. The Constitution of the Italian Middle-classes through Housing, Food and Cultural Good

Sassatelli, Roberta

*Dipartimento di Studi Sociali e Politici, University of Milan
Milan, ITALY*

Santoro, Marco

Dipartimento di Discipline della Comunicazione, University of Bologna Bologna, Italy

Semi, Giovanni

*Dipartimento di Studi Sociali e Politici, University of Milan
Milan, Italy*

Keywords

food, Cultural goods, Consumption, Middle-Classes, housing

The paper develops from the understanding that the so-called "crisis" of the Italian middle-class is a representation of a real or presumed discomfort at the challenges experienced in every day life as to chances of social and civic participation via economic opportunities. Consumption is an essential way this participation takes shape. Consumption is both an ordinary social practice and a fundamental identity mechanism especially for middle-classes: historically, they have had the leading role in the diffusion of distinctive or competitive consumption, due to their median and fluid position, easily prone to slight but important shifts in social hierarchies. What we call "middle-class" is often nothing else than a social space of sharing and of "competitive comparison" and "imitation" of tastes, properties, and life styles. Following this approach, this paper is based on a large qualitative research project conducted via ethnography and in depth interviews in two gentrifying neighbourhoods in Milan and Bologna. The research firstly investigates status dynamics in Italian middle-class households, by analysing how members of a sample of family units, differentiated by occupational status, cohort, and cultural capital, choose their homes and take possession of the house they live in. It then focuses on two key areas of consumption, food and cultural consumption. The paper aims to contribute to an understanding of how, through the cultural investment of lifestyle choices in these three areas of consumption, class relations are reproduced, the boundaries between consumption and production are managed, and finally the divide between private and public is continuously realized.

Consuming food and global elite culture

McMahon, Naoimh

Politics Department,, University of Exeter Exeter,, England.

Keywords

Food politics, consumption ethics, global elites, convention theory

This research is concerned with the experiences and attitudes of the policy elites involved in negotiating international food safety standards, through the example of the Codex Alimentarius Ad Hoc Intergovernmental Task Force on Foods Derived from Biotechnology. Through semi-structured interviews it analysed the ethics and beliefs of the scientists, civil servants, business and NGO representatives on their understandings of highly contentious issues around GM risks, politics, economics and their own activity as policymakers. This paper focuses on their attitudes to food.

This paper contributes to social science debates about the recent politicisation of the agro/food system within society being translated into an increasing variety of eco-labels. This may suggest a reaction against industrial agriculture and its environmental, health and economic impacts. Consumption has been problematised and, for some, choosing such foods is a way of supporting alternative and more progressive methods of production and wider social change. This paper uses convention theory (Lamont and Thevenot, 2000) to analyse the 'justifications' that policymakers use to assess whether an action is beneficial to the common good, their views on these debates about food, and whether their own consumption reflects similar concerns.

This paper engages with two important academic and policy debates which influence my respondents' relationship to food and their attitudes towards consumption. These are their evaluation of the relationship between technology and nature, and their conceptualisation of consumers' interests and roles within society. The extent to which they distinguish between food products and their method of production is central to understanding these attitudes. This debate over the potential power of the consumer and its normative implications raises important questions of the rights and responsibilities of consumers.

Certain policymakers expressed market and industrial 'justifications', distinguishing the food product and its qualities from its method of production. Food consumption was conceptualised as a private individual act and consumers should not be legitimately concerned with the method of production of their food and its impact on the environment or communities. This reflects the WTO policy which does not view method-of-production as a legitimate concern for government as it could be used to block trade.

Consuming Individuals, Consuming Societies: Theories of Consumption and the Wider Economy

Jacoby, Ben

*Politics and International Studies, The University of Warwick
Coventry, United Kingdom*

Keywords

theories of consumption, macro theories, Everyday IPE, Varieties of Capitalism

Theories of consumption have been mainly concerned with the micro and meso levels of analysis and have shed significant light into the individual meaning of consumption as well as into the different consumption patterns between ethical, sexual and socio-economic groups. However, and partly because of the nature of the academic field and the training of the practitioners, sociologists have been reluctant to build theories that investigate in more depth the constitutive nature of consumption to society. This paper argues that the discipline of sociology, due to its distinct tools of inquiry, has a lot to say about macro aspects of consumption, and should boldly do so. So far, economists have offered a poor record of tracking human behaviour realistically, and political economists have largely focussed upon the structural aspects of socio-political phenomena. Rejecting a rational choice view of the individual and critiquing a quasi-Sayian approach to the functioning of the economy, this article makes a strong claim for the mobilisation of sociological concepts when investigating consumption issues. In order to gain more insight into the interrelatedness of consumer phenomena and the wider economy, it is essential to adopt a dual focus on micro and macro levels, a matter that sociologists are in a particularly well position to meet. Starting from the intertwining of structure and agency, this paper argues that disciplines like International Political Economy (IPE) or Economics can better understand the link between individual behaviour and collective institutions if they adopt a weltanschauung that is close to sociological methods of investigation. After a methodological part, this paper goes on to give an example of how IPE scholars have started to introduce sociological notions and how they can keep on doing so in order to enrich the debates around 'Varieties of Capitalism' in their own discipline. The sociology of consumption thus not only holds essential keys to the development of what has been called 'Everyday IPE' but also to the question of convergent or divergent European societies. In this regard, this article favours cross-fertilization between social studies disciplines.

Consuming spa in Norway - paths to beauty and health

Roos, Gun

*National Institute for Consumer Research, SIFO
0405 Oslo, Norway*

Keywords

beauty, Health, spa

This paper explores the connections between body-related consumption, beauty and health through a study of spa in Norway. The aim is to discuss spa as a successful contemporary technology of self or path to achieve beauty, health and/or well-being. Based on media spa is an expanding field, and it is marketed as something positive, a perfect treat, gift, investment for health or break from everyday life. The first day spa in Oslo was opened in 1999 and in the last years several spa resorts have been opened. Empirical data is drawn from an ongoing wider study on how discourses on health, consumption, and well-being use, interpret and attach importance to appearance. This paper is based on both qualitative (fieldwork, semi-structured interviews, magazines) and quantitative (survey) data on spa consumption in Norway. Concepts from the sociology of consumption are supplemented by work of Bourdieu and Foucault and theories of body and gender. Consumption of goods and services play a role in identity formation. Health, appearance, self-improvement and self-surveillance of the body are described as important for modern selves. Schillings concept of 'body project', body as a phenomenon of choice and options, raises questions of identity, surveillance and resistance. Drawing on the work of Bourdieu, this paper argues that consumption of spa constitutes an investment in body that might be deployed in a variety of other arenas. Foucault's concept of technologies of self emphasizes the role of practices and instruments in generating a sense of self. Consumption in itself, and consumption connected with producing beauty and health in particular, is associated with women. The paper highlights some of the paradoxes in spa consumption and discusses how it succeeds in uniting beauty, health and well-being. Spa is both an investment and experience. To consume spa is something you do to prevent decay and purchase well-being, and thus health becomes synonymous with individual self presentation which can be displayed through the body.

Consumption and contemporary distinction

Ribeiro, Raquel

CES-ISCS - Centro de Estudos de Sociologia, Instituto Superior de Ciências Sociais e Políticas <http://www2.iscsp.utl.pt/?idc=24>,

Keywords

Stratification, Portugal, Consumption, Social Distinction

With this paper, we intend to present and discuss the results of a quanti-qualitative research project, concerning the contemporary relation between consumption and perceived social distinction. This investigation was developed during our PhD research at ISCS-Universidade Técnica de Lisboa.

We shall identify and understand relevant criteria for distinguishing social strata in the perspective of the everyday life consumer, paying special attention to distinctive consumer practices. A lot has been written about the importance of consumption tastes and habits to both structural and post-modern stratification patterns, but social scientists have been neglecting social agents' perspectives and rankings. Can portuguese ways of regarding social distinction confirm a global and cultural-prone consumption point of view, according to international investigations, or are there still some resistances and particularities that should be taken into account?

We applied a web-based questionnaire and several in-depth interviews to a sample of 546 middle-class individuals aged between 19 and 45 years, living in two portuguese different areas (Lisboa, the two-million inhabitants capital and Leiria, a coastal area medium-sized town), with comparative purposes, between July 2007 and March 2008.

Findings show that consumption is one of the most important and effective contributors for the perception of social distinction. It can be noted that consumption practices assume different roles as 'materialism' and 'intellectualism' traces are detected: material and conspicuous aspects tend to be more considered by provincial-town respondents, while cultural consumption, scholarship, technology and leisure seem to be more important on establishing distinction among metropolitans. If, on one hand, Lisboa seems close enough to European and American consumption and stratification trends, on the other hand international crisis and the growth of unemployment may as well bring back the old-fashioned importance of pecuniary strength.

Consumption and gender: a late-Wittgensteinian view

Helle-Valle, Jo

Digital media, SIFO

Oslo, Norway

Keywords

Gender, Consumption, Wittgenstein, ICT

This paper uses female e-gaming as an intake for a theoretically oriented discussion on how to understand the relationship between gender and consumption. Data from ongoing research shows that young men play a great deal more ICT games than young women. In this respect it is a masculine activity. However, figures from other sources show that grown women constitute a substantial part of gamers. One plausible explanation for this variation is that gaming for women is not so much a ludic activity as it is a relational one - playing is a means for relating to male friends and later with their children. In this sense digital gaming is turned into a feminine practice. This contradiction is used as an intake to a critical scrutiny of what we mean by "masculine" and "feminine" and a recasting of our understanding of how we deal with persons in social analysis. What kind of ontological status do we accord "masculine" and "feminine"? Are they stable realities that exist outside their manifestations in actual persons? Are they essential aspects of gendered individuality? I argue that a radical practice perspective, founded on Wittgenstein's late philosophy, implies that we must rid ourselves of langue-like explanatory forces. Consumption is practice, always context-specific and hence has different meanings in different language-games. In this view there is no "basic", essential meaning to things or processes. This implies that we cannot search for essential, authentic (gendered) identities. Rather, we must look for context-specific identity-work, understanding persons as collections of dividualities. The analytical consequence of this is that we must approach both consumption and gender inductively by carefully studying what kind of consumption that can be said to be gendered statements, how it is expressed, and what it means in various contexts. From this empirical foundation we should be able to provide more nuanced analyses of the relationship between gender and consumption.

Cooking with Bimby: food practices, competences and kitchen technologies

Truninger, Monica

*Institute of Social Sciences, University of Lisbon
Lisbon, Portugal*

Keywords

theory of practice, kitchen technologies, Cooking, competence

The Worwek's webpage (a German company of kitchenware) proudly announces that every two minutes one Bimby is sold somewhere in the world. Bimby (also known as Thermomix) is a kitchen robot that promises to revolutionise the way we cook, learn about cooking, coordinate and time plan our food practices at home. It is a pricey multi-functional food processor, cooker, steamer and self-cleaner. In Portugal, despite the current economic crisis, 3945 of these robots were sold last December and current numbers indicate that there are around 80000 people in the country with one of these machines in their kitchens (Diário de Notícias, 11th January 2009). In 2008, there were 28500 new clients and increasing media coverage is likely to contribute to disseminate further this new fad. Renowned Portuguese chefs also endorse it and are often seen in TV programmes with one of these machines praising its time saving and convenience qualities.

The robot cannot be purchased in shops, it being directly sold by sales representatives that make a demonstration in future clients' houses. These are usually social events where the host invites friends and family for a free meal produced in the blink of an eye by the robot, and in the presence of the marketer. Thus, these events mix economic and social elements, domestic and market spheres. The restricted circulation of this commodity makes it a very appealing object of material consumption, it being attached to signs of distinction, differentiation and 'good taste' (also reinforced by its sleek contemporary design). In a time where concerns are raising about the demise of cooking skills, this machine is being heralded in the media and in several internet forums crammed with Bimby enthusiasts (self-named 'bimbólicos') as a 'magic' gadget that turns dreadful cooks into notable 'chefs'. Drawing on empirical work on the uses of Bimby through the analyses of internet forums and interviews with practitioners this paper aims at reflecting about this kitchen gadget from a practice perspective. It will look specifically at appropriation and use, time coordination and routines, gender division of food work, cooking competences, meanings and engagements regarding this technology.

Cultural Participation: Changes Between 2001 and 2007 in Changing European Union

Toivonen, Timo

*Economic Sociology, Turku School of Economics
Turku, Finland*

Lindblom, Taru

*Economic Sociology, Turku School of Economics
Turku, Finland*

Keywords

cultural values, cultural participation, European Union,

International comparisons of cultural activities have become more and more common in the last decades. However, international comparisons of changes are still quite rare. In this paper these kinds of comparisons has been made on the basis of two Eurobarometer ?data (numbers 56.0 and 67.1). The purpose was to find out to what extent the use of some cultural activities (ballet/dance/opera, cinema, theatre, sport event, concert, public library, historical monuments, museums/galleries, and book reading) has changed. The results show that changes were not remarkable at the aggregate level of European Union between 2001 and 2007. However, this is much due to the ?new EU countries? (Bulgaria, Czech, Estonia, Hungary etc.), i.e. member countries joining the EU after 2001. In the ?old EU countries? relatively more people in 2007 than in 2001 were taking part in activities mentioned above. Although there were big differences between countries, we can talk about two different cultural consumption patterns, which are the "old EU country" and the "new EU country". They are partly produced by the differences in the level of education. In addition, the impact of the differing valuation systems of cultural consumption across countries as well as the social advantage brought by some forms of cultural consumption are discussed, too.

Department stores and the early consumer society in Imperial Germany. A discourse analysis of the German fight against modernity

Lenz, Thomas

Education and Sociology (FLSHASE), University of Luxembourg Trier, Germany

Keywords

Modernity, consumer society, discourse, department store

The emergence of the consumer society in the German 'Kaiserreich' is closely linked with a moral discussion dealing with one of the most important manifestations of this new era of consumption: the department store. At the turn of the century department stores rapidly spread in most of the bigger German cities. The German discourse on this diffusion of department stores was quite pessimistic and loaded with anti-Semitic and misogynic stereotypes, especially compared to the more moderate European discussion on this topic. In my paper I intend to show how this discussion was not only a debate on the social implications of an emerging new consumer society but also an attempt to fight against the modernisation of the 'Kaiserreich'. Pamphlets, medical and juridical journals, newspapers and a vast amount of dime novels released between 1850 and 1914 dealing with the consumer society in Germany were analysed and the discourse about the department store was reconstructed by me. While novels, articles or even pamphlets can not be treated as a mirror of the society they attempt to portray, they can be seen as a repository of social discourse. These textual documents show Germans wrestling with the new experiences of consumption, nationhood and modernity. Three main topics can be identified that were discussed within the discourse on department stores and consumption: (a) the 'threats' of the department stores for the women of the 'Kaiserreich' (e.g. stealing, prostitution and agoraphobia). (b) the role of Jewish entrepreneurs who were thought to destroy the German 'Mittelstand' (middle classes) and to endanger their female workforce financially and sexually and (c) some enthusiasm for the architecture and the techniques of the modern department stores that was linked with a cultural-pessimistic view on the social consequences of modernity as a whole. The department store discourse will also be analysed in a broader context by embedding it into the debate on modernity that evolved in the scientific community at that time. Above all, discussing consumption in Imperial Germany always meant talking about one's attitude on modernity.

Distinction through omnivorous musical tastes in Germany: A grounded theory approach to cultural omnivores and strategies of distinction in the case of music

Berli, Oliver

Department of Sociology, University of Tübingen Tübingen, Germany

Keywords

social inequality, Distinction, sociology of taste, cultural omnivore

There are several accounts to the relations of social stratification and cultural differences in current sociology. Debates ? as the one about the omnivore-univore thesis by Richard A. Peterson ? are showing that the strong homology argument as proposed by Pierre Bourdieu might not be adequately describing contemporary societies. In this paper it will be argued that cultural omnivorousness is not an argument against bourdieusian theory of taste. Rather there should be a refinement of Bourdieu's theory using the ongoing debates to develop his model further.

Recent research indicates that display of "patterned tolerance" or "openness" towards different types of music (including high as well as popular culture) can be interpreted as strategies of distinction. But there are still many unanswered questions. What are the social meanings of different combinations of knowledge about, participation in, preferences and dislikes for music? What are the conditions under which "omnivorous taste" is evolving? What does it mean to the individuals themselves? What are the relevant classifications made by the individuals themselves? And most important: What is the social meaning of "omnivorous" taste(s) in relation to other taste patterns?

In contrast to most research on this phenomenon ? mainly using quantitative methods to find omnivorous taste patterns in the society under scrutiny ? the presented project is using a grounded theory approach in the tradition of Anselm Strauss. The data used for interpretation includes observations and non-standardized interviews focusing on musical taste, usage of music in everyday life and the (re)production of taste through family and education. It will be argued that there are several types of "tolerant" or "omnivorous" musical tastes with different meanings on the micro-level which can be interpreted as strategies of distinction. In discussion with recent research on musical taste and cultural omnivorousness the author presents preliminary findings from his research project on omnivorous musical taste in Germany.

Domestic, European, and American music consumption in EU countries; trends and explanations

Bekhuis, Hidde

Interdisciplinary Social Sciences, Utrecht University Utrecht, The Netherlands

Lubbers, Marcel

Interdisciplinary Social Science, Utrecht University Utrecht, The Netherlands

Keywords

nationalism, music consumption, European intergration

National cultural goods demarcate in-group boundaries in everyday life situations. Research on the consumption of these national cultural goods, however, has mainly focused on the stratification between high and low brow culture. Relatively little attention is paid to the consumption of culture goods based on the nationality criterion. This study will examine trends in the origin of consumed music. We will answers the questions: To what extent varies the trend in the consumption of 1) domestic, 2) European and 3) American music between EU countries? And to what extent are changes overtime, and differences between countries explained by macro level conditions?

To explain the origin of consumed music, economic theories concerning the world trade market will be combined with sociological theories concerning cultural consumption and consumer ethnocentrism into one theoretical framework. From these theories, we derive hypotheses about the influence of EU- and national cultural policies, the (world) music market, country characteristics, and inter-country relations (e.g., language affinity and economic dominance).

The on sales based year-end hit-chart archives of Austria, Flanders (Belgium), France, Germany, Italy, the Netherlands, Spain, Sweden, Switzerland and the United Kingdom will be coded and additional context data will be added. This unique database, which dates back to 1975, will be used to test the hypotheses with pooled time-series analyses.

Educating for sustainable consumption

Sedmak, Suzana

Faculty of Management Koper, University of Primorska Koper, Slovenia

Keywords

sustainable consumption, school curriculum, education for sustainable consumption

Many authors are convinced that modern consumption is the human activity that is most detrimental to sustainability, followed by population growth and the growth of production. Changing unsustainable consumption patterns into sustainable ones is necessary for a sustainable future. However, changing consumption patterns inevitably assumes changing consumers' value systems ? and this is a rather long-term goal. One possible way to attain this goal is through the education system ? at least this is what majority of governments and ministries of education assume when implementing the elements of sustainable development into the education systems and school curricula. Author will argue that adopting documents and action plans on implementation of sustainable development will not suffice for moving towards sustainability. Knowing does not equate changing and transferring knowledge does not necessarily imply transforming unsustainable consumer practices into (more) sustainable ones. In the paper the main focus will be on reorienting education towards sustainability within the Slovene school curriculum. Results of the empirical research that was conducted among Slovene students and their teachers will be presented. One of the goals of the study was to investigate the perception of the presence of the themes of sustainable consumption and sustainable development in the existing school curriculum. It can be concluded from the research that students' perception of responsibility at the market place is limited to the issues regarding spending their money or getting 'value for money' and to some aspects dealing with safety or health issues (e. g., dangerous additives, waste pollution). This kind of responsibility could be classified as egocentric consumer responsibility where responsibility is limited to those aspects of their consumer behaviour which they can understand to have a direct influence on their well-being. This finding is in line with other findings of the research which will be presented in the paper as well.

Ethnic Differences in food consumption

Higgins, Vanessa

*Centre for Census and Survey Research, University of Manchester
Manchester, UK*

Dale, Angela

*Centre for Census and Survey Research, University of Manchester
Manchester, UK*

Keywords

ethnicity, food, Consumption

In England, there is considerable variation in the consumption of food among different ethnic groups, for instance the Indian and Chinese groups are more likely to eat the recommended 5 portions of fruit or vegetables per day and have lower fat intakes than the general population (Sproston et al, 2006, Vol 1). Cultural beliefs and traditions play an important role in dietary habits so this raises the question of whether older people retain more traditional eating patterns that may not be followed by younger generations. Migration also plays a significant role in dietary change among ethnic minority populations. Lawrence et al (2007) suggest that on moving to the UK traditional foods are modified, and that a reduction in vegetable intake together with the use of fast foods causes the overall diet to be less healthy. This is supported by other studies which note the adoption of the fast food part of the British diet among South Asian and Afro-Caribbean migrants (Landman & Cruickshank, 2001; Anderson et al, 2005, Simmons & Williams, 1997; Anderson & Lean, 1995).

This paper discusses research which uses the 2004 ethnic boost of the Health Survey for England to examine ethnic differences in diet. The results of exploratory and multivariate analysis will be presented. We examine the consumption of specific foods and also how ethnic differences in diet are influenced by factors such as gender, age, generation, social class, education, household income, marital status, religion and length of time since immigration. The paper also explores the role of parental diet in explaining the diet of children - as parental eating behaviours are important in the transmission of attitudes and values towards health eating (Boutelle et al, 2007). In addition we present the results of focus groups with South Asian women which give an insight into cultural issues concerning diet and differences between young adults and the parental generation.

Food consumption: The connections between religion and food in modern societies

Herrera, Paloma

Economy and Social Sciences, Universidad Politécnica de Valencia Gandia, Valencia, Spain

Keywords

Secularization, religious symbolism, food habits

In all societies and in all times there has been a strong link between food and religion. Today, in modern societies, this link seems broken; religion is out of our manners of food. So, the sociological interest was not to accept this as evident but to ask for it: is modern society really an exception? The qualitative analysis of large empirical material has led me to consider, as I try to show in this paper, that this exception is only apparent. Nowadays, the world of food is heavily laden with symbolism and especially religious symbolism but with other appearance. Eating habits are closely tied to typical religious beliefs and behaviors, although these are not transparent because they have moved their content, their language and their ways of expressing themselves.

Future patterns of sustainable food consumption. How consumers' visions are embedded in practices

Mäkelä, Johanna

*-, National Consumer Research Centre
Helsinki, Finland*

Niva, Mari

*-, National Consumer Research Centre
Helsinki, Finland*

Timonen, Päivi

*-, National Consumer Research Centre
Helsinki, Finland*

Keywords

Technology, sustainability, practices, consumers, future eating

The global consequences of environmental problems are widely recognised in both political agendas and in people's everyday life. As food consumption forms a significant part of the environmental load of households, the sustainability of what we eat is an increasingly topical question. The starting point of our paper is the theory of practice as a fruitful theoretical approach to ecologically and socially sustainable food consumption. We analyse consumers' ideas and notions on future food consumption from the perspective of practices understood as ideas, skills and materials changing in time.

The empirical data of the study were collected as part of a collaboration between multidisciplinary BRIGADE and MIRHAMI 2030 projects. The paper presents results from a sub-study of the project that investigates the social and cultural conditions for sustainable food choices. The study mapped consumers' ideas about future food consumption by inviting people to construct images of the future and think about activities relating to cookbooks, kitchens, grocery shopping, food packaging and meals. Altogether 53 people participated in six focus group discussions held in autumn 2007.

The results show that in consumers' ideas the changes in practices were linked with the technological and material transformations envisioned for the future. The dreams of the future depict utopias in which smart and sustainable technology is innovatively applied to promote a more fun and easy-going everyday life that enables people to use their skills, knowledges and creativities. In addition, the discussions reflected consumers' ideas of diversification, fragmentation and "hybridisation" of food cultures that were presented as idealisations of mass consumption vs. luxury consumption.

These exercises suggest that consumers' images of future food consumption are embedded in practices that are at the same time are changing and stable. Through these materialised practices consumers also identify their various roles as users, consumers and citizens in constructing the future. In order to discuss sustainability we need to recognise the ways in which practices act as carriers of change.

Gender and digital gaming: how girls, boys and their parents account of their everyday practices and logics concerning use and regulation

Storm-Mathisen, Ardis

*Digital media group, SIFO National Institute for Consumer Research
Oslo, Norway*

Keywords

Gender, Consumption, adolescents, digital games, theories of practice

What is the relationship between gender and the consumption of digital games in everyday life? How do conceptions of what is 'masculine' and 'feminine' play a part in the regulation of digital gaming? Previous research in the field has established substantial knowledge of the gendered patterns of discourses and practices of digital gaming. We know much less about the influence of context on these discourses and practices. This paper reports from an empirical study that seeks to contextualise adolescents' digital gaming activities and problems by mapping how parents and children in Norwegian households relate to and carry out the control and restriction of digital gaming. The study builds on data from (i) a strategic survey among pupils in secondary and high schools in Norway and (ii) in depth interviews with adolescents and parents of households with and without identified digital gaming problems. Focussing on the interviews in households without identified problems this paper presents early findings about how gender plays a role in the regulatory practices and logics surrounding adolescents digital gaming. The analysis leans on media and consumption theories, anthropology and philosophy. Essential are Silverstone et al's domestication theory and a late-Wittgensteinian practice perspective. The domestication perspective underlines the need to include the social setting in which subject relates to ICTs and the late-Wittgensteinian perspective underlines the importance of contextualizing comparisons of practices. This framework provides a view on practice, subjects, body/mind and explanations that enable research to articulate the contextual diversity of gendering with respect to digital gaming.

Generative Concept of Agency

Sulkunen, Pekka

*Sociology, University of Helsinki
Helsinki, Finland*

Keywords

practice, habitus, agency, Consumption, action

This paper presents a critique of what I call the Standard Sociological View of Action. In this framework, motives, goals, circumstances and meanings that regulate action are seen as separate elements. An opposition between objective structures and agency is constructed, and at the same time an opposition between the social and the natural is created. These oppositions have had a central place in sociological theorizing throughout the twentieth century. Awareness of the problems related to them at the abstract theoretical level was revived in the work of Anthony Giddens, Pierre Bourdieu, Alain Touraine and Margaret Archer in the 1970s and 1980s. However, the awareness at the abstract level has not removed them from the most influential theories of consumer behaviour such as that by Prochaska, Norcross, et al. (1994) or (Ajzen & Fishbein 1980; Ajzen 1991).

In this paper I present a critique of the Standard Concept of Action and propose that it be replaced with a Generative Concept of Agency founded on a cyclical structure in which habits and images are central elements. All action is based on and related to habits formed earlier; images are mobilized when actions change and are transformed into consolidated practices. The Generative Concept draws on Bourdieu's sociology. It is a way of interpreting the notorious ambivalence of the concept of habitus, between meaning and objective conditions on the one hand, and agency and structure on the other. The paper suggests that this ambivalence is less disturbing if habitus is understood as a theory of agency rather than as a theory of action, or practice. The Generative Concept of Agency applies both at the social level and at the level of individual behaviour. It resolves the two oppositions between structures and agency and natural and cultura. It is an indispensable tool for analyzing consumer behaviour of any kind.

Globalisation and the effects of variety: a comparison of Britain and France

Warde, Alan

School of Social Sciences, University of Manchester Manchester, UK

Keywords

Consumption, food, comparison, globalisation

This paper critically evaluates claims that the effect of globalization is to produce convergence in consumption patterns by examining change in Britain and France since the 1970s. After some reflection on what it might mean for globalization to generate convergence, it explores evidence about the similarities and differences in trajectory of some central and visible features of food habits in the two countries. Attention will be paid to the amount of time spent eating, meal patterns and formats, habits of eating out and their relation to gastronomy, the incorporation of foreign cuisines and the role of the state. Evidence will be drawn from the results of some recent research projects. These include a comparative analysis of time use and household expenditure, and some archival research on cultural norms surrounding eating both at home and away from home. The analysis emphasizes the complexity of contemporary change, but argues that in almost no respects is there any divergence in patterns between Britain and France. This does not necessarily imply that globalization is at work, but it does provide a foil to many recent accounts which focus on differentiation within and between countries.

Going Hybrid: An Analysis of Consumer Purchase Motivations

Ozaki, Ritsuko

*Imperial College Business School, Imperial College London
London, UK*

Sevastyanova, Katerina

*Imperial College Business School, Imperial College London
London, UK*

Keywords

consumer, adoption, Toyota Prius, Sustainable innovation, Consumption

What makes consumers adopt sustainable innovations? The uptake of pro-environmental products and technologies is of importance, particularly at the moment, when climate change, diminishing energy resources and energy security are serious issues. This paper reports on the case study of the Toyota Prius, a green innovation that has been in the market for the last 10 years, and investigates what factors influence and encourage consumers to purchase a Prius. Our approach to innovation uptake is a unique one: we use not only the existing innovation adoption-diffusion models, which are based on rational and cognitive behaviour, but also contextual perspectives from the sociology of consumption. When consumers decide to adopt an innovation, they consider not only functionality, usability, costs and intended outcomes, but also what the innovation means to them, for example, the way it reflects their identity, image, memberships, values and norms. In order to understand consumer perceptions of the Prius and their daily contexts such as driving-related routines and behaviours, a questionnaire survey was conducted. The questionnaire was developed based on a review of the existing literature on innovation adoption/consumption and hybrid car purchases, and from the results of informal discussion with Toyota dealers. The survey yielded over 1500 respondents in February 2009, and statistical tests were conducted to identify a motivation structure and relationships between different purchase motives and purchaser contexts.

How big is the fence around music genres? An empirical analysis of people's classification of artists and bands within music genres

Vanhecke, Gust

Sociology, Ghent University

Ghent - 9000, Belgium

Roose, Henk

Sociology, Ghent University

Ghent - 9000, Belgium

Keywords

music taste patterns, clustering, cultural stratification, symbolic boundaries, genre classification

Music genre classifications pervade, in record shops, on the radio, on the web, in surveys, etc. Yet classifying music into genres is no easy task, certainly given the pertinence of genres as symbolic markers, as means for social distinction. In this paper we want to investigate to what extent genre boundaries are permeable and differ according to the characteristics of the classifier. More specifically, we analyze how people classify favoured artists and bands within given music genres using data from an audience survey conducted in Flanders (Belgium) in 2007 (n = 879). Our main objectives are twofold; using multiple correspondence analysis we try first to visualize distances between genres and different artists/bands both within and between genres. Second, we want to probe into how differing classifications are socially embedded. Several linkages between music genre preference and social background characteristics have been repeatedly demonstrated. However, little is known about how well music tastes respect the scholarly genre-demarcations or rather cross these boundaries. In this way we hope to gain insight on the versatility of genre-artist connections, on the breadth of artists/bands included within certain genres, and finally on the social structuring of certain classifications.

In-school Marketing- selling calories for a captive audience

Farinha, Isabel

*Advertising, UNIDCOM/IADE-ESMP, Escola Superior de Marketing e Publicidade
Lisbon, Portugal*

Keywords

captive audience, interactive marketing, child consumer, in-school marketing

Children are a vital target for advertising executives as in addition to being powerful influencers and future buyers they also have a great purchasing power from an early age (McNeal, 1992). This has a series of repercussions on the three-dimensional market, induced by the impact of advertising on the child. That led us to the concept of in-school marketing centred on the primacy of the infant-child target in the corporate world, shown by the growth of ?businesses that offer advice on how to sell to children.? (Molnar, 2007:7). This phenomenon points to schools being included in the strategic planning of advertisers and media executives: ?schools are where the children are.? (Molnar, 2007:10).

The globalization of this scenario (WHO, World Health Organization (2004) report - Marketing food to children: the global regulatory environment) and the consequent unease felt over the effects of commercial activities on education and the quality of the food make commercialism ?increasingly controversial? (Molnar, 2006:1). In-school Marketing in European and North America public schools is linked with childhood obesity - according to our preliminary results children are mostly targeted in schools by marketing for high-calorie, nutritionally deficient foods.

The study is built on an analysis about the state, market and society working together and demarcates one another to enhance a win-win relationship, that is, one of legitimacy/visibility. This serves to affirm that the company possesses both the credibility to undertake specific marketing initiatives and invest in the training/education of children and education of the community in which they live to attain the desired effect.

From that follows the questions about the type of marketing that can be found in Portuguese schools (10-15 years old). The majority of studies have focused more on a passive type of marketing, that which children see, hear and read (Alves, 2002), rather than forms of interactive marketing (Moran, 2006). Here, qualitative methods were used to show that interactive marketing found in classrooms includes activities to be carried out revolving around a given company (Fogarty, 2006 cit in Moran, 2006) and curricular material, such as school textbooks containing exercises using specific products (Farinha, 2007).

Included or Excluded? Poor Youth Consumer's Accounts on Living in a Consumer Society

Aktas Yamanoglu, Melike

Faculty of Communication, Ankara University Ankara, Turkey

Keywords

Bourdieu, consumer society, symbolic capital, consumption practices of poor youth, taste of necessity

Within the frame of this study, consumption practices of poor youth, their relationships with consumption and their world of consumption will be examined in the context of Turkey. The field research findings based on semi-structured interviews with 65 young people living in Ankara-Turkey between the age of 15-29, highlighted that living experiences of poor youth in consumer society are meaningful in the context of both exclusion processes from this society and symbolic struggles given against to these processes. Pierre Bourdieu's theory and concepts, which are developed in his book Distinction (1984), were used to interpret consumption practices of poor youth. Bourdieu's approach arguing the social groups with low cultural and economic capital accumulation organize their taste and consumption choices through their "necessities" have important implications for this study however only "taste of necessity" is not adequate to unveil consumption practices of poor youth in Turkey. Under the pressure of consumer society, poor youth still reference necessities in their consumption nevertheless this situation does not point that they only consider "functionality" of the consumer goods. These young people utilize consumer goods and consumption patterns as a form of symbolic capital to reduce the social distances and develop various relationships. However the consumption practices based on the efforts to hide the class differences and to sustain more equal relationships lead to reproduction of social hierarchies as a result.

Increasing consumer awareness: A review of the Danish campaign One Tonne Less

Stø, Eivind

*SIFO, National Institute for Consumer Research
OSLO, Norway*

Strandbakken, Pål

*SIFO, National Institute for Consumer Research
OSLO, Norway*

Keywords

user awareness, sustainability, information campaigns,

Increasing consumer awareness: A review of the Danish campaign One Tonne Less

In the debates over sustainable consumption and production, a main concern has been to increase user awareness along the value chain. Based upon this ambition, programs have been released to inform and educate consumers to understand the environmental impact of everyday life consumption and to develop programs to change consumer behaviour towards a more sustainable pattern and lifestyle.

Nevertheless, a number of studies and general experience have shown that the effect of such campaigns usually is limited and the relationship between attitudes and behaviour is complicated. This is a well-known fact, in the scientific community and among politicians. This has not, however, undermined the popularity of this policy instrument. The information campaign remains a much used top-down tool addressing problems linked to health and consumption.

One Tonne Less is an ambitious Danish information campaign aiming at reducing CO<sub>2</sub> emissions from individuals and households. It consists of two elements. The first objective is to raise Danish consumers' awareness of the links between their lifestyle choices and their share of CO<sub>2</sub> emissions. In that sense it is a classic information campaign. The second objective is to commit Danish consumers and households to specific acts or courses of action to reduce their CO<sub>2</sub> emissions preferably by one ton. This commitment is done on the One Tonne Less homepage. The campaign will also be evaluated according to these two criteria: 1) has the campaign increased consumer awareness, and 2) how many people have committed themselves to a one tonne reduction.

Even though the One Tonne Less seems to be an almost 'ideal' campaign - a possible future benchmark for similar initiatives - the manifest success seems rather limited after all. We believe that the main constraint is that the framework around consumer behaviour has not changed. The responsibility is placed on the consumers and households. There is not opened any new windows of opportunities, the campaign is limited to inform about the existing opportunities. The paper is based upon analysis of web-sites, written materials and interviews with researchers and stakeholders.

Life patterns in contemporary society: a conceptual and operational proposal

Mauritti, Rosário

*CIES-ISCTE, CIES-ISCTE
Lisbon, Portugal*

da Cruz Martins, Susana

*CIES-ISCTE, CIES-ISCTE
Lisbon, Portugal*

Firmino da Costa, António

*Sociology, ISCTE, CIES-ISCTE
Lisbon, Portugal*

Keywords

quality of life, multivariate analysis, family budgets

Is it possible to draw a picture of the range of life patterns of the society today? Sociological analyses in which the social description of populations is a fundamental element have had difficulty in integrating analytical dimensions on 'work/production?', 'consumption/leisure?', and 'education/training?' in a theoretically consistent and empirically elucidating manner. However, all these aspects have been seen to be crucial to contemporary forms of social existence and systematically reveal highly significant relationships among themselves. With the construction and analytical use of the concept of life patterns an attempt is made to respond to the theoretical and operational relevance of assimilating these three crucial axes of the characterisation of society. The main hypothesis guiding the work was that, with the coordination of these three dimensions, it would be possible to find a set of patterns characterising ways of life and levels of the quality of life.

On an empirical level, the coordination mentioned and the actual verification of the hypothesis considered above demanded the combination of a number of indicators for the three dimensions, carried out using multivariate analysis procedures. The multivariate statistical approach included principal component analysis (PCA), homogeneity analysis (homals) and cluster analysis. The most important empirical source was the Portuguese Survey of Family Budgets (micro database), from National Statistic Institute. The substantive results of this project are presented here as an example of the theoretical and operational relevance of the analytical model proposed.

These contributions follow the line of a vast array of research on social structures and social recomposition that various CIES-ISCTE researchers have developed over a considerable period of time in connection with a variety of specific subjects of study on different scales, namely of European comparison.

Life Style Differentiation in the Netherlands

Nagel, Ineke

*faculty of social sciences, vu university amsterdam
amsterdam, netherlands*

Lemel, Yannick

Labo de Sociologie Quantitative, Centre de Recherche en Économie et Statistique Malakoff Cedex, Paris, France

Keywords

Bourdieu, cultural participation, Life Styles, homology thesis

Tastes in music, art, clothing, food, drinks and appearance are often thought to be highly individual. On the contrary, according to the French sociologist Pierre Bourdieu, life styles largely evolve from the position in social structure and can be described by the same two-dimensional 'social space' defined by an economic and a cultural hierarchy.

Although the homology thesis has inspired many scholars, it has also been the subject of much criticism. The proposed life style differentiation would only exist in France and be tenable only for the 1960's. Post-modernist views claim that lifestyles do not longer result from social structure, but are purely personal and are themselves the new entities of social structure. The omnivore thesis states that combinations of high and low brow are markers of high social status.

In this paper we examine whether life styles in the Netherlands can be described along the economic and cultural dimension of social structure, as hypothesized by Bourdieu. Apart from studying life style differences according to these dimensions as defined by traditional indicators of social status, we also consider the life style orientation of the family of origin. The data are collected in 2000 and refer to a sample of 620 Dutch, aged between 20 and 40, who have been interviewed on a very broad range of detailed life style characteristics, like highbrow and lowbrow cultural participation, reading behavior, preferences in music, food, drinks, vacations, table manners, health and physical appearance, possession of luxury and cultural goods.

References:

Peterson R.A and Kern R.M., 1996. 'Changing Highbrow Taste : From Snob to Omnivore?', American Sociological Review, 61, 900-907

Coulangéon, Ph. and Lemel, Y. (2009). The Homology Thesis: Distinction Revisited. In: Robson, K. and Sanders, C. (Eds.) Quantifying Theory: Pierre Bourdieu. Springer Science + Business Media B.V.

Liquefying Space: The Cultural Politics of 'Loft' Marketing

Zwick, Detlev

*Marketing, York University
Toronto ON, Canada*

Ozalp, Yesim

*Marketing, York University
Toronto ON, Canada*

Keywords

loft marketing, solid consumption objects, Consumption, liquid modernity, space

In this essay we explore an interesting dilemma of what Bauman (2008) terms 'light' capitalist consumer culture: the marketing and consumption of what we call 'solid consumption objects'. We consider a consumption object solid when the acquisition of it requires the buyer to make- at least in principle- a more or less long-term commitment to the object's specific features and product attributes. To exemplify this concept, we investigate the marketing of high-end loft apartments in Toronto, Canada. Our analysis shows that the efforts of the developers and marketers to sell the loft apartments run up against the need of the sales target- the upwardly mobile, urban 'professionals' (incl. Florida's (2002; 2007) 'creative class')- to design their lives as projects always under construction, where social and economic success is premised on the ability to be mobile (Bauman 1996). In other words, loft developers must sell an object fixed in space to buyers unwilling and unable to bear the anchoring consequences of the social, cultural, and physical space they occupy. We adapt Bauman's (2000) notion of liquid modernity as a theoretical lens to show how the marketing of lofts uses a collection of tools and techniques aimed at 'liquefying' the physicality of the loft in hopes to respond to buyers' needs for social, cultural, and economic mobility. Drawing on an analysis of a wide variety of marketing materials, we suggest that physical space is put in dialogue with consumerist yearnings by constructing it as a site for neo-bourgeois explorations of life as art and by inserting it into a larger spatial arrangement of typical middle-class consumption activities. No longer "petrif[ied] into everlasting reality" (Bauman, 2000, p. 62), the loft becomes a node in a network open to always changing connections, floating in the liquid space of the city (cf. Cupers, 2005). In the final analysis, we propose to extend production-focussed theories of space by drawing attention to the ways in which consumer capitalism mobilizes consumption practices as integral element in the social production of urban space.

Looking Russian or Estonian? Young consumers constructing the ethnic "self" and "other"

Keller, Margit

*Institute of Journalism and Communication, University of Tartu
Tartu, Estonia*

Vihalemm, Triin

*Institute of Journalism and Communication, University of Tartu
Tartu, Estonia*

Keywords

Estonia, Ethnic Relations, taste, youth culture, consumer culture

Our paper analyzes clothing style and taste as resources for social participation and identity creation in Estonia - a multi-ethnic post-Soviet transition society. Theoretically our paper draws on concepts of "glocal" youth consumer culture in which style plays a major role. We also build on studies of ethnicity and consumption which analyze interrelationships between consumers' home and host culture as well as transnational consumer culture. We conducted interviews with 11 Estonian and 12 Russian young people in 2008. Our focus is: how do young adults of Estonia construct ethnic "selves" and "others" with the help of symbolic resources provided by consumer culture. Using qualitative text analysis we look at young people's representations of clothing style, accessories and brand choice. Almost exclusively transnational consumer culture is drawn upon by the interviewees. The symbolic resources offered by the transnational production of fashion are appropriated in the local context of interethnic relations in varied forms. Both groups express their affiliation and criticism towards their in-group and appreciation and disrespect towards the "other" through a gendered discourse of good and bad taste. Glamour is described in detail, represented usually as bad taste and attributed to both ethnic groups by both groups of informants. Brands are prominent symbols used as elements to construct stereotypical identities with. The "hybrid strategy" of blurring styles is evident among both ethnic groups. However, this can easily be interpreted as ethnic assimilation thus limiting the possibilities of self-expression.

Mapping the art museums' consumption and perceptions

Hanquinet, Laurie

*Institute of Sociology/ METICES, FNRS/ULB
Brussels, Belgium*

Keywords

museum, art, Consumption patterns

How do visitors consume museums? What do they intend to see? Do they pay a visit alone? What kinds of information do they use during their visit? These questions are traditional in the field of museums research. Nevertheless, the relationships between these different aspects of the visit have been given less attention. Is the lonely visit associated with no use of information given by museums? Or with a longer visit? This paper intends to explore the relationships between these traditional measures of museum consumption by mapping them in a space of museum consumption. Moreover it investigates the links between the way of visiting and the image of visited museums as well as with the expectations from the visit. For example, does the lonely visitor differ with his specific expectations and images of the museum from the more 'sociable' visitors?

This contribution is based on a dataset of visitors of six modern and contemporary art museums in Belgium (1900 individuals). This contribution puts forward the suitability of the multiple correspondence analysis (MCA) in the exploration of the data in a more contrasted way. This explorative method allows circumscribing the various relations between the different dimensions of visitors' practices. Finally, this paper highlights through ascendant hierarchical classification (AHC) different classes of behaviors and attitudes. It also connects them with socio-demographic descriptions. The use of these complementary methods (MCA and AHC) relies on the will to give more consistency to museums' consumption patterns, contrary to methods aiming at reducing the complexity of the reality.

Moralising New Parents, Moralising Markets: Consumer Culture and the Moral Contours of Early Parenthood

Martens, Lydia

Sociology and Criminology, Keele University Staffordshire, United Kingdom

Keywords

Pedagogy, ethical consumption, moralities, markets, new parents

The focal point of this paper is the constitution of new parents as pedagogical subjects in consumer culture; a process which mirrors an analogous development in the medical-health field. It is identifiable through the diverse instruction services and resources now directed at people going through this transitional phase of life, and which include a growing number of pregnancy and early parenting websites, magazines, advisory services, parenting manuals and advice books, as well as products with accompanying information. The paper examines how instructional resources targeted at new parents are organised around non-commercial and commercial dimensions, and asks why we find such proximity in practices across these domains in this field. Whilst the prominence of parental pedagogies in both fields points to the cultural salience of creating a specific type of ethical parental-consumer subject, I will here also consider how the moralities around early parenthood rebound onto markets and invade marketing practices and discourses. Theoretically, the paper interweaves perspectives from the sociology of parenting, and new parenthood in particular, with insights from recent debate on ethical consumption and from the constitution of authority, morality and trust in markets. The empirical grounding of this work comes from continuing ethnographic research conducted at The Baby Show; a UK consumer show targeted specifically at this section of the population, and which brings together a variety of commercial and non-commercial exhibitors, and pregnancy and early childhood 'experts', with visitors consisting mainly of prospective parents, new parents, parents with young children, grandparents and friends.

Negotiating marginality through consumption

Vargiu, Andrea

Economia, Istituzioni e Società, Università di Sassari Sassari, Italy

Keywords

CONSUMPTIONS, MARGINALITY, Poverty, social work, COMPOSITE IDENTITIES

Rationale and object

Through consumption and use practices the members of a social group negotiate, confirm, reproduce and /or redefine the material and symbolic values of the exchanged goods. That negotiation is a form of interaction through which people recognize each other and identify themselves.

The paper presents the results of an empirical research on consumption practices of people in marginal or precarious situation. Those subjects are not traditionally perceived as able to face and contrast the constraints imposed by their social situation. Nonetheless, on the basis of literature, we can talk of a fragile equilibrium between the bonds imposed by the specific marginal situation and the capacity/possibility that actors have to choose among different courses of action. Through empirical study of consumption practices, we wanted to better explore that domain and understand how people in marginal situation actually face structural constraints.

Method

Empirical research is mainly based on in-depth interviews of marginal people about their consumption practices. Interview work rests upon a wider information base which concerns the structure of the local welfare system and the opinions of social workers.

Results

The paper will present analysis of interviews in order to show how actors try to keep their dignity while faced with social exclusion and material and immaterial deprivation. It will show how identities are built, negotiated and preserved through consumption of goods and services. A particular focus will be put on the role of organizations that supply welfare services and on how people in need deal with some rigid classifying automatisms that often result into stigma.

New and future cultural consumers: The Cultural Consumption and Practices of children aged 6-14 in Catalonia Survey

Mosteiro Molina, Sergio

Ministry of Culture and the Media, Government of Catalonia Spain, <http://www.gencat.cat/cultura>

Keywords

Catalonia, cultural consumption, family socialization, national survey, technological change

The question about cultural consumption and childhood and adolescence is of present interest and scientifically challenge. The fact that children now represent a considerable market for producers and retailers of some cultural goods might be well known, but the experience and the significance of consumption to their lives, as well as its sociological dimension, is not.

In 2008, the Ministry of Culture and the Media of Catalonia carried out, in collaboration with the Ministry of Education and the Statistical Institute, the Cultural Consumption and Practices of Children aged 6-14 in Catalonia Survey, which has been the first attempt, not only within Catalonia, but also within Spain, to undertake a systematic and panoramic analysis of the cultural habits of young people between 6 and 14 years old, asking batteries of questions in key areas of cultural activity, including museums, heritage, libraries, archives, reading, visual arts, performing arts, music and concerts, radio and television, computers, videogames, the Internet and mobile phones.

The sample was obtained using a cluster random sampling procedure with previous stratification, and 3.000 children and adolescents were interviewed. Given this population cohort's features, some methodological novelties were introduced. Moreover, apart from the general questionnaire, two additional questionnaires were conducted: one on the parents and another on the schools, so transversal comparisons can be established.

Using this empirical data, this article will yield a better understanding of the role of young people in processes of cultural consumption through the discussion of four main ideas:

- 1) Gender. Does still gender have effect on cultural habits, or are those traditional differences becoming to erode?
- 2) Socialization. How and to what extent does primary socialization and generational transmission contribute to the reproduction of cultural practices?
- 3) Immigration. Do significant differences exist among children according to their ?or their parents- origin?
- 4) Technology. Is technology a substitute or a complement to traditional cultural activities?

New Perspectives of Consumption: The Ecological Consumer

Alexandre, Sílvia

Socius, Socius/ISEG-UTL

Massamá, Portugal

Keywords

Ecological Consumption, Ecological Consumer, Ecological Products, environment consciousness.

Ecological consumption includes all collective and individual actions whose impact on the environment tends to be minimised, or rather, oftentimes underestimated. In this research, based on the criterion that ecological consumption contributes to the preservation of the environment, on the whole, we decided to study it with basis on the theory of social representation. Thus, we decided to study the social representation of ecological consumption, as well as, the ecological practices used in an urban area (Greater Lisbon) whose constituents are very diverse through a quantitative survey (530 questionnaires). We also analysed the impact of personal factors (personality, values, types of purchases, health concerns) and environmental ones (publicity, reference groups, opinion leaders and prices) on ecological consumption. Further to this, we studied the impact on environment consciousness.

Through our research we verified that the social representation of ecological consumption conceived by the people questioned is cognitively poor. It is clear that this concept is obviously linked to recycling. This is a subject, which is always in people's inner thoughts with special connection to Eco-points, packaging and the biodegradable ? elements related to recycling. We also verified that of the personal variables considered only the type of purchases made (rational and impulsive) and health concerns, influence ecological consumption behaviour. On the other hand, we concluded that all the environmental variables considered throughout this study (publicity, reference groups, opinion leaders and prices) influence this type of consumption. Finally, we made a comparative analysis between the social representation of the ecological consumption of a group of ecological consumers and a group of non-ecological consumers. We verified that the representations are different, which leads us to conclude that the social representation of ecological consumption varies depending on the practices adopted (ecological or non-ecological).

Nordic Democracy of Taste: Cultural Omnivorousness in Finland

Purhonen, Semi

*Department of Social Policy, University of Helsinki
Helsinki, Finland*

Gronow, Jukka

*Department of Sociology, Uppsala University
Uppsala, Sweden*

Rahkonen, Keijo

*Department of Social Policy, University of Helsinki
Helsinki, Finland*

Keywords

literature, music, taste, cultural omnivorousness, Finland

This paper addresses the thesis of cultural omnivorousness in two areas, music and literature, in the cultural context of Finland, one of the so-called Nordic welfare states. Drawing upon a nationally representative survey data, both areas are analysed in terms of likes and dislikes of different cultural genres. The omnivore thesis is first examined by measuring omnivorousness as a sum of liked musical and literature genres (?omnivorousness by volume?), and second, by counting only those combinations of likings that cross significant cultural boundaries as omnivorousness (?omnivorousness by composition?). Accordingly, different taste combinations are constructed and then explained by the major socio-demographic variables. Finally it is examined how the specified taste combinations in music and literature relate to more general cultural and political attitudes. The results suggest that no matter how omnivorousness is operationalised, in the case of literary taste it can be explained better by the socio-demographic factors than in the case of music. Also in the case of music, however, high education and female gender as well as older age were the main determinants of omnivorousness. If musical and literary genres are divided into ?highbrow?, ?folk? and ?pop? tastes, the omnivore type combining likings from all three categories was found to be the most typical of all taste combinations in both cases, whereas the hypothetical type of ?univore snob? (with likings exclusively limited to genres of the highbrow category) was practically non-existent.

Political Consumerism in Israel: The Case of the Religious-Secular Struggle Over the Sabbath

Ben-Porat, Guy

Department of Public Policy and Administration, Ben-Gurion University of the Negev Beer-Sheva, Israel

Shamir, Omri

*Department of Public Policy and Administration, Gulliford Glazer School of Business and Management Ben-Gurion University of the Negev
Beer-Sheva, Israel*

Keywords

Religion and State, Political consumerism, Israel, Globalization

Since the early days of Israeli statehood, the question of Sabbath observance has led to religious-secular struggles. Arrangements established in the early years of statehood, became known as the "Status Quo," and established compromises between religious and secular, including the character of the Sabbath. But, political, economic and demographic changes that occurred in the 1990s eroded these arrangements as more and more businesses began operating on the Sabbath. In this paper, we argue that A combination of circumstances has led to the shift from the political arena (the parliament) to the economic arena (the market) and opened the way to using political consumerism strategies to change or protect the Sabbath's character. Ulrich Beck (1997) claimed that the main arena is no longer the formal political sphere but the informal sphere of "sub-politics where citizens organize to act politically. We propose, therefore, to study the rise of sub-politics in Israel through the use of consumer power. After presenting our theoretical framework, we will delineate three main developments that influence sub-politics in the religious-secular struggle: (1) the rapid development of a consumer society influenced by liberalization, global economy and cultural changes that transformed the lifestyle of many Israelis (2) demographic changes caused by the mass immigration of mainly secular Jews from the former USSR, and (3) The Israeli government's failure and the rise of alternative politics. These changes, on the one hand, eroded the hold of old arrangements and the relevance of the political sphere and, on the other hand, led to new types of political initiatives, often outside the formal realm of politics. Finally, using media reports and open-ended interviews with religious and secular entrepreneurs we demonstrate how the economic power of religious and secular consumers is used in the new struggles over the Sabbath.

Political Consumerism or Political Co-optation? Mediating and Mainstreaming Fair Trade

Lekakis, Eleftheria

Media and Communications, Goldsmiths College, University of London London, United Kingdom

Keywords

Political consumerism, New Media, fair trade, communication, citizenship

This presentation explores the processes through which the Fair Trade cause has been communicated in the UK in such a way that it has been pulled from its niche status to a mainstream presence. A revolution in the marketplace has been foretold (cf. Boyle, 2005; Micheletti et al, 2006) and awareness of the Fairtrade Mark consumer label is now argued to be evident in 70% of the UK adult population, but the consequences for citizenship still to be examined. By looking at the mainstreaming of fair trade I draw conclusions about the contemporary nature of consumer citizenship and the tensions involved in acting politically in the marketplace. I argue that there is a certain 'co-optation' of citizenship by its commercial enactment. While this varies according to the degree of commitment, further engagement and prior knowledge this type of citizenship mostly concerns citizen consumers and the focus remains on the second part, which is that of the consumer.

Re-regulating consumption in a time of crises: An exploration of post neo-liberal regulation

Kjaernes, Unni

*Research Department, National Institute for Consumer Research (SIFO)
Oslo, Norway*

Poppe, Christian

*Research Department, National Institute for Consumer Research (SIFO)
Oslo, Norway*

Keywords

change, Consumption, financial crisis, Regulation, environmental crisis

Re-regulating consumption in a time of crises? An exploration of post neo-liberal regulation

Climate change as well the ongoing financial crisis affect consumption. It is simply not possible to discuss changes in contemporary consumption without taking these issues into consideration. Indeed, having to face new and severe challenges raises the need for new regulations designed to alter existing "and now unwanted" practises.

In general, social practices are formed within everyday practical routines and structures of meanings, competencies, and social relations. Changes typically take place slowly, often unnoticed, and along lines that appear as natural to the actors involved. This is often relatively unproblematic in the sense that such processes involve replacing one consumption product with another, or call for adaptations that do not challenge the social status of those engaged in the process. Crises, however, may trigger needs for abrupt changes that are much more demanding because status positions and welfare levels are severely affected. In as much as that is the case, new regulations are likely to be subjected to resistance from the parties involved.

The aim of this paper is to explore such processes in view of sociological theories of consumption and debates on regulation of consumption. Our main focus is on institutional fields where there are conflicting interests between new regulations and market powers. Two much debated consumer issues are explored; viz. meat consumption and access to loans. Each refers to a distinct type of regulation; whereas the meat issue concerns moral campaigns to voluntarily adjust one's eating patterns, the financial issue involves legislative, command-and-control regulations. In as much as the actors do not respond to the calls for change, we ask whether the bottleneck is on the consumer side, regulator side, or perhaps somewhere else in the institutional field.

Semantic of naturalness - re-assuring consumers of a risky food production

Rückert-John, Jana

Institute for Social Sciences in Agriculture, University Hohenheim Stuttgart, Germany

Keywords

eating-out, Risk, nutrition, security, naturalness

Nutrition in the Western world appears as an unproblematic matter in everyday life. Its existential meaning is almost forgotten. But currently nutrition becomes an eminent topic again, when the consequences of industrial production of foodstuff make the headlines. Irritated by nutritional debates and the demands of the clientèle of eating-out organizations, the so-called large scale consumers are also under pressure. Hereby specific expectations seem to be the options for solutions in eating-out organizations; for example the use of organic, regional and otherwise specified foodstuffs that promise security. The implementation process of these kinds of products have not only manifold consequences for organizational routines but as well as the relationship between the organization and its clientèle.

This arises the question: how can eating-out organizations urge consumers to purchase the products promising security as an irrefutable argument? By presenting empirical results of some German case studies funded by the Federal Ministry of Food, Agriculture and Consumer Protection, it will be demonstrated that price is not the critical key factor to attract consumers, but rather the communication along terms such as nature, region, season, tradition, handcraft and social fairness. These terms refer to one another on the basis of the semantic syndrome naturalness. For example, the reference to nature and region induces a space-time limitation for the purchase of foodstuff suggesting control of danger as a reduction of risk. Furthermore this strategy promises to cause social effects for regional producers and direct sellers.

In this way the use of topics like region and nature in communication directs to security through naturalness. It represents an ontology, which is a lasting and not further contestable reference providing security. However in reality, the organizations transform danger into problems of function-specific handling of uncertainties. Therefore naturalness appears as a semantic solution of organizational problems.

Smoking as an adaptation - rationality and habituality of smoking in manual work

Katainen, Anu

*Department of Sociology, University of Helsinki
University of Helsinki, Finland*

Keywords

smoking, Social Class, habit

A vast amount of research has brought out the association of daily smoking with social class. Smoking is very common in the most disadvantaged groups, but it has also maintained its popularity among manual workers. It has been suggested that what explains the social differentiation of smoking is simply the fact that educated people are more interested in health matters and are therefore more motivated to quit smoking. However, previous qualitative studies on class and health have shown that health is considered equally important by all social groups. In addition, smoking seems to serve many positive functions, especially in stressful life circumstances.

The starting point of the paper is that health concerns and the functionality of smoking are only one part of the answer in explaining the social differentiation of smoking. What needs to be taken into account is the environment in which tobacco addiction takes place. The study is based on the interviews of 55 daily smokers, quitters and occasional smokers from different occupational backgrounds, and on observations made at the respondents' workplaces. In this paper, the main interest is in the rationality of smoking in working-class contexts and how it is related to daily routines and social settings in manual work. Theoretically, the study draws on the pragmatist idea of habits and how they are formed in accordance with the external environment.

As a shared ritual, smoking is a self-evident part of daily routines at the workplaces under scrutiny. The study shows how smoking serves as a legitimate way to challenge the official rules and to make work more bearable by increasing social contacts and the sense of belonging. Paradoxically, smoking is to a great extent an unquestionable routine but at the same time it increases the autonomy of the workers with regard to their daily tasks.

Social Stratification and Cultural Preferences: National Cultural Capital and Taste in Music in Israel

Halutz, Doron

Sociology and Anthropology, Tel Aviv University

Tel Aviv, Israel

Keywords

sociology of taste, measurement, cultural stratification, Social stratification

Most research on social stratification and cultural preferences conceptualizes cultural capital as a universal repertoire of art works and genres ("high art"), whose consumption, or familiarity with, can confer social prestige. This conceptualization was criticized for being too narrow, as more and more cultural forms are recognized as potential cultural capital in a range of social contexts (e.g. "popular cultural capital", "subcultural capital" and "Multicultural capital").

My paper deals with another potential kind of cultural capital, namely National Cultural Capital. This term refers to the specific cultural capital and habitus which define natural membership in the national culture. It raises the question whether in immigration societies another dimension of inequality is formed around cultural items that can define belonging to the national collective.

Using new survey data from 2007 (N=411), I have investigated the associations between musical preferences and social position among adult Jews in Israel, focusing on the three main local genres struggling over the definition of the desired form of "Israeliness" in the field of popular music in Israel.

Two main findings are emphasized:

- (1) Hierarchy exists within genres as well as between genres; a fractal pattern can be discerned. However, the associations between stratification variables and musical taste indicators do not perfectly match the accepted division between "high" and "low" art/music.
- (2) Liking Songs-of-the-Land-of-Israel (one of the genres) is statistically associated with liking "high" music. Although SLI is considered folk music, not part of the traditional "high" arts, it enjoys a unique symbolic status in Israel. This might indicate that the elitist group is inclusive (omnivore) rather than exclusive (univore), but its inclusiveness is limited to canonical popular genres and musicians. It is not as boundaries-crossing (a mixture of "high" and "low") as is implicated by Peterson's Omnivore-Univore theory.

Sociological theories and food insecurity: A practice theory approach

Masullo, Ana

sociology, ERIS/INRA

Paris, France

Keywords

Poverty, food consumption, food insecurity

This presentation aims to do a critical presentation of an epidemiological tool designed to study food consumption and make some recommendations issued from an empirical qualitative study (precarious people interviewed in Paris and suburbs and 3000 quantitative questionnaires in the same area).

Food security is a conceptual and analytical concept used to identify households which have high economical constraints to food consumption applied to big samples in the US and Canada. According to FAO's, Rome declaration on world food security, 'Food security exists when people, at all times, have physical and economic access to sufficient, safe and nutrition food to meet their dietary needs and food preferences for an active and healthy life'. This concept has evolved including new dimensions. Three main conceptual developments can be identified: a shift from using measures of food availability and utilization to measure 'inadequate access', a shift from a focus on objective to subjective measures and a growing emphasis on fundamental measurement as opposed to reliance on distal, proxy measures. (Weed et al:2006).

Sociological approach, inspired in theories of practice can contribute to improve this tool of measurement. It seems imperative to consider individuals or households as more than biological entities or 'consumers' (Warde) but to understand food consumption as a social practice with strong influence in everyday life, wellbeing, social integration and participation into society (Bordieu). Include new dimensions of food insecurity emerged from qualitative studies and not considered yet as part of food insecurity. Giving a sociological depth to the concept can enlarge the population considered as food insecure and not only limit it to households having economical constraints but also stress, lack of time or absence psychological disposition to food practices investment. The food insecurity questionnaire made by 18 questions is focussed on budget and household, hiding inequalities related to food access and also different degrees of constraint. Secondly, inequalities at the individual level should be also studied, even if the food consumption unit is the household some studies begin to point the inequalities among members of the same households (adults/children, women/men, active/unemployed, i.e.).

Sociological traditions, taste and new cultural connections

Liikkanen, Mirja

*Culture, media, time use, Statistics Finland
Helsinki, Finland*

Keywords

materiality, cultural taste, sociological traditions of studying taste, new connections

The paper discusses the sociological traditions of studying cultural taste and cultural consumption. It asks whether the classical sociological theories of cultural taste connect the reasoning to the hierarchies of past structures modern society. Sociological theories of taste seem often to presume the basic institutions of modern society to be fairly stable, to have clear borderlines and also to be rather similar in different western societies. The belief in trickle down effect of the taste and as well as the supposition of homology between the taste, the class/status position and the way of living are strong. This seems to have led to a certain factualism and over-emphasizing of quantitative data including given and constant genre and taste classifications. The paper discusses also the limitations of importing and exporting theories and cultural classifications and their interpretations and meanings from country to country and/or from continent to another. Sociological studies of cultural taste often also abandon the materiality and affectionality of cultural practices and taste.

Culture is at the moment in the centre of the rhetoric of many international bodies and organizations, and of national policies. The new economical thinking emphasizes countable evidence. The idea of evidence based policy concept has rapidly circulated around the world. The development gives more and more emphasis to quantitative presentations of culture and cultural consumption as part of comprehensive economical frameworks and 'creative economy?'. The paper discusses the paradox that in spite of the common emphasis on quantitative data the sociological research on cultural consumption and taste seem not to have any comment on this new powerful development.

The paper claims that in everyday world the traditional borderlines and hierarchies are changing or even collapsing. Boundaries of work and leisure, production and consuming are fading and the origin of taste and it's uses in society are in a process of altering. In consequence the notions of cultural capital and legitimate taste need be re-thought and re-defined. The challenge is to find out tools and interpretations for grasping new forms of power and new forms of connectivity.

Some aspects of modern tourism: a sociological review

Boklin, Alex

*Sociology, Higher School of Economics
Moscow, Russian Federation*

Keywords

society of possible, Authenticity, post modernity, day-to-day vs. extraordinary, tourism

The present paper will pursue two main objects. The first one follows from its title - to outline and shortly, in a summary manner, shed light on a few aspects of tourism from a sociological point of view. Achieving of the second goal consist in putting the things discussed in a wider context: I intend to show that in the very process of elucidating these aspects fundamental questions of sociological ? and more broadly, philosophical - classics arise. That is, what may seem at first glance to be an ?unserious? topic (tourism in our case) hides very serious problems with considerable history.

As a whole, it is necessary to note that my paper would be rather an effort to stimulate further discussions than to conduct a profound revision of works (whether they are sociological or philosophical) related to tourism.

Thus, I plan to examine several themes connected with each other:

- authenticity of touristic experience;
- compensatory character of tourism: day-to-day vs. extraordinary;
- leisure and multitude of opportunities as compulsory forces;
- the fall of vitality in the age of post modernity.

During my presentation, I will step by step touch upon these four points and then will try to trace their theoretical beginnings.

Stakeholders' perception of consumers' barriers to energy saving

Throne-Holst, Harald

*SIFO, National Institute for Consumer Research
Oslo, Norway*

Stø, Eivind

*SIFO, National Institute for Consumer Research
Oslo, Norway*

Keywords

stakeholder perceptions, energy behaviour, barriers for change

The main objective of the paper is to develop methods to identify the relevance and strengths of various barriers for change in the energy behaviour of end consumers and households. Based upon state of the art, we have identified the following barriers: physical and structural, political, cultural-normative/social, economic, knowledge based and individual-psychological.

Further the project will discuss how activities from different stakeholders can overcome such barriers.

In this paper the results of interviews with strategic stakeholders in Norway will be presented.

We carried out 9 stakeholder interviews: Five in the area of energy in houses, three in mobility and one for purchase of household appliances. In the interviews the stakeholders were first asked about what barriers they saw for change in the energy behaviour, the reasons behind these barriers, who was involved and if their peers would agree on their suggestions. Further we presented our own suggestion for barriers, and we asked the stakeholders to reflect on these, and rank them in order of importance. Finally we asked for attempts to overcome barriers in the past, and how they could be overcome in the future.

We will here be reporting from an ongoing European project, BAREENERGY, coordinated by SIFO. An integral part of the project is to combine institutional and individual approaches. This is important as the behaviour of consumers do take place within a context and framework created by businesses and political authorities. This paper will take this into account and analyse the interviews with respect to how the stakeholders view both the consumers and the barriers they face, and how this can be understood in such combined approach.

Sustainable consumption by online trading: The example of eBay

Birgit, Blättel-Mink

Social Sciences, Goethe-University Frankfurt/Main Frankfurt/Main, Germany

Keywords

online second hand trading, prosuming, sustainable consumption

By online trading (e.g. eBay, amazon), compared to traditional consumption, not only the quantity of consumption is changing, but also the individual way of consuming. As a result, the decoupling of production and consumption, an effect of industrial revolution, is at least partly revised. Consumers, i.e. users of online trading, are not only buyers but also sellers of goods and services. The consumer is playing a more active role by also fulfilling tasks of the producer - she / he turns into a prosumer.

One type of online trading is second hand trading. So called rotating ownership is more and more becoming a societal trend. Compared to earlier generations, the ownership of e.g. items of furniture, books or clothes is no longer seen as permanent but more and more as temporary.

The question is, in how far with this kind of prosuming, i.e. buying new or second hand goods with the intention to resell them after a certain time span, attitudes towards owning goods are changing and, sustainable consumption is increasing. Can we observe a new type of consumption, a culture of auction, that no longer strives to accumulate goods but to own and use them for a certain time and resell them again? Is online trading of second hand goods accompanied by increasing life span of goods, and does the avoidance of buying new goods in addition reduce ecological damage? Or, is it the other way round: rotating ownership increases and fastens consumption?

Within the framework of an interdisciplinary research project a standardised survey of users of eBay dealing with the above questions was carried out. Theoretically the project relies on research on sustainable consumption and trading, media use, and innovation. In the paper first results of this survey will be presented.

Symbolic value as destruction of wealth - Are Bataille's concepts and insights relevant to the sociology of consumption?

Strandbakken, Pål

SIFO, National Institute for Consumer Research - SIFO

Oslo, Norway

Keywords

Bataille, destruction, symbolic value

The paper explores whether Georges Bataille's rather eccentric writings on economy and consumption might give fresh insights to modern consumer studies. Building on material presented in Marcel Mauss' study of The Gift, Bataille turned economy on its head, and claimed that the most important problem in the economy was overproduction/surplus rather than want. Even without accepting his general view on economics (which obviously is linked to his thinking and writing at large), we might use fruitful and relevant elements and aspects of it in order to - if possible - improve the theoretical status of the sociology of consumption.

The basic idea of Bataille, developing Mauss and related to, but perhaps not referring to, Veblen, is that symbolic goods, or symbol value, reflects different ways of destructing value in its more traditional sense. Potlatch rituals were status competitions where the winner was the chief who could afford to loose most. Similarly, the price of certain art objects is so high that they remove the owner's wealth from the productive arena, 'destroying' value for a completely useless object. A Lois Vuitton bag mainly carries the signal "expensive", giving it symbolic value for the amount of money it destroys in the price difference between a plastic bag and a designer bag.

These ideas seem relevant and under investigated in modern consumer studies.

The "Bimby phenomenon" and the change in food consumption lifestyles

Urbano, Claudia Valadas

*CesNova - Sociology, Faculty of Human and Social Sciences - New University of Lisbon
Lisbon, Portugal*

Jorge, Nuno

Social and Organizational Sciences, Polytechnical Institute of Santarem Santarem, Portugal

Keywords

sociology or consumption, food, lifestyle

Bimby (known as Thermomix in several countries) is an electronic device that helps to produce full meals and is nowadays part of the lifestyle of a significant proportion of Portuguese population. It is an expensive device which costs more than twice the Portuguese minimum wage, apparently being only accessible to certain social groups. However, it seems to be a cross-class phenomenon. Without knowing exactly which are the socioeconomic characteristics of Bimby's users, due to absence of specific researches on this matter, it seems that there is a change in practices of cooking and eating habits, associated to a different investment on consumption of food. There are about 80,000 Bimby machines sold in Portugal. Despite the analysis of social classes, we propose an exploratory approach to the Portuguese online forums (four exclusively focused on the Bimby theme): through a qualitative analysis of the posted messages, we aim to understand what changes occurred in the habits of food consumption produced by "bimbyfication" of Portuguese homes, besides the analysis of other issues beyond the mere exchange of recipes and cooking techniques with Bimby.

After a modernization of food, with McDonaldization and the empire of fast food, in a modern society of fast consumption and accelerated routines with outdoor meals, is Bimby creating a new indoor lifestyle? Which changes these devices like Bimby will produce in Portuguese food lifestyles? Will it be a consumption fever, or a trend, such as that occurred in the 80s with blenders, machines to cut ham, and homemade bread mixers, which led many people to buy them despite their short use afterwards? These are some of the questions we would like to discuss with this paper.

The Consequences of Cultural and Economic Resources for Tastes and Cultural Participation

Katz-Gerro, Tally

*Sociology and Anthropology, University of Haifa
Haifa, Israel*

Yaish, Meir

*Sociology and Anthropology, University of Haifa
Haifa, Israel*

Keywords

taste, cultural capital, Distinction

Most studies of the determinants of cultural capital have used taste or participation as interchangeable indicators of embodied cultural capital. In this paper, we propose to treat the two concepts separately. Specifically, we argue that participation is constrained to a larger degree by financial resources than tastes and to a lesser degree by cultural resources (parental cultural capital, father's education, and respondent's education); we further argue that tastes are shaped to a greater degree than participation by socialization processes and through the habitus and, to a lesser degree, by financial resources.

This paper contributes to two aspects of the literature on cultural stratification. First, it deepens our understanding of the association between individuals' tastes and their cultural participation, an issue that has rarely been addressed before. Second, it raises a discussion of the relative influence of cultural vs. economic resources on tastes vs. participation, which have not yet been modeled simultaneously.

Data for this research was purposely collected by the authors in a survey that was conducted in 2007 in Israel. As expected, we find that cultural participation is constrained by tastes and economic resources, while tastes are constrained by cultural resources but not by income.

The consumer boycott in Spain - Theoretical reflections and empirical results

Llopis-Goig, Ramon

Department of Sociology and Social Anthropology, University of Valencia Spain, <http://www.uv.es>

Keywords

Spanish society, Political consumerism, Consumer boycott

In the past, the job provided the worker with the central axis of the formation of his/her identity, as well as the ability to act as a counterforce by withdrawing the work effort through the organized strike (Beck, 2004: 30). But this role played by work as the basic element in the formation of the individual's identity has been replaced to a large degree by consumption (Bocock, 1995; Lury, 1996; Alonso, 2005; Bauman, 2007), as the previous dialectic is being increasingly impaired by the lost centrality of work, but also by the new trans-border mobility of capital. Thus, the role of counterforce corresponds more and more to the global civil society, and especially to the figure of the political consumer, whose power stems from the fact that s/he can refuse to purchase at any place and time. This possibility of refusing to buy constitutes a form of political consumerism whose presence has begun to grow in Spanish society in the past few years.

This communication is divided into two main sections. In the first, a review is carried out of the main theoretical proposals based on which the study of the consumer boycott can be approached: i) as a form of political protest (Barnes & Kaase, 1979); ii) as an expression of reflectivity (Beck, Giddens & Lash, 1997), as a means of increasing the feeling of consumer sovereignty (Beck, 1998: 108); and iii) as an exercise in self-expression and a challenge to the characteristic elite in a post-industrial society (Inglehart & Welzel, 2006). In the second part, an examination is made of whether, as the specialized literature has suggested, younger individuals are those who are more willing to perform this type of behaviours (Stolle, Hooghe & Micheletti, 2005; Fraile, Ferrer & Martín, 2007), the participation is greater as the educational level increases (Cainzos, 2006), and there are no differences according to sex (Ferrer, Medina & Torcal, 2006). This second section will be carried out based on the results of a survey taken of 3192 Spanish adults.

The consumption of aesthetic surgery in Italy: old gaps, new vocabularies

Ghigi, Rossella

dicpartimento di scienze della educazione, university of bologna Italy,

Keywords

aesthetic surgery, Body, Consumption, Health

Aesthetic surgery represents an ever-increasing market in Europe, having reached unprecedented levels of growth in the last twenty years. Through an analysis of both quantitative and qualitative data, this paper tries to evaluate the import of this market and to investigate the ways in which it concerns people of different ranks, classes, age, educational level and gender.

The first part of the paper examines the dissemination of aesthetic surgery on Italian territory through a survey of yellow-pages data on the professional practices of surgeons. This introductory glance shows very clearly that the distribution of aesthetic surgery is more similar to the distribution of fitness and beauty business-related services than that of other kinds of surgery. The outcomes of an original survey conducted in Italy in 2005-2006 on a sample of 5060 individuals are then presented. These data show that there is an urgency to assess the real proportions of the phenomenon, stressing the existence of gender and educational level gaps among people declaring to have undergone aesthetic surgery or to be willing to undergo aesthetic surgery procedures in the near future. At the same time, these data show an important change in relation to younger generations, who are significantly better disposed toward aesthetic surgery.

The second part of the paper is based on qualitative interviews with patients as well as with aesthetic surgeons. This second part also contributes to throwing light on the way in which people of different age, gender and educational levels look at aesthetic surgery as well as what repertoires and vocabulary they deploy in order to legitimate it.

Conclusions underline that media provide a stereotyped image of aesthetic surgery, presenting it as something relevant to ordinary people in everyday life and underestimating differences; but data are far from confirming it.

The contemporary estheticization of products through the shop window-dressing. Parfois: A case study analysis

Abreu, Maria José

2C2T (Centro de Ciência e Tecnologia Têxtil), Textile Engineering Department, University of Minho Guimarães, Portugal

Pires, Maria Helena

*CECS - Centre of Studies in Communication and Society, Department of Communication Sciences, University of Minho
Braga, Portugal*

Lima e Silva, Mellissa

2C2T (Centro de Ciência e Tecnologia Têxtil), Textile Engineering Department, University of Minho Guimarães, Portugal

Keywords

consumer culture, Shop window, Estheticization, Visual merchandising.

At least from the nineteenth century, shop windows constitute an effective way of trying to seduce consumers. With the modern society as with the industrialisation development, products obtain social significance mainly by their symbolic or exchange value. Karl Marx, in a materialistic perspective, had already underlined this phenomenon. There are also other contemporary authors, like Fritz Haug, Jean Baudrillard and Gilles Lipovetsky, who were concerned with this problematic of consumption. The study of the product's estheticization process is quite important, in order to understand psychological and social mechanisms that make us vulnerable to packaging, advertising and to several strategic manners of engaging our sensitive and emotional motivations. The fact is, that consumer behaviour is often mobilised by fantasies, secret desires and unexpected impulses...

Shop windows have also inspired different domains of interest, from literature, arts and cinema to architecture. The work of Charles Baudelaire (The Painter of the Modern Life), Walter Benjamin (The Passage's Project), but also that one of Dziga Vertov (The Man With the Movie Camera) and Walther Ruttmann (Berlin, The Symphony of a Great City) is quite known in terms of cultural references from the ending of the XIX and from the beginning of the XX centuries.

It is our purpose to study shop windows in a multidisciplinary perspective and to focus on the strategic visual process of articulating the exterior with the interior. How and in what basis the professionals of windows display invite the passers-by to pay attention to the showed products? And even to enter in the shop? From the consumer's point of view, what is the relation between visual consumption and effective one? In what way shop windows-dressing is related to urban architecture and culture?

We intend to answer these and other questions through a case study analysis, based on Parfois in Portugal, as a fashion accessory brand with an especial strategy of visual merchandising. In order to achieve this goal, we developed an empirical investigation centred on observation and interviews, crossing qualitative and quantitative methodologies.

The habitus of taste. The blurring of cultural consumption practices

Leonzi, Silvia

*Department of Sociology and Communication, Sapienza University of Rome
Rome, Italy*

Di Stefano, Antonio

*Department of Sociology and Communication, Sapienza University of Rome
Rome, Italy*

Keywords

Bourdieu, taste, habitus, cultural consumption, cultural omnivorousness

Among the most significant theoretical constructs of Bourdieu's analysis framework, especially concerning the consumption practices and the formation of individual taste, the habitus is a fundamental theoretical node with regard to society and its network study, although, specifically in American scientific context, the concepts of field and capital became more important than this category in last years (Sallaz, Zavisca 2007). Actually, the social becomes embedded into the individual through habitus (Wacquant, 2005) but the social becomes individualized because the meaning construction of individual action is at the base of social process (Melucci, 1996).

Bourdieu outlined a relational model where the traditional class is replaced by position adopted by social actor and taste becomes, at same time, a social disposition and a weapon of power (Zolberg, 1986). However, in last two decades, in the wider social setting where communication has assumed a central role in terms of habitus and habitat, the disintegration process of socio-cultural barriers and, contextually, the development of omnivorous behaviours (Peterson, 1996) shows the significant changes concerning the symbolic field in which practices are produced and structured.

Then, in terms of ecological approach, the habitus assumes a new semantic value. Indeed, according to Bourdieu if this theoretical dimension characterized particular processes of meaning and action building, into a wide range of trajectories, today the cultural omnivorousness appears to reflect a less structured and a more structuring habitus, where individual can continually gain access to plural habitus or, at least, to blurred patterns (Meyrowitz, 1985) of taste strategies.

The image of the consumer role, constructed by motivational research and marketing

Hellmann, Kai-Uwe

*Institute for Sociology, Technical University Berlin
Berlin, Germany*

Keywords

marketing, agency, role, Motivational Research, consumer

The image of the consumer role, constructed by motivational research and marketing.

A contribution to the sociology of the consumer

In 2000 John W. Meyer and Ronald L. Jepperson published an essay dealing with the cultural construction of social agency which means that phenomena we designate with terms such as act/action/agent are not of natural origin but constructed artificially. Thus, the specific meaning implied in these terms can be bundled into the question of qualification: who is qualified, qualified due to which criteria, to be in charge of and responsible for action?

Keeping this approach in mind, it can be said that the role of the consumer also can be viewed as a cultural construction of social agency within the modern society although we do not know much about the outlines of this role. Many questions remain open. How, for example, has the cultural construction of the modern consumer emerged? Who was responsible for its production? Since when does this role exist? And what about the key features of this role?

To try to answer some of these questions it could be fruitful to consult motivational research especially the work of Dr. Ernest Dichter because he ranks as one of the fathers of motivational research. The task of this contribution will be thus to show how motivational research and accompanying marketing efforts during the 40ties and 50ties of the 20th century were highly engaged with the construction, emergence and denotation of the consumer's role.

The Lisbon oriental waterfront renewed: Parque das Nações as a metropolitan territory of leisure and consumption

Pereira, Patrícia

*Sociology, Centro de Estudos de Sociologia da Universidade Nova de Lisboa and Faculdade de Ciências Sociais e Humanas da Universidade Nova de Lisboa
Lisbon, Portugal*

Keywords

Lisbon, Waterfront renewal, Metropolitanisation, Consumption and leisure spaces, Urban sociabilities

Result of the conversion of an urban void - turned obsolete by the transformation and relocation of industrial and port activities - today, Parque das Nações is a privileged metropolitan space of leisure and consumption. Just as the similar projects undertaken in Barcelona and Bilbao, to name only some of the most important, it is part of the third and last generation of renewed waterfronts identified in the literature on the subject. This third generation is characterized by the fact that waterfronts are meant to be showcases of the potential, the uniqueness and the modernity of their cities, assuring at the same time that the space possess a "global" resonance that might elevate them to the condition of metropolises.

The singularity and the modernity of Parque das Nações is based on cultural equipments and public spaces that are unique in a functional point of view, as well as in an aesthetical one, as they were conceived by renowned architects. This takes part of a seduction strategy with the purpose of creating a prestigious and sophisticated image of Lisbon.

Alongside a prestigious type of cultural consumption, other types occur in this plural territory. Different metropolitan, national and international populations come together here; multiple forms of consumption and leisure activities happen here.

The activities linked to commerce don't have a purely utilitarian function; they contribute to structure lifestyles and sociabilities and are amongst the most common leisure activities. This paper presents data resulting from an approach to the consumption practices of the socially differenced populations that come together at Parque das Nações, through interviews and the direct observation of the territory. The development of a typology of consumption spaces, in a broad sense, allows to characterize them, to identify who frequent them, with which ends, and to interpret the social relations and inequalities established there.

Special relevance will be attributed to the Vasco da Gama Shopping Centre, simulacrum of the ideal city, safe and comfortable, that possess, unlike much of other shopping centres, characteristics that aim to strongly connect it to its "unique" surroundings.

The Mcdonaldization of Tourism. An inquiry into the tendency of young people to choose "rationalized" vacation environments

Ferraresi, Mauro

*Sociology of Consumption, IULM University
Milano, Italy*

Stigliano, Giuseppe

*Sociology of Consumption, IULM University
Milan, Italy*

Keywords

simulation, tourism, McDonaldization, Risk, young people

The World Tourism Organization defines tourists as people who "travel to and stay in places outside their usual environment for not more than one consecutive year for leisure, business and other purposes not related to the exercise of an activity remunerated from within the place visited".

Tourism has always been seen as a major opportunity for people to get in touch with different cultures and habits. This is much more important for young people since it can be considered a very important part of their education, a way to enlarge the horizons.

Many authors noticed the relationship between Rationalization theory and the tourism sector.

This research investigates how young Italian tourists attitudes and practices relate to their choice for vacation destinations, in order to understand the reasons why, in many cases, they tend to prefer rationalized environment. On the one hand these places enable them to relax themselves, to have fun, to enjoy wonderful beaches and mountains, to act in a safe and predictable environment. On the other hand this package vacations tend to reduce their chances to experience the real nature of a different place.

This paper refers to Ritzer's McDonaldization of Society thesis, Beck's Theory of Risk Society and Baudrillard's Simulation Theory. Our aim is to understand why many young Italian university-educated tourists are more likely to spend their vacation time in a sort of Non-Place instead of choosing other forms of tourism.

A qualitative exploration of consumer attitudes carried out with 4 focus group interview sessions held with students attending IULM University in Milan (48 subjects) assesses their personal attitudes and practices with regard to vacation choice.

By focusing on their vacation preferences, this research results form the basis to better understand young people behavior referring to rationalized environments.

The Moral Economy of Consumption in Europe: A Multilevel Analysis across 19 European Countries

Koos, Sebastian

*Faculty of Social Sciences, University of Mannheim
Mannheim, Germany*

Keywords

europe, political consumption, multi level analysis

The last decade has seen a tremendous increase in the sales of fair trade, organic and ecological labelled products in Europe. Political scientists also note an increase in boycotting behaviour over time and coined the term 'political consumption' to capture the political nature of boycotting and buying for ethical, environmental and political reasons. Research on this kind of consumption behaviour thus far focuses mostly on qualitative studies or quantitative analysis of single countries. In this study I develop a cross national comparative framework to explain individual and country level differences of political, or more broadly conceived ethical consumption behaviour. Hypotheses are tested empirically using data of the 2002/2003 European Social Survey for 19 European countries. While taking into account economic and political factors I argue that especially individual value orientations are important to explain boycotting and political shopping. Thus consumers form a moral economy of consumption. However to fully understand the moral economy of consumption, explanations cannot be reduced to individual motivations, resources and costs, but also need to take into account the macro social context, in which action is embedded. Drawing on movement theories and literature on sub-politics three main aspects can be discerned to explain international differences in political consumption: the extent of globalization, national affluence and the presence of national product labelling schemes. By combining country level data with micro level data of the European Social Survey the hypotheses are tested using logistical multi level regression analysis. While on the individual level education level and individual value orientations have an important significant effect, on the macro level especially national affluence has a strong predictive power for political consumption.

The Paradox of the Shopping Mall in Ankara: The Restrictive But Inclusive Quasi-Public Space of ANKAmall

Akcaoglu, Aksu

*Sociology, Middle East Technical University
Turkey,*

Keywords

Ankara, shopping mall., habitus, Public Space

As a result of the mushrooming growth of shopping malls all around the city, the capital of Turkey, Ankara, has gained a new landscape in which public space acquired different attributes than its predecessors. Like the cases in the U.S., as well as Europe, the primacy of security and the rational organization of the space are among the significant threats leading to the emergence of a homogeneous visitor profile of shopping malls in Ankara. However, the visitor profile of the shopping malls in Ankara is far from being homogeneous. In the context of Ankara, the mall does not simply mean a pursuit for the lost community life, as it is argued to do in the U.S., but rather it represents the emergence of a new center of social life which is rival to the urban public spaces. Although the existing economic inequalities outside the mall are reshaped through the relations of consumption within the mall by creating a high self-control mechanism especially over lower income visitors, it does not prevent mall to transform into being a plural material habitus. Resting on a qualitative research which was conducted in the biggest mall of the city with people from different income, gender and age groups in the summer of 2007, in this paper I aim to focus on the conflicting dynamics of the emergent quasi-public space of ANKAmall.

The rise of ethical fashion: a sociological perspective

Mortara, Ariela

*Consumption, behaviour and corporate communication, IULM University
Milan, Italy*

Keywords

fashion, ethical consumption, ethical fashion

Since the early nineteenth imitation and distinction has been recognised as relevant in the functioning of fashion: indeed Simmel described fashion as one of the many forms of life through which people is trying to merge the tendency towards social equalization with the desire for individual differentiation and change (Simmel, 1904). Further, the existence of fashion relies upon a stratified society, in which imitation acts as a driver for people belonging to the lower part of society toward an higher social status, and distinction as a way for people belonging to the upper classes to distinguish themselves. Nowadays, consumers can rely on many very different fashions? styles to differentiate themselves and ethical fashion is one the most popular. In the last years there have been ethical fashion shows all over the world (i. e. Paris, Milan, London and New York) and most of the popular fashion brands have produced clothes line made with organic cotton (i.e. Zara and H&M).

The aim of the paper is to analyse the surge of ethical fashion verifying if it is rooted on an real quest for ethics or if it's simply a marketing tool. Furthermore, the paper will explore how ethical fashion can satisfy the need of consumers toward an ethical way of consumption, as largely testified from the spread of ethical consumption in many other fields (food, tourism, bank services) and, at the same time, comply to the struggle between the two forces than characterize fashion even in Western contemporary societies, surely less stratified than in the past.

References

Georg S. (1904), "Fashion", International Quarterly, 10(1), October 1904, pp. 130-155.

Transformations of Fashion: On the rise of a new democracy in fashion and its consequences

Titton, Monica

*Department of Sociology, University of Vienna
Vienna, Austria*

Keywords

class distinction, fashion studies, sociology of consumption

In my talk I want to discuss two intersecting processes taking place in the realm of fashion: on the one hand, the slow disappearing of the labels 'high' and 'low' in fashion, and on the other hand the dissolving of borders between fashion design and art. With Bourdieu's theory of class distinction and his approach to the artistic field in mind, I will investigate the consequences of these transformations.

The growth of low-priced fashion-chains such as H&M, Mango, Zara, etc., has led to what I want to call a 'democratization' of fashion. Due to very short production cycles and the use of low-cost materials, the dominant fashion-chains can make apparel affordable for everyone that is very similar to that seen on the ready-to-wear-shows of Paris and New York accessible to a mass market. This tendency of copying high-fashion has changed the clientele of fashion-chains throughout the last years, which now consists of customers of a broad socioeconomic spectrum. My thesis is that this process results in the attenuation of class distinction in apparel, or to speak with Veblen, in the decrease of fashion's ability to serve the purpose of 'conspicuous consumption'.

Because of this development, today high-end fashion labels have to directly compete with cheap clothing-chains. Expensive fashion companies seek to preserve their brand essence, which is the aura of uniqueness and luxury attached to their products. The best example for such a strategy is the one pursued by fashion designer Marc Jacobs, currently creative director of the French luxury label Louis Vuitton. He has collaborated with several performing artists, such as Richard Prince, creating Louis Vuitton handbags in limited editions. Ownership of such a handbag is - following Bourdieu's theory of class distinction - an act of social distinction, giving the owner the feeling of exclusiveness. When the handbag is created in part by an artist and is, similar to 'conventional' art, available only to a limited clientele, the fetish attributed to art is conferred upon the fashion accessory which thus becomes a super-exclusive medium of distinction.

Further theoretical implications on these developments will be outlined in my contribution.

Understanding ethical consumption as public participation: institutions and behaviours

Gulyás, Emese

PhD School of Sociology, Corvinus University of Budapest Budapest, Hungary

Keywords

institutions, political participation, ethical consumption, motivations

The paper outlines the interpretations and examines the phenomenon of ethical consumerism in Hungary. Its thesis is that ethical consumerism appears due to the ongoing changes of democratic political culture, as a result of the declining legitimacy of governments and the diversification of political participation opportunities. The paper uses Beck's theory of reflexive modernisation and subpolitics as an analytical framework, according to which there is a parallelism between the declining power of governments and classical, participatory political institutions, and the growing importance of the new political functions of the market.

Scholars stress the pressurizing nature of political consumption, seeing consumers not just as market players, but as political actors as well. The market is also a place for political and moral action. Market decisions reflect on the interpretations of material goods placed within a complex social and normative context, which according to the often used 'dollar vote' analogy means that through their purchasing decisions consumers participate in shaping society, just as they do through their political vote. The political consumption approach assigns instrumental nature of consumption a central role: the need to see changes in unwanted corporate or political practices plays an important role in consumer choices.

The paper analyses the results of a representative survey about ethical consumer and political attitudes from 2005, which showed that ethical consumers, comparing to other citizens, are more likely to join boycotts and social forums, and more likely consider them as efficient representation tools; ethical consumers assign importance to the use of traditional political institutions, however they doubt its efficiency. On the other hand results from a qualitative research from 2009 are presented. 30 structured interviews were conducted with consumers who practice at least one form of the following behaviors that are labelled as ethical consumption in the literature: buying from community supported agriculture, participate in direct link purchasing circles, buy fair trade products. The aim of the interviews was to understand the main motivations of the so called political-ethical consumers, their social and cognitive embeddedness into the individual political attitudes and behaviors, with a special focus on the need for public participation.

Virtual consumption, real meanings: an ethnographic research about consumption in Second Life

Bartoletti, Roberta

Communication Sciences, University of Urbino

Urbino, Italy

Keywords

virtual worlds, virtual ethnography, material culture, Second Life, Consumption

The paper focuses on the results of a research on consumption in one of the most popular online virtual world: Second Life (SL). The consumption play a central role in SL, a virtual world completely imagined and created by its Residents (its users or consumers).

The ethnographic research was conducted through participant observation and in-world interviews with SL Italian residents and focuses on differences and similarities with consumption in the material real life.

I discovered that through consumption SL Residents construct their identities, relationships and their in-world status in a very similar way to what happen in the real life (Douglas, Miller): the role of digital consumption objects in constructing meanings is metaphorically very similar to the role of material culture in the real life.

Secondly, consumption in a virtual world copes with augmented possibilities and new constraints, that are generated both by the rules of the virtual world (in the case of SL, rules of a digital capitalist market economy) and by the uses of its Residents (patterns of interaction, rituals, ecc.). In SL, for example, the priority given to the protection of the property right (each Resident is owner of its creations in-world) reduce the possibilities of a gift economy. At the same time, in SL there are more possibilities for consumption than in the real life thanks to the diffused availability of free stuffs in the in-world market. I finally observed practices that can be classified as sustainable consumption.

Visual arts appreciation patterns: crossing horizontal and vertical boundaries within the cultural hierarchy

Berghman, Michaël

Centre for Sociological Research, KULeuven Leuven, Belgium

van Eijck, Koen

Department of Arts and Culture Studies, Erasmus University Rotterdam Rotterdam, The Netherlands

Keywords

cultural omnivore, legitimate visual arts, cultural boundaries

The appreciation of nine distinct visual art styles was assessed by presenting color plates to some 3,000 Flemish respondents. We set out to study the relation between vertical cultural boundary crossing, or omnivorousness as we know it, and horizontal boundary crossing, i.e., a broad and encompassing preference within the domain of legitimate visual arts. It turns out that, although Bourdieu's distinction between a conservative taste for classical works and a more progressive taste for modern art remains highly relevant, a substantial proportion of our sample enjoys both classical and modern works. This latter segment also ventures somewhat into non-legitimate culture. We thus discern a group that combines high levels of horizontal boundary crossing within the legitimate visual arts with some vertical boundary crossing. However, the cluster limiting its visual arts preferences to modern works has markedly more outspoken non-legitimate and popular preferences. This reminds us of the bourdieusian difference between a culturally apt social segment, the cultural elite, for whom cultural stimulation prevails over symbolic restrictions, and a new middle class, paying lip service to the more complex, highly valued products of modern art, while keeping active participation within the confines of popular or non-legitimate culture. Those with a visual arts taste limited to classical works are much less culturally active, as are those with low preference levels for most modern and classical visual art styles. As such, the analyses demonstrate that horizontal and vertical cultural boundary crossing have different meanings and probably represent distinct strategies for distinction as well.

What will happen to luxury consumption?

Wilska, Terhi-Anna

*Department of Marketing, Turku School of Economics
Turku, Finland*

Keywords

Globalization, luxury consumption, conspicuous consumption, economic changes, standardization

Research on conspicuous and distinctive consumption from the perspectives of Veblen or Bourdieu has attracted academics for decades. However, empirical evidence supporting these theories is not very strong in all consumer societies. This study focuses on the past, present and future of conspicuous and luxury consumption in Finland, reflecting changes in global and national economy. The data employed are Finnish Household Budget Surveys 1990-2006, and two lifestyle surveys. According to the results, particularly during the economic boom of the 2000s, Finnish people's income and consumption increased rapidly. The structure of consumption oriented more and more to leisure time and luxury. Expenditure on cars and other vehicles, technology, travelling, culture and health and beauty services multiplied. Also luxury items and services, such as expensive houses, jewellery, luxury holidays, haute couture clothes and branded goods became more familiar to Finnish consumers. This is not only a matter of money, but general attitudes towards consumption have changed.

However, simultaneously with the increase of conspicuous consumption, consumer cultures have become more standardized and globalized, as described by Georg Ritzer, Alan Bryman, and Naomi Klein, for instance. Also in Finland, global store chains, discount stores and hypermarkets have expanded rapidly, and the popularity of cheap mass products have increased. Economic depression will probably accelerate this development. Also the worry about environmental issues may re-change the consumption patterns of Finnish households. It is likely that luxury consumption will go down in the future. The interesting question is how much.

Wine consumption in semi-public daily life Porto

Magalhães, Dulce Maria

Sociologia, Faculdade de Letras da Universidade do Porto Porto, Portugal

Keywords

wine consumptions, semi-public spaces, social differentiations, taverns, elitist clubs

The city of Porto has semi-public physical spaces specifically dedicated to the consumption of wine. They are different semi-public contexts, each with distinctive features, whether in terms of physical structure, clients and roles, or in terms of the social and symbolic dimensions stemming from the wines there offered. This paper focuses on a sociological approach to the daily wine practices of individuals in a social context.

The role played by wine consumption in the vast array of daily socio-cultural practices, intersected with a diversity of (pre)dispositions for action ? specifically related to the type of consumption itself, the mode of consumption, the place where wine is consumed and the occasion/time in which it is consumed. Consequently, we will analyse the consumption of wines bearing in mind social differentiations, since tastes and habits of individual consumers, which are socially constructed, reflect on wine consumption in terms of the wine chosen and places selected to have a drink.

All this is associated with, among other factors, to lifestyles. But it is also associated with the very world of daily life, to which certain places where wine is consumed belong. Taverns, cellars, restaurants and elitist clubs are the elected spaces for the study of these dynamics.

Our reflection is thus centred on the consumption of wine as a differentiated and/or distinctive social practice.

«Dematerialization», technology and listening experiences in musical consumption practices

Magaudda, Paolo

Department of Sociology, University of Padova Padova, Italy

Keywords

Technology, material culture, Practice theory, dematerialization, digital music

The paper analyses the consequences of musical objects' «dematerialization» on the actual listeners' consumption practices. «Dematerialization» of cultural artefacts and its reduction to electronic information regards, in the musical domain, the shift from the fixed materiality of audiotape or compact disc toward the use of digital formats and online music distribution. While this shift, occurred during the last ten years, has been partially addressed from an economic and productive point of view, its consequences on socio-cultural level and consumer practices still need to be fully addressed.

This paper will focus on some of the questions connected with the change in material culture of music on the basis of the empirical data consisting of 25 in-depth narrative semi-structured interviews with young Italian (15-30 yo) digital music listeners. On a theoretical level, the paper draws upon a «theory of practice», which considers practices rather than individuals as the crucial unit of investigation, in doing so enabling to better understand how changes in music material culture produce consequences on the whole set of musical listening activities and experiences.

More specifically, the paper will consider how change in the material culture of music affects the ways people listen to music, cultural values and meanings given to the music, people's musical experiences and tastes; moreover it will consider the ways in which listeners' meanings and values contribute in the shaping of the actual uses of digital music technologies. The paper ends underlining the mutual interaction of the material, the cultural and the cognitive dimensions in the process of reshaping of musical consumption practices.

RN06

Critical Political Economy

A European Variety of Capitalism as Normative Socio-Economic Construction

Becker, Uwe

Amsterdam School for Social Scientific Research/Political Science, University of Amsterdam Amsterdam, The Netherlands

Keywords

Varieties of Capitalism, socio-economic model, performance, corporatism

In the past decade there has been much debate on the European social model the scope of which has mostly been restricted to the welfare system in the rather restricted sense of social security benefits and labour market programmes. In this paper, I want to discuss the broader socio-economic model as put forward in the literature on varieties of capitalism that also includes the institutional structures of corporate governance and the capital-labour relationship. Distinguishing ideal-typical liberal, corporatist, statist and meso-communitarian capitalist varieties I will a) analyse the social and economic performances (in terms of employment, GDP growth, inequality, poverty, innovation, care for the environment) of national political economies in Western Europe, Northern America and Japan approximating these ideal types and b) examine the question of the European socio-economic model. This is a normative question because European capitalisms are diverse and a "model" has to be determined by normative choice. The political economies with the overall best performance profile are those that, like those of Switzerland, the Netherlands and particularly Scandinavia, more or less approximate the corporatist type. In the final step I will present reasons for choosing these political economies as example for a European social model. Main reasons are these countries' comparatively high democratic level, the macroeconomic/macro-social coordination aspect of their corporatist arrangements and, related, the relative reconciliation of economic and social goals.

Back to the Future: Can American-Style Consumer Capitalism Be Saved? Should It Be Saved?

Ivanova, Maria N

*Center for Global Affairs, New York University
New York, USA*

Keywords

consumer capitalism, financial crisis, Political economy of the US

The ongoing economic crisis in the United States signifies the end of finance-led consumer capitalism as an accumulation regime whose key features were debt-financed mass consumption of largely offshore-produced goods and surplus extraction through rapidly appreciating asset values ("wealth creation"). The avant-garde of this regime - a mushrooming parasitic class of financiers assisted by organic intellectuals - has been instrumental in sustaining its reproduction not only by spreading the ideological appeal of consumerism ("the American dream") but also through its direct interpenetration with all branches of government. Thus, it comes as no surprise that all efforts of the US administration (past and present) have been aimed at keeping the services-based bubble economy on life support. This paper makes three key arguments. First, the present crisis management policies are bound to fail because they ignore the impact of rising debt levels on the behavior of economic agents and the economy as a whole. Second, saving debt-driven consumerism requires significant modifications in the existing accumulation regime and the redefinition of the terms of the wage relation. Consequently, nothing short of a new social contract is necessary to resuscitate American-style consumer capitalism. Third, this paper argues that the latter should be left to die. The explosive growth of commodity production and consumption creates externalities for society and nature whose feedback effects are impossible to control. In time, the diversion of a growing amount of resources is needed to combat the consequences of a combination of constraints arising from the unchecked exploitation of humanity and nature. However, a point will be reached when the cost of combating externalities will outstrip the value of output. The ultimate result will be the abrupt collapse of economy, society, and nature. Thus, the present crisis of American capitalism should serve to encourage bold thinking beyond what is necessary to ensure the smooth reproduction of the existing accumulation regime.

Comparing Britain and France: The Institutional Mediation of the Moral re-valorisation of Islamic Banking After the Financial Crisis

Thwaites, Ebru

department of sociology, lancaster university lancaster, UK

Keywords

neo-liberalism, Islamic banking, moralisation

Comparing Britain and France: The Institutional Mediation of the Re-moralisation of Islamic Banking after the Global Financial Crisis.

By many liberal economists, Islamic banking has been presented as a new alternative to the shortcomings of the Western financial architecture, a remoralisation of neo-liberal capitalism. Alongside financial centres such as Hong Kong and Singapore, due to its significant Muslim population, London had already been a major market for Islamic banking. Recently, the French Finance Minister made a call to Islamic banks to invest in Paris as well. Due to its secular legal structure, despite 5 millions of Muslim inhabitants, France does not have any Islamic banking institutions. In July 2009, new laws will be put in place to enable the legal structure in France to accommodate Islamic banking. However, rather than high liquidity assets, the French financial market will accommodate the issuance of bonds and structured real estate transactions. This paper focuses on the comparison of London and Paris financial markets as a test case for comparing the institutional mediation of the remoralisation of capitalism. Due to differences in the organisation of the state, civil society and the law in both countries, remoralisation of capitalism is institutionally mediated in different ways. This paper looks at the impact of these differences on how remoralisation of neo-liberal capitalism takes place in different historical contexts.

Critiques to Concrete - Problems in Constructing Post-Crisis Policy

Anderton, David

*Economics, School of Oriental and African Studies
London, UK*

Keywords

Economic strategy, criticism, Crisis, alternatives

This paper is a study of the difficulties associated with the development of intellectual criticism into alternative economic strategies - especially within the current context of the global economic crisis. The almost religious nature of the current orthodoxy and its ability to subsume criticism leads to additional challenges in reforming ideas within the discipline. This requires urgent attention so that an understanding of the crisis based on systematic foundations, and not on incentives or individual mistakes, can prevail. Turning points in economic strategy in the past are re-examined, and suggestions for improving the communicability of developments in economic thought are put forward.

Disintegrative Effects of European Monetary Integration

Mueller, Klaus

Faculty of Humanities, AGH University of Science & Technology Kraków, Poland

Keywords

Coordination Failures, Economic Nationalism, European Monetary Union

The two most ambitious projects of the European Union during the last decade - the introduction of the common currency and the enlargement to the East - seemed a great success. The common currency seemed to eliminate competitive devaluations and to shield off the European economy from volatile international currency markets.

Unfortunately, things worked out differently. What was played down initially as an "American crisis" had dramatic effects on the European economies, on the Euro-zone and its Eastern neighbours. Basically, as will be shown, it laid open the institutional deficiencies which undermined a balanced monetary and economic policy in the Euro zone from the very beginning. Internally, EMU did not prevent beggar-thy-neighbour type of policies of a different kind. Especially Germany constantly devaluated its real exchange rate in terms of labour cost, while expecting other countries to absorb its surplus production. Manoeuvres of this type were made possible by the, in fact, unique construction of EMU which combines a supranational monetary regime with nationally decentralized fiscal, tax and labour market policies. Over the course of time this produced considerable tensions and divergencies inside EMU (according a set of indicators).

The global financial crisis, as I will argue, exacerbated the institutional shortcomings of the euro-system (its "under-institutionalisation") and exposed the flaws of its monetarist ideology. Restricted to monetary targeting, the ECB can neither play a constructive role in a common economic policy nor function as a supervisory body or a lender of last resort. The straight jacket of the Stability and Growth Pacts precludes common fiscal stimuli. Left to the member states, these policy domains experienced a new wave of economic nationalism. Solidarity in short supply, post-communist members or neighbours are directed to the IMF.

All this demonstrates, as the paper will conclude, that the EMU regime did not foster a "common economic policy of the union" and is not up to the declared aim of the EU to "deepen the solidarity between their peoples". A re-evaluation of EMU has to identify persistent strategic interest inside EMU which so far blocked "deeper integrated" economic policies.

Economic Crisis and Economic Nationalism

Pryke, Sam

Applied Social Sciences, Liverpool Hope University Liverpool, UK

Keywords

Crisis, Economic, nationalism

Whatever the possible outcomes it seems unlikely - although not impossible - that the present economic crisis will produce a resurgence of economic nationalism comparable to that of the 1930s. By economic nationalism I broadly mean, at some variance to recent academic discussion of the term, a political emphasis on national economic self sufficiency. Then the figure who had above all been concerned with protecting the international market system from itself, John Maynard Keynes, spoke in 1933 of the need to bring producer and consumer within the ambit of the same national, economic and financial organisation, as an aim in itself. The subsequent period saw the entrenchment of economic interventionist government policies besides more direct ideological alternatives to laissez faire capitalism. The battery of controls established in the mid twentieth century has been by no means abolished over the last thirty years. However, a given political goal of greater or even continuing levels of national economic sufficiency has become completely unacceptable such has been the dominance of economic neoliberalism. In certain respects governments, notably the British and American, have abandoned neoliberalism over the last six months through their massive financial intervention to prevent the bankruptcy of swathes of financial and industrial capitalism. However, there is little indication of an ideological disavowal of trade, foreign direct investment or overseas outsourcing, the staples of economic globalisation. This is for two essential reasons. First, the scale of economic dependence on trade and foreign investment. Although dependence upon it varies enormously between different countries and the components of national economies, any sustained reversal would bring about not just a melt down but economic Armageddon. Second, the range of ideological alternatives to neoliberalism were discredited and exhausted in the last century. My paper will examine these issues by looking at 1) the apparent contrast between the 1930s and the present period in stimulating greater economic nationalism; 2) the reasons why a political shift towards greater economic nationalism is unlikely in the near to medium term future; 3) more tentatively, what sort of economic policies are likely to predominate in the future.

Everyday Finance in Varieties of Capitalism: A sociological analysis of the credit crisis

Jacoby, Ben

*Politics and International Studies, The University of Warwick
Coventry, United Kingdom*

Keywords

Everyday IPE, Varieties of Capitalism, credit crisis, finance, agents

Recently the International Political Economy (IPE) literature has seen the initiative to develop new ways of investigation via the "Everyday IPE" approach (EIPE). In the debate about what EIPE should be and what it could perform, this paper takes the position that it is best understood as a method that transgresses the boundaries between IPE and sociology. Not only can such a conception overcome the old dichotomy between structure and agency, it can also shed significant light into the origins of the current credit crisis. Following these points, the paper is structured in several parts. After a short review of the EIPE literature, the article goes on to highlight the distinct features of an Everyday approach. It is explored how such a focus can complement traditional studies in IPE, that have overly focussed on the structural side of economic phenomena, and thus offer new insights into central IPE topics. Starting from the assumption that social reality is the interplay between structures and agents, an enquiry into the daily lives of economic actors reveals their constitutive nature to the system. Subsequently the paper moves on to the current economic downturn and analyses its origins in the light of an Everyday perspective. In this respect the societal support for the credit institutions' practices is investigated from a micro and meso perspective. In doing so, this paper applies the EIPE methodology to two European economies that have been said to display different production regimes and credit institutions, the United Kingdom and Germany. The argument runs that complementarities between the macro institutions and the societal practices in finance can be highlighted. Falling back on different trends in the housing market, this point will then support the thesis of "European Societies", from a macro as well as from a micro point of view. Hence this article uses a new approach in IPE to offer novel explanations to the current credit crisis.

Financial Crisis - Compreending the past, Raising the future

Ferreira, João Pedro

*Economics, Univesity of Coimbra, Faculty of Economics
Coimbra, Portugal*

Keywords

Crisis, neo-liberalism, Financialisation, sub-prime, heterodoxy

Periods of crisis tend to correspond to moments of transformation and modification of the paradigms that ruled the society and were the cause of the instability. As such, the actual crisis is fully correlated with the neo-liberal ideal and its international implementation after the "Washington Consensus". The policies adopted by several governments led to the deregulation of markets, privatization of several services and the erosion of the welfare state.

The goal of this paper is to reflect on the consequences of the adopted path together with the deterioration of the capital-labour compromise and the financialisation of markets. However, it is impossible to find in the neo-liberal doctrine the real answers and solutions to the serious economical and social problems generated.

The sub-prime crisis and how it spread in the international markets was not an inevitability but yet a consequence of the global economic integration and the levels of indebtedness of economies.

The political speech has insisted in the modifications of laws with the objective of implementing a truly regulatory system that would be capable of preventing new crisis and instabilities. However, as many times in history, the political speech is by no means related to the political practice. Europe, as a regional bloc with global relevance, and the European Governments need to find concerted solutions for the crisis that dare to break with the neo-liberal agenda and to cease the injection of capital in the financial markets. The key has to go through the implementation of a heterodox perspective of Political Economy. In this sense, there should be an attempt to recover the analysis and subjects studied by different authors that considered the existence of systemic and systematic crisis in capitalism.

Going back to authors as Keynes, Minsk and Marx shall implicate new reflections, without prejudice, about actions and measures that must be taken to prevent the deterioration of social and economic conditions of most citizens who are, presently, dealing with threats that do not seem to worry neo-liberal theorists.

Global Finance and Modes of Development in Europe

Jäger, Johannes

*Economics, University of Applied Sciences BFI Vienna
Vienna, Austria*

Imhof, Karen

*Economics, University of Applied Sciences BFI Vienna
Vienna, Austria*

Keywords

finance, europe, political economy, Development

The current crisis has fostered the old discussion about the role of global finance in the world economy anew. While most research on this topic previously focused either on the effects of global finance on the political hegemony of states or the problems posed by increased capital mobility to public and private authorities nationally and transnationally the current situation calls for a deeper analysis how the crisis affects the European countries and how it is related to material economic structures. Hence the focus of this paper will be on the different spatial scales of economic development and regulation or more precisely, the interlinkage between the ongoing changes in the global financial structure and the correspondent political and economic development. Empirically this will be done by focusing on Europe which is economically and politically highly fragmented but also a main player in global finance.

Globalisation, EU Enlargement and the Challenge of the Financial Crisis: East-West Migration and the Search for EU Solidarities

Likic_Brboric, Branka

REMESO Institute, Linköping University Norrköping, Sweden

Keywords

solidarities, financial crisis, Migration, EU enlargement

The paper addresses the challenges brought about by the recent waves of EU enlargement coupled with EU's commitment to global competitiveness, Single Market and global approach to migration management. Contrary to the market optimists' expectations concerning the positive migration effects of EU enlargement for both the old and the new member states, we have seen the realities of deindustrialization, East-West migration pressures, related informalization/precarization of employment and downward pressure on national welfare states. Furthermore, the migration pressures created by the latest wave of enlargement towards Romania and Bulgaria in the context of the global financial crisis and economic contraction of several sectors that depend on cheap informal migrant labour have led to mainstreaming of rising anti-immigrant and racist populism, but also to trade unions' grievances and nationalism. In conjunction to these processes the paper charts EU strategies for the configuration of a transnational social space and discusses the contingencies for institutional rebalancing in terms of a right-based mobility/migration regime, EU social model and "decent work agenda" across both new and old member states and candidate countries.

How many solutions to how many crises? The European labour movement vis-à-vis the financial turmoil

Wagner, Björn

*Institute of Sociology, University of Jena
Berlin, Germany*

Keywords

Central and Eastern Europe, European labour movement, European social model, financial crisis

As early as June 2008 a resolution of the European Trade Union Confederation, against the background of the growing financial and economic crisis, heavily criticised the business-as-usual attitude of every single EU institution and stated that it is "time to act together". This provokes questions about the internal unity of the European Trade Union movement itself vis-à-vis possible solutions to the crisis. As could be observed in the case of the European services directive, especially, EU enlargement has been followed by a serious East-West divide in labour politics, characterised by conflicts of interest (due to differing economic development levels) and institutional conflicts (due to postsocialist particularities). This has resulted in both low presence of CEE trade unions at the European level and in their rather passive behaviour with a view to supranational union activities. Since the current economic threats seem to be quite similar for Eastern and Western Europe, the crisis thus bears the potential to overcome such divides and develop a common labour project regarding the future of the European social model. As the paper will show, however, this requires a difficult process of rethinking and challenging long-established attitudes - especially on the part of Western labour, which, following enlargement, has been more concerned with the protection of vested rights than with the development of a pan-European labour identity. If trade unions, on the other hand, fail to establish a common reply to the crisis that is more than a simple appeal to policy-makers, the European labour movement as well as the European social model as a whole may find itself to emerge weakened from the crisis.

Keeping the Aspidistra Flying: The Political Economy of Capital Accumulation in the United Kingdom

Singh, Arjun

European Institute, London School of Economics and Political Science London, United Kingdom

Keywords

Capital Accumulation, power, Crisis, International Finance, europe

The paper analyses and evaluates British capitalist development and crisis using the novel approach devised by Jonathan Nitzan and Shimshon Bichler. The foundation of the analysis is rooted within the concept of differential accumulation, which emphasises the power drive of dominant capital groups to "beat the average" and exceed the "normal rate of return".

In doing so, Nitzan & Bichler articulate four regimes of differential accumulation, internal breadth via amalgamation, external breadth via green-field investment, internal depth via cost-cutting and external depth via stagflation. The inter-connected relationship between these regimes of differential accumulation, as well as their larger societal impacts, are analysed in light of British capitalist development since WWII and the current economic environment.

Five conclusions emerge from this paper, (1) Of the four regimes; amalgamation and stagflation are the most vital and tend to fluctuate contrariwise against each other. (2) Over a long period, amalgamation grows exponentially relative to green-field investment, contributing to the stagnating tendency of modern capitalism. (3) The wave-like pattern of mergers & acquisitions reflects the break-up of socioeconomic "envelopes", as dominant capital moves through successive amalgamation at the industrial, sectoral, national, supranational and global levels. In this sense, the current economic environment is an integral facet of differential accumulation. (4) Stagflation compensates for the periodic and, importantly, the current, lull in amalgamation. Stagflation, although appears as a crisis at the societal level, contributes significantly to differential accumulation at the disaggregate level. The current stagflationary crisis shall be "resolved" when dominant capital broke its existing envelope and pushes to continue amalgamation. Given however, there is nothing more to conquer beyond the global level, future stagflationary crises may prove more difficult to tame.

Labour and the Locusts - Emerging Contestation of Financial Governance and Capital Market Liberalisation in the EU

Horn, Laura

*Political Science, VU University Amsterdam
Amsterdam, Netherlands*

Keywords

resistance, capital market liberalisation, neoliberal EU governance, organised labour

Comprehensive reforms under the Financial Services Action Plan, and the concomitant shift towards new supervisory committees and regulatory networks have fundamentally changed the multi-level regulatory process of capital market liberalisation and financial services regulation. In particular transnational financial capital actors have become important nodes in the policy debate. Financial governance is still perceived as highly complex and arcane policy field, and labour as a social force on the EU level has so far at best been passively implicated in this process by adopting a "yes, but" position to the broader programme of capitalist restructuring in the EU.

Recently, however, organised labour has begun to contest the Commission's initiatives in the field of corporate governance and alternative investment, in concert with political groupings on the left (such as PES in the European Parliament, or ATTAC in a civil society context). This paper seeks to look at this emerging contestation by mapping and analysing trade union strategies towards alternative investors and EU regulation, focusing mainly on the European arena but also taking developments in the international context into account. The underlying question is whether we can see an emerging concertation of social forces which would indeed point towards the key role of labour as a force of resistance to European capitalist restructuring.

Moving beyond the Crisis: The Mondragon Cooperativist Group

Flecha, Ramon

*Sociological Theory, Universitat de Barcelona
Barcelona, Spain*

SantaCruz, Iñaki

Business Economics, Universitat Autònoma de Barcelona Sabadell, Spain

Elboj, Carmen

Psychology and Sociology, Universidad de Zaragoza Huesca, Spain

Keywords

economic crisis, competitiveness, cooperativism, sociology of possibility

Economic crises generate problems for workers, states and businesses. Many workers lose their jobs, others at risk of unemployment, accept bad working conditions and give up rights. Many companies close or abandon their plans for growth. States also fall into debt and lose their legitimacy in front of citizenship. Current debate about how to get out of this situation mostly focuses on the greater or lesser role of the state's intervention into economy. However, other possibilities can be found in current empirical realities that can never be seen by the analytical tools of a sociology focused on impossibility (Wright, in press), unfortunately still widespread. An analysis of real utopias is thus urgent, important. One of these realities is the competitive cooperativism developed by the Mondragon Group. In this paper, authors will present a case study of this pioneering and unique experience of cooperativism, focusing on two aspects: the extent to which mechanisms of quality of work and quality of life, as developed in this cooperative experience, are linked to their growth and productivity. The analysis leads to considerations for current economic crisis.

Current scientific literature on cooperativism outline issues such as the significance of the commitment of workers (Guerrieri, 2008), the link between incentives and values (Tabellini, 2008), and the idea of companies belonging to networks for local job mobility (Erikson & Lindgren, 2009). The study here presented adds to those with analyses of positive experiences and good practices from the Mondragon case, and how European enterprises could account for them, in order to reach the EU Lisbon goal of "productivity and better jobs for all". This work is part of a larger joint project between professors Wright and Flecha on plausible alternatives to capitalist economy. Contrary to sociologies of impossibility, current sociology should consider empirical realities that are drawing elements that can contribute to the re-foundation of its economy and its various social spheres.

Parasitical economic relationships in the transitional economies: aggravations in the conditions of economic crisis

Nikolaeva, Uliana

Institut of Socio-Political Research, Russian Academy of Sciences Moscow, Russian Federation

Keywords

parasitical (negative) economy, archaic economy, corruption, peripheral capitalism, economic crisis

Sharp increase of crime and corruption has become one of the most conspicuous features of the Russian society in transition. The bulk of shadow economy including its criminal and corrupted parts is sized by Russian experts up to 40 % GDP. At the beginning of 1990s the extortion racket (the systematic robbery of businessmen) was widely in use; over the last five years the corrupt practices are gaining the advantage. Many sociologists estimate the current situation in the Russian society as critical while using the term "system corruption" to characterize it (the latter understood as corruption that have pervaded all the levels of social system and become an integral part of the system of government).

In my paper I consider the economic banditry (racketeering) and system corruption as a form of parasitical (negative) economic relationship that lock out normal economic development through the deformation of the market relationship and systematic withdrawal of the considerable amount of social product. At the same time the specifics of my point of view would be making the parallel between the criminal-corruptive and some "archaic" (primordial, pre-class, early class) economic relationships, which, in the situation of radical socio-economic transformation, are being brought back to life. I insist that under the conditions of economic crisis the parasitical economic relationships characteristic of most developing countries as well as countries with transitional economies (countries of "peripheral capitalism") prove to block the effectiveness of struggle with emerged economic and social menaces; they are the phenomena worsening the economic crisis.

Participation and self-management as a strategy for mitigation, reconstruction, prevention and social development in the 2008 global accumulation of capital systemic crisis

Vratusa, Vera

Sociology, Belgrade University Faculty of Philosophy Belgrade, Serbia

Keywords

self-management, capital-accumulation-crisis, participation, human-development-strategy

Paper argues that the 2008 credit market crisis is just one of the manifestations of the global accumulation of capital systemic crisis cyclically reappearing due to the contradiction between potentially unlimited possibilities of the development of the social production forces, on the one hand, and limited aim of capitalist mode of life reproduction - private profit, on the other hand.

The most important effects of the ongoing crisis in different sectors of social activity and existence are presented in a comparative perspective on the basis of presently available evidence with special attention to dramatic increase in inequality, unemployment, hunger, morbidity, mortality and crime rate, recolonization war complex disasters.

The main finding of the paper is that the mass emergency impacts of the global accumulation of capital systemic crisis, can best be mitigated and prevented in the future through the participation of all concerned in decision-making and ownership affecting their life reproduction. Contemporary experiences of reconstruction of the social, economic and political institutions following a strategy of self-management and sustainable human development are compared to similar XXth century attempts at overcoming the class division of labor, exploitation, repression and systemic crisis.

Past and Future of the European Social Model

Hermann, Christoph

---, FORBA - Working Life Reserach Centre Vienna
Vienna, Austria

Keywords

social model, europe, neoliberal restructuring

The paper takes the financial crisis as a starting point to discuss the history of the notion of the European Social Model, how the very foundations of the ESM have been eroded in the past two decades through neoliberal restructuring and what are the main features of a future ESM that centres on the well-being of citizens rather than on profit-maximisation of businesses. The current crisis drastically shows the pitfalls of a privatised and deregulated capitalism. Americans not only loose their jobs, they also loose their health insurances, pension income, homes etc.

Not long after the Great Depression Karl Polanyi noted that market economies need to be protected from the "satanic" forces of self-regulated markets. The New Deal can be seen as an attempt to limit market forces by imposing rules on the deployment of labour power. After the Second World War this was complemented by rules on international trade and on currency exchanges. In Western Europe the market sphere was counter balanced by the creation of welfare states, public enterprises and public services. The result was that Western and especially Northern European societies achieved a degree of decommodification unknown in the US and other capitalist systems.

This development has been reversed in the past two decades. The reform of European welfare states and the privatisation of public services fuelled inequality and made the livelihood of Europeans increasingly dependent on the process of accumulation. The erosion of the ESM was greatly accelerated by the transformation in Eastern Europe. Interestingly the term ESM was used in this process to justify the gradual abolishment of European distinctiveness and the move towards American capitalism. The paper will argue that the current conjuncture is an opportunity to demand for a revitalisation of the ESM with the overall objective to re-establish and perhaps push further the comparable high level of decommodification. Three issues are particular important in this regard: The rebuilding of welfare states coupled with strong labour regulations and working time reductions; the creation and expansion of public services that are not subjugated to market forces; a sustained democratisation of European societies.

Post-industrial class action in a context of crisis

Byrne, David

School of Applied Social Sciences, Durham University Durham, UK

Keywords

transformation, parties, culture, class

The crucial issue for social and political mobilization in Europe in the context of the most serious crisis of capitalism since the 1930s is the "failure of commitment to founding projects" of Europe's mass membership "left" parties. Communist and socialist parties were originally committed to the transformation of capitalism into socialism with the demarcating element of change being the abolition of the wage labour relationship. The word originally is emphasized because by the 1980s no mass membership party could still be described as transformational in its objectives. Instead they had become social democratic parties which wanted to manage capitalist markets through the attainment and application of state power so as to ensure that workers are not massively exploited through the development of redistributive progressive tax funded welfare, the defence of the workers' capacity to maintain wages through collective organization, and the maintenance of full employment through macro-economic management which reduces the capacity of capital to deploy reserve armies of labour in order to increase exploitation at the point of production. Whilst there were important differences in relation to social politics, these objectives were also those of christian democratic parties and national republican parties, and even of "One Nation" British Conservatism. Beginning with Thatcherism in the UK in the 1980s this changed and the social market project was replaced by increasingly enthusiastic endorsement of the sovereignty of unfettered markets, with UK New "Labour" representing an extreme case. European political elites are now confronted with a fundamental failure of markets, are frantically trying to resurrect macro-economic social market tools, and have no sense of any transformational project. At the same time the industrial structure which sustained in particular the cultural forms of class identity across Europe has been massively eroded by deindustrialization and much of Europe must be described as "post-industrial" whilst the great majority of people remain objectively proletarian. This paper will address the issue of how class action might be remobilized for a transformational project and will draw on the work of Raymond Williams in relation to residual and emergent unincorporated cultural forms as a basis for its arguments.

Responses to global economic crisis - a verdict on "transition"

Drahokoupil, Jan

*MZES, University of Mannheim
Mannheim, Germany*

Keywords

capitalist variety, Eastern Europe, financial crisis

The current world financial crisis marks the end of an era in the post-communist world. "Transition" can now be assessed against the test of preparedness to face external difficulties that are affecting every country in the world, albeit in different ways. Responses to the crisis demonstrate the diverse ways in which post-communist countries have become integrated into a global economy and the specific forms of capitalist economic system that they have created. The different courses of development have led to different weak points and comparative strengths which lead to differing depths and natures of economic difficulties in the current situation. The crisis in finance has been a severe problem for only some countries, depending on their levels of private and public debt and the behaviour of their finance sectors and big enterprises. Others, however, have great difficulty coping with falling demand for goods and all are threatened by perceptions of instability across post-communist countries in general. There are specific problems for countries with greatest dependence on remittances from working abroad, from export of raw materials and semi-manufactures and from close integration into networks of manufacturing multinational companies. A comparison of countries (including information particularly on Russia, Hungary, Ukraine, Czech Republic, Lithuania) will provide a basis for generalisations on the effects of the world financial crisis and hence on the results of post-communist transformation.

The contradictions and tendencies within state responses to the current crisis: the case of Germany

Bruff, Ian

*Research & Knowledge Transfer, Edge Hill University
Manchester, UK*

Keywords

government borrowing, neo-liberalism, Germany, everyday state practices, contradictions

This paper considers why it seems that national governments are pursuing contradictory responses to the current crisis - as can be seen in the co-existence of large-scale intervention and bail-outs, plus fiscal expansion, and a continued implementation of key tenets of neo-liberalism in a range of policy areas. I will argue that we should expect the state to exhibit such contradictions, for it is an intrinsic element of its institutional materiality. In consequence, it is essential that analysis uncovers the asymmetries, repetitions and tendencies at the heart of everyday state practices in order to understand the trajectory of state policies and institutional configurations. In turn, this will enable us to assess the extent to which the current crisis is the catalyst for a fundamental reorientation of various national state trajectories or not.

I will then consider the example of Germany, whose government has in the space of a few weeks moved from a critique of "crass Keynesianism" to a reflationary fiscal package which seems to bear the hallmarks of exactly this approach. At the same time, though, the government committed itself to paying off as soon as possible the extra debt incurred over the next few years, to the extent that Chancellor Merkel suggested that the constitution should be amended in order to ban excessive government borrowing. This, combined with the recent Agenda 2010 reforms, would reaffirm Germany's shift since unification towards a neo-liberal trajectory. However, the rise of the Left Party and the increased public sentiment towards "social justice" may well prove to be intervening factors, and for this reason the paper concludes by considering the importance of the 2009 general election for Germany's subsequent trajectory.

The Credit of the State

Boy, Nina

Security/ International Politics, PRIO/ Lancaster University London, United Kingdom

Keywords

Bonds, Credit, state, Circulation, security

What kind of idea of the state is emerging from the credit crisis? With the nationalisation of financial institutions, the return of fiscal policy, calls for higher regulation and the discrediting of risk-based models in favour of uncertainty, the global crisis seems to have returned Keynesian elements to the world. At the same time the interventions are represented as decisively unidealistic, forced, temporary and pragmatic. It also turns out that contrary to the doctrine of self-regulation, banks have implicitly or explicitly relied on the lender of last resort in their risk-management, and, as illustrated by the Lehman Brothers episode, that the position of uncertainty over bail-outs that central bankers were holding up to discipline the market was untenable. But at the same time as banks and investors rely on and demand ultimate governmental credit guarantee, desperate for a "floor" to market losses, the state has no privileged position in the financial system and is itself subject to credit ratings. Low risk premiums of government bonds are wholly backed by national solvency, fiscal discipline, economic strength and currency-issuing power. The issuance of new U.S. government debt to finance the budget deficit, liquidity programmes, mortgage purchases and bank and industry bail-outs has therefore increased bond yields since the beginning of 2009. While prominent pyramid schemes such as Madoff and Stanford are penally persecuted, the U.S. government is itself driving a spectacular Ponzi scheme. Despite the recapitalisation of banks, Libor rates have also risen, which may indicate that the cost of protecting the debt of banks against default is increasingly connected to the national debt. On the assumption that circulation and liquidity depend on a plausible narrative of security, this paper seeks to explore the idea of state credit and credibility and its role in the operation of liberal governance and crisis.

The critical in critical IPE research: Progressive Constitutionalism and immanent critique

Möller, Kolja

*Center for european law and politics, Universität Bremen
Bremen, Germany*

Keywords

Hegemony, varieties of critique, political interventions

Although proposing a critical perspective on globalization and european integration, neo-gramscian IPE has unfortunately failed to encourage alternative pathways beyond the neo-liberal agenda. The reasons for this fact are rooted in its theoretical framework that grounds on a too simplistic notion of the "critical" in critical theories. At least two deficiencies occur: Firstly, neo-gramscian IPE has a fragile understanding of what a critical theory is. It lacks epistemological reflection and often mixes up normative, immanent and genealogical varieties of critique. Secondly, it has a too narrow, power-fixed use of Antonio Gramscis concept of Hegemony which neglects its far reaching potential regarding political interventions. By putting neo-gramscian IPE in a wider context of critical theory approaches such as the Frankfurt School and Postmarxism these problems can be envisaged: The reconstruction of different kinds of critique provides a framework that leads to a more sophisticated approach in evaluating the "critical" in critical IPE research. Further more I will argue that a postmarxist reconstruction of Hegemony is not only fruitful for analytic reasons, it can also inspire practical engagements. Gramscis "war of position" entails a normative surplus that privileges immanent critique. Then the "critical effect" of neo-gramscian IPE, especially towards the recent crisis of global capitalism, depends on its ability to emanate a "progressive constitutionalism" from immanent critique. Maybe this recalibration can lead to a more visible role of critical IPE research in developing alternatives to US-led capitalism.

The Financial Crisis and the Re-Regulation of the European Financial Service Markets: The Hour of Heterodox Political Economy

Young, Brigitte

Political Science, University of Muenster Muenster, Germany

Keywords

Lamfalussy process., heterodox political economy, financial regulation/re-fragmentation, EU-polity, Efficient market hypothesis

The efficient market hypothesis, the cornerstone of neoclassical economics, and its focus on perfect markets, is likely to turn out the biggest and most expensive error in the history of economics. Since the deepening of the financial crisis, the benefits of financial market liberalization and, in particular, the underlying assumptions about the self-regulating capacity of the market are no longer accepted. The "methodological imperialism" defining human beings as rational actors seeking to maximize their utility is not confined to the economics profession. It has also laid the groundwork for the rational choice dominance in political science. But the financial melt-down could turn out the hour of heterodox political economics to offer alternatives to the abstract theories and mathematical modelling of global finance and instead focus on the real world.

The paper focuses on the role of European states to restructure Europe's financial industry. The challenge facing Europe is whether this will be a coordinated process among EU's leaders to empower the Lamfalussy process without resorting to a national fragmentation of Europe's financial service industries. With the creation of the so-called Lamfalussy architecture for financial regulation in 2004, the European Union has started a process of coordination among the member states. But the present call for the nation-state to rescue the banking structure has re-ignited the debate on the role of the nation state. This of course begs to questions whether the "pro-competitive state" has even the capacity to regulate international capital flows. What "state" are we talking about? Is the present purpose of state intervention only to bail out failing institutions? Has globalization impacted upon governance structures in such a way that it has altered dramatically the parameters of the likely mix between state, market, and networks? A question addressed in this paper is thus whether the call for state intervention in regulating the financial sector can be understood through the existing analytical tools or whether we need new paradigms in order to understand the causes of the global finance/credit crisis and to embark on a new global financial architecture.

The Global Financial Crisis and the Irrelevance of European Integration Theory

Ryner, Magnus

IR, Politics & Sociology, Oxford Brookes University Oxford, United Kingdom

Cafruny, Alan

Government, Hamilton College Clinton, NY, USA

Keywords

neoliberalism, Integration Theory, financial crisis

The global financial crisis is one of those rare instances where the 'history of events' shatters existing institutions and, to some extent, structures of the longue durée (Braudel). As such, it is clear that it represents a turning point that will shape the future of not only the capitalist world economy but also the European Union. In an age when policy makers and academics alike have assigned central importance to "norms", the effects of the crisis has made a mockery of the most central of these, namely the stability norms that has underpinned the European Monetary Union (EMU) and the competition norms on state aids that has underpinned the Single European Market (SEM). In strenuous efforts to rescue the monetary and financial system, member states have unceremoniously discarded these norms and the odd Commissioner who protests is dismissed as out of touch. Beyond this, the crisis has profound effects on "the real" economy as yet again euphoric predictions of a revitalisation of the European economy and "decoupling" from the United States gives way to a gloomy realisation that stagnation, and even perhaps depression and deflation is on the agenda. Yet, what does European integration theory have to say about the causes and effects of the financial crisis that is going to be central in defining the future nature of the EU-beast? The answer is "nothing of importance" and just like the odd protesting Commissioner it indicates just how out of touch and obsolete this self-referential club of the study of the EU sui generis is when it concerns the essentials of its object of study. In this paper we locate the main reason for this irrelevance in the 19th century 'disciplinary split' of the social sciences which integration theory has failed to transcend. By way of remedy, we conclude by offering our own version of IPE that "solves" the "agent-structure" problem (Wendt, 1995) through a number of contemporary inflections of central insights by Marx and Weber in what might somewhat tongue-in-cheek be called a neo-neo (neo-Marxist-neo-Weberian) synthesis.

Varieties of banking aid measures

Schmitz, Stefan

*Financial markets, OeNB
Vienna, Austria*

Weber, Beat

*International Affairs, OeNB
Vienna, Austria*

Keywords

financial crisis, Financial markets, banking

European states have reacted to the recent financial turmoil by preparing rescue packages for the banking sector. While there is a degree of harmonisation in terms of minimum requirements (instruments and durations allowed, pricing etc.), there is also a considerable amount of differences between countries concerning size and features of the packages. EU governments publicly frame the packages as necessary not only to stabilise banks but also to stabilise the broader economy and the labour market. We argue that they (can) entail considerable redistributive effects. These crucially depend on the technical details of the packages, such as pricing of capital injections and guarantees as well as conditions attached to the various measures. In our paper, we first distil the differences in these details and analyse their distributional impact. Second, we study the politico-economic determinants of these differences by looking at possible links between rescue packages and indicators derived from the "Varieties of Capitalism" literature and comparative welfare state analysis. We utilise a comprehensive data set of the details of rescue packages of 25 countries in the EU plus the USA.

Why economic sociology matters to understand the financial crisis (and what should be done accordingly to overhaul finance)

Lordon, Frederic

Economics and sociology, CNRS, CSE (Centre de Sociologie Europeenne)

Ville d'Avray, France

Keywords

financial crisis, competition, risks, financial innovations, beliefs

The failure of mathematical finance to prevent a crisis of such magnitude points at the inability of quantitative economics approaches alone to deliver not only efficient risk control but also a clear understanding of financial phenomena. An economic sociology view is especially relevant to underscore the three main causes that have paved the way for this crisis - and then to propose a radical overhaul of finance :

1) The irresistible forces of "greedy competition". The combination of stellar returns and fierce competition in the field of asset management creates forces no agent can resist. Even those who have a clear view of the growing risks have no option but follow the stream unless losing market shares. Risk taking biases created by the external forces of the financial field are reflected within the trading rooms through a shift in the balance between the front office and the back office, detrimental to the latter.

2) The essential flaws of risk control. Value-at Risk models rely on the flawed assumption that asset prices are driven by an objective density of probability, and that quantitative methods will eventually identify it. They miss the fact that the current density of probability is contingent and temporary because it is immanent to the interactions of the agents. As soon as this interactions incur a sudden shift, which is typically the case in liquidity crises, the models are wrongfooted and unable to deliver correct risk assessment. These shifts are completely unpredictable ex ante, and the new arising density of probability as well.

3) "Financial innovation" as a social belief. Beyond their technicalities, financial innovations also have a social effect within the financial community. Actually it is necessary to invoke an external "event", generically named "innovation", to believe in the sustainability of outstanding returns and consider them normal while they are clearly not. Innovation then should be analyzed as a collective self-delusion social device.

If financial crises are to be prevented, it can only be by addressing these structural issues, along a "blueprint" that the paper will sketch.

RN07

Sociology of Culture

"A Black Voice": Rap Music and the Construction of Identity among Israeli-Ethiopian Adolescents

Ratner, David

Department of Sociology-Anthropology, Ben-Gurion University Rehovot, Israel

Keywords

Black/African Identity, identity construction, Israeli Ethiopians, Rap Music, adolescents

This paper studies the interconnections between the consumption of popular music and identity formation among Israeli-Ethiopian teenagers.

A salient phenomenon, extensively documented in academic and journalistic writing in Israel, is that of Israeli-Ethiopian teenagers listening to rap music, wearing hip-hop outfits and sometimes themselves writing and performing rap songs.

The central claim of this paper is that, contrary to the common interpretation, these are not necessarily signs of "identity crisis", neither catalysts of juvenile delinquency or anti-white racism. Drawing on such diverse theoretical frameworks as cultural fields and cultural capital (Bourdieu) popular music and identity construction (e.g. Bennet), black/African Diaspora (e.g. Gilroy, Hall) and Race and Racialization, I will try to show how Israeli-Ethiopian youths, facing gloomy economic and social realities in their communities, utilize rap music and hip-hop culture as means of conceptualizing their experiences as a "black" minority in a "white" society, breaking their seclusion and marginalization in Israeli Society through imagined bonds with the global African Diaspora and developing a self confident, relevant and assertive identity to assist them with the challenges of contemporary Israeli society.

The findings presented in this paper are based on semi structured in-depth interviews conducted with 25 Israeli youths of Ethiopian descent, aged 16-18, between February and July 2007.

"Cybernetic" cultures of the self - the rise of a new individualism

Traue, Boris

*Institut für Soziologie, Technische Universität Berlin
Berlin, Germany*

Keywords

individualism, subject, Media, Professionalism, Capitalism

The rise of romantic individualism in consumer capitalism, spiritual milieus, and therapy is reinforced and at the same time challenged by a renaissance of the subject in scientific discourse since the 1960s. Departing from this observation, the paper will discuss the repercussions between everyday lifestyles, scientific discourse and the rise of digital media, which find expression in the competition of varieties of individualism: The economic sciences and economic institutions advertise the "enterprising" self (M. Foucault; U. Bröckling), countered by the social sciences and their (de-) constructivist critique of entrepreneurialism. In the perspective of a sociology of knowledge both, affirmation and critique of the "entrepreneurial self", constitute the discursive (and economic) practices of "heroic individualism".

Drawing from a soon-to-be published study (discourse analysis, ethnography, interview methodology) on the history of therapeutic practices in alternative medicine and the corporation ("coaching" and "consulting"), I will present empirical findings on the development of this therapeutic culture and corresponding culture of the self, which indicate the emergence of a third culture of individualism, differing from romantic and heroic individualism. My approach combines the theoretical perspective and methodological stance of the sociology of knowledge with governmentality studies and discourse analysis, further drawing from media studies.

Alternative therapeutic practices aim at reconciling romanticist and heroic notions of individualism by drawing eclectically from elements of both in the context of self-help and management. In the communicative practices coaching and consulting, therapeutic and everyday techniques of the self aim at a feedback-based exploitation of personal and social resources, thereby subjectivating, ?activating?, and responsabilising its clients in a manner wrought by tensions and contradictions. This culture of the activated, "cybernetic self" has been vastly successful in shaping the reorganisation of the welfare state (as recently described by S. Lessenich), corporate culture, and a new milieu of white-collar "project work" within European nation-states (cf. L. Boltanski/E. Chiapello). The "third individualism" I describe thus entertains a guiding and legitimizing relation with the "third way" political projects of realigning citizenship and statehood, the public and the private, profit and solidarity in the context of globalization and New capitalism.

"Discreet Multiculturalism" of Poland and the intercultural dialogue in the activity of Polish NGOs

Chromiec, Elzbieta

The Lower Silesia University of Public Services, The Lower Silesia University of Public Services ASESOR Wroclaw, POLAND

Keywords

Intercultural, dialogue, competence

The presentation includes the results and analysis of the research project "Polish non-governmental organisations and the dialogue of cultures".

The deep interview with the leaders and co-workers of three very effective and dynamic NGOs functioning from the beginning of 90s (BORUSSIA Cultural Community Association from Olsztyn, BORDERLAND Foundation from Sejny, SHALOM Foundation from Warszawa) could help to construct the form of the inquiry for the quantitative research on almost 200 associations and foundations for intercultural relations in the new Polish democracy.

The forms of the intercultural projects at the borderlands, in multicultural environments of big cities, among the minorities groups, in the frames of the European Union etc. are more and more present and effective in the promotion and building of an intercultural competence of thousands of people. The development ways of Polish "dialogic" NGOs, their strategies and kinds of thinking about Polish shape of multiculturalism are very impressive.

Almost 100 Polish projects during The European Year of Intercultural Dialogue 2008 created also the possibility to look at some problems connected with closed attitudes of Poles towards "the strangers", the weakness of the Polish third sector in compare to other European countries, and the hot need to educate young people for the world of social and cultural differences, but also in the consciousness of the intercultural dialogue in the time of European integration.

"It makes you laugh but it's not funny": French audiences and American comedy

Balland, Ludivine

LaSSP, institut d'etudes politiques toulouse toulouse, france

Vera Zambrano, Sandra

*LaSSP, institut d'etudes politiques toulouse
toulouse, france*

Kuipers, Giselinde

*sociology and anthropology, university of amsterdam
amsterdam, netherlands*

Keywords

France, Reception, television, Globalization, cultural import

In this paper, we analyze French viewers' perception and appreciation of American television comedies, using the results of 17 focus groups with French television viewers. A stratified sampling procedure was employed to ensure equal representation of age groups, genders, and educational levels. This study is part of a larger project studying the import and reception of American television in four European countries.

The protectionist French media regime led to relative small inflow of American programming. Indeed, our respondents - especially those above 30 - demonstrated rather limited skill in "decoding" American comedies. Respondents of all social backgrounds were rather dismissive of American comedy and American television; and in their discussion of American popular culture voiced many negative opinions on the US.

Our analysis will focus on the question how cultural fare from the egalitarian US is incorporated into the hierarchies of French taste culture(s). Our respondents placed American comedy (and American popular culture in general) firmly in the realm of low culture (vulgar, simple, physical, "beauf"). As such, it was contrasted with French humor, which respondents of all social backgrounds described as more verbal, refined, and intellectual. Moreover, French humor was typically seen as politically relevant and critical, whereas American humor was dismissed as mere entertainment (and potentially reactionary). However, this combination of anti-Americanism, political suspicion and aesthetic disdain proved hard to maintain during the viewing and discussion of clips of American comedies; which many of our respondents found fairly amusing. This led to extensive discursive maneuvering, especially among more highly educated. Typically, American comedy was described as "not funny" although "it makes on laugh". This analysis, therefore, illustrates the normative aspect of taste hierarchy - explicitly uncoupling legitimate taste from affective response ? which we found was particularly prevalent among French viewers (compared with other countries in this study). Moreover, it highlights the work involved in making cultural imports fit in nationally bound taste patterns and classification systems.

"Making the Europeans": cultural identity and cultural policy between institutional narrative and banal Europeanisation

Sassatelli, Monica

Department of Sociology, University of Sussex Brighton, England

Keywords

europe, identity, Narrative, cultural policy

The paper presents and discusses the cultural policies of both the European Union (EU) and of the Council of Europe (COE), that in this field has often acted as a forerunner and think-tank for the EU itself. These policies are here conceptualised as key loci to interrogate current narratives and representations of European identity and culture, having been put forward to create what had long been diagnosed as lacking: a European society and its citizens, properly formatted according to the annexed cultural identity. Not only is the often difficult and evolving relationship of the EU and COE thematised, highlighting shifts in notions of Europe, culture and identity, but so too is the role of the various local subjects and networks active in the sector that they have helped emerge, given their strategy of fostering the European cultural space mainly through trans-national co-operation. The paper is based both on a comprehensive analysis of the institutional narratives themselves, and on results from in-depth qualitative research on prominent examples of EU and COE cultural actions implemented locally, such as the European City of Culture Programme (EU) and the European Landscape Convention (COE). This provides a perspective on the relationship between the institutional production of the narrative and the recipient's spaces of interpretation and actual use within what can be termed "banal" Europeanization. The conclusions involve a consideration of the reach of public, institutional narratives of (European) identity beyond the level of Euro-elites and on the nature of the emerging cultural Europeanization.

"What is the problem with you?" Accepting culture diversity in Alto Adige

Riccioni, Ilaria

Faculty of Sciences of Education, Free University of Bozen Brixen (Bz), Italy

Keywords

Multiculturalism, culture, emerging conflict, every day life

Is it possible to handle multiculturalism without handling conflict? Which problems can emerge in everyday experience of a bilingual country; is multiculturalism always experienced as a resource or can it be seen as the major problem concerning identity, social life, culture in general? When more than one culture cohabitates in the same area, is one destined to prevail on the other? And, should they be considered apart in order to protect identity or should they mix together? And if no one prevails, can this issue become a serious obstacle to the development of the entire community in terms of mutual understanding beyond apathetic indifference? This paper will show the results of a field research carried out during the last two years in Brixen: the social experience of multiculturalism. A pilot research that has been carried out with qualitative methods (40 interviews in German and Italian), in order to investigate emerging problems of a bi-cultural community as directly experienced and expressed by the community members.

"Who crushed the Pope" "An art", "a work of art", and "an artist" in a press discussion about jubilee exhibition in the Zachta Gallery

Stokowska, Anna

Sociology, Graduate School for Social Research Warsaw, Poland

Keywords

Cattelan, art, artist, exhibition, art critique

In December 2000 Zachta Gallery in Warsaw opened a jubilee exhibition. Its curator, Harald Szeemann, was asked to present his own, subjective vision of 100 years of Polish art. The effect of that presentation raised one of the stormiest discussions in Polish media about artistic event. However, after conducting an analysis of media discourse concerning this exhibition, it turned out that newspapers did not discuss art at all. A direct conclusion that can be drawn out of the semantic field analysis of selected 17 articles and textual analysis of over 250 texts is that the most powerful message for readers consisted of what art is not instead of what it is or might be. This lack of positive postulates and, above all, denying that contemporary art is a true one, became a characteristic for articles mainly concerning one piece present at the exhibition - Maurizio Cattelan's "No title", which showed a figure of Pope John Paul II crushed by a meteorite. According to analyzed (and supported by interpretation in Pierre Bourdieu's categories) articles, art should not question established social order, break a taboo, or change audiences' mentality. Any attempt of being political became a disqualifying factor for art. Additionally, in this case it was not an artist who made a political statement, but it was a politician who made artistic one - two Polish Parliament members covered Cattelan's artificial statue with a white sheet as they would do if it was a real dead body. Therefore, art entanglement in politics, on the one hand refused, on the other, became an example of a subversive strategy. This situation has shown, first of all, a failure of professional art critique, which did not react almost at all on political, religious and ideological attacks on Cattelan, his work, Zachta Gallery, and even its director, Anda Rottenberg who eventually resigned. What is more, a journalistic critique has shown its potential in mobilizing public (a large number of letters to newspapers is evidence); it was distinctive however, that it did it without using messages encouraging people to think about art individually.

'Binge' Drinking, Neo-liberalism and Individualism

Haydock, Will

School of Health and Social Care, Bournemouth University, UK Bournemouth, UK

Keywords

individualism, Distinction, neo-liberalism, alcohol, Binge

Will Haydock

PhD Student, Bournemouth University

Flat 16, Athelney Court

24 Grove Road

Bournemouth

BH1 3DB

Tel: 01202 558177

Fax: 01202 962194

Email: whaydock@bournemouth.ac.uk

'Binge' Drinking, Neo-liberalism and Individualism

'Binge' drinking in the UK is perceived by government, media and academics alike as a topic of concern, despite the absence of any agreed definition. The current UK government's approach to alcohol policy can be understood within the framework of neo-liberalism, its clear morals and ideals juxtaposed with increased opportunities for apparent transgression. 'Binge' drinking is constructed - by both media and government - as such transgression, in contrast with the ideals of 'responsible' or 'moderate' drinking. 'Binge' drinkers are seen as hedonistic, excessive and irrational; the antithesis of the rational, self-governing, moral individual that is the ideal neo-liberal subject.

Conversely, most academic discussions of 'binge' drinking have focused on the contrast with what has been called 'traditional' drinking, based in community pubs and understood to have reinforced stable working-class, masculine identities based on workplace relations. 'Binge' drinking is presented as an individualistic practice, constructing identities through consumption under conditions determined by big business, with any sense of community being simply brand loyalty created by companies. 'Binge' drinking is thus understood not as the antithesis of neo-liberal ideals, but their apotheosis.

My ethnographic research of drinking cultures in Bournemouth, UK, suggests that the relationship between individualism and drinking on the British night-time high street is more varied and nuanced than either of these models suggest. Some drinkers did present individualistic identities constructed through consumption, but they emphasised self-control, rationality and 'good taste', trying to distance themselves from conceptions of 'binge' drinking. On the other hand, many who might commonly be identified as 'binge' drinkers denounced the construction of such identities as 'stuck up' because of the stress on 'image' over 'having a laugh', and emphasised instead a sense of community that built on relationships from school and work, not simply shared patterns of consumption. The paper will therefore address the theme 'New and Old Individualisms', as it considers how ideas of individualism and distinction inform Bournemouth's high street drinking cultures.

A Comparative Study of Images and Representations of Foreign countries in European and U.S. Media

Menendez Alarcon, Antonio V.

Sociology, Butler University

Indianapolis, USA

Keywords

representation, Media, Content Analysis, Stereotypes

In this research I studied the role of the media in defining countries. Taking as examples France, Spain and the United States media (including newspapers and wire agencies). In short, how the media has contributed to the production and reproduction of social representations of other countries in their respective populations. This paper is based on content analysis of newspapers and one wire agency from each country. The analysis of newspapers was conducted on two of the outlets that are viewed as among the most influential in each country. As was expected, the European newspapers cover much more (in length and number of stories) the United States than the United States media covers Europe. The single most covered theme in all the outlets was politics. However, the proportion that politics take in the European outlets is 1/3 more than in the US outlets. The political coverage in all the media tends to be negative, and particularly in the European outlets regarding US policies. However, there are considerable differences also among the European outlets. Furthermore, several stereotypes are reproduced in these media about each country.

A cultural sociology of emotions in the art market

Herrero, Marta

sociology, university of plymouth plymouth, uk

Keywords

art market, sociology, emotions

This paper deals with two related key issues in the sociology of art markets: how to analyse the practices of art market actors and the role of art market objects within a sociological perspective. In order to address this issue the paper first argues that analyses of commodification no longer captures the various and different ways in which the art object has become the centre of epistemic, meaning producing practices. Thus rather than being the repository of commodity values (aesthetic, economic) assign to it by agents in fields, or art worlds, for example, the art object needs to be conceptualised in a two-fold process: by focusing on how art market actors generate and assign value to the art work, but also by exploring how the art object can take upon the role of generating and shaping the practices of art market actors by arising specific emotions and feelings, e.g. trust, anxiety, excitement. The paper draws upon empirical data collected in three market sectors, primary (commercial galleries), secondary (art dealers) and tertiary (auction houses) to compare the various mechanisms through which the art object generates and shapes art market practices.

The analytical approach used in this paper is twofold: 1) cultural sociology in its focus to meaning-making processes, is particularly suitable to the study of how the art object becomes the repository of meaning, and it also orientates market actors towards acting in specific ways. 2) This approach will be complemented by drawing upon work in the sociology of emotions which stresses the need to see emotions, not only as socially constructed, but also as generating specific types of action. The paper will conclude by arguing that a cultural sociology of emotions is a novel analytical framework that can inform future research in the sociology of art markets.

A sociological conceptualization of personal reflexivity

Caetano, Ana

Sociology, CIES-ISCTE

Lisbon, Portugal

Keywords

systems of dispositions, practical sense, Personal reflexivity, practices

In recent sociological work, the notion of reflexivity appears implicitly (rather than explicitly) as referring to an integral part of the daily experiences of individuals in contemporary societies. However, not much has been said about the operating processes through which people reflect about the social world and the ways they act in social contexts. This paper is part of a PhD research with the main goal of contributing to the understanding of the processes and mechanisms of personal reflexivity. The analysis focuses on higher education students due to their participation on a privileged (educational) context for the promotion of reflexivity and because they address the need to make choices in contexts of multiple articulations and transitions between phases and spheres of life. The research aims at describing and analysing the processes through which students confer meaning to their pathways, and the ways their reflexivity is articulated with the different social contexts in which they participate. Regarding the social complexity of individuals, theoretical and methodological procedures of a sociological analysis at the individual level are adopted.

In this paper the discussion is centred on the main theoretical approaches that can contribute for the analytical understanding of the various ways individuals think about themselves and about their social circumstances. Special critical attention is given to the works of Anthony Giddens, Pierre Bourdieu, Bernard Lahire and Margaret Archer. The main goal of the paper is to identify and problematize the main sociological dimensions that can be mobilized for the operationalization of the concept of personal reflexivity. It is argued that reflexivity coexists in complex and singular ways with the systems of dispositions of each individual. As a component of human subjectivity, reflexivity must be understood considering the different spheres of socialisation of individuals and the ways these social domains articulate and interpenetrate in setting not only people's goals and life projects but also their reflexive competences.

A tool of analysis for investigating cultures in an inter-cultural and trans-cultural perspective: towards a reflexive sociology of culture

Onorati, Maria Giovanna

Faculty of Education - Area: Sociology of Culture and Communication, University of Valle d'Aosta

<http://www.univda.it/univda/Anagrafe.nsf/0/D0F59FCEA7F8CAF9C1256DB80047A0AA?Opendocument&Highlight=0>, d'Ovidio, Francesco Domenico

Department of Statistic Sciences "C.Cecchi", University of Bari

Bari, Italy

Keywords

indexes of cultural variability, intercultural accomodation, hidden paradygms, reflective model of analysis

The paper proposes a methodological tool that, though a quantitative and extensive one, may foster a reflexive comprehension of culture in an intercultural and trans-cultural perspective. By creating a system of (inter)cultural indexes that may check and measure those latent factors of culture that influence observed attitudes towards cultural differences in current multi-ethnic and multi-cultural societies, such a model of analysis casts a new light upon hidden paradygms of culture and proposes a new methodological approach to cultural differences, that may contribute to the development of a reflexive sociology, what Beck calls 'a reflexive cosmopolitanism' (Beck 2007). In particular, this paper refers of a research carried out in the Italian region Valle d'Aosta (Onorati - Bracciale 2007, Onorati - d'Ovidio 2008) that, in the wake of Triandis's analysis of individualism/collectivism (Triandis 1995) and Hofstede's studies on cultural variability (Hofstede 2001 and 2003), worked at the construction of a system of indicators that may bring to the light - in an intercultural and transcultural (e.g. comparative) perspective - the cultural changes within those socio-cultural contexts more and more characterized by individuals' increased mobility and cross-cultural phenomena.

The proposed model starts from constructing indicators of cultural variability largely based on Hofstede's indexes of power distance, individualism, masculinity, uncertainty avoidance and, through them, explores the attitudes towards cultural differences in everyday life in a representative sample of population (both autoctonous and alloctonous) by checking their agreement/disagreement, preference, perceptions about some 'interculturally sensitive' behaviours and beliefs. Than, through a causal factorial model, this analysis focuses on (and measure) the latent cultural factors that influence the explored behaviours and thereby highlights the 'hidden paradygms' (Hall, 1968) that underlie the investigated culture, their weight in influencing the value orientation towards differences and eventual processes of intercultural accomodation in action. By treating these hidden paradygms as invariant latent patterns of any culture, this analysis lends itself to comparisons among different cultures, thus fostering a reflexive (self-aware) and trans-cultural approach to cultural complexity (Beck 2006, Beck-Giddens-Lash 1994).

An Exercise in Symbolic Geography: A Cultural Map of Serbia

Popescu, Mihaela

Communication Studies, California State University, San Bernardino San Bernardino, CA, USA

Cveticanin, Predrag

Faculty of Philosophy, University of Nis Nis, Serbia

Keywords

cultural map of Serbia, cultural capital, axes of closure and usurpation strategies in Serbia

Our article is based on the data from the 2005 survey 'Cultural Needs, Habits and Taste of Citizens of Serbia and Macedonia' conducted (in Serbia) on a national proportional sample of 1364 interviewees. Using Multiple Correspondence Analysis (MCA), we first reconstruct the field of cultural styles as reflected in individual cultural needs (motivation for participation in cultural activities), cultural habits (actual participation in cultural activities), cultural knowledge and aesthetic preferences. Second, following Michele Lamont's interpretation of cultural capital as an exclusionary device (1988; 1992), we then examined how these cultural styles are distributed along the four axes alongside which exclusionary (closure) and usurpation strategies are carried out in Serbia: between the educated and the uneducated; between the urban population on one hand and the recently urbanized and rural population on the other; between the population of the (European) North of the country and the (Oriental) South, and between 'cosmopolitans' and 'patriots'.

Between reflexivity and habits: sociological theory of everyday life

Schmidt, Filip

Social Sciences Department (Wydział Nauk Społecznych), Institute of Sociology (Instytut Socjologii) Poznań, Poland

Keywords

everyday life, materiality, embodiment, Reflexivity, habit

Reflexivity has become one of the key terms in contemporary sociology. Like many other concepts which gained a huge popularity it has been sometimes subjected to trivialization and treated as a synonym of various modernisation processes, increasing flexibility of many lifestyles or taken for granted as a defining characteristic of modernity or postmodernity.

Yet, what seems to be crucial are detailed analysis of situations and contexts in which reflexivity is indeed activated. Actions which rest on an advanced level of reflexivity are very important but quantitatively minor category of human activity in comparison to those which are based on various embodied operational schemata ? habits or routines (Jean-Claude Kaufmann), embedded in the relation between actor and familiar material surroundings. As already Berger and Luckmann argued, the basic human pursuit is the ?routinisation? of various areas of life and ? what Mary Douglas illustrates ? ordering the image of the world and reducing its complexity. Therefore, the increased capability for reflexivity, crucial for human beings, turns out to be predominantly an effect of a clash: (a) of more than one operational schema; (b) of a fragile, not fully internalized schema and an idea of an alternative way of action or (c) of schemata of two or more people. The probability of such a clash increases along with an increasing degree of inconsistency of knowledge in a given group/society. It is the high number of social tensions and discrepancies ? inconsistency of some logics of thinking and acting internalized by the actors ? that is responsible for increased reflexivity. What seems to be crucial for the analysis of reflexivity is the very analysis of those inconsistencies: contexts in which they arise and the strategies adopted by actors to cope with them.

The aim of my presentation is to discuss this theoretical model, based mainly on Jean-Claude Kaufmann works and to illustrate it by empirical findings from Kaufmann?s studies on intimate relationships and housework, as well as some German and Polish studies concerning sociology of intimacy and finally ? empirical findings from cognitivist studies on theory of action and intelligence.

Beyond the power-colonial-pattern: performing culture in the postcolonial context

Costa, Rafael

*Sociology (Master Degree Student), Faculty of Economics - University of Coimbra
Lisboa, Portugal*

Keywords

power, ideology, culture, Coloniality, Post-colonialism

Stuart Hall's (1986) brilliant re-lecture on the work of Antonio Gramsci indicates that an original and productive form of perceiving the true process of ideological clash must consider the analysis of the 'multi-emphatic and inter-discursive character of the ideological field' rather than the unique flux of 'dominant ideas' in which everything and everyone have to be absorbed. Therefore, the analytical work of ideology takes us to a performative stand point of cultural studies since we begin to deal with 'distinct discursive currents' which bond and break the actually-existing-social-power-relation through a constantly and contingently negotiation between different types of differences 'ethnic, gender and class. Nevertheless, during this negotiation 'in which the result may structure or rupture the social power relations 'power and difference comes to be the basic considerations regarding the multiple and heterogeneous global hierarchies that insists on the configuration and re-configuration of the social power structures of domination and exploitation on the basis of racial, sexual, political, economical and knowledge differences. What the Peruvian sociologist Anibal Quijano calls the 'coloniality of power': an actual social relation that, articulated by a unique organizer principal (the power-colonial-pattern), involves the exploitation and domination exercised in multiples dimensions of the social life 'since economical, sexual or gender relations until political organizations, structures of knowledge, state or home entities. However, beside and beyond 'coloniality of power', cultural performance and cultural negotiation are both articulated and are continuously taking shape into social existence. Considering that, we might question, rather than neglect the actually-existent-power-coloniality, what is the remarkable social setting that would make possible the rupture of this power-coloniality-contingency. Stretching to a non-imperialist cultural analysis and taking into consideration the European multicultural scenario as a postcolonial condition that may allow the present to be 'an expanded and ex-centric site of experience and empowerment?', we attempt to read, theoretically speaking, 'cultural strategies' capable to de-structure the colonial power dispositions.

Concepts of Identity in a pluricultural nation - the case of Ecuador

Altmann, Philipp

FB IV - Soziologie, Universität Trier Marienheide, Germany

Keywords

Multiculturalism, identity, latin america, social movement

Since the 1990s, the definition of identity has become a central part of the politics and demands of Ecuadorian social movements, syndicates and political parties. The most radical proposals come from one of the biggest indigenous organizations, the Confederación de Nacionalidades Indígenas del Ecuador (CONAIE), which holds the idea of interculturalism and plurinationalism as it is reflected - in part - by the Constitution of 2008. Some concepts - especially the concept of multiculturalism - are rejected as Eurocentric or transformed into ideas perceived as indigenous. But the CONAIE itself is a quite pluralistic organization with at times contradictory opinions, so it seems difficult to find a unique political position. Nevertheless, it serves as an ideological avant-garde which influenced the politics of the traditional and especially the new populist movements like the government party Alianza PAIS. In this presentation, I would like to explain the different ways of constructing identity in Ecuador. Although the question of identity started as an indigenous one, it became a topic every political actor has to treat with. In this way, it will be possible to give an insight in the political culture of Ecuador and to establish analogies to the situation in Europe itself. The presented conclusions are drawn from interviews with political actors, newspapers and magazines and some previous studies on the identity politics in Ecuador.

Conflicting Visions of the Cultural Identity of Europe in Romania

Georgiu, Grigore

*Faculty of Communication and Public Relations, National School of Political and Administrative Studies
Bucharest, Romania*

Ciocea, Malina

*Faculty of Communication and Public Relations, National School of Political and Administrative Studies
Bucharest, Romania*

Corbu, Nicoleta

*Faculty of Communication and Public Relations, National School of Political and Administrative Studies
Bucharest, Romania*

Keywords

value, convergence, discourse, elections, conflict

The paper discusses the issue of the new relationship between the national culture of a new member of the EU and the emerging European cultural identity. Modern Romanian thinkers have fervently debated the pro-European arguments in contrast with traditional views. Romania got off to a slow start in the modernization process, and the issue of its cultural identity has been intensely considered in relation to the European cultural model. This debate was taken up in the years of transition to democracy, when the identity discourses of intellectual and political actors started to be differentiated based on their attitude towards the nationalism of the former Communist regime and the perspective of our integration in Euro-Atlantic structures. Arguments in favor of integration have consolidated both the social and historical research and the pleadings to construct a convergent paradigm offering a key to understanding the national-European relationship, where the two dimensions of cultural identity are seen as complementary.

Our research then follows the identification of those solutions that political actors put forward in order to conciliate the tensions between the integration project and the loyalties of the community. At the core of the European project lies the attempt to harmonize conflicting tendencies: protecting cultural and linguistic diversity of Europe while building convergence of values and mentalities that would gather citizens and nations around common projects. To this end we are going to monitor the discourses on European-national relationship of political groups of the European Parliament and the parties and candidates from Romania during the Europarliamentary elections in June 2009. We believe that this comparative analysis is relevant for raising awareness of the confronting tendencies regarding the problematical relationship between national cultural identities and the long-term objectives of the European project. The results of the research and the qualitative analysis will be subsequently integrated into a broader project of our research team.

Cosmopolitanism in Spanish society - An analysis of its profiles and determining factors

Llopis-Goig, Ramon

Department of Sociology and Social Anthropology, University of Valencia Spain, <http://www.uv.es>

Keywords

Spanish society, Globalization, Cosmopolitanism

During the past few years, various sociological analyses have encouraged the hope that deterritorialization tendencies distancing individuals from their attachment to their territorially defined cultures could awaken a general cultural disposition toward greater openness to the world (Tomlinson, 2001: 234). From this perspective, the introduction of technology and mass media in the home, the growing multi-culturalism, the globalization of consumer habits, and the increase in geographic mobility and tourism to foreign countries would foment the creation of a series of everyday practices and competencies that would circulate with a high degree of interdependence and globality (Beck, 2005: 62).

Based on the results of a survey carried out in May of 2005 with a sample of 2480 Spanish adults, this communication examines the distribution of cosmopolitanism in Spanish society and its determining factors. To achieve these objectives, various multivariate statistical techniques were applied. In the first place, based on the theoretical proposals by Szerszynski and Urry (2002: 470), Noya (2005), Skrbis and Woodward (2007: 732) and Bilbeny (2007), three components were identified that form the empirical structure of cosmopolitanism in Spanish society. Second, by applying cluster analysis, a typology of the Spanish population was obtained with regard to the components of cosmopolitanism. Finally, the multiple lineal regression technique was used to identify the socio-demographic and attitudinal variables that demonstrate a greater influence on the diverse components of cosmopolitanism.

The communication concludes with a theoretical reflection on the types of cosmopolitanism identified, as well as an analysis of the aspects that facilitate and impede its development in Spanish society. Finally, some suggestions are offered about the aspects to approach in future sociological studies.

Creative Cities: An opportunity of regeneration

Cabaço, Susana

Instituto de Ciências Sociais, Universidade de Lisboa - Instituto de Ciências Sociais Lisbon, Portugal

Cruz, Ana Rita

Centro Regional para a Inovação do Algarve, Universidade do Algarve Faro, Portugal

Keywords

city, creativity, culture and tourism

The increased recognition of economic crisis impacts on opportunity structure lead to an understanding of the importance of analysing the territorial regeneration factors. However, the origin and the agents that influence changes might be found in multiple 'locus': a demanding civil society that participates through new channels, the intense pressure of tourism markets and the claims of private agents on urban regeneration.

The deep changes on economic and urban paradigms of growth and development, are the framework for the 'creative cities'. In what concerns the regeneration of cities, two main trends emerge. The first is the relevance of 'ludic' and leisure dimensions and the growing recognition of the 'cultural cluster' and their actors on the role of creativity on territorial regeneration specialized functions. The second trend is the emergence of a set of values and attitudes which could be considered as 'social liberalism'. Florida (2002) on his well-know work sustains that territories struggle to develop an attractive setting to the 'creative class'. To accomplish this goal, territories should promote tolerance, talent and technology.

This communication discusses the 'creative territories', starting to be recognized as important elements of the competitiveness of nations and regions, mainly due to its regeneration potentialities, reconversion and creation of innovative spaces and added value to products and ideas.

Cultural Boundaries in Turkish Death Announcements (1970-2006)

Ergin, Murat

Department of Sociology, Koc University Istanbul, Turkey

Keywords

Turkey, death, cultural boundaries, taste, death announcements

Bourdieu, in his Distinction, argues that societies seek to go beyond the limitations of the individuals of which they are composed, and adds that conventions ranging from portraits and statues to tombstones, from memorial ceremonies to national holidays serve to counteract the bodily limitations imposed by death. In this symbolic constellation, eternal life is one of the most sought-after social privileges? (Bourdieu, 1984, p. 72). Although they are popularly considered great equalizers, death and the rituals around it accentuate social and cultural differences, such as class, gender, ethnicity, and religiosity. In the social search for immortality, death announcements constitute an important aspect of the efforts to establish cultural distinctions, symbolic boundaries and choices around symbols of status, consumption and taste. The present study focuses on a representative sample (N=2554) of death announcements in a major Turkish daily newspaper (Hürriyet), from 1970 to 2006, and analyzes their content in terms of social difference, impression management and corresponding efforts to accumulate status and cultural capital. Turkish death announcements characterize a large decentralized collection of private decisions for self-representation, since the publication process involves no editorial involvement as to the 'significance' of a particular announcement. In this sense, death announcements resonate with the efforts of privileged groups to convey a self image and signify efforts to draw cultural boundaries across gender, class, and religion/ethnicity. Findings indicate the following: 1) Announcements for women and non-Muslims reveal distinct patterns of cultural messages compared to Muslims and men. Signs of cultural capital are largely monopolized by Turkish and Muslim men. 2) Changes in the language of the announcements reflect important historical turning points in consumption patterns. The 1980s and 1990s, which witnessed the rise of consumption-oriented urban middle classes in Turkey, are marked with announcements dominated with the goal of offering symbolic gestures and building status alliances rather than simply spreading the news of death. 3) Messages of philanthropy, such as requests to refrain from sending flowers and instead making donations to charities, signify an aspect of cultural boundary construction. 4) Changing patterns of consumption correspond to the tendency to define death in postmodern terms.

Cultural Performance, Audience Contestation and Bob Dylan's Reputation during the Electric Turn (1965-6)

Cossu, Andrea

*Department of Sociology and Social Research, University of Trento
Trento, Italy*

Keywords

Bob Dylan, celebrity, performance, popular music

How can a set of contested and partially unsuccessful performances acquire a mythic status? And how do they contribute to an artist's reputation? In this paper, I analyze Bob Dylan's transition from folk singer to rock icon during the mid 1960's, focusing especially on the world tour of 1965-6. Scholarship on this artist has neglected the performative dimension of his becoming a celebrity, focusing instead on textual analysis. The recourse to the toolbox of performance theory can bring some new insight on both Dylan and the creation of artistic reputation in transitional moments. I take into consideration the context, the actor-audience relationship, and the divergence of Dylan's and his audience's background representations and scripts, from the perspective of Jeffrey Alexander's cultural pragmatics. I argue that the transition was effective because Dylan was able to exploit the critical power of his opponents as a means to gain reputation which was consistent with the changing view of what rock music was, and that the interpretive conflicts moved on the edge of unsuccessful performance in a way that it could be scripted effectively according to an emerging vision of the novelty and individualism of rock music.

Cultural planning in Italian small and middle towns

Porrello, Antonino

*Dipartimento di Pianificazione, Università IUAV di Venezia
Venezia, Italia*

Tommasi, Enrico

*Dipartimento di Pianificazione, Università IUAV di Venezia
Venezia, Italia*

Bertasio, Danila

Facoltà di Lettere e Filosofia, Università di Parma Parma, Italia

Keywords

global issues, cultural planning, culture, small and middle towns, local development

Within the research network of the universities of Venice, Udine, Padua, Parma and Catania, the research group of IUAV University of Venice coordinated by Antonino Porrello has undertaken a study path about Italian small and middle towns of culture, i.e. province or township capitals basing their development pattern on the promotion of arts and culture at urban scale.

In this vision, a strong connection is established between the dynamism of such Italian 'culture towns' expressed in their configuration of labs experimenting innovative forms of cultural planning and governance and the approach and the forms of urban cultural offer. With regards to the approach, it is possible to distinguish between a social and economic development based on cultural innovation, and an 'incremental' one, driven by logic of urban and cultural marketing; between the promotion of élite fine arts and culture, and of events aimed at the general public according to a wider definition of culture; or of 'mass' events based on large numbers and market operations eliciting high economic returns.

So local authorities and companies invoke and evoke culture as a source to legitimate their actions or strategies for local development. But are the terms development and events compatible with culture? How and at which conditions? Which is the relation between the typologies of promoted events and towns features?

Today, such development patterns founded upon mobilizing cultural resources, aiming at a sustainable and equal social and economic local development, are configured as a response to the development driven by the mobility of financial capitals, by global economic competitiveness and the centralization of economy command functions. In this context, are Italian small and middle towns of culture influenced by the same globalization dynamics regulating great cities? And if these dynamics are the same, how much they involve small and middle towns and the territory? Which is the balance between globalizing pushes and the reinforcement of local dimension, culture, peculiarities and place identity?

Cultural Sources of Subjectivity

Halas, Elzbieta

Institute of Sociology, Warsaw University Warsaw, Poland

Keywords

cultural person, cultural pragmatism, Florian Znaniecki, Subjectivity

Competing views on the human individual are concomitant with the contrasting directions of contemporary changes. The emphasis on the human agency and creativity is counterbalanced by trends towards effacement of the self and other deeply dehumanizing views of the world without the subject. In this context, the cultural version of pragmatism deserves closer attention for its perspective on the subject that cannot be reduced to any version of the homo sociologicus. In particular, Florian Znaniecki's culturalism and the principle of the humanistic coefficient applied to the individual should be reexamined and his concept of the cultural person discussed anew. A concept of the social person as a relational being embedded in the role system is only a part of a broader concept of a cultural person and his/her becoming. The classical formulation of the relational, symbolic and cultural approaches to the subject appeals as still innovatory and stimulating the critical review of other pragmatic concepts of the selfhood and current approaches to the symbolic self.

Culture as a Space of In-Between

Dr. Kauppert, Michael

Sociology, Friedrich-Schiller University of Jena Jena, Germany

Keywords

dynamics, narrative interviews, Structuralism

According to the French philosopher Michel Serres the function of culture is not only to dissociate social spaces from apart but also to interrelate them in a new way. Hence, culture can be seen as a space of In-Between. As a consequence of this argument a wide-spread assumption becomes questionable: that Europe is a space (or a concept) which alternates mainly between two poles - unity and diversity. Instead of this unfruitful opposition it is argued that the concept of culture as a space of In-Between leads to a structural point of view which allows to identify the concrete dynamics of (dis)connecting spaces. In my presentation I will illustrate this thesis along narrative interviews. The empirical material was acquired within the Collaborative Research Program on Transformation of Societies situated at the universities of Jena und Halle in germany.

Culture, Life-World, and the Constitution of Symbolic Power

Dreher, Jochen

*Sociology, University of Konstanz
Konstanz, Germany*

Keywords

power, phenomenology, Sociology of Knowledge, life-world

Culture according to Max Weber is a finite segment of the meaningless infinity of the world process. Clifford Geertz, following up on Weber's reflections, argues that 'man is an animal suspended in webs of significance he himself has spun' and these webs are what he considers to be 'culture'. From the perspective of phenomenologically oriented sociology and focusing on the dialectical relationship between individual and society (Berger/Luckmann), this presentation concentrates on how culture is 'impregnated' by specific power relations. The individual social actor experiences the cultural world as web of social relationships, as system of signs and symbols with a particular meaning structure, and also as institutionalized forms of social organization, of systems of status and prestige, etc. (Alfred Schutz). Human consciousness is 'impregnated' by stratifications related to inequality and power hierarchies, which serve as a frame for consciousness activities. Therefore, the subjectively centered life-world of the individual is affected by power hierarchies in relation to its different multiple reality spheres. The intersubjective life-world including the social world is determined by relevance structures which are dependent on the recognition of what Pierre Bourdieu calls symbolic capital consisting of cultural and economic capital. The recognition of symbolic capital within a social group forms the basis for the constitution of symbolic power relations which are a reflection of 'in real' existing power relations. Phenomenologically oriented sociology allows the explication of how symbolic power hierarchies are culturally defined; they are constituted on the basis of the culturally structured life-world of the individual actor.

Cultures in interaction: The circuit of science news from the scientist-journalist 'co-production' to the public

Mendonça, Helena

Sociology, ISCTE/CIES

Porto, Portugal

Keywords

interaction, Journalistic Culture, Scientific Culture, Publics Culture, Interviews.

An empirical research on interactions between journalists and scientists explored how the laws and the values that guide and validate these two fields interact in the course of journalistic interviews (Mendonça, 2006). The results suggest that the cultural differences and the potential conflicts between journalists and scientists tend to dilute themselves in the context of the interaction. Journalists and scientists tend to spark off co-operative and convergence strategies (metanorms) during the interview, not only making possible the interaction but also allowing that the final result - the published text - meets the expectations created at the time of their encounter. This research challenges a set of assumptions on relationships such as media-science and journalists-scientists, suggesting that media-science relations might be less noticeable by tension and conflict than the one suggested by literature.

Following this path, this ongoing PhD research aims to deepen those results and observe the attainment of the cooperation, exploring now more a reflexive analyse from journalists and scientists on their recent interactions. Designing the news circuit, this study focused on news production is complemented by a content analysis on the news and a reception study aiming at verifying how the science news make sense(s) to their readers. By this methodological device allowing us to deepen the press journalistic interview (usually marked by the opacity) and to look at the publics (characterized by the diversity) we are watching the interaction and the intentionality of the actors for what news.

This paper presents results of this qualitative study based on interviews of journalists and scientists who interacted in a news item, selected from two Portuguese newspapers. Journalists and scientists made a self reflexive analyse on meanings and senses produced by the "co-produced" science news content. Meanwhile, ten readers with different profiles were invited to reflect on the meanings suggested by the same news.

Our intend is twofold: 1) identify how members of three cultures - journalists, scientists and publics - interact, adapt themselves and, eventually, experience changes in this process; 2) analyse the mobilized resources activated by each actor in all moments of news construction.

Debatable aspects of the cultural globalization

Tanatova, Dina K.

*Faculty of Sociology, Russian State Social University
Moscow, Russia*

Keywords

Globalization, Development, destruction, global catastrophe

Debatable aspects of the cultural globalization

The problem of globalization is still under discussion in the world research community. However, its main theoretical principles have already been set in the sociology of culture.

At the same time, there are some debatable matters. Firstly. Globalization is often interpreted as a complicated, controversial, and irreversible process. The continuing discussions about involvement/non-involvement in the globalization process are inefficient, at least. We should consider it as a reality, concentrating mostly on the opening possibilities for the world and models for eliminating dangerous consequences.

Secondly. Some experts believe that in the globalization the following two tendencies are struggling with each other: a tendency to development and progress of the mankind and a tendency to its destruction. However, globalization as any new process in the renewed geopolitical situation can be characterized not only in the negative, but also in the positive continuum. For example, the fact of access to the world cultural achievements proves the positive influence made by the globalization process.

Thirdly. In the era of globalization the problem of global management or the problem of democratic government is of paramount importance. Here the following three tendencies can be found: 1) consider democracy as an imperative of political regime development in certain countries, which will inevitably lead to the democratic world relations; 2) believe that world relations are formed by the main three groups of actors: nations, transnational networks and entrepreneurs (communities or closed societies); 3) conception of 'cosmopolitan democracy' (D. Held) in which a new system of relations is replacing the relations related to the 1648 Peace of Westphalia and the relations formed after World War II (UN).

From this point of view there are two hypothetic models in the cultural globalization: 1) globalization gives a new quality to all spheres of the human life (the essence of this quality is unknown except for partial understanding of its economic aspect); 2) globalization consequences are unpredictable (a global catastrophe is possible).

Declaration of "me-ness" - A search for individuality through involvement in tattooing in post-transformative Poland

Dziuban, Agata

Institute of Sociology, Jagiellonian University Krakow, Poland

Keywords

biographical strategy, Body, Individuality, individuation process, tattooing

The aim of this study is to examine tattoo acquisition in the context of an emerging individualized society in post-transformative Poland. It will be argued that rising involvement in tattooing in Poland reflects transforming patterns of identity formation and a way of marking one's interdependency. By analyzing the narratives of male and female tattoo enthusiasts, this study looks to explore tattooing as a meaningful and reflexive body practice involved in a broader biographical strategy and the process of identity construction. It will be shown that the decision to acquire a tattoo is based not only on the desire to alter one's physical appearance, as opposed to other body modification strategies, but also as a way of altering and reinforcing one's self-definition, enabling self-expression, and affect management. However, it will be suggested that tattooing should not be solely understood as a manifestation of 'hyperindividuality', but as a practice structured by social relations and an indicator of individual 'interdependences' and embeddedness in broader culture. As such, involvement in tattooing can be understood as a symbolic way of differentiating or positioning oneself within the broader community and a cultural commentary, which reflects social meanings behind tattooing and enables individuals to negotiate normalizing pressures surrounding the body and 'self'.

The theoretical basis for this study is founded on Grounded Theory. Qualitative data was collected in Poland through fifteen in-depth interviews with tattoo enthusiasts (aged 23-50 years) having at least three tattoos and analyzed using the MaxQDA computer program. Interviews focused on when and in what circumstances the tattoos were acquired, the motivation for getting a tattoo, and what significance the tattoo holds for the individual. Photos were also taken of participants' tattoos, which were then visually analyzed for symbolism and body location by the researcher.

Demassification in contemporary modernity

Bordoni, Carlo

Scienze della formazione, University of Florence Carrara, Italy

Keywords

class, individualism, Mass

How can the process of demassification be defined? As the most disturbing social event to characterise the post-modern period? What is the inevitable consequence of the crisis of mass society?

There can be several causes, not all of which can be put down to political or economic reasons. Regardless of which angle to consider it from, demassification represents a social change of incredibly vast proportions involving culture, politics, economics, behaviour and the very existence of each individual. The process of subjectivisation or individualisation which stems from the early twentieth century as a reaction to the emergence of an aggressive and uncontrollable mass and which established itself during the control of the masses within totalitarian regimes, ended up causing a split in the compact front of society, favouring an exasperated rarefaction, characterised by fragmentation, by separatism, solitude, personal benefit, by the defence of private interests, in what Bauman defined 'individualised society'. The third phase of massification, the consumer phase, began to show signs of weakening at the end of the sixties, in concurrence with the working class and student protests, which contested the equilibrium of the middle class well being and highlighted the political contradictions. This continued into the seventies with the emergence of alternative movements that questioned the life style imposed on consumerism. They were against savage industrialisation (the post-Ford production method and also exploitation of natural resources thanks to the emergence of ecology awareness), and sought alternative ways of political participation: they were heading towards 'biopolitics' (Foucault), closer to human needs.

Detraditionalized selves. A comparative analysis

Elchardus, Mark

*Sociology, Vrije Universiteit Brussel
Brussels, Belgium*

De Keere, Kobe

*Sociology Department, Vrije Universiteit Brussel
Brussels, Belgium*

Keywords

individualization, social control, detraditionalization

In an earlier paper it was argued that detraditionalization - economic development, development of the welfare state, decline of tradition, traditional ethics and religious belief - can not be equated with individualization but has to be viewed as a shift in the mode of social control (Elchardus, 2009). The new mode of social control is based on agencies of control on the one hand, the emergence of a new conception of self on the other. This paper wants to (1) map the extent of detraditionalization in Western societies, (2) verify whether among such societies detraditionalization is related to the emergence of a new conception of the self, and (3) verify whether the emergence of new controlling institutions, in particular therapy, can at least partly account for the relationship between detraditionalization and the emergence of a new conception of self.

The analysis is restricted to OECD-countries and based on both aggregate data and the World Value Survey. A multilevel analysis reveals that this indicator of self-control is higher in the cluster of fully detraditionalized societies, even after controlling for individual indicators of detraditionalization. The proportion of psychologists working in the mental health sector per thousand population, is used as an indicator of the development of the therapeutic sector. This proportion is much higher in the fully detraditionalized societies and accounts in part for the relationship between detraditionalization and the new conception of the self.

Developing a Common European Identity using Technology-Based Education: Learning@Europe

Paolini, Paolo

*Department of Electronics and Information, Politecnico di Milano
Milan, Italy*

Di Blas, Nicoletta

*Department of Electronics and Information, Politecnico di Milano
Milan, Italy*

Keywords

European identity, e-learning, impact

The notions of 'identity' and 'national identity' are quite complex, being related at the same time to different factors: deep cultural traditions, understanding of history, false myths about history, stereotypes etc. In Europe we have a large variety of national identities, which in a recent past have created (through the world wars) serious troubles. Today national identity is still a divisive factor within Europe and one of the major obstacles to build a true European identity.

The project Learning@Europe does not mean to challenge the notion of 'national identity', neither to disseminate the gospel of a new 'good identity' (the European one). The aim is to help youngsters at school to understand:

'How national identities developed in Europe

'How it developed in their countries

'How it developed in other European countries

We discovered that all the above are unknown subjects in European school systems, with the exception of the 'own identity' that is in general treated in a very chauvinistic manner, which is a surprise for students of different countries.

Learning@Europe has involved more than 6,000 students (15 to 19 years of age) in 18 different European countries. A special edition was held between European students and the cadets of West-Point (USA).

Technology was crucial for the project: 4 classes (from different countries) at the time participate to a 'friendly' competition. The focal point of the 'experience' (lasting 6 weeks) are real-time sessions (lasting one hour each), where the 4 classes meet in a 3 dimensional space. In addition the 4 classes keep in touch and cooperate via online forums.

Participants are provided with a set of interviews to leading experts about national identities and the process of national identity development in specific countries.

An extensive evaluation (see www.learningateurope.net) has been conducted through direct observation, focus groups and questionnaires. The perceived impact upon teachers and students is very high. As far as the students are concerned, 20% declare they have acquired a different perception and 34% have changed their mind about Europe. 51% of the teachers report that students have changed their attitude toward other cultures.

Digital amateur photography as a new communication medium (in the example of Moscow State Museum-Reserve Tsaritsyno)

Komarova, Nataliya

*Center for Fundamental Sociology IGITI, State University - Higher School of Economics
Moscow, Russia*

Keywords

amateur photography, Mediation of cultures, theory of social events, actor network theory, communicative practice

Spreading of digital technologies substantially changed daily practices of ordinary people. In the photography sphere these changes are connected with wider independence of the photographer caused by the elimination of correlation between financial cost of the process and the amount of pictures done and by the appearance of new possibilities of presenting photographs. The main research question is whether spreading of digital technologies in the sphere of photography leads to the rise of a new mood of acting and interacting about photography.

Photography as a particular type of media has a definite structure that implies not only functional features of cameras and related staff but also the patterns of taking pictures and its? further storage and presenting. Media themselves, not the content they carry, are the focus of the study. A peculiar type of social interaction is under investigation, the one where cameras and other associated staff pretend to be actants enjoying equal rights with photographers in making up our world. As long as cameras act during the process of taking pictures but can not explicate its ?intentions? it is more legitimate to use the theory of social events that understands the notion ?event? as cognitive complex available for grasping by an observer because of the important premise about the existence of basic perception unity between an observer and any actor of an event. Different ways of combination of events constituting the process of taking pictures and presenting them are analyzed. The comparison between the field of analogue amateur photography studies and the results of the empirical research in the State Museum-Reserve Tsaritsyno indicates that taking pictures on digital cameras by amateur photographers becomes less oriented to be a commemorative practice of saving important moments of life but more oriented to be a new type of communicative practice based on the idea of urgent communication ? the special way to transmit instant messages to a particular audience. In this sense photography tends to turn into a new variant of communication medium that occupies its own place in the communication process of modern society.

Embarrassment as a Sign of Lack of Embodied Culture in Performance: the Case of Dance

Bassetti, Chiara

*Sociology and Social Research, University of Trento
Trento, Italy*

Keywords

culture, performance, dance, embodiment, Embarrassment

In reflecting, starting from dance case, upon the link between (incompetent) performance and embarrassment, the aim of the paper is twofold: extending Goffman's (1956, 1959, 1969) analysis of this cross-cultural social feeling beyond conversational encounters to non-verbal performances and defining embarrassment as a sign of lack of embodied culture.

The paper derives from my multisite ethnography on the professional world of dancers. Data include interviews as well as fieldnotes and video-recordings of the everyday natural occurring activities of two Italian dance companies and related schools, where I in order to better understand dance training and its effects I also enrolled for the first time in dance courses.

Embarrassment appears when someone, reflexively looking at him/herself through the eyes of the others and imagining their judgement, sees him/herself as an incompetent member of a specific, more or less situated, social group, with its own specific culture. In the case at hand, dancers usually feel embarrassed (and/or ashamed) about how their own body looks and, especially, moves in comparison to the other bodies surrounding it and/or in comparison to how it should move ideally. Dance culture, in fact, is mostly a bodily kinetic one.

Feeling embarrassed happens, although differently, for both professional dancers in facing new body-work experiences and aspiring dancers in the process of embodying dance culture and aesthetics; in both on-stage and off-stage (rehearsals, lessons, or even ordinary activities if carried out with other dancers) performances. The paper explores these various cases, underlying the common motive for (lack of embodied specific culture), and the objective and subjective symptoms of (i.e. immobility, touching hair, setting right clothes, etc.), dancers' embarrassment in/for their non-verbal performances. Finally, some considerations are put forward concerning the role of the dance practice room's mirror in raising embarrassment as well as in increasing it by making more difficult to conceal this feeling from the others present.

[Topic: Performing Cultures]

Embracing the Postnational Nation: The creation of Swedish "National Day"

Schall, Carly Elizabeth

Sociology, University of Wisconsin - Madison Madison, WI, USA

Keywords

nationalism, Sweden, Multiculturalism

In 2005, the Swedish government designated June 6th -- a previously little-celebrated holiday, Flag Day -- as Swedish National Day, an official state holiday to celebrate the Swedish nation. That Sweden should institute such a holiday at this particular junction in history, when the Swedes often see themselves as somehow "beyond" nationalism, is paradoxical. The proposed paper explores this paradox both in terms of why an official national day would be created, and in terms of what the meaning of this holiday has come to be during the past four years of celebration. This is done through examination of parliamentary records, newspaper accounts of June 6th celebrations. This paper suggests that the impetus behind the creation of this holiday was primarily a reaction to the perceived threat that Europeanization poses to Swedish national identity, but that the particular identity espoused in these celebrations is decidedly multicultural and cosmopolitan. As such, this paper seeks to shed light on the tensions between national and supranational identities, suggesting that, on the one hand, national identities continue to be of importance in an ever more interconnected international context, but that the content of these identities may change in ways that indicate a responsiveness to this process. In other words, while Europeanization and globalization have provoked a re-commitment to the national, the nation itself may be re-imagined as post-national.

Erected by Attalos II King of Pergamon 159-138 B.C. / Destroyed by Barbarian Invaders from the North 267 A.D. / Rebuilt by Philhellenes of America 1953 A.D

Lalaki, Despina

*Department of Sociology, The New School for Social Research
New York, USA*

Keywords

Philhellenism, Truman Doctrine, Cold War Cultural Politics

The rather improbable title for the paper I propose here was suggested in the 1950's as a commemorative plaque for the American contribution to the reconstruction of the Attalos Stoa at the ancient Agora of Athens in Greece, the museum of the Agora excavations, an American project since the early 1930's. The project, which stands on the shoulders of the Truman Doctrine and the Marshall Plan, evoked American Philhellenism as its heart. In this paper I seek to explore the nature and the components of this most recent Philhellenic tradition, to unravel its origins and understand its impact, if any, on those who are served by the museum.

Philhellenism, the love of Greek culture, which over the years has drawn archaeologists, scholars and cultural amateurs to the land and to its study has, like any other kind of love, never been unconditional. If European philhellenism, in vogue early in 19th century, cast the nascent Modern Greece as the progeny of Socrates and Pericles, now American philhellenism would exercise its own power of love and would seek to cast the land and its culture into a new image. American archaeology, in this specific historical space and time, occupies a special if not unexpected place in this new expression of philhellenic zeal; on the one side, it provided all the necessary safeguards studying and protecting the ancient legacy from the distractive powers of modernity and on the other, it promised to propel it into the future and assist the efforts of development, political, social and certainly of cultural development. The cultural heritage of the country, as interpreted and evaluated by some of its defenders, offered the subtext and the rationale for the economic and political disposition of the country, which was understood as incompatible with communism that according to many observers threatened to engulf post-war Greece.

Studied as a case of cultural mediation from the Cold War perspective the American interest in Greece constitutes, I believe, a very distinct expression of what in the literature is broadly understood as 'Philhellenism' and explores a very specific aspect of its historical and political uses.

Europe in our pockets: national identity and European currency

Ribeiro, Rita

*Sociology, Universidade do Minho
Braga, Portugal*

Keywords

national identity, European Integration, European currency

For about three centuries nation-state was the core structure in territorial, political and economical organization of the western world. In the last fifty years, globalization along with European unification produced a new understanding on frontiers, sovereignty and belonging. The changes produced by European integration lead us to ask some questions about the Europeans self-definition and the emerging ways of thinking national identity and national culture. What does it mean to be national of a country in a globalized world? Are there new forms of identification available in order to deal with transnational economies, massification of culture and weakening of boundaries? How does national identification cope with a larger circle of identification, the European one? How do national cultures cope with increasing cultural diversity and pluralism of values?

Taking the Portuguese case, I would say that the democratic revolution, in 1974, and following integration process aroused an internal debate on Portugal's position in the world, namely the imperial vocation vs. European option. According to Eurobarometer figures and data collected in several focus groups, Portuguese tend to assess European integration in a losses and benefits scheme. Thus Europe is foremost seen as a provider of economic development and not as a space of culture and identity. It can be said that Portuguese have ambiguous representations in regard to the approximation to Europe occurred in the last three decades and that the same applies to the historical and symbolic connection the country had with the empire. That is, national identity has been reconstructed in order to accommodate the Europeanization of the country and to preserve cultural and historical specificities, resulting in an ambivalent position towards Europe. This means that the senses of belonging to national and European spaces are reconfigured and strategic forms of identification - that include both the longing to be European and the precedence of being national - are shaped, particularly with regard to the process of replacing the national currency by the European currency.

European construction through culture, mobility and people circulation: the case of Erasmus students in Coruña University

Domingues, Joana

Sociologia, Universidade do Minho/ Universidade da Corunha Covilhã, Portugal

Araújo, Emília

*Sociologia, Universidade do Minho
Braga, Portugal*

Keywords

mobility, Interculturaly, Erasmus students, "European construction".

This paper addresses the concept of interculturality starting from a research made at Coruña University involving ERASMUS students coming from Portugal, Poland and Italy. Drawing on an analysis of ERASMUS students nationalities, motivations and discourses about 'integration' in Spain, it is our intention to shed some light on the way 'European construction' may not only be achieved by the process of interchanging people with its modes of living and patterns of thought, but also by implementing politics of equality which may foster knowledge circulation as well as the reshaping of interchange programs and politics of integration. The authors assume, however that this new forms of cultural relationship are only culturally and politically valid insofar as they are neither conflictual nor holist but pluralistic in the sense that may valorize the legitimacy of diversity even if confronting with space and times becoming ever more homogeneous. In sequence, it becomes extremely important to explore the purposes, the expectative as well as the actors involved in a mobility decision as well as their understandings about the gains and the loses implied in a mobility action within Europe. Considering the existing differences and unequal levels of centrality of each european country, it is also relevant to consider the amount and the extension of these oportuny costs weither from an individual point view or each country interests and projects involving interchange of students.

Feminine male teachers'. A study on the gender relatedness of cultural preferences and practices of Flemish teachers

Siongers, Jessy

*Sociology, Vrije Universiteit Brussel
Brussels, Belgium*

Vangoidsenhoven, Gjuido

*Sociology, Vrije Universiteit Brussel
Brussels, Belgium*

Elchardus, Mark

*Sociology, Vrije Universiteit Brussel
1050, Belgium*

Keywords

Gender, teachers, cultural preferences

The relation between culture and education has been frequently demonstrated. Based on the assumption that successful cultural experiences in school are conducive for cultural participation and a lasting interest in cultural life, and given the hypothesis that cultural participation has a positive impact on the schooling of all students, it seems that cultural education is indispensable in a school context. The teacher plays a significant role in this cultural socialization. Therefore, it is important to have a clear picture of the cultural preferences and practices of teachers. Bourdieu (1979) described the teaching staff as a group that is rich in cultural capital but relatively poor in economic capital and other studies confirmed this. The teaching staff has however a very specific composition. Besides the fact that this group largely consists of highly educated persons, there is also a strong over-representation of women. Women are generally found to have a stronger preference for high-brow cultural activities. However, Lizardo (2006) recently added an important nuance. He found that in occupations that according to Bourdieu are characterized by a relatively high degree of cultural capital and a relatively low level of economic capital, such as teaching, men and women equally appreciate higher culture. In these professions highbrow culture rather plays a coordinating role, and both the jobs of men and women involve the production of symbols and are knowledge-intensive. This brings about that both men and women in these professions will show a larger appreciation of highbrow culture. Since the sex ratio of teachers varies greatly according to the educational levels and the educational subjects offered in schools, the study of the gender relatedness of cultural capital amongst teachers is extremely relevant. In this paper we will compare the cultural preferences and participation of Flemish teachers with other working people, taking into account their specific composition. Secondly, we will examine if these cultural preferences and participation of teachers is gender-related. In order to do this, we will make use of the survey ??Cultural Participation in Flanders 2003?2004?? and a combined dataset of two studies on time-use (1999 & 2004).

Friendship and public space: a private form of social capital

Bellotti, Elisa

*Sociology, University of Manchester
Manchester, United Kingdom*

Keywords

individualism, community, social capital, Friendship, social networks

Topic: New and Old Individualisms

Individualism has been variously interpreted by social science in contemporary times. One of its major interpretations, related to the personal private sphere, conceptualises it as a process of atomization of society, implying the loosening of values and the fragmentation of social structure. This has led some scholars to claim against the loss of community, which can be found, for example, in the weakening of social capital.

On the other hand, some scholars have highlighted the changing nature of community, which cannot be intended anymore in traditional terms (a local social structure characterized by shared identity, solidarity, reciprocity, trust and collective memory), but it is today formed by social networks, where people chose whom they do relate to.

This communication explores the friendship networks of single youth in Milan, using data collected in 2005 with both egonetworks and in-depth, non structured interviews. Drawing on results, I will show where friendship ties are commonly formed and what kind of support they provide to single people; moreover, I will focus on the main outputs of friendship sociability in terms of social capital.

Conclusions will show how friendship is used by single people to access the public space, which is today dominated by consumerism individualism and does not promote urban socialization (like public spaces in the past). This individualised form of sociability has implication on the outcome of friendship, which can be considered as a private form of social capital, whose norms and benefits are not applied to relationships outside the friendship network but do shape new localised and individualised forms of communities.

Generational differences in ethnic and religious attachment and their interrelation among Muslim minorities in the Netherlands

Maliepaard, Mieke

Interdisciplinary Social Sciences, Utrecht University Utrecht, The Netherlands

Lubbers, Marcel

Interdisciplinary Social Sciences, Utrecht University Utrecht, The Netherlands

Gijsberts, Merove

-, Netherlands Institute for Social Research Den Haag, The Netherlands

Keywords

second generation, assimilation, ethnic identity, Islam, religious identity

Are there generational differences in ethnic and religious attachment among Muslim minorities in the Netherlands? To answer this question, we assess patterns of ethnic and religious identity and practice among Dutch Turks and Moroccans. Classical assimilation theory predicts a decline in ethnic attachment over generations, but is less clear on consequences of migration on religious attachment. In addition, most assimilation studies were done in the United States, a very different receiving context from the largely secular Netherlands. We use quantitative analysis to test propositions among first and second generation minorities (N=1861). Our data indicate that the second generation reports weaker ethnic and religious identities than the first, and engages less in ethnic and religious practices. We do find however, that religious and ethnic identity become increasingly related for the second generation. These differences can only partly be accounted for by differences in education, employment and life course events.

Hybridity as a cultural form of individual subjectivism. Trapped between cultural heritage and transnational symbolic values

Budakowska, Elzbieta

Department of Sociology of Social Changes, University of Warsaw Warsaw/Warszawa, Poland

Keywords

transnationalization, postmodernism, Hybridity, individual subjectivism, cultural heritage

The complexity resulted from the transnational specificity of the existing social orders and the multiplicity of previously not existing options, are also reflected in the emerging variety of individual subjectivisms .

I define individual subjectivism in terms of a postmodern perspective. It is in a perspective of increasing freedom of choice in constantly multiplying cultural environment which overcomes time and space, and not necessarily serves as a base of permanent anchored identity. Since every choice is only temporary, an individual can become a nomad trapped between its own cultural heritage and transnational symbolic values.

Liberal economy causes transnational journey of the subject which reconfigures the relations between the identity, belonging and cultural heritage. Constant border transgression creates transnational migrant identity. Nomadic way of thinking is leading to the nomadic lifestyle and the consciousness of the lack of stable borders.

Hybridization, in turn, as a playful combination of different cultural elements undermining the essential discourse, is connected with deterritorialization and relational identity. This is followed by the gradual development of hybrid cultural forms, functioning within the broader (beyond the local/national) understanding of cultural heritage. So, it can undermine the national identity and shape some new hybrid cultural forms, another words, forms situated between that what is stable and that what is fluid.

Transnational context, clearly suggests that the number of human beings eligible to move in the global scale is constantly growing, as well as the intensity of crossing the cultural borders. The phenomenon of transnational moves requires from the social actor constant redefinition of its sense of belonging.

The changes indicated above rises the question about the adequacy of the current research approaches towards the nation state The global open flows have their part in destroying the naïve understanding of the local as given. The nation state, is not longer a sufficient explanatory base in a postmodernist social network context, which should be treated as a variable in explaining that what emerges from the way of being and that what actually comes from the way of belonging,

ICT for Cultural Heritage Communication: Investigating the Impact

Paolini, Paolo

*Department of Electronics and Information, Politecnico di Milano
Milan, Italy*

Di Blas, Nicoletta

*Department of Electronics and Information, Politecnico di Milano
Milan, Italy*

Rubegni, Elisa

TEC-LAB, University of Lugano Lugano, Switzerland

Keywords

impact, user-study, cultural heritage

For more than a decade cultural institutions (mainly from the Anglo-Saxon area) have experimented ever more sophisticated forms of computer-mediated communication, ranging from "traditional" websites to mobile devices and now the new frontier of web 2.0. Important issues like usability and users' engagement (with interaction and content) have also been explored through different user studies.

Still, as we discuss in this paper, the issue of the (deep) cultural impact, beyond the engagement and curiosity that computer mediated communication may raise, has not yet been adequately addressed. Does ICT-based communication help conveying the cultural message (of a museum, an exhibition?)? Under which conditions? Is this impact long-lasting? When is the "right timing": before a visit, during a visit, after a visit?

This paper aims at discussing this fundamental issue based on the results of an extensive survey that took place between July 2008 and January 2009. In spring 2008 the TEC-LAB of University of Italian Switzerland built a multimedia multi-channel application (exploiting 1001stories, a tool developed at HOC-LAB of Politecnico di Milano) for the exhibition "Enigma Helvetia" that was held at the Museo Cantonale and Museo d'Arte of Lugano. The application was highly innovative, from a technological point of view, but also very user friendly: the aim was to provide non-techy users with an agile tool for introducing the exhibition's cultural message.

The user study was organized as an online survey proposed to more than 1000 "friends of the museum?"; 119 answered. In addition, the survey was also proposed to on-site visitors; 82 answered. Therefore on the whole we had 201 questionnaires for the analysis. Interesting results have been obtained; just to mention a few, a very high percentage used the web site for more than 5 minutes, and 26% more than 20 minutes (an incredible amount of time). Both users who visited the exhibition and those who did not, felt that the multimedia helped them to understand better its cultural themes.

Identity performances of the global elite and the power of the local - Everyday actions of white German bank managers in London and Singapore

Meier, Lars

*Joblessness and Social Inclusion, Institute for Employment Research
Nuremberg, Germany*

Keywords

place, Whiteness, Global Elite, performance, Identities

Usually the elite and their cultural identities, the white high qualified and well paid males, are invisible in social research. In my presentation the formation of elite identities by their everyday activities and performances is investigated in two different cities. Based on the analysis of empirical data collected by participant observation and in semi-structured interviews with German finance managers working in London and in Singapore the construction of whiteness, maleness and of being the global elite became visible in both cities. By living, working and spending leisure time in London or Singapore the process of identity construction becomes a process of a steady interaction with the city: with its specific history, its social structure and its materiality. My presentation will not only demonstrate the process of identity construction in different contexts, it will also demonstrate the process of identity construction as an interaction with the city and its specific history: with the colonial city of Singapore and with the imperial city of London. In their everyday production of identities the German bankers interact with the city structures. And they are also bringing something with them into the city which massively influences their encounter with the city: their images of the cities. These images produce different expectations of the city and of specific places in the city. They have some impact on the everyday activities and the unique identity formations of the managers.

Ideology and Subjectivity in Fantasy Literature

Kosma, Yvonne-Alexia

Department of Preschool Education, University of Thessaly Athens, Greece

Keywords

power, identity, Subjectivity, fantasy literature

This paper is about power relations and subjectivity in fantasy literature. My approach is mainly concerned with the ideological impact of fantasy literature and it focuses on the effects and consequences of representation. In this sense it is not only about the production of meaning through and within representation, but mostly about the reproduction of power relations and the construction of identities and subjectivities.

A key feature of fantasy literature is the denial of dominant assumptions concerning the 'real' and the 'possible'. Thus a fantasy narrative is founded on an obdurate defiance of what is generally accepted to be plausible. It is 'the narrative result of transforming the condition contrary to fact, into a 'fact' itself'. In a way, such a violation of dominant assumptions upsets prevailing normative conventions. It would certainly be naive to assume that fantasy is inherently subversive (it might as well reproduce dominant or even reactionary ideologies). But in redefining the 'real' we reach the limits of categories we have learned to consider as fixed. Questioning given boundaries between the real and the fictional, human and non-human, male and female etc. such hybrid subjectivities can lead to the redefinition of the concept of subjectivity and the deconstruction of binary categories. This hybrid status may question the ontological purity according to which western societies define what is canonically human. Unsettling dominant categories, fantasy forms may redefine what it means to be a subject inside a binary ordering system.

My work draws upon Foucault's archaeological method, on genealogy as well as on the key concepts of discourse theory by Laclau and Mouffe. I also draw on literary criticism and psychoanalysis.

Image of Foreigners. Adolescent's attitudes and socializations of diversity

Alessandro, Bergamaschi

Social Sciences Department - Unité de Recherche Migrations et Société, Turin University - Nice Sophia Antipolis University Turin - Nice, Italy - France

Keywords

Immigration, representations, attitudes, interethnic relationships

My thesis project is the social representation of foreign people among adolescents in Italy and France and their degree of ethnical prejudice. It's a comparative study focused on the high schools of three towns: Turin and Genes for Italy, Nice for France. The ethnic prejudice is not a merely result of the interaction between different brains, that stimulate deep emotional attitudes of rejection or acceptance of immigrants. My analysis shows that the interethnic attitudes are the results of the interaction of specific sociological factors such as: a) socio-economical, b) socio-demographics, c) cultural-capital, d) relationship, e) national-ideological. The understanding of the ethnical attitudes needs to integrate the individual level of the social representations (socio-psychological approach) into a contextual level. It is demonstrated that a social representation, like that of immigrant, is a cognitive architecture that take form in a psycho-sociological way. However it is important not to forget that it is the product of the national ideological dominant pattern that reflects the specific socio-political life of the countries. Moreover the social representation needs the sociological variables connected with the actor's social position to yield visible attitudes. In this way it is shown that interethnic's attitudes are the results of the foreigners social representation, assumed such as a cognitive tank activated by the above-mentioned factors. This study is conducted by a semi-structured questionnaire, administered on a stratified quota sample of 919 individuals (302 in Turin, 311 in Genes, and 306 in Nice). It was chosen to test an adolescent population, students of the senior class of high school, because it is an important moment to develop ethnical attitudes when the person to get ready to live an important moment of life (such as the end of the secondary educational cycle) that oblige him to develop expectancies about his future and to think deeply about the social circumstances. Main theoretical frameworks employed: Personality and Ideology Theory [Adorno], Contact Theory [Allport], Social Identity Theory [Tajfel], Realistic Conflict Theory [Blumer, Sherif], Ethnic Competition Theory [Scheepers, Coenders]; the Socials Representations School begun by Moscovici until the recent developments [Abric; Moliner; Grize; Doise; Seca].

ImagEnation of the Czech DNA

Slesingerova, Eva

Sociology (Social Anthropology), Faculty of Social Studies Brno, Czech republic

Keywords

DNA, Biopower, representation of human body, genom, ethnicization of human diversity

Taking advantage of interpretative social theory, this paper examines the narrative concerning complementarity of sameness and difference in the production of knowledge within interpretation of various imaginations of DNA, genom and the body, mainly. The new emerging of the idea of race, like the main theme of distribution the sameness and difference, is critically analyses within broader area of contemporary forms of the biopower: questions of race, reproductive medicine and genomic. The special attention is paid to the recovering of the idea of race.

These representations of 'sameness' and 'difference' presented in popular discourse refer to the cultural imagination of genomic and DNA research in connection with notions of nationality and ethnicity. This text asks the consequences which the use of words and images connected with concepts of 'origin' or imagination of the body for the construction of national core-group or national core solidarity of the community have brought. The core arguments of the paper are associated with analysis of the representation of the body, the DNA, the genom in the connecting with the legitimization of ethnic or national bordelines identification.

Importance of the Visual: ocularcentrist orientation and its research methodology

Zilinskaite, Viktorija

Stratification department, Institute for Social Research Vilnius, Lithuania

Keywords

methodology, ocularcentrism, Visual culture

The presentation analyses empirical methodology for research of ocularcentrism. Visual culture for a long time was privileged object of semiotics where meanings of objects of culture are analysed. Importance of visuality in Western European culture traditionally was analysed by culture studies. Martin Jay has used the term ocularcentrism to describe centrality of the visual in contemporary Western life and stated that visual culture, more precisely focus on vision, - significant and exceptional feature of Western culture.

However ocularcentrism of Western culture in sociology is usually taken as axiom or based on power of mass media and arguments of other sciences. Methodology of estimation of paramount of vision in respect of other senses was experimented during the research in Lithuania, Latvia and Norway. The methodology is based on analysis of indirect attitudes towards different aspects of personal presentation. For the analysis of attitudes toward visuality the cognitive aspect of value attitudes was used. The questions were formed to elucidate indirect experience and generalised observation rather than individual preferences. This on the first hand allows to avoid stereotype answers that may give the respondent possibility to portray him/her-self as having "good taste" or being prudent person (what is usually happening if we ask about respondent's own preferences). On the other hand, it allows extension of information validity, because respondents present not their own attitudes, but generalisation of their observations.

Data analysis proved methodology through showing the existence of the relation between behavioural and emotional attitudes towards artefacts of ocularcentrist culture and cognitive ocularcentrism in public and private spheres. Data analysis showed Norwegians to be more ocularcentrism oriented while Lithuanians were oriented to deconstruction of meanings. While regarding local culture as a different one, Lithuanians may see need for deconstruction of meanings of visual materials that seem to be obvious for Norwegians.

Individualistic Metaphors in Conflict: Controversies of the Authorship Perception in Contemporary University

Kurakin, Dmitry

*Centre for Fundamental Sociology, State University - Higher School of Economics
Moscow, Russia*

Keywords

plagiarism, root metaphor, cultural autonomy, authorship, uncertainty

The "cultural turn" has given birth to several theoretical and methodological dilemmas in sociology. One of the most important among them is the ontological status of cultural matters or, in other words, the problem of "cultural autonomy". Proceeding from theses of the "strong program of cultural sociology" which denies explanations of culture by means of something separated of meaning realm, this paper moves to the concrete social object analysis, namely contemporary university as one of the corner stones of the European cultural identity.

The idea of the autonomy of culture implies giving sociological accounts to the inner logic of cultural matters. The sociological reconstruction of social life root metaphors is seen as a methodological solution suitable for this purpose. Root metaphor organizes meanings of social life, providing social actors with clear evidence of the "order of things" and shading light on what is right and what is wrong. Meanings which contradict inner logic of the metaphor engender "uncertainty" and thus are perceived as "impure" and marked with strong negative emotions (anger, aversion, misunderstanding, etceteras). These emotions are empirically observable in contrast to metaphors. That's why to reconstruct root metaphors of social life we have to detect and analyze conflicts.

This paper examines two sets of university life root metaphors based on case-study analysis of actual conflict of intuitions in the university practice. The conflict concerns different perceptions of authorship and plagiarism prohibition. One set of metaphors relates to classical university models, and the other one characterizes economy-oriented models of education. Both are in close relation to the Enlightenment, modernity and individualism, but in different way. Contradictions come to light within the bounds of authorship perception and the problem of substance of text. The first set of metaphors issues from the ancient understanding of the sacred substance of the authorship/authority (going back to Latin verb "augeo"), as well as Romanticism accentuation of the originality and uniqueness of the text. The second one, on the contrary, relativizes the substance of the text from the point of instrumental rationality. In a wider sense it takes shape of Weberian conflict of formal and substantial rationalities.

Language change among Catalan young people

Serracant, Pau

*-, Catalan Youth Observatory
Barcelona, Spain*

Keywords

young people, language, linguistic choice, Transitions

Catalonia is a complex multilingual society, traditionally divided into Catalan and Spanish speakers who constantly negotiate their position. In the last decade the arrival of an important number of foreign population (up to 25% of young people in Catalonia are born outside Spain) has changed the linguistic framework and adds complexity to this situation. Young people are especially sensitive with regard to linguistic issues, as it is during the youth phase when people define their identities and their social position. It is considered that the different transitions that form the youth phase (studying, working, leaving home and family formation) are key moments in the shaping of language use decisions.

The paper presents the main results of a specific statistical exploitation on language issues of the Catalan Youth Survey from 2007. Firstly, it is described the linguistic distribution of Catalan young people (characterized by a polarized equilibrium) and its evolution since 2002 (increase in the number of bilingual youngsters). Secondly, the paper focuses in the changes in the linguistic choice according to the context (family, friends, school, work, unknown people): passing from one's origin family to a wider social context implies an increase of the use of the second language. Also, the more formal is the context the most speakers Catalan language gains. Thirdly, it is offered data on 'linguistic mobility', i.e., the percentage of young people that have Catalan language as their family (of origin) language and have changed into Spanish as their usual language, and the opposite way. Results show a clearly different 'change rate' (that benefits Catalan language) and a strong influence of the 'linguistic environment' (the percentage of each language speakers in each territory) in the probability of linguistic mobility to happen.

Looking for "A place in the sun": The Italian way to the soap opera between global and local issues

Cardini, Daniela

Istituto di Comunicazione, Università IULM Milano, Italy

Keywords

Globalization, Media, tv, serial form, soap

Television serials are the expression of the so-called "national drama" (Livingstone 1998; Allen 1985, 1995), that is, how a culture can think about itself from a daily-life perspective by focusing on private relationships such as family, friends, couple, parenthood and so on. But the serial form is also one of the clearest expressions of the globalization process, which is epitomized by the worldwide circulation of US tv series.

The relationships between local and global issues become clear in the soap opera form. While in many European tv schedules national soaps go together with US programs and they generally score better rates, the Italian situation is quite different. This will be the focus of the proposed paper.

Until 1997 there was no Italian production of soap operas. Daytime serials were mainly imported from the US and dubbed. The local production was focused on tv movies (2 to 4 episodes) or prime time dramas (up to 8 ? 10 episodes).

The first Italian soap, Un posto al sole ("A place in the sun?"), resulted from a joint venture between the public broadcaster RAI3 and Grundy Productions, that sold RAI3 the production format of the UK-Australian soap Neighbours. So, the Italian soap is a mix of a British-Australian productive format, local contents and US daily scheduling.

Most of the Italian tv critics and scholars predicted an almost sure failure, but they were wrong: in less than three years, two other new local soaps (Vivere and Cento Vetrine) entered the schedule of commercial television (Mediaset). Ten years after, two of them are still on air, one of them was closed in May 2008 and a new one premiered in September 08.

This paper will analyze the cultural and industrial background that contributed to the creation of an Italian way to the soap opera, as an unusual example of the mix of global formats and local adaptations, of production rules and narrative needs.

Magic as a social institution and the mechanisms of its "self-defense"

Boklin, Alex

*Sociology, Higher School of Economics
Moscow, Russian Federation*

Keywords

failure, social institution, magic

The culture of modernity is substantially built upon scientific and technological achievements. But does it mean that we have reached the "disenchantment" of the world? Has everything we know (or would like to know) and deal with become transparent and predictable? In other words, have we managed to eliminate all the magic from the cultural sphere? Hardly. On the contrary, many authors point out that uncertainty, risks and virtualization are on a global scale one of the most significant features of modern life. So, maybe we live in "a new magical epoch"?

Within this "current cultural situation", I'd like to highlight and subject to initial sociological analysis the fact of magic's persistence. This supposes addressing two significant issues.

The first is: since we want to analyze magic from a sociological perspective, it would be quite logical to decide, with which concept it stands most closely. In my paper, I intend to propose studying magic as a social institution. Science and religion are often observed as social institutions and in this light it may seem a bit surprising that magic, the third and perhaps the most ancient element of "the classic triad" (magic, religion and science) still hasn't been considered consistently in this way.

And the second issue would be to give an outline to means by which magic still dwells in our world. What occurs when magic fails? And how such failures are "fixed"?

Shortly speaking, an attempt will be taken to demonstrate how "self-defense" of a certain cultural phenomenon is being performed.

Making Music Together - Performance and Aesthetic Dimensions of Social Action in Alfred Schutz

Stascheit, Andreas Georg

Emil Berliner Institute, Dortmund University of Applied Sciences and Arts Dortmund, Germany

Keywords

performing cultures, embodied features of performance, aesthetics in action

In 1956 Alfred Schutz was invited to present the paper 'Mozart and the Philosophers' at the renowned Peabody Conservatory, Baltimore. In the run-up to this lecture, a Baltimore newspaper published a short article that contains perhaps the most concise précis of Alfred Schutz's self-defined intentions: 'His principal fields of endeavor are philosophical interpretations of the social world through language and the arts, especially music.'

A reconstruction of Alfred Schutz's way into sociology through music has to follow two analytical directions: the exploration of correlations between Schutz's own musical practice and his theoretical positions, complemented by tracing back the influences, the controversy between Nietzsche and Wagner and the debate between Bergson and Einstein have left in Schutz's thought.

Schutz's essay 'Making Music Together' is taken as the starting point for the discussion presented in this paper. Following the two analytical directions mentioned above, we will explore the essay's theoretical context by analyzing the two topics below from the perspective of performance:

- (1) polyphony and counterpoint, taken as performed and embodied musical structures
- (2) musical tempo and rhythm, discussed from the viewpoint of ensemble performance

As will be shown, the performance related aspects of polyphony, tempo and rhythm have provided the basis for one of Schutz's key contributions to social theory: the explication of the principal relevance of temporal structures for the genesis and understanding of social relationships. The discussion thus reveals the aesthetic background of what may be called the 'cantus firmus' present throughout the work of Alfred Schutz: the nexus of time, action and plurality of rationality.

Making sense of the procedural footprint of the making of and implementation of cultural policies: a methodological contribution from Bakhtin's literary theory

Ramalho, Joana

*Instituto de Ciências Sociais, Universidade de Lisboa
Lisbon, Portugal*

Keywords

cultural policies, dialogism, Mikhail Bakhtin, polyphony

As a methodological inspiration the literary theory of Mikhail Bakhtin has been of interest to an array of disciplines. In this paper, I explore its appropriation by sociology focusing on the inherent reflexivity of both sociological research and social processes.

According to Bakhtin the material of human sciences are texts, and their method is interpretation. Their object is not a finite object, but a subject in itself, in constant dialogism with other subjects, amongst these the researcher. The metalanguage establishes thus a dialogical relation to the described language, which is particularly true in a qualitative methodology, where the main tool remains the researcher himself and his own responsive understanding. A reflection on the chosen methodology and its limitations is therefore fundamental.

Heterology remains one of the main characteristics of society and social diversity, reuniting the diversity of languages (heteroglossia) and of voices (heterophony). According to Bakhtin, these are always dialogically arranged in a text. Knowing of each others existence, the different languages, voices, and utterances within a novel are bound to conflict, to negotiate, to agree, to react and change. Accommodating a multiplicity of perspectives and dialogues, it is not a finite object, but an ongoing event.

Dialogism and polyphony seem to be intrinsic to all social processes. Bakhtin's literary theory can therefore be used to inquiry into different cultural processes. I am particularly interested in the field of cultural policies, and within it in processes that bring together different individuals and institutions, articulating different intentions and expectations to achieve a common goal. The selected example is the construction of cultural facilities - architectonic spaces built to accommodate and institutionalise cultural productions. The building process as a whole is suitable for analysis as a heterophonic process, with centripetal and centrifugal forces. Human actions, texts in potentia as Bakhtin sees them, should be understood according to their primary meaning, and to the meaning they acquire through dialogue. I compare the process of building a cultural facility to a polyphonic novel, an event in becoming, with its multiplicity of perspectives, dialogues and monologues, influenced by both the context and each other.

Masks as Important Elements of European Cultural Heritage

Kovacev, Asja Nina

*Department of Health Studies, University of Ljubljana
Ljubljana, Slovenia*

Keywords

identity, cultural heritage, mask

Mask is one of the most ancient human creations and belongs to the most impressive elements of cultural heritage in different cultures. Several discoveries prove the use of masks long before people started to cultivate the earth. Throughout history masks have been used for different purposes, which caused different consequences.

Originally the mask represented a phantasmal creation, which was connected with demoniac manifestations. In archaic societies people's use of masks in rites enabled their empathic identification with the creatures, whose masks they were wearing, their use in battles raised the warriors' self-confidence, while their use in funerary art was meant to enable the dead people to keep their natural look and to return to the world, which they had left.

Mask enables a radical change of the identity by covering the person's face, which is the best visible indicator of his/her personality. Because of that mask has appeared in every culture from the most archaic to the most developed ones. Its main function is not to hide people's essence, but to reveal it and to demonstrate all impulses that ordinarily have to be hidden or repressed because of the demands of the social environment.

The identity change in ritual is complete (and because of that it is also associated with tensions, fear, and anxiety), while its change in theatre and carnival is only partial. The masked person is conscious of his/her real personality and of the temporariness of such transformations.

Media and reproductive health. How Italian media establish the social reality of the infertility and its social meanings

Boccia Artieri, Giovanni

*Sociology of communication, University of Urbino "Carlo Bo"
Urbino, Italy*

Gemini, Laura

*Sociology of communication, University of Urbino "Carlo Bo"
Urbino, Italy*

Bartoletti, Roberta

*Sociology of communication, University of Urbino "Carlo Bo"
Urbino, Italy*

Mazzoli, Lella

*Sociology of communication, University of Urbino
Urbino, Italy*

Keywords

infertility, Media, , social representations

The aim of this speech is to present the results of a research conducted by LaRiCA ? Reaserch Lab. Of Advanced Communication ? Faculty of Sociology, University of Urbino ? about the reproductive health in Italy.

A first part of the research concerns the content analysis of a sample of media mainstream ? more precisely a sample of the most diffused italian newspapers ? about the main themes of the health and reproductive desease. The analysis presented has been conducted by the application of a coding sheet based on the typical selectors used by media to create its news. Our questions are: what does media communication say about our topic? And how? In other words the main hypotesis of the research is that the social reality of the reproductive health is said by media. On this base we can observe the social construction of the meanings of a problem that an increasing number of individuals, couples and families in Italy have to face at the present and, over all, in the future.

In order to compare the semantics of the reproductive health the second part focuses on the grassroot communication. Thanks to a qualitative focus on a number of web communities it is possible to observe how networked people generate spontaneus contents about the experience of the infertility. In this way we can analyse the meanings emerging outside the media mainstream. Towards, as we try to show, a new semantics of the reproductive health.

Session: 6. Culture and Power

Mediating Regional Identities; The Popularity and Legitimacy of Regional Television

Hitters, Erik

Media and Communication, Erasmus University Rotterdam - ERMeCC Rotterdam, Netherlands

Krijnen, Tonny

Media and Communication, Erasmus University Rotterdam Rotterdam, Netherlands

Keywords

legitimation, Regions, television, mediated culture

The popularity and legitimacy of regional television in the Netherlands seems to be growing. An increasing number of regional programmes, lauded for their authenticity and familiarity, have reached the national networks. In order to protect cultural heritage and to strengthen regional identities local and provincial governments support such programmes. A change in Dutch media legislation in 2006 has made the provinces primarily financially responsible for the 13 regional networks in the Netherlands. In this paper we will investigate whether the popularity of regional television has indeed increased and if so, what this implies with respect to matters of globalisation and mediated cultures.

In order to answer our questions we are inspired by globalisation theories. Authors such as Castells and Morley have argued that mediated globalisation threatens identities and subsequently gives rise to a need for a new self conforming and coherent identity. Regional networks and government cater to this need.

Regional programmes, however, not only have homogenizing characteristics, but can also exclude and thus induce fragmentation. By their authenticity and familiar settings regional programmes also quite clearly show which groups in society are excluded and unwanted (Morley, 2001). In this respect, the increased attention of policy makers for homogenizing regional television is remarkable. Attempts at identity construction by means of television programmes does not only demonstrate naïve ideas about the impact of media, it is also paradoxical in a society struggling with problems of ethnic minorities and integration.

To answer our research questions we use primary as well as secondary data. Data provided by networks are analysed in order to assess ratings, market shares, advertising income and financial performance. An analysis of programming data is used to chart changes in content and genres. Primary data consist of qualitative interviews with employees and ceo's of regional networks, with provincial policy-makers and programme producers. The interviews are analysed by means of Atlas.ti.

Our results confirm an increase in the popularity and legitimacy of regional networks, but simultaneously show the problematic nature of a homogenous regional identity in a globalising and diversifying society.

National Homogeneity in European Economic Cultures

Hoelscher, Michael

Institute of Sociology, University of Heidelberg Heidelberg, Germany

Keywords

culture, European Integration, methodological nationalism, Economic sociology, European Values Study

The overarching context for the paper is the question, whether national cultures are internally homogeneous. However, the paper will address this question only in a limited way, namely: ?In how far are national cultures homogeneous on the regional level.? Culture is defined in this context as values, norms and beliefs that are relatively stable over time and that are shared by a group (see Gerhards & Hoelscher 2005). The example for the study are ?Economic cultures in the enlarged European Union?. Following current debates in economic sociology (e.g. Granovetter & Swedberg 2001; Smelser & Swedberg 1994) a theoretically derived and empirically useful concept of ?economic culture? was developed.

The concept was operationalised on the basis of the European Values Study from 1999/2000. Using cluster and discriminant analysis, 29 European Union member and accession countries were classified into three distinct economic cultures (Hoelscher 2006).

A reaggregation on the regional level (323 regions within 26 of these countries) shows an astonishing degree of homogeneity between regions of one country, despite huge differences in their economic situation. More than 90% of regions fall in the same cluster as their respective country.

The results will be discussed in relation to current debates on ?methodological nationalism? and ?European integration?.

References

Gerhards, J., & Hoelscher, M. (2005). Kulturelle Gemeinsamkeiten und Unterschiede in der erweiterten EU. Ein Vergleich zwischen den Mitgliedsländern, den Beitrittskandidaten und der Türkei. Wiesbaden: VS Verlag für Sozialwissenschaften.

Granovetter, M., & Swedberg, R. (Eds.). (2001). The Sociology of Economic Life (Second Edition ed.). Cambridge (MA): Westview Press.

Hoelscher, M. (2006). Wirtschaftskulturen in der erweiterten EU. Die Einstellungen der Bürgerinnen und Bürger im europäischen Vergleich. Wiesbaden: VS Verlag.

Smelser, N. J., & Swedberg, R. (Eds.). (1994). The Handbook of Economic Sociology. Princeton (NJ) / New York: Princeton University Press / Russell Sage Foundation.

Nepantla Sociology

Mendes, Madalena

*UID - Observatório de Políticas Educativas e de Contextos Educativos, Universidade Lusófona de Humanidades e Tecnologias
Lisboa, Portugal*

Romão, José Eustáquio

*Centro de Pós-graduação (Mestrado e Doutorado) em Educação, Universidade 9 de Julho - UNINOVE
S. Paulo, Brasil*

Keywords

New geopolitics, Nepantla Sociology, Coloniality, Socio-historical formations

Respectfully, do we understand that the suggestive question-subject of the 9th Conference of ESA could be extended for "European Society or Planetarian Societies"? In fact, it does not make sense to refer to social formations created artificial and regionally, in the name of any hegemonic global project. To keep on considering only the social formations and the European civilizatory processes, creating new frontiers, or consolidating the established ones, is to ignore the rich movement of the contemporary world, which brings together localism with globalism, "glocalism", in the best dialectic sense of the term. To identify, to recognize and to look for the sociability with all forms and socio-cultural processes all over the Planet, so that it becomes from an astronomic phenomenon to a historical one, as the brazilian sociologist Octavio Ianni wanted, must be the aim of the XXIst century. Besides, to think "European societies" and their respective cultures, without taking in consideration the extra-European contributions is to insist on the cultural hegemonization. So more than try to "translate" others societies cultural processes, the important thing is to develop the "nepantla" competence ("to live in between"), that is, to develop the capacity of living between two or more cultures, without colonialities, to develop the squint glance and the consequent capacity of using all the potentialities and diversity of all cultures.

The "Nepantla Sociology" would be the reflection turned to all forms of production of answers to logical problems, with the nepantla science, to the aesthetic problems with the nepantla art, to the practical problems with the nepantla ethics. In fact, it means to liquefy all the frontiers between the socio-historical formations, transforming what were a separation, division and customs into bridges on which productive, associative and symbolic processes cross and interact themselves, all over the Globe.

In this paper, the authors, from the contributions of thinkers as Santos, Quijano, Canclini, Gruzinski, Ribeiro, Glissant, Said, Dussel, Freire and Mignolo, propose the Nepantla Sociology as a privileged way of deconstructing euro-centric hegemonic paradigms in the defense of a new geopolitics able to avoke the silenced, in between, hybrid, oppressed and mestize cultures.

Perception and meaning in the transformation of museums ? a performance analysis of exhibitions in ethnology museums at the beginning of the 21st century

Grigoleit, Annette

Fellow of the Graduate College "Cultural Hermeneutics: Reflections of Difference and Transdifference", Friedrich-Alexander-University Erlangen Lüneburg, Germany

Keywords

Media, performance, space, qualitative methods

How do exhibitions in ethnology museum stage their cultural contexts? This question is eminent in view of the recent crisis of this museum type, and especially in view of the self-proclaimed concept of being a place of intercultural dialog. To approach these issues I analyzed selected parts of the permanent exhibition of the ethnology museum in Hamburg. Of particular interest for this study are the constitutive conditions, coherences, multi-media features and the social usages of these exhibitions that generate meaning and (re)construct spheres according to the claims mentioned above. The surveyed exhibition is treated as text, i.e., as signifier of meaning, yet especially as present medium of something absent, something non-expressed in a palpable manner. Exhibitions (as systems of signs) always have a medial realization (Srubar). With respect to this mediality it becomes important to analyze the constitutive conditions: How do the different levels of contents become discernable for different senses under the aspect of their performance? The center of the presentation will then be the methodological discussion of the research design in view of these theoretical and research questions. Using one specific unit of the exhibition as an example, I will present the usefulness and difficulties, the advantages and limitations of my methodology. It is based on the sociological hermeneutic approach by Soeffner and on the Grounded Theory by Glaser and Strauss. The exhibition affects the corporality of the observer and his movements; issues of the atmospheric constellation and the relationships among objects, spaces, other media and the observer in the exhibition have to be accounted for. Asemiotic and presemiotic modes of communication are regarded as well as the disciplining power of these spaces. The first level is the audio-visual and oral descriptive documentation which refers to an intersubjective performance in the museum-field. The second level implicates the preparation of this documentations especially in regard to the "literalization" of the oral descriptions and orientated in a system of notation. On the third level the analysis follows a pragmatically and socio-scientific hermeneutics orientated approach of "sequence analysis" (Soeffner, Raab).

Performing Cultural Cosmopolitanism: Pop-Rock Cognoscenti

Regev, Motti

Sociology, The Open University of Israel Raanana, Israel

Keywords

Cosmopolitanism, pop-rock, Knowledge

The taste and knowledge community of pop-rock is an aggregation of individuals scattered around the world, whose members are connected by their acquaintance with, knowledge of, and expertise in the very detailed history and stylistic variety of pop-rock music. Members of this community are also characterized by their taste preferences for genres of pop-rock music. These are the pop-rock cognoscenti or aficionados. They possess knowledge about musicians, styles, songs, albums, periods, and in general the type of knowledge that informs dictionaries and encyclopedias of popular music and pop-rock. Some of these individuals are lucky enough to make a living out of this knowledge by being critics; others are simply fans and collectors. This paper looks at some of the practices through which this knowledge is exercised in Israel. These practices include critics' columns and reviews in newspapers, magazines and websites, radio talk of music editors in specialized programs, and fans' information and opinion exchanges in internet forums. Attention will be given to the mixed presence, in all these practices, of knowledge about musicians not only from the US and UK, but also from Israel and other countries. The paper will contextualize these practices within the discourse on cultural cosmopolitanism. It will be argued that these practices are one particular mode of performing cosmopolitanism. These practices may be conceived as a set of rites through which cultural cosmopolitanism becomes an actually existing reality, where the local/national and the global frames of identity interweave into one

Intended for the 'performing cultures' or 'global issues' topic

Performing Power: Public Authority Styles in Finland 1945-2005

Kantola, Anu

*Department of Communication, University of Helsinki
Helsinki, Finland*

Keywords

Authority styles, power, performance, emotional regime

The paper examines the public authority styles in the post-war Finland and in particular the revolutionary style of corporate authorities since 1960s. As Luc Boltanski and Eve Chiapello (2007) have hypothesized corporate authorities adopted a socially transformative role in the post war societies by developing new spirited authority styles, which can be characterized as revolutionary. A longitudinal qualitative analysis of the main Finnish current affair and business magazines, Suomen Kuvalehti and Talouselämä from 1945 to 2005 and tracks down how authority is performed in the stories concentrating on one person, i.e. in personal interviews and features. It is suggested that there emerge three distinct public authority styles: i) patriotic paternalism (1945-1975), ii) rational managerialism (1955-1980) and iii) enthusiastic individualism (1980-2000). These styles are seen as emotional regimes (Reddy 2001), which are in dynamic relation with each other. At the heart of each style are the positive feelings, a fantasy of 'we?', which give rise to it. Yet at the same time there is the darker side, negative and suppressed feelings, which often are addressed by the following regime. This dynamic has been clear especially in Finland since 1970s as corporate authorities have developed clearly a style of authority which can be characterized as revolutionary. Moreover, the corporate styles has had a wider societal impact, as also authority styles in other societal sectors have been clearly affected by it by mimicking the corporate style or otherwise being trapped in nostalgia or positioned in opposition to the revolutionary project.

Performing the belief in contemporary dance

Laermans, Rudi

Centre for Sociological Research, Catholic University of Leuven Leuven, Belgium

Keywords

arts, performing culture, contemporary dance

In this paper, I will try to elucidate how the identity and reality of contemporary dance is constructed in a performative way through a variety of discursive as well as non-discursive practices. My attempt combines theoretical insights from recent performance theory (J. Butler), second order cybernetics (N. Luhmann) and so-called post-structuralism (J. Derrida). Two points will be stressed in the overall argument, which is backed by a first-hand acquaintance with the field of contemporary dance as researcher as well as through more direct forms of participation such as teaching, criticism and personal friendships with dance makers.

First, the performative identification of "something" as an instance of contemporary dance implies a form of belief, in the sense of an explicit or implicit conviction that the performed identifications identify real identities. Yet, one never believes alone: the first order modality of believing is in principle backed by the belief that there are others who believe what one believes. This belief circle points to the importance of others, real and imaginary ones, for and "within" the performativity of categories such as contemporary dance.

Second, I will point out that the identification of something as an instance of contemporary dance only acquires a certain plausibility if it is repeated by other actors. Every reiteration re-performs the initial performativity in an at least temporarily, often also discursively or non-discursively and institutionally different context, which evidently implies shifts, re-articulations, re-embeddings, and so on. Nevertheless, the self-referentiality of reiterations may effectively result in an overall confirmation of the previous labeling of for instance a public performance as "being contemporary dance". In this way, the already realized identification is at once temporarily and socially generalized. From a certain moment onwards, the identification acquires a factuality which is difficult to deny, let alone to disconfirm. In the concluding section, I will therefore argue that reiterations of identifications by different actors in different time sequences and within various contexts have an unintended social performativity.

Performing the Enterprising Self - Cultural Hegemony in Times of Uncertainty

Motakef, Mona

Essen Collegium of Gender Studies, University of Duisburg-Essen Essen, Germany

Lengersdorf, Diana

Institute for Sociology, University of Dortmund Dortmund, Germany

Keywords

enterprising self, cultural theory, Body, Hegemony, subject

Understanding hegemony only as master-slave-concepts ? in categories of manifest relations or rankings ? is no more sufficient. To open up the analysis and descriptions of (pre-)dominance, cultural dimensions are coming into focus. This perspective provides new possibilities for including productive dimensions of power, to investigate resistance and obstinacy or to understand varieties of hegemony. Following present diagnoses and prognoses of sophisticated-liberal societies, subjectifying techniques are self-control and self-regulation. A hegemonic form of subjectifying is the Enterprising Self.

In our presentation we advance the Enterprising Self from two perspectives. By understanding the body as a mediator of social life we firstly ask how the Enterprising Self appears in bodily performances. In a second step we discuss the Enterprising Self as a form of cultural hegemony (Laclau/Mouffe). Based on these two perspectives we discuss how cultural hegemony is localized and "partially fixed" on bodies. Using the example of managers and physicians we stress how hegemonic body practices are provoked.

Photographing the Past: the power of the photos in the public inscription of controversial events

Tota, Anna Lisa

*Dept. of Communication and Performing Arts, University Rome III, Faculty of Literature and Philosophy
Rome, Italy*

Keywords

public memory, cultural trauma, controversial events

How shared meanings are attributed to controversial event? To what extent can the public meaning of cultural trauma being fixed through different kind of cultural artefacts? This paper explores the power of images - and especially that of photos - in framing and reframing the public knowledge of very contested events. Starting from the works by Barbie Zelizer on the role played by photos in the public framing of the Holocaust, the paper addresses specifically the case of two very important photos from the Vietnam war: 1) the photos from My Lai Massacre, the mass murder of 347 to 504 unarmed citizens in South Vietnam, entirely civilians and some of them women and children, conducted by U.S. Army forces on March 16, 1968. 2) The photo of Kim Phuc, a young girl at about age nine running naked on the street after being severely burned on her back by a South Vietnamese napalm attack. The photo was taken by AP photographer Nick Út on June 1972. These photos are analysed in their textual characteristics and in the history of their reception, in order to understand how they have contributed to reframe the meaning of the Vietnam war in the American and in the European public discourse.

Portugal's cultural policy in the beginning of a new century

Centeno, Maria João

*Organizational Communication, School of Media Studies and Mass Communication, Lisbon's Politecnic Institute
Lisboa, Portugal*

Keywords

cultural policy, decentralization, Public discussion

Since 1974, many have been the Portuguese governments that promoted policies to respect plural creativity and "the post-enlightenment belief in a civilizational reason, associated to the modern's bet in State's responsibilities and capabilities to structure cultural life, as so far its equipments, its public search and financial stimulus to creation and taste education" (Silva, 2004b: 16).

Cultural democratization includes an easier access to cultural opportunities and goods, as well as enlightened cultural consumptions, a public commitment in terms of a cultural public service assurance, material and institutional conditions to independent artistic creation, valorization of "publics" education and formation as a root to cultural practice qualification are thought to conduct to more developed proposals either by political parties placed on the right or on the left side.

Decentralization policy has covered the Portuguese territory with equipments which, being seen as mediation places, must be incorporated in local experience as social places. So they must be alive places that inspire a common understanding, unifying elements that help people to identify and feel them as their own; public places must be as public as possible.

This presentation intends to show cultural organizations' paper, namely those which constitute the Theatres' National Network, in the ideas' public discussion.

Portuguese Cinema and its publics

Freire, Susana

x, ISCTE

Lisbon, Portugal

Keywords

Portuguese Cinema, Audiences, Spectator, Film, Cinematographic Culture

The cinematographic work is the reflection of the society we are living in, it reveals the different observations and perspectives. More than articulate the Portuguese movie, as singular object of the social- economical conditions and cultural situations that is involved, it is most important to elaborate the analysis of its audience and the construction of its reception spaces.

Evaluating the coincidence between receptors code, knowledge level, references an appreciation criteria, we will focus on the problem of the audience contact with the Portuguese cinema.

The importance of the spectator is vital when approaching the cinematographic phenomenon. This is because the cinema, as reference to stimulate new sensations, seems to necessarily imply a reflection about the spectator experience and the reality that it is going to experiment. As for this it is urgent to know what is his place and logic preferences, expectations and considerations and the final reasons of his choices.

Portuguese Manifest Destiny: The immaterial cultural heritage in a global material dominant culture

Sebastiao, Sonia

*Communication and Media Studies, Superior Institute of Social and Political Science - Technical University of Lisbon
Lisbon, Portugal*

Keywords

Symbol, Cultural Heritage, Myth

In its sociological theory, Vilfredo Pareto identified the existence of opposed forces that assure the social balance. These forces: residues and derivations of persistence or maintenance and change or combinations, can be identified in the 'Portuguese enigma', respectively, with the Manifest Destiny and its sub-myths (latent mythical structures) and with the dominant ascending myths of decay and progress, identified within the global risk contemporary society.

So using Pareto's theory, Gilbert Durand's mythanalysis model and the genetic method, one will demonstrate the unconscious persistence of historic mythical structures in Portuguese culture and mentality, and the ascending dominance of material Portuguese decay and technological progress associated with global culture.

The mythical structures that we call latent or dormant are visible in Portuguese culture, namely in:

1. Religious rituals and cults - such as the Holy Spirit Festivities and Marian Devotions;
2. Literary symbols ? such as Lusíadas (Camões); Mensagem (Fernando Pessoa); História do Futuro (Padre António Vieira);
3. Architectural monument and Manueline style (Geronimo's Monastery ? Lisbon; Convent of Christ ? Tomar);
4. Paintings and so one.

And are configured by the myths of: Manifest Destiny associated with the Myth of Crusade, the Maritime Adventure, the Great Monarch (Sebastian) and the Fifth Empire, and the love superexperience related with women sublimation (Goddess Cult).

On the other hand, the dominant myths are identified in Portuguese economic and educational problems related with their decay after their Renascent overseas empire dismantle, loss of independence and historical political leaders inefficiency. Although, Portugal have never been left behind in European construction, neither in technological progress. Nevertheless, their material Golden Age is over and ones believe that the actual greatness of Portuguese essence is on their specific immaterial culture. How we preserve it? First of all, knowing it and understanding its importance!

Power in organizational culture

Engelstad, Fredrik

Department of Sociology and Human Geography, University of Oslo Blindern, Norway

Keywords

power, culture, neo-institutional literature

In the literature on organizational culture, two distinct traditions may be singled out. On the one hand the long wave of management literature from the early 1980s and onwards, initiated by Peters and Waterman's "In search of excellence" (1982). On the other hand the neo-institutionalist literature in the wake of seminal papers by Meyer and Rowan (1977) and Powell and DiMaggio (1983).

Both traditions have power as a central concern, but for understanding organizations and their culture in terms of power, both are unsatisfactory. The management literature has a strong tendency to overrate the power of managers in shaping the culture of organizations, and likewise quite exaggerated expectations as to the effects on efficiency. Neo-institutionalism, on the other hand tends to underrate the significance of power. This does not mean that power is absent in neo-institutionalism, organizations are shaped by professions, the state and other agencies may coerce them into specific behaviors. Surprisingly, however, management and leadership are virtually absent in the neo-institutionalist world, and power structures become blurred at best.

The paper will seek to bridge the two literatures by on the one hand analyzing the limitations of the managerial approach in terms of theoretical work on power and communication. At the same the paper aims at disclosing the actor related power aspects of neo-institutionalism by linking them to organizational strategies.

The main thrust of the paper is theoretical, but empirical illustrations will be drawn from knowledge base organizations such as publishing houses and research institutes.

Powerpoint and the Performance of Knowledge

Knoblauch, Hubert

*Institute of Sociology, TU Berlin
Berlin, Germany*

Keywords

performance, Genre, Powerpoint, videography, Sociology of Knowledge

Powerpoint has not only been transforming the way how lectures are held; this new genre of knowledge transmission has been disseminated into every area of modern culture. In this paper I will present videographic analyses of power-point presentations. On the basis of video recordings of some two hundred presentations I will try to show that powerpoint is not to be considered as a simplification of information, but rather as a kind of transformation of knowledge transmission that is best accounted for by the notion of hybrid performance. Various aspects of this transformation will be considered, such as visualisation spatialisation and performance.

Public culture as the answer to calls-problems

Franchuk, Victor

*Social management, Russian State Social University
Moscow, Russia*

Keywords

values, problems, calls, answers, culture

Now among sociologists there is no unity of understanding of a society and public culture (PC). However, the success can be achieved, if the differentiation of social sciences will be accompanied by their integration. As one of the most effective integration means is offered updated organicist approach to a society and PC.

According to the new organicist approach, developed in Russian State Social University, the society is considered as 'the system deciding social problems?', and PC as set of samples of PC such as laws and legal acts, social institutes, social values and norms, innovations, organizational systems, national projects and goal programs being means (tools) of the decision of social problems. Thus, all PC is represented as the answer to calls-problems arising before a society.

On each new call, on each new social problem a society should 'answers' to corresponding highly effective samples of PC. Therefore state must constantly watch the PC, otherwise in it will be collects a lot of superfluous, ineffective samples of PC, that can lead to a 'paralysis' of the social mechanism of a society.

PC is subdivided into natural, artificial and combined. On the other hand, PC includes every means (tools) of the decision of social problems. PC it is focused on satisfaction of social needs, including economic, political, military, etc. Thus, PC can be treated as all that is created by people (purposely or inadvertently), is accepted by a society and it used by it for the answer to calls-problems, i.e. for satisfaction in public needs.

In spite of the fact that PC constantly changes under influence of calls-problems, these changes should not concern 'nucleus of PC?', i.e. system of base values and social norms corresponding to them (P.Sorokin), protected historically formed social mechanism (A.Compte) which includes a state as part of social mechanism.

The social mechanism reveals and solves social problems-calls, creating for new samples of PC or using already existing samples. Solving problems the social mechanism aspires to keep the formed order in a society.

Public Sphere as Assemblage: Assembling Political Cultures

Campbell, Elaine

School of Geography, Politics and Sociology, Newcastle University Newcastle Upon Tyne, United Kingdom

Keywords

Public Sphere, Cultural Politics, assemblage theory, DeLanda, liberal democracy

This paper investigates contemporary academic accounts of political culture which centre on and mobilise the notion of the public sphere. It does so in order to draw out a series of assumptions which are embedded within the conceptual scaffolding of such accounts - assumptions about, for example, the boundaries of public/private life; the forms, locations and conditions of possibility for public deliberation and participation; relations of power and resistance in liberal, democratic polities; processes and techniques of (mass) mediation; and the nature and attributes of "the public". Making use of recent developments in Deleuzian-inspired assemblage theory - most especially drawn from DeLanda's (2006) "new philosophy of society" - the paper sets out an alternative perspective on the notion of the public sphere, and regards it as a space of connectivity brought into being through a contingent and heterogeneous assemblage of discursive, visual and performative practices. This is mapped out with reference to the cultural politics of crime and punishment. However, a/the public sphere as an assemblage is not simply a "social construction" brought into being through a logic of connectivity, but is an emergent and ephemeral space which reflexively nurtures and assembles the political cultures of which it is an integral part. The discussion concludes, then, with a consideration of the contribution of assemblage theory to identifying the progressive, inclusionary and liberatory potentialities of different kinds of politico-cultural relations and connections.

Publishing studies and theoretical modelling: the case for a Portuguese case

Medeiros, Nuno

*Ciências Sociais e Humanas/Sociologia, Escola Superior de Tecnologia da Saúde de Lisboa/Faculdade de Ciências Sociais e Humanas
Portugal,*

Keywords

theoretical modelling, Portuguese case, publishing studies, centre and periphery

As an emerging field in search of consolidation and of a place in the agenda of the social sciences, namely of the sociology of culture, publishing studies, a term coined in the mid-nineties, intend to create a scientific narrative of the typographic construction of the world. This intention builds upon the use of concepts like 'culture shaping' or 'canon making', and tries an understanding and explanation of the processes that revolve around the printed word ' nowadays, also the digital one ' having the book as paradigm, both as object and idea. Focusing on the complex ' often filled with tension and contradiction ' universe of the publishing industry and agents, the editorial studies seek institutionalization as a recognized and autonomous field of knowledge, using among other strategies one of the oldest underpinning practices at the disposal of science: the creation and development of theoretical models that are comprehensive and analytically capable of an understanding of the plural publishing and publisher's world.

The proposed presentation attempts to challenge the trends that, within the emergence of editorial studies, contribute to the fast academic establishing and institutional validation through modelling, therefore putting forward a critique of the ' not necessarily intentional ' hegemonic consequences inherent to this option. The challenge consists not in the suppression of the theoretical proposals and their generalization plans, but rather in the critical perspective towards a modelling temptation that works as a production centre of explanatory modes imposing a discourse on the scientific periphery, and ignoring the native sources and traditions. In an effort to illustrate this point of view the author resorts to the Portuguese case during the Estado Novo period, concerning the relation between publishing and twentieth century authoritarian regimes.

Qualifying the Impact of 'Commercialization' on the Cultural Coverage of Dutch, French, German and U.S. Newspapers, 1955-2005

Janssen, Susanne

Dept. of Media and Communication / Dept. of Arts and Culture Studies, Erasmus University Rotterdam Rotterdam, Rotterdam

Keywords

field theory, comparative analysis, commercialization, arts journalism

Since the 1950s, the coverage given to the arts and culture in Western newspapers seems to have undergone significant changes, which appear closely connected to wider changes in the domains of culture and journalism. According to the research literature, a key development in both fields has been 'commercialization': newspapers as well as producers and mediators in virtual all cultural fields have become more oriented toward commercial values and practices, which has led to a series of transformations in the journalism of arts and culture. However, commercialization is a multidimensional, longitudinal, and internationally highly variable process (Benson 2000, 2005; Essner 1999, Norris 2000; Schoenbach and Lauf 2002). In this paper, we therefore use a long-term, cross-national research design and a variety of empirical measures to study the alleged 'commercialization' of arts journalism. Our research aim is twofold: (i) to qualify the impact of commercializing forces on the volume, content and appearance of the arts and cultural coverage in elite newspapers of four different countries - France, Germany, the Netherlands, and the United States - between 1955-2005 and (ii) to explore whether and how commercial influences are weakened or strengthened by specific features of the journalistic field (Benson 2005) and the cultural field in each country. To this end, for each country, we conduct a comprehensive content analysis of the arts and cultural coverage as well as the cultural advertising in mainstream newspapers. For our typology of each country's journalistic and cultural field, we draw on the available research literature and secondary data on (among other things) developments in the newspaper market, media and cultural policy frameworks, and the preferences of cultural consumers.

Recreational sexuality as an upper middle-class distinction mechanism

Kaplan, Dana

Sociology, Political Science, and Communication, The Open University Raanana, Israel

Keywords

Sexuality, Middle Class, Distinction, taste

Using the concept of recreational sexuality (to be distinguished from procreational), this paper addresses the absence of class analysis from the sociology of sexuality. It also stresses the potential contribution of cultural sociology in explicating contemporary sexualities.

Recreational sexuality refers to marginal sexual practices and new ways of managing sexual relations that have reshaped heterosexual lives. Anal intercourse, multiple-partners sex or BDSM serve as examples for this kind of sexuality, where pleasure becomes a fundamental 'right', and even more so, a condition for self-fulfillment. More often than not, this gradual socio-sexual shift has been conceptualized as both agent-less and structure-less ideological move towards an egalitarian yet hedonistic society. Furthermore, this move is seen as unrelated to emerging late-modernity's neoliberal policies and individualization discourses. In contrast, I will show how recreational sexuality, no longer a completely private conduct, forms a symbolic class boundary between the upper middle- and the lower classes.

Based on in-depth interviews I show how men and women of the upper middle-class use recreational sexuality to individualize themselves and exercise their cultural sophistication. However, and in lieu with recent transformations in taste formation processes, where "good taste" is more a function of idiosyncratic, omnivore selection skills than the safe old "high/low" culture snobbery, recreational sexuality should not be understood as "transgressive" or avant-garde. Rather, as a class practice it exemplifies a process of cultural hybridization, typical to contemporary upper middle-classes.

Rehabilitating Discredited Culture: The Endurance of Distinction in British Comedy

Friedman, Sam

*Sociology, University of Edinburgh
Edinburgh, Scotland*

Keywords

festivals, class, comedy, Bourdieu, Distinction

Sam Friedman, University Of Edinburgh, sam@festmag.co.uk; Topic 6. Culture and Power

At the Edinburgh Festivals, which together constitute the largest arts festival in the world, the Bourdieusian homology between class and cultural taste has been particularly enduring. Traditionally showcasing only the 'high' performing arts of opera, ballet and theatre, Festival attendance has been synonymous with the upper and middle classes. However, in recent years, this arena of distinction has been disrupted. Although audiences remain predominantly drawn from the cultural elite, there has been a significant rise in the production of 'low-brow' comedy. While in 1980 there were only 14 comedy shows at the Festivals, this number had risen to 649 by 2008, more than any other art form. Following other trends in elite consumption of popular culture, the leading sociological explanation for this phenomenon is the 'cultural omnivore thesis'. This theory posits that symbolic hierarchies underpinning cultural consumption have largely collapsed and dominant groups now have expansive cultural portfolios which incorporate both high and low culture. This paper is based on preliminary research that seeks to critique the 'cultural omnivore thesis', arguing that its quantitative bias fails to examine both the specific practice of elite culture consumers and how popular arts such as comedy may have changed over time. Traditionally denigrated in the 'academy', British comedy has undergone a significant transformation since the 1980s 'alternative comedy' movement. New 'high art' genres of critical, intellectual and surrealist comedy now dominate the Edinburgh Festivals and have subsequently been appropriated and consecrated by dominant groups. Such elite consumers of comedy are also rarefying their consumption by transposing their distinctly 'disinterested' aesthetic style to consume comedy in a manner inaccessible to those with less cultural capital. By examining the contemporary rise of comedy, this paper therefore suggests that an updated version of Bourdieu's distinction may still be relevant.

Reification of Autonomy: Picture Frame as Media

Farkhatdinov, Nail

Centre for Fundamental Sociology, State University Higher School of Economics Russia, <http://www.cfs-leviathan.ru/content/view/32/38/>

Keywords

reification, picture frame, cultural sociology, perception, production of culture

The proposed paper examines one of the core problems of classical sociology as applied to culture and arts: the problem of social differentiation which signifies shift from traditional society to modern one. I am going to focus on this process in order to provide sociological accounts of changes occurred during this shift with humans' ability to perceive different art forms. I will show the limits of production of culture perspective and then turn to more culture-sensitive approach as applied to painting and its contemporary media forms within museum spaces.

The predominant perspective in sociology of arts and culture - production of culture perspective - provided several notions to elaborate this shift both on theoretical and empirical levels. Harrison C. White and Pierre Bourdieu are the most significant contributors to the empirical studies of autonomization in historical perspective. They both focused on the Impressionist movement and using notions of art market and field of art demonstrated the genesis of modern art institutions. In particular the link between social background and art forms was exemplified. To smaller extent Howard S. Becker in his classical work Artworlds keeps the same position by developing idea of collective nature of art. The general point to these approaches is reductionist perspective. Mediation of art form is reduced to its social environment.

In order to overcome reductionist perspective sociology of culture and art should take into consideration criticism from cultural sociology. In general cultural sociology is rooted in the idea of relative autonomy of culture. Thus, sociologists should focus on the effects in social life caused by art. To understand the link between art and society in its cultural sociological and mediated way I turn to Simmels' discussion of picture frame in his essays. I suppose that picture frame is a key object in reification of autonomy process if we speak about modern way of presenting painting. Simmels' works already contain the general perspective to study the change picture frame required to perceive art. I illustrate main point with the examples of exhibiting religious paintings from Tretyakov Gallery.

Religion in Education - between integration and conflict

Körs, Anna

Department of Sociology, University of Hamburg Hamburg, Germany

Keywords

religion, education, europe, Integration, conflict

The paper draws on the results of an empirical mixed-methods-study carried out within the international research project called REDCo: 'Religion in Education. A contribution to Dialogue or a factor of Conflict in transforming societies of European countries?'. The project's main aim is to establish and compare the potentials and limitations of religion in schools in the educational systems of selected European countries (England, Estonia, France, Germany, Norway, Russia, Spain, The Netherlands). Recent events across the world have remade religion a topic of high public interest, among them the migratory processes bringing to Europe increasing numbers of people from ethnic and cultural groups for whom religion plays an important role in their lives, the collapse of the Soviet system and the revival of religion in many post-socialist countries, the fear of religious fanaticism in western societies etc. There is a rising public awareness of the necessity to see dialogue between religions and worldviews as a tool to prevent conflict and to support a peaceful coexistence in a pluralistic and heterogeneous society. This is also expressed by the great efforts that have recently been made by inter-governmental organisations developing practical guidance and policy recommendations for teaching about religions and beliefs. For example the governments of the 47 member states of the Council of Europe (2008: 24) emphasised the great importance and relevance of interreligious dialogue in a 'White Paper on Intercultural Dialogue' by stating: 'Interreligious dialogue can also contribute to a stronger consensus within society regarding the solutions to social problems?'. Given the process of European unification and the growing religious plurality of European societies, interreligious education is to be considered as key issue for preventing conflict and supporting peaceful coexistence, on both an intranational as well as an international level. The paper will present some broad trends in terms of similarities and differences between the European countries and will then focus the German situation.

Rethinking cultural value

Stewart, Simon

Sociology, University of Portsmouth Portsmouth, England

Keywords

culture, Distinction, sociology, Cultural Value, Taste Hierarchies

Taste hierarchies have been challenged, and most prominently, Pierre Bourdieu's work has led to what Tony Bennett terms 'a Bakhtinian 'discrowning' of official hierarchies of the arts'. Alongside the many positive implications of this 'discrowning' there has been a tendency to countenance cultural relativism as a less uncomfortable option rather than to embark on uneasy debates into issues of cultural value. This is perhaps because attempts to define the worth of one cultural artefact over another have often been left vulnerable to criticism (and often rightly so). The most obvious example that springs to mind is Adorno's attempts to differentiate the superiority of 'difficult' classical musical compositions over jazz. This paper explores various ways out of this impasse (without resorting to essentialism), utilising examples from reflexive sociological thought that tentatively addresses issues of cultural value: for example work that dares to pronounce the worth of something over nothing (Ritzer); the historical quintessence that is part of the autonomization of the fields of cultural production (Bourdieu); and the symbiosis of cultural industries and cultural forms (Witkin).

Scenarios on the Appearance of a Global Civilization

Huiu, Diana

independent application, independent application
Bucharest, Romania

Keywords

civilization, future scenarios, Globalization

Is humanity about to know its first Global Civilization? The intensive interaction among major existing cultures would say that yes. In this case, which will be the characteristics of this civilization and who will manage to make the political unification? These are the themes explored by this paper that starts from a comparative study of older civilizations made by the historian Neagu Djuvara and continues with some future scenarios.

The first chapter explains the thesis of Neagu Djuvara, which says that a civilization passes almost all the time through some specific stages during their life cycle: incubation, formation, blossoming, fight for hegemony and imperial stage. 11 civilizations have been identified in the known human history, 4 being still alive: Chinese, Indian, Arab and Western European. The first 2 are in their imperial stage, the third is already in decadence, while the fourth is still in the fight for hegemony.

The second chapter explores how present civilizations interact among themselves and how this could lead to the appearance of a Global Civilization, where all the countries of the world would form a single political system. Because the Western European civilization is the only one that has not reached its imperial phase and has the strongest expansion force, the Global Civilization might be identical with the Western Civilization.

In the third chapter are developed some future scenarios, taking into consideration possible games to be played by main competitors in the fight for hegemony. The cultural heritage of each competitor is deeply assessed.

In conclusion, the paper is exploring the chances for a Global Civilization to appear in the near future, based on the stages noticed in the development of other civilizations. The paper is also explaining the role that each existing civilization has in this process and its chances for making a global political unification.

Social Behaviour as Foundation for Social Relationships

Gunina, Alina

*Sociology, Russian State University For The Humanities
Moscow, Russia*

Keywords

07, alinne, yandex

Nothing can serve as a basis for investigating the system of social relationships than the logically summarized historical experience of man's development. The structure of this system cannot be anything else but the reflection of social relativity where subject and object are two facets of one social reality. It would be wrong to assume that it is the increasing role of human factor in history that the subjective prevails over the objective. In other words, human conquest of the external world is an objective process.

In order to reconstruct the stages of this process, we should analyse relations within the sphere of objective necessity. Consciousness here plays only a passive role, being only a means for the individual and the society to adapt to the manipulations of the "invisible hand".

Parties existing in these relations ordinarily perceive them as chaotic, blind, and frequently destructive forces whose combined effect can lead to a social revolution.

The participants in socio-economic relations try to limit these destructive forces, or eliminate their harmful effects to some degree. This significant victory of collective consciousness over the element of socio-economic relations leads to a conflict with the basic movement toward the development of freedom.

Social Network Sites and the rise of networked individualism

Comunello, Francesca

*Sociologia e Comunicazione, Sapienza Università di Roma
Rome, Italy*

Mulargia, Simone

Sociologia e Comunicazione, Sapienza Università di Roma Roma, Italy

Keywords

social relations, networked individualism, identity performances, social network sites

The rise of individualism has been recently described in terms of 'networked individualism' or 'individualized networking' (Wellman, Castells). The new patterns of sociability seem to be built on me-centred networks: each person 'becomes a communication and information switchboard, between persons, networks, and institutions' (Wellman, 2004: 127).

Digital technology is not determining this process: it is rather enabling each person to build and manage their own social networks, both on- and offline.

The recent popularity of Social Network Sites such as My Space, Facebook, LinkedIn, etc. shows that there is a growing interest in articulating, making visible, and managing personal or professional relationships through technology-enabled environments. The phenomenon addressed is wider than Social Network Sites, and includes the wide variety of ways in which people are linked to each other.

The purpose of the proposed presentation is to examine Social Network Sites by focusing on personal profiles and 'friendships', in order to underline the ways in which people articulate their social relations and the related individualised identity performances.

Profiles are powerful tools of self-presentation: a social network profile's list of interests publicly articulates how tastes contribute to identity building, leading to what has been defined as taste performance.

For a better understanding of the identity performances and of the ties' strength, we should not only focus on SNS, but rather consider the wider context. Nevertheless, SNS are powerful playgrounds, both for the user and for the researcher.

The proposed presentation is based on empirical research, both quantitative and qualitative, conducted since June 2008 at the University of Rome, Sapienza.

Social Networks and cultural exchanges: the phenomena of Couchsurfing

Nunes, Flávio

Institute of Social Sciences, University of Minho Guimaraes, Portugal

Keywords

web portals, social softwares, Social Networks, Information and Communication Technologies

This paper intends to discuss the role of information and communication technologies, specially the Internet and the increasing phenomena of social networks based on on-line platforms, as relevant promoters for trans-national connections between individuals which are currently emerging by on going transformations in travel and leisure practices.

The main purpose of this study is to evaluate the potential of ICT's as a key agent that nowadays has been contributing to activate social changes by the appearance of new collective practices, namely by the emergence of new mobility behaviours as a consequence of on-going transformations in the way peoples travel and spend their holidays.

The more and more frequent use of low-costs flights has been responsible for an exponential increase of holidays abroad for publics that were not so familiar with this opportunity, however the accommodation costs still remains relevant limiting the length of this journeys as well as the consumption practices and interactions in the destination place. Some telematic portals has been appearing recently in order to minimize this constraint.

In this paper we will evaluate the implications of the telematic portal "couchsurfing", which will be presented as a social network composed by more than 860 thousand members, who are available to receive in their homes, free of any charge, other members of this worldwide community. This service will be discussed as a social software, functioning as a volunteer-based worldwide network connecting travellers with members of local communities, and aiming to create educational exchanges; spread tolerance and facilitate cultural understanding. It can be stated that the main purpose of this on-line service is to facilitate connections worldwide and cultural exchanges.

Based in a quantitative and representative approach it will be presented the profile of the Portuguese "couchsurfer", as well as it will be evaluated the repercussions of this phenomena among Portuguese members.

Social Uses of Internet: Hierarchies in the Digital Life

Lopez-Sintas, Jordi

Business Economics, Universitat Autònoma de Barcelona Bellaterra (Cerdanyola del Valles), SPAIN

Garcia-Alvarez, Maria Ercilia

Business Economics, Universitat Rovira i Virgili Vila-Seca (Tarragona), Spain

Filimon, Nela

Economics, Universitat de Girona Girona, Spain

Keywords

digital divide, digital entertainment, Internet social uses

We turn here to the anthropological view of consumption according to which social uses of technology are not random, and with an explorative technique we try to determine up to what extent the Spanish Internet usage patterns depend on the socioeconomic status of the individuals. Moreover, Bourdieu's univorous-snob pattern of consumption for the upper scale individuals is tested against a persistent evidence of an omnivorous upscale consumption pattern supported by recent research on Spaniards' recorded music consumption habits. This approach is particularly suitable for Internet, which has a diversity of content much greater than any traditional electronic media and, literally has something to offer to everybody.

Recent evidence proved the existence of a significant gap in home Internet usage between metropolitan and rural areas as well as different usage patterns depending on socioeconomic factors like age, gender, civil status, education, position in the social strata and economic capital endowment. Identifying what people search for on the Internet ? information, employment opportunities, e-banking services, communication, entertainment, work at home, e-learning, etc. - the frequency of Internet access, the technical devices used to access Internet, and the place of Internet access are some of the questions raised here, whose answer could offer a much more complete and comprehensive characterization of the home Internet consumers' profiles and patterns.

Data come from the ?Survey about Equipment and use of ICT at home? performed by the Spanish National Statistics Institute in 2007. It included 22,197 individuals, of both genders and age 16 or older, all Spanish residents. The information is structured by regions, habitat and socioeconomic variables. We applied multiple correspondence procedures to structure the social uses of Internet and identified four generic patterns: 1) information searching; 2) communication; 3) transactions; 4) education and learning. This structure was next mapped in correlation with socioeconomic, regional and technological coordinates and the results have shown the discriminating power of these indicators. The existence of status inequalities in people's use of technology has social effects, proving Internet's capacity to structure the society.

Sociology of Culture, Heritage and Identity

Beitnere, Dagmara

*Institute for Philosophy and Sociology, University of Latvia
Riga, Latvia*

Keywords

identity, literature, self-reference, cultural narratives, autopoiesis

In the ESA Congress 2003 my paper included research about Latvian cultural self-reference "we are a farmer (or peasant) culture". This self-reference was influenced autopoiesis to understand themselves like agrarian country. According N. Luhman theory process of self-reference giving are asymmetrical. I mean, this is point from which self-reference are delivered - a groups of intellectuals - writer, poetry, artist, scientists (people with authority). To continue this process of invisible synchronization in society, my research was done with Latvian intellectuals ( in former sovjet time cold - intelligentsia) for looking to understand, why Latvian cultural identities and models of education go back to agrarian cultural values and norms, and bring in 21 century attitudes and self-descriptions from 19 century. Why Latvian intellectuals permanent to be avoid from self-description about themselves like a urban, industrial and close to ideas of modernism being culture. Issues is about the lost self-reference during the sovjet time and why this can take part in Latvia. Same indication came from Latvian literature in which Latvian are described prevailing like countryside people, a large number of novels from 19 to 21 century explain Latvian, living in countryside. Cultural stories and everyday narratives not help to explain and give more motivation to develop understanding themselves for much more rationality and irony, that according to N. Luhman's theory is a resource for development and grow up modern identities. Research is based on N. Luhman's system theory and theory of narratives.

Southern Adriatic and EU. Integrating an anthropology of the absence

Romano, Onofrio

Historical and Social Sciences, Università degli Studi di Bari Bari, Italy

Keywords

identity, European societies, Southern Adriatic

The contribution focuses on the identity issue in reference to the European integration process. To this end, the case of the Southern Adriatic area ? covering the Italian South-East and the South western Balkans (namely Apulia and Albania) ? will be highlighted. This region shows many reasons of interest for the whole process of European integration, as it represents a kind of hinge between Western civilization and the East, Europe and the Mediterranean, North and South of the World. Our thesis is that, despite the different traditions, cultural heritage, histories, political domain etc., the societies facing on the two sides of the lower Adriatic share common core attitudes. They were forged on the basis of a similar existential framework: the secular condition of peripheral marginality in relation to the hubs of political power. So, the lower Adriatic inhabitants have acquired a particular skill to win the grace of the ruler in office, whoever he was, building, at the same time, an hidden orb in which to preserve their authenticity, their original cultural references. This frame has produced, in the long run, an anti-identitarian peoples constitution, ie an ?anthropology of the absence?, consisting of two complementary dimensions: mimicry and the vernacular order. This ensures both the merger of dissimilarities and the preservation of an impregnable singularity. The anthropology of the absence still emerges strongly in relation to the new political focus with which this region relates nowadays: the European Union. The implemented policies aimed at cohesion and at integration of the peripheral regions are here systematically diverted to reproduce life forms consolidated over the centuries, which evade the fundamental canons of the Western-European model of society. But, far from being included as a disease, the attitude developed in the lower Adriatic could represent a useful suggestion for Europe itself, always faced with the problem of his unresolved identity.

Sports, Identities and Governance. Football and nationalist attitudes within the Basque Country and Catalonia

Tuñón, Jorge

European Studies, Universidad Complutense de Madrid

SPAIN, <http://www.ucm.es>

Brey, Elisa

Sociología II (Ecología Humana y Población), Université de Liège / Universidad Complutense de Madrid

SPAIN, <http://www.ucm.es>

Keywords

Sports, National identities, Football, Catalonia., Basque Country

Football is (undoubtedly) the most important and followed sport in Spain. The regional and nationalist cleavages are also much important in the Iberic country than in other European societies. It is also well-known (among the literature), how Sports have been used to build political and national identities.

Therefore, the proposed research will seek to analyse the football added and attributed values from the social and political sub-State dimension in Spain. Thus, it will mainly focus in the cases whose nationalist cleavage impact is higher: the Basque and the Catalan. Functions attached, societal meanings, associated aims, or the mere wills about the regional governance, football represents within both Spanish "Autonomous Communities", will be dealt with.

The quasi federalised Spanish State allows regional (Autonomous Communities) football selections. Many of them, and not only the Basque and the Catalan, have already played friendly matches against national teams. Nationalist wishes (defended by the main Non State Wide Parties) would allow both Autonomous Communities teams to become part in official competitions.

The most relevant Catalan and Basque football teams had always been forced to deal (formally or informally) with the National/Political issue cleavage. In spite of (until now) none of them has refused to compete within the Spanish Championship, some of them have exhibited clear nationalist and political attitudes: a) Athletic de Bilbao only accepts Basque players; b) Real Sociedad (San Sebastián) only enrolls non Spanish football players (Basque or foreigners); c) Barcelona Football Club represents the Catalan's identity faced to Madrid d) Espanyol represents an integrative, Catalan but also Spanish, identity within Barcelona.

Thus, the interaction between football and the regional and national cleavage (while national identities building) in the Basque Country and Catalonia, will be substantiated. Following a qualitative analysis method approach (surveys records), some questions will be dealt with: How far football conducts or strengths nationalist identities? How does the National/Regional cleavage influence football teams social and political attitudes? Does the centre-periphery issue variable influence football teams supporter's choices? Would it be once possible or predictable to transpose any of the above mentioned attitudes to other European societies?

State management in cultural policy of Russia

Karpova, Galina

Social Anthropology and Social Work, Saratov State Technical University Saratov, Russia

Keywords

cultural heritage, diversity of cultural life, cultural management, cultural policy

The report suggests the debate about the cultural policy in Russia. During the transition to a market economy in Russian Federation culture has suffered significant changes. The cultural policy can no longer be treated as the prerogative of government. Modern cultural policy is an area of interaction between different actors, which are formed through the efforts of the strategy of real action in the field of culture. The latest changes require creating new concepts and mechanisms of implementation of social policy including development of methodology of cultural policy research, conceptualizing mechanisms for conservation and development of the cultural heritage of the country and ensuring the continuity of the development of Russian culture, along with support for the diversity of cultural life and cultural innovations.

The 1940 exhibition of the 'Portuguese world' in postcards. The Portuguese global in a lusocentric vision

Martins, Moisés

*Department of Communication Sciences, University of Minho
Braga, Portugal*

Oliveira, Maria Madalena

*Department of Communication Sciences, University of Minho
Braga, Portugal*

Bandeira, Miguel

*Department of Geography, University of Minho
Braga, Portugal*

Keywords

Portuguese World Exhibition, Salazarism, colonial empire, social imaginary, illustrated postcards

Since the beginning, from History to Anthropology and from Sociology to Semiotics, Social Sciences have highlighted the close relationship between image and memory. Within the framework of the French tradition of socio-anthropology, which establishes the link between images and the shaping of social imaginaries, we propose to revisit the Portuguese World Exhibition, Lisbon, 1940.

Of the leading values of the Estado Novo, the Portuguese World Exhibition crowned the Foundation and Restoration of Independence Centennial enterprise, by celebrating eight centuries of independence (1140) and three centuries of re-conquered independence (1640), with reference, as well, to the forth centennial, representing the 'peek of the Empire' (1540). Centred not only on historical time, but also on 'present imperial space', following the medieval, imperial and brigantine trails, the Exhibition was a magnificent fulfilment of the 'spirit policy', preached in Portugal since 1932, depicting the 'Portuguese world' as a peaceful oasis, described, in the meantime, by Saint-Exupéry as a 'type of clear and sad paradise'.

The Exhibition is well-documented in illustrated postcards which have frozen the image of the whole set of local identities, from the North of Portugal to Timor, passing through America, Africa and Asia, while defining the global Portuguese of the first half of the 20th century. Every single cultural hue of this large Portuguese colonial village, from architecture to skin tone and to street names, are recorded in black and white on the back of postcards, during the golden age of this means of communication. We aim to examine, through socio-anthropological insight, these historical, architectural, geographic and ethnographic registers, by using a sample from the postcard collection published at the time of the Exhibition.

The biasing effect of overreporting cultural behaviour in standard surveys on cultural and arts participation. How can overreporting be understood and countered ?

Lievens, John

*Department of Sociology, Ghent University
Gent, Belgium*

Keywords

cultural participation, validity, methodological innovations, social desirability

Social desirability can result in a respondent overreporting his own behaviour. Especially for activities that are generally considered highly pursuable as elements of an active lifestyle, overreporting might be an important confounding issue. Participation rates then can be overestimated and, moreover, when overreporting is not evenly distributed in the sample, coefficients of explanatory models can be biased. Question wording can be specifically tailored to counter these biases. Although the general principles underlying overreporting are well documented, much less is known on the causes why some people are more inclined than others to overestimate their behaviour. Our paper investigates these issues by using a large-scale representative face-to-face survey on cultural behaviour and attitudes in Flanders (n=2.849) in which two alternative measurement instruments for cultural participation are used. The first is the Eurobarometer 56.0 question for cultural participation. The second contains specific measures to counter overreporting, such as the use of a shorter reference period, a detailed categorization of cultural activities, a filtering system, open answers and alternates questions on cultural participation with other questions. By comparing the answers revealed from these two alternative measurement instruments we are able to estimate the excess degree of overreporting induced by the Eurobarometer type of questioning. Next, we use a multivariate model to explain differences in overreporting behaviour. As explanatory variables we include socio-demographic background characteristics, lifestyle elements and cultural interest. Concluding, we discuss the surplus-value of the alternative measurement instrument for reaching substantive insights in the dynamics and social structuring of cultural participation.

The Culture-Based Development (CBD) Theory and Method of Expressing the Link: Culture as a Resource for Sustainable Development

Tubadji, Annie

*IL, German Labour Institute (IAB)
Nuernberg, Germany*

Pelzel, Frank

*IL, German Labour Institute (IAB)
Nuernberg, Germany*

Keywords

cultural capital, resource, Development, CBD, PLS-LV methodology

The influence of cultural capital of an area on the productivity level of its labour force and the effect on its socio-economic development is one of the mechanisms of the impact of culture on sustainable development. The aim of our paper is to construct an econometric model based on our theoretically developed 'cultural productivity function' expressing this influence. The model can be applied in developmental planning.

The paper will be structured as follows: The first part provides a critical review of the three most widely recognized concepts of cultural impact on development: Bourdieu, Florida and Throsby. Each of them provides alternative interpretation of cultural (creative) capital. However the literature goes to evident extremes when testing the validity of these concepts. We identify two bottlenecks in the structure of the three models: 1) omission of important variables of culture and 2) incompliance between the production functions they use and the real dynamics of the phenomena. Applying parts of the concepts of Bourdieu, Florida, Throsby, we construct our own Culture-Based Development (CBD) model and augment it with several developmental indicators.

The second part of the paper is devoted to an own empirical analysis. On the basis of a large microdata panel data for German regions for the period 1975 to 2004, we aim to test our CBD model through a longitudinal analysis. The CBD determined channels of cultural impact, reflected by the right side of our equation which impacts the endogenous variable 'sustainable development' on the left side. Actually neither the channels nor the influenced variable is directly measurable. Hence we opted for the Partial Least Squares Pathmodelling technique as which uses latent variables for modelling the supposed causal relationships. Through PLS-PM methodology our CBD model will be able to identify the influence of the single cultural channels and their strength. The reliability and validity of the model itself and its underlying measures will be validated by diverse fit indices.

In conclusion we present the consequences of our results for the usefulness of CBD for explaining regional differences in socio-economic development. Additionally, the applicability of our model in strategic planning is discussed.

The establishment of the mass media as major players within the art field of the 1960s. A challenge to Pierre Bourdieu's art field conception

Zahner, Nina Tessa

Institut of Cultural Science, Faculty of Philosophy and Social Science., University of Leipzig Leipzig, Germany

Keywords

Mass Media, culture and power, Bourdieu, art critique, 1960s

Within Pierre Bourdieu's art field conception aesthetics and art critique play an important role in mediating and defining high art. This powerful position of aesthetics and art critique gets challenged empirically when looking at the art field of the 1960s. In the 1960s a number of artists were to produce art that could be understood by the audience without this mediating practices as it either referred to everyday knowledge or to contexts that the artists themselves provided. The paper will present the reconstruction of the career paths of some major artists in the western art field of the 1950s and 1960s. A comparison of these careers will show that the definition processes of art changed dramatically during this period: The described artistic practices put the quasi-monopolistic position of the art critique for interpreting and defining the art of the time into question and included a number of new actors in this process. It will be shown that the mass media became one of these important new actors within the art definition processes. This development changed the art definition process and the power structure of the art field fundamentally. Publicity now became an important new type of capital within the field. It became an alternative source for the accumulation of economic and symbolic capital and opened new career paths to artists. The paper will show in detail that, from now on, it was not only specific artistic capital that could lead to a successful career in the arts but also publicity skills, a specific form of cultural capital.

The field of "Philosophical practices" in Italy

de Benedittis, Mario

*Studi sociali e politici, Università degli Studi di Milano
Genova, Italy*

Keywords

Sociology of intellectuals, Philosophical field, habitus

The aim of this paper is giving a sociological interpretation of the phenomena of philosophical practices and philosophical counselling in Italy during the last decade. Using a bourdieusian framework, and grounding on qualitative and quantitative data collected in a 2 years research, the paper develops 3 lines of analyses, in order to understand the intertwined dimensions of the rise of a new cultural profession: the first will describe philosophical practices on the background of changes that invested the philosophical field in Italy; the second will describe the biographies and trajectories of the agents involved in the field; the third will examine the institutions in the field, the theoretical stances of the agents and their relations with their cultural, economical and social capital.

The hidden and illuminated object: publishing as enunciation and prescription of the book

Medeiros, Nuno

*Ciências Sociais e Humanas/Sociologia, Escola Superior de Tecnologia da Saúde de Lisboa/Faculdade de Ciências Sociais e Humanas
Portugal,*

Keywords

publishing, book, prescription, enunciation, plural nature

This proposal tries to theoretically address the book considered inextricably with publishing, articulating both topics in an effort to explore the printed object, and to point out, within such an effort, its plural and tensional nature.

Built upon and perceived through the book, publishing participates in the construction of that perception, the object it consecrates, and the market it institutes. Bearing the double condition of idea and materiality, the book and the publishing activity that enunciates and prescribes it present themselves as a polymorph constellation, frequently fostered by contradiction, equally depicted in the obstacles and difficulties faced by any attempt to scrutinize such a realm.

Any research proposition focusing on book publishing has to deal with a kaleidoscopic universe, suggesting an object that is split between its condition of closeness, metaphor of a reality organizing discourse (which it illuminates), and murkiness, echoing a world of opacity and silence. In this view, far from being an object of the past, the book is at the core of the modern project, and, this presentation dares to say, beyond.

The hybridisation of culture

Nulens, Gert

Studies on Media, Information and Telecommunicaton, Vrije Universiteit Brussel Brussels, Belgium

Keywords

hybridisation, Mediation, networked culture, ICT

(Topic: Mediation of Cultures)

The increasing use of information and communication technologies (ICT) in the creation, preservation, distribution and communication of cultural content goes along with an implosion of traditional concepts as 'time', 'space' and 'meaning' (McLuhan, Baudrillard). In the cultural domain this implosion leads to a convergence of formerly separated spheres. Indeed in the cultural domain ?networked by means of ICT? institutions, roles, identities, practices and actors are reformed and rebuild into new hybrid forms. The virtual is interlinked with the real, mediated culture is mixed with non-mediated culture, fiction with reality, private participation with public participation, production roles with consumption roles.

In this paper the hybridisation of culture will be analysed and framed into the conceptual notion of 'implosion'. The paper is based on qualitative research on the hybrid use of cultural content by youngsters. As a generation of digital natives they domesticated hybrid practices in their cultural participation patterns, and interpret the convergence of formerly seperated spheres less problematic than older generations. Cultural participation of digital natives is characterised by a mix between digital and analogue mediated cultural content and non-mediated culture.

Consequently the hybridisation of culture forces us to rethink the frameworks by which we understand, classify and support cultural creation and participation. Cultural creators, mediators, participants and policy makers will have to adapt to this networked and hybrid cultural sphere.

The medical control in visual sources of Soviet Russia in 1930s

Bendina, Olga

social work and social anthropology, Saratov state technical university Saratov, Russia

Keywords

medical control, social life, visual sources

The reforms of the 1930s in the Soviet historiography are referred to as an epoch of 'cultural revolution', which can be considered in terms of modernization, with its characteristic features of Grand narrative of The Science regulating all spheres of social life, aspiration to explain all phenomena of human life within the framework of scientific truth. This process was accompanied by the rise of manufacturing of visual products for a wide audience (posters, propaganda leaflets, films). From then Soviet power developed so called medical gaze, in terms of M. Foucault. Thus, the state began to supervise the population through controlling and forming the body, sexuality with the help of medicine. The medical control began to penetrate into daily life, accompanying a person from birth to death. The health care of a nation becomes the main motive in visual sources, such as posters and leaflets, which were manuals for daily use, appealing to cleanliness and hygiene as a basics for health (ex: poster by ?.?. Bulanov 'All for the guys both sex from birthday?', 1929, poster of the unknown artist 'Have you taken care of breasts?', 1930, poster by ?.F. Bri-Brain 'The Working Woman! Struggle for a clean dining hall, for healthy food?', 1931). Cleanliness and health were depicted by the white dressing gowns, scarves, children's dress, the night shirt cloth, providing a connotation with the presence of medicine in any person's life. Medical posters and anthropometrical photos are saturated with binary oppositions clean / dirty, norm / pathology, while the medically identified cleanliness is understood as a norm and social hygiene becomes a means of policy and control. The paper is focused on the studies of several photos from archives and early Soviet medical journals, as well as few Soviet posters devoted to ideals of hygiene and means of scientific medical scrutinizing of body as immanent to strategies of governmentality in the chosen historic period.

The New Norwegian Work and Welfare Administration. Knowledge sharing and cooperation.

Dyhr-Nielsen, Reidun

Dep. of Sociology, Social work and Welfare Studies, University of Agder, Norway Kristiansand, Norway

Keywords

Knowledge, welfare, cooperation, discretion

The 1st. of July 2006 a new reform was born. The welfare administration in Norway went through a major reformprocess starting with establishment of one office in every county of the country as a pilot office. Workfare, pension and social services were put together into one organization. This reform is supposed to be fulfilled by January 2010. The goal for this reform is to give the user a better and easier way into the jungle of laws and system requirements to help them obtain what their rights.

This is a major reform. 16000 people were employed in the former work and welfare organisation. In addition there were a high number of social workers going to be integrated into the reformed organisation.

When so many people are going to cooperate on basis of their knowledge and experience from different areas of the welfare society, it is important to see and listen to the other professionals and users in order to make a decision.

Decisions are made on the basis of theoretical knowledge, but also on the background of experience made from similar instances. In order to make the right decision, professionals are to use a combination of rules and regulations, laws, judicial assessment and their own discretion. Both the practise of discretion and theoretical knowledge has to be used to obtain the most accurate decision for the person in question.

In this paper the focus is on how to make new knowledge through cooperation. Different professions have different adjustment to different situations. How can they learn from each other in order to make the best decision for the user of the social welfare? In this process tacit knowledge and discretion is important and the question here is;

Can different ways of discretion give benefit to the user and how do we exercise this discretion?

The process of European integration. Perceptions and evaluations of Italian military élite

Antonini, Erica

DEPARTMENT OF POLITICAL STUDIES, UNIVERSITY "LA SAPIENZA"
ITALY,

Iannone, Roberta

DEPARTMENT OF POLITICAL STUDIES, UNIVERSITY "LA SAPIENZA"
ITALY,

Rossi, Emanuele

DEPARTMENT OF POLITICAL STUDIES, UNIVERSITY "LA SAPIENZA"
ROME, ITALY

Keywords

public opinion, European Integration, European culture, enlargements, constitution

Two processes regarding European Union have marked recent years: the new enlargements and the events related to the signature of the 'Treaty instituting a Constitution for Europe' (2004), blocked in 2005 by negative results of French and Dutch referenda and by UK's decision to stop sine die the process of ratification, till the signature of the new Treaty, formally not constitutional, that took place in Lisbon in December 2007, which 'modifies' but does not 'substitute' the previous Treaties.

This paper aims to present the main results of a research program, whose title was 'The process of European integration. Perceptions and evaluations of Italian military élite', presented by the authors and financed by Italian National Research Council (CNR), within a Program promoting research activities by young researchers.

The paper will particularly focus on the results of the analysis of a questionnaire administered to 153 members of Italian military élite, provided with specific experiences of internationalisation (officers members of SMD - 'Stato Maggiore della Difesa' - and officers students of ISSMI - 'Istituto Superiore di Stato Maggiore Interforze' in Rome). The aim of the research was to throw light on the levels of interest and information of this specific section of Italian population towards the process of European integration, with a special regard to processes of enlargement and constitutionalisation. The main object of investigation has been the identification of the role played by different typologies of factors - individual (level of interest and information on those themes), structural (sense of belonging and level of integration in the military institution), relational (importance of social capital), mediatic (comparison between media image and direct interaction with people from EU and non-EU countries, for instance by participation in international missions) - in the structuring of information, perceptions and evaluations of the interviewed about the phenomena considered, with a special regard on the comparison between direct and mediated experience of the same events. The project is in line with an international research context, within which a significant role is played by Eurobarometer, which has systematically followed the state and development of European public opinion since 1974.

The Re-creation of Coimbra's Touristic Imagery: a Process Based on Its Centuries-Old University as the Motor of Urban Tourism

Fortuna, Carlos

*Centre for Social Studies, University of Coimbra
Coimbra, Portugal*

Gomes, Carina

*Centre for Social Studies, University of Coimbra
Coimbra, Portugal*

Keywords

Cultural mediation, Cultural regeneration, Urban tourism, Touristic imageries, Place promotion

Drawing largely on a recent research project, this paper explores the ongoing process of re-creation of Coimbra's touristic imagery based on its cultural history.

Coimbra is the Portuguese University City par excellence. Its centuries-old university is the city's premier historical resource, and is currently being submitted for inclusion in UNESCO's World Heritage List. This process is part of a broad-reaching strategy that aims to increase the city's touristic appeal. After a few failed projects for the promotion of a brand image ('National Capital of Culture' and 'City of Healthcare?'), the city has now turned to the World Heritage as an attempt to find an imposing new brand identity.

This paper discusses the building of political consensus regarding this central goal, forged both at local and at national levels. Shared also by the majority of local population, the centerpiece of this consensus is the conviction that the recognition of the University by UNESCO will increase local tourist demand and multiply current tourist flows, by turning it into a sort of place-myth. Although the success achieved in similar cases reinforces this conviction, the difficulties involved are not to be underestimated, and the high expectations placed on the UNESCO's recognition as a redeeming solution can be problematic.

In a context of intense inter-city competition, this case involves the re-recreation and the promotion of city's imagery based on the exclusive use of its history and memory. Although this strategy is not amongst the most cited in the literature on creative urban action, we believe the use of university's history may lead to an effective touristic remapping of Coimbra.

However, Coimbra has a limited and disconnected pool of cultural attractions, as well as serious shortcomings and logistic problems. Thus, we argue that the city should lead a more consistent strategy, investing simultaneously in the touristic (re)valorization of its other resources, and promote the region's assets and resources. As other studies show, only an integrated approach can lead to a sustainable touristic action and serve as a sound basis for a project that will otherwise be nothing but an unrealizable dream of city renewal.

The Relationship Between Prison Officers and Prisoners

Nielsen, Malene Molding

Department of Sociology, University of Copenhagen, Denmark Oxford, Denmark

Keywords

working identities, total institutions, Institutional relationships, representations, bullying

The relationship between prison officers and prisoners has been described in numerous studies that acknowledge and guard the jurisdictional and institutional split that distinguishes officers and prisoners. While this study also acknowledges the split as an undeniable fact, it focuses on another dimension of reality where the distinction between officers and prisoners dissolves. The study explores the relationship that prison officers have with each other by analysing different kinds of officer-prisoner relationships and the consequences of these relations for the officer group. I argue that in managing everyday life in prison, officers continuously accommodate to prisoners perspectives and interests; perspectives and interests that officers take upon themselves and come to represent among their colleagues. These representations provide an unconventional presence of prisoners among officers; a presence that blurs the distinction between the two and has detrimental implications for the relationship officers have with each other. As such, institutions like the one observed in this study generate not only distinction between officers and prisoners but also sameness and a confusing interplay between the two.

The role of images to building the "enemy"

Mangone, Emiliana

Department of Educational Sciences, University of Salerno Fisciano (SA), Italy

Keywords

representations, Media, immigrants, images, Enemy

The behavior towards other people depends on: a) the idea that we build of them; b) the interpretation of past and present actions; c) the expectation of future actions; and d) the socio-cultural contexts. The moment in which an individual or a group attributes to another individual or group the responsibility of his/her critical and/or suffering conditions, we create a situation in which we attribute a false blame to someone or a group defined as the "enemy?". The attribution of responsibility suggests solutions to social problems, while the rules that determine the explanations can both contain and increase the violence and/or control the social order.

The idea of this paper is that the building of "the enemy" category which represent one of the most powerful icon of modernity, is influenced by information and knowledge obtained from the media and especially through images that the media broadcasts. We do not rebuild the history of the "enemy", but we want to analyze the different ways to attribute a judgment that allows the building of the "enemy" (real or not real). This process is strongly influenced by images, these can function as a "deforming mirror". In fact, images promote the terms of language that they create, they put in evidence only on some themes, concepts or mental categories, forgetting others. They do not easily reflex the values of society, but they modify its hierarchy, although they do not create new values.

In other words, the images do not produce only symbolism that contribute to the self-building of identity, but they also give models of identification to base the interactions and social actions on. In this research, we are presenting the modifications of youths perceptions to immigrants. These modifications allow to switch the view on different directions that assume a positive value (to render more familiar what was not familiar), but it is fundamental to underline, that often the images produce contrary effects and instead of releasing themselves from stereotyped conditioning, they make his or her reinforce their negative position.

The Self-Presentation of Amateur Football Players of Turkish Origin in Berlin and the Reconstruction of their "Other" Typifications

Aktan, Oktay

*Sociology, University of Potsdam
Berlin, Germany*

Keywords

Everyday life-world - alltägliche Lebenswelt analysis, reconstruction of common perceptions, self-presentation and presentation of the "other", Collective interpretation of cultural differences among the players

The proposed paper is one part of a qualitative PhD research project conducted in Berlin, which offers a phenomenological analysis of everyday life of amateur football players of Turkish origin. Although much qualitative research has been done concerning the social aspects of migration in Germany, very few of them investigate the everyday life-world - alltägliche Lebenswelt of Turkish immigrants.

Intending to study the third generation of this population, group discussion was used as the method for data collection in order to encourage the participants to tell more and to openly discuss their everyday football life with each other. This paper includes a hermeneutic interpretation of selected group discussions. The main concern is to reconstruct common perceptions, values and priorities of the participants, by emphasizing on inner group relations, the roles of the group members and the subjectively constructed system of typifications established by them.

Other points of interest are the collective interpretation of cultural differences between German players and players of Turkish origin, an interpretation of the players' self-presentation, as well as their collectively constructed typifications. The paper that I wish to present at your conference concerns the reconstruction of the "other" that is subjectively typified by the amateur football players of Turkish origin. The concept of the "others" in the studied football context is represented as opponent players of different origins and who, according to the collected empirical data, can be grouped as East-German Players, West-German Players and the players of Turkish origin playing in other Turkish football clubs. The aim of this paper is to interpret the common typification of the "other" represented in these three subgroups.

The Social Appropriation of Internet Technologies

Harambam, Jaron

Sociology, Erasmus University Rotterdam Rotterdam, The Netherlands

Keywords

(Virtual) Social Contact, Body and Senses, digital divide, place

This both quantitative (N=250) and qualitative research uses a new social and communal internet project, Telebrink, as a case-study to focus on the domestication of today's information and communication technologies. Telebrink is designed to ease and facilitate the everyday life in small rural villages in the Netherlands, while concurrently enhancing its social life. We have focused on what explanations could help us in understanding the (non)usage of these social internet projects?

The debate around the role of information and communications technologies in our contemporary 'network societies' has long been characterized by the unquestioned belief that these technologies will drastically change our societies. What the social consequences of these changes are, have mostly been described in hyperbolic terms with a strong scent of technological determinism (Katz & Rice, 2002; Wellman & Haythornthwaite, 2002). The notion of the digital divide has nevertheless established itself as an important issue in political and sociological debates for it is believed that certain socially marginalized groups would be secluded from the advantageous emancipatory effects of these technologies. Hence a new (re)production of social segregation. As access alone became common property in most Western countries, the digital divide debate moved from a focus on access (who is online) to skills and capacities (what do they do online?).

However, skills for using computer technology was found to be a necessary but certainly no sufficient condition for the social usage of the internet (Silverstone, 2005). Our quantitative research has confirmed this hypothesis and showed that although socio-economic parameters and skills and capacities do indeed exert influence on the usage of internet technologies, they are strongly mediated by opinions and beliefs about sociality and technology, especially with regard to its social functions. These issues were consequently the focus of our in-depth interviews (23). Embodied notions of social contact with much emphasis on the sensual aspects of human interaction rivaled with rational, mental notions of social contact becoming 'hyperpersonal'. A diversified view on the qualities of social contact helps explaining the divergent social usage of internet technologies.

The social structuring of lifestyles: an analysis of cultural lifestyles, based on both attitudinal and behavioural lifestyle aspects

Caen, Maya

*Sociology, Ghent University
Gent, Belgium*

Lievens, John

*Sociology, Ghent University
Gent, Belgium*

Keywords

identity, attitudes, lifestyle, cultural participation, Reflexivity

In this paper, we intend to further the quest for adequate models explaining lifestyle differences within contemporary Western societies. This main research goal is embedded in the current debate on cultural lifestyles and their link with social structure and social inequality. Both the 'classical' homology arguments and recent additions to this model are discussed.

Moreover, we opt for an alternative conceptualization of cultural lifestyles. With some exceptions, most sociological studies solely focus on respondents' actual participation or cultural taste (preferences). Recent research, however, suggests the importance of other attitudinal aspects such as participation motives, (aesthetic) expectations or barriers to barriers. Only few empirical contributions combine these attitudinal and behavioural aspects within their lifestyle conceptualizations. However, the arguments that have arisen in the debate all point to the relevance of a combined approach. In general, we argue that an analysis of preferences, expectations, thresholds and motives, used in combination with behavioural indicators of cultural lifestyles, provides more detailed information and thus results in a more fine-tuned description of lifestyle variance.

We use data coming from a large-scale 2003-2004 survey on cultural participation in Flanders (Re-Creatief Vlaanderen), and lifestyle typologies are built by means of latent class clustering techniques. The broad explanatory model used for the explanation of lifestyle variance includes several indicators of cultural capital, age, as well as gender, social network size, degree of urbanization, family composition and job category.

The main conclusions put forward are : a) that differences in the amount of cultural capital explain an important fraction of lifestyle differentiation, despite the importance of other, non-class and non-status covariates, b) that this lifestyle variance runs along several scales, among which the differences between home-centred or 'private' and outdoor or 'public' participation. Furthermore we found c) that the analysis of attitudinal lifestyle indicators clearly leads to a better insight in cultural and symbolical differentiation and d) that the latter especially is important when it comes to explaining, on the one hand, differences between individuals with home-centred versus outwardly directed lifestyles and, on the other hand, differences within the group with (mainly) home-centred lifestyles.

The special case of Switzerland. A narrative which constituted Swiss national identity, and its present use

Eberle, Thomas S.

Institute of Sociology, University of St. Gallen St. Gallen, Switzerland

Keywords

cultural heritage, National identities, European Cultures

The national histories of European states have much in common: myths of origin and foundation, a panorama of glorious heroes, a hereditary enemy, and a division of history in dark and light times, in times of prosperity, decadence, crisis and rebirth. Many of these national myths, symbols, narratives, rituals and traditions were shaped in the 19th century, and constituted a national identity which successfully resisted supranational categories, like religion, class or gender. Although these national myths and narratives have been deconstructed by modern historical research and proven as incompatible with historical facts, they are still alive in popular culture and in the heads and emotions of many people, and they are time and again politically exploited by national-conservative elites.

My paper focuses on the narrative that Switzerland is a special case (Sonderfall). In the second half of the 19th century, this meant a liberal conception of a republican, federalistically organized state with direct democracy; a militia system in politics and army; the permanent neutrality as a state maxim; the principle of collegiality and the idea of a 'nation of will' which unites regions with different languages and cultures. In the context of the constitution of nation-states in Germany and Italy, which were organized along language boundaries and ethnic criteria and which took the form of centralistic monarchies, Switzerland was indeed a special case. The narrative was used to integrate the country internally and unify it against exterior threats, like World War I, then fascism and WWII, and later communism. Nowadays, it is invoked by a rightist political parties as a demarcation against the European Union. Political counterparts, supported by many social scientists, contend that Switzerland is no special case anymore if compared to other European countries. A third strand in the debate attempts to endow the traditional narrative with a new meaning, which takes into account the political changes in Europe during the past decades as well as the recent transformations of life-styles which make other collective identities more relevant. The analysis of this debate shows how national identity in present-day Switzerland is constructed and which major issues are involved.

The Varieties of Reflexive Experience

Jacobs, Mark D.

Sociology, George Mason University Fairfax, VA, USA

Keywords

culture, theory, Reflexivity

Reflecting the interrelation of developing selves and others, reflexivity—the unifying split within consciousness of objectivity and subjectivity—describes the relation of self to society. Foundational postulates concerning that relation—strong or weak, harmonious or conflictual, transparent or opaque—plot the varieties of reflexive experience. Traceable to Hegel's famous parable of lord and servant, through the influence that Georg Simmel exercised over the American pragmatists, reflexivity is a core concept of both micro- and macro- sociology. In appropriating Simmel's conception of reflexivity, however, the American pragmatists (as well as the macro-sociologists, Shils and Parsons, they influenced in turn) changed its tone, ignoring Simmel's basic postulate that the individual exists inside and outside of society at the same time. Unlike Simmel, the "marginal man" whose work expresses a sense of estrangement from society, the American pragmatists were socially well-established reformers inspired by communitarian ideals. DuBois's Simmelian vision of "double-consciousness" could not take strong root in American sociology until relatively recently. Psychoanalysis has had relatively little influence on American sociology, in part because of Freud's postulate of the innately unknowable and anti-social nature of the self. And despite his revisionist image of society as a confidence-game rather than an expression of value-consensus, even Erving Goffman can be read as a theorist of social solidarity. In its European revival as a macrosociological concept—in the work of such theorists as Giddens, Bourdieu, and Beck, for example—reflexivity has shed its optimistic overtones. The varieties of this concept are integral to the contrasts between European and US sociology, between the hermeneutics of suspicion and the hermeneutics of trust, between rhetorics of irony and metaphysics, and between modernity and postmodernity. These varieties ground different moralities and different visions of national and supra-national integration.

Underground Impulses : Czechoslovak non-official musicking from 1968-1989

Hagen, Trever

Sociology & Philosophy, University of Exeter Exeter, United Kingdom

Keywords

heritage, performance, Czechoslovakia, music, resistance

This paper examines the ways in which underground music produced, perpetuated, and preserved a community in post-1968 Czechoslovakia by placing itself within a narrative of Czech resistance. By appropriating myth, imagery, literature, and figures of Czech cultural history via performance, I argue that the underground musicians were able to reframe stigmatization from official media outlets of the neo-Stalinist regime. The research seeks to understand how these cultural resources of resistance, synthesized with international musical/artistic movements, created 'alternative structures' by exemplar for individuals to learn how to live non-official, underground, or alternative lifestyles. The music examined illustrates how it brought forth new modes of consciousness congruent to shifts in composition, performance, and audience of normalized Czechoslovak society from 1968-1989.

Urban representations of troubled histories: Lisbon and Shanghai

Griswold, Wendy

Sociology, Northwestern University and University of Oslo Evanston, Illinois, USA

Keywords

urban culture, Globalization, Audiences, tourism

Urban representations of troubled histories: Lisbon and Shanghai

A series of 'Urban Representations' conferences have asked, How do cities represent themselves? How do architectural and landscape statements, tourist attractions and public relations, art and design, work at urban self-fashioning? What is the relationship between internal and external audiences, locals and tourists, workers and investors, for such representations? The proposed paper is the newest research from this investigation.*

Cities represent themselves for both internal and external audiences. For cities aspiring to be 'global,' the external audiences are particularly important. Urban representations can build solidarity among the local population and enhance the legitimacy of the ruling regime, while externally they may increase the market value of the city's brand, thereby attracting investment and tourism.

Like all ideal types, 'global cities' obscures historical variation. In particular, cities have experienced the pattern of globalization/de-globalization/re-globalization. Lisbon and Shanghai, the two cases on which our discussion will focus, exemplify this pattern.

Cities often have 'troubled histories' that require memory work and cultural framing; Berlin is a much-studied example. During such de-globalized periods that some cities experience 'troubled histories.' Indeed the troubles themselves are often the cause for the retreat from global networks. Such troubled histories have to be dealt with at the time of re-globalization.

This paper focuses on contemporary urban representations, asking: How do troubled histories become resources for external and internal audiences? How can such blots on the historical record as fascism, suppression, and violence be 'told' in ways that contribute to, instead of detract from, the city's brand? We will consider the question generally while drawing particularly on evidence from Lisbon and Shanghai.

* Three Urban Representations conferences have been held to date; the first two were in the U. S. and the third is in Shanghai in March 2009. Future conferences are planned for Tokyo, Oslo and other European cities.

Which cultural policies for planning diversity and territorial development?

Borrelli, Nunzia

Dipartimento di Studi europei e mediterranei, II University of Naples Italy,

Rufino, Annamaria

Dipartimento di Studi Europei e Mediterranei, Seconda Università degli Studi di Napoli Caserta, Italy

Keywords

culture, local development, diversity, cultural planning

Nunzia Borrelli

PhD Spatial planning and local development Turin Polytechnic

Contract lecturer Urban Anthropology La Sapienza Roma

Contract Researcher and Lecturer II University of Naples

nunzia.borrelli@gmail.com

The main aim of this paper is to investigate the relationships between culture, cultural policies, local development in societies characterized by diversity. More specifically, paper want to analyse the role of culture in local development processes, in order to define cultural policies able to trigger development processes in a world of difference.

Paper hypothesizes that culture and cultural policies can, really, contribute to local development and in order to discuss the hypothesis presents on one hand the main features characterising the contemporary society and on the other hand it presents local development theories able to proof the role of culture and cultural policies that aim to stimulate local development and urban regeneration processes.

In order to reach the aims defined above and to discuss the hypothesis, the paper is organized as follow.

The first paragraph gives some definition of terms used in the paper, like culture, local development and cultural policies. The second paragraph, moving from the literature about globalization processes, shows some features of contemporary society characterized by diversity. The third paragraph, showing how culture end cultures planning could contribute to local development, discusses the proposed hypothesis. The last paragraph regards the conclusions and suggests some cues about multiculturalism and planning for diversity.

Why (not) me? - Logics of selection within the pop music industry

Keunen, Gert

Sociology, KU Leuven

Gent, Belgium

Keywords

Media, Bourdieu, pop music, interaction networks

In the field of the arts, some artists get a strong reputation, others don't. In pop music this reputation mostly equals attention. This paper focuses on one central segment within this music world which I call the 'alternative mainstream': the place where you can find the trends and hypes of the moment, where pop groups get attention and respect from the major media, record labels, concert promoters, etc. When groups will have strong radio airplay and a broad media coverage, they will have more and better paid gigs too and still sell a little bit of records. But how do they get there? It's up to the media, the managers and promoters to decide whether a group will get the attention he deserves. I'm therefore wondering on which basis such decisions are made.

Starting from how Becker sees an art world as a network of people doing things together on basis of conventions and Bourdieu's ideas about symbolic capital, the field struggle between the established and new ones and the cycle of consecration, I'll propose a theoretical model of logics of selection by which I can demonstrate the way the decisions in the pop music field are made. This model is hypothetical, based on my own professional observations in this art world and will be investigated empirically by interviews with key actors in the scene. The inspiration for these logics is Pascal Gielen's distinction between singular and collective regimes (in which he - following the Actor Network Theory - also focuses on the work of art itself). I'll present these regimes in three different logics: actors within the music industry think in terms of artistic values, sound quality or the style of a musical piece or band (symbolic logic), the past reputation of an artist or his connections with the right people in the industry (social logic), or the potential commercial values, functionality or accessibility of the music (economic logic). I'll look at the importance of these logics and what the effect of them will be on the careers of all those promising artists, dreaming about success and breakthrough.

Worlds, fields and networks

Bottero, Wendy

*Sociology, University of Manchester
Manchester, UK*

Crossley, Nick

*Sociology, University of Manchester
Manchester, UK*

Keywords

networks, fields, Bourdieu, Becker

With their respective concepts of (art) world and field, Becker and Bourdieu provide competing perspectives on the social organisation of cultural activity. Bourdieu's framework is often preferred, with the concept of field seen to counter widely perceived flaws in the symbolic interactionist focus on concrete interaction. Bourdieu's field analysis explicitly rejects the emphasis, found in both symbolic interactionism and network analysis, on actualised or "empirical" relations, focussing instead on the underlying "objective" relations which structure manifest social relationships. However, this focus on objective field relations has its own flaws, unduly abstracting from the substance of interpersonal relations within fields and neglecting the actor's point of view. Becker's framework, by contrast, makes fruitful links between concrete social connection and the resources and conventions of different milieux, but its treatment of networks is impressionistic at best. Using illustrations from a network analysis of the British punk scene, we argue that a more sustained focus on networks as features of distributed resources can extend Becker's framework and address the criticisms that Bourdieu (and others) make of symbolic interactionism. In doing so, we provide a similar type of analysis to field analysis but one which focuses on the presence (and absence) of concrete social connections.

«Warce» Theatre: between cultural activism and artistic aspiration

Teixeira, Berta

*Faculty of Economy, University of Coimbra, Portugal/ PHD Student.
Coimbra, Portugal*

Keywords

Counterhegemony, Hegemony, Emancipation, Colonialism, Barter

2010 will be determinant for it is the end of the Second Decade for Eradication of Colonialism. It will also be the International Year for the Rapprochement of Cultures. Decolonization, as complex process, calls for the rehabilitation of some of the unachieved proposals of European Modernity. One of such proposals was human emancipation in its economic, social, cultural and artistic features. If one agrees that the aesthetics-expressive manifestations (the arts in general and the theatre in particular), can be seminal to (new) emancipatory skills/practices, one could also understand that any decolonizing process needs to be fed by the respect to nature matters and from the plural insights of human knowledges/thoughts of the globe. To fully proceed with the decolonization of territory, respecting people's values/dignity, is to assume cultural/artistic diversity and to grant epistemological validation of such diversity in the world.

With the proposed paper I will present «m.a.r.e.s.», a barter residence held in Benguela-Angola-Africa, as a strategy of developing an artistic practice-constellation: a «warce» theatre that requires the reformulation of inadequate and inherited binaries like body and spirit, me and the other, feminine and masculine, love and hate, war and peace.

RN08

Disaster and Social Crisis

An account of scientific transfer to the industry: the co-development of an incident analysis tool

Besnard, Denis

*Center for Research on Risk and Crisis, Mines ParisTech
Sophia Antipolis Cedex, France*

Fabre, Damien

*Center for Research on Risk and Crisis, Mines ParisTech
Sophia Antipolis Cedex, France*

Van Wassenhove, Wim

*Center for Research on Risk and Crisis, Mines ParisTech
Sophia Antipolis Cedex, France*

Runte, Eduardo F. A.

*Center for Research on Risk and Crisis, Mines ParisTech
Sophia Antipolis Cedex, France*

Keywords

ecological work analysis, accident investigation, CREAM, safety

This paper is an account of scientific transfer to, and co-development with, a commercial organization. The context is that of safety management of an energy distribution network. A company called EnergyCo approached the authors about their need of an incident analysis method. The company wanted a tool that would help them better capture the causes of incidents during maintenance operations on their network. The expertise they particularly asked for was that of human factors; an angle to work analysis they valued but had not been able to deploy at the time. Beyond the mere technical contents of the tool that was developed, we wish to provide an account of the various transactions, exchanges and collaborations that took place during the development of this method.

We will highlight a particular angle of scientific transfer: co-development. In doing so, we will try to convey the message that scientific transfer goes beyond a mere "push" model. Indeed, we are of the opinion that in the case of the development of a method for the industry, transfer can be turned very productively into a co-development collaboration.

Built utopias: the rise and fall of large-scale collective housing in Serbia

Stojic, Milica

*Architecture and Urban Planning, master level student of Faculty of Technical Sciences, University of Novi Sad, Serbia
Novi Sad, Serbia*

Keywords

prevention, post-communist societies, large-scale collective-housing, ghettoization, civil unrest

Biggest riots in France since May 1968 started on 27 October 2005 in Clichy-sous-Bois, an eastern Paris suburb (banlieue), notorious for its high unemployment rate and incidence of violent crime. This banlieue, inhabited mostly with labor-immigration of the 1960s and their posterity, consists of HLM (habitation à loyer modéré) - rent-controlled housing type.

Although early Modernist doctrine in architecture predicted large-scale collective housing for an ideal classless society of the future, the First World War and the housing shortage that followed, found these estates to be mostly inhabited by middle and lower class families. Middle class residents quickly fled to two-storey suburbs, leaving poorer people in their wake, surrounded by a specific set of high-rise problems. In France, this migration coincided with the immense immigration pressure of population from Maghreb countries; they were mostly employed in low-paid positions and their poor economic situation, along with considerable xenophobia among French natives, lead to progressive ghettoization of these residential suburbs.

In Central and Eastern Europe, the problems faced are significantly different. High-rise housing was built on a scale barely imaginable in Western Europe: in most Western countries around 17% of housing stock is in high-rise blocks, while in the countries of the East, this average share is closer to 40%. The idea of collective housing fit perfectly with Communist ideals, and a more mixed group of residents moved in to stay. Fortunately, these countries have so far avoided the massive ghettoization of high-rise estates experienced further west.

After the fall of Communism, many state-owned properties were sold to residents and in transitional years the demographic structure of inhabitants has been rapidly changing. Although most of eastern European societies still has not reached a level of economic wealth that would provoke the migration of higher-income inhabitants into suburban single-family units. It is important to start slowly now to address the situation before it becomes more urgent and starts to undermine the social cohesion. This research addresses the issues that would help avoid process of ghettoization of mass-housing estates in former communist countries.

Collecting Quality Data: Do Researcher Profiles and Training Avoid or Create Bias?

Irvine, Laura

School of Public Health, Center for Research on the Epidemiology of Disasters (CRED) Bruxelles, Belgium

Fordham, Maureen

Disaster and Development, Applied Sciences, Northumbria University Newcastle Upon Tyne, United Kingdom

Keywords

interviewer training, household surveys, data quality, researcher identity

There are two factors that significantly affect the quality of data collected in household surveys that are not consistently addressed in international research projects, especially with research done in developed countries. These are the impact that both a researcher's identity and the site-focused interviewer training can have on the respondents and the research team.

A variety of reactions or biases can be evoked from a researcher's identity, depending on the community or the individual, during both qualitative and quantitative research. This is especially important in international research projects where researchers may have diverse backgrounds, and when cross-cultural understandings can be complex. The researcher's identity is used as criteria for selection in some qualitative methodologies but less in quantitative methodologies. In the same context, using this specific criterion can be more common in international research projects taking place in developing countries but not consistently considered in developed countries.

Other than the important issue of cultural sensitivity when conducting research in a specific community, the reaction of respondents to the individual researcher may considerably affect the quality of data received. However, using 'researcher profiling' based on the identity of the person can raise equally important ethical questions of discrimination or perpetuation of community biases.

Secondly, training of the interviewers of household surveys must be comprehensive and adapted specifically to the target community. Standard training methods and manuals exist and should be referenced, but modifications should be adopted to best fit the research site. International research teams may have a difficult time understanding the implications of various responses or attempts for clarification during data collection. Multi-disciplinary studies can require researchers who have expertise in each discipline, as well as experience with data collection. These requirements can be challenging to fulfill, thus a focus must be established in researcher selection and training. We will discuss the affects of researcher identity and team-/site-appropriate training to the collection of quality data for household surveys in international research projects, and put forth recommendations for methods to reduce the inconsistencies and challenges faced when approaching cross-cultural research.

Commemorating La Tragedia. Public and Private Memorial Strategies of the 1999 Floods in Venezuela

Revet, Sandrine

Sciences-Po, Centre d'Etudes et de Recherches Internationales (CERI, Sciences-Po) France,

Keywords

Floods., Public, Private, Venezuela, Commemorations

In societies that experience catastrophic events, numerous practices are aimed at endowing those events with meaning. The contingent nature of the catastrophe and the disorder it produces are inconsistent with the sense of reason and provoke fear. To overcome the fear and limit the disorder, societies generally seek to reestablish order by explaining the catastrophe and by measuring it, narrating it, commemorating it.

Based on an ethnographic fieldwork in Venezuela after some particularly violent floods in December 1999, this paper aims to show that commemoration ceremonies are not confined to institutional acts. We observed two types of ceremonies. The first ones are situated at the local, private level; they are organized by victims' family and friends or neighbors and apprehend the disaster in private terms. They are moments of communion between those who died in the disaster and those who survived it. The second type are institutional commemorations. Governmental and regional institutions, political parties as well as the Catholic Church organize their own ceremonies. Though they are sometimes enacted in the same places as the more private ceremonies, they envision the catastrophe as a distant event and the understanding is that the dead—unknown to the actors—must be forgotten so that life can go on. We'll analyze and present how this two types of commemorations encounter and provoke tensions.

Communication Analysis of Two Spanish Political Crisis: The Ecological Disaster of the "Prestige" and the Terrorist Catastrophe of "11-M"

Ruano, Juan de Dios

*Sociología y Ciencia Política y de la Administración, Universidad de A Coruña
A Coruña, Spain*

Keywords

ecological disasters "Prestige", spanish political crisis, terrorist catastrophe "11-M"

This draft aims to make a comparative analysis of the commonly accepted guidelines for communication in crisis situations (see Ruano Gómez, JD (Dir.) Narrativas de riesgo y acciones de confianza, A Coruña, 2009, Publication University Server) and effective communication development in two political crises that occurred in Spain: the environmental disaster caused by oil spills from marine oil tanker "Prestige" and the terrorist catastrophe that occurred on March 11, 2004 in Madrid. To that we will use two empirical studies conducted by the author on both events. The first of these investigations De la catástrofe ecológica a la crisis política (research financed by the Science and Technology Ministry -Ref. VEM2003-20076-C02-02 and Xunta de Galicia -PGIDIT03CSO16302PR) and the second investigation on the media and social terrorist catastrophe: analysis of 11-M (research funded by the Xunta de Galicia General Direction for Research, Development and Innovation -Ref. PGIDIT05CSO10202PR).

Critical Events Information Process: Public Image Transmitted by the Media of the Institutions Concerned in the Prat Airport Crisis

Santiago, Elvira

*Sociología y ciencia política y de la administración, A Coruña University
A Coruña, Spain*

Keywords

airport, public image, Crisis, media., institutions

Critical events information process transmitted by the media are crucial in managing and planning crisis (Harrison, 1999; Sicard, 1997; Ogrzeck and Gullery, 1997). As we have put into manifest in previous work, the media represents a genuine regulator of social and political pressure on the management of a crisis and therefore may influence their views and assessments on the implementation of collective actions carried on by groups with a desire for notoriety.

From this point of view, the strike that blocked the runway of Barcelona's airport on July 28, 2006 constitute a new way of labour conflict where social, political and media actors acquired special relevance for their clear involvement in airport security.

Therefore we will present the results of the study about the public image transmitted by the spanish press of the institutions concerned by the incident, from the agencies and companies involved (AENA, Guardia Civil, Iberia, etc...) to the unions and workers (Works councils, trade union branches, etc.).

Defining criteria to characterise activity domains: refining Perrow's assumptions

Macchi, Luigi

Crisis and Risk Research Centre (CRC),, Ecole des Mines de Paris MINES ParisTech Rue Claude Daunesse B.P. 207, France

Fabre, Damien

Crisis and Risk Research Centre (CRC),, MINES ParisTech Sophia Antipolis Cedex, France

Keywords

update, Perrow's, matrix.

In 1984, Charles Perrow classified industrial domains according to their level of coupling and interactiveness (Perrow, 1984). More recently Hollnagel proposed to substitute the concept of interactiveness with the "manageability" dimension to emphasise that it is the consequence of complexity, rather than complexity itself that matters (Hollnagel, 2008). The classification of industrial domains is useful to understand which safety methods, among all available, are the most suitable to the typology of system they are applied to. Indeed, nowadays a lot of industries use actually only a few of the whole set of methods available (HSE, 2001).

This paper aims at defining a set of criteria and a method to describe activity domains with respect to their level of coupling and manageability. The possibility to achieve a structured characterisation of domain activities will, in a later phase, permit the association of the appropriate safety assessment and accident investigation method to the respective domain. The paper will make use of a sample of safety experts to validate the choice of criteria and to update the original Perrow's matrix.

Effects of the Media Communication in Crisis Catastrophe Situations

Rodríguez Teijeiro, Ariadna

Sociology and Political Science and of the Administration, University of A Coruña Spain,

Keywords

media effects, Prestige, media power, social perception, Media communication

Along the evolution of the scientific studies on the mass communication, has come supporting that the relevancy of the role of the mass media in general, and especially the influence that they exercise on the conformation of the public opinion, reaches such dimensions that "an explanation of the collective conduct in the current society is not possible without resorting to the media" (Roda, 2001: 1). So, this idea reaches a crucial importance when the object of the media communication it is constituted by situations specially relevant by the social and political instability that generally involve, like the crises and the catastrophes (Ruano, 2005: 221).

In fact, the named by Ulrich Beck (1998) as risk society, where the mass media occupy a preponderant place, the informative treatment granted to this type of events, as well as his reception and assimilation by the population, constitute key factors for the maintenance of a social and political context suitable and favourable around the institutional management of this type of situations. In this context, the social and political relevancy reached by the paradigmatic case of the ship Prestige, sunk opposite to the Galician coasts in November, 2002, seems to have been determined principally by two fundamental factors: a) the social role played by the mass media that covered the Prestige case, and b) the attitude and cognitive effects reached by the contents and information that have been transmitted by these mass media.

In this line, from the empirical results derived from several researches and based on three theoretical models of reference on the analysis of the effects of the media communication (extracted from Mass Communication Research), we analyze which has been the degree of power exercised by the media during the coverage of the Prestige case: a) a strong power; b) a limited power; or c) a accumulative power, as well as the different types of effects that the media contents could have reached on the conformation of the attitudes, opinions and/or behaviors of the population affected by the catastrophe: a) effect of persuasion; b) effect of reinforcement; c) effect of construction of the reality.

Experiencing mass social riots and/or protests: the collapse of the Greek parliamentary democracy for a month in December 2008

Marinopoulou, Anastasia

Political Science, Geschwister Scholl Institute Munich, Germany

Keywords

protests, Riots, Cosmopolitanism, social institutions

Understanding social phenomena throughout human history meant attempting to deal with them and anticipate crises. The aim of this announcement is the one referred, namely to approach the understanding of "old" concepts - most probably over-discussed in the past - such as parliamentarism and social institutions in order to clarify complex social phenomena such as riots and protests.

The distinction between riots and protests should focus on the intentions as well as on the aiming of each. Riots bear individualistic frames of reference and particularistic intentions of the most barren sense. On the contrary, social protests represent the social whole stating concrete political appeals by means of expressing open criticism towards social institutions. Under the latter perspective, interpreting individual political action is related to the perception of social responsibility respectively that each society indicates and demands simultaneously.

The case of the Greek social upheaval in December 2008 has very long political roots which can find reference in the systematic demise of all social and political institutions in terms of timeliness and affiliation with social reality. The point of the presentation is not an egocentric interest for Greek reality. It rather attempts to argue that unless European societies deal with obviously unresolved political issues they shall soon have to face similar predicaments.

Unless political institutions incorporate emerging social appeals, citizens of European societies would identify themselves not with members of parliamentary democracies acting for their interests but with desperate and obliged participants into either left or right extremism movements. The more European societies turn a blind eye towards corruption, social injustice, immigration and cultural differences, the more citizens of these societies would turn to reactions of political extremes ending up into hopeless riots and open urban violence.

European social and political crises do not seem so distant anymore, what appears to need a long way to be reached is new concepts which would invent new ways for the viable cohabitation of all members of a European or global social whole either these members are individual or collective.

Exterminism or Utopia: E. P. Thompson's pacifist strategy

Muller, Ricardo

Dept. of Sociology and Political Science, Universidade Federal de Santa Catarina (UFSC) Florianopolis, Brazil

Keywords

social movements, Risk, REALISM, Exterminism, Pacifism

The paper aims to scrutiny pieces of E. P. Thompson's writings. It primarily focuses the analytical categories of class and experience, both considered the axis of Thompson's work, as well his sense of realism. The arguments proceed systematizing and discussing aspects related to Thompson's practice and thought and his engagement and role as an European pacifist, especially from the early eighties on. In this context, the paper states the theoretical and political debates in which Thompson was involved and summarizes their most important issues: topics related to his conception of socialist humanism and protest as a mode of struggle; his criticism towards the concept of market, and its place within any approach of capitalism; the category of exterminism and the idea of disaster it conveyed and his concern to build alternatives to cold war's diplomacy and rhetoric in order to advocate disarmament as well. Although characterized by a profound pessimism and an apocalyptic perspective, unusual in his work, Thompson's essays on exterminism actually end up with a more optimistic view and submit an (antiexterminist) agenda to change the scenario and revert such risk situation. Thus Thompson insisted on creating a new consciousness: class struggle was still a fundamental issue, but the most pressing matter had become the salvation of humanity itself, for the antagonistic nexus between utopia and exterminism redefined the whole cause. So Thompson's most significant contribution to the Cold War debate and against the arms race, the nuclear threat and for the organization of peace groups and movements was his 1980 pamphlet Protest and Survive. Thompson foresees Europe not as a war theatre, but as a peace theatre achieved through popular democratic pressure. Finally, the paper reassures Thompson's confidence on reason in the name of utopia and freedom, and assesses their political and contemporary relevance.

Extreme weather events: Disaster information - or disastrously informed? A diagnosis of shortcoming in media reporting, media use habits and risk awareness

Zemp, Helena

IPMZ-Institut of Mass Communication Science and Media Research, University of Zurich Zurich, Switzerland

Keywords

Mass Media, coping with risk, weather extreme, social media use, media change

Social science literature has established that the media plays a key role in many aspects of crisis and disasters. Specifically national research on media coverage of disasters highlights factors that are unique to a given nation as this research in the Swiss context illustrates. However, the findings have general application to some extent although European national media systems vary in terms of regulation and economic structures.

Most European countries have recently experienced devastating disasters such as flood, storm or drought, associated with global climate change. Switzerland for example, in 2005 faced the worst flood in the last 100 years. In line with Beck's (1986) statement of a so called "risk society" the recent increase of environmental risks and extreme weather are pertinent to measures that aim to mitigate, prepare for or respond to potential threats. In addition, there are general tendencies of increased medialization processes. This includes new modes of communication to manage risk at a local, national and international level. Due to the high level of effectiveness and the value of warning and informing the public, the national media system remains indispensable for risk prevention.

On the one hand, the rapid diffusion of new communication technologies, such as internet or mobile phones can assist with fast and easy communication paths to sustain emergent forms of risk awareness and damage reduction. On the other hand, in the past four decades we have witnessed an unprecedented rise in economic pressures, resulting in profit drives that displace the public service ethos of journalism. However, this market-oriented coverage can significantly alter risk communication and public perceptions of disasters.

The results of my content analysis of flood coverage from 1910-2005 in Switzerland provide new insights into the routines of news media during natural disasters, specifically topic selection and presentation. Additionally, a nation-wide survey is included providing important insights into the styles of media use during a disaster, risk awareness or preparedness. These are areas in which the media can both help and/or hinder. It is in this context that European wide surveys and research of media coverage is of real value.

From forgetting to remembering disaster: the controversial construction of 'discreet memory' in Seveso

Centemeri, Laura

*School of Economics - University of Coimbra, Centre for Social Studies - Observatory on Risk
Coimbra, Portugal*

Keywords

memory, feminism, environmentalism, disaster, contaminated communities

Proposal for Session 6: Remembering and Forgetting Disaster

The Seveso disaster is considered as a symbol of European environmentalist struggle. Yet, at the local level, the population affected by the dioxin contamination caused by the ICMESA plant (10th of July 1976) has mostly fought for the right to forget the event. Only recently a collective memory of the disaster has been made visible, through the creation in 2004 of a Memory Pathway in the Oak Wood, a 42-hectare plot of forest in the urban centre of Seveso that was artificially created over the most contaminated area. The Memory Pathway -a series of displays telling the disaster's story through texts and photos- is part of the project Bridge of Memory, promoted by a local group of environmentalist and feminist activists with the aim of opposing the local pressure to erase the disaster's memory. The paper investigates how this shift from forgetting to remembering disaster has been made possible. First of all, I analyse the crisis that followed the dioxin spill and which was marked, locally, by a harsh conflict opposing, on one side, a part of the affected population and, on the other side, social movements and public authorities. The result of this conflict has been the lack of a shared interpretation of the event in the community affected and the reduction of its consequences to technical and individual problems. I then turn to how the experience of this conflict has been at the heart of the renewal, during the 80's and 90's, of the political action of a group of Seveso environmental and feminist activists. I analyse how this renewal brought to the launching of the Bridge of Memory project in 2000. This project succeeded in creating a shared view in the local community on the dioxin disaster as an 'opportunity for change'. In the same time, the compromise reached through the idea of 'discreet memory' -and embodied in the displays of the Memory Pathway- shows how the possibility to remember is linked to collectively avoid to investigate the controversial legacy of the disaster, in particular long-term dioxin health effects.

Infrastructures and their failures: mobilizing various knowledges of risk

Silvast, Antti

*Department of Sociology, University of Helsinki
Helsinki, Finland*

Keywords

risks, resilience, participatory observation, infrastructures

In recent years critical infrastructures like energy, water, banking, telecommunications and gas have increasingly become a Western collective security issue. Many governments and EU have taken major initiatives to protect their critical infrastructures from natural catastrophes, terrorism and various other hazards, as the disruption or destruction of infrastructures are seen as having a serious impact on citizens and the functioning of governments.

My paper introduces an ongoing PhD project on this subject. The project deliberates particularly concrete cases where the knowledge of infrastructure risks is mobilized.

My project uses participatory approaches to study mobilization of risk knowledge on two field sites: the control rooms of a Finnish electricity distribution company, and Finnish critical infrastructure protection seminars. The first field site, whose data I collected by interviewing and observing electricity reliability professionals in 2008, is used to address a question of risk practices: what are the varieties of professional skills for supplying a functioning infrastructure? My contention here is to illustrate the practical rules of thumb and professional judgments which are deployed in order to protect the electricity supply systems from disturbances. Electricity infrastructure systems cannot be made completely fail-safe, which also places demands on their disaster-resilience.

The second field site is used to address a question of preparedness: how do experts design systems and organizations that cope with failures which are very rare? Based on attending several infrastructure protection expert seminars between 2007 and 2008, I claim there is a widely shared preoccupation on the urgency of preparing for infrastructure risks. Contrasting the social scientific notions of rare risks being non-calculable and non-manageable, the seminars see a constant crafting of new tools for anticipating different infrastructure failures. Many tools in particular place emphasis on building both infrastructure users and operators a disaster-resilient and economic subjectivity.

My paper concludes that concrete mobilizations of risk tend to make divergent assumptions of what risks are and how they ought to be managed.

The PhD is part of the Academy of Finland -funded project Managing Insecurity in the University of Helsinki, Department of Sociology.

Main insights in risk research in Spain: conceptual, methodological and applied research advancements

González Rodríguez, Benjamín

*Sociology, Faculty of Sociology
A Coruña, Spain*

García Gómez, Andrés

Dirección General de Protección Civil y Emergencias/CEISE, Ministerio del Interior Madrid, Spain

Keywords

Historical trends in risk research in Spain, applied approaches to risk, theoretical contributions

Main insights in risk research in Spain: conceptual, methodological and applied research advancements. This contribution will show the advancements made in Spain in the field of the so called the risk society. We will summarize the evolution of risk research alongside the last two decades, mainly from the public sector perspective. Our contribution would be a kind of meta-analysis of research activities carried out in Spain on such varied aspects as the social perception of risk, indicators and indexes to assess the social impact of catastrophes, the political "resonance" of catastrophes, people attitudes and reactions to nuclear energy, etc.

Nuclear culture in Spain

González Rodríguez, Benjamín

*Sociology, University of A Coruña
A Coruña, Spain*

Keywords

nuclear culture, radioactive waste disposal, objective vs subjective variables

This paper aims at looking for the main social and psychological features underlying the nuclear culture in those countries. Specifically, we carried out a study to detect, among other things, (1) people's perceived level of information about radioactive waste (subjective); (2) main sources of information that people trust, both in Spain and the EC; (3) people's knowledge of radioactive waste (objective); (4) given reasons for not yet having solved the permanent wastes disposal; (5) main perceived risks in the daily handling of radioactive waste; (6) degree of worry and concern about radioactive waste. Our key interest in this research had to do also with finding whether people living close to nuclear plants had ideas, feelings and worries contrasting to those of people living far away from these nuclear facilities. Our main finding in this regard was that structural/objective variables (age, sex, income, education, zone of residence, professional activity) did not account for the variation of the people's objective knowledge of radioactive waste, whereas the same variables did account for the people's variation in subjective perceptions of radioactive waste. By the way, as compared to most other EC countries, Spain did tend to score lower in its degree of information and knowledge about radioactive waste issues.

Perceiving Terrorism: Media Coverage and Emotional Responses to the Gungoren and Aktutun

Ozyasar, Ferzan

*Law, Governance and International Relations, London Metropolitan University
London, UK*

Demirli Yoraz, Aylin

Psychological Services in Education Psychological Counseling and Guidance, Ankara University Ankara, Turkey

Keywords

Media, identification, Terror, emotional responses, Post Traumatic Stress Disorder

In this research we will attempt to understand how sections of the national population have emotionally related to the news media coverage and we will consider the extent to which the Turkish media has handled the representation of political violence with any care or consistency. We intend to question how forms of identification determine the emotional responses of the public to representations of political violence and the extent to which balanced forms of objectivity are offset by more subjective and biased understandings which are defined by societal institutions and power relations.

To define our analysis we will employ a qualitative research methodology to consider the coverage and the impact that coverage within the three national Turkish newspapers with the highest circulations (Zaman, Posta and Hurriyet) during the Gungoren bombing attack on the 27 July 2008 and the Aktutun Gendarmerie station raid on the 3 September 2008. The Gungoren bombing, in which eighteen civilians died, was a case of urban terrorism in centre of Istanbul in which the victims were randomly selected. It was covered mainly as a PKK action despite the denials which were issued by the PKK itself. The Aktutun Gendarmerie station raid, in which seventeen soldiers died, was an armed conflict between the army and the PKK. Both events were covered widely by the media. Therefore, we will take a sample group of random individuals to consider how these events were covered and what responses they engendered. To this end, we will employ a demographic questionnaire and semi-structured interviews about the written coverage and photographs selected from the Zaman, Posta and Hurriyet newspapers during the first week of the coverage of the events.

We will utilise the 'Likert' scale to measure the consistency of the emotional responses we received from our sample group. Consequently, it is our aim to understand how and why members of the Turkish media audience are affected by the newspapers' coverage of political violence and to discover how our sample's reactions are shaped or altered by the news coverage of different types of terrorist actions.

Planning for Sustainable Settlements along the River Bengawan Solo, Java Island, Indonesia

Gregersdotter Höglund, Lina

Blekinge Institute of Technology, Spatial Planning SWEDEN,

Keywords

flooding, housing, Planning, Poverty, disaster management

The floods in Indonesia are a big annual problem for the poorest areas along rivers especially in East Java along the Bengawan Solo. The impact is not only on their houses, but their lands, their plantation fields, their animals and also the infrastructure within the villages.

This means that every year they have to rebuild, renovate and replant all that has been destroyed due to the floods, leading to big financial losses.

Since there is corruption in Indonesia in the field of disaster mitigation, there are funds to renovate and take care about the flood victims but it is difficult to place the money into the pockets of the people who need it. By using local materials the villagers can rebuild and renovate by themselves without having to use the slow and corrupt bureaucracy.

I have chosen to study some areas in East Java that have annually problems with flooding along the Bengawan Solo River, both in the cities as well as in the villages, where the conditions are poor and the effects are bigger for the poor inhabitants to get a better understanding for the impacts of the floods. This analysis together with Walk Through Evaluations and interviews made with both the heads of the two villages I have studied and the inhabitants in the villages have led to a plan proposal for sustainable dwellings to be better adapted to the floods. My thesis results in two different proposals for both villages, that will create a village that can survive all year round with less problems from the impact of the river Bengawan Solo

Professional emergency responders and unorganized volunteers: incident sites as meeting places

Johansson, Roine

Department of Social Sciences, Mid Sweden University Östersund, Sweden

Keywords

organization, individual volunteer, emergency responder, incident site

Incident sites, e.g, places where a road traffic accident or a fire has occurred, are often meeting places of different kinds of actors. Some of these actors work for emergency response organizations, and they are trained and equipped to deal with the incident more or less as a matter of routine. To them the incident site is a place of work, and the situation is usually broadly familiar and regarded as part of everyday life. To other people, on the other hand, the situation at an incident site may be regarded as extreme, and as a total disruption of everyday life. Among this kind of actors are individual volunteers who just happens to be at the scene when a traffic accident, a fire, or some other kind of incident occurs, and who take some kind of rescue action. The purpose of the paper is to study the encounters between professional emergency responders and individual volunteers, from the former's point of view. The three most common emergency response organizations at incident sites, at least in Sweden where the study was carried out, are the police, the fire and rescue service, and the ambulance service. Interviews were carried out with personnel from these three organizations. Some common traits were discerned, but the differences between them, with regard to their attitudes and behaviour towards the volunteers, were far more salient. The police had the most positive attitude and the most extensive contacts with the volunteers, the firemen had the least extensive contacts, and the ambulance personnel had the most ambivalent attitude towards the volunteers. To the police, interaction with volunteers is of primary importance to their work, but this kind of interaction is of secondary importance to the other two organizations. These differences are largely due to the division of labour between the three organizations, and to their different organizational logics.

Resettlement and violence: collateral damages of a well intended humanitarian intervention in Maratane refugee camp

Cardoso, Filipa

CEA, ISCTE

Lisbon, Portugal

Keywords

violence, forced migration, humanitarian intervention, refugee camp

Refugees may have become the fastest growing population category in the world (Bauman). In Africa, armed civil conflicts and state collapse cause massive forced migrations (Mbembe). In these 'new wars' violence and abuses against civil populations cause massive dislocations. Mass exodus is closely followed by international humanitarian intervention, often in the form of camps for refugees and displaced persons. Designed for the protection of the population (to ensure safety, shelter, food and basic health care), the camps are also a way to discipline and segregate uprooted people from the population of their host societies. The time of permanence in the camps has become very superior to the duration of the humanitarian catastrophe at its origin (Agier).

Refugee camps have become a constant of African landscape, a new form of organization of the social space, with truly structural character (Mbembe). This results in profound society's transformation. Forced migrations and following humanitarian interventions have thus become a decisive factor of societal transformations in the places of origin of the migrants as well as at their destinations.

The refugee camp model, as an external intervention, has important multilateral effects, frequently underestimated and somehow unexpected. It affects the camp inmates, but also the surrounding environment and its population, the local NGO's and enterprises and heaven the central government of the hosting country.

I will present an unexpected effect of an external humanitarian intervention, through a case study of Maratane refugee camp, in Northern Mozambique. This camp has a population of nearly 5000 people, forced migrants from the Great Lakes region, mainly from D.R.Congo. In 2006, following a well intended UNHCR resettlement program, the majority of the camp population decided that if they wanted to become eligible for resettlement in North America or Europe they 'must' be victims or perpetrators of violence. I propose to analyze how this programme seriously undermined a potentially successful integration process, causing an upsurge of violence.

Risk Perception, Extreme Events and Institutional Trust in Portugal

Mendes, José

*Centre for Social Studies, University of Coimbra
Coimbra, Portugal*

Tavares, Alexandre

*Centre for Social Studies, University of Coimbra
Coimbra, Portugal*

Cunha, Lúcio

*Centre for Social Studies, University of Coimbra
Coimbra, Portugal*

Basto, Eduardo

*Centre for Social Studies, University of Coimbra
Coimbra, Portugal*

Keywords

Social Networks, experience of catastrophic events, risk perception, institutional trust

In this paper we present and discuss the results of two surveys on natural and technological risks: one at the national level (Portugal), applied to a representative sample of the Portuguese adult population; another at the local level, applied to a representative sample of adult population of Coimbra's municipality, Centre Region of Portugal. In both cases, we focus on the identification of the sources of risk perception, the experience and evaluation of catastrophic events and situations, the role of social networks in coping with extreme events, institutional communication and trust in civil protection institutions, media coverage, neighbourhood networks and intergenerational information transference.

The main purpose is to assess populations' knowledge and trust in the institutions involved in crisis management, and the impact of risk and risk management perceptions on the construction of social vulnerability and resilience to disasters and extreme events. The data also allow the construction of indexes that measure the formation, extent and impact of community strategies for dealing with catastrophes.

The interrelation of these issues with spatial patterns and sociodemographic characteristics of the populations interviewed is discussed, as well as the methodological problems that arise from assessing risk perceptions and their implications in risk amplification at different spatial scales.

Risks and catastrophes: Attitudes and behaviour in society

García Gómez, Andrés

Dirección General de Protección Civil y Emergencias, Ministerio del Interior Madrid, Spain

Keywords

autogenerated risks, catastrophe and risk, People's reactions in catastrophic situations, responsibility for the catastrophes and their effects, tecno-science

The work here presented deals with the results and conclusions of a sociological field distributive study carried out in the area of the whole national territory, included the insular communities, between November, 2007 and January, 2008.

In that research we can find the blocks or batteries of traditional questions on training, information, perception, acceptability, and reactions of the population in catastrophic situations that provide us with updated information on the confidence levels of citizens in the institutions and organisms of intervention, related to the management of emergencies, at the three levels of the current administration of the State and others of private ownership.

Another interesting variable that is analyzed is the relation and role, so much at present as in the future, which the population plays between the development of the tecno-science, catastrophe and risk. It is of special interest the role that the citizens award to the technological and scientific progress, on the one hand as "reason" for future and new risks and on the other one as "solution" and minimization of the same ones. Role which oscillation between one and another saucer of the scale is going to determine with complete certainty our future as society in view of the weight that public opinion has in a democratic society. People think as if they were submitted to processes of destabilization and catastrophic situations whose genesis is out of their system and will. Catastrophes were viewed as events produced by an unpredictable nature or by the random caprice of a few transcendent gods who are in last instance responsible for the domination and control of catastrophic events. This attribution of reason to the transcendency, natural or divine, has being turn his accusing finger towards human activity itself, so that we have perceived in the last few years a great amount of reports of risks that threaten us, including the so called native risks, that can be conceived as autogenerated risks. In this regard, our society has shifted from praying the gods to claiming the administrations.

Social impact assessment for natural disaster management

Sairinen, Rauno

"Forest, Environment and Society" -Centre for Competence, University of Joensuu Joensuu, Finland

Keywords

disasters and social impacts, community and environmental disaster, environmental hazards

Natural disasters always have a social dimension and, whatever their cause, their effects are invariably rooted in societal processes that render certain groups or individuals particularly vulnerable to their impacts. The problem which often lies over the disaster management practices is that social dimensions of disasters are badly identified and assessed. This paper discusses this problem and offers social impact assessment (SIA) as a one tool for the uses of environmental disaster management. Here, the main questions concern following issues:

The main targets for making the SIA in the conditions of disaster are the following:

- ? To understand how a disaster changes the life and welfare of residents, communities and regions (direct and indirect impacts).
- ? To understand the potential impacts of a disaster for gender and various social, ethnic and age groups (vulnerability of various population groups).
- ? To develop mitigation, adaptation or compensation measures for the harmful social impacts (adaptive capacity).
- ? To alert planners and decision-makers to likely social change (planning tool).
- ? To help communities cope with the impacts of disaster and the post-disaster conditions (community empowerment).

When assessing the social impacts of natural disasters we have to understand and take into account the difference between direct and indirect impacts, the questions of social vulnerability and resilience, and also the various phases of disaster development. Concerning the latter, we can talk about timescales (i.e. happenings before, during and after the disaster) and responses of different actors (capacities of adaptation, mitigation of adverse impacts, reconstruction). In addition, impact assessment must not be restricted itself to the description of direct or indirect impacts, but it should be developed also towards understanding the dynamics of social and community changes.

Around the world there exist various modes of social and community assessments concerning conditions of natural disaster. In this paper, some of these applications such as Vulnerability and Capacity Assessment (VCA), Community Risk Assessment (CRA) and Community (Environmental) Assessment, are shortly introduced and compared.

Social Impact of Disasters in Holistic Perspective

Joshi, P.C.

Department of Anthropology, University of Delhi Delhi, India

Guha-Sapir, D.

*CRED, School of Public Health, Catholic University of Louvain
Brussels, Belgium*

Keywords

Midsiat, holistic, process, methodology, cross-disciplinary

Investigation of the social impacts of disasters has been a tedious task as social dimensions are complex and fuzzy. While it is easy and empirically conducive to work on individuals, the social dimension is not sum of individuals. On methodological plane, use of qualitative methods has been chosen as appropriate strategy to investigate the social domain. However, it is still considered to be a difficult task to think of a quantitative instrument for social impact assessment.

Social scientists have understood disasters as events that happen in time and space influencing the social unit which in turn responds to the event. The researchers study the impact of these events on the social unit which ranges from an individual, household, community to the whole of society. The international and cross-disciplinary teams in disaster research have helped in bringing about an understanding of the disasters as processes rather than events. There is an inherent advantage in conceptualizing disasters as processes which focuses on interrelated issues and also to achieve some specific results in terms of greater understanding of impacts. Microdis is one such effort in the direction of understanding impacts of disasters.

One of the objectives of the EU funded 6th Framework Microdis Integrated Project is to understand social impacts of disasters with particular reference to floods, wind storm and earthquake. The multi-country teams involved in this endeavor hail from United Kingdom, The Netherlands, India and Philippines. This multi-country team is also multi-disciplinary in nature representing geography, psychology, social anthropology, sociology, development studies and social medicines.

Cross-disciplinary teams bring in the methodological nuances of different disciplines on the same platform which provide us with better tools for both data collection and analysis. This also includes sharing of past experiences in disaster research which help in contextualizing the study against the backdrop of practicality.

The paper discusses the challenges faced in constructing MIDSAT (Microdis Social Impact Assessment Tool) within the Microdis framework. This tool is envisaged as a quantitative culture and disaster free tool. Midsiat includes socio-demographic, socio-cultural, socio-economic, socio-political, socio-psychological and socio-structural dimensions under social impact ensemble.

Speeches and silences of the disaster. Ethnography of the 1999 floods in Cuxac d'Aude (France)

Langumier, Julien

Laboratoire RIVES, UMR CNRS Environnement ville et société

Lyon, France

Keywords

account, memory, Ethnography, France, floods

The binary opposition relative to disasters ? remembering vs forgetting ? is linked with the temporal notion of a ?frozen time? during the crisis and a ?return to normal life? after the event. Two years after the catastrophic floods which have affected the south of France (Aude) in 1999, the four years ethnographical survey led at Cuxac d'Aude (five people killed and 80% of the village devastated) shows the limits of these static approaches. For a single interview, inhabitants tell dramatically the story of the 1999 event and at the same time put it into perspective with their projects for the future. Actually, in this place, they have to deal with a contradictory reality : they have experienced a complete disaster which can occur again and however they are still living there. At that scale, the relation to a disaster cannot be understood through cultural typologies but must be analysed through social dynamics that works in the ordinary time and the daily routines: remembering and forgetting the 1999 floods, trusting and denying the risk of the next disaster. Regarding the research methodology, the field work must deal on these issues with speeches and silences.

Starting from this point, we will analyse the testimonial practices of the inhabitants relative to the collective tragedy. In particular, how psychological assistance during the crisis and the development of a ?risk culture? called by stakeholders afterwards affect the way that inhabitants try to live with the disaster following dynamic attitudes?

We will also study the way different social groups interpret the floods and point out specific people responsible for the disaster. The existing local conflicts between farmers and suburban residents can explain how the ones or the others are accused. After the disaster, a part of the history of the village succumb into social oblivion. Nobody explain clearly how in the 1980's, the social response to the economic vine crisis has led to transform old vineyards into individual housing. At list, the social context and configuration participate to the way the event enters in the local history and in the collective memory.

Survivors' and Relatives' Perceptions of Justice in Post-Disaster Trials

Petropoulos, Nicholas

none, former director of Emergencies Research Center Athens, Greece

Keywords

Justice, accountability, closure, litigation, post-disaster trials

SURVIVORS' AND RELATIVES' PERCEPTIONS OF JUSTICE IN POST-DISASTER TRIALS

Disasters are usually accompanied by a stage of allocating blame and an accountability process. This is especially the case in the so-called man-made and technological disasters, but is also present in natural disasters, such as earthquakes. The process of accountability is present in 'natural' disasters since it is humans who organize preparedness, humans who determine how land is used and humans who build and maintain structures. Furthermore, and increasingly, the process of accountability leads the survivors and/or their relatives to undertake litigation in order to obtain justice, restitution, psychological closure, and material compensation for damages to their health, their property and their level of living.

Although disaster litigation has not been systematically scrutinized by disaster sociologists, the available literature (see Murphy & Keating, 1995; Marshall, Picou & Schlichtmann, 2004; Picou, Marshall & Gill, 2004; Ott, 2007; Effron, 2008) suggests that traditional litigation procedures (e.g. adversary method) may not be the best strategy for obtaining justice for victims, survivors and their relatives, in view of the fact that trials usually require protracted periods of time and may compound the traumatic impacts of disaster.

Based on a questionnaire survey of survivors and/or their relatives who used various strategies for obtaining justice, restitution and compensation (e.g. litigation, direct settlements etc), following three types of disaster (1999 Athens earthquake, 2000 Express Samina shipwreck and the 17N terrorist attacks), the author observed comparatively higher levels of satisfaction with the court outcomes among the plaintiffs/victims of terrorism, lower levels among the plaintiffs/victims of the shipwreck and the lowest levels of satisfaction among the plaintiffs/victims of the 1999 earthquake.

The author uses the literature, the responses of survivors/plaintiffs to the open-ended questions, the court proceedings and the plaintiffs'/victims' testimony to interpret the quantitative results and also to suggest improvements and/or alternatives to the litigation process in order to promote the sense of justice, restitution and closure among the survivors and their relatives.

The Distomo Slaughter: Memory, Politics and the Struggle for Closure

Petropoulos, Nicholas

Disasters and Social Conflicts, former director of Emergencies Research Center Athens, Greece

Keywords

closure, survivors, litigation, Distomo slaughter, collective memories

Disasters ("acts of God") and humanitarian crisis attendant to conflict situations ("acts of man") are often accompanied by extensive loss of human life. Besides constituting traumatic events for the survivors and their relatives, they also become critical events in the collective memory of the impacted community, dividing their history, experiences, policies and practices into their lives before the event (B.E.) and after the event (A.E.). Some well known examples from the past and recent history include the WWII holocaust against the Jews, the bombing of Hiroshima, the 2004 Indonesian Tsunami, the 9/11 terrorist attacks. These events have more or less localized/globalized impacts on collective memories, with some of them extending beyond the impacted community, across borders and generations. During WWII, and especially as the war was coming to an end, there were a number of "mini-holocasts" in various cities, towns and villages of Greece, perpetrated by the Nazi occupation forces. In one of these, known as the "Distomo Slaughter", 218 civilians of all ages (men, women, children) were massacred by German SS troops as a reprisal for an ambush by the partisans. Although quantitatively the DS was not the most devastating event during the occupation of Greece, certain qualities of the mass execution made it stand out in the memories of the survivors and the broader Greek community. The paper, using historical, narrative, documentary, and court materials, describes (1) the events surrounding the massacre that have made it stand out in the collective memories and consciousness of the impacted community, (2) the ways of commemorating the event, (3) the struggle of the survivors for justice, compensation and closure via litigation in national and international courts, (4) the organizations/scholars in Greece and Germany that have supported the struggle of the survivors/descendants of the survivors and (5) the role of international law and geopolitics as obstacles in the process of psychological closure on the level of individuals and families. The paper concludes with recommendations for expediting closure in post-disaster and post-conflict situations.

The implementation of new security technologies: the Spanish case

Pereira Puga, Manuel

Sociology, Political Science and Administration, University of A Coruña A Coruña, Spain

Keywords

risks, privacy, security, Spain, European Union

The current processes of globalization come characterized by the emergence of new global risks and uncertainties; we live in what Ulrich Beck called the "Risk Society ". In it, one of the principal worries is the collective safety, as we can easily see in the media repercussion or in the presence in studies of opinion that issues as the terrorism or the organized delinquency have in our societies. Opposite to these threats, which cannot be tackled by the States unilaterally, the European Union tries to implement new technologies and developments in safety matters, but to get this done, it is necessary to know the public perception of them and, especially, the dilemma between safety and privacy. We will focus in the Spanish case, which turns out to be specially relevant for as Spain has coexisted with the ETA terrorism during decades. Furthermore, it has suffered the major fundamentalist attack among the countries of the Union.

The socio-psychological ability to be resilient

Diego Gonçalves, Carmen

*Center for Social Studies, University of Coimbra
Coimbra, Portugal*

Keywords

Risk, resilience, vulnerability, prevention, hazard

Natural disasters (such work accidents, or unemployment) are events with a strong emotional and traumatic burden, which can be associated with the development of the post stress traumatic perturbation and associated co-morbid perturbations linked to reactive anxiety. Social and individual vulnerability of exposition to a natural threat constitutes an intrinsic risk factor of intrinsic disposition to the threat that should not be ignored while can conditioner the destructives consequences of natural disasters. Concomitantly, is fundamental the control of the depression symptoms of the affected populations not only in medical terms, but also because it can help people to restructure theirs lives. In this ambit the concept of resilience emerge as on the fundamental ones, because is related with the capacity of the individual or groups to struggle with problems, to overcome obstacles, or even to resist to the pressure inherent of adverse situations, like stress without get into psychological disturb. Portugal, within South European countries, is a country characterized by its moderate to high seismic activity, and the investigation, namely on the earth sciences are concerned with causes, factors, antecedents of natural disasters, in the sense to foresee, consequently, avoid the exposure to them. Nevertheless, on can see an increase on the research area, namely linked with human and social sciences, concerned not only with prevention, but also with the consequences of natural disasters, to a several extent levels; as economics, social, lawful and cultural ones, but also psychosocial ones, because natural phenomena are seen as events from which can result various accidents, namely damage and psychological disorders, which affect not only the individuals but also the groups and the social context. In this sense it is very important to reflect about the interdisciplinary contribution of Sociology in order to be possible to develop prevention measures on the ambit of the psychosocial effects of the impact of natural disasters.

The Tsunami-Factor: A Natural Disaster acts as a moderator of the strength of intention-behaviour relations in the field of money donations

Mayerl, Jochen

Institute for Social Sciences, Sociology and Empirical Social Research Unit, University of Stuttgart Stuttgart, Germany

Keywords

Tsunami-factor, intention-behavior relation, accessibility, response latencies, money donations

The study reports the empirical test of three hypotheses on the temporary enforcement that happened to effects of intentions on actual behaviour concerning individual money donations when the Tsunami disaster took place in December 2004 (what we call "the Tsunami-factor"). Our empirical research utilizes data of two German panel surveys (each with two waves of telephone interviewing) conducted in 2004 and 2005. The results of several robust logistic regression estimations show a temporary and event specific enforcement of the intention-behavior relation in the field of money donations caused by the Tsunami disaster. In addition, when modifying the analysis by taking response latencies into consideration, our statistical results reveal that people having both highly accessible and strong intentions (in times before the catastrophe occurred) are even more likely enforced to donate money than others.

Towards Ontological Empiricism in Crisis Management Training

Pollack, Joseph Richard Yves Gaston

War and Security Studies, University of Hull Hull, UK

Keywords

Training, system integration, crisis management, Ontological Empiricism

Technical advances in system integration and sensor technology have enabled data collection during training to an extent not previously attainable. Understanding the role that system integration plays in the crisis management training of the traditional actors of societal security, namely the 'blue light' services, health services, and local government will enable a more meaningful approach to agent-based situated learning.

Building upon the evolution of system integration from application-centric to information-centric integration and current trends of miniaturisation and modularisation in sensor technology, this paper will suggest possible applications for practitioners and academia. From a practitioners point of view information-centric system integration will enable training exercises hitherto impossible. Not only could information-centric integration enable cheaper, more scalable, faster delivery of, and more controllable collaborative exercises for crisis managers, but it could help extend the scope of analysis of collaborative exercises at operational levels as well.

Having limited the scope of societal security concerns to incidents and crises that may disrupt political autonomy and training to collaborative exercises, this paper will be a policy recommendation that builds upon an example from a DSB tender in Norway.

This paper will recommend a policy that should be followed by governments and private sector organisations that seek to conduct collaborative training exercises internationally and across the blue-light agencies, local government and health services. The implementation of such a policy would require university, industry, and government interaction; might require public-private partnerships; would be grounded in the securitisation of training; and would revolutionise the data-collection and analysis of such exercises.

This policy will focus more on the role played by system integration technology in crisis management training but recommends that certain sensor technologies be incorporated in training exercises. Apart from answering the demand from governments for ontological empiricism in collaborative exercises, the implementation of such a policy might enable lab conditions for the testing of crisis management theories.

Watermarks - Floods and Memoryscape in Santa Fe (Argentina)

Ullberg, Susann

Swedish National Defence College, CRISMART Stockholm, Sweden

Keywords

memory work, Argentina, floods

SESSION 6: Disastrous floods are a recurrent problem for the people living in the city of Santa Fe since colonial times. On April 29th of 2003 occurred what is currently referred to as "La Inundación" [The Flood] and is described as the worst flood ever in the history of Santa Fe, given that it affected areas of the town that never before had been flooded. This disaster prompted an unprecedented memory work, principally enacted by disaster victim groups "Los Inundados [the Flood Victims]" demanding the State for moral and economic reparation for their suffering. This process takes place by means of social practices, which range from public rituals of protest by Los Inundados to everyday life activities of the affected inhabitants. The intense memory work of La Inundación has indeed dominated the social memoryscape in Santa Fe since 2003. At the same time it has worked as a memory device in itself, prompting older memories of past floods to stand out again and thereby constituting what Shaw calls "palimpsest memories" (2002). A closer look into this model reveals that only certain past disasters stand out in memory however. Others continue in to the shadows of oblivion. Based on ethnography from my fieldwork in the city of Santa Fe in 2004-2008, this aims at understanding what social processes forge this selective memory work.

Ways to remember disasters - inclusions, exclusions and hierarchies

Andersen, Nina Blom

Department of Communication, Business and Information Technologies, Roskilde University Roskilde, Denmark

Keywords

Exclusion, inclusion, individualized consequences, hierarchies

Some disasters are given much attention and get their own place in history. But how are these events remembered in society and why is it that some disasters are forgotten right away? These are the questions that this paper deals with.

It will be argued, that there is a strong focus on the situation of citizens that suffers from, are affected or hurt by spectacular disasters. At least for a while after the event has taken place. The citizens get acknowledgement and eagerness to express care and support can be identified. There is especially focus on the psychological consequences and ways of dealing with traumas. This care and acknowledgement can on the one hand be seen as a strength, but the paper suggests, that it on the other hand can be seen as a weakness, that consequences of disasters primarily are understood as a burden for individuals instead of a collective and social problem. Disasters are remembered as events that affected and hurt a number of people, not as events that collective societal actors can learn from and work to prevent in the future.

The paper further deals with the discussion why citizens affected or hurt from spectacular events only get their situation acknowledged in a certain period after an event has occurred and why the rest of society loose interest after a while. There can be a number of reasons for this, but the influence of a hierarchy of grief and affectedness is discussed in the paper. An investigation of such a hierarchy can also shed light to the question why some disasters get less or no attention, why they get excluded from the memory of society and are forgotten.

The paper finally discusses the power to define whom to acknowledge, what to remember, what to forget and what to learn from a disaster.

The analysis of the processes in relation to a technological disaster on Danish ground is based on both media texts and qualitative interviews.

What Difference Do International and Cross-Disciplinary Teams Make to Disaster Research Practice?

Fordham, Maureen

*Divisions of Geography & Environmental Management, Northumbria University School of Applied Sciences
Newcastle upon Tyne, United Kingdom*

Akerkar, Supriya Akerkar

Divisions of Geography & Environmental Management, University of Northumbria Newcastle upon Tyne, United Kingdom

Scharf, Manuela Scharf

Divisions of Geography & Environmental Management, University of Northumbria Newcastle upon Tyne NE1 8ST, United Kingdom

Keywords

disaster preparedness, mitigation, prevention strategies

What difference do international and cross-disciplinary teams make to disaster research practice? This paper will share experiences from the MICRODIS project (<http://www.microdis-eu.be/>). MICRODIS is an Integrated Project funded under the EU Sixth Framework Programme. Its overall goal is to strengthen disaster preparedness, mitigation and prevention strategies in order to reduce the health, social and economic impacts of extreme events (floods, earthquakes and storms) on communities. The project aims include developing an integrated impact methodology and establishing an evidence-base of primary field research through quantitative surveys and various qualitative methods in Europe and Asia. MICRODIS includes partners from seven countries in Europe and Asia who come from a range of disciplinary backgrounds (including sociology, epidemiology, anthropology, psychology) and practice communities (including both academic partners and disaster-development practitioners).

The paper discusses issues concerning the translation of research concepts and practice across national, regional, cultural and disciplinary boundaries.

When public policies demand local populations remember previous flooding: an interdisciplinary research

Claeys, Cécilia

*Dpt of Human Sciences/UMR Espace-DESMID, University of the Mediterranean
Marseille, France*

Chalvet, Martine

*Dpt of Human Sciences/UMR Espace-DESMID, University of the Mediterranean
Marseille, France*

Demontis, Claire

*Dpt of Human Sciences/UMR Espace-DESMID, University of the Mediterranean
Marseille, France*

Voiron, Christine

Dpt of Geography, University of Nice/UMR Espace Nice, France

Dutozia, Jérôme

dpt of Geography/UMR Espace, University of Nice Nice, France

Keywords

remembering/forgetting disasters, flooding, public perception of public policies, interdisciplinary

This communication aims to present the results of an interdisciplinary research entitled "remembering, forgetting and re-appropriating: Flooding management". Breaking from their protectionist heritage, the new French public policies encourages the citizens to remember previous disasters, hoping they will learn to live with flooding and this will re-establish a "lost culture of risk". However, such a call is not heard as clearly by the citizens as the public policies expected. Our research team analyses this difficult reception of these new public policies based on a voluntary remembering process. The interdisciplinary composition of the team appears particularly appropriate to highlight the different components of the remembering/forgetting processes. The sociologist analyses the discourses and practices of inhabitants of "flooding areas" about the past disasters and the new public policies. The historian provides an objective analysis of the past floods and their treatment by the media. And the geographers propose two levels of spatial analyses, the first one focusing on the flooding itself, and the second one considering domino effects (with the case study of the electricity network, as a material indicator of remembering/forgetting effects). The information is composed of qualitative and quantitative databases, original by their interdisciplinary dimension. Thus, the sociological interviews and questionnaires also include questions raised by the historian and the geographers on one hand, and on the other hand, maps made by geographers enclose information collected by the others disciplines.

RN09

Economic Sociology

"Crime and Punishment": Enforcement and Compliance in the European Fisheries

Coelho, Manuel

Economia, SOCIUS/ISEG/UTL

Lisboa, PORTUGAL

Filipe, José António

Departamento Métodos Quantitativos, UNIDE/ISCTE

Lisboa, PORTUGAL

M. Ferreira, Manuel Alberto

Departamento Métodos Quantitativos, UNIDE/ISCTE

Lisboa, Portugal

Keywords

Compliance, Common Fisheries Policy, Economics of Uncertainty, Illegal Fishing, Enforcement

Monitoring and enforcement considerations have been largely ignored in the study of fishery management. This paper explores this issue with a formal model to show how fishing firms behave and fisheries policies are affected by costly, imperfect enforcement of fisheries law. The theoretical analysis combines standard Economics of Fisheries analysis (Gordon/Schaefer model) with the theory of "Crime and Punishment" of Becker (1968). Becker's analysis has its fundamentals in the Economics of Uncertainty and Information.

The model sustains a rule of optimal behaviour for a rational ("homo economicus") operator: For a given stock size, the firm sets its catch rate at a level in excess of its quota, where marginal profits equal the expected marginal penalty.

Model conclusions are used to discuss the design of the control regime of the Common Fisheries Policy.

Implementing Common policies is never easy, especially when myopic individual interests do not match with long term collective interests. This is the case in fisheries. Without a clear and effective policy of control, the Commission is certain that the "Tragedy of the Commons" (over-fishing and overcapacity) will result.

According to BECKER (1968), individuals rationally decide whether or not engage in criminal activities by comparing the expected returns to crime with the legitimate business. The analysis of the Commission proposals seems to give a special attention to the increase of the probability of detection as a means to deter criminal behaviour and increase compliance with regulation. Introduction of severe penalties is not in the first line of measures to control illegal fishing.

The Commission believes that financial support will guarantee the indispensable means of surveillance and increase the deterrence capacity of Member States, in uniform manner, and the transparency and trust between partners. But the Commission also knows that legal administrations have significant differences and that judicial machinery has a great inertia. The efficiency of justice is not only a question of financial means. It has cultural and historical roots. It's virtually impossible to put all the Member States in uniform position in terms of speed and severity of penalties application.

(Re)Defining Corporate Social Responsibility: Beyond the "Business Case"

Rowland, Jussara

Sociology, ISCTE

Lisboa, Portugal

Keywords

corporate social responsibility, discourse, Business case, Philanthropy

In spite of the ethical and moral background of Corporate Social Responsibility (CSR), in recent decades we have assisted to a shift in the CSR discourse that defends an instrumental approach to the notion, and puts in evidence the "business case for CSR".

In this sense it is argued that CSR must be understood not as an altruistic act, but as an integrated strategy that can bring real benefits, not only for the recipient of the policy but also (and more importantly) for the company it self, in a "win-win" logic. CSR has become in this sense a strategic tool used, as many other, to achieve competitive advantage in an increasing complex world.

This approach to CSR can be demonstrated by the way corporate philanthropy and community involvement has evolved. Companies have had a long tradition of "giving back" to community, but only recently we have witnessed a transformation in the way traditional philanthropy is carried out and justified by companies. This new line of approach in fact defends a more strategically approach to the companies social investments, more and more aligned with the core business of the company.

Instrumental CSR has become the norm in the field in a progressively explicit way. However, if we analyse in detail the companies' discourse about CSR we will find a much more diverse range of themes and justifications (moral/instrumental, personal/organizational, economic/political, etc.) which articulate with each other in a more complex way than the field literature could lead to assume.

In this communication we will analyse the discourse of 27 companies' managers in charge of CSR projects with the aim of analysing how they justify CSR. Specifically we are interested in understanding how different kinds of justifications articulate at discourse level, if these articulations are explicit or implicit and in what way they can be contextualised in the (re)definition of the notion of CRS.

Consumers' Cooperatives Directors and Managers: Sociological Profile

Pereira, Helder

Escola Superior de Gestão, Instituto Politécnico de Santarém Santarem, Portugal

Keywords

Consumption, social capital, managers, cooperatives, directors

Based on the fact that, due to its nature and mission, any attempt to resist to consumerism in modern societies should have Consumers' Cooperatives that still exist as main actors, even if Co-ops have faced difficulties to adapt to the emergence of consumerist culture, have lost their reason to live or have actually a weak associative life. This research draws the sociological profile of Portuguese Consumers' Cooperatives managers.

We tried understand directors and managers' main socio-ideological characteristics, analyze the way they see their organizations' mission, measure their level of social involvement, their motivation, commitment and associative pledge, their loyalty to cooperative principles, their insertion in social networks, their degree of trust (both in the associative movement and among their peers), and the trust they have on different levels of global society.

Through this analysis, we tried to evaluate if consumers' cooperatives play (or not) a facilitating role for supported communitarian development, in nowadays Portuguese society, through the creation and diffusion of social capital and if, consequently, they are an alternative or a point of resistance to hegemonical consumerist culture, in modern societies.

Customer Oriented Approach in Russian Small Business

Merkulova, Anastasia

*Division for Sociology, Russian State University for the Humanities
Moscow, Russia*

Keywords

business, strategy, customer

Researchers are talking about concentration on work processes and minimizing of attention to a customer in large firms. But in small business businessmen don't pay enough attention to their customers. The problem is in the fact that small business usually don't even work their mechanism through, not saying about a strategy. In Russia small business was created from nothing by people without special education and qualification. So now there are some problems with customer society and as a result - with a profit. So we offer a customer strategy as an ability to extract supplementary profit as a result of deep comprehension and effective satisfaction of customer's needs.

There are no clear foundations of customer relationships, according to world practice in Russian small business. The reasons are:

1. In Soviet Union there were no ways for private business because of the state economics and plan strategy. There were no choice of goods, deficit, and executives, who weren't interested in some profit, more than a plan.
2. After the Soviet, in 90-s, there were a lot of businessmen without special education. As a result, these people don't bring standards of contemporary business culture. They are passive in innovations and qualitative steps in advancement of their business. Those who made an efforts for intensive development, had already became large firms.
3. Business depends on the outside conditions. It is important to say that there were no accessible information for businessmen. And state control for business, unreasonable interference and restraint on freedom of trade.

As we grounded the necessity of customer strategy as a development of business, so it is important to know, how much are russian businessmen ready to put it on their deal and practice.

An indispensable condition for each marketing strategy - is a businessmen consciousness. In 2008 I investigated Moscow businessmen and their subjective causes in customer orientation (interview). As a result we may say that the majority of businessmen provide a customer strategy. But they do it intuitively and fragmentary. They are more oriented on practice than on theory. But the investigation showed us many interesting details...

Delocalized R&D units within multinationals: an insight on trajectories of innovation

Urze, Paula

Departamento de Ciências Sociais Aplicadas, FCT/UNL - Faculdade de Ciências e Tecnologia da Universidade Nova de Lisboa Caparica, Portugal

Manatos, Maria João

---, UNINNOVA - Instituto de Desenvolvimento de Novas Tecnologias Caparica, Portugal

Keywords

electronics and automobile industries, global strategies, knowledge-based economy, R&D, multinational companies

In the last few decades important transformations have been emerging in the society and in the economy, leading to the development of a new economic and social structure.

Actually, the new concept of knowledge-based economy comes from the acknowledgement of the importance of knowledge for economic growth (Soete, 2000). This way, knowledge based economies are mainly economies in which the knowledge management regarding the innovation process, , becomes central in the competition between economic actors (Murteira, 2004).

The new economy is also a global economy, where one of the central actors - the multinational companies (MNC) - develops their strategy and organizes their activity globally.

The increasing number of MNC's activity, associated with the process of globalization, has led to a deepening of the interdependence among economic actors settled in different locations. Furthermore, these developments have changed the way companies organize their innovative functions both spatially and organizationally (Cantwell and Narula, 2001).

As a matter of fact, a potential source of competitive advantage for MNC is in the capacity of delocalized subsidiaries to generate innovative processes or products (Dunning, 2000; Cantwell and Mudambi, 2005).

Based on this theoretical approach, this paper aims at mapping the role of delocalised R&D units within the companies's global strategies and the relations established locally in order to earn power within the global value chains.

The methodology is grounded on a local case study and on one extended case - that involves a local R&D unit (Portugal), a foreigner R&D unit (Holland) and the headquarters (Norway) - developed on multinationals from the automobile and electronics industries.

The results obtained from the developed research (R&D.COM - Local R&D COMpetencies within Global Value Chains - FCT/MCTES project) point out, on the one hand, that the local case study is a portuguese subsidiary with a central position in the network, which is, strongly, a consequence of the competences developed locally; on the other hand, the extended case is an example of a MNC where R&D is developed mainly in the headquarters but is also delocalised to some subsidiaries, with a certain level of autonomy and independence.

Does Managerial Capitalism Matter?

Behling, Felix

*Sociology, University of Essex
Colchester, United Kingdom*

Keywords

power, organisation, Managerial Capitalism, FTSE100

The concept of managerial capitalism describes the separation of ownership and control in modern companies, whereby managers assumed control over the company ? but do not own it ? and shareholders own the company ? but do not control it. Since the 1930s, discussions have focussed on the financial and legal implications of the concept. Except for the case of the USA the findings are mixed; a problem of collective action amongst minority shareholders may occur and managers may appear as an elite. This paper addresses the question of whether it really matters if there is separation ? shareholders can assemble enough power to influence corporate strategies, managers evolve as an elite through interlocking directorships and high amounts of social capital, or not. Drawing on theoretical arguments from social network analysis, the paper argues that the board of directors is a ?bottle neck? of information flow in both negative and positive ways. The organisational structure of modern companies renders the management board the ultimate instance for deciding how corporate strategies are translated in the bottom level units and which operational information reach shareholders. All information from either direction must pass through the management board due to its position between the company and the shareholders. Instead of focussing on the number and size of shareholdings, this paper has the management?s domination over information, and finally resources, at its centre. This paper attempts to take discussion on this subject into new directions.

Economic Crises - Global and Local - In Reflection of Polish Press

Nawojczyk, Maria

*Sociology, AGH University of Science and Technology
Krakow, Poland*

Gibek, Krzysztof

*Sociology, AGH University of Science and Technology
Krakow, Poland*

Keywords

Poland, discourse analysis, economic crises

One of the sociological features of the current economic crises had been its beginning as a media fact rather than economic reality for ordinary people in Poland. Until the very end of 2008 the official strategy of Polish government was denying of present of any economic crises in Poland: "The Polish economy as well as Polish banking system are used to be healthy and in good conditions and we will be suffer a little slow down because we are not an island". Unfortunately it occurs not to be true.

Based on discourse analysis of two major Polish daily and two weekly we would like to show the evolution of narrative describing crises in global terms and particularly at the domestic market. What was the picture of global crises at the beginning of this discussion, how it supposed to affect Poland, who serve as experts and opinion givers and finally how through the language we can observe the change from "slow down" to "crises"? This are basic questions we would like to answer in our presentation.

Financial Agents with reduced liability - Powerless investors' - towards a critical sociology of economy

Wetzel, Dietmar J.

*Institute of Sociology, University of Berne
Berne, Switzerland*

Zielinski, Aleksander Milosz

*Institute of Sociology, University of Berne
Bern, Switzerland*

Keywords

collective memory, Financial markets, investment funds, critical sociology

After years of a booming global economy, when not only investment funds and banks, but also private investors profited, recently the speculation bubble burst again. Slowly we are beginning to discover the extent of this global crisis. The investment funds - initiated by the banks - have become an important agent on the financial markets and exert a rising influence on society as a whole, e.g. through pension organisation or the management of fortunes (Windolf 2005). Apart from investment funds private investors also play a central role. From the perspective of a critical sociology of economy we perceive two tasks which, so far, have not been covered systematically.

1. In the first step our contribution focuses on the structural reasons for the crisis. Deutschmann (2008) mentions these: extreme accumulation of private fortunes in a socio-structural pyramid which demands upward societal mobility, while the chances of advancement for young people are sinking. Thus it is possible to suggest that the bonus system of the banks, which relies on the short-term maximization of profits in combination with reduced liability of these and similar institutions, purposely encourages the "implosion of fortunes". Our approach attempts to integrate into our analysis the highly prevalent indifference of the investors towards this injustice.

2. In a second step it is possible and necessary to inquire about the causes and the actors of the crisis. We consider two fruitful fields of analysis: Relating to the concept of collective (Halbwachs 1925, 1950) and cultural memory (Assmann 1995) we have to ask how the medial focus on "infotainment" (Postman 1985) hinders or even prevents the sedimentation of "memes" (Dawkins 1976). On the other hand we have to determine how exactly the investors are being influenced: Through the suggestion of the need to invest in specific financial products the banks manoeuvre themselves and the investors into a dilemma of ethical responsibility. With its popularization of financial topics mass media influence the insecure investors (Stäheli 2007).

Financial crises in Denmark, Finland and Sweden: 1990-93 and 2008- compared

Kosonen, Pekka

*Department of Sociology, University of Helsinki
Helsinki, Finland*

Keywords

Financial, Crisis, Norden

Financial crisis and a deep recession occurred in Finland and Sweden in 1990-93. It is interesting to compare the current financial crisis (2008-) in Nordic countries to the earlier experiences and lessons. The most important difference between these two is that the former was a specific Nordic one, while the current crisis is global in nature. The background is the process of globalization, the deregulation of financial markets being a central part of this process. In the Nordic countries, financial deregulation started in the mid-1980s, in Denmark somewhat earlier, and it was followed by an increasing destabilization of the economies, due to many mistakes made in national policy decisions. First, an overheating of the economies was experienced. Foreign debts of the households and enterprises multiplied. Second, when the international economy entered a recession in 1990, there happened a strong contraction in these economies, the bubble in asset prices burst and left the financial sector with a serious bad debt problem. A deep banking crisis occurred, and many banks needed state support. Due to this, the level of public debt increased and a structural long-term unemployment emerged. Today, these policies have been presented as prime examples of successful ways to handle the financial crisis; nothing could be farther away from the truth. The financial crisis 2008- hit also the Nordic countries. This time, the banking crisis is deeper in Denmark than Finland and Sweden; asset prices and housing prices have dropped in all three countries. Policy measures include 'packages' to strengthen banks' capital base in order to increase lending. The effect of these measures can be questioned, provided that the main problem is on the demand side. It is argued that in the Nordic healthy economies - low public debts, banks' financial solidity, availability of enterprise financing - there are more options than elsewhere, but much depends on global developments.

Financial Crisis and Systemic Risks: Towards an Economic Sociology of the Crisis'

Kessler, Oliver

Department of Sociology, University of Bielefeld Bielefeld, Germany

Keywords

Risk, financial crisis, reform, financial stability, non-knowledge

The Subprime-Crisis has led to a discursive change. With the collapse of the American mortgage market, monetarist ideas were invalidated and replaced by revived Keynesianism. The current attempt to revive the economy by stimulus packages and state interventions, including the quasi-nationalisation of vulnerable banks signals this discursive change. In this contribution I nevertheless argue that the subprime crisis does not only require a better understanding of hedge funds, rating agencies and the employment of derivatives and complex financial instruments, but that it also raises more conceptual issues concerning the notion of systemic risk. Presently, the current debate on how to reform global finance is based on a concept of stability, which perpetuates central monetarist ideas that foreclose further inquiries as to how the discursive change can translate into a renegotiation over the current institutional order. For an institutional alternative to the current monetarist-based system, it is necessary that there is a different concept of stability that is open to the complex and evolutionary conditions of finance; and the political and social preconditions of financial practices.

Financial Crisis or Crisis in Relationships: A Clash Between Chain Stores and Their Suppliers in Russian Retail Market

Radaev, Vadim

*Sociology, State University - Higher School of Economics
Moscow, Radaev*

Keywords

retail market, contracts, relational conflicts

Financial crisis led to severe conflicts between retailers and suppliers since in 2008. Payments were delayed up to 90 days and 10-30 percent discounts were required for immediate payments. In that way retail companies tried to resolve the problem of increasing liquidity shortage at the expense of suppliers. In turn, suppliers withheld their deliveries to some of the chain stores.

However, it is not the financial crisis that starts continuous wars in supply chains. It just reveals and aggravates tensions which emerged long before. According to a stereotypical vision, this crisis in relationships is produced by excessive contract requirements of the retail companies regarding reduced prices of supplied goods, slotting allowances and fees that should be made by the suppliers to see their goods on the store shelves. It reflects power asymmetry among chain members and greater resource dependence of the suppliers in buyer-driven commodity chains. The widespread idea of 'unfair exchange' is used to resolve the disputed issues by means of state intervention. For example, the Russian Federation Federal Anti-Trust Service has published a list of 27 retailers' demands which should be eliminated from the contract relationships. Retailers try to resist these pressures by applying to the Civil Code.

To test stereotypical explanations and investigate actual sources of the conflict we brought the opponents together in our study. Survey data were collected from 500 managers of retailing chains and their suppliers as two sides of the conflict in five Russia's cities including Moscow, S.-Petersburg, Yekaterinburg, Novosibirsk, and Tyumen. The sample includes firms of different size operating in food and electronic sectors of the consumer market. Quantitative data was supplemented by a series of 30 in-depth interviews with retailers and suppliers.

After detailed analysis of all major elements of contract requirements as estimated by two sides of the market exchange, I build up a binary logistic regression model to evaluate the sources of relational conflicts. A major hypothesis is that these conflicts originate largely not from additional contract demands of retailers but from the frequent failures of both parties of exchange to fulfill their contract obligations.

Financial Crisis, Financialization and Comparative Capitalism

Nölke, Andreas

Political Science, Goethe University Frankfurt Frankfurt/Main, Germany

Heires, Marcel

Political Science, Goethe-University Frankfurt Frankfurt/Main, Germany

Keywords

financial crisis, financialization, comparative capitalism

The paper explains the emergence and the consequences of the crisis by drawing on established theories of International Political Economy. It uses the 'Financialization'-concept for an inter-temporal study and the 'Comparative Capitalism' research program for an inter-national perspective. In an inter-temporal perspective, the contribution demonstrates that both the emergence and the extent of the crisis are impossible to understand without taking due notice of the fundamental processes of company and household financialization during the last three decades. Financialization is defined as a process whereby the share of the financial sector within profits and household income permanently increases, to the detriment of the share of the production sector. In an inter-national perspective, the article explains the more severe repercussions of the crisis within Anglo-Saxon economies by pointing towards the more important role of financial markets within these liberal economies, whereas the classical 'Hausbanken' within coordinated economies have been more moderately affected.

Financial octopus: emergence and development of the present financial crisis

Oliveira, Luísa

*Sociology, CIES-ISCTE
Lisbon, Portugal*

Terlica, Sofia

*CIES-ISCTE, CIES-ISCTE
Lisbon, Portugal*

Coelho, Bernardo

*CIES-ISCTE, CIES-ISCTE
Lisbon, Portugal*

Keywords

financial crisis, System architecture, Derivatives, Social life., Social impacts

Present financial crisis has its origins in a finance-led society and its repercussions to the economic and social world are an evidence of the financial leverage. Financial world is more close to daily life than we can sometimes suppose. It is imbricated in the social actors's everyday life's and is not a distant or esoteric bunch of slang words. We define financial system as an octopus, silently structuring society.

To avoid being trapped in fascination of the object, we firstly describe and produce a brief architecture of financial system concerning the identification of the diverse markets (capital, stocks, bonds, derivatives, other); social actors involved (from investment banks to regulatory institutions, and core participants inside institutions); and flows (inter-markets and intra-market between institutions).

Bearing this architecture in mind, we look closer to the derivatives market. There is empirical evidence of a numerous growth of financial instruments which led specifically to the development of derivatives market (mortgage-backed securities (MBS) and collateralized debt obligations (CDO)). These instruments are based on securitization and collateralization, aiming to spread risk through markets, countries and agents. Structured vehicles of investment (SVI) were created to develop and trade these instruments, allowing investment banks and hedge funds to take more risky and leveraged positions.

As these strategies seem to be circumscribed to the financial sphere, it should be emphasized that they led to an increased access of credit and products to a broader population. The housing market is one example of the influence of the financial market in the real economy. In this context subprime is, paradoxically, an example of both financial leveraged benefiting households and latter contributing to the failure of the financial system.

We observed the last decades with strong evolution of financial derivatives markets. However, financial crises have succeeded, showing the vulnerability of the system and the gap between financial enrichment and real economy evolution.

This exploratory analysis, describing the financial markets octopus, concludes that the origins of the crises are based on the real. Financial markets are not an esoteric branch of economics, but are an overly integrated system through and inside daily economics and social life.

Forms of Capital in the Making of a Bourgeoisie: A case-study

Koniordos, Sokratis

Dept. of Sociology, University of Crete Aghia Paraskevi Attikis, Greece

Keywords

forms of capital, bourgeoisie, social capital

Abstract

One of the key problems in any account of an emergent bourgeoisie is how it initially becomes enriched, and, thereafter, how it manages to regularly accumulate over and above its consumption needs so that it may divert and use the accumulated surplus in capitalist enterprising. I propose to look at one specific entrepreneurial family over the span of six generations that has been operating in parts of the Eastern Mediterranean as a case in point, to which I will refer to as the 'CK' family for purposes of anonymity. I claim that studying the forms of capital it created and deployed reveals and highlights a particular path towards the elevation into the bourgeoisie, capitalist entrepreneurship and further speciation. I have been able to access through personal ties the particular family, and conduct ethnographic-type research; some document research has also been undertaken.

Global Financial Crisis: Complexity, Dilemmas and Regulatory Failures

Martinelli, Alberto

*Department of Social and Political Studies, University of Milan
Milano, Italy*

Burns, Tom R.

*Sociology, University of Uppsala
Uppsala, Sweden*

Keywords

complexity, innovation, risk-taking, financial crisis, regulatory failures

Drawing on our earlier works, we show the ways in which institutional features of the banking and financial systems - relating to credit-formation and risk-taking - lead to overexpansion and ultimately systemic failures. The paper identifies several key factors explaining the regulatory and systemic failures:

(1) Technical Innovations. Commercial and investments banks (in Europe, the USA, and much of the world) along with hedge funds, insurance companies, and other financial institutions - in the pursuit of substantial gains, including projects of pure speculation - develop and/or adopt new ways to increase credit-creation and credit-utilization, in many instances beyond public and private regulation. Such "financial engineering" includes new instruments for spreading risk, which lower the costs of borrowing and enables still more credit-creation and credit-utilization.

(2) Risk-taking and Risky System Expansion. Long periods of successful "wealth" expansion also tend to relax public and private regulatory standards, and facilitate the emergence of informal operative norms and practices which minimize precautionary behavior and increase risky credit-creation and distribution. All of this helps drive the (increasingly risky) expansion of "wealth-creation" systems.

(3) Complexity and Regulatory Failure. The multiplication of diverse instruments makes for high complexity, limited overview and limited susceptibility to modelling and analysis. (even established measurements and indicators of system performance and vulnerability prove inadequate or inappropriate, e.g., failing to effectively measure growing risk-taking and the risks of system failures).

Uncertain Limits, System Shift. When the credit-expansion and speculative bubble(s) ultimately burst (as they must), there is a dramatic flip-flop leading, among other things, to a general loss of confidence and trust in the system and to rapidly spreading strategies of high precautionary judgment and risk-aversion. These "new shifting norms" of behavior mutually interact in a downward spiral with radical contraction of credit and financial markets. Such developments spill over to the "real economy". New principles and institutional arrangements - as well as leading indicators - for regulating credit and financial market are proposed in the paper based on our socio-economic analysis. Also, the analysis points to immediate ways to restore trust and confidence in banking and financial systems and their regulation.

How Credit Institutions Look at Society. Economics, Sociology and the Problem of Social Reflexivity Reconsidered

Marques, Rafael

*SOCIUS - Research Centre in Economic and Organizations Sociology, ISEG - Technical University of Lisbon
LISBON, PORTUGAL*

Lopes, Daniel Seabra

*SOCIUS - Research Centre in Economic and Organizations Sociology, ISEG - UTL
LISBON, PORTUGAL*

Keywords

Social reflexivity, Sociological performativity, Statistical technologies, Banks, Credit

Almost twenty years ago, Anthony Giddens proclaimed that modernity was, in itself, deeply and intrinsically sociological, in the sense that sociological knowledge tended to be rapidly assimilated by individuals and institutions and therefore incorporated in subsequent processes of change. In a period where political action and social transformation seem to be highly restricted by economic imperatives, it may be interesting to interrogate how much sociology is being put to practice in economic institutions in general, and in credit institutions in particular. Drawing on fieldwork developed in marketing and risk analysis departments of two Portuguese retail banks, this communication will describe how these institutions use specific views of society which are predominantly statistic and mainly derived from economics, having little resemblance with sociological or anthropological models. Hence the need to reconsider the problem of social reflexivity and to ask if social sciences are still important in the framing of society or if they are condemned to be an appendix of economics.

Human and social capital as intermediate variables of economic development

Graça, João

Sociologia, ISEG/ SOCIUS

Lisboa, Portugal

Bittencourt, Bernadete

Sociologia, ISEG/ SOCIUS

Lisboa, Portugal

Niza, Claudia

Sociologia, ISEG/ SOCIUS

Lisboa, Portugal

Carvalho, Helena

Metodos Quantitativos, ISCTE/ CIES

Lisboa, Portugal

Marques, Rafael

Sociologia, ISEG/ SOCIUS

Lisboa, Portugal

Keywords

values, beliefs, Economic Behaviour, Behavioural Economics

Early modernization theorists suggested that economic development is closely related to cultural values whether in the form of economic determinism or cultural determinism. More recently, some authors have advocated a middle ground in which some variables are more compatible with some stages of economic development, and that is possible to track the parallel evolution of culture and economy. Although modernization may be a progression, this process may have different patterns. Regions of the same level of development may have different configurations related to different types of capital that may have led to this result. Human capital may be defined as the education, training and long-term health embodied in the workforce. From the standpoint of modernisation theory, it could be conjectured that a reasonable sum of human capital is necessary for a nation's transition from a traditional society (mainly agricultural) and that a larger sum of human capital is required for the progression a modern to a post-modern society (mainly service sector workforce). Moreover, social capital can advance national and regional economic development through micro and macro processes. At the micro-level, horizontal social ties characterised by social integration and interpersonal trust, can foster economic development by reducing transaction costs, facilitating information sharing and peer monitoring. At the macro-level, social capital may benefit the economic system by producing a more efficient public administration, high quality social policies and the reduction of corruption. This work has the purpose to analyze the intermediate role that both human and social capital may have on economic development by studying their influence on economic values, beliefs and behaviours. Results from a national representative sample will be present and discussed.

Human Capital or Discrimination? Labor Market Entry Disadvantages of Second-Generation Turkish Migrants in Germany

Hunkler, Christian

Faculty of Social Sciences, Mannheim University Mannheim, Germany

Keywords

Migration, inequality, discrimination, Turkish, second-generation

Earlier studies disagree over whether differences in the human capital configuration or employer discrimination explain second-generation migrants' disadvantages when entering German labor markets. While the human capital explanation has been tested extensively, less convincing research explores employer discrimination. Furthermore, past research understood the successful completion of a vocational education as part of the human capital configuration and identified it as the major predictor of a successful transition into the labor market. This disregards, however, that for the most part companies are the providers of access to vocational education in Germany, and hence discrimination may occur when companies make their enrollment decisions for these programs. Importantly, this suggests investigating an earlier time point in the process when discrimination may occur than previous studies have considered. Therefore, using data from the German Socioeconomic Panel Study, I analyze the transition from secondary school into the labor market in two steps: first, the transition into vocational education, and second into employment. The GSOEP allows a comprehensive specification of human capital and testing of corollary hypotheses derived from statistical discrimination and taste discrimination.

Using discrete event history models for access to and completion of vocational education, I find significant and substantial ethnic residuals especially for young Turkish men, even when controlling for receiving country specific capitals. This raises serious doubts in specifying vocational education as part of human capital. For the second part of the process, the actual transition into regular employment, I use hybrid estimation models. Human capital, including receiving country specific resources, such as German language fluency, does not fully explain the ethnic penalties young males with Turkish migration background experience. Finally, interaction models show that a completed vocational education pays off less for Turkish as compared to Germans, again the effect is pronounced for Turkish men. The latter finding is direct evidence for statistical discrimination. Regarding taste discrimination I find no evidence, although, this is conducted through an indirect test. In conclusion, the inclusive human capital measures available in the GSOEP do not fully explain Turkish second-generation migrants' disadvantages; partly it can be attributed to statistical discrimination.

Inter-ethnic differences in finding the first job by personal contacts

Verhaeghe, Pieter-Paul

*Department of Sociology, University of Ghent
Ghent, Belgium*

Van de Putte, Bart

*Department of Sociology, University of Ghent
Ghent, Belgium*

Keywords

job finding methods, social capital, class, ethnic minorities

A growing body of research is devoted to the determinants of using personal contacts to get a job. Recently, inter-ethnic differences in finding a job by personal contacts are examined. Notwithstanding a few exceptions, the literature reveals that ethnic minorities make more use of contacts to find a job. The question remains why? This paper investigates the interplay between ethnicity and human, economic and social capital. It is hypothesized that the inter-ethnic differences in the disposable amount of these forms of capital can explain the different use of personal contacts. In addition, it is hypothesized that different socio-economic challenges result in different effects of each form of capital for the different ethnic minorities.

For these purposes, data are used of labour market entrants in Belgium with a native, Turkish, North-African or South-European origin (N=6486). The results are revealing: (1) Turkish and South-European, but not North-African, labour market entrants are more inclined to attain their first job by personal contacts than natives. This can partly be explained by their lower human capital and the social capital differences between ethnic minorities. (2) The determinants of using personal contacts for finding the first job are also different for the three ethnic minorities. Speaking Turkish at home is the most important determinant for the Turkish entrants, which can be interpreted both as a form of symbolic capital and as an indicator of the embeddedness in the Turkish community. Economic capital and gender are crucial factors for the South-European entrants. For the North-African entrants, human capital is the most determining form of capital. Implications for social capital theory and class theory are discussed.

Is the Killer Art Market Killing Art?

Coslor, Erica

*Sociology, University of Chicago
Chicago, USA*

Keywords

expert knowledge, Science and technology studies of finance, markets as cultures, financialization and calculation

It was at a panel session organized by the Art Dealer's Association of America last year at the height of the art bubble that I heard the telling quote that gives this paper its name. Titled 'Is the Killer Art Market Killing Art?' the panel consisted of various leaders from the art world, speaking to a packed theater at the Museum of Modern Art's education extension in Manhattan. After panel members talked about both the problems and advantages of the high prices in the contemporary art market, they opened up the floor to questions, and one audience member asked what esteemed New York art dealer Betty Parsons would have done in this "Wall-Streeting of the art market?" Over the past 40 years there has been development in economic theory and numerical quantification of art, along with an increasing number of buyers who consider themselves investors, rather than collectors. (Although there have been some doubts about art as a financial investment in the economic downturn, the latest auction results have been fairly strong.) Drawing from the science and technology studies of finance perspective, my research highlights the organizational, social and technical developments that seek to transform valuable objects into rationalized investments, as well as the moral resistance to this project. This can be characterized as a conflict between the culture of finance (Abolafia) and the culture of the contemporary art market., with competing forms of expert knowledge about how to understand the market, particularly in terms of quantification. The speculative and abstracted nature of investment uses rational numerical calculations to commodify art, seeking to change the market to meet the expectations of transparency seeking, profit-minded investors. This conflicts with the relationship-based system used by galleries, dealers, museums and collectors, typified by private transactions, long time horizons, and normative views of appropriate market behavior, where the goal is to 'control the biography of the artwork' (Velthuis 2005) and advance the career of the artist. This research contributes to theories of expert knowledge, quantification, multiple markets, divergent processes of valuation, and the desire to control the meaning and biography of objects.

Islamic Ethic and The Spirit of Capitalism in Turkey: Is it Possible?

Akarçay, Erhan

*Sociology, Anadolu University
Eskisehir, Turkey*

Ceyhan, Cagdas

Department of Journalism, Anadolu University Eskisehir, Turkey

Keywords

Weber, neo-liberalism, Islamic ethic, Islamic capitalism, protestant ethic

This paper examines Islamic capital in Turkey and questions whether Islamic capitalism can be understood in terms of Weberian Protestant ethic. Turkish modernization process is mainly based on the economic development of society as well as the dominant carrier of the society. Economic development is supported by the social and cultural background by means of secular understanding. Secular mentality of the state and social institutions strain with conservative and more dominantly Islamic interpretation of economics and development strategies. Since 1950's conservatism had been part of politics in Turkey. Development strategies in Turkey had been changeable in accordance with political parties. On the one hand right wing parties in general and particularly religious-nationalist, rightist-conservative parties in Turkey have been modernist, developmental and on the other hand they had conservative-nationalist understanding of economics. During the late 1970's and after 1980 coup, governments had sprouted Islamic tendencies. With the late 1980's Islamic capital accumulation has started to articulate in neo-liberalism and become the carrier of neo-liberal economic policies. The ruling Adalet ve Kalkınma Partisi (AKP- Justice and Development Party) can absolutely be considered as conservative in terms of politics but neo-liberal in terms of economics. AKP, during its governance backs up conservative/Islamic industrialists and businessmen significantly. AKP carries former Islamic understanding of capitalism which is religious-nationalist, although its effort in articulating leading capitalist world economies. This paper claims that even there exists some kind of conflict between Islam and capitalism, there is a spirit of capitalism in Turkish-Islamic capitalism.

Judgmental vs. Credit Scoring Systems in Evaluating Credit Applications - Outcomes on the Micro and Macro Level: Different Inequality Patterns in Getting Credit and Subprime Lending Due to Commodification

Szathmari, Milan

Institute of Sociology and Social Policy, Corvinus University of Budapest Budapest, Hungary

Keywords

inequality, Consumer Credit, judgmental system, credit scoring, subprime lending

I argue that as over the time the form of consumer credit becomes more and more money-like the inequality in getting credit becomes a more and more significant issue, just as the income inequality. We present two ideal types of banks' practice in evaluating credit applications which are related to either uncertainty (Russia) or risk (USA) faced by banks (Rona-Tas and Guseva 2001). In situations of uncertainty banks have to rely on judgmental/subjective decision making which results in severe discrimination. When facing risk, credit scoring systems are developed, which grant or deny the loan based on the statistical analysis of the past behavior of individuals similar to the credit applicant. This eliminates the subjectivity of the bank clerk, but it introduces statistical discrimination, which can never be entirely eliminated, although it can be reduced by the positive (full) data credit bureau. If existing institutions and the perceived stability of the economy make banks to transform uncertainty to risk then the inevitable credit boom decreases the inequality among credit applicants. However, commodification of and selling the loan portfolio becomes possible too. If banks are allowed by regulations to do so then subprime lending will occur because banks can shift their responsibility, so thus transform their own risk to an uncertainty of the whole financial system. On the level of the credit applicant though, instead of being an advantage the access to credit becomes a disadvantage for subprime applicants.

Labour regimes in European Advanced Economies: labour markets, carework and welfare states

Ciccia, Rossella

Faculty of Sociology, University of Rome La Sapienza

Rome, Italy

Keywords

institutions, Welfare State, carework, families, Labour regime

In any society social reproduction can be achieved essentially in three different ways whose boundaries are continuously redefined: engagement into paid employment, unpaid family work or intra-family transfers or welfare state support. The institutional set up of labour markets along the XVII century has gone along with the expulsion of certain activities and groups of people from the legitimate productive sphere. Those activities are not limited to housework or family work (Saraceno, 1998: 48) but include others which are normally neglected, such as education, and others still that have been invented along the course of time (retirement). Certain institutional set ups of the labour market lie thus on distinct configurations of the other two spheres of social reproduction (unpaid family work and welfare state support and intra-family transfers) that imply different effects on how the different segments of the population are incorporated into the labour market. The concept of labour regime has been defined as the set of relatively coherent and lasting rules of social life that consent to mobilize labour energies in typical forms (Mingione, 1997: 158). In this work, using aggregate data, we will describe how European advanced economies cluster according to their labour regime whereas we define the concept of labour regime as the intersection of two dimensions: the differential degree of participation of groups defined by gender and age into the labour market (selection of the labour force), the prevailing shape in which the labour relation is regulated (standardization of the employment relation). Finally, we investigate to what degree the different models that emerge can be explained through the existence of certain configuration in the reproductive and welfare spheres.

Leadership and innovation in economic organisations

Lisboa, Manuel

Sociology, CesNova - FCSH/UNL

Lisboa, Portugal

Roque Dantas, Ana

Sociology, CesNova - FCSH/UNL

Lisboa, Portugal

Keywords

leadership, decision making, innovation, sociology

This paper aims to discuss the results from a national research that focuses on the relations between leadership and innovation in economic organisations.

Innovation is, on its multiple forms, one of the ways of the countries economic modernization and sustained development, but the decision behind its implementation depends on the social actors that lead the economic organisations. In this way, we will present the organizational and biographical factors that can either ease or hinder the innovation process by comparing companies that innovate with companies that don't innovate, in different economic sectors and in different regions of Portugal. Also, special attention will be given to decision making process in innovation contexts.

This research uses qualitative methods (in-depth interviews) and quantitative methods (sociological inquiry), mixing qualitative and quantitative data analysis (from questionnaire, interviews and statistics).

The field work was developed in cooperation with GPEAR/MCTES. This partnership allowed us to have access to data from CIS_2006, regarding technological and organizational innovations, as well as the opportunity to build an autonomous questionnaire focusing on leadership launched with the CIS_2006 questionnaire.

This study is financed by FCT (PPCDT/SOC/58363/2004) and is developed by a research team from SociNova/CesNova - FCSH/UNL.

Results show that companies that innovate have certain organizational characteristics that distinguish them, as well as leadership specificities. Innovation is more likely to occur in bigger companies (more than 50 workers) of Lisboa/Setúbal that also have both, national and international markets. Their leaders have high educational degrees, are the company managers (and not their owners) and favour new ideas as their action rationality.

Leveraging Time: Money, Credit and the Crisis of Value

Dodd, Nigel

Sociology, London School of Economics and Political Science CCCC, CCCCC

Keywords

2007-9 crisis, Credit, value

The paper explores the 2007-9 financial crisis as a crisis of value which has significant implications for our understanding of the relationship between money, credit and time. After agreeing with the characterization by Blackburn and others of the crisis as an outcome of the process of financialization which has been responsible for the emergence of the 'New Wall Street System' (Gowan) since the early 1990s, the empirical focus of the paper is on the development of the so-called parallel (or shadow) banking system. This system operates on the (unregulated) margins of the mainstream (regulated) system of commercial and investment banks. Within the parallel banking system, 'value' is engineered through the construction of synthetic monetary instruments. The logic according to which value expands in this system represents a departure from finance capitalism (M-C-M?). Rather, it is a system in which monetary instruments are used to raise more money, or in which money begets money (M-M?). This is a logic in which time becomes the key asset, the vehicle for a leveraging process that (following Hyman Minsky) eventually resembles an inherently unstable pyramid of time, similar to a Ponzi scheme. When the pyramid collapses as deleveraging takes place and monetary instruments unravel, the absence of what are perceived to be 'real' underlying assets is revealed ? and yet holders of monetary instruments seek refuge in money. Using Kojin Karatani's 'parallax' conception of capitalist accumulation in terms of two distinct spheres of value (M-C and C-M), I examine this absence as a crisis of value in which fundamental ideas about the relationship between money, credit and time come to the fore.

Local Clusters and Corporate Social Responsibility

Santos, Maria

*Department social sciences, Instituto Superior de Economia e Gest3o
Lisboa, Portugal*

Keywords

stakeholder, clusters, Corporate Citizenship, sustainability, corporate social responsibility

Local Clusters and Corporate Social Responsibility

This study examines the theme of clusters in Corporate Social Responsibility (CSR). Based on the current state of art about CSR and on investigations that are being carried out in Portugal, this article shows the limitations that the current CSR practices have in overcoming social, economic and environmental problems at a global level. It deepens the theme of clusters as an integrated alternative of intervention, the several types of clusters and discusses aspects of their practices, as well as their potentiality and limitations.

In spite of CSR appearing associated to a competitive advantage with recognizable benefits in terms of global sustainability, it is possible to verify that its results are still insufficient, not only in terms of individual competitiveness, but mostly in terms of the global system's alteration. This occurs mainly due to the fact that CSR practices have a "micro" character, therefore limiting its action scope and global reforming effects.

According to studies, the positive impacts of the CSR can be improved if added to efforts of other enterprises, civil society and public sector. In this perspective, several authors have been integrating the Porter's concept of clusters to evaluate the potentialities of CSR groupings for promotion competitiveness reinforcement sustainable development.

This concept (clusters in CSR) assumes that enterprise grouping located in the same territory will interact amongst themselves and with other local entities, to optimize practices which contribute to a sustainable development of the region, in an integrated and global perspective. The adoption of social goals shared by different entities articulated in a net can improve the development of actions that exceed the sphere of micro actions, with a lot of benefits to the local communities.

By taking into consideration the proposition for a larger intervention, which connects different social entities (enterprises, civil society organizations, local power), that are working for the construction of a sustainable development, it is possible to visualize the clusters' relevance in CSR. The analysis of these forms of social innovation, based in integrated networks of CSR, constitutes the central objective of the present research.

Logic of social capital: the formation of market culture and structure

Fidrya, Efim

department of sociology and political science, North-Eastern State University Magadan, Russia

Keywords

networks, fields, entrepreneurship culture, capitals

Statement of the problem. The problem of 'living' markets diversity is being examined in the paper. The author intends to show the dynamic mechanism of net structure and market participants' practices by placing them under the context of global and local factors, causing the formation of culture of a certain type.

Methodological base. Our research is based on Bourdieu's field theory, net theory, the concept of various capital forms, as well as on the ideas about orders of values suggested by French institutional school. Markets are made of fields consisting of interconnected participants' positions, organized in nets. They are regulated by a specific type of culture which is formed under the influence of both global and specific local conditions. Market culture is based on certain value logic, characteristic of different capital forms. This logic determines the means and the aims of struggle; makes market actors work out suitable norms and practices. Market participants' nets are formed and reproduced under the influence of this logic.

Subject. Market as field of socially and economically embedded market actors' positions.

Empirical base. Two regional markets were examined: the market of car spare parts for Japanese cars and the market of computers and office equipment. Relevant statistics was analyzed, 26 businessmen were interviewed, and 400 clients were questioned at each market.

Key statements.

Among global factors influencing markets the following components are singled out: the system of legal relationship, macroeconomic context, administrative status, goods specificity, concepts of control. Local regional conditions: climatic and geographic context, population structure, regional economy, regional culture.

Geographic remoteness and detachment of the region, density of social nets and intensity of cooperation inside of them lead to formation of a specific culture, built on the logic of social capital. The relationship, leading to formation of voluntary mutual obligations, becomes valuable. Reputation, long-term and informal connections with market participants become the main competitive advantages. Companies, possessing larger volume of social capital, acquire the leading role. At the same time each market possesses some specific features in 'interpretation' of social capital logic.

Looking back to the future? Or: (what) can we learn from unemployment in former state-socialist societies for understanding citizenship relations in the economic crisis?

Reiter, Herwig

*Institute of Sociology, University of Bremen
Bremen, Germany*

Keywords

state, citizenship, unemployment, post-communism, economic crisis

Less than two decades before the financial crisis of autumn 2008 and its aftermath began to challenge the very principles of liberal market economies, a shock wave of similar scope hit the societies of the eastern half of Europe ending the era of socialist realities. The collapse of state socialism in Europe turned the lives of more than 300 million people in the area upside down and shattered long established expectations associated with the system of state planning and control. Differently from the gradual withdrawal of the state in the political economies of the west during the years before the crisis, the post-communist east suffered an abrupt loss of the state as part of the prescribed 'shock therapy' towards democratic market capitalism. Sudden mass unemployment was in most countries initially largely disembedded from public forms of social security. It brought an end to decades of the socialist right and obligation to labour, established new life course risks, and altogether changed the relationships between the state and its citizens as well as among citizens themselves. Against this background the paper reconstructs the triangular citizenship relationships between the individual, the unemployed and the state under conditions of mass unemployment in post-communism. On the basis of a qualitative-empirical study of young people conducted in the post-Soviet, neo-capitalist context of Lithuania in 2004 the paper discusses the perceived relational responses to unemployment, a societal problem that establishes novel criteria of membership and exclusion. The paper concludes by exploring the relevance of these effects of unemployment in a situation of system change and state loss for the analysis of unemployment in the current system crisis where, instead, the role of the state comes to the fore.

Looking for the keys to the black box of price for medical service (the example of Moscow dentistry)

Berdysheva, Elena

*sociology, State University Higher School of Economics
Moscow, Russian Federation*

Keywords

service, price, medicine, market, commodification

Up to a certain extent prices of goods can be calculated and read with the reference to the material costs while pricing of illusive and immaterial services turns out to be a black box for both market actors and researchers. At this juncture the case of medical services seems to be particularly complicated. Medicine deals with health ? an absolute ?substantive? value. To put it in terms of Karl Polany health is a fictitious good. Meanwhile marketization of medical services requires its calculation and representation as a numerical price.

The main medical service people in Russia used to pay for is a dental service. So, on the one hand, dentistry is a sphere where pricing of medical services is routinized more or less successfully. On the other, prices of dental services in Russia are deeply differentiated. Therefore the necessity to make a choice by comparing different prices makes market actors to ponder over price determinants. Presented in this light dentistry is a good example for studying price-setting for medical services.

On the results of a longitudinal empirical study of a price setting on the Moscow dental market I elaborate the thesis that in order to calculate and price dental services actors redefine them as a set of tangible characteristics able to be compared and ranged. The latter helps them to shield the sacred nature of health as an object of medical services and to construct market prices able to become legitimate, authoritative and taken for granted.

Obligations and Expectations: Active Citizenship, Welfare Provision and the State

Hugh, Jennifer

Politics, University of Sheffield Sheffield, United Kingdom

Keywords

state, citizenship, welfare

This paper traces the development of citizenship in relation to welfare provision and explores the implications that a changing global economic environment might have upon it. In the United Kingdom there has been a discernible shift over the past thirty years away from Marshall's citizenship by status, to citizenship by obligation (Plant, 2003). At the same time a debate has begun to emerge regarding the disengagement of citizens from politics (Hay, 2007). From a welfare perspective, 'good citizens' have been defined by their willingness to participate in paid work. Recent developments, such as the extension of the obligatory nature of welfare provision to groups such as the disabled and single parents, would appear to support Beck's view that work 'has today become the core value and mode of integration in modern societies, to such an extent that almost no alternative remains' (Beck, 2000: 11). Citizens are seen as reflexive and wanting to be active (Giddens, 1994; Le Grand, 2007). In the welfare system, tailored support is available to the citizen seeking employment. Some of this is contracted out to third parties, reflecting a shift towards choice and competition in the public sector where active citizens can demand higher levels of service (Le Grand, 2007; Clarke et al 2007). This active, reflexive citizen is not protected by the state from the risk of unemployment, but is enabled by the state to limit the impact of unemployment. The global financial crisis may make it harder for citizens to fulfil their obligations by participating in work, and harder for the state to fulfil its obligation of responding to the demands of active citizens who want to work. These implications could reinforce perceptions that politicians do not deliver; or alternatively, the necessity for state involvement could reinvigorate the debate about the nature of the relationship between state and citizen.

On the other side of the Subprime Crisis: How German people save and invest money? And what are their constructions of trust, control and blame?

Gill, Bernhard

*Sociology, Munich University
Munich, Germany*

Nikutowski, Oliver

Strategy & Planning, Ludwig-Maximilians-University Munich Munich, Germany

Keywords

individualisation theory, subprime crisis, risk society, saving and investing money in Germany

The Subprime Crisis, it is said, is caused by lending too much money without demanding enough securities. But on the other hand ? and this is seldom scrutinized ? the Subprime Crisis could only happen because there was so much money, searching for investment possibilities. China, Japan and Germany produced more than they consumed, building up high savings and with it high national account surpluses. The same asymmetry can be seen within the EU, with e.g. Spain, Greece and Ireland as debtors and Germany as the main lender.

Before this background our research focuses on how, why and when ordinary German people save and invest money. Traditionally the German middle class has a strong resentment against inflation, therefore backing up the German Bundesbank in its Europe wide crusade against state debt, high wages and a "weak Euro". Alarmed by the demografic discourse about the "aging society", people were scared for not receiving enough retirement benefits and thus guided by financial consulting to save more money. In the same moment the financial sector was deregulated to offer more risky investments to ordinary private households. Thus, decisions about saving should have become more individualised in the full sense of individualisation theory. This means that everybody should be aware of alternatives, chances, and risks, and feels responsible for the results ? but this is, of course, an empirical question. What are the constructions of trust and control when people save money? Whom do they scapegoat for losses, to whom do they attribute gains? What are historical differences now and in the past, bearing in mind that the Great Depression was one of the main causes for the rise to power of the Nazi regime?

Theoretically, our research is inspired by the risk society thesis of Ulrich Beck and by Christoph Deutschmann's observations about the roots of the financial crises in the social structure of advanced industrial societies. Methodologically, we are mainly working with content analysis of the financial discourse and with narrative interviews of individual savers.

Pressure, Trust and Gift - Vertical Supply Chains an Global Price Pressure

Ruuskanen, Petri

Department of Social Sciences and Philosophy, University of Jyväskylä University of Jyväskylä, Finland

Keywords

power, trust, industrial networks, global competition, gift

In the recent decades the competitive environment of industrial enterprises has been changing rapidly. Rather predictable and often domestically oriented mass market has transformed to highly differentiated and volatile international market. In addition to this, the intensive international competition together with fast technological development has caused a declining price trend in many industries. The aim of the paper is to study Finnish small and medium sized suppliers in the context of the global price pressure. The paper is based on in depth interviews of managers of small and medium sized entrepreneurial suppliers and their customers. The paper, firstly, analyses how SMEs manage the rising importance of networks, intensified globalizing competition and price pressure. Secondly, the paper analyses the importance of social networks and trust in strategies of SMEs.

Institutionalized networks relations with large corporations are very important for small suppliers. They e.g. offer a privileged channel to resources, such as knowledge and information and public funded development projects. They also increase negotiating power of small firms against material suppliers. Trust often acts as an entry ticket to business networks. Trust and social proximity with network ?switchmen? lubricate the coordination of cooperation by easing the interaction. Thus it is important for suppliers to establish close social relations with the actors in the switchman positions. Suppliers have, for example, recruited a key employees or partners from their customer organizations to utilize their close social relations with switchmen. Another typical means for creating social proximity with switchmen are social gatherings in a form of hospitality. The gatherings act as a gift institution which is very effective means to build social proximity (Mauss). Simultaneously very deep commitment and trust in asymmetric supplier customer relationships may create lock in effects. The efforts of suppliers to create their own products with their own intellectual property rights can be interpreted as a lack of commitment by the large customers. Tight commitment to one key customer, on the other hand, erodes the small suppliers? credibility in the eyes of other potential customers.

Primitivization of Organizational Forms as a Coping Strategy: Russian Retail Trade Under the Economic Crisis

Kotelnikova, Zoya

*Sociology, State Univerisy - the Higher School of Economics
Moscow, Russia*

Keywords

institutions, retail trade, economic crisis, organizational forms

There is a common belief that economic crisis should lead to profound restructuring and renovation. We would argue that, on the contrary, it could stimulate primitivization of the organizational forms. Being taken as a coping and cost-reduction strategy, primitivization tends to become an ideological trend for the future growth.

This argument is illustrated by the current development of Russian retail trade. Since the beginning of the economic reforms in the 1990s this sector has gone through revolutionary structural and institutional changes triggered by the dramatic development of modern chain stores. International and domestic chain store companies introduced the diverse trading formats and new sophisticated technologies. They deliver an increasing variety of goods and bring a great number of new brands to their customers.

When the economic crisis burst out, the situation started to reverse in many important aspects. Discount stores with a low level of services are now considered as a most promising trading format. Instead of an increasing assortment variety the number of store-keeping units tends to decrease at least in two times. It is claimed that consumers have too many choices to make. Nameless private labels production increasingly substitutes the supply of branded goods.

Some political measures contribute to this process changing the patterns of relations between retail business and municipal authorities. For example, the Moscow Government declared a cancellation of their programme aimed to close down all open-air markets which were previously considered as primitive and 'non-civilized' forms of trade dealing with poor services, counterfeited goods, and illegal activities. These primitive formats will be to some extent recovered in the market.

The empirical data for the study were collected from the series of 64 in-depth interviews with top managers of domestic retail companies of four cities: Moscow, Ekaterinburg, Blagovechshensk, and Magadan. Two series of these interviews were conducted by the author and research team in 2006 and 2008.

Professional power and rent seeking: Theoretical assumptions and empirical findings on Polish insolvency system

Pilitowski, Bartosz

Sociology, Instytut Socjologii UMK

Torun, Poland

Keywords

Professions, rent seeking, discretionary power, insolvency system, economic growth

This paper utilises findings of rent seeking theory and sociology of professions. Sociology of professions analyses how occupational groups solicit for their professional status and power. Theory of rent seeking on the other hand studies how people compete for political rent ? that is redistributive transfers granted by political power. Economists examining rent seeking phenomenon has come to conclusions that it causes extensive waste of resources and hinders growth of a given economy.

The basic presumption of this paper is that, professional discretionary power allows generating political rent too. Referring to empirical data on Polish insolvency system, where two professional groups ? insolvency court judges and receivers ? play significant role, the paper analyses the sources and scale of possible transfers and waste of resources with use of professional power. Importance of insolvency systems for the fluency of national economies rise in the time of crisis as the number of bankruptcies rise.

In conclusions, the paper arguments that the economic measures of waste and transfers caused by rent seeking are insufficient to evaluate all the consequences of this phenomenon for economy. Use of professional power for rent seeking call for analyse from institutional and social perspectives. Rent seeking often involves illegal actions and brings about misuse and deformation of subjected institutions. Consequences including fall of social capital and rise of total transaction costs constrain economy and discourage enterprising and innovative behaviour.

Quality Conventions and Price Formation in the French Online Advertising Market

Mellet, Kevin

*Sense, Orange Labs
Issy-Moulineaux, France*

Beuscart, Jean-Samuel

*Sense, Orange Labs
Issy-Moulineaux, France*

Keywords

Advertising, market, online advertising, price, quality conventions

The online advertising market organizes the selling and the buying of the audience product. It organizes the matching between publishers with various products (various formats and environments) and advertisers with various intentions (branding or direct response). Moreover, this matching can be either direct ? very large publishers negotiate some of their inventory directly with major advertisers ? or indirect ? intermediaries such as ad networks, ad servers and agencies slip in between suppliers and demanders.

Many analysts predict that automated bidding systems, now mainly used by search engines will gradually penetrate the whole market and organize matching and pricing for display advertising. Moreover, online advertisers and publishers who currently engage in targeting to a relatively modest degree are expected to generalize their use of these tools (Evans, 2008; Goldman, 2006). Just like modern finance, these highly computerized tools are performative devices that are supposed to give rise to efficient markets (Callon, Muniesa, 2004).

Our study offers an empirical examination of of the French online display advertsing market. It leads us to qualify the vision of a fully automated and unified online advertising market. We investigated the activity of all the French ad networks recorded by the SRI (the union of online ad networks) and conducted 20 semi directive interviews with ad network managers and market professionals who resort to these ad networks (publishers, agencies, advertisers, targeting software developers). Observations and interviews reveal the plurality of coordination mechanisms that frame the matching between advertisers and web site publishers, and particularly the conventions of quality which support coordination. We summarize our findings, drawing from Salais and Storper (1993), by suggesting that there are four worlds of production within the online advertising market. The analysis of the quality conventions and the balance of power between them are used to explain several features of prices: their opacity, their dispersion and their fluctuations.

Quick lesson on deregulation of financial markets. The case of mortgage borrowers led consumer uprising against a Polish bank

Kulpa, Anna

Department of Sociology and Social Anthropology, AGH University of Science and Technology Krakow, Poland

Keywords

economic representations, subprime-crisis, economic literacy, alternative forms of rational economic knowledge, market as arena for social action

There is no subprime mortgage market in Poland but due to sudden plunge in the Polish zloty exchange rate and drop in prices on the real estate market loans denominated in Swiss Frank (CHF) and taken out before CHF appreciation can become undersecured. By most of borrowers such risk was not anticipated and it is interesting to look how do they confront it now. Paper will focus on borrowers campaign against one of Polish bank accused of predatory lending in order to investigate how popular economic representations are produced through social action. Economic knowledge will be treated as important element for explaining economic behaviour.

Loans of borrowers involved in protest have variable rate but it is not adjusted up or down to any market index. In period when CHF London Interbank Offered Rate (LIBOR) was rising rate floating was seen as connected to LIBOR. Eventually when CHF LIBOR had started to fall down bank did not started to cut down the interests. Bank is accused of using loopholes to obtain additional profit. Protest is organised entirely on-line and mainly through social networking. Many borrowers have poor formal training in economic theory but they pragmatically elaborate representations stemming from their connections with the few markets they are involved in and gain economic knowledge through the news media. Knowledge is roughly fitted to borrower's pragmatic interests vis-à-vis bank. Arguments against bank goes beyond predatory lending and hit banking system itself, deregulation of financial market and the role of state. Piecemeal understanding of a particular economic context and financial market is produced in order to comfort each other, deny prior wrong economic decision and asymmetry in conflict with bank. Protest leaders serve as intermediaries translating economic insights into borrowers action.

Rethinking the demand and supply matching: How revolving accounts have turned into a credit dedicated to low income populations in France

Ducourant, Hélène

Sociology, Clersé

Villeneuve d'Ascq, France

Keywords

, consumer, account, Credit, revolving

In France, revolving accounts<sup>1</sup> are a very popular form of credit. It represents more than 20% of the outstanding consumer credit and it is particularly attractive to low income population. Yet, its investigators did not mean such destiny when they introduced it in France in the sixties. Its aim was only to facilitate sales in some mass retail shops. What had happened in the meantime? And why did the transformation into a lower class credit turn out to be extremely profitable?

In this presentation, I show how historically this credit happened to be dedicated to low income populations. And I explain why these populations are attracted by such supplies: it is while seeking 'disembedded' trade relations that these households have subscribed to such credit, thus escaping the social stigma attached to other ways of obtaining fund.

Describing this evolution, I distinguish myself from approaches that are already seen as classical in economic sociology. More precisely, I show that Bourdieu's « structural homology » does not fit to the revolving credit market. This scheme cannot explain why lower class people run to get a product that was not done for them. Then, after authors such as White (White, 1981) or Garcia-Parpet (Garcia-Parpet, 2007), I explain how supply is built by the effects of differentiation strategy from each firm. But I underline all the same that it is the uses of this credit by the consumers who divert its meaning that make revolving credit a profitable activity.

This research is based on my PhD dissertation fieldwork (2005-2008). More than forty top executives of credit firms were interviewed, two months of in situ observations have been done and credit firms' archives have been analyzed. The presentation can be given either in English or in Portuguese.

<sup>1</sup>A revolving account is a type of debt account where the outstanding balance does not have to be paid in full every month by the borrower to the lender. In France, revolving accounts are often supplied by specific credit firms that are different from deposit banks where households have their personal bank account.

Science on a journey from one change to another: epistemic cultures amidst the global science capitalism

Kovalainen, Anne

*Department of Sociology, University of Turku
TURKU, Finland*

Poutanen, Seppo

*Department of Sociology, University of Turku
Turku, Finland*

Keywords

changes, fundings, global knowledge economy, universities

Presently a unique process of change in the Finnish university field is taking place: the time span and theme of university restructuring and change are both highly significant historically speaking, and require contemporary analysis particularly with regard to cooperation in scientific, organization and working life as well as the sociology of science. Presently the merger of several universities is being completed in Finland. The changes introduced in the research landscape concern universities' governance, funding and future possibilities in the global knowledge economy. While the changes in Finnish universities are ongoing ? ranging from the changes in external, structural conditions such as the introduction of new legal structure to the organizational changes within the universities such as mergers of institutions, departments and faculties ? all irreversibly, directly and indirectly affect the lives, plans and possibilities of researchers. Universities are under pressure to reorganise and adopt strategic economic orientations and specialization as to more closely resemble the private corporations that dominate this market. The commodification of knowledge is not simplistic phenomenon (e.g. Mirowski & Sent 2008; Mirowski 2004; Fuller 2002). This is the theme we will focus on in our paper with the help of interview materials analysed through qualitative methods.

More generally, our paper targets the changes in the Finnish universities at four interconnected levels. Our paper is part of the research project where we will analyze universities as i) workplaces and as work cultures, as ii) places for epistemic communities and birthplaces of new knowledge, and as iii) part of research landscape and iv) targets for and co-producers of science policies.

Theoretically our project is built on four research-related foundations: a) for post-structural social epistemology as well as for the areas of scientific research (Flax 1992, Harding 1991, Longino 1990, Traweek 1992, Fuller 1996, 2007), b) for more general science of sociology research (SSR) (Barnes, Bloor & Henry 1996; Collins & Pinch 1993; Gieryn 2000; Knorr-Cetina 1991), c) for actor network theory (ANT) (Callon 1991; Latour 1987; Law 2004), as well as d) for research on economy and work (e.g. Watson et al. 2003).

Skybridge and Grounded Angel: European econo-culturescapes

Boyne, Roy

School of Applied Social Sciences, Durham University Durham, United Kingdom

Keywords

impact, economy, culture, Architecture, art

The UK Audit Commission's 2005 work on the evaluation of public investment in culture – the 'Culture Block' – ignored qualitative evaluation, even though this figured in their individual inspections, and in admired evaluation 'toolkits'. We might hope for methodological breakthroughs in the field of culture research comparable to the 1972 development of the statistical method of 'partial likelihood' in the health field. However, the signs are not propitious. The International Statistics Institute has little interest in applied research, and while the joint work of UNESCO, OECD and Eurostat did have a focus up to 2007 on international categories for cultural statistics, the current work programme is dominated by education statistics (although the OECD has developed Satellite Accounts for Culture).

Measurement technology for investigation of the value of cultural investment has not progressed. While this is the case, the qualitative paradigm represented by the intelligent intuitionism of Francois Matarasso combined with case study work into carefully chosen impact groups – while theoretically and methodologically fragile – has minimal competition in an area often categorised by economists under the heading of externalities.

Two case studies will examine these issues. The Viaduc de Millau (2004) in Southern France, on the A75 autoroute, known as La Méridienne, between Clermont-Ferrand and Pézenas, was designed by Norman Foster and Partners. The Angel of the North (1998) in Gateshead, North East England, was made by Anthony Gormley. The former was designed to improve arterial links to and from Paris, with concern also for a potentially mixed impact on the prosperity of the Millau area. The latter was made to be a sign of past, present and future, 'witnessing and marking in time and space.' In surveying the work that French economists have done to assess the impact of Foster's 'bridge in the sky', and the work that economists and cultural policy specialists have done to reflect upon the impact of Gateshead's Angel, the economists' notion of externalities will come under critical scrutiny, as will the most recent paradigmatic socio-economic evaluation methodology, in the work done by the Impacts08 team during Liverpool's year as European City of Culture.

Social Construction of Innovation (SCI): Portuguese Cases in Technologic-Based Organizations

Piteira, Margarida

SOCIUS - Research Centre in Economic and Organizational Sociology, Instituto Superior de Economia e Gestão - Universidade Técnica de Lisboa
Portugal, <http://www.iseg.utl.pt/socius/index.html>

Gomes, Jorge

Social and Organisational Psychology, Instituto Superior de Ciências do Trabalho e da Empresa (Lisbon University Institute)
Lisboa, Portugal

Carvalho Ferreira, José Maria

Social Sciences, SOCIUS - Research Centre in Economic and Organizational Sociology - ISEG-UTL
Portugal, <http://www.iseg.utl.pt/socius/index.html>

Keywords

innovation, Social Construction., Organizational Context

This paper discusses the innovation as a social process in organizational context. The current work presents the results of three case studies in Portuguese technologic-based corporations.

Following the MIRP (Minnesota Innovation Research Program; Van de Ven et al., 1999; 2000), we define innovation as a process that includes ideas, outcomes, people, transactions and contexts. More specifically, innovation is defined as new ideas that are developed and implemented to achieve desired outcomes by people who are engaged in transactions (relationships) with others in a changing institutional and organizational context. Using the social construction perspective (Granovetter, 1985), organizations issues are embedded in a larger social system. In this perspective, the social process begins with the novelty generation by people in transactions, to introduce products / services into the market.

This research followed a qualitative approach, and used a case study approach. This strategy was selected because it allows descriptive and richer data to be collected. It also allows to explore actors` accounts of the phenomena under study. Data was collected via interviews, direct observation, media, web and document analysis using triangulation. The first empirical research focus was to identify the highest Portuguese innovative firms with international recognition. In this explorative step key informants were selected from academic and business areas, and media and websites were also analysed.

We followed the suggestions by Yin (1994) and Eisenhardt (1989) namely we used protocols and consolidating the model of analysis. In this phase, top management, the human resources director and the middle management were interviewed.

The implications of the paper are discussed at a practical level (e.g. human resources policy and its relationship with innovation in organizations), at a methodological (e.g. link between tacit and theoretical knowledge through case study research), and at a theoretical (e.g. presentation of a conceptual framework to analyze the innovation processes as a product of organizational actors).

Social Inequalities in Modern Russia: Problems and Perspectives

Gorshkov, Mikhail

Director, Institute of Sociology, Russian Academy of Sciences Moscow, Russia

Keywords

human and social capital, social inequalities, Social exclusion, social ordinariness, Social stratification

Problems of social inequalities are very important to present-day Russia. Results of sociological survey conducted by the Institute of Sociology (Russian Academy of Sciences) let us to conclude that Russians are discontent not so much with some casual social inequalities, but with a new system of socio-economical relations (including distribution of property and incomes), inconsistency between peoples' social and professional statuses and level of their social expectations. It looks like that part of poor Russians will rather increase than decrease in the nearest future, because they will exhaust their resources and social nets of support and will not be able to overcome crisis. At the same time social inequalities manifest themselves in different quality of some separate life aspects, Russians' socio-psychological state and state of health, available opportunities and adaptation strategies. Different types of residence, age discrimination, educational differences turned out to be the most important inequality factors. It's an obvious tendency toward further increase in inequality, since quality of life improves mostly for those already well-off. There are objective reasons of above inequalities as well as of impossibility to improve state of unfortunate strata, such as low level of education, lack of skills, necessary for advantageous employment at labor market. Therefore, state social policy, focused on tempering inequalities, should be pointed to developing opportunities in the sphere of human capital building-up. Social inequalities have an effect on traditional practices of mutual support which are an important additional survival resource. Thus, in respect of the poorest strata it's possible to speak about social exclusion: their representatives either lack for social capital, or it is manifestly insufficient. Despite the fact that informal social networks are very important from the standpoint of survival, approximately 20 percent of Russian population are fully deprived of any social capital. Another very dangerous tendency is that of step-by-step exclusion of needy (and especially poor) people from the most significant types of multifunctional interchanges of social capital as well as functioning of social networks for the sake of the most unsophisticated types of support in case the matter concerns the most underprovided people.

Strong Ties, Weak Ties and the Management of Innovation

Gretzinger, Susanne

Department of Border Region Studies, University of Southern Denmark Sønderborg, Denmark

Matiaske, Wenzel

Institute for Human Resources and International Management, Helmut-Schmidt-University Hamburg Hamburg, Germany

Hinz, Holger

International Institute of Management (IIM), University of Flensburg Flensburg, Germany

Keywords

Innovation-culture, socio-economic survey, case of German and Danish small and medium sized enterprises

The Case of Danish and German Small and Medium Sized Enterprises

Frequently innovations are essential strategic resources of small and medium sized enterprises. At the same time innovations of SMEs have an impact on the competitive capacity of national economies. According to this the importance of SMEs should not be underestimated. In particular organizational trends of decentralization and outsourcing during the last two decades have enhanced the dependence of large enterprises on the innovations of small and medium sized suppliers. These are reasons for the institutional policies supporting innovation to concentrate partly on the innovations of SMEs. In praxis supporting innovations encounters several difficulties. While focusing on the perspective of an individual firm conventional approaches of strategic management tend to overlook the institutional support system of innovations.

Through the socio-economic lens of social network analyses the shaping recommendation referring to entrepreneurs is to limit their communication on innovations to "strong ties" but the process of innovation is dependent on a high level of information from the very beginning.

Based on the resource dependence approach this study develops a theoretical framework which integrates the system of public innovation support and enables the development of hypotheses on the utilization of 'weak ties' in the process of innovation (Pfeffer/Salancik, 1978). Based on this framework the study discusses the differences between the governance structures of the Danish and German systems of supporting innovations and their strengths and weakening in consulting SMEs. Empirical our study is based on a survey of SMEs situated in West Denmark in Northern Germany (Cornett/Sørensen, 2005). The multivariate analyses (correspondence- and cluster analyses, logit models) of the survey data on the determinants of successful and failed innovations in SMEs (n = 378, paper and pencil questionnaires in Northern Denmark, n = 380, computer assisted telephone-interviews in North Germany) provides insights on factors of success using the institutional system of supporting innovations in both countries.

Structural-normative dimensions of the spread of rural entrepreneurship in transition societies. The Case of Transylvania

Csata, Zsombor

Sociology, Babes-Bolyai University

Cluj Napoca, Romania

Keywords

regional specialization, entrepreneurship, Social Networks

Our paper is dealing with the social determinants of the spread of small and medium enterprises in the rural settlements of Transylvania after the change of regime. The analysis is divided in two main parts: in the first section, by emphasizing the role of sociological factors, we will try to explain regional differences concerning the density of the economic institutions.

The second part consists of the analysis of such settlements, where statistics show that the entrepreneurial propensity is strikingly high compared to the regional means; although this can not be fully explained either by the economic model of comparative advantages or by the inequality of the territorial dispersion of economic and natural resources. In these locations we analyze the establishment of those specific co-operational patterns and collaboration networks which originally were not created for economic purposes, but proved to be economically viable despite of the ambiguous economic and judiciary conditions, characteristic for the period following the change of regime.

Tax Bureaucrats and Their Clients: Changes in Taxpayers and Tax Inspectors Relationship in Russia

Danilova, Elena

Institute of Sociology, Institute of Sociology RAS

Moscow, Russia

Keywords

bureaucracy, taxation, regulatory capture capacity, institutional changes

The paper looks at the changes in relationship between the policy makers, the tax inspectors and the taxpayers in 2000s. Paper utilizes data of a unique panel survey of citizens and tax officials (2001, 2008) as well as ethnographic studies. Survey in 2001 revealed a serious gap between the state higher authorities' policy and actual behavior of the rank-and-file tax inspectors and taxpayers. Both tax inspectors and taxpayers were rather on the same side of "barricade", opposing to state higher level tax authorities. Internal hierarchy within the agency was relatively weak. Informal ad-hoc arrangements, corruption and tax evasion were not only wide-spread, but often justified by the both sides of the taxation mechanism. In 2008 the tax agency became one of the most feared and organized, with drastically increased capacity to collect taxes. The study presents an opportunity to question how the state is able to increase tax collection and decrease tax evasion in relatively short time. The paper argues that the most important factor could be seen in the institutional changes due to policy focusing on internal organizational changes and role-performing identities within tax employees. This resulted in increasing state regulatory capture capacity and more obedience of taxpayers. However, in tax policy there was a relatively little focus on improving efficiency of taxation regime in terms of introducing more incentives for businesses.

The banking system's monopolization of consumer credit in France: From face-to-face credit to economic identity checks

Laferté, Gilles

Sciences Sociales, INRA

Dijon, France

Keywords

economic identification, France, Consumer Credit, bank

Relatively little is known of the contemporary history of consumer credit in France despite growing interest in the subject.

This face-to-face economy between shop owners and customers based on acquaintanceship networks was progressively superseded by a more formal system of credit, introduced by large department stores in the late nineteenth century and then by finance houses, primarily for motor car purchases in the inter-war years. The explosion of credit for consumer durables at the Liberation led the legislator to place these finance houses under the supervision of the Bank of France. However, outside of consumer credit for durable goods, what the authorities termed the 'black credit' system—direct credit granted by shop owners to their customers—continued on a massive scale until the 1970s.

The 1970s saw the banking system extend to the entire population through the progressive requirement for wages to be paid into bank accounts. Banks raced to set up networks to capture deposits and began to take an interest in this customer base of individuals, thereby inventing retail banking with the financial advisor as its central figure. New banking products emerged, with the generalization of current accounts, personal loans, overdrafts and finally of credit cards, which even today remain essentially payment cards.

The consumer credit market in France has therefore followed a very different path from the US model. Strong consumer protection laws have prohibited the sharing of files of all bank customers, thereby forestalling the creation of credit bureaus, which are at the heart of today's financial crisis. This specificity slowed the automation of credit, limiting interbank cooperation to 'bad payer' files centralized by the Bank of France.

This monopolization of credit by banks and finance houses has led to the emergence of a bureaucratic and economic system of identity controls of consumers for what are 'remote' markets. Banks have become the implicit intermediaries in most transactions, guaranteeing the identity and solvency of those involved, and assimilating the vast majority of transactions to cash payments. Nowadays, in most cases, Bank identification is the condition to enter the market.

The culture of risk: Private benefits / Public damages

Gómez, Victoria

Political Science and Sociology (Ciencia Política y Sociología), Universidad Carlos III Madrid Getafe (Madrid), Spain

Keywords

financial crisis, culture of risk, new economic paradigm

The culture of risk: Private benefits / Public damages

In contrast with what happened in most of the 20th century, the last two decades? numerous financial crises are linked to both instability and uncertainty. These recent crises are commonly explained as a result of financial flows globalisation. From a sociological point of view, however, the extent of the damaging effects of the crises is also connected to a new culture of risk which shows three relevant features: (a) legitimacy of the search for short-term benefits, (b) acceptance of the attempt to finance the new economy through risk activities and (c) confidence on the market mechanisms? control. A new and more reliable economic paradigm should question the present culture of risk based on the enhancement of uncertain ventures as source of innovation and hope. The paper will critically explore the three different dimensions of the culture of risk, with particular attention to the specificity of the current crisis.

The decommodification of humans, hell and ferocity: Notes and observations about empty markets

Adriaenssens, Stef

CEDON, HUB - University College Brussels

Brussels, Belgium

Keywords

preferences, decommodification, cultural change, historical analysis

The emergence of markets receives plenty of attention in social-scientific theorizing and in empirical research. Not only economists study 'emerging markets' intensively, also sociologists have been tackling the problem. In sociological theory and research this is complemented with a thesis, sometimes also an implicit assumption, about the long term 'marketization' or 'commodification' of social life. This thesis or assumption basically boils down to the idea that monetized exchange in the long term has become an always more important part of social relationships and of relationships between people and goods.

This dominant way depicting the growing importance of markets in society passes over the existence of the opposite phenomenon. There is little doubt that some markets and goods have become de-commodified during the emergence of modern society. Excellent examples are found in slave markets, but also in the more exceptional phenomena of markets for gladiator fights and for indulgences. The (temporary) end state of this process of decommodification is defined as 'empty markets'. Studying empty markets and the processes associated with it seem to be left in the care of historians, as if they had no relevance whatsoever for the understanding of contemporary markets. This paper starts from the opposite intuition that the study of market decline may be an informative approach to understand more about the evolution of markets and market society.

Though they are seldom studied by social scientists interested in contemporary markets, empty markets may learn us a lot about the rules, regularities and mechanisms behind market change. For one thing, empty markets probably give us a hint about the role of changing preferences and 'tastes' in how markets may evolve.

This paper attempts to test hypotheses concerning the supposed relevance of changing tastes and preferences, i.e. changing individual agents and their cultures, as a causal condition of the process of emptying markets. Basically the standpoint will be defended that changing preferences and cultural tastes, in some cases even from suppliers, had a decisive effect on the process. The cases of the markets of gladiator games, slaves and indulgences serve as basis for some provisional conclusions.

The financial crisis and Petrobras's Social Responsibility Policies

Belem, Marcela Purini

Departamento de Engenharia de Produção, Universidade Federal de São Carlos São Carlos, Brasil

Keywords

financial crisis, corporate social responsibility, Petrobras

The present work analyzes the effects of the present financial crisis over the entrepreneurial policies of Social Responsibility of Petrobrás, the major Brazilian company from the field of energy.

Petrobras is a mixed-stocked Corporation controlled by the federation, that is, a state-owned company where there is a share between the public and the private powers, both in its administration and in its capital.

In 2008, Petrobras was acknowledged by a Management & Excellence (M&E) survey as the world's most sustainable oil company. The company is a global reference in ethics and sustainability, in addition, since 2003 Petrobras adhered to the United Nations Global Compact, a voluntary agreement by which companies worldwide agree to guarantee compliance with the principles relating to human rights, working conditions, and environment. Beside that, for the third time, Petrobras earned the right to be listed on the Dow Jones Global Sustainability Index (DJSI), the most important global sustainability index .

Petrobras publishes annually its Social and Environmental Balance. Using the social balances from 2006, 2007 and 2008 we did an analysis of the effects of the crisis over the company's Social Responsibility actions. We began our analysis in the year of 2006, for in that year Brazil attained the self-sufficiency in the oil production, when the company breaks a record in the gains and in the investments on Social Responsibility Actions. In the years of 2007 and 2008, despite the company's success in great part of its aims and obligations towards its Social Responsibility commitments, the effects of the economic panorama were felt both in the company's profits as well as in the entrepreneurial policies of Social Responsibility.

The Impact of Globalization on Rural Poor in Turkey: The case of Social Risk Mitigation Project

Gulcubuk, Bulent

*Dept. of Agricultural Economics, Ankara University Faculty of Agriculture
Ankara, TURKEY*

Keywords

Globalization, Turkey, Rural Poverty, SRMP

Globalization has multi-facet impacts on the live of people. Turkey has faced the reality of globalization for many years but its adverse effect has been severely felt especially after the 1980s. Turkey, as other developing countries, has entered under the political realm of influential international organizations and has been negatively affected by this process. 30% of total population lives in rural areas and 30% of the labour force is employed in agriculture. Despite its significance in employment, agriculture contributes only 10% to the gross national income. Especially in the 1990s liberalization policy being implemented has resulted in structural changes in the agricultural sector of Turkey. Millions of people have been adversely affected by globalization in general and by privatization and free-market economic policy in particular. Agricultural policy being orchestrated by international policy formation agencies has affected 90% of small agricultural businesses and 35 % of landless rural population and this policy has furthermore caused unemployment, poverty and migration from the rural to urban areas working as unregistered workers. In fact, during the year of 1991-2001 about one million agricultural enterprises has been shut down and there is no data about what these people are doing.

As a result of globalization policy being imposed, legal regulations regarding the limited production of tobacco, sugar, hazelnut and tea has affected about two million rural families and millions of agricultural workers directly or indirectly. Such development has increased poverty and 36% of people are making a living under the poverty line. In Turkey the World-Bank financed Social Risk Mitigation Project (SRMP) has been implemented after the 2001 crisis. SRMP was put in force in order to mitigate the adverse effect of globalization and economic crisis on poor. The purpose of this paper is first of all to examine the effect of globalization on Turkish agriculture and on increasing poverty. This has followed by introduction of SRMP. Within this context, the last component of SRMP, income and employment generation, will be examined and discussed based on the results of field research.

The institutional shape of regional SME-based sectors in Spain

Ahedo, Manu

Department of Business Administration, University Rovira i Virgili Tarragona, Spain

Keywords

institutional analysis, Regions, sectors, SMEs

The paper makes an institutional analysis of the construction of regional industrial sectors based on Small and Medium-Sized Enterprises. Specifically, it looks at the relation between three main dimensions in the evolution of advanced industrial economy in Spain during the last 3 decades: firm-size, sector and region. It is assumed that latent conflicts are present in the interplay between these three dimensions. The objective of the paper is to contribute with the case of Spain to the discussion on the relations between firm-size, sector and regions, and the collective actors and agents that play institutional games in shaping the reconfiguration processes of nation-state business systems and capitalisms.

There are two units of analysis. First, the interplay between public actors and private actors involved directly or indirectly in the constitution of the regional SME-based sectors. Second, the role played by the regional industry associations that have emerged and constituted in Spain to articulate, represent and organize the interest of regional sector SMEs. Conceptually, two main concepts are deployed: collective competition goods, and organizational power.

Regarding research methods, a longitudinal research has been conducted, based on secondary literature and data, archive analysis and about 40 semi-structured interviews with key informants and actors, during the period 2001-2008.

The main general conclusion is that regional SMEs in different sectors have been able to construct and develop their collective competition goods through different types of institutional strategies and different arrangements of public-private collaboration. Concrete conclusions are as follows. First, that the traditional conflicts between SME and large firms are also found to be reproduced in the new sectors, such as ICT and biotechnology. Second, differences in sector organization need to be combined with regional differences concerning regional business systems, institutional framework and regional industrial policies. Third, that, beyond regional differences, the industry associations of regional SME-based sectors have tended to increase their organizational autonomy and power, and in that sense the collective competition goods have acquired a more private character. Fourth, the hybridation thesis of national models of business systems or capitalisms is somehow confirmed.

The World on a Calendar: Coordinating the Global Art Market through Time, Events, and Location

Coslor, Erica

*Sociology, University of Chicago
Chicago, USA*

Keywords

art market, Economic Geography, Market Calendar, Market Coordination, New Economic Sociology

Using the case of the global art market, I suggest the 'global calendar' as a way of providing a time and location linked form of coordination. In my research into the contemporary art market, I question how the overall global market is held together: what structures, organizations, events and other elements bring order and coordination to the disparate actors and regions that participate? The answer, I suggest, is a loose form of organization conducted through a calendar of events and happenings, a calendar that runs throughout the world, but is segmented in space and time. Despite the long existence of a 'global imaginary' about a world-spanning art market, prior to about 1980, the art market was more of an international, rather than global form, where only a few cities were centers of transnational activity. In the late 1980s, this shifted to a form that spanned much more of the globe, and this 'market calendar' is actively growing and recruiting participation from new centers of wealth and artistic activity, such as Beijing and Dubai. This recruitment of new art market centers is partly strategic, seeking to bring in new money from growing and previously marginalized nations like China, India, and Russia, and there is a corresponding self recruitment as smaller cities attempt to become centers for the arts as a form of economic development. Focusing activity in these new centers for short amounts of time is one way the market calendar is able to accommodate new locations. For example, New York is a year-round center for the art market, but Miami, FL becomes the center of attention for a week in December, during the ArtBasel Miami Beach art fair. In this paper, I present my theory of the global calendar, with some preliminary results from my initial research, examining the role of art fairs, entrepreneurs, news media, and other coordinating factors.

Trust in Financial Markets and Financial Professionalism: Lessons from the Subprime Crisis

Langenohl, Andreas

Center of Excellence "Cultural Foundations of Integration", University of Konstanz Konstanz, Germany

Keywords

Professionalism, trust, Crisis, financial market

The paper explores financial professionalism as a key component in keeping financial markets trustworthy, arguing that it is in professional relations that trust in markets is generated. Such relations are found between investment advisors and their clients, both institutional and private. The paper discusses ways to sociologically operationalize the functions and the limits of trust in financial professionalism and presents first preliminary findings.

As a result of the promotion of professional forms of self-organization in the finance industry (Lounsbury, Preda), today financial occupations live up to classical sociological definitions of professionalism. They have a body of abstract knowledge acquired in higher education (business administration and economics); they apply this knowledge in a case-sensitive way with a client and her particular dispositions; and they actively cooperate in an expert-client relation. However, sociological theorization on the professions reveals also an ambiguity about the professions' capacity to contribute to the generation of trust. While according to Parsons professional action strengthens societal integration because it puts to work general values under conditions of particularity, Abbott interprets the rise of the professions as the result of a struggle for symbolic and strategic power in society. Apart from this controversy, Barner and Giddens see a decline on the trust that professions can generate due to a rise of lay expertise in contemporary knowledge societies.

Drawing on those sociological positions, the paper attempts to gauge the role of professional relations in the emergence of trust in financial markets. The present context of the subprime crisis provides an excellent opportunity for this. Empirically the paper refers to interviews with bank advisors in the Sparkassen Finanzgruppe and presents their interpretations of the impact of the crisis on their clients' investment behavior, their general trust in the financial markets, and their views on the client-expert-relationship. While it will be necessary to include more data, those interviews provide a first viewpoint on financial market trust and allow discussing issues like professionalism as a business ideology, the reduction of complexity through the fiduciary relationship, and the ways in which trust relations are strained (or not) by market crashes.

RN10

Sociology of Education

A Sociological Inquiry of Wants in Educational Choices

Puaca, Goran

Department of Sociology, University of Gothenburg Göteborg, Sweden

Daoud, Adel

*Department of Sociology, University of Gothenburg
Göteborg, Sweden*

Keywords

wants, educational choices, Reflexivity, habitus, preferences

From an emancipatory point of view it is essential to know more about how human wants are related to educational choices and the motivational factors that enable social action. The purpose of this paper is to develop an explanatory sociological approach of wants. We do this in relation to the concept of preferences of rational choice theory. By using one of the favourite cases of this theory, namely preferences prevailing choices and investment in human capital, we manage to show that the assumption of stable preferences is unrealistic. We will illustrate the impossibility to separate wants from material and symbolic support of the social order (relative scarcity). The want-lists of different student's (n=27) demonstrate this. In this context, a want-list of an individual is defined as a social and cultural manifestation, and an outcome of agents' reinterpretations and negotiations within a social order. Our findings illustrate that these want-lists contain high levels of inconsistency from the perspective of rational choice: meaning that they violate the principle of transitivity (viz. irrationality) and manifest an indifference which is derived from the principle of completeness (viz. indeterminacy). We argue that this inconsistency arises because of radical uncertainty, denominated as epistemological opaqueness. From this we propose an alternative approach to want formation anchored in the concept of the habitus (Pierre Bourdieu) and reflexivity (Margaret Archer). The habitus concept establishes the set of wants (merely the bundle of wants), whereas reflexivity conditions the want-list (the interconnectedness of wants). This approach both eases the problem of epistemic opaqueness and maintains that wants should be seen to form an organic totality. An organic incorporation of wants will, we argue, help us to understand how habitus hinges agent's reflexive possibilities of making educational choices. Consequently, if we view wants as being denominated to socio-cultural manifestations, we may better understand the intermediating domains of micro-political affairs that both constitute the prevailing order of things, and poses individual possibilities of questioning and transforming that order. Our results pose a challenge to assumptions centred in the recognition that educational choices first and foremost are expressions of individual interest and cognitive skills.

Academic Achievement and Ethnic Minorities in England

Fernández-Reino, Mariña

Department of Political and Social Sciences, University Pompeu Fabra (Barcelona) Barcelona, Spain

Keywords

ethnic minorities, academic achievement, England

Empirical studies have generally painted a negative picture of the academic achievement of children from minorities of immigrant origin. A valuable source of data for capturing this phenomenon at the cross-national level has been the Programme for International Students Assessment (PISA), which has allowed researchers to detect substantive differences in the width of the gap across countries. However, the main drawback of cross-national data is that it does not permit assessment of the differences between ethnic groups due their small sample size. Moreover, studies made at national level have shown disparate levels of educational achievement across ethnic groups; interestingly enough, some of these are even performing better than natives.

In my research I am interested in capturing the mechanisms that account for the differences in academic performance between children of different immigrant minorities and between these and natives. Particularly, I am focusing on the case of England using the Longitudinal Study of Young People in England. In a later stage of my thesis, I will include the case of Spain, where a similar survey, in which I am collaborating on the design, is currently being developed. A cross-national comparison like between England and Spain will allow me to grasp the influence of macro variables such as the educational system, something that would not be possible in a single country study.

The paper I would like to present in the conference corresponds to the first article of my thesis. In this first paper I tackle the school effects on the educational performance through a multilevel analysis. At the same time, I try to see if the most common reported explanatory factors (particularly the socio-economic background) have a different effect upon each ethnic minority's children. Especial attention will be paid to the interactions between individual level variables and macro level factors, such as the neighborhood environment or the degree of social cohesion between the members of each ethnic minority. These interactions will probably shed light on the unknown mechanisms that account for the differentials in educational achievement across ethnic minorities and between those and natives.

AIDS Knowledge and Sexual Activity among Flemish Secondary School Students: the Effects of Type of Education

Van Rossem, Ronan

*department of sociology, Ghent University
Ghent, Belgium*

Van Tuyckom, Charlotte

*department of sociology, Ghent University
Ghent, Belgium*

Berten, Hans

*department of sociology, Ghent University
Ghent, Belgium*

Keywords

sexual activity, AIDS knowledge, educational stratification

Using data from the Flemish Educational Assessment survey, this paper examines how AIDS knowledge and sexual activity co-vary among Flemish secondary school students, and how they are affected by education type. Results indicate that type of education affects both an adolescent's onset of sexuality and his/her AIDS knowledge, and these effects prove robust for differences in socio-economic backgrounds. Students in lower status education types are more likely to be sexually active and to have poorer AIDS knowledge. The relationship between AIDS knowledge and sexual activity is, however, more complex. Although students in education types with poorer AIDS knowledge are more sexually active, within each of these groups the sexually active have better AIDS knowledge than the non-sexually active ones. There is also evidence of active information seeking by sexually active students which leads to improved AIDS knowledge.

Are doctoral students creators of new knowledge? Implication of New Policies on Social Sciences Doctoral Programs in the UK

Matos, Frederico

CALT & Anthropology & Centre for Personal and Professional Development, University College London & University of Cambridge
London, UK

Keywords

university(ies), research councils, PhD, Higher Education, doctoral studies

Doctoral programmes in the UK have seen profound changes in recent years. These include the introduction of a training component, as well as more stringent deadlines and supervisory control. The changes are being introduced following the Roberts' Set for Success report and the Joint Skills Statement by the Research Councils, the latter important funders of doctoral studies in the UK. Some say that the current changes affect the quality and reach of the research itself, which in turn affect the final result: the thesis.

This paper is based on in-depth interviews with supervisors and PhD students in Social Sciences departments in a UK research-intensive university. The main conclusions of this study are that individual supervisors have adopted compliance strategies in tune with departmental and institution-wide practices at times in opposition to their own individual view of what PhDs should be and should attain. Compliance strategies include introduction of transferable skills training, tighter rules for accepting new students, as well as co-supervision. An initial period of reaction and resistance to the new doctoral paradigm was followed by a more settled period of adaptation and compliance that show what Hockney calls "the art of the possible".

The presentation will focus on different perceptions of what the PhD is: the stakeholders', the supervisors' and the students'.

Becoming a "lifelong learner" - Trajectories and identities of individuals in today's European societies

Alves, Mariana Gaio

UIED (Unidade de Investigação Educação e Desenvolvimento), FCT - Universidade Nova Lisboa Caparica, Portugal

Keywords

Identities, socialization, lifelong learning, education

Lifelong learning has been emerging as a central and guiding principle in the definition of educational policies over the last years, especially in the European context since the year 2000. European societies are expected to become knowledge and learning societies and to achieve this goal lifelong learning seems to be an essential tool. So, this research theme has a significant social relevancy in contemporary contexts and points out for the need of a deeper understanding of the dynamics, potentialities and constraints that arise from this general political orientation.

Within this framework the paper intends to reflect upon the idea of "lifelong learner" in the contemporary European societies focusing on the individuals' trajectories and identities and questioning the concepts of socialization and construction of a personal and social identity. It draws on data coming from a research project funded by the Portuguese Ministry of Science and Technology (PDCT/CED/60425/2004) and focusing on lifelong learning and European educational policies. This project has been allowing collecting empirical data through documental analysis, questionnaires and interviews about individuals that are engaging in educational initiatives framed by the dynamics of lifelong learning.

Underlying the research work developed there are two main assumptions: one is the idea that education is considered a project for national and European mobilization but this has a slightly different meaning nowadays since education is regarded as a process that occurs in a lifelong and in a life wide perspective; the other is the argument that studying education within this framework is crucial to the understanding of changes occurring in today's societies. Much of the discussion around lifelong learning in recent years has been centred on its main aims in economical and social terms at a macro level of analysis, but the paper intends to explore a challenging and important line of sociological research by approaching the lifelong learners own perspectives and level of analysis.

Changes in Higher Education: Quality Assurance and University Change

Yokoyama, Keiko

Center for the Study of Higher Education, The Pennsylvania State University University Park, PA, USA

Keywords

university adaptation, quality assurance, Higher Education, education change, agency and structural approaches

The purpose of the study is to clarify what conditions higher education change and the resistance of change. The study applies Giddens' concept of constraint and enablement of social structure (1984), and explores the relationship between agency, structural and cultural conditions. This study then explores Archer's Social Origins of Educational Systems (1984) by incorporating cultural aspect to explain restricting and enabling aspects of higher education change and taking an account of market-oriented trends in the last three decades.

The study argues that the combination of agency, structural and cultural approaches rather than single approach can explain higher education change. It proposes two causality models of higher education change. The first is the model in which structural and cultural elements determine agents' action. This change tends to fall in the routine adjustment.

The second model refers to agency condition which is isolated from structural condition. Culture elements may shape dominant agents and agents' choice of action as well as the range of the values underlined in proposed agenda. Such change may bring about dynamism.

The study examines a theoretical framework in the context of three "episodes" on the changing quality assurance mechanisms in England, Japan and New York State (see Giddens 1984, about "episodes" analysis). These analytical units - England; Japan; and New York State - do not correspond to political units because the UK and the US have the multiple higher education systems, each of which has different financial and to significant degree legal coordination. Those settings are comparable because they have commonly experienced expansion and shifted in the direction of the market force.

As the result of analysis, it becomes clear that three episodes fit in the first model. Those changes commonly occurred in the routine basis, rather than through detachment from the reproduction of existing structure. One of episodes presents the case in which existing cultural elements enabled higher education change.

The empirical part of the study was funded by the Daiwa Anglo-Japanese Foundation and Great Britain Sasakawa Foundation. This is the final paper of triple papers to disseminate the result of the project on higher education change.

Changing values in higher education

Hrubos, Ildikó

*Institute of Sociology and Social Policy, Corvinus University of Budapest
Budapest, HUNGARY*

Hrubos, Ildikó

*Institute of Sociology and Social Policy, Corvinus University of Budapest
Budapest, HUNGARY*

Keywords

Bologna Process, academic values, social equality, effectiveness, European values

The endlessness and relatively modest results of discussions about higher education, its task, its role in society and its transformation is a warning that something is missing from our thinking. The almost ten year old Bologna Process after the creation of its framework is now mature enough so we can focus our attention on the fundamental questions along with the debate over details and practical problems. It would be a good idea to hold clarifying talks about the values we should follow, their priorities of importance and we need to get over the current situation, when the main actors in higher education are confused, unable to be sure, making intellectual and emotional bonding harder for them. This leads to mistaken, dysfunctional decisions and processes. The lecture aims to contribute to this clarifying work. It is based the fact that higher education today, besides its intrinsic values (academic values, production and transfer of scientific knowledge), must undertake to follow the values expected from general education (social equality, effectiveness), and also has to face the transformation and expansion of its own value system, as comply with different labour-market's demands, institutional autonomy, responsibility to the society as a whole, preservation of European humanist traditions, meeting of different cultures, university as the engine of the economy, innovation etc.).

Curriculum Reform and New Textbooks in Turkey: Nationalism in an Interactive Education

Cayir, Kenan

Sociology, Istanbul Bilgi University Istanbul, Turkey

Keywords

Critical Thinking, Curriculum Reform, nationalism, Turkey

The Ministry of National Education of Turkey has undertaken a comprehensive school curriculum reform by the 2005-2006 academic years. The reform consisted of the introduction of new courses such as 'training for thinking' and new textbooks, all written on the basis of a 'student-centered approach'. The rationale behind the reform, as stated in official documents, involves an aim to adopt Turkey to the European Union on the one hand, and to the 'new information age' on the other. New textbooks, however, demonstrate that it is not easy to implement the reform in the face of Turkey's deep-seated nationalist and essentialist political culture. This paper explores the curriculum reform based on the discursive analysis of new primary school Turkish and Life Study textbooks (grades 2-5). A close analysis of these textbooks shows that they lead teachers to employ new interactive techniques in order to make students think upon the course themes. Nevertheless the content of questions and dialogues in new textbooks is still imbued with a narrow definition of nationalism and exclusive notion of essentialism. The European Union receives no mention in textbooks. The paper argues that these new textbooks should be revised in order to achieve a genuine reform to develop open-mindedness and democratic reasoning in both teachers and pupils.

Democratisation of School Education in Portugal

Sebastião, João

*sociology of education, Centre for Research and Studies in Sociology
Lisboa, Portugal*

Keywords

Democratisation of School Education, social inequalities in schooling, school attendance

Coming from almost a one and half century of slow growth in educational development, Portugal has considerably changed its patterns of educational attendance in compulsory and secondary education. However, this expansion was not made without difficulties, namely the long presence of school failure and drop out. Comparing two sets of data, one from the Census of 1971/1981/2001 with indicators about the search for school attendance, school performance and regional differentiation; and the other from researches about social inequalities in schooling carried in the early 1970's and 2000's, we will argue that school expansion in Portugal still keeps the pattern of a strongly selective educational system, even if clearly more open in its higher levels to different kind of students.

Discussion on Russia's participation in Bologna process

Goloseyeva, Anna

*Sociological, Russian State University for the Humanities
Moscow, Russia*

Keywords

Bologna Process, russia, education

At present time in Russia is actively realized the reform of high education, initiated by the Government. The goal of the reform ? transit of Russia to Bologna system ? caused a fierce dispute in the society.

Arguments of the yes part of the transit are obvious: we need to integrate into the world educational system, Russian diplomas would be accepted all over the world, we would adopt positive European tendencies and raise competitive capacity of Russian Universities. But the educational community still has a lot of doubts, especially about the ways the current reform goes. As a result a considerable part of professors and university leaders (especially the leading ones - Moscow State University and St. Petersburg State University) resist Bologna process and all groundless from their point of view innovations.

First of all there are a lot of protests against Universal State Exam ? the school final test, which is equated with entrance University exam. Many experts are sure that in Russian educational system where test system is new enough, this Test shouldn't be the only criteria of knowledge evaluation so far.

The newly instituted two-level system (Baccalaureat - Magistracy) is also very controversial. Bachelors will get diploma of high education only after 4 years of study: it isn't clear yet whether there is any demand for them on labor market and to what extent?

Of particular concern is the trend in many Russian universities to a reduction of graduate school, which runs counter to basic global trends.

The majority of experts believe that the entry into the Bologna system should begin with an increase in funding of universities, especially the leading classical universities. It is not possible to compete with Western universities with miserly budgets of universities and poverty teacher's salaries and students scholarships. Under such conditions the mobility of our teachers and students (this is one of the objectives of the Bologna program) could be ensured only by their departure abroad for permanent employment.

We are interested in examining pluses and minuses of Russian participation in Bologna process especially in comparison with the experience of other East European countries.

Earning or learning? Russian students' secondary employment research

Vorona, Mariya

Social anthropology and social work, Saratov State Technical University Saratov, Russia

Keywords

labour market, Higher Education, students

The significant social and economic changes, taking place in the Russian society during the last decades, have greatly and mostly affected higher education and labour market. These two social institutes are the intersection, where the phenomenon of a working student becomes apparent. The student - worker launched on the labour market today by the system of higher education from its each level, is a kind of conductor - translator between the labour market and the sphere of education. He/she introduces into the labour market values and skills acquired during his/her study, and on the other hand into the university world the spirit of reality and practical skills received in productive process. We need to question: who is a modern student - worker - a working student or a learning worker? Bearing in mind this question we carried out a research to get the answer to it. The methods of questionnaire (N=300) and biographic interview were used. The research was carried out among the students of three high schools of Saratov. Data, received during the research, shows that, trying to observe the balance and to adapt to the labour market, in overwhelming majority of cases the student makes the choice in favour of work with the purpose of satisfaction of material needs and accumulation of the labour experience. Besides, the biographic interviews have shown the ability of the modern student for the fast integration in the sphere of employment, his/her orientation on personal development and solution of his/her own material problems by means of realization of external and internal resources. This research can be a basis for the development of the recommendations aimed at improvement of the situation in the students' labour market.

Education and training for lone parents in the Republic of Ireland and Northern Ireland

Brereton, Bernadette

*Centre for Education and Diversity Research (CEDAR), Dundalk Institute of Technology
Co. Louth, Ireland*

van der Velden Lyons, Vera

*Centre for Education and Diversity Research (CEDAR), Dundalk Institute of Technology
Co. Louth, Ireland*

Keywords

education, Training, lone parents

In the Republic of Ireland, consistent poverty rates among one-parent families have increased from 27% in 2005 to 32.5% in 2006. Children in Northern Ireland are twice as likely to be living in poverty as children from other parts of the UK (Save the Children, 2008). These stark statistics form the background to this research project examining the education and training available to single mothers in Northern Ireland and the Republic of Ireland. The main problem facing many single mothers is the inability to escape the poverty-trap, regardless of being in or out of employment. The reality is that employment does not necessarily mean the cure to poverty. In fact, low educational attainment of lone parents is a major cause of high poverty rates as low educational qualifications are directly linked to low skilled and poorly paid jobs. Part-time and low paid jobs also lead to high exit rates. Encouraging single mothers to enter or return to education and training has been one objective of both governments (in NI and the ROI).

This paper will show that the majority of single mothers want to gain better qualifications by returning to training and education. However, the infrastructure to support single mothers into education is inadequate. Single mothers are faced with multiple difficulties when trying to access training and education. These range from not knowing where to start looking for a training course to a feeling of guilt and a severe lack of self-confidence which is very common in single-mothers who have been out of the labour market for a considerable length of time. Single mothers who have returned to education or training find it hard to continue or finish their studies due to added pressures, such as lack of finances, flexibility, transport, childcare and other supports. Subsequently, the dropout rate among single-mothers attending training courses is high.

These practical issues are a direct result of complex structural inequalities embedded in both societies which have led to women's inferior social and economic position which in turn has seriously disadvantaged single women on a number of levels.

Education for Active Democratic Citizenship: a Clash of Practices and Definitions' (European guidelines and national practices (on the example of Germany and Russia))

Zimenkova, Tatjana

Sociology, Bielefeld University

Germany, http://ekvv.uni-bielefeld.de/pers\_publ/publ/PersonDetail.jsp?personId=142288#142288

Keywords

conceptions of citizenship, Education for Active Democratic Citizenship, European and national conceptions

Education for (Active) Democratic Citizenship (EfADC) is an important conception in educational policies on the European Union and Council of Europe level, and educational policies and practices of the member states. It became an established and essential part of the school education in Europe.

The amount of funding and numbers of large-, medium- and small-scale school projects show that the development of EfADC is supported by international and national authorities, and it is actively practised by educational agents. The idea of Education for Active Democratic Citizenship is closely connected with learning to understand, support and practise democracy.

However, analysis of different guidelines and educational practices show that the definition of active democratic citizenship is rather diffuse when applied by different agents. It appears that the EfADC is not necessarily connected to the development of political positions. It is rather the case that some important political attitudes and topics, e.g. tolerance, gender equality, multiculturalism etc. are picked up, and others e.g. critical attitudes are seldom the focus of EfADC.

Citizenship education in Europe is challenged by many phenomena, e.g. internationalisation and migration, Europeanization and globalisation, transformation, etc. Educational policies and practices cannot but instrumentalise EfADC in order to handle these challenges. This however results in the situation that understanding and practices of EfADC are spread between patriotic education, community services, human rights education etc.

Is Education for Active Democratic Citizenship an empty term, filled with radically different substance, according to the agent using it? Are there national specifics, which differ significantly from international guidelines?

The presentation seeks to depict different meanings of 'Active Democratic Citizenship' in educational policies and practices, describing common European components of EfADC, and arguing about the national specifics (Russian and German) of EfADC. Descriptions of the implicit meanings attached to Education for Active Democratic Citizenship (on the European and national level) are used in order to describe some (international and national) paths and development trends in what is seen as an active citizen.

Educational choice at the end of primary school. Does the primary school matter?

Boone, Simon

*Department of Sociology, Ghent University
Ghent, Belgium*

Van Houtte, Mieke

*Department of Sociology, Ghent University
Ghent, Belgium*

Keywords

transition from primary to secondary education, social inequality, school effects, educational choice

The study of educational choices at the end of primary school has been a recurring research topic in European educational sociology. Driven by a concern about the possible social reproductive character of educational systems, sociologists have been trying to disentangle the determinants of educational choice. To achieve this goal they have focused mainly on the relative importance of ascribed versus achieved characteristics of pupils. Both have been shown to affect educational choices, suggesting that the decision that has to be made at the end of primary school does indeed create social inequalities between pupils. This finding has been explained using the framework of relative risk aversion, social capital and cultural capital. Although these perspectives have been very helpful to get insight in how social inequality originates when making educational choices, we suggest it might be interesting to investigate if characteristics of the primary school help us to explain the decision making process.

There is, in fact, a long-standing tradition in sociology to conceive of the characteristics of organizations as influencing its members. The culture, structure and composition of organizations are thought to influence the individuals pertaining to these organizations. In educational sociology, this field of research is known as school effectiveness research. Whereas this kind of research has, in the past, mainly linked school characteristics to achievement outcomes, we contend that it might also be interesting to investigate the potential influence of school composition, structure and culture on the school's pupils' choices.

It is our purpose to present an alternative model for the study of educational choice. A model that stresses the potential importance of school characteristics in a sociological explanation of educational decision making.

Educational inequalities and political representation in European countries; the case of England and Denmark

Kolokitha, Magdalini

*LLAKES, Institute of Education
London, UK*

Preston, John

*LLAKES, Institute of Education
London, UK*

Keywords

representation, social cohesion, educational inequalities

In this paper we aim to explore how students' perceptions and experiences of inequalities in educational settings influence active citizenship and social cohesion in different European countries. Our data derive from different educational settings e.g. lower and upper secondary, higher education and work based learning and aim to investigate whether such inequalities have been formally institutionalised.

Moreover, our research investigates both economic and cultural inequalities. The present paper, influenced by Fraser's theoretical contribution, will focus on redistribution, recognition and representation. Our approach is on the way interviewees attempt to interrogate, justify, explain, criticize or accept experiences and/or perceptions of inequalities and explore the relationship to active citizenship.

The research expands in five European countries and one Asian. In this paper will focus primarily to the English and Danish context. Within this context we aim to explore whether representation is perceived at local, national and/or global level. Are these perceptions/experiences of inequality seen to justify individuals' attitudes on representation? How far and in which ways do they affect social cohesion?

Our research utilises both quantitative and qualitative methods. At the first stage we conduct questionnaire surveys with learner groups in each institution to elicit information on the relationship between student background characteristics, learning environment, perceptions of inequality, and social attitudes. At the second stage we use first stage results as a sampling frame for selecting respondents for interviewing.

Effects of school organization on the unequal outcomes: A qualitative study in a primary school in Istanbul, Turkey

Somel, R. Nazli

*Educational Sciences, Helmut Schmidt University, Hamburg
Berlin, Germany*

Keywords

school organization, educational inequality, documentary method

The effect of students' social backgrounds, such as class, gender, or ethnicity, on their educational success, and in general, on unequal educational outcomes is a well-studied topic. However, how school organization influences unequal outcomes is less known. Here I will address this issue by analyzing the organization format of a primary school in Istanbul. During my field work of four months I conducted participant observation, as well as interviews with school administrators, teachers, students and parents, which I interpret using the documentary method.

In the school I studied, I identified two basic effects of the school organization: (1) It enforces social inequalities by sorting the students into different classes, specifically, at the 1st class based on signs of parents' social backgrounds, such as accent or outfit, and at the 6th class, based on the students' success during the previous five school years. This organization generates a significant difference among the classes, but also certain homogeneity within a class. Furthermore, teachers' attitudes differ in different classes. Also the students' educational expectations and future plans are strongly influenced by the class they are attending. (2) The school administration's (and in certain situations, the Education Ministry's) regulations regarding the use of school space and feasibilities also affect equality in a negative way. For example, all the activities, such as training for the general examinations, cultural activities, etc., take place after the school time. This leads to a strong disadvantage against the female students who are responsible for younger siblings or household work, and male students who are working after school. My results indicate the significant and active role of school organization in promoting unequal outcomes.

Equality matters: teachers' constructions of professional identities

Moreau, Marie-Pierre

Institute for Policy Studies in Education, London Metropolitan University London, United Kingdom

Maylor, Uvanney

Institute for Policy Studies in Education, London Metropolitan University London, United Kingdom

Keywords

equality, identity, race, Gender, teachers

In this paper, we explore teachers' construction of professional identities from a theoretical perspective, which draws on feminist and critical race theories. We look at how teachers discursively position themselves and are positioned by others as "professionals" and argue that "being a professional" is a contextual, societal construction, and one that is highly raced and gendered. We explore the implication of being positioned/ not positioned as such for individuals as well as for the school sector as a whole.

The focus of this particular paper is on teachers located in UK secondary schools, although our analysis resonates beyond these educational and territorial boundaries. We draw on data collected from two different projects and a corpus of over 50 semi-structured interviews with secondary school teachers: one project researching gender inequalities in the teaching profession; another project exploring the experiences of overseas-trained teachers. Both groups represent an interesting terrain for the exploration of equality matters. Traditionally, minority ethnic groups have been largely under-represented in the teaching profession in the UK. Women teachers have represented for many years now the largest component of the workforce, in the compulsory school sector, yet they are clearly under-represented in the most prestigious and rewarded posts.

Ethnicized Culture, Curricular Imagination, and Divisive Patterns of Schooling

Marada, Radim

*Sociology, Masaryk University
Brno, Czech Republic*

Keywords

inclusion, Exclusion, schooling, educational careers, ethnic culture

The paper critically addresses the idea that poor performance of Roma children in Czech (and other East Central European) schools is an inevitable consequence of a deep schism between the 'particular' cultural environment in which they are raised and the 'universal' culture of schooling within the education system. It is the different symbolic status of 'the particular' and 'the universal' which underlies the widespread view that while the dominant school culture is legitimate (natural), it is the Roma who should adjust to it. It is the 'particularity vs. universality' pattern of perception that also eventually congeals the assumed gap between the Roma and the dominant culture as a natural given, with serious practical consequences for, e.g., the attitude of teachers to Roma pupils or their parents (and vice versa), the government policies, etc.

Czech school curricula have, in the past two decades, gradually been weakening their explicit national basis and contents. Yet the patterns of educational inequalities along ethnic lines have continued. Now the argument has been that school curricula tend to test logical and abstract cognitive capacities, whereas the Roma children are predisposed (by the character of their early socialization) to think more intuitively and concretely. This has transposed the perceived difference between the dominant (universal) and the minority (particular) culture onto a less substantial level, yet it has even strengthened the sense of a cultural difference at the same time.

Within this framework, the paper pursues a number of empirical issues, like, e.g., the role of pre-school testing, the role of expert bodies (pedagogical counselors, etc.), the character of school curricula, the makeup of the school-class environment, etc. Along this way, it shows how 'Roma culture' gets reified and particularized through the school experience itself (even in the eyes of the Roma kids and their parents), and how this affects the (dis)integration of Roma children in and through the educational system. The paper is based on an ongoing extensive empirical research project EDUMIGROM which focuses on educational careers of Roma youth in the contemporary Czech Republic, Hungary, Romania, and Slovakia.

Europe's challenges in education and culture in 21st century: Consulting Theodor W. Adorno

Klinkisch, Eva

*Sociology, University of Hohenheim
Stuttgart, Germany*

Buß, Eugen

*Sociology, University of Hohenheim
Stuttgart, Germany*

Keywords

Adorno, Critical Thinking, education, maturity

In August 2009 it will be 40 years that Theodor W. Adorno died. His thoughts shaped discussions in social science as well as in whole post-war society in the second half of the past century and were debated as fervid as controversial. Adorno radically stressed the importance of maturity, responsibility and critical thinking, of an extensive critical awareness of the present and also referred emphatically on the role of education and culture. Our days, modern democracies not only in Europe pretend to offer best conditions to live in freedom and emancipation and to allow their citizens individual selfhood, fulfilment and autonomy. In this context, education is emphasized regularly being one crucial factor for Europe's welfare now and in the future. At first glance, Adornos demands often seem to be fulfilled, his pessimism is called to be disproved by recent history. But are his thoughts really those of the past and not useful getting insights in problems of our societies these days? Could our view on variant tasks in education and its systems be enriched by studying Adorno?

In order to figure out selected dimensions including maturity, autonomy, emancipation, culture and education and their impact on subject and society, this contribution turns towards an extract of Adornos works, "Theory of `half-education`" and "Education to Maturity". The explanations are based on Adornos general way of thinking which is to be briefly presented as well. Thereupon it will be asked whether, how far and why implications could be derived considering urgent educational challenges. This is accomplished exemplarily by discussing some current issues of vocational education in Germany. It will be shown that Adornos statements can give fruitful impulses and that they do matter just now. This paper shall provide a basis to discuss social challenges in Europe of 21st century in a constructive way as well as in critical awareness - inspired by Adorno.

Exit Exams - neither a panacea nor a curse

Cosentino de Cohen, Clemencia

Program for Evaluation and Equity Research (PEER), The Urban Institute Washington, DC, USA

Keywords

comparative research, student achievement, Student Examinations

Testing regimes at the end of secondary school vary greatly throughout European educational systems, despite the push to harmonize certification requirements across jurisdictions. Testing efforts which rely on different types of exams to certify completion of secondary school and often to give access to university studies may have important consequences for student learning, future life chances, and social inequality. This research presents a comparative analysis of the relationship between testing regimes and student achievement. Using a micro dataset created from individual records of students tested in the Third International Mathematics and Science Study and relying on a thorough qualitative review of testing regimes this paper explores the relationship between exit exams (particularly external and high stakes) and student achievement. A guiding concern of this research is whether exit exams are associated with greater inequalities in learning outcomes, signaling that inequalities may be generated by, or maintained through, existing examination regimes. Unlike prior research on this topic, which generally models the relationship between exams at the end of secondary school and achievement in 7th or 8th grade, this work aligns achievement and testing appropriately: both measured at the end of secondary school. Results of multivariate linear models (weighted least squares and quantile regressions) indicate that external exit exams have a small positive association with student achievement. Exams that are high stakes are negatively associated with student achievement, unless those exams are external. Exit or graduation exams that are external and high stakes display a positive association with student achievement. Against expectations, the results suggest that the influence of exams is not greater among higher achieving students. On the contrary, exams may have a stronger (and positive) effect among lower achievers. Also contrary to expectations, external exit exams are not associated with higher variance in student achievement. The paper concludes with a discussion of the implications of these results, particularly in the context of possible inequalities in student achievement. The paper also includes a discussion of methodological challenges encountered when attempting not to model using the nation as the unit of analysis. The nation proved to be an inescapable dimension of analysis.

Expansion and contraction. The development of higher education in Eastern Europe between 1950 and 2000

Reisz, Robert D.

*Institut für Hochschulforschung, Martin Luther Universität Halle Wittenberg
Germany,*

Stock, Manfred

Institut für Hochschulforschung, Martin Luther Universität Halle Wittenberg Lutherstadt Wittenberg, Germany

Keywords

systems theory, new institutionalism, Eastern Europe, higher education expansion

Comparative research in the sociology of education, based on the new institutionalist 'world polity' approach finds that the expansion of education has universalistic character. Considering these research results, our study compares the expansion of higher education in Eastern and Western Europe in the period between 1950 and 2000. We demonstrate that in the Eastern European countries there existed a specific pattern of inclusion, different from the global model. Here, phases of expansion and contraction come one after another. During the period of state socialism, governments tried to subject higher education development to political programs. These programs were results of different and sometimes even conflicting ideologies. These conflicts finally led in all socialist countries to a halt of higher education expansion. During the post-socialist transformations the expansion of higher education in Eastern Europe is approaching that in the Western part of the continent.

We will start by introducing shortly the results of the new institutionalist approach regarding the expansion of higher education world-wide. We will follow by discussing the particularities of the Eastern European case. A systematic analysis based on time-series cross section regression models will also support our thesis that the case of Eastern European higher education does not fit the new institutionalist pattern of continuous world-wide expansion. Finally we will try to find a theoretical support based on Luhmann's theory of social systems for the differences between the expansion of higher education in Eastern and Western Europe.

Experiences of Textbook Scanners: Is Scanning a way for Transformation and a Tool for Human Rights Education?

Bagli, Melike Turkan

Faculty of Educational Sciences, Ankara University ANKARA, TURKEY

Keywords

textbooks, human rights education, promoting human rights

The Project for Promoting Human Rights in Elementary and Secondary School Textbooks which began in May 2002 was carried out by the History Foundation. Its aim was to determine the problematic content regarding human rights in the context of school textbooks and formulate recommendations for their improvement. In this project over 190 textbooks were scanned and identified problematic content regarding human rights. In the year of 2005, paradigm in which the curriculum was based on had been totally changed by Ministry of Education to 'constructivist approach'; therefore new textbooks were published. In 2007, History Foundation started to second phase of the project for the new textbooks. As in the first project, scanning process was planned to be carried out with the support of 'volunteers' who were willing to scan textbooks. University students in Ankara and 'stanbul (These students were mostly undergrad students from the field of history, sociology, psychology, educational sciences, Turkish Literature, etc.) were invited to be in the scanning process. Before the scanning process was started, scanners were trained in order to be able to make them skillful in scanning. Scanning process is that the process has a unique aspect -which is- it requires them as scanners to identify the textbook parts contrary to the human rights principles, however at the same time it is a kind of opportunity to transform them in the way of internalization of the human rights principles. After the first project, some of the informal feedbacks received from the scanners revealed that the process of scanning through the eye-glasses of human rights made them more conscious about this issue, skillful in identifying and describing problems regarding human rights in media, educational contexts and daily life. Semi-structured interviews with the scanners in 2008 also showed that through scanning textbooks, scanners have become more well-informed in terms of human rights. The results also revealed that scanning textbooks is also a way for educating under-grad students for human rights and scanning textbooks is a way of human rights education.

Family school investment and schooling context: at the crossroads of family and school strategies

Diogo, Ana

Sciences of Education, Universidade dos Açores [University of Azores] Ponta Delgada, Portugal

Keywords

schooling contexts, Family investment on school, School-Family Relationship

The aim of this paper is to analyse how family school investment is affected by the schooling contexts. The framework of this analysis is the idea of the complex nature of the relationship between families and schools.

Being aware that the attended school context is a key ingredient to make a difference in children's school careers, school (or class) choice is, increasingly, at the centre of family strategies. Furthermore, research has shown that family strategies can work in symbiosis with school strategies for students' recruitment and with policies focused on schools' autonomy.

The idea that the schooling context is not neutral (interfering with the investment made by individuals) has been stressed by the sociology of education at least since the 70s, through the school effects' studies. These studies have essentially tried to show that schools make a difference, regardless family influence. This approach was developed as a critique to macrosociological studies that explained family school investment from a culturalist perspective or from the theory of rational action.

Anyway, these perspectives reveal to be unable to capture the complex phenomena of the relationship and mutual influence between schools and families. Alternatively, we are interested to stress that families interfere in school characteristics and dynamics, triggering reactions and strategies in the schools, which, in turn, feedback an impact on those dynamics. Thus, the school context works as a crossroad between the particular interests and strategies of families and schools.

We tried to research the relationship between family school investment (particularly the expectations of continuation of studies) and the social composition of schools and their classes; the involvement of young people and their parents in school work, teachers' pedagogical practice; and the school organizational context.

The results come from two researches made in Portugal (at the archipelago of the Azores) and concern the end of compulsory schooling. The first, already completed, included a survey of 409 youngsters and 119 parents, and documental research, as well (Diogo, 2008). The second, still ongoing, includes a survey of 1913 students (Diogo et al., 2008). Data analysis is quantitative, involving the use of descriptive statistics and logistic regression analysis.

Female or Male Teacher: A Determinante of Gender-specific Differences in Primary School Achievement

Bacher, Johann

Department for Empirical Social Research, Johannes Kepler University of Linz Linz, Austria

Leitgöb, Heinz

Department for Empirical Social Research, Johannes Kepler University of Linz Linz, Austria

Keywords

multilevel modeling, student-teacher gender interaction effect, gender gap in school performance

In the meantime, gender gaps in school performance are an empirically confirmed and therefore widely accepted fact. Particularly regarding the reading competences, girls outperform boys in virtually all countries participating in large-scale international studies like PIRLS at the primary and PISA at the secondary educational level. Investigating the causes of these gender-specific differences comprehensively requires besides individual determinants the inclusion of contextual influences, containing amongst others teacher characteristics. Therefore our exploratory focus highlights the effect of teacher gender on the reading performance of girls and boys.

The existing literature suggests that a match between student and teacher gender has a positive impact on the educational outcome, which can be explained by role-model, unintended behavioral and active preference effects. Vice versa, a gender-mismatch can lead to a phenomenon called stereotype threat which can retard the academic identification of students and subsequently their performance (Dee, 2005) as well as unintended and intended discrimination by the teacher. However, it has to be mentioned that the results of the available empirical literature are decidedly mixed.

Methodologically, most of the studies apply OLS regression to model a student-teacher interaction effect while including a number of control variables from different levels of aggregation (student, class, school). By using the Austrian 2006 PIRLS dataset, we follow a multilevel modeling approach to account for the hierarchical structure of the data (students nested within classes nested within schools) and further integrate the relevant variables of interest at the appropriate level to avoid statistical and conceptual problems (Hox, 2002: 3). Consequently, we create a cross-level interaction effect between student and teacher gender by building a random intercept random slope model with student gender at the individual and teacher gender at the class level as well as a number of control variables, selected by theoretical aspects.

To conclude, our aim is to shed light on the effect of teacher gender on the reading competences of students at the end of primary schooling by (1) trying to provide a coherent model based on a solid theoretical foundation and (2) using the appropriate methodological tools for analysing hierarchical data.

Fragmentation of higher education in Brazil: new public higher education in Piauí

Carvalho e Silva, Willame

SOCIOLOGY DEPARTMENT, ISCTE - Instituto Superior de Ciências do Trabalho e da Empresa
Lisboa, Portugal

Keywords

Higher Education, new public, fragmentation, background new public higher education.

The study "fragmentation of higher education in Brazil: new public higher education in Piauí", is to identify and characterize the profile, paths and cultural distinctions, social and economic of the new public higher education-of Piauí Brazil, which takes place from the process of democratization in the area of higher education in the mid-1990s, the result of a government policy of opening to private initiative. Research has identified as a major problem if there is separation and division in terms of background, offices and lifestyle among the new characters of higher education (students of Institutions newly established private) and public courses in the traditional elite of public universities of education higher in Piauí,. The main hypothesis is to say that the new public higher education are from the popular classes, who have suffered the process of "deferred success" (Vieira, 2007:144), consisting of young with irregular route school, with a late entry in the system higher education, older than average public university. From a sociodemographic point of view, it identifies a significant number of new characters from cities in the State of Piauí, featuring an internal migration in search of better living conditions, health, education and housing in the capital of the state of Piauí, Teresina . The study aims also to identify the distinctions between traditional and new public system education, in terms of probable ways to professional futures conditions. This research is a contribution to support future policy-making in the field of higher education in Brazil.

Higher Education and Development - Students of the Portuguese Speaking Countries (PALOP) Diaspora: Brain Drain or Brain Gain

Faria, Margarida

Human Sciences, IICT

Lisboa, Portugal

Bénard da Costa, Ana

ISCTE, Centro de Estudos Africanos

Lisboa, Portugal

Keywords

Higher Education, Migration, Development

The current communication describes a research project on students from Portuguese Speaking African Countries (PALOP) pursuing their university degrees in Portugal. Through the example of Angola and Mozambique cases, the presenters will analyse individual and family trajectories and how they influence the decision of going abroad together with the choice of a certain destination (particularly the choice of studying in Portugal).

The study also attempts to interpret these strategies and trajectories as inscribed in these countries' recent developments in the post-colonial times (in both post-independency and post-socialism contexts) and how these dynamic contexts keep determining the specific conditions in which such individual and collective initiatives take place.

Migrant capacities such as higher education, training, specialized skills and knowledge (human capital) combined with social capital (networks, norms and values that facilitate cooperation among individuals and groups), affective capital (commitment and good-will derived from emotional engagement in personal projects and financial capital (savings, investments, remittances) are amongst the most influential factors in making development projects' effective and sustainable. They are also crucial for the countries' political and democratic stability. In order to create such beneficial conditions, stake-holders and policy-makers need to create situations for these migrants' return to their home countries, converting brain drain into brain gain.

Higher education in the world countries: the analysis of international statistics and the results of the global rankings in education

Bershadszkaya, Margarita

*Department for Innovation activities support, Modern University for Humanities
Moscow, Russia*

Karpenko, Olga

*vice-president, Modern University for Humanities
Moscow, Russia*

Keywords

webometrics, university ranking, Russian education system, distance education, mega-universities

Higher education in the world countries: the analysis of international statistics and the results of the global rankings in education.

The purpose of the study is to define the strengths and weaknesses of the Russian educational system in the context of international indicators. It gives the possibility to compare the positive and negative aspects of development of national educational systems and to identify the global trends of educational development in the world.

Besides the data issued annually by the UNESCO Institute for Statistics, in the analysis there were considered the results of the global ratings characterizing the basic aspects of world education.

The main criteria for comparative analysis:

- 1) The index of education and the level of population covered by higher education.
- 2) Number of students in higher education, characterizing the scale of development of higher education in the country.
- 3) The export of education as a reflection of the current reputation of the national educational system in the international community.
- 4) Rating of availability and accessibility of higher education in world countries.
- 5) World university rankings 2008-2009: the Academic Ranking of World Universities (ARWU) - 2009; the Times World University Rankings - 2008; Webometrics Ranking of World Universities -2009.
- 6) The results of the performance of 15-year-old students in the Program for International Student Assessment (PISA- 2006): the state of education at the secondary level as the foundation for higher education.
- 7) The level of development of distance education based on Information Communication Technologies (ICT). The assessment scale of mega-universities? educational activity in the country was the basis for the comparison.

Based on the analysis of quantitative indicators, shown by charts and graphs, there were selected 16 countries-leaders. The analysis has allowed to estimate the place of Russia in the world educational space and to determine the prospects for further development of the Russian system of higher education.

Higher Education Success and Failure in Portugal: The Confirmation of School Trajectories and of the Privileged Few

Seixas, Ana Maria

*Faculty of Psychology and Education Sciences, University of Coimbra
Coimbra, Portugal*

Ferreira, Claudino

*Centre for Social Studies, University of Coimbra
Coimbra, Portugal*

Mendes, José

*Centre for Social Studies, University of Coimbra
Coimbra, Portugal*

Campos, Alfredo

*Centre for Social Studies, University of Coimbra
Coimbra, Portugal*

Seabra Santos, Aline

*Centre for Social Studies, University of Coimbra
Coimbra, Portugal*

Keywords

higher education success and failure, school trajectories, economic inequalities, Portuguese higher education system

In this paper we present the results of an ongoing research project concerning higher education success and failure in Portugal. Based on a sample of students from three major higher education institutions, University of Coimbra, Technical University of Lisbon and ISCTE, we propose a model of prediction of success and failure using a multinomial logistic regression.

The success and failure model is based on two dependent variables: repetition and grades obtained. For both variables some predictors are common: the pair institution/course; grades obtained in high school and higher education access grades. The differences arise in the role of family educational capital and working experience for repetition and having a scholarship for the grades obtained.

Contrary to the results published in most studies in the field, gender and class origin don't play a role in success and failure in higher education in Portugal. As highly unequal and selective, with access by numerus clausus, the Portuguese higher education system homogenizes its students, structuring inequalities on success and failure on the pre-university trajectories and the need to work in order to meet economic expenses. The economic factor is the only extraneous predictor of higher education success and failure in Portugal, in a self-sustained and self-reproductive system, impermeable to major structural changes on the Portuguese society. The morphological expansion of the Portuguese higher education system was based widely on the recruitment of middle and higher classes' students and on the few from lower middle and working class academically adapted to the demands of the educational system.

The paper concludes with some reflexions on the importance of attending to the institutional and course effects on success and failure and the promotion of proactive monitoring procedures, self and external evaluation of pedagogical practices and the central role of scholarships and economic support to mitigate inequalities and promote academic persistence.

Hiring from within: institutional inbreeding and its consequences at Russian universities (empirical evidence from Saint-Petersburg universities)

Sivak, Elizaveta

Sociology, Higher School of Economics

Russia, <http://lia.hse.ru/person/189897.html#>

Yudkevich, Maria

Economics, Higher School of Economics

Russia, <http://lia.hse.ru/person/65220.html#>

Keywords

academic communication, academic mobility, inbreeding

Among various faculty employment policies in universities two polar modes could be distinguished. The first is hiring at external academic labor market. The second is a strategy of hiring 'from within' - attaching academically oriented students to university, 'bringing up' students to entry-level teachers, hiring university's own graduates. Such hiring practices are commonly known as inbreeding.

Different strategies of reproduction of faculty are interesting not only in itself but also for their effects on local university norms and standards and individual faculty careers. There are a large number of studies which focus on inbreeding consequences (Eels and Cleveland 1935, Hargens and Farr 1973, Eisenberg and Wells 2000, etc.). While extensive empirical evidence shows that inbreeding negatively affect faculty promotion, academic productivity and professional recognition, inbreeding is widely accepted in some national academic systems.

Our paper considers an inbreeding phenomenon at Russian universities. We use data of a 2007 survey of faculty working at 28 St.Petersburg higher education institutions which have undergraduate programs in economics, to estimate the impact of inbreeding on faculty's individual careers, publication strategies, structure of social contacts.

We found that inbreeding is considered as normal practice by faculty members. Chair heads also suggest that university should hire their own graduates at the first place. It should be mentioned, that this group's opinion is of particular importance as heads can form an employment politics by themselves and play as gatekeepers. Results of our study demonstrate that the most common type of published work is a publication in non-refereed journals published by this university. 'Insiders' (low-mobile faculty who work at the same university since graduation) publish in local journals more often than 'outsiders' and less often in Russian-wide academic journals. Professional communication of insiders basically is taken place in a circle of their close colleagues - research mentor, chair and chair colleagues, and less often insiders communicate with colleagues outside their university. We also demonstrate (that is consistent with previous findings in the field) a significant difference in effort and time allocation between teaching, research and services for insiders and outsiders.

Identifying factors influencing school success in lower- and upper-secondary Romanian schools

Haragus, Paul

*Faculty of Sociology and Social Work, Babes-Bolyai University
Cluj-Napoca, Romania*

Damean, Diana

*Faculty of Sociology and Social Work, Babes-Bolyai University
Cluj-Napoca, Romania*

Roth, Maria

*Faculty of Sociology and Social Work, Babes-Bolyai University
Cluj-Napoca, Romania*

Iovu, Mihai

*Faculty of Sociology and Social Work, Babes-Bolyai University
Cluj-Napoca, Romania*

Keywords

Romania, inequalities, school success, ecological perspective

Statement of problem: Our paper is based on the outcome of a national survey for The social diagnosis of school success using the social measure of school success project. Theoretical background: The article is based on the eco-interactive-developmental perspective, according to which the balance of risk and protective factors experienced by students in their social environments influences their level of school success. The core dimensions identified by this theory and supported by field research can be grouped into 5 main domains: individual, family, friends, school, and neighbourhood (community). Method: A Romanian version of School Success Profile questionnaire, designed at the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill (USA), was applied to a nationally representative sample of 2700 students, aged 13-18, and enrolled in the compulsory educational system. The purpose of the instrument is to identify the adolescents most likely to encounter school-risk situations. Results: Data revealed significant associations between demographic variables (ethnicity, residence, gender) and respondents' school performance. Moreover, each of the 5 main domains (and dimensions like Trouble Avoidance, Optimism, Adjustment, Home Academic Environment, Parent Educational Support, Friend Support, Teacher Support, School Safety, and Neighbourhood Safety) had a significant effect. Conclusions: Even though all the above-mentioned factors have been controlled, residence (rural), ethnicity (Roma) and gender (male) still have a greater negative effect on children's academic performance, thus raising the question on how these inequalities can be tackled.

Imagined futures among youth from immigrant families: vocational choice, expected and aspired mobility(ies)

Mateus, Sandra

*Centro de Investigação e Estudos de Sociologia, CIES/ISCTE
Lisbon, Portugal*

Keywords

Youth, ethnicity, transition, Expectations, aspirations

A recent demographic study showed that in 2007 immigrant parents' newborns made up 10% per cent of all babies delivered in Portugal. Portugal is progressively becoming a country marked by ethnic diversity and cultural heterogeneity, where the children of immigrants are participant segment, representing increasingly a 'measure' of sedentarization and integration processes of the immigrant population.

The communication will focus in youngsters from immigrant families and their expected and aspired patterns of mobility(ies), by analysing, by one hand, their structural context and conditions of existence (educational achievement, social class, ethnic background and gender) and, by the other hand, their educational and professional expectations and aspirations, considering that those are privileged for the discussion of the objective and subjective conditions of integration, participation and citizenship exercise in the Portuguese society. Vocational decisions are conceived within a structural context where institutional, social and ethnic background act and constrain, but also emerge from individual and subjective strategies, which can be identified and interpreted.

The discussion will be supported with data from a mixed method research carried out in 2007, involving about 1200 9th grade native and descendant of immigrant students (age 14-19), inquired in 13 schools with a highly diverse clientele, placed in 3 regions (Lisboa, Setúbal e Faro); and interviews made to 24 young descendants of immigrants, 7 parents, 16 educational agents (professors, executive responsible, psychologists in charge of the vocational process).

Will be examined the educational and professional projects, the trends of students educational track choice and the vocational orientation processes underlying, the professional universes of reference hold by the family and friends, as much as the general representations and attitudes about the future and transition towards adulthood among youth with immigrant background.

Based in the imagined life course and in the present biography, it will be discussed the ways in which, in the compulsory schooling conclusion context, and transition for higher education or for work, ethnic, social and cultural belonging contribute for the definition of school and career choices, giving place to individual destinies and broader social configurations.

Increased Involvement of Parents in School Activity and in their Children's Education

Agabrian, Mircea

Sociology and Social Work, "1 Decembrie 1918" University of Alba Iulia Alba Iulia, Romania

Keywords

attitudes, education, teachers, parents, school

The paper presents the results from a case study undertaken in five different pre-university education institutions in the County of Alba (Romania) which prefaced the implementation of the school-"family"-community partnership programs as far as it ensured the agreement between the programs and the particularities of each comprehensive or high school.

Purpose and objective of the research was to find out the parents' and teachers' positions towards the changing nature of the school-family relationship within the democratic society.

Data were analysed through hierarchical cluster analysis and multidimensional scaling, with the help of which we identified easier the tendencies of the subjects' options and attitudes. In this way, the investigation revealed also the domains imposing a sustained activity of the Action Team for Partnerships set up in every school to implement the partnership programs.

Intercultural education for all? An investigation of the impact of school composition on intercultural education.

Agirdag, Orhan

*Department of Sociology, CuDOS, Ghent University
Gent, Belgium*

Van Houtte, Mieke

*Department of Sociology; CuDOS, Ghent University
Gent, Belgium*

Keywords

segregation, multicultural education, ethnic school composition, primary education

In different European countries, the growing ethnic and cultural diversity has incited sociologists of education to investigate multicultural education as a means of creating equal educational opportunities for students from diverse backgrounds. Moreover, changes in the national educational systems are carried out to prepare children for a multicultural society. For example, in Belgium where this study is conducted, the government decided to integrate 'intercultural education' as a part of the final attainment levels and development goals. Nowadays, official documents explicitly prescribe intercultural education to be 'a task for all schools'. Therefore, theoretically all schools should provide intercultural education.

However, little is known about the amount of intercultural education in different schools. Previous ethnographic research, mainly from the USA, has pointed out that in predominantly white schools racial and ethnic diversity are taboo topics. The discourse of teachers and school staff in such 'white' schools is described as 'color-blind'. Since these studies are limited by small samples (as they are conducted in few schools) and lack to include any quantification of inter/multicultural education, we go beyond these shortcomings in our research.

The aim of our study is to investigate whether the amount of intercultural education in primary schools is linked to the social-economic and ethnic composition of the school. More specifically, we will test the relationship between the ethnic and SES school composition and the amount of intercultural education that is provided by teachers and the amount of multicultural activities as reported by school principals.

This study is based on data which were gathered from 68 schools in Flanders. Our sample consists of all school principals of these schools and 600 teachers. For teachers, a mean score of 'intercultural education' is calculated for each school by aggregating the score of provided intercultural education by individual teachers, after it is stated that the intercultural practices are shared by teachers within a school. The analysis is based on multivariate regression.

On theoretical grounds, we expect that the provided levels of intercultural education positively correlate with the amount of non-native pupils in a school and negatively correlate with the SES-composition of the student body.

Interculturalism and Cultural Translation as key-concepts of Transnationalism of Education

Kosmider, Anna

Faculdade de Ciências Humanas e Sociais, Universidade Fernando Pessoa Porto, Portugal

Seixas, Paulo

Faculdade de Ciências Humanas Sociais, Universidade Fernando Pessoa Porto, Portugal

Keywords

Cultural Translation, European Culture., Interculturalism, Multiculturalism

With the purpose of the area of transnacionalism of education and comparison between systems I present this proposal of communication which will be included in the doctoral project in Anthropology. It intends to compare socio-educational processes in Poland and Portugal with objective to show new cultures of citizenship, in particular the European Culture.

The aim of the paper is to discuss some of the key concepts which will enable to get to know the new socio-cultural board where educational processes should be understood and well defined.

The concepts of Interculturalism and Cultural Translation are the ones that will be studied.

The discussion of these concepts will be done according to the perspectives of Ribeiro, Asad, Ingold, Jordan and the others.

As far as Interculturalism is concerned one of the most important aspect to be analyzed is its relation with multiculturalism.

Interculturalism in sociological and anthropological perspective implicates such concepts like boundaries and flows.

The concept of Cultural Translation can be understood at least at two levels. Cultural Translation in Anthropology reveals the place of the Anthropologist and epistemic authority of the translator of the cultures. The second perspective is even more significant given the fact that it is discussed as the contemporary process between people of different cultures.

Internationalization of Higher Education in Taiwan: Rationales, Strategies and Responses

Ma, Ai-hsuan

Sociology, National Chengchi University Taiwan,

Keywords

Higher Education, Globalization, International Student, Internationalization, Taiwan

Owing to globalization and the development of mass higher education, many countries endeavor to internationalize their higher education systems in order to attract more foreign students, and an increasing number of students pursue tertiary education overseas. In the research into such phenomena, Taiwan deserves special attention due to its rich experience in student migration and unique historical context. The purpose of the paper is to examine the course and the context of Taiwan's policy transformation in the internationalization of higher education, and the ways international students in Taiwan perceive and respond to such policy changes.

Although Taiwan has a long history of recruiting overseas ethnic Chinese students to study, only in the recent years did it undergo a string of policy reforms to internationalize its higher education system and to rigorously recruit international students from around the world. Under government policies, international students in Taiwan are categorized into two sub-groups: 'foreign students' and 'compatriot and expatriate students' respectively, and such distinction is made roughly along the line of ethnicity but not necessarily nationality. These two groups of international students are recruited and overseen by different government agencies and university divisions, and they follow different policy guidelines and are supported by different funding resources. With the policy reforms in progress, this differentiation begins to receive challenges and starts to become obscure. This paper is based on a 2-year study on the internationalization of higher education and international student mobility in Taiwan. Through document analysis and in-depth interviews with government officials, policy makers, university administrators, and international students, this paper analyzes the trajectory of policy reforms and the rationales of the Taiwan government and universities for the internationalization of higher education on the one hand, and how such policy transformation may affect the perceptions and experiences of international students in Taiwan on the other.

Legitimacy of Public Education: Recent Shifts in Comparative Perspective

Rosenmund, Moritz

Departement of Research and Development, University of Applied Sciences, School of Education Zürich, Switzerland

Keywords

Legitimacy, standards, education system, curriculum making

In 17th and 18th century Europe education was firmly based on religious beliefs. In the 19th and early 20th century it became closely related with nation-building and anchored in the nation-state. With comparative educational achievement studies (TIMSS, PISA), the development of quality indicators for national school systems by international organizations (OECD, UNESCO) and an increasing emphasis on feedback-on-results management of national education systems legitimacy of public education systems has become, since the late 20th century, a core issue of current debates on public education worldwide. The question arises to what extent 'rationalized' evaluation systems will replace nation-specific criteria and procedures of assessing education systems, making cross-national comparison, besides comparison of students' achievements and comparative research on the determinants of varying efficiency, obsolete.

Drawing from a comparative study on curriculum development in four European countries and one U.S. state in the 1990s the paper starts with a re-analysis of survey data relating to criteria for legitimacy of content standards, i.e. curricular norms. It is argued (1) that three general referents for the assignment of legitimacy ? scientific rationality, societal functions of education, and the self-referential character of education ? may be distinguished and (2) that variation in national patterns can convincingly be interpreted in terms of specific national conditions and situations at the time when the curricula were developed. In subsequent sections the paper discusses consequences of the shift from legitimacy of school systems based on particular national criteria to norms set by international organizations for both modes of regulation of public education and comparative sociology of education.

National Truth of PISA: The OECD PISA Study in Finnish media discourses

Rautalin, Marjaana

Department of Social Research, University of Tampere Tampere, Finland

Keywords

World Polity Theory, PISA, OECD, Global Governance, Finnish Education Policy

The aim of this paper is to scrutinize how global policy models especially in the area of education are co-opted and brought into effect at nation state level. As a case study I analyse different ways in which the OECD PISA Study (Programme for International Student Assessment) is discussed in Finnish media. The main questions posed to the data are: what are the discourses PISA is connected to in the media discussion? What are the interested parties involved in the texts? What are the objectives different parties pursue? What are the premises the arguments presented in the texts are based on? What are the tensions like between various discourses? By analyzing the media text as discussed above I aim to delineate the socially constructed national truth of PISA, how it is linked with Finnish education, and what role the OECD plays through PISA in Finnish education policy formation.

Organizational identities and the quality processes in three Russian universities

Pavluytkin, Ivan

Laboratory for Institutional Analysis of Economic Reforms, State University - Higher School of Economics Moscow, Russian Federation

Keywords

organizational identity, university change, quality

The notion of quality in higher education has become on the most popular and problematic in academic discourse. There is no doubt nowadays that quality is something essential in spite of lots of meanings and no clear definition. Nevertheless, it has become an organizational variable, which can be affected and manipulated in various ways. Our study is focused on the interpretation of quality process development in Russia and its effects on university life and change. Institutional vision of university organization requires organizational identity to be one of the core concepts in interpretation of organizational change. The central question for the study is how the work on quality in large Russian universities is effected by their organizational identities?

According to classical definition of organizational identity it is "a self reflective question" (Who are we anyway as organization?) Identity captures the essential features of an organization. Those features could be summarized in three major dimensions: organizational identity is a) what is taken by organization members to be central to the organization; b) what makes the organization distinctive from other organizations; and c) what is perceived by members to be a enduring or continuing feature linking the present organization with the past (and presumably the future).

According to different perspectives this definition was criticized to some extent and reconceptualized as being enduring and influenced by institutional environment. So we are going to interpret the difference in perceptions on quality process in relation with difference in identity perception as inside and outside frame of university administration.

Our analysis is based on 15 in-depth interviews with university administrations (university chancellors, vice-chancellors, deans) from 3 universities located in Moscow, Saint-Petersburg and V. Novgorod. They were held from the end of the 2008 and till the beginning of the 2009. Besides we analyzed university publications and materials: strategy, self evaluation, quality recommendations.

One of the result is that there are three categories forming identity perceptions which influence the difference in work on quality: relevance, common language and correspondence.

Overcoming educational inequalities: Differences among mixture, streaming and inclusion

Puigvert, Lidia

*Sociological Theory, Universitat de Barcelona
Barcelona, Spain*

Aubert, Adriana

*Sociological Theory, Universitat de Barcelona
Barcelona, Spain*

Engels, Laura

222, University of Nottingham Nottingham, United Kingdom

Mircea Alexiu, Teodor

Facultatea de Sociologie si Psihologie, Universitatea de Vest din Timisoara Timisoara, Romania

Keywords

European Research, inclusion, educational success, efficiency

As part of the Sixth Framework Programme of the European Union, the Includ-ed Project: Strategies for inclusion and social cohesion in Europe from education is an integrated project (2006-2011) is the only integrated project focused on schooling education. INCLUD-ED is aimed at analyzing educational strategies that contribute to overcome inequalities and promote social cohesion, and educational strategies that generate social exclusion, particularly focusing on vulnerable and marginalized groups. Based on the findings obtained during the first year, an exhaustive review of European educational systems, three different ways to organize students and the available human resources in schools have been identified: mixture, streaming and inclusion. In the meantime, diversity is a predominant reality in European educational systems; schools need to find different strategies to cope with the new reality and the prospects ahead. The diversity found in the student body creates new challenges for teachers as they must respond to the students' diverse needs. Nevertheless, the organizational models of students and human resources that have been developed to address this situation are not always inclusive educational strategies. This paper clarifies the different responses and their effects on the school.

Mixture refers to traditional classrooms based on mixed ability classrooms, all the students with only one teacher per class. Mixture has been proven not to be able to respond appropriately to the students' diverse needs. A teacher alone cannot attend all the students' diverse needs. As a result, in many educational systems streaming measures were introduced. Streaming usually involves an increase of human resources (additional teachers) in order to separate those students who experience major learning difficulties. Thus, it entails organization of students according to ability levels, producing negative effects on instrumental areas learning for all students. Inclusionary measures are presented as an alternative model to mixture and streaming. Inclusion is defined as the organization of students in heterogeneous groups with additional resources drawing from the human resources available in the schools. Different practical examples of this model will be provided.

Parents Associations, Social Reproduction and Interculturality: Notes from a Sociological Research

Silva, Pedro

School of Education and Social Sciences, Leiria Polytechnic Institute Leiria, Portugal

Keywords

Parents Associations, Ethnography, Social and Cultural Reproduction, Intercultural Education, School-Family Relationship

My research has focused on the relationship between two central institutions of our current societies, schools and families, which I have theorized (Silva, 2003a) as including a) a relationship among cultures, i.e., a relation among the local culture(s) and school culture ? this one theorized by Bourdieu and others as the social dominant one and predominantly written, urban and middle class; and b) a double dyad (home and school strands; and individual and collective dimensions of action).

My investigation ? about the influence of social class and gender in home-school relations ? led me to deal with several social actors and realize that parents associations (PAs) can be an important social actor, either a central or a peripheral one, depending on each context and conjuncture.

What and whom are PAs for? This main research question led me to raise several others: Are they a middle class job? Do ?professional parents? (Beattie, 1985) tend to relate equally to all groups of parents, regardless social class, gender and ethnicity? Do they relate preferably with teachers and school administrators, also middle class jobs? Can they be ?partner-parents? (Stoer and Silva, 2005) and become a privileged bridge between school culture and the local community, even when this one is basically composed of popular culture and ethnic minorities? How do PA leaders tend to articulate individual and collective action? How do they manage to act in both home and school strands?

In order to get an answer to these questions I conducted, during two years, a study in three public elementary schools and their communities in the centre of Portugal, where, through a reflexive ethnography, I used participant-observation, ethnographic interviewing, document analysis, fieldnotes and content analysis (Silva, 2003b).

I found that PA leaders tend a) to be (new) middle class; b) to act as organizational centaurs (Ahrne, 1994); and that c) different PAs develop, implicitly or explicitly, multiple purposes which may not take into account parents expectations and interests. Only having this in mind can we ensure a democratic cooperation and dialogue among social actors and promote equity in home-school-community links and a bridge among different cultures.

Pedagogic relation changes and challenges: from classroom interaction to the broader sociocultural context

Ferreira, Nuno

Sociology, ISCTE

Lisboa, Portugal

Keywords

classroom interaction, sociocultural change, authority values, new information and communication technologies

This communication follows a first period of field research, carried out in a study on the changes in the pedagogical relationship at the secondary public school. Although the innumerable different contexts in which the pedagogical action takes place, we believe in the existence of a shared set of cultural and social regularities between those contexts. The main challenge is establishing a link between the interaction in the classroom and some dynamics of societal changes. Therefore we propose analyzing the relationship of students to the school authority in a context of structural change and reforming cultures, skills and personal identities of the youngest.

Focusing the terrain observation in Lisbon's public secondary education ? 10th to 12th grades - the choice of the schools was guided by a criterion of heterogeneity in relation to socioeconomic backgrounds of their students. This approach may be considered unorthodox since apparently ignores one key-concept of sociology of education: class. When studying the student's relations to authority-figures like the teacher at the learning set, a class-oriented research will most probably enhance some of the old disparities which are still present nowadays, and serve as a camouflage to some important, although subtle, changes that may occur at the general mainstream of codes, and even structural aspects which tend to mold the way students behave and think. Although unsatisfactory in terms of its theoretical and methodological accuracy, the concept "middle class" will merge some of the constraints that may interfere with the purpose of this study giving us a much more broader sense of the transversal cultural changes which influence, more or less equally, different groups of socioeconomic and identity backgrounds. Two major dimensions emerge in the practices and behavior of the students: one is of a structural nature and is related to the accelerated changes in the information and communication technologies shaping the practices of learning; the other, is related to the values, beliefs and identity references that shape the communication and learning strategies at the teacher-student level.

Perspectives and issues of an 'European' higher education proposal

Fornos Klein, Stefan

Sociology, Universidade de São Paulo (USP)

São Paulo (SP), Brazil

Keywords

differentiation, modern university, Bologna Process, Higher Education

The hereby proposed presentation aims at offering a critical assessment of the trends and issues involved in the Bologna Process, a wide ranging programme initiated by a few European Union member states, longing to structure a common European Higher Education Area, which among other objectives is especially oriented towards a unification of the types of degree offered along with the definition of common evaluation criteria but that unmistakably exerts further underlying institutional and social pressure.

Due to the recently handled overall research theme of my studies I shall focus mainly on the case of Germany and intend to base my diagnostic on two guidelines: (i) take through a careful review of those main intentions explicated in the Bologna Declaration and the subsequent official communiqués signed by those nation-states engaged in this process, thereby trying to point out possible contradictory aims stated from the beginning, as well as preparing a thorough compilation of those contents that should later on be used for cross-reference; (ii) observe and critically examine qualitative and quantitative data and official reports by the German government and higher education institutions that are committed to understand and evaluate the achievements hitherto accomplished along with present and future problems and restrictions that can already be perceived.

In this manner, my chief objective is to shed light on some of the dubious consequences that can be sighted so far and further elaborate on some possible developments. My interpretation shall, furthermore, draw upon the historical and sociological constituency of the German university in order to establish and fundament the viewpoints expressed, especially focusing on the role that the concept of the nowadays to a large degree surpassed Humboldtian "modern university" has played. In this sense, an essential issue that has to be dealt with concerns the main traits that should characterise the projected type of education in the struggle between an ideal of general formation [Bildung] versus practical training constraints.

Profiles of leadership and democratic school

Torres, Leonor

*Sociology of Education and Educational Administration, University of Minho
Braga, Portugal*

Palhares, José

*Sociology of Education and Educational Administration, University of Minho
Braga, Portugal*

Keywords

school culture, democracy and participation, school leadership

The Portuguese education system has witnessed, in the last two decades, the emergence of educational policy measures whose reformist agenda has attached growing importance to school management and leadership dimensions. The direction of change in school administration has veered towards the implementation of a structure of governance capable of enhancing the effectiveness of the implementation of educational policy measures and the provision of public education service? (Decree-Law n. 75/2008 of 22 April), which effectively signals the abandonment of more collegial and democratic models in favour of those that are more professionalized and individualized.

Along this path, marked by trials and morphological adaptations of management bodies, one notes greater acknowledgement of the role leadership plays in the development of school autonomy. Perceived as a politically sound response to the plagues of rising school indiscipline, underachievement and dropout, the leadership theme has been gradually emerging as a fundamental variable in the quest for school excellence, strongly opposed to the historically rooted collegial management culture so widespread in Portuguese schools. Despite the clear influence of neoliberal thinking in this attempt to reduce school life to the mere expression of indicators of managerialist nature, it is interesting, nevertheless, to study/examine the nature of the relationship between leadership and management styles and school outcomes and the impact this relationship has on the democratic development of the school.

In this sense, based on the critical analysis of the external evaluation reports of secondary schools, the central aim of this paper is to discuss the meanings generally attributed to "good leadership?", "good school organization and administration" to observe if it is possible to establish some form of link with school outcomes, to understand how the tensions unleashed by this evaluation process influence the organizational settings and practices of different school-objects. One question is if this process may not, in fact, represent a "managerialist mission" whose "secret" agenda is to subvert and rewire the logic of autonomous and democratic decision making of schools?

Pupil-teacher communication in secondary schools: Evidence from Latvia

Grivins, Mikelis

Faculty of Social sciences, Latvia University Latvia,

Keywords

teacher-pupil relations, communication, secondary schools, education

Research on education nowadays is mostly concerned with different quantitative macro measurements. This approach gives opportunity to compare data both from cross-national and longitudinal viewpoint. On the other hand such a methodology can be abstract and with no connection to real social processes at school. From quite meaningful processes it can produce abstract terms with no definition. Although results from such a macro research can be abstract, later they are generalised to micro level processes. Different perspective can be found in some theoretical frameworks. For example, theories of P. Bourdieu, P. Freire, I. Illich support both macro level importance and micro level processes.

This paper by analysing teacher-pupil communication during lessons at school tries to analyse how educational processes emerges in micro level and to understand how observed communication attributes influences education processes in total. Analysis is based on empirical research conducted in Latvia where several in-depth interviews and observations in secondary school was held.

Data indicates that there are communication strategies which teachers and pupils use to influence processes in class. Teachers' communication strategies emphasize control of workflow, knowledge and time schedule. Pupils use different types of communication mainly to support the processes, defend themselves, 'hide' their knowledge level or even reschedule time. Although all communication at school is related, there are important differences between teacher-pupil communication during the lessons and breaks.

Qualification and occupational position. An international comparison using EU-LFS data

Wolf, Christof

*Social Monitoring and Social Change, GESIS -- Leibniz-Institute for the Social Sciences
Mannheim, Germany*

Keywords

Educatkion, Occupation, Qualification, Position, EU-LFS

Qualification and Occupational Position. An international comparison using EU-LFS data

Over the last century the educational level of populations around the world has increased steadily. To name just one figure: while in the year 1900 approximately one percent of the population in the respective age group went to university this share increased to 20 percent one hundred years later (Schofer & Meyer, 2005). It is not clear how this increase in qualifications impacted on individual employment chances and occupational positions. Some authors assume that through educational expansion the link between education and occupational position has weakened because other, presumably more selective criteria, e.g. family background or ?habitus?, increasingly play a more important role. Other scholars claim that the opposite is true. They argue that only recently the distribution of education reached a level of diversity that helped employers to place prospective employees in the right positions; i.e. the connection between credentials and positions should have increased.

Using EU-LFS data from 21 European countries and three time points (1995, 2000, 2005) I investigate how the link between education and occupation has changed. First I show that educational expansion is still going on in Europe with now sign of satiation. At the same time the demand for labor has changed dramatically in favor of highly skilled professionals and semi-professionals. Both changes result in an astonishing level of stability with respect to the connection of education and occupational position. In addition the analyses indicated a strikingly high level of similarity between countries.

Schofer, Evan, and John W. Meyer. 2005. "The world-wide expansion of higher education in the twentieth century." American Sociological Review 70:898-920.

Quality and Inequality in Eastern European Education Systems

Alieva, Aigul

International Master in Social Policy Analysis, CEPS/INSTEAD Differdange, Luxembourg

Jansova, Eva

*Centre for Sociological Research, K.U. Leuven
Leuven, Belgium*

Keywords

Stratification, Eastern Europe, achievement, schooling system, PISA 2006

Educational success or failure is the result of interplay between both individual and structural-level determinants. This paper aims to estimate these effects for 13 Eastern European countries by using data for approximately 65000 15-year old students taking part in PISA 2006 study. Preliminary analysis at the individual level tells us that the explanatory power of the familial background varies from lowest 7-8% in Montenegro and Latvia, to 17-19% in Romania and Czech Republic.

The exploration goes beyond the individual background, and the effect of schools, curricular differentiation and tracking is taken into account. Preliminary analysis shows that in countries where all the students follow the same track, the educational achievement remains high, or at least on OECD average level (i.e. Poland and Estonia). On the other hand, countries with two and more tracks have large achievement gaps between students, with largest distances observed in Croatia, Romania and Slovenia. The only exception in this case is Czech Republic, where students in both academic and vocational programmes perform above the OECD level of 500 points.

The preliminary results evolve around following observations. Firstly, the effect of the familial background can be mitigated by the structure of education system. Secondly, the inequality in performance in stratified systems results from the quality of teaching (after controlling for the individual background effects). And thirdly, the quality and education policies should be carefully examined in a number of countries, such as Bulgaria, Montenegro and Romania, the weakest performing countries among all. The study aims to provide some basic insights into the education processes in Eastern European societies that can be used for further studies in educational and socio-economic mobility, studies on typologies of education systems, i.e. the comparison between Western and Eastern educational systems and others.

Quality of teaching - representations and proposals for action: an exploratory study with students from Alentejo (Portugal)

Saragoça, José

Department of Sociology, University of Évora Évora, Portugal

Fialho, Isabel

*Department of Pedagogy and Education, University of Évora
Évora, Portugal*

Cid, Marília

*Department of Pedagogy and Education, University of Évora
Évora, Portugal*

Rebelo, Hugo

Center for Research in Education and Psychology - CIEP, University of Évora Évora, Portugal

Candeias, Adelinda

*Department of Psychology, University of Évora
Évora, Portugal*

Pires, Heldemerina

*Department of Psychology, University of Évora
Évora, Portugal*

Bonito, Jorge

*Department of Pedagogy and Education, University of Évora
Évora, Portugal*

Keywords

teaching materials, teacher's commitment, assessment methodologies, teaching methodologies., quality of teaching

The quality of teaching has been one of the most discussed issues in educational research programs in countries around the world. In almost all countries of Europe there has been a concern to develop research in this field of knowledge, investing significant resources in it.

The recent research results show's a strong positive correlation between student's academic success and the quality of education available to them. However, the way students perceive the quality indicators has been an area less explored by the research.

In order to fill part of that gap, we started a longitudinal research project, funded by FCT - Foundation for Science and Technology (Portugal), which aims to contribute to the dialectical encounter between the representations of students on the quality of education and their academic success.

The sampling of this exploratory study is focused on 9th grade (compulsory education) and 12th grade classes (secondary education) in Arraiolos and Évora schools (rural and urban spaces of Évora district) and in courses of three institutions of higher education in the Alentejo region - Portugal - (the University of Évora, the Polytechnic Institute of Beja and Polytechnic Institute of Portalegre). Data collection was done through a survey by questionnaire.

This communication discusses the analysis of data about the representation of students on variables related to the commitment of teachers, the methodologies of teaching, the methodologies of assessment and the teaching materials used on class.

Researching Teaching Quality in Higher Education: Ethical and Methodological Issues

Abbas, Andrea

Criminology and Sociology, University of Teesside Middlesbrough, UK

Ashwin, Paul

Department of Educational Research, Lancaster University Lancaster, UK

McLean, Monica

Institute for Research in Teaching and Learning in Higher Education, University of Nottingham Nottingham, UK

Filippakou, Ourania

School of Education, University of Nottingham Nottingham, United Kingdom

Keywords

Higher Education, inequality, quality, methods, Bernstein

On an international level there has been a growth in the use of university learning and teaching quality systems which are designed to evaluate and make transparent the quality of undergraduate degree courses (OECD, 2008). However, there is much evidence to suggest that such systems simply reinforce existing economic and social inequalities between countries, universities, students and their staff (Abbas and Mclean, 2007). The basis of the paper is a three-year UK Research Council funded project designed to explore fairer, sociologically informed ways of conceptualising teaching quality. A multi-method approach to fieldwork is employed to develop an understanding of teaching quality in four sociology university departments. The early part of our fieldwork has thrown up both the advantages and challenges of researching a sensitive topic in our own area of employment. It appears as if our own positions as academics and sociologists in different institutions and departments has both facilitated access and also caused difficulties. In addition, the sensitivity of the topic raises a host of ethical issues which require particularly delicate handling. In this paper we demonstrate how we have conceptualised our own position in the field utilising the concepts and theories of Basil Bernstein (2000) which have provided an initial framework with which we have begun to gain insight into the methodological and ethical challenges we face.

Abbas, A. and McLean, M. (2007) Qualitative research as a method for making just comparisons of pedagogic quality in higher education: a pilot study, British Journal of Sociology of Education, 28, pp.723-737

Bernstein, B. (2000) Pedagogy, Symbolic Control and Identity, 2nd Revised Edition, (London, Rowman and Littlefield Publishers).

OECD (2008) Tertiary Education for the Knowledge Society: Volume 1, OECD.

Restructuring the Governance of Portuguese Schools (1998-2008): Policies and Practices

Dias, Mariana

*Sociology of Education, Escola Superior de Educação de Lisboa
Lisboa, Portugal*

Keywords

Organisational Change, school governance, neo -managerialism

Restructuring the Governance of Portuguese Schools(1998-2008):Policies and Practices

The educational agenda of recent decades has been characterised by ongoing attempts to "restructure" and "deregulate" state schooling . This process has, however , been highly controversial ,with major divergences of interpretation in almost all the aspects pertaining to the reform in school governance : its goals , principles , foundations , outcomes and "effective" level of internationalisation.

The current research aims to contribute towards a clarification of certain aspects of this debate and, in particular, of issues relating to :

- the impact of reform on organizational structures and practices .
- the influence of neo-managerial perspectives in societies which differ considerably from the more developed countries . Indeed, Portugal has been defined as a semi -peripheral country, with very specific approaches to the development of the Welfare State and mass schooling .

The investigation describes and analyses the organizational, professional, social, cultural and political transformations taking place in six Portuguese primary schools, during the period 1998-2008. The analysis took into consideration the main issues and controversies to which the reform in school governance has given rise in contemporary literature : emergence of new models for social regulation (market, neo -managerialism, performativity ); changes in professional and organizational patterns (collegiality , school culture , leadership ); new relations between the school and the community (consumer power, "privatisation")

Revolutionary change or imitation? Social context of educational change in Poland

Mikiewicz, Piotr

International Institute for Study of Culture and Education, University of Lower Silesia Wroclaw, Poland

Keywords

Social structure, educational system, Social change

Rapid change observed in temporary educational system in Poland suggests revolution. From vocationally oriented changed it's appearance into academically driven system. The paper is aimed to examine the social and economical conditions of this change and furthermore the consequences of the process. At the first site it can be taken as an indicator of modernization and convergence of Polish social and economical system to the western one. But closer look and analysis shows rather imitated character of the change - mechanical change of labels rather deep redefinition of structures and functions. What is interesting, even if this change has have imitative character, one way or another, affects the social system and can be a very important part of re-constitution of the whole social structure.

The paper is devoted to:

- 1) presentation of the changes in contemporary Polish educational system
- 2) brief history of the social change in post-soviet Poland as the context for the change in education
- 3) (potential) consequences of educational change for social structure.

Russian Universities and Internationalization of Education

Konstantinovskiy, David

Department of Sociology of Education, Science and Culture, Institute of Sociology, Russian Academy of Sciences Moscow, Russian Federation

Keywords

Internationalization, universities, consequences, strategies

Internationalization of education, particularly inclusion into pan-European educational system, is one of the most disputable themes in Russian academic and educational communities. On one side of the argument are the employers as the main customer on labor market confirming the importance of internationalization and insisting that university graduates must have professional skills enabling them to work in international environment, to participate in international projects. We also see that international activities of the university might have a real influence on the home region: it is more actively involved into international cooperation and integration; the region gets an access to foreign scientific achievements, new material and technology, obtains a possibility for intercultural communication.

At the same time there is a need of evaluation both positive and negative consequences of such education internationalization, appreciation of cultural traditions, preservation of achievements of the Russian educational system. Many experts are concerned that existing educational model would be destroyed, but new one might not have evident advantages. Important argument of the opponents of university's international integration is a fear of 'brain drain'. Such apprehensions do have some grounds, though international activities of the universities can't be considered as an only reason for the 'brain drain', there are others significant causes.

Conducted research shows what courses are chosen by Russian universities; what attitudes Russian academics have toward innovations in interaction and communication with foreign universities.

What are the strategies of promotion the Russian universities to the international education market? Analysis allows reducing these strategies to the following main types. Mobilization strategy bringing all university resources together allows university successfully moving to the international educational market. Situational strategy depends on current situation, often university promotes the particular set of activities, for example the most successful or conventional. Wait-and-see strategy is the strategy when the university does not take any initiative in international cooperation field. Causes for such strategy might be the rejection of these activities in principal, lack of resources, unclaimed university's graduates on a labor market or previous unsuccessful experience of realization international joint programs.

School Choice and Social Class: The Impact of Education Systems on Patterns of School Choice

Avram, Silvia

Social and Political Sciences, European University Institute San Domenico di Fiesole, Italy

Dronkers, Jaap

Social and Political Sciences, European University Institute San Domenico di Fiesole, Italy

Keywords

educational inequality, school choice, educational systems

One of the most hotly debated topics in education research and policy making concerns publicly subsidized school choice. The controversy has been probably most prominent in the United States, where a series of studies showing private schools in general, and Catholic schools in particular, were more effective in producing high-achieving students compared to the public sector (Coleman, Hoffer et al. 1982; Coleman and Hoffer 1987; Chubb and Moe 1990; Bryk, Lee et al. 1993) triggered a wave of experiments with school choice and school vouchers. Supporters of school choice argue that it would engender a general increase in educational quality by forcing schools to compete for pupils. Critics have questioned that assumption along with raising equity questions. In particular, some authors have pointed to the class dimension of school choice and its potential for increased segregation and educational inequality (Echols, McPherson et al. 1990; Ball 1993; Ball, Bowe et al. 1996). What is often overlooked in these disputes, however, is the diversity of programs and arrangements under the 'school choice' umbrella.

This paper sets out to test whether school choice does bring about stronger segregation along class lines, focusing especially on the impact of institutional design. It makes use of the three waves of the PISA study to investigate how parental socio-economic status (education, occupation, and wealth) but also the school's social composition influence the option for a private, but publicly financed school instead of a public one in 18 European countries. Findings confirm that important role played in particular by the school's social composition in the majority of countries included in the analysis. Yet, they also point to considerable cross-national variation in the impact social class related variables have on selection of a private school when the choice is supported financially from the public budget. The final part of the paper attempts to explain country differences by looking at characteristics of the educational system, such as the size of the subsidized private sector, regulations imposed on schools in exchange for receiving subsidies (such as concerning tuition fees, staff policy, curriculum etc), and the existence of national examinations.

School performance, social inequalities and ethnicity: The children of Cape Verdean and Indian immigrants in basic schooling in Portugal

Seabra, Teresa

Sociology, ISCTE

Lisbon, Portugal

Keywords

social inequalities, school performance, education, school, immigrants

Considering the expansion of immigration in our country and the resulting progressive introduction of a considerable contingent of the school population of different national origin, the aim of this research is, on one hand, to ascertain the school performance of these children and young people by considering a diverse range of structural and procedural variables and, on the other hand, to understand how social contexts (family and school) increase or reduce the possibilities of achieving the ideal of equal opportunities propitiated by school in modern societies.

We compare the school results of pupils of different national origins ? Portugal, Cape Verde and India, and different socio-cultural circumstances in basic education in the Lisbon Metropolitan Area and look into how far family dynamics and school processes are related to unequal performance. We distributed a questionnaire to 837 pupils at eight different schools, collected statistics at each school and interviewed the parents of children of Cape Verdean and Indian origin.

Our analysis of the information gathered showed a superior school performance from the pupils of Indian origin both in relation to Portuguese pupils and those of Cape Verdean origin, even when allowing for the effect of other structural variables. We also detected differences between groups of pupils with regard to their family lives (relationship with country of origin and schooling) and their school experience (behaviour and relationship with people and learning).

School Quasi Market processes and actors' justification about differentiation

Devleeshouwer, Perrine

Sociology, Université Libre de Bruxelles Belgium,

Keywords

Educational Quasi-Market, Complementary differentiation, Actors' Justifications

The school system in Belgium, and especially in Brussels, is organized as a quasi-market (Delvaux, 1999; Draelants and al., 2003; Dupriez and Vandenberghe, 2004; Maroy, 2007). In theory, the competition between schools should be expected to improve their effectiveness. However, Maroy (2006) has shown that this is not the case. Instead, schools are engaged in a process of complementary differentiation and not of competition. This leads to the specialisation of schools on the basis of their pupils characteristics. Some schools receive young people with school careers marked by lots of options changes, failures or exclusions. On the other hand of the scale there are schools that will only accept and keep, pupils achieving the highest academic standards. This situation leads to a two-tier system in which hierarchy and complementary differentiation are created and reinforced by reputations and the social representations (Maroy, 2006). These logics, although subjective, create significant demographic imbalances. Example of this would be the separation of school intakes by selection, educational segregation, limited heterogeneity within schools or classrooms and the keeping up of separate educational streams (Delvaux and Joseph, 2006). This leads to a dualisation along both social and ethnic lines. As an extension the analyses mentioned above, I intend to present the results of a research relating to discourses of both youth and institutional actors (Verhoeven, Delvaux, Rea, Martiniello, 2007). These discourses play a part in the reproduction of schools hierarchisation and at the same time they are a posteriori justifications of the hierarchy. A large proportion of the representations emerging from the discourses associate a high rate of foreign origin pupils with underperforming schools. In this view a good school is one with a mainly native demographic. There are, of course, some other criteria, however the main one is concerned with ethnic origin. This is deep-rooted in the actors' outlook as it has existed for a long period of time and no measure have been taken to prove it wrong. The recent attempts to modify the school choice system came up against a strong refusal based on the symbolic construction of the educational hierarchy

Schools and Immigrant Families: Complex Relations

Garreta Bochaca, Jordi

Geography and Sociology, University of Lleida Lleida, Spain

Bernad Caveró, Olga

Geography and Sociology, University of Lleida Lleida, Spain

Keywords

school experience, parents? associations, school, educational expectations, immigrant origin families

The family-school relationship should be analysed taking into account that it has not always been thought necessary and that there has been an imbalance of power between these two institutions. In this framework, the immigrant origin families, with less knowledge of the educational system, the workings of the centres and the correct forms for relations, often appear to be little involved and biased. In the framework of some general considerations, through three of our own empirical studies, the text analyses the relations with the immigrant origin families and how these are perceived by the teachers and the representatives of parents? associations. To sum up, we show how, among other factors, the dynamics in the educational centres, plus the knowledge that the families acquire lead to greater implication. In contrast, the lack of knowledge and negative dynamics create barriers that are sometimes difficult to overcome.

Selectivity and flexibility in the German secondary school system: a configurational analysis of recent data from the German Socio-Economic Panel (SOEP)

Glaesser, Judith

School of Education, Durham University Durham, United Kingdom

Cooper, Barry

*School of Education, Durham University
Durham, United Kingdom*

Keywords

Stratification, Secondary School System, Social Mobility, Germany, Qualitative Comparative Analysis

In Ralph Turner's 1960 typology of educational systems, under sponsored mobility pupils are selected in competitive examinations at an early stage in their educational careers for an academic route allowing access to high social class positions. For those not selected it is difficult to catch up at a later point. Under the alternative norm of contest mobility opportunities are kept open for all for as long as possible. Allmendinger has built on Turner's work, developing her own classification to include the dimensions of standardisation and stratification.

There is ongoing debate in many European countries about both equality of opportunity and the continuing wastage of talent, and the ways in which differing systems of secondary schooling contribute to these. Despite ongoing reforms, the German system still might best be described as sponsored and highly stratified according to Turner's and Allmendinger's classifications. However, there are growing concerns that the current system sorts children into educational pathways at too early an age, given that a child may not develop his/her potential until later and because evidence suggests that the sorting process is socially, not just academically, selective. The possibility of changing tracks does exist, but again, there is some evidence that this does not alleviate the early social inequality and may even reinforce it.

This paper has three aims. It describes the amount of flexibility currently in the German educational system, using a cohort of individuals born in 1988/1989 from the SOEP. Second, building on earlier work by ourselves and other authors, it analyses factors influencing whether individuals make use of the opportunities for changing track. Most earlier relevant work has used regression-based methods, but we use an alternative configurational approach, Ragin's Qualitative Comparative Analysis (QCA). QCA employs a Boolean approach. Instead of determining the net effects of supposedly independent variables, its focus is on establishing the configurations of necessary and/or sufficient causes or conditions associated with particular outcomes. Contrasting this case-based approach with the regression approach, and explaining our use of it, is our third aim.

Self-Esteem of Academic and Vocational Students: Does Inter-School Tracking Sharpen the Difference?

Van Houtte, Mieke

*Sociology, Ghent University
Gent, Belgium*

Demanet, Jannick

*Sociology, Ghent University
Gent, Belgium*

Keywords

tracking, self-esteem, secondary education, inter-school segregation

Research into the consequences of tracking occupies a significant place within sociology of education. It is demonstrated that lower tracks students develop an anti-school culture, to overcome the status deprivation resulting from being in a lower track. Research has mainly focused on cognitive outcomes, yet it has been shown that attending a lower track affects the global self-esteem. The differences between tracks have usually been demonstrated within schools. But, in Flanders, as in other European regions, schools themselves can be distinguished according to the curriculum they offer, giving rise to academic schools on the one hand and technical/vocational schools on the other hand. Besides these 'categorical' schools, there are also so-called 'multilateral' schools, incorporating academic, technical and vocational tracks. We question how school type 'multilateral or categorical' relates to academic students' and vocational students' self-esteem, and whether the relation between track position and self-esteem varies according to school type. Inter-school tracking might be expected to encourage stigmatising of vocational students because of the firm distinction between academic and vocational students, arousing negative self-feelings in the vocational students. It is also possible that vocational students in multilateral schools take the academic students as a comparative reference group, leading to relative deprivation and negative self-feelings.

Analyses are based on a subsample of the Flemish Educational Assessment (FIEA)'s data gathered in 2004-2005 from 11.872 third and fifth grade students in a sample of 85 secondary schools. There are 10 multilateral and 56 categorical schools (22 academic, 4 vocational, 30 technical/vocational). Analyses are limited to the 3758 academic and the 2152 vocational students enrolled in these schools. Multilevel analyses (HLM6) show that academic students enrolled in multilateral schools have a slightly higher self-esteem than those in categorical schools. As for the vocational students' self-esteem, school type does not seem to make any difference. Academic students have a significant higher self-esteem than vocational students. This difference is larger in multilateral schools than in categorical schools. Our findings suggest that in multilateral schools academic students compare themselves with the vocational track students, leading to a higher awareness of status gratification, resulting in a higher self-esteem.

Shaken, not stirred. A sociological framework for relating school compositional features to school deviance

Demanet, Jannick

*Department of Sociology, Ghent University
Gent, Belgium*

Van Houtte, Mieke

*Department of Sociology, Ghent University
Gent, Belgium*

Keywords

School composition, School effects research, School deviance, Critics, Theories

In the last decades, the area of school effectiveness research has been subject to numerous criticisms. This contribution focuses explicitly upon one critique: the downplay of SES as a contextual variable. We argue that this critique can be broadened: SER has minimized the role of all compositional school features. However, focusing upon these characteristics could provide very interesting insights into the various effects the placing together of various groups of students has on specific outcomes and processes, especially from a sociological point of view. Taking account of two other prominent critiques, namely the lack of theorizing and the overreliance upon academic outcomes, this contribution shows, through an application of some well-known sociological theories to the topic of school deviance, that focusing upon school composition could be very interesting for SER. From strain theory, we can expect that both the ethnic and SES composition of schools could influence the level of school disorder of students, because both these characteristics can influence the levels of goal blockage and blockage of pain-avoidance behavior. A high sense of blockage invokes strain, ultimately leading to more school misconduct. Group threat theory expects ethnic composition to have an influence upon levels of school disorder: heterogeneous schools invoke more interethnic competition for the acquisition of control of the 'turf'. This conflict-ridden climate influences the likelihood of showing school misconduct, through the mechanisms of social learning theory. Two (sub)cultural theories, cultural deprivation theory and oppositional culture theory, state that students turn to deviant subcultures if they perceive that they have no valid way of attaining status, or of making scholastic progress. The cultural deprivation theory applies this to the SES composition, oppositional culture theory relates this to the ethnic composition of schools. Finally, we argue that some of the mechanisms brought forward by the theories, are actually expressions of reference group theory, which can be used as an encompassing theoretical framework for the study of the relation between school composition and individual school misconduct. This sociological framework is presented to stir up the discussion concerning the role of school composition in school effectiveness research.

Social selection during the transition from primary school to secondary education stage: effects of antisocial behaviour and prosocial deficits on school choice

Weber, Christoph

Department of Empirical Social Research, Johannes Kepler University Linz, Austria

Keywords

choice of school type, prosocial deficits, antisocial behaviour, Transition from primary school to secondary school

The educational career of children affects many areas of their later lives (e.g. income, employment, ?). In Germany the first decision about which educational track to follow is made after primary school, at the age of ten. Depending on which school type is chosen, differential developmental opportunities are disclosed or constrained. It could be expected that in addition to the grades there are other variables which affect the choice of a particular educational track. Using data from a longitudinal cohort study (Children's Panel of the German Youth Institute) the effects of children's characteristics (antisocial behaviour and prosocial skills) on the followed educational track were examined. Two national representative age cohorts were surveyed three times at intervals of one and a half year. The younger cohort (N=1148) started at the age of about 5 years. The cohort of the elder (N=1042) was interviewed the first time at the age of 8-9 years. The guiding hypotheses are that (1) mediated by the teacher's recommendation regarding the school track pupils should choose and independent from the grades in primary school, children with high levels of antisocial behaviour and low levels of prosocial skills change more often to a secondary elementary school (This is the lowest school track). (2) There is an effect of secondary elementary school to subsequent antisocial behaviour and to the maintenance of prosocial deficits. Furthermore the impact of SES on the particular educational track was investigated. Results indicate that antisocial behaviour enhances ? independent from the grades ? the probability that children attend a secondary elementary school. This effect is mediated by the teacher's recommendation. The effect of prosocial deficits is not supported by the data. The data supports the hypothesis that the school type fosters ? independent from prior levels of behavioural problems - further antisocial behaviour. The analogue hypothesis for prosocial behaviour is not supported. Further results show that SES affects school choice in versatile ways. Low-SES children are characterised by higher levels of antisocial behaviour and lower school attainment and thus attend more often a secondary elementary school. Finally there is a direct SES-effect on school choice.

Structural Impacts on Individual Outcomes: How National Characteristics Influence Student Learning

Arnett, Stephanie

Sociology and Latin American Studies, Tulane University

New Orleans, LA, USA

Keywords

learning, socioeconomic status, Cross-National

This work attempts to quantify the extent to which societal and social environmental factors associated with schools and families influence the learning process. A sample of 155,457 students in 6029 schools in 29 countries from the Program for International Student Assessment (PISA) data is examined to determine how much variation in the reading literacy of students is associated with factors at the student, school, and country level. This paper first focuses on variation in and of itself by considering both the differences in reading literacy across countries and the variation of ability within countries. In addition, it explores the nature of this variation by testing the hypothesis that the influence of socioeconomic status on student learning varies systematically on a cross-national basis; this is achieved by comparing the strength of the influence of two measures of socioeconomic status – family social status and parental education – on reading ability. Findings of a strong effect of socioeconomic status on student outcomes establish the existence and illustrate the importance of variation in these slopes as indicators of the varying influence of socioeconomic status on outcomes cross-nationally. In addition, they confirm that the distribution of opportunities to learn varies across nations for students.

Success rates in Portuguese Higher Education

de Almeida Alves, Nuno

ISCTE, CIES

Lisboa, Portugal

Keywords

Success, Higher Education, failure, Drop-out

Higher Education is a major feature in contemporary European societies due to its strategic role in the training of highly qualified human resources, as well as in the creation of knowledge and research and development. However, the assessment of success rates of their undergraduate student population hasn't been a priority to sociology of education or public policies research. The available indicators cover the gross enrolment ratio (proportion of tertiary education students enrolled in the age cohort 19-24), the universities' drop-out prevention and retention capacity and, finally, the system's efficacy analysis, calculated through survival rate (calculated as the ratio of the number of students who are awarded an initial degree to the number of new entrants to the level  $n$  years before,  $n$  being the number of years of full-time study required to complete the degree - OECD, Education at a Glance, 2002). None of these measures provides accurate data on the success rate in Higher Education. This presentation puts forward the proposal that this measure ought to be calculated considering the number of students that obtain a first degree in a given year and the number of years spent to obtain that same degree. Through these numbers, we will be able to estimate the absolute success rate, the relative success rate and estimate the drop-out rate. All these data will be further analysed taking institutional (Higher Education Institutions characteristics) and subject specific constraints (scientific and educational areas, courses demand) into consideration, factors that may largely contribute to the understanding and assessment of the results obtained. Some individual based arguments will also be considered, in order to illustrate specific issues of personal nature in the student's paths that can be especially relevant. This presentation is based in on the results obtained by the research project "[Portuguese] Students and their trajectories through Higher Education: Success and Failure, Factors and Processes, Fostering Best Practices", that was carried out in 2008, coordinated by António Firmino da Costa e João Miguel Teixeira Lopes.

Systems of Exclusion - Immigration and Inequalities (a multilevel analysis)

Teltemann, Janna

*Sociology, University of Bremen
Bremen, Germany*

Keywords

Immigration, Integration, inequality, multilevel analysis, educational systems

International migration accelerated during the last decades, thereby creating new and more diverse patterns of movements. Hence, experiences and challenges with regard to migration and integration vary considerably across Europe. Most European countries are immigration countries today and population growth is becoming increasingly dependent on the contribution of net migration and higher birth rates among immigrant populations. In knowledge-based economies the battle for talent is becoming as important as the battle for inward investment and a successful recruitment of skilled migrants can offer significant comparative advantages. But there is also a persisting need for unskilled labour migration in times of internationalization and a broadening of the tertiary sector, particularly in countries where rising living costs make lower paid jobs unattractive to the native population.

Thus, Europe is dependent on immigration. For the potential advantages of migration to be maximised however, it is crucial that immigration is accompanied by social integration. As European countries feature diverging immigration backgrounds, they established differing institutions that shape integration trajectories of immigrants. The educational system plays a crucial role for integration since educational credentials are a prerequisite for labour market attainment. Further, educational attainment fosters social assimilation by providing knowledge about the host country and by facilitating contact with natives. As educational systems but also other relevant institutions as labour market regulations and welfare provision vary across Europe, integration outcomes vary accordingly.

The paper seeks to explain differing educational outcomes of immigrants in Europe by testing the impact of various contextual factors. In a multilevel approach, data from PISA 2006 with additional data on a national level will be analysed. The dependent variable is the risk, not to reach the first proficiency level in reading as defined in the PISA assessment framework. This is a strong indicator for threatening social exclusion. By testing predictors that measure features of educational systems, economic performance and social policies as well as attitudes towards immigrants, the paper sheds light on the conditions that favour or hinder the integration of immigrants. With this approach it is possible to identify which characteristics of educational systems produce more or less inequality.

Teacher Trust as an Indicator of Social Inequality in Secondary Education?

Van Maele, Dimitri

Sociology, Ghent University

Belgium, <http://www.psw.ugent.be/cudos/>

Van Houtte, Mieke

Sociology, Ghent University

Belgium, <http://www.psw.ugent.be/cudos/>

Keywords

trust, teachers, social inequality, School composition, teachability

Trust relations contribute to a school's level of social capital and enhance the functioning of the school and students' achievement (Goddard, 2003). European research on teacher trust is relatively scarce however. This study, departing from normative role expectations, analyzes how teacher and organizational school characteristics affect teacher trust. Since taking into account school context is crucial regarding a social justice orientation on education (Thrupp, 2006), we analyze if organizational size and organizational composition in terms of the social class background, gender, and ethnicity of students leads to unequal levels of teacher trust in students across secondary schools. We also pay attention to the role of teachers' gender, socioeconomic background, years of experience, teaching hours, nature of the courses taught, and their perception of the students' teachability in explaining trust.

Data were collected within the context of the Flemish Educational Assessment, during the 2004-2005 school year, from 2,104 third- and/or fifth-grade teachers by means of anonymous written questionnaires across a representative sample of 84 secondary schools in Flanders. Moreover, 11,872 third- and fifth-grade students completed questionnaires. The trust variable was derived from the trust scales developed by Hoy and Tschannen-Moran (1999). We measured teacher trust in students with 10 items. Cronbach's alpha for our trust scale is 0.77. Multilevel analysis is used to reveal the assessed relationships.

The unconditional multilevel analysis reveals 23.4% of the variance in teacher trust is situated between schools ( $p < 0.001$ ). The included school features explain 89% of the variance in trust at the school level. An important proportion of teacher trust is explained by variation in the social class composition of the student body, also explaining the impact of ethnic composition. In low socioeconomic schools with a lot of students, trust is very worrisome. When the proportion of female students is high, teacher trust is also high. The students' study culture could not explain the effects of compositional features. However, composition effects are mediated through teachers' perception of the students' teachability.

These findings may raise staff awareness of trends in their attitudes that demand systematic intervention in view of reducing social inequalities in education.

The Bologna Process and the New Legal Regime of Higher Education Institutions in Portugal

Galego, Carla

*Institute of Education Sciences, Universidade Lusófona de Humanidades e Tecnologias
Lisbon, Portugal*

Marques, Fátima

*Institute of Education Sciences, Universidade Lusófona de Humanidades e Tecnologias
Lisbon, Portugal*

Teodoro, António

Institute of Education Sciences, Universidade Lusófona de Humanidades e Tecnologias Lisbon, Lisbon

Keywords

Governance, autonomy, Higher Education Institutions, Legal Regime of Higher Education Institutions

In the context of the current massification of higher education, the development of the scientific knowledge and the modifications in its reproduction processes, as well as the recomposition of the relations between the State, society and economy, lead us to new modes of governance of higher education, still in construction. This trend to the construction of new modes of governance, strongly influenced by the new public management theories, stems from the combination of forms (state, market, community, ?household?), existing or dominant, through which the various activities (and scales) of governance are socially coordinated. In this context, the educational reforms reproduce the speech and the proposals of powerful global players, such as OECD and World Bank.

Specifically for higher education, these agencies suggest four basic reforms: (i) efficiency and accountability, (ii) accreditation and universalization, (iii) international competition, and (iv) privatization. The last OECD report about Tertiary Education is particularly significant. In the scope of this process, the higher educational policies are at risk of being colonized by the economical policy that expresses itself by the articulation between the educational systems and the productive systems, the curricula reorganization and cost reduction. However, despite the convergences processes identified, in particular within the countries that participate in the Bologna process, there is a hybridization of the educational policies of the higher education, given the market limitations and the resistances to its implementation in each country. Under RIAIPE network, we are currently working this issue taking Portugal and Spain contexts (and five others Latin American countries) as subject of study.

In this context and the framework of critical theory, this communication is to present the analysis of connections between the guidelines set out in the Bologna Declaration and the education policies produced in Portugal with a view to creating a European Higher Education Area.

The changes in educational policies and its effects on higher education market in Portugal

Urbano, Claudia Valadas

*CesNova - Sociology, Faculty of Human and Social Sciences - New University of Lisbon
Portugal,*

Keywords

Higher Education, educational policy, polytechnical education

Duality characterizes the Portuguese higher education system. Universities and Polytechnical Institutes have different statuses in the higher education system and therefore in society. With the Bologna Process, Europe tries to homogenise educational systems. How can Portugal manage to do it if, internally, there are differences in the attractiveness of both subsystems? The main focus of our research has been the polytechnical higher education, which is the less socially valued subsystem. However, at the start of the 21st century, just before the beginning of the Bologna Process in Portugal, this subsystem won some notoriety in the Portuguese higher education scenario. The normative field is not the same: laws concerning higher education have changed in Portugal in the 90s and the graduation is now more balanced between the two subsystems - polytechnical and university - with the end of the exclusivity of the licenciante degree by the university subsystem. In this period of change, it is also visible an effect on demand for higher education and in particular for polytechnical education. Will the demand trends change, now that both subsystems will offer similar first and second cycle diplomas with the Bologna Process?

These changes have also opened the door to other cohorts than the traditional, with the possibility of ingress by a special regime to the over than 23 years old candidates, created in order to increase the percentage of graduated population. Possessing different social characteristics from those of the traditional cohort, how will higher education adapt to these new students? Will it achieve unity in difference? Trying to accomplish European goals, in order to increase graduate population, how will higher education answer to even more missions than those it traditionally had? The divergence in union could be, in a future, the union in difference? These are some of the questions concerning national education systems that we will try to debate. In order to do that, we'll analyse offer and demand of polytechnical and university subsystems, in the last two decades, a period of significant changes in Portuguese educational policies.

The Curricular Knowledge Construction in Portugal. Historical, Economic, Social and Cultural Features

Estrela, Elsa

*Instituto de Ciências da Educação, Universidade Lusófona de Humanidades e Tecnologias
Lisboa, Portugal*

Keywords

educational change, Curricular knowledge, policy cycles, Governance

This paper is written under an international project entitled RIAIPE (Rede Ibero-Americana de Investigação em Políticas Educativas ? Iberian-American Network of Investigation in Educational Policies), where investigators analyze the influences of globalization in educational policies and try to build alternative indicators related to equity and social inclusion.

We consider knowledge as a social process, produced by multiple actors who act in different fields or levels. And this knowledge has a role in the process of political decisions. In this task we are considering the political mobilization of knowledge by the macro level actors, such as political actors. So, we will first identify the main political actors responsible for political decision in each political cycle.

Our understanding is that policies and educational change configure processes, based on policies cycles and contexts (Bowe at al, 1992; Ball, 1994) and the connection of internal and external movements, such as social, political or economic movements, that influence educational reform cycles (Goodson, 2008).

We will analyze the new modes of governance and regulation expressed in the curriculum policies recommended at the international level and the related curriculum policies implemented in Portugal. We start from the idea that national states reconfigure global policies taken by international/ transnational organizations, such as OECD and European Union (Estrela & Teodoro, 2009), as it is important to understand how national policies are impregnated of international forces (Teodoro, 2003, 2007).

We seek to describe the context of influence and the context of policy text production in each policy cycle between 1971 and 2009. We also to correlate the curricular policies proposed with the historical, economic, social and cultural contexts shaping each political cycle.

Our study will imply critical analysis of legal texts related to curricular policies in Portugal between 1971 and 2009 and documents, reports, opinions and proposals from national organizations, such as professional teachers associations and unions, and international organizations, such as European Union, OECD, World Bank and UNESCO.

The impact of ethnic differences on social relationships in school classes

Di Bartolomeo, Anna

*Department of Demography, Faculty of Statistics, University of Rome "Sapienza"
Rome, Italy*

Lapucci, Enrica

*Department of Demography, Faculty of Statistics, University of Rome "Sapienza"
Rome, Italy*

Guarneri, Antonella

*Direzione Centrale per le Statistiche e le Indagini sulle Istituzioni Sociali, Italian National Institute of Statistics, Istat
Rome, Italy*

Natale, Luisa

Department of Economic Sciences, University of Cassino Cassino (FR), Italy

Simone, Maura

*Direzione centrale programmazione e contabilità, Italian National Institute of Statistics, Istat
Rome, Italy*

Bovadilla, Stefania

Department of Demography, University of Rome "Sapienza" Rome, Italy

Keywords

Social Networks, ethnic differences, school classes, p-star methodology

The integration of migrants and their children has become one of the greatest challenge in the Italian context, particularly in the scholastic system where immigrants' children account for the 6.4% of the total scholastic population, with an annual growth rate equal to 71.1% in the last ten years.

Although several aspects have been strongly stressed by the literature (e.g. performance in educational tracks and its determinants), less attention has been placed on friendship and tie dynamics between natives and immigrants' children.

This paper aims to fill this gap by analyzing the network structure of multiethnic classes. Data have been taken by the dataset ITAGEN2, the first Italian national survey on the integration of immigrants' children in the scholastic system, which focuses on 24 classes composed by students aged 11-14 distinguished by migration status.

In particular, two dimensions of social ties are deepened: liking and cooperation. The former is captured by a questionnaire item 'who are your best friends?', while the latter by 'who do you help (and who does help you) with practical problems (e.g. success doing homework, organizing a party, and so on)?'.

Three research hypotheses are tested: 1. Ties are affected by the principle of 'ethnic homophily', i.e. social relationships among students with the same ethnicity are more likely to occur than among those with different ethnic backgrounds; 2. the homophily effect differs between the two considered social tie dimensions, since different determinants act respectively on liking (intimate friendship) and cooperation (emotional support) dynamics; 3. among others, the tendency to discriminate among friends is particularly affected by personal attitudes and opinions regarding multicultural issues.

In order to understand how dyads and networks? characteristics impact liking and cooperation? ties among students, a multilevel approach of the p* methodology is adopted. By this approach, both the differences between and within classes and their implications on the social relationships between peers will be analyzed and discussed.

The impact of globalization on knowledge and education through international surveys and assessments

Klemencic, Eva

Centre for applied epistemology, The Educational Research Institute Ljubljana, Slovenia

Keywords

international educational surveys, educational system, global/local knowledge

Slovenia is a country which is included in a number of different international educational surveys and assessments, e.g. PISA, TIMSS, SITES, PIRLS, CIVED/ICCS. Frequently raised questions about real importance in taking part in this studies, neglecting the least important fact of being placed on the international scales (what could exculpate researching in itself), should be replaced with practical consequences. What could these studies tell us about our educational system and even more, what could they tell us in comparison to others systems, beginning with the question- why do we need the comparison at all? With regards to this- could these surveys indicate equal knowledge benchmarking in all of surveyed countries? Could analysis which gives consideration to acknowledging historical, economical, political, cultural and social context in global knowledge benchmarking identify special knowledge conceptualization or even more, how could these studies and assessments influence on the national educational system in a meaning of emphasizing reliable educational (especially knowledge) indicators? In this paper, one methodological instrument applied for secondary analysis with regards to other country specific parameters and which could be used in Ragin's mixed methodology for international comparisons will be presented regarding to identification of context and achievements.

To what extent are countries prepared to exchange their educational and knowledge paradigm? Is local knowledge meaningless in processes of globalization on knowledge and education? How globalisation and especially international surveys and assessments affect on local knowledge? Are participating countries in these studies conceptualizing new, global knowledge through making local knowledge global?

The importance of social and cultural capital for educational performance: Eastern vs Western Europe

Prokic-Breuer, Tijana

Political and Social Sciences, European University Institute San Domenico di Fiesole, Florence, Italy

Keywords

social capital, Eastern Europe, cultural capital, educational performance

The aim of this paper is to examine whether the relation between social and cultural capital of children and their educational performance is different in Eastern Europe compared to Western Europe. This comparison is made throughout the transition period of the Eastern European countries. The paper contributes to existing knowledge by focusing on the differences in the way social and cultural capital are related to educational performance rather than explaining the inequality of educational achievement.

In order to explore the differences between the ways social and cultural capital have contributed to educational achievement, two data sets are used. Both data sets measure cognitive performance of children in 20 European countries. The first study under consideration is 'Trends in International Mathematics and Science Study (TIMSS)', conducted in 1995 and 2003. The second one is the 'Program for International Students Assessment (PISA)', conducted in 2000, 2003 and 2006.

The applied theoretical approach to social capital follows Coleman (1987) where a social capital in- and outside of the family is considered as a factor that positively relates to educational performance of children. Cultural capital on the other hand is defined as in the theoretical work of Bourdieu (1984) and the empirical work of DiMaggio (1982 and 1985). The estimated model is an adapted version of the educational production function, through which a statistical relationship between cognitive performance and family background is examined.

Empirical results show that it can not be concluded that there is a significant difference in the way social and cultural capital contributed to educational performance in Eastern and Western Europe at the beginning of Transition or in the later stages. These outcomes suggest that egalitarian policies of communism have not succeeded in their aim to eliminate significance of cultural capital and social capital for educational performance. Therefore, contrary to many believes, this paper shows that Eastern and Western Europe are not as different as it is often claimed. At least not regarding the way these aspects of family background contributed to educational performance.

The induction phase in teacher's careers in Flandres

Vangoidsenhoven, Guido

*Sociology (SOCl), Vrije Universiteit Brussel
Brussel, Belgium*

Siongers, Jessy

*Sociology (SOCl), Vrije Universiteit Brussel
Brussel, Belgium*

Huyge, Ellen

Onderzoeksgroep School en politiek, Universiteit Antwerpen Antwerpen, Belgium

Elchardus, Mark

*Sociology (SOCl), Vrije Universiteit Brussel
Brussel, Belgium*

Kavadias, Dimokritos

*Sociology (SOCl), Vrije Universiteit Brussel
Brussel, Belgium*

Keywords

Teachers' professional development, praxis shock, professional induction problems

In our societies the profession of teacher tends to become more important. As a consequence, how to attract and retain teachers became the focus of inquiry in recent research. These studies tended to gather useful information on teachers' social-economic characteristics, time spending, work satisfaction, however, the singularity, appeal and shortcomings of the profession can only be detected by comparing teachers with other occupations. This research wants to fill the hiatus and compare the socio-graphic characteristics and careers of teachers with those of other occupational groups by analysing existing cross-sectional and longitudinal data, and by means of focus group interviews with teachers and ex-teachers.

Making the move from teacher education to actual professional practice is difficult for many teachers and often of great influence on the next career stages. Although many scholars refer to the disillusionment teachers experience as a (praxis)shock, the term, strictly taken, doesn't cover the entire reality of a beginning teacher. More than a one-time confrontation, the entrance of beginning teachers in everyday teaching practice is a long learning and adaptation process with both actors and organizational structure influencing and changing each other.

Several factors will be explored that contribute to the so-called harsh entry into the teaching profession. In the first part we will focus on both the objective and subjective job-insecurity. As previous research has shown, one of the biggest attractions of the educational sector in Flanders is the fact that teachers can get appointed for life after a minimum of three years working experience. This means that the first three years teachers face a certain degree of work- and income insecurity. We want to know if they experience significantly more or less job-insecurity than their peers in other occupations. In the consecutive part of the paper four factors are distinguished (PCA): problems with teaching, school culture, authority and work pressure. Graduates who always worked as teacher after graduation, those who first worked somewhere else but then entered the teaching profession, and teachers that left the profession will be compared on these factors.

The late construction of a hybrid vocational and educational training system in Spain

Ahedo, Manu

Dep. of Business Administration, University Rovira i Virgili Tarragona, Spain

Keywords

Spain, hybrid model, initial and further training, VET system

The article analyzes the emergence and institutionalization of the technical vocational and education training (VET) system in the democratic Spain during the last decades. The argument is that the late construction of a hybrid model of VET in the last two decades has increasingly become one of the key factors in understanding the advanced industrial economy in Spain.

In Spain, training system in general, and the technical vocational and education training (VET) in particular, have been underdeveloped for most part of the 20th. century, under negative non-democratic circumstances, unbalance industrialization, and abrupt processes of economic growth. Until the 1970s and even the 1980s, VET system in Spain was dominated by three main actors: large firms with apprenticeship schools, religious educational centres in initial VET, and various public institutions managed by the labour associations from the Dictatorship. Thus, VET system was a very weak education sub-system and it was one of the main problems to develop a more balanced and founded advanced industrial economy.

In the early 1990s, both initial VET and further VET began a rapid process of change, with two main features. First, a process of governance negotiation among several public and private actors, where state and public actors increased their role in managing the VET system. Second, a growing influence of supra-national models, especially at the EU level, thereby amounting to its hybridation process. The consequence has been the construction of a highly hybrid model, where, under a general state governance, firms, social partners and markets collaborate with different roles in both VETs. Whereas initial VET has adopted a clear state-centred system, further VET has been mainly developed through bipartite arrangements by labour market partners. The model is even more differentiated if cross regional dynamics are taken into account in the regionalized federal system in Spain. Although the new VET system still presents many problems and limitations, by 2009, both initial and further VET systems have become central to the economic and educational challenges of Spain, and a critical aspect in moving towards the knowledge and learning society.

The Lisbon Agenda as the roadmap of the European education systems

Bonal, Xavier

*Sociology, Autonomous University of Barcelona
Bellaterra-Barcelona, Spain*

Tarabini, Aina

*Sociology, Autonomous University of Barcelona
Bellaterra-Barcelona, Spain*

Albaigés, Bernat

*Sociology, Autonomous University of Barcelona
Bellaterra-Barcelona, Spain*

Keywords

European Union, Open Method of Coordination, Educational Agenda, Politics of Education, Education policies

In 2000 the European Council held in Lisbon set a new strategic objective for the European Union: 'It should become the most competitive and dynamic knowledge-based economy in the world capable of sustainable economic growth with more and better jobs and greater social cohesion?'. Within the overall strategy for the EU to achieve the stated goal, key importance is attributed to Education and Training Systems. Moreover, according to the EU, a fundamental transformation of education and training throughout Europe is necessary to face the current European socio-economic challenges. In this context, the Lisbon Agenda has set a political agenda in Education and Training that all the member states have committed to achieve in 2010. This agenda not only fixes the strategic objectives that should orient national educational priorities and policies, but it also sets a method to ensure the success of the stated goals: the Open Method of Coordination. The objective of the communication is twofold: on the one hand, it presents a theoretical analysis oriented to explore the changes generated by the Lisbon Agenda in the mandate, the capacity and the governance of the European education systems; on the other hand, it presents an empirical analysis oriented to analyse the performance of national systems with regard to the 5 benchmarks of the Education and Training 2010 Programme. The focus of the empirical analysis will be the Spanish and Catalan case, in comparison with other EU member states. This twofold analysis will allow us to present a critical statement of the Lisbon Agenda both in terms of its conception and implementation.

The perceived (un)desirability of segregated schools: who really wants segregation?

Symons, Katrien

*Education and Lifelong Learning, Higher Institute of Labour Studies
Leuven, Belgium*

Vandenbroucke, Anneloes

Education and Lifelong Learning, Higher Institute of Labour Studies Leuven, Belgium

Keywords

primary education, Flanders, school segregation, school choice

Like in many other European countries, Belgium is dealing with a high degree of ethnic segregation in education. In Flemish cities especially, native and immigrant children seem to attend separate schools more than can be expected based on neighborhood composition. Still, hardly any sociological research has been done in Flanders on the causes of ethnic segregation, and the degree to which segregation is perceived as desirable or undesirable by parents of different socio-economic and ethnic groups. This means that little is known about the public support for a desegregation policy and that no empirical data are available to help design such a policy.

The fact that Flemish parents are free to enroll their child in the school of their choice, could suggest that parents prefer ethnically segregated schools. Segregation theories (especially those developed in the field of residential segregation) confirm that the individual preferences of the "choice makers" are indeed one of the important mechanisms that lead to segregation. On the other hand it is also shown that the individual choice makers do not always perceive the outcome of their combined choices as a desired situation. Therefore, the ethnic school composition as a motive for school choice will be investigated separately from the perceived desirability of segregated schools in general.

For the gathering of the data, a large sample of 2635 parents with a child in the first grade of the primary school was invited to fill in a standardized questionnaire. As the data gathering was in the final phase at the moment of writing this proposal, the results are still tentative. Generally, it is expected that social and ethnic segregation will be considered an undesirable situation, while at the same time ethnic school composition will play a role in individual school choice behavior. Furthermore, it is expected that the degree to which ethnic composition plays a role in individual school choice and the degree to which segregation is considered as (un)desirable, will differ according to the social-economic and ethnic background of the parents.

The Role of Family Factors in the School Success of Pupils with low Psychological Involvement in Education

Agnes, David-Kacso

*Sociology and Social Work, Babes-Bolyai University, Cluj-Napoca
Cluj-Napoca, Romania*

Viorela, Ducu-Foamete

*Sociology and Social Work, Babes-Bolyai University Cluj-Napoca
Cluj-Napoca, Romania*

Keywords

educational involvement, educational support, family characteristics, school success

This research is based on the outcome of a national survey for The social diagnosis of school success using the social measure of school success and designing evidence-based intervention methods project, that aims to identify and evaluate those conditions of children's social environment which influence their school success. The project is mainly focused on validating in Romania an instrument designed at the Chapel Hill University (USA), called the School Success Profile which provides information about characteristics of the youth's four main microsistems: neighbourhoods, school, peer relationships and family.

This study propose to examine the relationship between family characteristics and the school results of children with low psychological involvement in education. The family related dimensions considered here are : family togetherness, emotional support, home educational environment, educational support and school expectations.

Our findings show that satisfaction of the emotional needs of children in the family are related to higher degree of school success even when parental educational support doesn't determine differences in school outcomes.

We also verify the relationship between family characteristics (emotional factors and educational support) and school results of children in families where mothers are working abroad.

The identified results show directions of intervention at family level in order to improve the degree of school success of youth with low involvement in education, in order to prevent school dropout.

The role of social capital in applicants' strategies in Russian regional markets of higher education

Dayanova, Elina

sociology, SU-HSE

Moscow, Russia

Keywords

applicant's strategies, social capital, Higher Education, market

The present paper describes a study that will examine the role of social capital in applicants' strategies on Russian regional markets of higher education using primarily the database provided by the Laboratory of institutional analysis of economic reforms and the secondary data gathered from federal web-site www.edu.ru. More precisely, the research will be concerned with the role of strong and weak ties in applicants' strategies under different market structures. It is argued that while the social capital literature has produced many insights, a number of conceptual and statistical problems exist with the current use of social capital concept. Employing the social network approach a model that considers social capital effect will be designed. It is anticipated that the results of this study will yield important insight into both the understanding of the role of social capital in applicants' strategies and the consequences of social network deployment under different market structures.

The role of suggestion in the process of socialization

Zielinski, Aleksander Milosz

Institut für Soziologie, Universität Bern Bern, Switzerland

Keywords

world culture, world citizenship, suggestion,

Inspired by recent work exploring the importance of the 'suggestive realm' for society (e.g. Blackman 2007, 2008; Campbell, 2006; Orr 2006) I intend to focus on a topic which has not been yet covered systematically, namely the process of socialisation. Numerous studies of the neo-institutionalist school around John Meyer (Benavot und Braslavsky 2006; Frank et al. 2000; McEneaney und Meyer 2000; Schissler und Soysal 2005; Schofer und Meyer 2005; Wong 1991) have shown that since World War II a substantial process of homogenisation has been going on worldwide in the field of education: Curricular changes around the world copy each other, enrolment patterns are isomorphic, organizational structures parallel each other etc. For Meyer (2008) the aim of this process is the education of 'world citizens'.

So far only little attention has been drawn to the process how an individual is formed into a world citizen. I propose to identify 'suggestions' as the linguistic function which facilitates this: As Laclau and Mouffe (1985) convincingly demonstrated, in a purely differential system meaning can never be fixed. That's why hegemonial articulations around so called 'empty signifiers' have to be articulated to temporarily close such a system of meanings. In practice discursive elements are being appropriated by the rhetorical figure of suggestion: a fictional whole is being projected while at the same time the individual in question is being affectively influenced to believe/assume that a discursive element is able to close the gap between the subject and the fictional whole.

From my point of view it seems obvious that in the field of education a huge number of concepts are at work and function through suggestions. The most basic ones are humanism (the idea that everyone is a human being which includes specific characteristics while excluding the possibility of others) and masculinism/feminism (the notion that biological gender differences influence what we can or cannot do, become etc.). I intend to develop these ideas in more detail and exemplify them before closing with an outlook on possible areas for future research.

Underschooled youths and adults in Portugal and Brazil: targets of the same logic of conformity

Alves, Natália

*Ciências da Educação, Universidade de Educação
Lisboa, Portugal*

Rummert, Sonia

*UI&DCE, Universidade de Lisboa
Lisboa, Portugal*

Keywords

Underschooled youth and adults, VET, ideological conformity

In this paper we analyse some measures concerning educational policy targeted at underschooled youths and adults in Portugal and Brazil. Despite their differences, both countries present strong similarities due to their semi-peripheral condition, as they show themselves especially receptive to the ideologies and directions issued by supranational organizations such as BIRD, IMF and Unesco in the case of Brazil and OECD and European Commission in the case of Portugal. Common to all these organizations is the defence of an instrumental conception of education for employability, for productivity, for competitiveness and for social cohesion. Transformed into merchandise, education plays a fundamental role in the consolidation of the new spirit of capitalism (Boltansky & Chiappello, 1999; Mészáros, 2002).

The Portuguese and Brazilian governments adhered to the thesis that their position in the international division of labour is the result of the low level of qualification of the working class. As a consequence they have implemented, since the beginning of the 21st century, some educational measures oriented towards the raise of the educational and professional qualification levels. Within the scope of this paper, the analysis comprises the New Opportunities Programme in Portugal and the Programme for the Inclusion of Youth (PROJOVEM), especially the PROJOVEM Worker, in Brazil. In short, the NOP aims at qualifying and certifying one million workers, rendering the completion of 12th grade as a minimum educational reference level and enrolling half of the secondary students in VET courses. The PROJOVEM aims at allowing the completion of the fundamental course (compulsory education) together with professional training for one million and four hundred thousand young people who had never completed it.

The analysis allows us to demonstrate that these measures contribute to increase the functional subordination of the educational policies to the economic interests and to reinforce the ideological conformity of Portuguese and Brazilian working classes.

Understanding Contemporary Educational Changes in Europe

Kantzara, Vasiliki

Sociology, Panteion University of Social and Political Sciences Athens, Greece

Keywords

education, sociology, role, Bologna, functions

The last two decades, a burgeoning interest in education is witnessed worldwide. International organisations and government education policy in several western countries place education in the middle of public attention in order to introduce more or less extensive reforms. Education policy gives off a feeling of emergency in terms of 'either we change or we perish' in the context of a globalised market economy, perceived as highly competitive.

The Bologna Declaration of June 1999 marks the beginning of collaboration between European countries in introducing changes in tertiary education. Evaluating higher education and teaching staff, as well as the designing of a common system of graduate and postgraduate studies are considered to be the major innovative education policy measures. Evaluating the work of universities is an attempt to apply the notion of 'accountability' in education, the same way as in business corporations. A common system of university studies aims at facilitating students' mobility across Europe as well as comparison between different education systems.

Aspired educational changes are based on a view about the profits to be gained by the institution of education for society as a whole, a thought that was formulated at least in philosophy very early in history. Classical, and more recent sociological theories showed that the functioning of an education system is complex and multifaceted: it is related to other societal institutions in various ways and levels and it contributes both to societal preservation and transformation. Currently, theorists ask themselves what educational aims shall prevail, teaching for citizenship and global solidarity or teaching for economic survival in a competitive world?

The questions that arise are: How do we understand and interpret recent educational changes? Do these changes alter the role education plays in society, and if so, in what ways?

The answer to the questions posed above is based on a theoretical framework, drawn on sociological approaches, and on a bibliographical study in the field of social functions of education, in sociology of education.

Voices from within school - young peoples' room for citizenship within reconfigured educational and social systems

Macedo, Eunice

Faculdade de Psicologia e de Ciências da Educação e CIIE, Universidade do Porto Porto, Portugal

Costa Araújo, Helena

Faculdade de Psicologia e de Ciências da Educação, Universidade do Porto Porto, Portugal

Keywords

transnational regulation, students' voice, educational reconfiguration, rankings, young citizenship(s)

This paper will be developed around three main questions: Which are the connections among the national educational system schools' performance concerns and the transnational regulation of education? Which are the meanings of the rankings and how do secondary schools' rankings affect students' construction as European citizens? How do students perceive schooling and schools' location in table leagues, within the learning Europe?

Tensions seem to arouse between the globally structured educational agenda, whose lead role is played at supranational level and State's decision power. In the light of a new educational order, within a context of educational transnational regulation, national states seem to be issued the mediation role between the principles of comparability, competitiveness, mobility, and the ideals of a democratic school that comprises individual and group differences, and that is understood in its potential for human development and citizenship enlargement. In face of efficiency and quality guarantee worries, which are patent in soft law regulative educational politics, at the European level, and that are imported to public politics of education in Portugal, as hard law, how to reconcile the guarantee and reinforcement of "school for all" at secondary school level, the expectancies of academic excellence shaped under middle class views and the qualification demands towards the access to high education and the work market, in this European framework? Is there room for positive/inclusive change within the national educational field?

Rankings are understood within such educational evaluative framework in accordance with the accountability obligation rendered by the State to more global power. Which is the space reserved and preserved for young peoples' citizenship within this educational, social, and political background? And how do young citizens envisage and express their present and future location in these reconfigured systems? Students' voices potential to build, report and interpret the social order and to produce knowledge about it is assumed in an attempt to gather views from within school that capture its interconnections with more global socio-political systems. This is a branch of the Educational Sciences PhD larger approach, which tries to understand young peoples' emergent voices, in an educational context embodied by the rankings.

Welfare-oriented education policy - Wind of change in the relationship of education and social policies in Germany

Randhahn, Solveig

Institute for Political Science, Westfälische Wilhelms-Universität Münster Münster, Germany

Keywords

Social Policy, change, Welfare State, education policy

The political debates about the German welfare state are characterized by a reorientation in the setting of priorities: The German Agenda 2010 based on principles like activation, capabilities and preventive measures, determine the discussions over the organization of a sustainable welfare system. Whereas other European welfare states already include education policy as a component of their welfare system, in Germany a perspective change to a more preventive social investment state can be recognized only during the last years. In this regard education policy receives more attention both from politicians as well as from political scientists. These developments lead to the hypotheses that Germany is characterized by increasing cross-sectional policies in the education and social policy sector with the purpose to reach a new balance between "old and new social risks". This assumption includes two central questions that are examined in my research project:

1. What characterizes a welfare-oriented education discourse in Germany?
2. Did this discourse lead to a change in the relationship of German education and social policy?

To investigate these research questions three variables have been elaborated in a preliminary investigation to explain the developing change in Germany: a changing understanding of the welfare state; a structural change in society; the influence of Europeanization and globalization.

These variables are the basis for the main investigation - a cross sectional analysis of the education policy in four federal states. By means of a qualitative document analysis, sociopolitical references in the respective education policies are discovered. The scientific interest refers to the question to what extent the education policy interests of the German federal states converge with or rather diverge from the welfare policy concepts of the German Federal Government. The research project aims to develop indicators which create a qualitative measure for the shifting relationship between education and social policy.

RN11

Sociology of Emotions

"I've got him ..." - Emotions/affects in online mediated love markets: A poststructuralist approach

Wetzel, Dietmar J.

*Institute of Sociology, University of Berne
Berne, Switzerland*

Keywords

subjectivation, love markets, online dating, affects/emotions, poststructuralism

For a person dating online the virtual search for a relationship seems more than ever one of the best options when looking for a partner. However, this seemingly ideal (relationships) market may be "polluted" by things outside of the non-economic field (Stäheli 2007). With a poststructuralist approach emotions or affects can be analyzed more closely, for example the way in which they contaminate the logic of the homo oeconomicus and also the strategies/tactics of the subjects when choosing different partners. In general, affects can be described as the ability to affect someone or to be affected by someone (Deleuze/Guattari 1996). While it is not possible to localize affects in space and the stress is often put on structural aspects, emotions are individually attributable and belong to the area of influence of subjects.

(1) Optimization of the choice of partners is possible and even desired by the unleashed competition. It is an empirical question how affects that are not controllable by the affected person contaminate the practices of online dating and change the chances for success on the market, resulting in a new mode of subjectivation understood as self-interest.

(2) With Eva Illouz (2006) relationships can be described as cognitive objects that can be analyzed by a rational cost-benefit analysis. The only obstacle lies in the over-estimation of one's own market value. It would be interesting to examine to what extent (unconscious) affects cross the plans of a subject that has been trimmed on optimization by guidebooks.

(3) The economics of abundance and the "absence in the presence" (Derrida) require efficient control strategies in the search for the right partner. We have to explore how the (new) access opportunities and the active handling of one's own actions and emotions lead to new forms of classification.

"It doesn't feel right - emotional regime and bureaucratic empathy in the Swedish Migration Board"

Wettergren, Åsa

Department of Social Studies, Karlstad University

Karlstad, Sweden

Keywords

Migration, bureaucracy, emotional regime, emotion work, asylum seekers

This study explores the emotional regime and employee emotion work at one of the Swedish Migration Board's departments for the investigation of asylum requests. Do employees reflect on the power over life and death implied in the decisions they make? How are emotions used, managed and organized in response? To what extent do case officers make use of their discretionary powers as part of emotion management?

Between March 2008 and February 2009 I visited the department at four occasions, each time following a different case officer. All together the data consists of 12 semi-structured qualitative interviews; 8 observations of asylum request hearings; and extensive field notes from informal observations. Second-hand data (internal documents, reports, statistics, and newspaper articles) were also collected and analysed.

The emotional regime of the department revolves around the sacred symbol of the Alien's Act and government directives. The management is proud of reducing turnaround time and increasing flexibility to meet the unpredictable influx of requests. To case officers, safe-guarding the legal rights of the applicant in a fair and neutral investigation - regardless of the outcome - is a source of pride. They struggle to overcome perceived obstacles; e.g. the failure of legal assistants to deliver correct pleas; and the failure of applicants to deliver the truth. Discretionary power is used to "test" key cases (changing practice) and sometimes used in favour of female applicants. Feelings routinely help ordering and evaluating information. Uncertainty is transferred to the courts, trusting that all rejections will be tried there.

The organization of emotion in bureaucracy focuses procedure and thereby makes feelings of responsibility for the human consequences seem irrational.

"You won't mention it, will you?" - On emotional and ethical dilemmas in doing biographical research

Ruokonen-Engler, Minna

Social Sciences, Goethe University Frankfurt/Main, Germany

Keywords

feeling rules, emotion work, biographical narrative interview, body management, ethical reasoning

In this paper, I will analyze some emotional and ethical dilemmas that I was confronted with while conducting biographical narrative interviews for my PhD thesis about migration processes, ethnicity and gender constructions in biographies of migrant women. With the help of case study vignettes and some interview sequences I will firstly show what kind of dilemmas emerged during the interviewing. Secondly, I will explain how these dilemmas were solved in the particular situation. Thirdly, I will discuss what kind of theoretical challenges these dilemmas pose to the method of biographical narrative interviewing in particular and to the biographical research in general. Consequently, I seek to challenge the method of biographical narrative interviewing just as a means of data collection. I will discuss this method from an interactive point of view as a reciprocal un/balanced power relation that demands emotion work, feeling rules, body management, and ethical reasoning. The lingering questions are, however, how to integrate these aspects in the analysis of the biographical narrative interviews and what epistemological and methodological consequences should be drawn from this.

'Emotional Liberation' Among Women Peace Activists In Israeli Society

Benski, Tova

The College of Management ? Academic studies, Dept. of Behavioral Sciences Tel-Aviv, Israel

Keywords

women's activism, disenchantment, emotional liberation

This paper aims at discussing processes of disenchantment and distrust that have evolved within the women's peace movement in Israeli society. Women's peace movements represent a relatively new phenomenon in Israeli civil society. This trend began with a small number of organizations immediately following the breakout of the first Lebanon War in June 1982. By the turn of the third millennium, two distinct waves could be identified. The first wave began after the outbreak of the first Palestinian Intifada, in January 1988, and receded in 1993/1994 with the signing of the Oslo Agreement. The second wave of women's peace activism, initiated with the onset of the Intifada al-Aqsa (October 2000), and is still active, though it has passed its peak. Throughout this period of time, a central theme that has emerged during my ongoing research on these movements was that of a processes of disenchantment from Israeli society with its dominant ideology, from Zionism, the Israeli policy in the occupied territories, and from their ability to promote significant changes in Israeli politics. These processes will be discussed with a reference to McAdam's (1982) concept of "Cognitive Liberation" along the lines suggested by Flam (2005), in an attempt to advance an approach of processes of "emotional liberation".The discussion will be based on data collected over more than 20 years of studies of women's peace movements in Israel.

A Sensual Economy of Emotions: Commodified connections in Buenos Aires's international tango scene

Törnqvist, Maria

Department of Sociology, Stockholm University Sweden,

Keywords

tango dancing, tourism, emotion labour, sensual economy

Drawing from an ethnographic study of tango tourism in Buenos Aires this paper explores global flows of emotional consumption. The industry around westerners travelling to Argentina with the specific aim of dancing tango is a recent phenomenon that allows a flourishing of myths, desires and images of exotic places. One objective of the paper is to set eyes on the reconstructions of intimate life in the context of complex intersections of socio-economic orders, gender, ethnicity and sexuality. Looking at tango tourism as a global economy, it appears as a form of "emotion labour" where certain practices and experiences are commercialized (such as the example of dance-escorts, mainly provided by Argentine men to European and North-American women). However, what makes this a yet more interesting empirical case is its character of a market in a cross section. I argue that a strict material analysis is insufficient if we want to understand informal sensual economies like that of tango dancing. Money makes up a part of the world, not at least as a consequence of the harsh Argentine economy, but the main values at stake are primarily others. The formation of temporary and steady dance partners is a complicated process where people negotiate dancing skills, "chemistry", physical appearance and social status - and as a consequence of this: a palette of emotional repertoires. When adding the dimension of tourism, follows a spectrum of affect ranging from exotic fantasies and romantic dreams of blending together with the Other (sexually, mentally or dance-wise), to colonial nostalgia, sentimental longings for other worlds and feelings of shame and fears of being another "fooled foreigner". The objective of the paper is to explore such imaginaries and emotional practices as part of a sensual economy, and thereby making a larger claim that the organization of social institutions and markets are always also emotional arrangements.

A Sociology of Happiness: reflections and perceptions

Hyman, Laura

Department of Sociology, University of Surrey Guildford, United Kingdom

Keywords

measurement, reflections, , Happiness

The last thirty years have seen a rapid proliferation of social scientific research into happiness and well-being. In particular, social indicators research has emphasised the importance of happiness measures at a national level, alongside more traditional economic or 'objective' measures like GDP-growth and per-capita income, for the monitoring of societal progress. Much of this work - which mainly utilises measures of happiness derived from survey variables - has been undertaken within the disciplines of economics and psychology.

Despite all of this, the study of happiness within sociology has remained a rather under-researched area. This paper seeks to demonstrate the way in which sociology can problematise the idea of happiness that is conceived by both the public and other social scientists alike; what is it that is actually being measured? Why is it seen to be so important to have measures of happiness with which to monitor progress? Why is there this apparent 'obsession' with the achievement of happiness in contemporary western societies? And what are the different factors that make up the socio-cultural landscape upon which 'being happy' is located? Such questions are often overlooked in happiness research; instead, it is assumed to be a natural or inevitable goal toward which we as individuals aim in our everyday lives. This paper will put forward some arguments from sociological theory that help to answer these questions.

The paper then goes on to present some preliminary findings from a qualitative study in which in-depth interview data from a small sample of British adults highlight a number of ideas that together form a sociological understanding of people's perceptions of and reflections upon the idea of happiness. Two further questions are then raised: what can this tell us about the way in which happiness is socially constructed? And what are the implications of all of this for the measurement of happiness?

Affective communication, social and biological roots

Zagalo, Nelson

*Communication Sciences, Universidade do Minho
Braga, Portugal*

Gonçalves, Albertino

*Department of Sociology, Universidade do Minho
Braga, Portugal*

Keywords

affectivity, culture, communication, emotion

Studies in fields of neuroscience (Damásio, 1994) and psychology (Frijda, 1986) demonstrated the importance of emotion for the survival system as an organism and as a subject. With this approach substantiated by the natural evolution premises (LeDoux, 1999) they launched new interrogations about the prewired conceptions of life against the culture-learned processes. On the other side the survival or adaptive functioning of the emotions (Lang and Bradley, 1998) served also to put a strong emphasis in the spirit of the union and collectivity. Survival would be only manageable for humans if we took into account the human bonding possibility (Bowlby, 1969), which would be dependent of the mammalian evolution (Whybrow, 1999).

Taking into account the emotion impact in our species and observing it as a generator of socialization we could say that communication, which is a social action, depends on the possibility to establish connections between humans, and depends of the individual emotions, which are relied to the prewired survival needs. Beyond the natural existence, emotions are strategic in communication, becoming action targets. That's what happens, in the interpersonal communication, for example in Goffman studies on the dramaturgical perspective of interaction (1959) and in the most recent practices studied by the affective computing area.

For that matter it's in our interest to demonstrate in this paper the impact of biological emotions in the social domain related with the questions of survival and natural evolution and then establish linking to the communication use of affectivity.

Bowlby, J., (1969), Attachment and Loss, Vol. 3: Loss: Sadness and Depression, Basic Books

Damásio, António, (1994), O Erro de Descartes, Europa- América, Lisboa, 1995

Frijda, N.H., (1986), The Emotions, Studies in Emotion and Social Interaction, Cambridge University Press, Cambridge

Goffman, Erving (1959), The Presentation of Self in Everyday Life, Anchor Books, USA

Lang, P. J.; Bradley, M. M. & Cuthbert, B. N. (1998), Emotion, Motivation and Anxiety: Brain Mechanisms and Psychophysiology. Biology Psychiatry, 44: 1248-1263.

LeDoux, Josef, (1998), The Emotional Brain: The Mysterious Underpinnings of Emotional Life, Simon & Schuster

Whybrow, Peter (1999), interview, in Why Dogs Smile & Chimpanzees Cry (1999), Carol L. Fleisher.

Authority Styles as Emotional Regimes: Finland 1945-2005

Kantola, Anu

*Department of Communication, University of Helsinki
Helsinki, Finland*

Keywords

emotional styles, Emotional regimes, Finland, authority

The paper examines the public authority styles in the post-war Finland and in particular the revolutionary style of corporate authorities since 1960s. As Luc Boltanski and Eve Chiapello (2007) have hypothesized corporate authorities adopted a socially transformative role in the post war societies by developing new spirited authority styles, which can be characterized as revolutionary. A longitudinal qualitative analysis of the main Finnish current affair and business magazines, Suomen Kuvalehti and Talouselämä from 1945 to 2005 and tracks down how authority is performed in the stories concentrating on one person, i.e. in personal interviews and features. It is suggested that there emerge three distinct public authority styles: i) patriotic paternalism (1945-1975), ii) rational managerialism (1955-1980) and iii) enthusiastic individualism (1980-2000). These styles are seen as emotional regimes (Reddy 2001), which are in dynamic relation with each other. At the heart of each style are the positive feelings, a fantasy of "we", which give rise to it. Yet at the same time there is the darker side, negative and suppressed feelings, which often are addressed by the following regime. This dynamic has been clear especially in Finland since 1970s as corporate authorities have developed clearly a style of authority which can be characterized as revolutionary. Moreover, the corporate styles has had a wider societal impact, as also authority styles in other societal sectors have been clearly affected by it by mimicking the corporate style or otherwise being trapped in nostalgia or positioned in opposition to the revolutionary project.

Bullying, bystanders, emotions and ethics

Bloch, Charlotte

sociology, University of Copenhagen Copenhagen, Denmark

Keywords

emotions, ethics, Keyword: bullying, bystander

Bullying, bystanders, emotions and ethics

Bullying at the workplace has got increased attention during the last decades. Bullying is a specific interactional process between perpetrators, bystanders and victims. Research of bullying from the perspective of the bystander is rather limited. Bystanders, however, play a crucial role in bullying because they in a complex way contribute to the construction of a social reality that allows processes of bullying.

The purpose of the paper is to present the preliminary results of a qualitative analysis of bystander's experiences of bullying at the work place. The study was based on qualitative interviews with 45 employees. The interviewees were selected according to criteria of being witnesses, perpetrators and victims. All the interviewees, however, were asked to reconstruct experiences of processes of negative interactions from the above mentioned three different perspectives. They were also asked to reconstruct episodes in which they have felt different social emotions such as anger, shame, pride, fear, depressions, joy etc. and they were asked how they managed these emotions.

The purpose of the analysis is to explore the complex relationship between aroused emotions such as fear, shame, guilt, anger, ways of interpreting the social reality, ways of take or deny moral responsibility and different ways of acting as bystander. In the analysis I draw on Scheff's theory on shame and social bond, Collins' theory of interaction ritual, emotional energy and morality, Clark's theory of emotional experienced social place and Cohen's theory about denial and cognitive distortions. I also draw on general sociological literature about morality and ethics in modern society.

Collective Construction of persons between Habitus and Emotion

John, René

Institute for Social Sciences in Agriculture, University Hohenheim Stuttgart, Germany

Keywords

values, identity, community, habitus

Emotions of communities are often observed with fear as well as with hope. Tönnies' concept of community based on natural-will already included emotional aspects, while feelings for, and within the community provided its binding force. But the importance of emotions are abated by its society counterpart and its rational will. The following debates on the difference between society and community furthermore marginalized emotions along community under the perspective of modernization. The assumption that community and emotions are antiquated became stronger, notwithstanding Durkheim's effervescence and Weber's charismatic leadership taking effects in emotional communities.

Nevertheless there are good reasons to argue that emotions are a necessary momentum for the everlasting production of simplified self-descriptions viz. identity, thus being prerequisites for the development of modern individuality. The role of emotions for the reproduction of personal identity is closely connected to the respective habitus. Habitus appears as a set of implicit, schematic knowledge of scriptures, which is configured and confirmed by emotional experiences.

Through the analysis of an environmental catastrophe such as the flood of the river Oder in 1997, the importance of emotions could be revealed - most notably in situations of crisis. In such situations, expectations bound to habitus meet resistance to reality; becoming problematic and explicit, and consequently arguable. The expectations focus on the validity of values symbolizing the boundaries of particular communities. The disappointment of these expectations by exceptional circumstances renders an impact on the simplified self-descriptions - the identities. The relevant self-description can be stabilized by experiencing the constitution and confirmation of the validity of values in a new way within a particular community. The collective confirmed fulfillment of a newly constituted validity of values has a positive emotional effect, leading to the habitualization of the now expected value-validity. Individuals can describe themselves in a reassured way because the renewed self-descriptions and its implied values are proved for this particular community. The basic constitutive and confirmatory emotional process also casts a new light onto the status of communities. Communities henceforth appear as a modern phenomenon, which deals with the problem of stratificational unbound individuality.

Comte, Durkheim and social affectivity

Arppe, Tiina

*Sociology, University of Helsinki
Helsinki, Finland*

Keywords

religion, affectivity, social bond

The paper compares the affective theories of two grand classics of the French sociology, Auguste Comte and Émile Durkheim. Although Comte severely criticized his predecessor Saint-Simon for the "religious" and "sentimental" penchants, especially in the forefront in his later writings, he nonetheless developed himself a religious system for the new Humanity, which heavily leaned on the sentimental, even the instinctual component of man's being. Comte believed that the ideological reproduction of the society (reorganized in a new, "scientific" manner) requires, as its affective supplement, a positivist religion which assembles the universal love each individual feels for the Humanity as a common telos of affective attachment that constitutes the emotional and moral foundation of the new society. The model for this universal love was sought in a more concrete level (that of the familial love), but the more general moral problem it was destined to solve was rooted in the instinctual level: how to guarantee the dominance of the altruistic over the egoistic instincts (since for Comte, the "natural" instinct of man was towards egoism, i.e. towards self-preservation).

The very same problem, concerning the social need of regulation of man's "lower", biological (egoistic) instincts, constitutes the dynamic foundation of the Durkheimian theory of suicide. But whereas Comte goes looking for the primordial, affective model for his universal love of the Humanity on the individual level, for Durkheim the necessary regulation of the individual (destructive) passions can only be found in an affective force which is, right from the beginning, above the individuals and therefore capable of subjugating their egoistic impulses (this force being the society itself). Later, in his theory of religion, Durkheim emphasizes the integrative function of the religious realm, putting in the forefront the ritual side of religion, the "collective effervescence" binding the individuals together by the force of an affective "contagion" (whereas in the Comtean model the binding force is situated in the representation each member of the society makes of the universal Humanity). In spite of these differences Comte and Durkheim end up with a very consensual (non-repressional and non-violent) vision of society's affective foundation.

Conceptualizing grief sociologically

Jakoby, Nina

*Sociological Institute, University of Zurich
Zurich, Switzerland*

Keywords

grief, theory, emotion

Grief is a fairly uncharted territory in the field of the sociology of emotions worthy of closer scrutiny. Grief has mostly been known to be a neglected theoretical and empirical object of sociological research. It is due time to establish grief as a topic of the sociology of emotions and to confront the narrow psychological conception of grief. The dominant theoretical perspectives on grief derive from psychology and psychiatry. They focus on the individual responses to the loss of a significant other, rather than on the social and structural context in which grief occurs. The psychological literature deals with the symptoms and consequences of grief more than theorizing grief as an emotion. In the medical model, grief resembles an illness from which one should recover ("grief as a disease" vs. "grief as an emotion"). On the contrary, from a sociological point of view, grief is defined as a social phenomenon, because it emerges from relationships, attachments, expectations, and obligations (see Charmaz/Milligan 2006). Furthermore, there is a missing link between general sociological theories of emotions and the phenomenon of grief: "Grief plays a limited role in general sociological theories of emotions" (Charmaz/Milligan 2006: 517). My aim is to relocate "grief" as a topic of the sociology of emotions and to discuss the contribution of general sociological theories of emotions for the explanation and understanding of grief. For example, from the perspective of symbolic interactionism, the loss of a significant other means a loss or crisis of the self. Grief can be interpreted as a new construction of the self and everyday life. Other concepts focus attention on grief as an emotional role ("grief role") and the importance of feeling rules and the normative regulation of emotions (Fowlkes 1990, Hochschild 1983).

Desexualization and sexualization within phases of formalization and informalization

Wouters, Cas

ASW, Utrecht University
Amsterdam, Netherlands

Keywords

desexualization, sexualization, emancipation of emotions

This paper discusses long-term changes in sexuality by connecting and integrating them into phases of formalization and informalization. The process of formalization of manners and disciplining of people as it proceeded until the late nineteenth century is related to and comprises a process of desexualization: controlling the dangers of sexuality by increasingly repressing sex and restricting it within marriage and by increasingly regulating sexual urges via the inner fears of a rather rigid and authoritarian conscience. This resulted in an increasingly stronger taboo on sex in public and in private, and to a large extent it was even banned from consciousness.

From the end of the nineteenth century onwards, there was an informalization of manners and an "emancipation of emotions": emotions that had been denied and repressed, including all those related to sexuality, (re)gained access to consciousness and wider acceptance in more informal social codes. In this way, the process of informalization is connected to what can be called a process of sexualization. The paper discusses the present use of this concept, which is mainly moral and loaded with negative connotations. Moral motives often result in an exaggeration of research findings of sexualization in this sense. This paper argues to interpret these findings within the framework of sexualization as a process. It comprises a polemic between the two concepts, arguing against this moral concept and in favour of a process concept of sexualization, a sexualisation that refers to the emancipation of sexuality and its integration into everyday life.

Discourses of Emotion in Israeli Soldiers' Testimonials

Katriel, Tamar

*Communication, University of Haifa
Haifa, Israel*

Shavit, Nimrod

*Communication, University of Haifa
Haifa, Israel*

Keywords

emotions, social movement, soldiers, testimony

In the spring of 2004, a core activist group of recently discharged Israeli soldiers, who had spent much of their mandatory military service in the Occupied Palestinian Territories, launched a testimonial project designed to give voice to their personal experiences active duty. They coalesced under the name of Breaking the Silence, using the numerous photographs and oral testimonies they had gathered as the basis for a awareness-raising campaign conducted in a range of forms and venues, including a traveling photography exhibition, an edited collection of testimonial booklets, articles in the mainstream press, alternative guided tours in the West-Bank town of Hebron, and a well-designed website.

Alongside factual reports of the soldiers' routine military activities and the hardships suffered by the Palestinian population under the occupation regime, the soldiers' verbal testimonies are punctuated by self-reflective statements articulating their responses to what they saw and what they did. We analyze these statements by building on previous research related to images of soldierhood and their gendered dimensions. We propose that the intensive focus on emotional experience is crucial to the social role of the Breaking the Silence testimonial project as a counter-discourse that challenges hegemonic views of the soldierly identity. More specifically, we note the soldiers' preoccupation with the tension between expressivity and emotional control and between structural power and existential vulnerability, as well as their back-and-forth movement between moments of emotional distancing on the one hand and empathic identification on the other. Finally, we examine the ways in which "moral feelings" such as shame and guilt are both directly and indirectly addressed by the soldier-witnesses in their insistence on re-moralizing the field of martial action in which they find themselves trapped.

Emotion Sickness. Pro-Ana Virtual Communities

Cantó-Milà, Natàlia

*Arts & Humanities, UOC (Open University of Catalonia)
Barcelona, Spain*

Seebach, Swen

*Arts & Humanities, UOC (Open University of Catalonia)
Barcelona, Spain*

Keywords

religion, internet, self harming, invulnerability, body/mind distinction

This paper focuses on virtual communities of anorexic girls and boys: their blogs, their forums and chat rooms create a virtual space in which they exchange their experiences with eating disorders and often encourage themselves not to give up on their eating disorder - which they view as a life style rather than an illness. This paper analyses the discourse on anorexia created, re-created and shared in and by these virtual communities. Special attention is paid to the emotions that are attached to their commitment to anorexia, which they personify and name Ana, and to the virtual community. The thesis presented here is that the emotions that lead people to develop this eating disorder, and to "choose" it as a lifestyle as well as to virtually engage in dignifying it as such, are deeply and intrinsically connected with the core characteristics of late modern capitalist societies. They cannot be understood from an individualistic perspective, as mental illnesses, but through a perspective from the sociology of emotions in close relation with a sociology of late (or post)modernity.

Emotion: development of the mind and physical expression

Costa, Juliana

*Departamento de Comunicação e Arte, Universidade de Aveiro
Guimarães, Portugal*

Oliveira, Lúcia

*Departamento de Comunicação e Arte, Universidade de Aveiro
Aveiro, Portugal*

Antunes, Maria João

*Departamento de Comunicação e Arte, Universidade de Aveiro
Aveiro, Portugal*

Correia, Secundino

*Chief Innovation Officer, CNOTINFOR
Coimbra, Portugal*

Estanqueiro, Marco

*Departamento de Engenharia Informática, Faculdade de Ciências e Tecnologia da Universidade de Coimbra
Coimbra, Portugal*

Keywords

communication, emotion, mind, facial expressions

Social relations are based on emotional responses whether in face-to-face communication between human beings or even other types of communication between humans and virtual companions. The emergence of virtual companions and the establishment of long term relationships with humans raise the question of the importance of emotion in this process. Emotion enables the development of a more believable relationship with a virtual companion, considering that this is the only way humans can perceive the virtual companion's emotional state and intentions. It is also through emotions that we relate with other people. Emotions are what make us unique and identifiable.

The most immediate way of expressing emotion and communicating is through our body, mainly facial expressions, body gestures and speech. They assure a more natural interaction between humans and virtual companions. Facial expressions are a key element in non-verbal communication and therefore it is our objective to understand how they can engage both humans and companions. It has been said that a virtual companion capable of maintaining a natural interaction with humans specially students can increase their motivation, hence the importance of understanding how to develop the companion's mind and provide him with emotions and the capability of expressing them.

In this paper we aim to present a model, being developed in LIREC project, for expressing emotions through facial expression and to present an architecture proposal for the development of the virtual companion's mind based on the FLAME model, Fuzzy Logic Model Of Emotions. It is our goal to show how emotions can induce long-term relationships with virtual companions and which are the implications, as well as how this relates to the companion's mind model expressed through the companion's actions.

Emotional aspects of work life and professional career

Kubczak, Anna

Sociology of Organization and Management, University of Łódź, Faculty of Economics and Sociology, Institute of Sociology Łódź, Poland

Keywords

work life, organization, emotions, narrative interview, professional career

The aim of the paper is to present the emotional aspects of professional careers described in narratives of people in different phases of their work life. The author will argue that emotions, commonly recognized as subjective states experienced by an individual, and their meaning for an individual should be reconstructed with reference to actions and social processes in which an actor is involved. The emotions have temporal dimensions and they may be regarded as a kind of process located within wider organizational and social context, not only interactional one.

The focus of the paper will be on answering questions: what is the difference between observation, semi-structured interview and narrative interview according to obtained empirical data on emotions? What kind of analytical concepts may be used to describe and explain emotional aspects of work life and professional career? How to go beyond declarative layer of data and reach the one which is meaningful but often hidden because of interactional specific of interview situation?

The paper will refer to research on professional careers, based on semi-structured and narrative interviews and observations.

Emotional Encounters between Children and Social Welfare Professionals

Pinkney, Sharon

social Policy, The Open University Leeds, UK

Keywords

emotions, children, organisations, professionals

This paper explores the emotional and affective aspects of children and young people's participation within social welfare contexts in the UK. Professionals such as social workers and children's rights workers articulate, manage and negotiate the emotional when working with children and young people in different ways. Some professionals seek to insulate and distance themselves from this difficult work by using various strategies to manage the distress and discomfort. Avoidance is another strategy commonly deployed. In addition to these individual strategies, institutional responses to the emotional aspects of the work are unravelled.

The paper is based on extensive analysis of social care policy texts and in-depth interviews with policy and children's rights officers. It seeks to support and extend existing theorising on social policy and emotion by using organisational analysis and the psychosocial perspective to gain further insight into participation policy and practices.

The professional dilemmas involved in emotional management are discussed in relation to work with children and young people. A range of examples illustrate the complexity involved in negotiating and managing participation, as well as showing how this provokes a range of anxieties, strain and emotion for individual and groups of professionals as well as for the institutions of welfare. These include listening to children which in policy appears unambiguous but in practice is understood differently by children and professionals. The second example is multi-agency working, which is known to raise anxiety for professionals as well as often being difficult for children. Thirdly the discomfort professionals sometimes express at their own organisations in working with children is discussed. This third example relates to the conditions of labour within the new public management of modernised welfare services. These three examples are chosen as they are taken from individual, group and organisational levels of analysis.

Finally the dimensions of power that are enacted in relations between professionals and children are explored to understand the emotional aspects of these relationships between children, young people and welfare professionals.

Emotional Geographies of Teacher-parent Relations: A Case Study in Taiwan

Chen, Hsin-Jen

Centre for Teacher Education, National Chung Cheng University Chia-Yi, TAIWAN

Wang, Ya-Hsuan

Institution of Education, National Chung Cheng University Chia-Yi, TAIWAN

Keywords

Moral purpose, Emotional politics, Teacher-parent relations, Emotional geographies, Classical professionalism

This article seeks to explore how five dimensions of emotional geographies, based on Andy Hargreaves' theoretical framework, are used to analyze three primary teachers' perceptions of their interactions with parents in a Taiwanese primary school. Research findings illustrated that teacher-parent relations are investigated as emotional geographies, inescapable from teachers' judgment related to parents' sociocultural status, from teachers' moral purposes, from their notions of professionalism, from their hierarchically political distance from parents, and from the frequency to contact parents. Thus, Hargreaves' framework of emotional geographies is a useful lens to explore teacher-parent interactions. The paper closes with suggestions for policy considerations.

Emotional labour and emotional strain among Swedish prison officers

Lindberg, Odd

School of law, psychology and social work, University of Orebro Orebro, Sweden

Bruhn, Anders

School of humanities and social science, Orebro university Orebro, Sweden

Nylander, Per Ake

School of law, psychology and social work, Orebro university Orebro, Sweden

Keywords

emotional strain, rituals, Prison officers, emotional labour

Prison life has often been connected to different kinds of emotions. The emotional life of prison officers is though rarely explored. Prison officers meet, in their daily work with inmates, different emotional expressions. This can be aggressions but also deep sadness. In the interaction with inmates prison officers are involved in different modes of emotional labour performance. In this paper we will argue that there is an important relation between the different rituals that prison officers in different wings are involved in and the officers' emotional labour performance. Different rituals and different emotional labour also goes hand in hand with the development of differences in views about the inmates. Differences in interaction rituals and performance of emotional labour becomes clear when we compare officers in three kinds of wings, treatment wings, security wings and regular wings. Officers in security wings are more involved in formal rituals like counting inmates, visitations of inmates and visitors, and looking for contraband which leads to a more distanced and surface emotional labour. They also express a more negative view of the inmates, they being manipulative criminals. They also express a more us (officers) and them (inmates) attitude. Offices in treatment wings see the formal rituals more as hindrance in their daily work trying to motivate and create relations to the inmates. They are also involved in more spontaneous rituals together with the inmates which can create feelings of affinity and understanding. They also perform a more deep emotional labour interacting with inmates. This in turn leads to more emotional strain in this group. Compared to the officers in security wings, officers in treatment wings have a much more positive view of the inmates. In treatment wings the officers often talk about the inmates' good resources and stressing the importance of treating the inmates' with respect. In the regular wings we can see that the officers vary in their emotional labour performance between surface, and deep emotional labour in their interactions with inmates.

Emotional spaces

Körs, Anna

*Institut of Sociology, University of Hamburg
Germany,*

Keywords

identity, emotion, space

This paper argues that emotions play a central role in the process of constructing space which again is of high significance for the construction of identity and interpretations of the world (spatial turn). To neglect the emotional attachments to space is to miss out on or misunderstand much of the processes and forces of social life. An example is given by the great deal of attention to church buildings in East Germany as a widely secularised society where over 70% of the people are without religious affiliation. The reconstruction of the Dresdner Frauenkirche or the high civic engagement for the preservation of village churches in East Germany lie beyond the realm of rationality. To develop a notion of church buildings as emotional spaces it will be questioned what kind of emotions are attached to church buildings and what are the modes of construction? It will be drawn on an empirical study, including a standardised questioning of about 2.000 churchgoers (parish, citizens, tourists) and with a focus on five 13th century church buildings, two of them in Western Germany (Kiel, Lübeck) and two in Eastern Germany (Wismar, Stralsund). The crucial question is how such emotionally-charged spaces, variously conceived, hold potentials for well-being, commemoration, identification etc. and facilitate the development of civic society or can also be a trigger of exclusion, social conflict (as the discussions about major building projects of mosques in Germany reveal).

Emotional Value of Body Image and Self-Esteem

Kovacev, Asja Nina

*Department of Health Studies, University of Ljubljana
Ljubljana, Slovenia*

Keywords

emotion, self-esteem, body image, attractiveness

Body image refers to the persons' picture of their body in their mind. It is closely connected with their self-esteem and the predominant emotions, associated with their own body. It is also under strong influence of the persons' beliefs and attitudes as well as the ideals that prevail in the society. For females, as compared with males, there is a greater discrepancy between their perceived body size and their ideal body size. Female adolescents are even more preoccupied with physical appearance than women in other age groups. They are also more likely to identify themselves as overweight. They tend to be dissatisfied with their body weight, size, and shape. Since their feelings about themselves may be shaped by the attitudes of others, the overweight people may suffer from low self-esteem and have high levels of depression.

Body image is not necessarily the reflection of the persons' actual appearance. Even the real physical appearance differs in meaning and importance for males and females (particularly concerning their body weight and shape). Many women want to be slimmer, since slimness is regarded as beautiful, while fatness is viewed negatively. Therefore the persons' dissatisfaction with their appearance may cause serious emotional problems. Such people may be bereft of joy, happiness, liveliness and optimism. Instead of positive emotions they can experience despair, depression and even manifest auto-aggressive behaviour (above all, eating disorders, etc.).

While men tend to obtain their self-esteem through achievements, power status and control, women's self-concept and self-esteem are often based on desirability and attractiveness. Thus, women are under greater pressure than men to look well.

Emotions and Crime Media Narratives: Shifting Focus to Victims

Smolej, Mirka

*Criminological Unit, National Research Institute of Legal Policy
Helsinki, Finland*

Keywords

crime victims, emotiona, narratives, crime media

In this paper I discuss one of the most significant changes that have occurred in crime reporting during the last decades: the shift from portraying crimes and perpetrators to portraying crime victims and their experiences. This emotional transition has moved crime victims from having a merely functional role in crime narratives to being in a more and more focal position, their suffering increasingly constituting the subject position of the story. The crime victim is no longer portrayed as an unfortunate citizen but instead as a character that represents everyone and whose experiences are expected to be general and collective instead of individual and atypical.

Contemporary media narratives not only invite, but seem to actively encourage consumers to identify and empathise with victims of crime. This is done by making the viewers see what the victims are seeing and feel what the victims are feeling. The audience is also seduced to become emotionally involved with the narrative and to join in the punishment of the offender, who is portrayed as evil and beyond redemption. Nevertheless, crime media can also serve other kinds of needs and even be pleurably consumed. It can for example offer excitement, feeling of danger or enable cathartic experiences.

The emotional shift in news production that has occurred in several Western societies during recent decades is apparent also in Finland. For example, homicide reporting has become more sentimental and it appeals more and more to the subjective experiences of lay people. Moreover, the consequences of a homicide, such as grief and shock are stressed to a much larger extent than before. There appears to be a growing interest in emotion in the news media as more and more space is devoted to the representations of mourning in the coverage of major disasters or extraordinary deaths. These developments have taken place simultaneously with the growing amount of crime related material in Finnish media. It appears that the rise of the mediated victim image in crime reporting is heavily connected to the general "emotionalization" of news media witnessed in several countries.

Emotions and Ethnicity: Hurt Identities in a Post-War-Society

Mijic, Ana

Department of Sociology, University of Vienna Austria, <http://www.soz.univie.ac.at/>

Keywords

identity, War Experience, emotions, ethnicity, Collectives

Focusing on the analysis of social relations in post-war-societies, emotions seem to play an important role. Hatred, fear, grief, guilt, honor and dishonor as well as pride and shame are not merely symptomatic emotions in times of war, but also in the transformation processes of post-war times.

In an empirical study, I am investigating the (social) construction of "self" and of "others" in post-war societies. The analysis is centered on Bosnia and Herzegovina. During the war in this former Yugoslavian republic, the conflicting parties constructed identities which were characterized by intensive and powerful ethnic in-group/out-group differentiations. These differentiations - as one central outcome of ethnic mobilization - comprise specific emotional bonds to and within the in-group - like sympathy, pride, solidarity, etc. In contrast, hatred, fear, and mistrust are characteristic for the social relations between in-group and out-group.

However, after the end of war, actors were confronted with an entirely novel situation: New normative standards that rigorously delegitimize ethnic mobilization were induced by a third party - the international community. Because of this newly introduced set of normative standards and the fact that conflicting parties have to continue living together in one nation state beyond their own ethnic community, they are forced to perform new definitions of ethnic boundaries, i.e. a new "definition of the situation".

An initial analysis of the data I collected suggests that such transformation processes have specific emotional qualities and impacts, which I explore in more detail in this contribution. The central themes of my investigation revolve around the interrelation of particular cognitions ("patterns of interpretation") and emotions, the link between identity and emotion, and the relation between "collectives" ("collective identity") and emotions. More specifically, I am concerned with the antecedents and experiences of guilt and shame, with the role of pride and honor, and with the question whether the intervention of the international/european community is experienced as a kind of humiliation.

Emotions and Everydaylife: The "Homo Sentiens" Floating between Late Moderns Ambivalences

Cerulo, Massimo

Department of Sociology, University of Calabria

Italy, <http://www.sociologia.unical.it>

Keywords

experience, emotions, "hikikomori", ambivalence, everydaylife

The aim of this communication is to highlight some trends and countertrends that seem to characterize everydaylife of contemporary individuals. Starting from Simmel's analysis about modernity's peculiar forms of sociality (Simmel 1908; Levine 1971), I argue that the two social poles emphasized by the German sociologist seem to be stronger now than in the past. I notice growing stiffening between an inescapable need of loneliness and the necessity of relating with other individuals. In this context, it appears that the contemporary individual manifests his unease choosing different forms of experience to spread his emotionality.

My hypothesis identifies two new social and emotional poles in which it is possible to grasp this experiential stiffening: on the one hand, there are forms of experience, like the hikikomori phenomenon in Japan (Furlong 2008; Zielenziger 2007), that I call social retreat; on the other hand, there are forced collective identifications (Haroche 2008; Hochschild 2003; Lacroix 2001). I argue therefore that emotions are becoming now fundamental instruments in order to reach a compromise with everydaylife routines. In other words, I believe that the issue is learning how to "handle" our emotions.

The sociological concept of ambivalence is the leitmotif of my analysis (Nedelmann 1992). I believe that ambivalence is the key for a thorough enquiry into contemporary social relations. In fact, as I will try to make clear that it plays a primary role into social interactions and as well as in the social construction of emotions inside the two poles mentioned above.

References:

Furlong A., 2008, "The Japanese hikikomori phenomenon", «Sociological Review», 56(2), pp. 309-325.

Haroche C., 2008, "L'avenir du sensible: le sens et les sentiments en question", PUF, Paris.

Hochschild A.R., 2003, "The Commercialization of Intimate Life", University of California Press, Berkeley.

Lacroix M., 2001, "Le culte de l'émotion", Flammarion, Paris.

Levine D.N., 1971, "Introduction", on "Georg Simmel. On individuality and Social Forms", Chicago University Press, Chicago.

Nedelmann B., 1992, "L'ambivalenza come principio di socializzazione", «Rassegna Italiana di Sociologia», 33(2), pp. 233-55.

Simmel G., 1908, "Soziologie", Duncker&Humbolt, Berlin.

Zielenziger M. 2007, "Shutting Out the Sun", Nan A. Talese, New York.

Emotions and Habitus of Officers in Fictional Literature

Kuzmics, Helmut

Sociology, University of Graz Graz, Austria

Keywords

emotions, habitus, military, war, Habsburg Monarchy

In the new field of the sociology of emotions, the feelings related to war and the feelings of people involved in it are still scarcely dealt with. This holds also true for a historical sociology of emotions. The Habsburg Monarchy's reckless step of going to war in 1914 was motivated by old feudal considerations of honour as much as by more "rational" thinking, if the term is appropriate at all. Since 1848 at least - the year of the revolution - Habsburg officers formed a caste separated from the rest of society (Allmayer-Beck 1987, Rothenberg 1976) and they were shaped by a military-aristocratic "habitus" (Elias) in stark contrast to that of the working bourgeois. Although more and more officers were recruited from the (lower ranks of the) bourgeoisie, got very little salary and were even too poor to be in a position to marry, they stuck to the ideals and mores of a feudal warrior caste, except in those areas where technical skills were indispensable. A habitus evolved which combined bluntness, discipline of the barracks and feudal "courage", but - an Austrian particularity - which was also opposed to "knowledge" and unable to develop qualities of good "leadership" in battle: determination and boldness often gave way to passivity, faltering and dithering in the face of battle. The causes for this to occur are not easy to find: In this paper, I try to bring some light into this matter by analyzing novels and other forms of prose fiction (Torresani, von Saar, Roth, Schnitzler, Lernet-Holenia etc.) to make visible the emotional experience and the situational constraints of Habsburg officers in their development from the middle of the 19th century to the end of the First World war. Particular emphasis is put on the characteristics of literary communication between author and audience (to inform, to entertain, to legitimize, to accuse etc.) how realistic are literary descriptions in a "field" (Bourdieu) which makes heroic exaggeration everything else but impossible?

Emotions and Narrative Interview Techniques in Organization Research

Kleres, Jochen

*Institut für Soziologie, Universität Leipzig
Berlin, Germany*

Keywords

organization, narrative interviews, sense-making, narrativity of emotions

In general, narrative research has been firmly established as a method for qualitative research (national variations notwithstanding). Qualitative methods and narrative interviews in particular have also entered the field of organization research as indicated by an increasing number of recent publications. Within the field of organization theory, narrative methods are particularly compatible with Weick's sense-making approach. Narrative methods have mostly been applied to issues related to a sociology of knowledge and the significance of emotions within narrative interview texts remains underexplored to date. Likewise, Weick's theory, while not entirely mute about emotions, has only paid marginal attention to them.

The presentation will briefly introduce Weick's theory and the method of narrative interviews in order to outline convergences. Then it will focus on exploring ways in which emotions are communicated through narrative texts. It will be shown that a number of analytical concepts of narrative research can be very helpful in tapping into the emotional side of human experience. For this, I will also refer to selected concepts of linguistic research on emotionality of texts. This will help develop a notion of the narrativity of emotions, which is the idea that emotions and meanings are constituted simultaneously in narrative texts and are embedded in the ongoing stream of the narrative.

Emotions as cognitions and the consequences for the sociology of emotions

Boersema, Jacob development studies, university of amsterdam leiden, netherlands

Keywords

sociology, emotions, cognitive appraisal theory

Research on emotions in psychology and neuropsychology has the last two decades exploded (Lazarus, 1992, Le Doux, 1996). On the one hand have these findings led to a consensus about a theory of emotions that sees them as cognitions. Particularly Richard Lazarus work on cognitive appraisal has been path breaking in this field. On the other hand has neuroscientific imagining revealed how the part of our brain that deals with emotions is much older and bigger, and there by faster and stronger then the part of our brain that processes cognition and also speech (Haidt, 1999). Most of these findings seem to have bypassed sociology (but see Turner 1999). This paper argues that the theories of emotions based on these findings challenge some of the basic premises and long held believes popular in the sociology of emotions.

In this paper we discuss three particular implications, and illustrate these with examples out of the canon of the sociology of emotions. The first implication is that cognitive appraisal theory shows how emotions are always social, because emotions always have objects, which can be either be things, believes or people. There is no reason to make a distinction between an individual and social theory of emotions (Scheff, 1990, Turner, 2005). The second implications is that the relationship between social norms and emotions is different then is commonly assumed in work on emotion management, not the least by its principal architect Arlie Hochschild (1978, 1983). The main reason for this misconceptualization is that these theories are inadequate in their definitions of what emotions really are. The third implication is that the strength, fastness and therefore influence of our emotional brain suggest a more Bourdieuan approach to the sociology of emotions then is now common. Emotions should be studied with an emphasis on people's "feel for the game" and intuitions instead of through a reliance on their verbal account given after the fact (Sayer, 2005).

Emotions as the 'glue' and substance of solidarity

Salmela, Mikko

*Dept of Social and Moral Philosophy, University of Helsinki
Helsinki, Finland*

Keywords

emotions, Solidarity, Collins

This presentation lends its title from Randall Collins' (1990) characterization of emotions as the "glue" of solidarity. I will argue for the same conclusion for partly different reasons, while suggesting that group emotions manifest substantial features of group solidarity as well. Solidarity has often been characterized as either involving or constitutive of an affective bond; a feeling of cohesion or belonging together between group members. Besides these "feelings of solidarity", however, emotions have several other functions in the structure and dynamics of social groups. Firstly, shared emotions contribute to the emergence and constitution of social groups. Contrary to Collins who understands group emotions as a primarily physiological, nonintentional states accompanied by shared focus of attention, I suggest that shared emotions are capable of giving rise to social groups by virtue of being intentional states with evaluative, motivational, and behavioral components that represent the emerging group's goals, beliefs, and intentions in an embryonic form. Secondly, emotions constitute an affective dimension of the group members' commitment to the group's ethos - its constitutive goals, values, standards, or norms. The point is that if group members are committed to the group goal, they ought to, other things being equal, feel disappointed if the goal is thwarted; angry at the agent thwarting the goal, afraid if the goal is threatened, happy if the goal is achieved, and so on. Thirdly, fellow feelings, empathy, and sympathy constitute an affective dimension of the group members' commitment to each other. Group members are also motivated to praise and blame their each other for their acting either for or against the group ethos. Fourthly, shared emotions about ethos-related events, such as joy about the group's achievements, disappointment about its defeats, anger at agents perceived to be responsible for the group's defeat, and so on, reinforce the group members' feelings of solidarity. Finally, I argue that social groups in which emotions function in all these ways are solidary groups that manifest substantial features of group solidarity. Empirical examples of such groups may include teams, parties, labour unions, theatre ensembles, orchestras, workgroups, and so on.

Emotions at work as a key-factor of well-being in the workplace. An empirical study of local health service area Napoli 1

Squillace, Francesco

Agenzia Regionale Sanitaria, Regione Puglia Bari, Italy

Keywords

employees, récits de vie, local health service, occupational dissatisfaction, Naples

This study investigated the phenomenon of occupational dissatisfaction in health service employees in Naples, studying interaction between work environment and corporate social responsibility (CSR). The author used ethno-sociological methodology and the récit de vie technique - as proposed by Daniel Bertaux - in performing the study at two Hospitals in local health service area Na/1, in which 23 employees were interviewed.

The evidence emerging from the study's setting enabled him to describe the phenomenon of forced motivation inherent in socio-economic push factors, thereby integrating the concept of motivation. The definition of forced motivation takes into consideration the environment's socio-economic factors and combines them with Arlie Russell Hochschild's concept of "emotional labour"; it is completed by the development of a theory of emotional dissonance, relating to the forced motivation found in the field, on the basis of Robert Zajonc's contribution regarding Leon Festinger's theory of cognitive dissonance.

The author therefore experimented with a technique of exploration and analysis of the récits de vie which enabled him to highlight the variables involved in the working of corporate organisational mechanisms, and divide these into 4 groups - structural, procedural, emotional and results - and, subsequently, to show, by drawing up specific analysis dossiers, the existence and direction of causal links between them, and to formalise them in relational strings. The final output of this technique consists in the graphic rendering of these strings in a socio-organisational diagram which shows the same number of relational networks as microcosms studied.

The analysis of this diagram showed the centrality of the emotional variable, in its negative disposition, and of some of the independent variables belonging to the "procedural" group in relation to the manifestation of workplace dissatisfaction among employees. This analysis was concluded by defining the phenomenon studied which, based on the specific variables directly involved in its creation, allows the parts of the working relationship to be balanced: with regard to the questions CSR poses the workplace, the responsibilities regarding the quality of corporate productivity and the protection of employees' occupational welfare.

Epistemic Feeling, Knowledge and Communal Ethics

Konzelmann Ziv, Anita

Department of Philosophy, University of Basel Basel, Switzerland

Keywords

values, virtue, epistemic, feeling, collective

The paper outlines a twofold claim: (1) There is a specific kind of feeling called 'epistemic feeling'; (2) Epistemic feeling genuinely is collective feeling. The claim outlined presupposes the following assumptions made in Virtue Epistemology, Virtue Theory and Emotion Theory: beliefs must be rooted in virtues in order to get the credit of knowledge; virtues are enduring affective dispositions motivating us to behave in certain ways in a given situation; affective states are internally related to value ethics, either in that they are the means to 'grasp' objective values, or in that they are projective faculties that determine the valuable properties of a situation. The central value involved in the enterprise of knowledge is truth-conformity; it is supplemented by the epistemic values of justification, warrant, explanation and evidence. Given the aforementioned assumptions on virtues and values, the claim of Virtue Epistemology implies that we dispose of affective dispositions that respond to or determine these epistemic values. Epistemic feelings so understood make us feel when and how epistemic values are at stake and motivate us to act in responsible ways given these values.

Within this theoretical setting I shall argue that epistemic feeling cannot be accounted for in terms of merely individual feeling. While individuals may have a general feeling for truth-conformity, their individual feeling for justification, warrant or explanation is derived from a communal feeling. The communal epistemic feeling is generated in the joint endeavour to determine the extent of justification or warrant for knowledge. It is a feeling that is distributed on individuals in virtue of their being members of an epistemic community, and it manifests in that it is felt in a We-mode rather than in an I-mode. Epistemic feeling thus bears ethical implications: on the one hand, it contributes to setting epistemic standards; on the other hand it ties individuals together into the shared responsibility of upholding them.

European Re-Writes and Emotions

Flam, Helena

Institute of Sociology, University of Leipzig Leipzig, Germany

Keywords

Poland, self-images, national pride, national shame, Italian

Since about 1990 several European nations have had their recent histories re-written. A generational shift which silenced some stakeholders in particular versions of the past while bringing the baby boom generation, uncompromised through WWII and its atrocities, into positions of authority, granted it an opportunity to 'voice' their view of history, re-casting it in the process. Among further structural factors behind the re-writing phenomenon we find the downfall of the Soviet bloc and/or the re-configuring of the political party systems. As actors mostly journalists, scientists and politicians, seem to have played a major role in re-interpreting the past. Based on a selection of scientific publications and interviews, I would like to discuss how Poles and Italians had their national self-image changed from (i) a victim to a perpetrator; (ii) a coward to a hero or vice versa. I will also indicate how these changes in the self-image have been pushed by some groups, while resisted by others to argue that new self-images were resisted when their adoption implied bad and supported when they acceptance implied good self-feelings. This is to say that the new self-images called not only for the change of mind about but also for the change of heart towards one's own nation and particular groups within it - While the old self-images fed the national pride or shame/guilt, hid or froze its cleavages and so consolidated each nation in a specific way, the new self-images called for a reversal of these emotions and divided each nation anew.

Everyday life on the Internet: A conceptual framework for exploring interpersonal communications and emotions

Beneito-Montagut, Roser

*Computing, Multimedia and Telecommunication, Open University of Catalonia
Barcelona, Spain*

Keywords

Computer-mediated communication, emotions, everyday life, Internet society

There is a growing interest in and knowledge about how the Internet operates within our everyday life. However, there are few studies that explore in depth interpersonal interaction processes on the Internet, and none of them take into account the role of emotions in this communication process.

This paper sets focus on the role of emotions and aims at deconstructing the dichotomies of "real" and "virtual" communication. I will present a theoretical and methodological framework for a more complex study of social interactions on the Internet. This includes amongst others a critical discussion of Goffman's "interaction order theory" and further investigation in ethnographic methodology when applied to the study of social interactions on the Internet.

The computer-mediated communication (CMC) will serve for an in-depth analysis of social conduct in everyday life on the Internet. I argue that everyday life takes place on the Internet, and there is no difference between online and offline interpersonal communications in terms of their "reality". The Internet has penetrated into all aspects of life, disappearing into the background as an invisible infrastructure and a taken-for-granted aspect of life. An analysis of interpersonal communications on the Internet should then be done beyond real and virtual dichotomies. This position takes me away from a study that investigates what things can or cannot be done online. My interest is on how we integrate the CMC online into everyday life and how emotions intervene in the social interaction on the Internet.

Facilitating the emotional dynamics of trust, status and power: Toward sustainable processes in integrated community care

Hopfenbeck, Mark

Health and society, Gjøevik University College gjøevik, norway

Keywords

power, emotions, trust, status, care

Social determinants of mental health are generally considered to influence individual's sense of belonging, esteem and control (Dalgard 2006). Social disintegration, isolation and inequality tend to weaken an individual's sense of belonging. Social exclusion, discrimination and unemployment often lead to lower levels of self-esteem. Economic marginalization, excessive job demands and exposure to violence are all connected with a diminished sense of control.

Though these large-scale societal factors often require substantial resources and time to change, integrated community care can be a first step in addressing and remediating the individual experiences associated with these factors.

This paper describes an ongoing project in rural Eastern Norway using a form of integrated community care based on dialogical meetings in social networks (Seikkula & Arnkil 2006). These interventions target experiences of belonging, esteem and control in order to enhance recovery processes. Special focus is given to facilitating emotional disclosure and reflection on the part of the social network.

As part of a larger evaluation project, the author is conducting research on the interactional processes in these meetings using a framework based on recent work on the emotional dynamics of trust, status and power. In addition to observation and conversational analysis of the meeting transcripts the members of the meetings also participate in an "emotional network interview" which was developed for this project based on the meta-emotion interview (Gottman, et al. 1997) and the affect-consciousness interview (Monsen & Monsen 2000).

Fear as Social emotions and as social change operators

Dores, António Pedro

Sociology, ISCTE

Lisboa, Portugal

Keywords

fear, instability, change

Social change transforms the way people live and the way people represent their way of living.

Social change, as much as resistance to social change, could it start by managing fear feelings? The hypothesis is to look at social emotions as change operators that enables people to transform them selves in order to resist to social change proposals, or else, in order to act strongly, "without fear", supporting social change.

Some authors show emotions as supportive of rational thinking and behaviour. The stability of rationality depends on the way emotions are managed: as "fear" or "without fear". If it is so, instability is the norm and stability is available when fear operates and a freezing device.

The experience described on this paper would compare the memories of the author about the carnation revolution, in Portugal after the economic crisis of 1973 and what happens in Greece since November 2008.

To compare the fear people felt before the democratic revolution in Portugal (and in Greece more or less at the same time) and the "without fear" people felt after the revolution and after the recent uprising in Greece.

We will look for fear emotions inside institutional spaces, at the family and friends level and at the individual level.

Fear, disgust, shock. Politics of affect in the self-fashioning process of religious and secular Muslims

Fadil, Nadia

Robert Schuman Center for Advanced Studies, European University Institute San Domenico di Fiesole, Italy

Keywords

religion, Subjectivity, secularism, Affects

This paper examines the affective components of the religious and secular orientation of Maghrebi-Belgians. It is based on a fieldwork and qualitative interviews conducted with second generation Maghrebi in Brussels and Antwerp with various profiles between 2003 to 2006. The paper departs from the observation that emotions and experiences of disgust, fear or chock acted as important differentiating markers in the articulation of one's religious orientation. Whereas a sense of fear or repulsion was expressed by some secular Maghrebi in relation to certain orthodox Muslim conducts and convictions, narratives of shock or fear were articulated by orthodox Muslim Maghrebi in relation to secular convictions that sit at odds with the dominant orthodox rationale or the dominant secular context. Drawing on Talal Asad's On Suicide bombing (2007) and Wendy Brown's Regulating Aversion (2006) we try to understand the productive capacities of this economy of affect, and how these emotions are infrastructural to the constitution of religious and/or secular communities and subjectivities.

Financial Satisfaction in Old Age: A Satisfaction Paradox or a Result of Accumulated Wealth?

Hansen, Thomas

Aging research, NOVA-Norwegian Social Research

Oslo, NORWAY

Keywords

income, age, subjective quality of life, financial satisfaction, wealth

Prior research consistently has found that older adults, despite low incomes, are more financially satisfied than younger adults. This "satisfaction paradox" is typically attributed to elders' supposed psychological accommodation to poor financial circumstances. We advance a different explanation, one that focuses on substantial age differences in wealth and liabilities. Data are from the first wave of the Norwegian NorLAG study (n=4169). Findings support the hypothesis that an examination of a wider range of economic variables shows that material circumstances are more important to the financial satisfaction of the elderly than previously believed. A considerable part of the higher financial satisfaction with increasing age can thus be explained by greater assets and less debt among the aged. Nonetheless, assets and debt do not mediate this relationship at lower incomes, because older people with little income have very little accumulated wealth. As older people with little income and wealth have a much stronger tendency to be financially satisfied than their younger, equally poor counterparts, an "aging paradox" still remains in this field.

Gender, Emotion Work, and Collective Identity in the Soldiers' Mothers NGOs in Russia

Jagudina, Zaira

School of Technology and Society, University of Skövde Goteborg, Sweden

Keywords

Gender, russia, rules of feeling, maternal movement

This paper examines the framing processes and emotion work involved in the construction of the collective identity of maternal feminist movement in the Soldiers' Mothers NGOs (SOMO) in Russia. The anti-draft/ anti-military movement of soldiers' mothers was created and sustained since the early 1990s in post-Soviet Russia. This paper is based on the materials of the qualitative research conducted in 2000-2004. It presents the analysis of a profound shift in the collective identity of this heterogeneous movement, which in the early 2000s started to identify with the feminist ideas and symbols. Through framing processes and emotion work, a set of ideas, symbols, values, and rules of feeling is produced and reinforced in a shared culture of the movement. The symbols and rules of feeling are staged and confirmed in rituals including routine storytelling, face-to-face interactions, mass meetings, and printed documents.

The "imagined community" (Mohanty 2003) of the movement is produced and sustained by linking together different kinds of struggles staged by women from their different social locations and positioning through gender, class, nation, and culture. The SOMO non-governmental organisations politicise the interpretation of needs of soldier's mothers and challenge a gendered discourse and rules of feeling about masculine soldier and self-sacrificing mother. The movement furthermore constructs an oppositional symbolic reality of the human rights community, associated with the historical legacy of the Soviet dissidents, and challenges the gendered boundary between the masculinised state /party-politics and the feminised civic activity of the Third sector in the civil society. The SOMO incorporate in its collective identity frame the feminist concept of "gender" brought into Russia by the Western-oriented intellectual feminists' groups. The SOMO reinterpret the meaning of the "foreign" feminist concept from the perspective of the grassroots women's anti-militarist movement and construct the feeling of transnational female solidarity. The movement's marginalisation in the official political arena is resisted through the management of de-mobilising feelings of frustration and resignation.

Gendered agency and emotions in the field of care work

Husso, Marita

*Department of Social Sciences and Jyväskylä, University of Jyväskylä
Jyväskylä, Finland*

Hirvonen, Helena

*Department of Social Sciences and Philosophy, University of Jyväskylä
Jyväskylä, Finland*

Keywords

Gender, emotions, care, agency

In the past decade, care service organisations have faced demands for intensification of work in Finland as in many other OECD countries. Meanwhile, Finnish Working Life Barometers have reported that both physical and mental strain have increased among social and health care personnel, but with significant gender differences. Our presentation discusses caring as gendered, habitual and emotional work, and as a lived social relationship that produces different states of autonomy and dependency for men and women. We analyze different emotional aspects of agency, such as sense of responsibility, caring, and endurance both as personal choices, and as obligations and a way of being in the world. Discursive practices also mold the emotions, habits, practices and lived relationships of caring. In their part, these practices can produce, perpetuate or question the gendered presumptions and expectations of caring. Our aim is to find such a dialogue between individual experiences and structural questions that would enable recognition of the protective frames and harmful practices of care work. Finally, we present an interpretation on how intertwining phenomenological and constructionist perspectives can help to analyse care workers gendered habits, emotions and agencies. In our analysis, we refer to works by Pierre Bourdieu and Lois McNay. Our data consists of interviews from Finnish social and health care workers.

Happiness

Roque Dantas, Ana

Sociologia, Cesnova- FCSH/UNL

Lisboa, Portugal

Keywords

social action, Happiness, sociology of emotions

This paper focus on happiness and its influence on social action, through a sociological analysis of the structural, sociocultural and individual dimensions that condition the importance given to happiness.

A new analysis model allowed the comprehension of the social processes associated with the construction of the idea of happiness, as well as the identification of values, expectations, meanings and feelings that guide social action.

Research methodology combines a macro approach, through statistic data analysis, with the study of the actors' individual trajectories using sociological in-depth interviews.

Results show that happiness is subject to evolution, transformation and fluctuations being also, influenced by several dimensions of social actor's life. Namely: social relations, work, financial situation, friends and family and life styles as well as social actors' reflexivity of their own life circumstances.

Identity at Crossroads: An Insight into Romania

Strugut, Alina

*Sociology, University of Leipzig
Leipzig, Germany*

Keywords

Romania, emotions, accounts, narratives, identity

The question of identity formation has been on the agenda of social sciences for a long time. In my presentation, I intend to shed a new light on the "problem of identity" by approaching it within the triangle of self-knowledge, emotions, and self-deception.

I will look at Romania during the Communist period, and in particular I will focus on the consequences of the Decree Law 770 that the Ceausescu regime introduced in 1966. This Law aimed at redressing the ongoing demographic problem by denying women the right to abortions, in a context that blocked access to quasi all means of contraception. It proved to have devastating consequences for the population, with sky-rocketing maternal and infant mortality rates, as well as increasing rates of abandoned children.

I will explore the manner in which both women and men build accounts and narratives in order to re-cover from the painful experiences. These accounts and narratives reveal a gap between self-knowledge and dealing with a traumatic past; and the quest for a self-deceiving new identity, that allows emotional serenity. People resort to "emotion work" that entails active efforts to make sense and reconstruct genuine emotions in line with prevalent emotion ideologies or socio-cultural context. This process encompasses a self-reinforcing mechanism that nurtures a "conspiracy of silence" since people tend to actively deny the importance and the effects of the Decree by resorting to various strategies, such as self-glorification, defence and offence, moral blackmail, redefinition, relativization, trivialization, evasion, reduction to absurd. By doing this, they create a protective shield against facing their authentic emotions.

Imitating Life or Art: Were spectators' effective in affectively transforming the 'Zidane incident' into civic mythoi?

Baker, Stephanie-Alice

Sociology, University of Western Sydney Sydney, Australia

Keywords

emotions, affect, Katharsis, Zidane, mimesis

Samuel Huntington notably suggested that post cold-war conflicts would originate from cultural and religious differences referred to as the "clash of civilizations". Operating as physical and psychological extensions of civilizations, mythoi are imbued with meaning reflecting societies' ethical systems while encapsulating ways of understanding cultural differences. Despite the pluralistic values intersecting modernity, mythoi continue to permeate contemporary society traversing fields of popular culture and sport. The 'Zidane incident' occurring during the 2006 World Cup operated within archetypal paradigms of the tragic hero enabling spectators to affectively relate to, and reorient, civic values in their quest for meaning. Accordingly, this paper explores mythoi in light of spectators' affective reactions to 'the incident', illuminating how these emotions reflect racial segregation in France while conversely examining whether affective projections enabled spectators to transcend these divisions. Zidane's allegiance to Kabyle, Algerian and French narratives allowed spectators to affectively transform their emotional reactions into mythoi reconciling France's present tensions, past conflicts and future hopes. The Zidane myth, however, deviates from mythic forms as he failed to recognise his hamartia (error of judgment). Mimetically reflecting his internal state, aesthetic mediums, media commentators, spectators and political figures responded to Zidane's final gesture by emphasising the grandeur of his heroic act solidified by national honours and "unconditional love" towards "France's most popular person." Thus, we must ask what audiences affectively recognised from the Zidane myth? If there is no recognised error, no regret towards the actions leading to his tragic decline, can we represent the Zidane myth as an effective affective experience? While some suggest Zidane's final act and aesthetic representations of it ultimately offer little insight, spectators' affective reactions to this incident reveal social significance extending beyond permitting what appear to be violent acts of masculine pride.

Internet and the plot of resentment

Di Fraia, Guido

Istituto di Comunicazione, Università IULM, Milano Milano, Italy

Keywords

social movements, internet, resentment, emotional energy, social networking

Emotions inheres simultaneously in individual and in the social structures and relationships in which individuals are embedded. They are fruitful "objects" of study to integrate micro and macro sociological perspective in sociological studies. Their role is essential to social processes not only in being central to identity and affiliation, but also in being the most important basis of social action and the form it takes. We can consider emotion and emotional energy (Collins 1990, pp.32-33) as the experience of readiness for personal and social action.

Our thesis is that among other emotions, resentment is particularly suitable for the comprehension of some of the most characteristic and relevant socio-cultural dynamics of post modern society.

Resentment (also called rancour, or ranklement) can be define as "an emotion of anger or bitterness felt repeatedly, as a result of a real, or imagined, wrong done". At social level, it is the feeling experienced by social actors (J.M. Barbalet 1992, p. 153). Moving from classic (Nietzsche, Scheler) and more recent theorizations (Girard, Tomellieri, Barbalet), the paper as the following purpose:

1. to demonstrate as resentment is probably one of the most common and appropriate emotional answer for actors living in complex, flexible and high unequal contests;
2. to investigate, from a macro sociological perspective, the role played by Internet and the social networking in the elaboration of resentment. Do internet conversations and social networking help actors to became more aware of social and structural origin of mechanism which generate their resentment? Or, vice versa, do these conversations contribute to reduce the total amount of emotional energy generated by social resentment, making it perceive as a personal guilt to cope with?

Management of emotions in organizations.

Pawlowska, Beata

The of Sociology of Organization and Management Department, University of Lodz Lodz, Poland

Keywords

emotion, organization, emotional intelligence, emotional intelligence organizations, emotional self-control

The main aim of this paper is to present ways how emotions are managed in an organization. We will try to answer the following questions: are contemporary organizations able to deal with their employees' emotions to maximize their work efficiency? Are contemporary organizations able to evoke positive emotions among their employees? Are we able do control our emotionality? Should employees smother their emotions in each situation?

We will refer to positive psychology theory (see Frederickson 2003, 2009). We will also try to present some problems, that contemporary employers may face when employing and managing people from the Y generation.

We will talk about both process of emotions management in organization and emotional self-control. We will pay main attention to the problem of emotional intelligence and we will tie it with the process of organization management.

Conclusions presented in this paper are the results of many covert participant observations carried out by the Author in direct sales organization between 1997-2002 but also during many professional trainings and organizational meetings in other organizations (covert and overt, participant and quasi-participant observations) between 2005-2008. Moreover, analyses presented in this paper base on semi-structured interviews (38 interviews) with employees of different organizations, in different age, professional positions and trades. Interviews concern their professional careers including turning points and emotional conditions connected with tasks and situations that took place in their professional environment.

References:

- 1.Goleman D.,(1997), Inteligencja emocjonalna. Pozna, Media Rodzina of Pozna.
- 2.Fredrickson, B. L., (2003). The value of positive emotions, American Scientist, 91, 330-335
- 3.Fredrickson B. L., (2009). Positivity. New York, Crown.

Management, dispositions, and particular emotions: Young managers of Lisbon

Amandio, Ana Sofia

Sociology, École normale supérieure - Lettres et Sciences humaines de Lyon Lyon, France

Keywords

managers, plural individual, dispositions of particular emotions

In this paper we aim to present the preliminary empirical results of our PhD Thesis, a study on the dispositions of the young managers of Lisbon.

Approaching the young manager as a "plural individual" (Lahire 1998), we try to argue that the manager's emotional dispositions are dynamic. In other words, we hold that we can observe a synchronic variation of their dispositions. To demonstrate it, we have built 3 types of dispositions of particular emotions: [1] Sacrifice and hedonism; [2] Loyalty and confidence; [3] Authority and persuasion. We furthermore examine its oscillation within different contexts, the couple and the company.

The following discussion will outline an account of the notion "emotional socialisation", by showing how can we build upon it by focusing on the dispositions variability of the individual trajectories within contexts.

This paper will conclude with an epistemological discussion of Lahire's theory of action and the concept of "plural individual". Not only by relating it to other perspectives on the individual (like Bourdieu's "habitus", or Jon Elster's "multiple self"), but by trying to fight one of the most persistent epistemological problems of the sociology of emotions pertinent today: essentialism.

Managing Mixed Emotions in the Layered Ritual Reality of Networking Events

Klemelä, Juha

*Department of Sociology, University of Turku, Faculty of Social Sciences
TURKU, FINLAND*

Keywords

face-to-face networking, conversation rituals, emotion management, self

My presentation deals with face-to-face networking events, a common phenomenon in especially the business world, but also in the academia (though not always under the title of "networking"). I will look into the rituality of networking, its dramaturgy, and the need and contents of emotion management.

Floor-level networking is often staged to look like friendly socializing. Nevertheless, it has an instrumental goal: useful contacts. Every networker knows this, so the instrumentality is not latent. It is not completely manifest, either. I presume that there is a mutual implicit contract of not breaching the situation by stating the instrumental goal aloud. The getting of contacts is a conscious but tacit function of socializing.

Networking may be studied from the viewpoint of Durkheimian-Goffmanian-Collinsian conversation rituals. Due to the double agenda in the situations the rituality is layered. We have a ritual with physical proximity, boundaries for outsiders, discussion topics as totems, and a shared and happy emotional mood of casualness. In addition, we have the ritual layer of networking proper. On this embedded level the ritual totems are the sought-after contacts: potential customers, employers, research associates, referees, or whatnot. The emotional mood is probably one of slight anxiety and the atmosphere is mildly competitive.

The rituality is layered, and so are the emotions both layered and mixed. The conversation partners are both objects of politeness, competitors, and "trophies." It is clear that there may be a discrepancy between how one feels about networking and how he or she is supposed and obliged to act. The nature of networking activity may call for emotion management (i.e. emotion work) (c.f. Hochschild). This may have a strategical aim: to not let the interaction be disturbed by the display of the "wrong" emotions. But there may also be deeper emotional needs served: insulating one's "soul", the core self, from the potentially damaging effects of being forced to play the multiply double-dealing ritual game of networking.

It will be an interesting task to probe these possibilities empirically. My empirical materials will consist of observations from networking events in Finland and interviews of networkers.

On Friending and Feelings: Civilised, managed or relational emotions in everyday life?

Holmes, Mary

Sociology, Flinders University Adelaide, Australia

Keywords

symbolic interactionism, social reproduction, Facebook, emotion management, civilizing process

The feelings that flit or linger between us in our daily lives are often difficult to capture. To do so has been the realm of poets, novelists or artists, more than sociologists. Joy, boredom, excitement, sadness and other emotions are fundamental to social life, but attempts to rationally analyse them often strip them of their sensual and emotive impact. One solution is to "sneak up" on these emotions by round about means. Norbert Elias and Arlie Hochschild have both maintained some sense of embodied emotionality in their work by looking not directly at emotions, but at etiquette and advice books. This paper applies a similar approach to more recent forms of website advice about etiquette for using social network sites (in particular Facebook). It is argued that this advice, and responses to it, can help reveal not only current social rules about emotional expression, but how people currently manage emotions not only around those rules, but in relation to others. This relational emotionality is core to the reproduction of an everyday social life in which nation states have become decentred.

On the Multiple Causes of Emotional Ambivalence

Flam, Helena

*Sociology, Leipzig University
Leipzig, Germany*

Terpe, Sylvia

*Sociology, University of Halle
Halle (Saale), Germany*

Keywords

emotional ambivalence, power asymmetries, causes, cultural codes, feeling rules

A few classical and contemporary sociologists (Simmel, Merton, Elias, Smelser, Weigert&Franks, Deborah Gould, Pratt&Doucet) have addressed the phenomenon of ambivalence. Some have argued that ambivalence is part of human nature and/or culture, while others saw it as a typical modern phenomenon - a reaction to the complex, hard to define, rapidly shifting and ever expanding (chains of) human relationships. To Merton sociological ambivalence was primarily about (professional) roles confronted with conflicting cognitive-normative expectations/pressures. Weigert&Franks and Pratt&Doucet agreed, but paid much more attention to the social diversity of conflicting goals & role expectations as well as to conflicting emotions that accompany these and produce the state of ambivalence. As ambivalence Weigert&Franks also defined, drawing on Hochschild, the gap between the "authentic" and the feeling rule. In contrast to these authors, Smelser shifted focus away from roles, norms and feeling rules to the contradictory emotions in the individual psyche. It entailed contradictory emotions about specific persons or relationships and was very likely to emerge in situations of power asymmetry/dependency, especially within locking-in relationships, organisations or institutions. These authors agreed that ambivalence is other-directed, and that incompatible emotions often immobilize and/or are a cause pain. This led to the question of how ambivalence is resolved. Pratt&Doucet, for example, focused on the individual resolution modes, ranging from its denial through indecision and wait&see posture to fanatical commitment. Debbie Gould in contrast highlighted self-directed emotional ambivalence and its immobilizing consequences. She showed how two external actors - social movement and government - worked to resolve the individual state of ambivalence to the advantage of one emotion - anger - to produce social mobilization. In our presentation we would like to posit emotional ambivalence as a complex phenomenon that has several distinct causes. Drawing on the work of Ervin Goffman, Theodore Kemper, Thomas Scheff, Arlie Hochschild and Eva Illouz we would like to propose that emotional ambivalence can be caused by (1) attribution of guilt/responsibility (2) feeling rules/cultural codes (3) status/power constellations (4) status/power & feeling rules.

Painful emotions and a problem drinking father - considering emotions in the life story interview study on young men

Pirskanen, Henna

*Family Research Centre; Department of Social Sciences and Philosophy, University of Jyväskylä
Jyväskylä, Finland*

Keywords

Life story interviewing, Problem Drinking, emotions, father-son-relationship

In this presentation, I will discuss emotions as part of the life story interview research on the adult sons of problem drinking fathers. The data used in the study consist of 21 life story interviews of Finnish young men aged 21-42. While these young men were growing up, their fathers were problem drinkers. In the interviews young men produced narratives of their lives from an adult perspective.

Earlier studies have shown that drinking can disturb family life and be harmful in various ways to children. In the case of a problem drinking father and his son, also aspects of the father-son- relationship and of the father as a male role model assume major importance. Therefore fathers' drinking may continue to be a sensitive and a painful topic to their sons in adulthood, which may make it difficult for the sons to reflect on the past.

For these reasons, emotions are considered as part of my study in at least two respects: Firstly, disclosure on a sensitive topic may make emotions - which the informants may have for long set aside - rise to the surface in the interview situation. Therefore emotion work is required from both the informant and the interviewer in the situation. Secondly, while analyzing the data, the researcher interprets the sons' accounts of the emotions they have gone through while living in the childhood home and facing the father's problem drinking and its consequences. The emotions that the sons reflect on in the interviews, ranging from sorrow and fear of the father to negligence and forgiveness, are an essential part of the life story interview data. Because life stories contain various phases, alterations and reconsiderations in regard to the sons' perceptions on the father and their relationship, the sons' emotions are in many respects peculiarly ambivalent.

Probing emotions within a sociological identity perspective. Getting at both narratives and everyday life experiences with the help of episodic interviews

Rogge, Benedikt

Bremen International Graduate School of Social Sciences, University of Bremen Bremen, Germany

Keywords

identity theory, qualitative interviews, everyday life, narratives

Sociological identity theory assumes that emotional experiences can only adequately be understood when taking into account both subjects' identity "standards" (e.g. conceived as role expectations) and their situational perceptions. This means that situational feelings, e.g. anger, as well as enduring emotional states, e.g. depression or wellbeing, arise as a specific congruence or incongruence between a person's more general standards and her/his situational perceptions or self-perceptions.

Building on this, I argue, we need to conceptualise identity and the occurrence of emotions both at the level of self-reflexive narratives on the one hand and the level of concrete, situational experiences on the other. Qualitative empirical sociological research, however, has thus far mostly concentrated on exploring either the former or the latter. I hold, synthesising the two different research focuses will yield a more complete picture of emotional processes. At the methodical level, the challenge is then to look at narratives as well as concrete episodes of experienced everyday life and at their interrelations.

I briefly unfold the sociological identity framework in which I locate the emergence of emotions. In the main part of the paper, I show in what ways the so called "episodic interview", as proposed by Uwe Flick, is suited for countering the above-mentioned challenge. Flick explicitly distinguishes between two sorts of knowledge that is narrative and episodic knowledge. These are collected and interpreted as two different types of data within the rationale of the episodic interview. This actually represents an effective way of triangulating the data and thus increasing their validity. Finally, I will give concrete research examples from an ongoing project on well-being in unemployment.

With this paper, I hope to promote a more inclusive understanding of emotions in empirical sociological studies and to direct attention at a sound method whose value for investigating emotions has barely been acknowledged yet.

Recognising domestic workers: the impact of emotions on everyday life

de la Blétière, Vanessa

*Sociology, DINÂMIA (Centro de Estudos Sobre a Mudança Socioeconómica)
Lisbon, Portugal*

Keywords

emotions, Recognition, Domestic workers, social devaluation, social esteem.

The social construction of the concept of domestic work involves the notion of social devaluation that shade the regard and recognition of this kind of work. Domestic workers have been defined as an "invisible army of workers" (Ramirez-Machado; 2003). The nature of domestic work only permits to see the result of this activity when it is either not done or not done well (Dussuet; 1998); in the same way, domestic workers are frequently unseen; sometimes the nature of the tasks tend to occult the nature of the person (body and mind). The devaluation of this kind of work disregards the value of domestic workers role in civil society and also in family by helping the process of empowerment of some woman. This communication aims to analyze how domestic workers live whitening devaluation of this job; in discussing the nature of this social devaluation we will explore the emotions of a domestic worker in everyday life taking into account the fact that domestic work is predominantly done by women; having no equality of gender on this kind of work, we aim also to analyze the emotions that could be behind men doing this kind of work. Based on interviews of domestic workers in Portugal, the communication will consider how social devaluation affects workers' self esteem, and identify the strategies adopted to surpass this feeling. Using the concept of "recognition" to clarify the importance of social esteem (Honneth; 2004) in domestic work, we will focus on the effects of emotions and body language on the everyday life of a domestic worker, through the process of social recognition.

Sexualised violence, cultural meanings and emotions

Ronkainen, Suvi

Department of Research Methodology, University of Lapland Rovaniemi, Finland

Keywords

Subjectivity, embodiment, cultural meanings, lived emotions, emotional discourses

The sociology of emotions has actively theorised and researched the social and historical construction of emotions. It has, however, bypassed one logical potentiality that this body of research offers. Instead of asking how emotions are culturally constructed it is possible also to analyse cultural meanings through emotions. This question frames my presentation that focuses on how women who have experienced serious sexual violence or violence in their relationship speak about their emotions. What kind of emotional discourses they use? What kind of social position is legitimated through experiences? How do the vulnerability, power and the cultural meanings of violence coalesce with each other? What do these emotions tell about the cultural meanings of sexualised violence? The empirical material comes from the follow-up research of 15 women. It was collected using therapeutic, deep interviews and active interviews that called for different kinds of emotional speech. Therefore the material consists of varied discourses of emotions and emotional experiences. However, the empirical material is used mainly for theoretical reasons, for to help to conceptualize theoretically the connections between lived emotions, subjectivity, cultural meanings and power. Theoretically the paper combines semiotics and the phenomenology of body with sociology of emotions. The aim of the paper is to offer one possible way to theorise emotions at the same time deeply socially and culturally constructed and embodied, lived experiences.

Shame and Guilt Feelings: What is there to be learnt from psychological research?

Thome, Helmut

Martin-Luther-Universität Halle-Wittenberg, Martin-Luther-Universität Halle-Wittenberg Halle - Saale, Germany

Keywords

shame, guilt, behavioural implications

Philosophers and sociologists alike often refer indiscriminately to shame and guilt feelings as "moral" emotions. In contrast to this (and also in critique of earlier ethnological distinctions between shame and guilt cultures), behavioural psychologists have expended great effort to distinguish, phenomenologically as well as conceptually, between shame and guilt and to clarify their varied behavioural implications. Two major propositions have been advanced in this context: (1) Shame involves the entire self as the focus of evaluation whereas guilt focuses upon the specific act (transgression) commissioned. (2) Guilt in general is the more adaptive response, personally as well as socially: Shame is conducive to either aggression or withdrawal, guilt presses toward reparative action (cf. Lewis, Tangney et al.). Self-esteem might function as a moderator variable in such situations (cf. Baumeister et al.). Several versions of shame and guilt scales based on these assumptions have been developed. Another helpful conceptualization has been offered by G. Piers who suggests that "guilt anxiety accompanies transgression; shame, failure". This definition can be amended by the account given by J. Aronfreed: Whereas failure refers to all sorts of demonstrated incompetence, incapacities, flawed performances or low status experience, guilt is based on a moral evaluation of what one has done or not done, i.e. it refers to cognitions concerning harmful consequences of an act (or inaction) for others. Though there is still much discussion about appropriate definitions, there is also general agreement (1) that shame and guilt feelings are often blended and (2) that cultures differ with regard to the relative weight they assign to shame and guilt as elements in their repertoire of social control mechanisms. Another interesting set of distinctions has been worked out in the cognitive-developmental theory of moral consciousness: Remorse and regret are characteristic emotions governed by the autonomous type of conscience, whereas the heteronomous type typically props up the "warm glow" of pangs of conscience. This dichotomy, however, misses another type of conscience which is based on the (euphoric) experience of self-transcendence (Ch. Taylor, H. Joas).

Sibship as a Mental Health Factor in Families - Emotional Enrichment of Sibling Relationship

Brock, Inés

Childhood Studies, University of Applied Science Magdeburg-Stendal Halle(Saale), Germany

Keywords

sibling relationship, mental health, intimacy, emotional capital, resilience

The contribution deals with the very special bonding between siblings. In the past it has been asserted that defining features of sibship are conflict and retardation. In spite of bearing in mind that there is an experience of rivalry between the siblings, the paper argues that the daily encounter with siblings influence every child emotionally. The focus here is the enhancing aspect of having a brother or sister. The main issue deals with the encouragement and advancement which they give to each other.

Some new findings will be presented around sibship on the basis of a qualitative case-study of the thesis of the author. The power in interactions between siblings is not simply a question of birth order. Siblings develop a specific dynamic relationship which includes positive impacts on their development. The repertoire of skills and knowledge which are learnt and applied through and within siblings' interaction can be regarded as a mental health factor during the time of growing up. Dynamics of the existentially relevant affiliation system will be described - which means the belonging to the family of origin.

Siblings share time, space and knowledge which lead to a unique intimacy. Communication rules and exchanging rules between siblings have a very special character without parental steering. Changing coalitions strengthen the siblings regardless of age. Encouraging each other is a crucial psychological factor too. The contact to origin needs arise a further understanding of equivalence and empathy. Siblings are looking for gaining the accomplishment of exchange and negotiation. Sibship generates symmetrical reciprocity, dyadic coping and emotional capital. Siblings assist and enhance each other right from the beginning of life. That sociological phenomenon can be described as an enormous resilience factor.

The lack of sociological research about early childhood sibship leads to insistence on old beliefs like the trauma of dethronement. The paper will help to abolish this old prejudice. The results will be demonstrated with the help of an explanation of siblings' inner notions of sharing daily routines as well as special challenging situations. First and foremost siblings enrich themselves in mental health.

Social relationships and trust in asylum seeking families with children

Björnberg, Ulla

Sociology, Gothenburg university Gothenburg, Sweden

Keywords

Migration, asylum, children, resilience

The point of departure for my paper is the assumption that social relationships with kin and local contexts are important for the well being of asylum seeking children. For asylum seeking children and families social networking might be hard to accomplish due to constraints linked to social and legal contexts in the host country. Constraints can also be linked to the family situation and the circumstances that they have to cope with in every day life before and after the flight. In the paper I draw on results from an ongoing study on the experiences of asylum seeking children and their families in Sweden. The main focus is on families who have waited for decisions regarding permanent residence for several months and sometimes more than a year and the ways in which kin relationships are developing during transition from the country of origin to the host country. The empirical data are based on qualitative interviews with children from 9 years and with one parent for each child. The over arching research objective is to identify factors that are important for well being of children seeking asylum and to study how they cope with their experiences as asylum seekers. The tension between excluding experiences and expectations regarding how the situation of the child and it's family should improve or deteriorate after the flight is for a child a constitutive reference for how coping strategies are developed. In the analysis I draw on theoretical concepts of resilience, empowerment and social capital as conditions for well-being. Results suggest that both parents and children seem to find themselves in a social vacuum - they have weak social relationships with transnational members of kin as well as local neighbours and friends. This is interpreted as a coping strategy due to lack of trust. Lack of trust is both a consequence of but also a response to the liminality during the transition. Individualism and independence also appear as coping strategies of adult asylum seekers and children.

Sport as a mode of emotional involvement between nations. An Emotional Sociology's approach to International Relationships

Reicher, Dieter

Sociology, Karl-Franzens-Universität Graz Graz, Austria

Keywords

emotions, international relationships, unintended consequences, Sport, nationalism

The paper argues that students of international relationships widely neglected sport and emotions as well as sociologists ignore phenomena of internationality. Unlike diplomacy and foreign policy with its preferred mode of strategic-rationality, sport promotes a variety of emotions. Affects, moods and other types of emotions are key components in the interaction process both between athletes and between audiences. The paper discusses two different emotional aspects that sport has for shaping international relationships. First, there are several patterns of emotional involvement generated by sport. These patterns partly affect unintended consequences for international politics, other non-sport agents, and sport competitors. Second, the sport creates international communities which share common affective-structures as well as common emotional patterns of loyalty towards national teams and athletes.

The "Unfinished Sentences" Technique in Studying the Loneliness Phenomenon

Puzanova, Zhanna

Sociology, Peoples' Friendship University of Russia Pushkino, Moscow Region, Russia

Keywords

"unfinished sentences" technique, communication, Loneliness

The inquiry of more than 140 people was conducted in the research of loneliness by the "unfinished sentences" technique. As a result 2550 elementary explanations - concluded sentences were obtained. The components of lonely man image were revealed for further description and interpretation. The analysis of verbal categories was carried out during the first stage. Subsequently, the determinants were sorted out and the components were constructed. The comparison of 10 components' weights of a lonely person image shows that the dominant ones are: "Characteristics of a Lonely Person", "Communication", "Reasons for Loneliness". Consequently, these components get the most attention from respondents when it comes to discussion of loneliness phenomenon. These three components make up the nucleus of a lonely person image:

Component	Absolute weight	Percentage %
Characteristics of a lonely person	586	28,13
Communication	346,25	16,52
Reasons for loneliness	281,8	13,53
Attitude towards a lonely person	243,1	11,57
Actions, behaviour of a lonely person	221,55	10,64
Sense of loneliness	114	5,47
Alone	104,85	5,03
The lonely one is given	87,1	4,18
Anyone can feel lonely	61,4	2,85
No answer or not clear	25,8	1,24
I've never felt lonely	17,5	0,84
Total	2083,1	100

The component "Characteristics of a Lonely Person" provides an idea of properties and personality traits, peculiarities in behavior and disposition of lonely people as well as their temperament. The "Communication" component is composed of nine elements that somehow characterize the process of lonely people communication. The fact that communication provides satisfaction and the necessary relief that a lonely person strives for is proved by the element "Readiness to Communication" which is the most substantial in the given component and underlines the importance of communication for lonely people. The elements of the component "Reasons for Loneliness": "beloved", "friends", "close ones", "relatives, members of the family, spouses" show that the reason for loneliness might be absence or loss of close ones, or break-up.

One of the essential advantages of the "unfinished sentences" technique is that one can resort to textual data unlimited number of times. Other interpretations are possible providing regrouping of elementary explanations.

The city-as-montage in the labyrinths of memory. An exercise of dragging Braga's postcards from their institutional moorings to an intimate cartography of an e-motional journey.

Bandeira, Miguel

*Geography Department, University of Minho
Braga, Portugal*

Pires, Maria Helena

*CECS - Centre of Studies in Communication and Society, Department of Communication Sciences, University of Minho
Braga, Portugal*

Keywords

memory, emotional cartography, post-cards, Visual culture

Postcards constitute a singular below-the-line media in terms of their relation with time and setting dimensions. They give subjects the opportunity to involve themselves in a circling, a continual return to the same loci, the same figures, the same squares and landscapes, but each time from a different direction. Each one's memory is fulfilled of many images, as part of the «popular culture». At the same time, each one's passage, throw those images, produces «an intimate panoramic tour» (Bruno). Adopting Benjamin's proposal, this implies to consider how the objects and settings of the urban environment are perceived and transformed.

In this perspective, we intend to discuss the concept of «cartography», suggesting that it isn't just an institutionalised and materialized form of knowledge, but it also can be a subjective way of giving shape to an intimate geography. In order to illustrate this kind of sensitive experience, we propose to take some postcards from Braga-city and reassemble them as fragments of a particular topology, produced as a bricolage. Which are the most frequently represented figures in those postcards and what does it means in its relation to the image of the city as we perceived it? Which are its absent motifs and settings? What to say about the implicit limits or about the framing traces with which we give rise to our imaginary experience of flânerie?

If we consider the contemporary tendency to blur the frontiers between high culture and popular culture, from one side, and between art and life, from the other, in post-modern Frederic Jameson's perspective, it is particularly important to pay attention to the way subjects produce their own ephemeral patterns of reference. From time to time, postcards always were, besides a privileged interpersonal media, an instrument of shaping an intimate and e-motional relation with settings and memories. The artists (photographers, designers or cartoonists...) and the postcard users, from this point of view, can be considered as imaginary flâneurs...

The emotionality of friendship in the workplace and the impact on the organisational life

Greco (Dr.), Silvana

*Department of Social and Political Studies, University of Milan
Milano, Italy*

Keywords

Friendship, emotions in the workplace, employment transitions

Drawing on accounts from qualitative biographical in-depth narratives with 50 female and male adults (35-65 years old) working in small and bigger work organisations in Italy, this paper deals with adult friendship and the related emotions that arise from this particular social relation and interaction such as joy, happiness, sadness, anger, envy, between colleagues in the workplace, how they develop in time and what kind of gender differences can be underlined. Moreover, the paper examines how the emotionality of friendship in the workplace shape and affect the work experience and work attitude, the career opportunities and what kind of role they play during periods of work difficulties such as a job change (employment transitions) and a job loss, which often represent emotionally traumatic events.

Although both men than women agree that friendship in the workplace has more difficulties to arise especially in a competitive work environment, once colleagues become friends the workplace becomes a place "to feel at home", where in particular women express freely their emotions increasing their job satisfaction and social cohesion of the work team, therefore, improving the work attitude. Men underline that the comprehension of the rules and practices of the organisation through a colleague friend is a crucial element in a organisational life. In addition, friendship enhances collaboration, mitigates competition and supports in the long run their career. Said this, friendship can destabilize also the work relationship interfering with negative emotions such as anger, envy or jealousy or risking to transform it in a more intimate relationship. Both men than women emphasise the importance of an emotional support from "colleague friends" during employment transitions.

The Metropolis and Mental Strife - measuring the effect of urban living and conformity to emotion norms in urbanised societies upon emotionality, using the European Social Survey

Patulny, Roger

*Social Policy Research Centre, University of New South Wales
Sydney, Australia*

Keywords

emotion, SIMMEL, urban studies, Multi-Level Modelling

There has long been a sociological distinction drawn between urban and rural areas concerning the impact each has upon mental life and emotional experience. Classic sociological theorists such as Toennies surmised a division between intimate rural (Gemeinschaft) and impersonal urban (Gesellschaft) life. Simmel espoused that the Metropolis had the effect of "greying" life, and rendering the individual blasé and impersonal to the lives and concerns of others. Implicit in both theories is the idea that urban life in one form or another, despite its penchant for improving earnings capacity and material prosperity, erodes emotionality and the experience of regular emotional ups and downs in favour of a more rational aspect. However, these theories have not been adequately tested using large-scale representative statistical data. The emotional constancy of urban life might easily be undermined by the influence of individual factors such as age, financial stress, education, experience of crime, and work status, or similar factors operating on an aggregated national scale, such as population ageing, economic downturn, educational achievement, and rising crime rates, and changing work hours. Furthermore, they are theories that have developed in a particular social context (19th-20th C. Germany), and may reflect emotional norms appropriate just to one culture at one point in time.

This paper will address the question of the influence of urban living and the emotion norms of urbanised nations upon emotionality, by examining large-scale representative statistical data across several countries from the latest (2006) Wave of the European Social Survey (ESS). The paper will examine the effect of town size upon "emotionality" - or the frequency of the experience of emotional highs and lows - controlling for relevant individual and aggregated demographic factors. It will also examine the influence of aggregated national rates (norms) of emotionality upon individual emotionality through the use of multi-level modelling techniques, to capture the influence of socio-emotional forces (ie. emotional socialisation, or emotion-normative conformity) upon reported emotional experience.

The risks of the risk society: Regressive ego and fear of freedom

Graziosi, Mariolina

*studi sociali e politici, università milano
milano, italy*

Keywords

fear, Risk, freedom, trust

Starting from Ulrik Beck's theory of risk as the main trait of contemporary society (Risk Society: Toward a New Modernity, Sage 1992) I will explore the consequences of risk and uncertainty on individual's life in late modernity. Drawing from Adorno's thesis that in mass society the individual ego is regressive, that is an ego dominated by fear of autonomy and wish to be part of a group (Adorno, Lezioni di sociologia, Einaudi, 2001), I sustain that it is more so in contemporary society because risk causes fear and uncertainty that do not allow for the formation of strong mature ego.

My analysis will focus on the link between risk, fear and regression on one side, and trust, autonomy, and freedom on the other side. A long tradition has considered the effect of fear on the ego, starting from the work of Le Bon The Crowd: A study of the Popular Mind, followed by Freud's book Group Psychology and the analysis of the Ego and then Adorno and Horkheimer's research on The Authoritarian personality. All of them have underlined the loss of critical conscience as main consequence of a situation dominated by strong emotions.

More recently, sociologists such as Anthony Giddens, Zygmunt Bauman, and Ulrik Beck have analyzed the deep transformation of contemporary society and all of them agree that one of the necessary requirements for survival is trust and a strong subjectivity. Giddens even speaks of ontological trust as the condition that would allow the individual to face the risk and the uncertainties of late modernity (Modernity and Self-Identity: Self and Society in the Late Modern Age, Stanford, 1991).

On the ground of the contributions made by the mentioned authors, I will reflect on the emotional problems that the individual has to face in a society dominated by risk, how such emotional problems influence the personality, in particular the formation of a weak ego that put a risk freedom as main value of modern contemporary society.

The role of social emotions in the regulation of drinking. An analysis of young adults' drinking diaries

Törrönen, Jukka

Centre for Social Research on Alcohol and Drugs, Stockholm University Stockholm, Sweden

Maunu, Antti

*The department of sociology, The Finnish Foundation for Alcohol Studies
Helsinki, Finland*

Keywords

social emotions, pride, shame, diary, regulation of drinking

In the paper we examine the role of social emotions in the regulation of drinking by analysing the young adults' pub and drinking diaries. In the analysis we pay special attention to the experiential, bodily and processual aspects of social emotions. In this we take influences from structuralistic, pragmatic and fenomenological viewpoints, especially from the theories of Thomas Scheff and G.H. Mead. In the paper we assume that emotions that regulate drinking can be reduced to the emotions of pride and shame that are, according to Scheff, as primary social emotions present in all communication and action. They express for the agents and for the participants of interaction the actual "temperature" of social relations. Pride refers to a strong and safe involvement in interaction, in which individuals feel themselves fine and respectful. In a shameful state individuals, in turn, experience themselves negatively in the eyes of others, which imply that social bonds are intimidated. The diary material includes a lot of concrete situation - dependent and expressive descriptions of that how drinking is experientially associated with the emotions of pride and shame. Our analysis shows that there exists interesting differences in the emotions of pride and shame in drinking depending on the type of sociability and social situation. In the context of drinking pride and shame are associated in the diaries most strongly with strengthening and tying of bonds of friendship and love. In relation to them, status competition and the emphasis of self occur in the diaries considerably less frequently or they remain as subordinate emotional episodes for friendship and love.

We love them, we use them, we kill them - Ambivalent emotions towards animals

Pohlheim, Katja

Faculty of Sociology, Bielefeld University Bielefeld, Germany

Keywords

pets, human-animal-relation, emotions

Animals are an important part of our society - as pets or beef cattle - but still underestimated in sociology. Till now there are almost no - at least no European - sociological literature and research about the human-animal-relation. But pets and animal raising for consumption are both part of our everyday-life. So we should have a closer look at our relationship to these creatures - in my presentation I want to highlight the emotions involved in the human-animal relationship.

In western culture the relation of humans towards animals is very ambivalent and in the same way emotions towards them are ambiguous. On the one hand, they are loved and named family members. We feel able to show them our emotions, can cry in front of them, do not feel ashamed, and laugh and talk about them in their presence without being afraid to be talked back. They do not force us to follow feeling rules nor do emotion work. For all they do for us (and there is much more) we are so thankful that in most supermarkets areas for pet food are even larger than areas for infant food.

We also use animals and their abilities in therapy. For example, dogs are used as guides, sniffers, search and rescue dogs. Most of these functions will not be replaced by artificial things in the next few years. This implies that humans are dependent on animals.

On the other hand, we raise nameless animals for consumption. These should be invisible and as productive and cheap as possible. The Animal Welfare Act is necessary to protect these creatures from bad human treatment. Parallels to how slaves, Blacks and women have been treated historically speaking can be seen.

How can we explain these disparate treatment of animals with the established sociological theories of emotions? How is it possible that there are such ambiguous emotions and relations towards animals? Why do we accept some animals as part of our family/society, but not others? And why are we able to show them more authentic emotions than we do to other humans?

What kinds of norms are "emotion norms"? Steps towards a taxonomy

von Scheve, Christian

*Institute of Sociology, Center of Excellence "Languages of Emotion", Freie Universitaet Berlin
Berlin, Germany*

Keywords

emotions, social norms, feeling rules

In the scientific literature, "emotion norms" (or "feeling rules") are treated surprisingly ambiguous: sometimes as specific kinds of social norms, i.e. cognitive representations of what ought or ought not to be, their distinctiveness being the precise reference to components of emotion, e.g. motor-expression or subjective feeling. In this case, emotion norms explicitly demarcate instances in which emotions or specific components of emotion should or should not occur. On the other hand, emotion norms are invoked as more general explanations for the social and cultural construction of emotions. In this case, they are assumed to somehow shape emotional experience and cover an array emotion-related behaviors, e.g. the valuation or social sharing of emotion.

This ambiguity is surprising, since there is a variety of sophisticated concepts of norms, for example in sociology and philosophy, that can further inform emotion research. In this contribution, I discuss some of these conceptions and explore how they can eventually contribute to a more complete understanding of how norms and emotions go together. First, I will focus on the injunctive character of emotion norms and draw on the distinction between social and moral norms, thus exploring the question of the conditionality of emotion norms, i.e. whether they can be categorized along a continuum of moral-unconditional to socially-conditional. Second, I will focus on the descriptive aspects of emotion norms and also examine related constructs such as emotional habits and conventions. Third, I will discuss some peculiarities of the compliance with and the enforcement of emotion norms, as compared to other norms, which are assumed to be rooted in the internalization and the evolutionary and behavioral control functions of emotion.

What makes us modern(s)? The place of emotions in European societies of the past and the present

Becker, Patrick

Institute for Science and Technology Studies, University of Bielefeld Bielefeld, Germany

Keywords

Romantic Ethic, Modernisation, Rationalism, Emotional Turn, History of Ideas

Visions and concepts of a good society always had a prominent place in European thought. From the Enlightenment onwards, they were a favourite topic for social theorists, many of which firmly believed in the power of (scientific) reason to create and further a good society. This belief in the civilizing force of reason and rationality is still an essential part of most contemporary definitions of modern society, which usually consider the rational organisation of social life and a disenchanted, scientific world view as one of its constitutive features. However, there has always been a counterweight to the modernist emphasis on rationality - the vision of a society that is not (solely) founded on utilitarian motives and rational order, but connected by a collective effervescence, and driven by emotional motives and expressive values. From 18th century romanticism to the hippie movement at the end of the 20th century, this quest for an emotional renewal of society has been an integral part of modern culture and modern thought.

Interestingly enough, we are currently experiencing another renaissance of emotionality: Nowadays, emotions and feelings are increasingly recognized as valuable personal resources for success both in private and professional life, and in addition to that, emotions are also moving into the centre of scientific attention - especially within those disciplines that originally thought that feelings shouldn't matter to them (e.g., computer, neuro, or cognitive science).

Is this surprising renaissance of emotionality indicative of an emotional reenchantment of our society - or are we witnessing just another modernist push for rational order, i.e. an attempt to scientifically rationalise the emotions and the way we handle them?

With this question in mind, my presentation will discuss the return of emotions in science and society. I'll begin with a historical overview of the contested role (and the changing fortunes) of emotions in the course of modernisation and their subsequent marginalisation as "non-rational" and "non-modern", and then take a closer look at the current emotional turn in the sciences and its implications for understanding, handling and using emotions in today's late (or post) modern society.

Working with "Quality" - how Lean and Appreciative Inquiry initiatives change social and emotional relationships in the day-care institution?

Poder, Poul

Sociology Department, University of Copenhagen Copenhagen K, Denmark

Keywords

day-care institution, emotional effects, Quality projects

European state and municipal governance of early childhood education and care is increasingly preoccupied with developing, ensuring and measuring "quality" initiatives, which are meant to improve day care institutions. Measuring quality initiatives has various constitutive effects such as typification, interpellation, fixations, creation of particular social relations etc. This issue of wider effects of measuring quality initiative is still a relatively little researched area (Dahler-Larsen 2008).

Consequently this paper deals with constitutive effects of different quality initiatives within two day care institutions as it reports on a study of a kindergarden, which has worked with LEAN (idea of slimming the organisation with respect to "time-wasting" activities) and another which worked with "Appreciative Culture" (reflecting the idea of focussing on what works well and successes) as a way of improving "quality".

The study addresses questions such as whether implementing Lean implies a typification of care that subordinates care activities under a rationalized, instrumental and optimizing world-view? Does focussing on successful activities lead to a de-legitimization of so-called negative emotions, and if so, how does this have effects on the social relationships between colleagues and between management and employees? Moreover, working with quality projects can be seen as including every involved member of the organisation, as everybody can contribute to the meaning of "quality" which seems an endlessly open signifier. Does the work on "quality" therefore create group emotion or energy given a learning process (Quinn 2007), or does it de-legitimise certain members' notion of quality and therefore engenders disillusion and cynicism.

Methodologically, the study is based on analysis of documents, interviews and observation. The aim of the study is to contribute to an understanding of how quality initiatives work seen from within the institution rather than from totalising perspectives, which conceive the quality discourse in terms of governing and dominance.

RN12

Environment and Society

"Rivers are Ours" versus "Rivers are Flowing in Vain" - Conflict over Water Governance in Eastern Black Sea Region in Turkey

Adem, Çigdem

Research Assistant, The Public Administration Institute for Turkey and the Middle East Ankara, Turkey

Keywords

social dimensions of water management, participation, water governance

Nation-states and global and national political actors are embedded in broader frameworks of governance and these frameworks consist of multiple layers and multiple actors. This adds substantial weight to the need for democratic, legitimate and just water governance structures, institutions and dynamics. Hence, deeper understanding of use of rivers is necessary.

Since 2005, with the enforcement of the Law on Renewable Energy, there was an outburst of projects by the private sector to construct hydroelectric power plants (HEPP) who are also assigned the right to use water. Most of these river type HEPPs are (and planned to be) constructed in the Eastern Black Sea region of Turkey, eminent for its rich ecosystem, rainforests, encompasses many protected areas and diverse flora and fauna. The small river type HEPPs are not even subject to any Environmental Impact Assessment and are subject to uncontrolled, vigorous construction. The reason beneath this policy is to decrease the level of foreign energy dependency of the country via constructing HEPPs. The discourse to rationalize this policy has been "The rivers are flowing in vain". The local people living by these rivers are not even informed throughout the process. As a result, they have formed a platform called "The Rivers are Ours" and have organized mass protests. Some cases have already been taken to the court. The study will explore how the rivers are perceived by the local people, how much they are part of the social, cultural and economic life and how they see being left out of decision-making processes of their habitus. Further, it will dwell upon the two conflicting discourses around the river and will depict the impact on the local, regional and national levels with a definite emphasis on the local level.

The study will be based on a field study to be carried out at several villages to grasp the relations of the local people with the river. The research methods consist of group and in-depth interviews with the policy-makers, local people and members of the "Rivers are Ours" Platform.

"Walking on two legs" to the accreditation of CDM? Institutional histories of CDM accredited projects in China

Bluemling, Bettina

Environmental Policy Group, Wageningen University Wageningen, The Netherlands

Mol, Arthur P.J.

Environmental Policy Group, Wageningen University Wageningen, The Netherlands

Keywords

historical institutionalism, China, climate policy, Clean Development Mechanism

The Clean Development Mechanism has been put into effect to facilitate low cost compliance of industrialized countries to the Kyoto Protocol's aims of greenhouse gas reduction. By end 2008, China accounts for 49% of CDM projects among the Asian-Pacific countries, the latter again making 77% of worldwide CDM projects. Its role as a leading CDM actor owes China to a considerable extent to a strategy which it named "walking on two legs" and which it followed until the economic reforms in 1978. Under this policy, the government on the one hand promoted centralized, large-scale energy generating projects, while, especially for the electrification of rural areas, it relied on small-scale decentralized systems that were carried out by rural communities, i.e. production brigades. Small hydropower plants were one of the main power schemes of this time. Today, 48% of China's CDM projects consist of hydropower projects. This observation, as well as China's "walking on two legs" strategy, makes it an interesting case to compare which kinds of projects find their way to CDM accreditation. What is their institutional history? Who are the main stakeholders involved? Who are the beneficiaries from accreditation? Through a stakeholder survey among selected CDM projects, as well as a key stakeholder survey among projects which have not been accredited, answers to these questions should contribute to a discussion about in which aspects state intervention plays a role for making trading schemes such as the CDM successful in host countries.

'Laboratories' for advancing and studying public formations in sustainable development

Van Breda, John

Transdisciplinary Sustainability Analysis Modelling and Assessment HUB, Stellenbosch University Matieland, South Africa

Stauffacher, Michael

Institute for Environmental Decisions, Natural and Social Science Interface, ETH Zurich Zurich, Switzerland

Keywords

sustainable development, publics, transdisciplinary case study, STS, issue formation

Considering public involvement in science and societal decision making, implies a thorough and critical reflection of the issue at stake, as issues do largely determine what 'the public' is, i.e. how and what public is formed by the respective framing of the issue. Our considerations presented in this paper depart from the Transdisciplinary Case Study (TdCS) design as an applied research framework. The term transdisciplinary refers in our understanding to a form of knowledge production that complements existing disciplinary and interdisciplinary scientific activities by integrating stakeholders from outside academia in addressing concrete issues related to sustainable development. In these studies, we start from the case, i.e. not from a problem, but from a geographical entity where the relevant issues to be tackled are jointly defined by academia and stakeholders from the region. As such the TdCS is an integral part of 'constructing different publics', i.e. offering different ways of framing the issue and thereby contributing to different assemblages of distinct issue understandings and respective publics. Such public formations are often going 'beyond' many boundaries, like institutional; sectoral; national; and cultural. Coming together with other actors and being challenged by multi-dimensional cases, scientists are not only engaged in looking for real-world solutions, but are as well constructing 'laboratories' for advancing and studying new public formations and their consequence for the status quo of the nation-state European Society. This very fact raises some questions that we would like to address in our presentation: how do we approach (with our TdCS interventions) problems that have not necessarily become 'res publicae' as yet? How do we know whether a public(s) has in fact been formed? Is this formation a pre-condition for methodological interventions such as TdCS? Where public formations are found to be underway, can we conclude that the different nation-state boundaries are indeed in the process of being transgressed and re-drawn? We argue that scientists as the facilitators of and actors in similar public involvement processes cannot afford to miss these developments. In other words, it means having to develop extra pairs of eyes to read / interpret this unfolding situation.

Alternative Agro-food Networks: A New Knowledge-based Agro-food Paradigm?

Psarikidou, Katerina

*Sociology ; ESRC Centre for Economic and Social Aspects of Genomics (Cesagen), Lancaster University & Genewatch UK
Lancaster, UK*

Szerszynski, Bronislaw

Sociology; ESRC Centre for Economic and Social Aspects of Genomics (Cesagen), Lancaster University Lancaster, UK

Keywords

sustainability, knowledge-based economy, Alternative Agro-Food Networks, relocalisation, quality food

Recent years have seen the emergence of a range of alternative agro-food networks (AAFNs) which contrast starkly with the dominant productivist model of conventional agro-food systems (Ilbery & Bowler, 1998). Terms such as relocalisation (Renting et al. 2003), re-connection (Hartwick 1998), and re-socialisation (Marsden et al. 2000) have all been used to describe this relatively new tendency in the "modern geographies of food" (Whatmore & Thorne, 1997), one which seeks a transformation of the power dynamics within the agro-food system.

Based on an understanding of the knowledge/power link (Foucault 1972), as well as recent observations on the centrality of knowledge for the acquisition of a competitive advantage within post-industrial societies (Bell, 1993), the aim of this paper is to investigate the "knowledge" dimension of these newly-catalyzed agro-food spaces, and the associated forms of sociality and power. As van der Ploeg (1990) underlines, the rationalisation and standardisation of conventional knowledge-based agro-food processes has led to a shift away from the "art de localité" of practice-, experience- and craft-based agro-food knowledge. However, there are ways in which AAFNs can be seen as part of a very different kind of knowledge-based agro-food paradigm, one that involves distinctive forms of immaterial labour that invest the commodity with both informational and cultural content (Lazzarato 1996).

This paper explores the diverse knowledge systems operating in alternative agro-food networks in two areas of the northwest of England - the Manchester urban conurbation and rural Cumbria - and aims to identify their links to the different patterns of social relations and forms of value (Graeber 2001) associated with them. A plurality of complementary or contradictory knowledge systems can be observed among the practitioners, involving a diversity of knowledges and skills - old and new, traditional and modern, expert and lay, explicit and tacit (Polanyi 1967), encoded and embedded (Nonaka, 1994). Our aim is to explore the role that such knowledges might play in the constitution of a new knowledge-based agro-food paradigm, one associated with rather different future visions of society. Data come from the EC-funded project, "Facilitating Alternative Agro-food Networks: Stakeholder Perspectives on Research Needs" (www.faanweb.eu).

Alternatives to individual car travel: an environmental attitude?

Vincent, Stéphanie

LET, ENTPE

Vaulx-en-Velin, France

Keywords

modal choice, altermobilities, changing process, environmental consciousness

In view of the three major environmental issues ? pollution, greenhouse gas emissions and an ever-waning supply of fossil fuels ? we are today faced with an imperative to change our habits. Among these habits, the use of the automobile is being called into question. These addiction to the automobile, however, will not be an easy one from which to break free.

In our PhD research, we chose to focus on individuals whose modal uses differed from this automobile norm. The research conducted in France aim to understand how new forms of mobility could be appropriated by individuals. These alternatives to individual car travel were called ?altermobilities?. Three of them were particularly focused on: carpooling, bicycling and public transportation. The appropriation of these means of transport was analysed through a qualitative method based on life cycle interviews. Interviewees were chosen according to their current modal use to commute.

The first goal of this paper is to shed light on some of the mechanisms that will allow us to liberate ourselves ? even partially ? from our reliance on the automobile. The life cycle method allows to build biographic paths of ?altermobile? people. Four types of processes appear, leading to altermobile habits. Three of them shows that altermobility appears after a change in the modal habits, linked to constraint, opportunity or involvement. Nevertheless, the most unexpected result was that several alternative habits had been rooted for a long time in people life.

The second goal is to call into question the role played by environmental consciousness through the processes, particularly through changing processes. What is the meaning people give to their mobility behaviours? Do they consider them as environmental involvement or not? Many attitudes could be identified in fact. The link between environmental awareness and altermobile habit seems to be neither obvious nor mechanical.

Animal welfare: social challenges due to this new concept

Toschi Maciel, Carolina

Social Sciences, Federal University of Santa Catarina Florianópolis, Brazil

Keywords

animal welfare, poultry market, environment sociology

In the context of agribusiness, the organization of the meat market has changed significantly in the last few decades. The recent demand for animal welfare, motivated mostly by the food safety crisis faced by Europe in 1990, has been stimulating changes from farm to fork. These changes are challenging the actors involved in the meat chain, both in the production and consumption process. Nevertheless, the articulation of animal welfare with global food markets has not yet been sufficiently studied from the perspective of Environmental Sociology. In this sense, the present research aims to fulfill part of this gap, by presenting a study on the challenges indicated by actors on the poultry chain in Santa Catarina (Brazil) due to animal welfare issues. In this way, a study was conducted based on environmental sociology literature, namely, in John Hannigan's constructionist perspective and in Arthur Mol and Gert Spaargaren's version of ecological modernization. The first one was particularly important for comprehending the raising process of animal welfare demand, while the second one for the description of the restructuring of meat market and its motivations. The research also provided a field study through qualitative interviews with farmers, abattoirs, public authorities, third party certification companies, NGOs and consumers with activities in Santa Catarina. The analysis of these materials suggested that there are significant differences on the definition of what constitutes the "animal welfare" and as a consequence conflicts have appeared, causing interference with the negotiations in the poultry market. Finally, the research provides considerations about the consequences of those dissimilarities, such as the difficulty in implementing "animal welfare practices" when it is not clear what is and what is not animal welfare, as well as the anxiety of consumers who are not certain what an advertisement like "product in conformity with animal welfare" really means.

Animal-farming practices and consumer trust in Finland

Jokinen, Pekka

*Faculty of Social Sciences and Regional Studies, University of Joensuu
Joensuu, FINLAND*

Vinnari, Markus

*Faculty of Social Sciences and Regional Studies, University of Joensuu
Tampere, FINLAND*

Kupsala, Saara

Research Programme for Environmental Policy, Finnish Environment Institute Helsinki, FINLAND

Keywords

politics of consumption, meat consumption, animal welfare

Sustainable consumption has become a core policy objective in national and international arenas even though its definition is not precise. It is ordinarily defined as the consumption of more environmentally efficiently produced goods, but there is a continuing need to learn more about consumer behaviour and to promote public trust in food issues. Animal welfare is a central issue in the politicisation of food consumption, and there has been considerable increase in demand for "animal friendly" products such as organic products.

The main interest of this paper is if developments in social practices are leading to a broad greening of food consumption, following a same kind of greening path as the organic production has done, for instance. We explore, firstly, the European trajectories of meat consumption. It is found that the meat consumption per person in Finland is low when considered in the EU context. The Nordic countries are typically known as high-trust societies in terms of food issues. This refers to trust in food safety, but also in public authorities and consumer organisations. Interestingly, in Finland the concern for farm animal welfare is the lowest and the trust to institutions and legislation promoting farm animal welfare is the highest in the EU25 countries. Secondly, we therefore examine the Finnish case on trust and animal welfare by using survey material related to consumer perspectives of meat and meat products. Thirdly, we aim to combine the citizen and the consumer perspectives on farm animal welfare by discussing how consumers understand and give meanings to animal welfare.

We make conclusions regarding the interest in animal welfare in the Finnish society by discussing the politicisation of food consumption, various positions of the citizen-consumer and the social institutions that may be required to facilitate more sustainable choices. The paper is based on a research project aiming to clarify the effect consumer trust in animal-farming practices has on the legitimacy of food policy.

Assessing Joint Knowledge

Bergmans, Anne

Faculty of Political and Social Sciences, University of Antwerp Antwerp, Belgium

Crabbé, Ann

*Faculty of Political and Social Sciences, University of Antwerp
Antwerp, Belgium*

Loots, Ilse

*Faculty of Political and Social Sciences, university of Antwerp
Antwerp, Belgium*

Deblonde, Marian

Institute for the Environment and Sustainable Development, University of Antwerp Antwerp, Belgium

Keywords

evaluation, knowledge production, participation

Participation in the context of decision-making on complex issues and, in particular, in the face of sustainability issues, environmental and technological uncertainty or risk, is often presented as a "must" because of its benefits in terms of legitimacy and acceptance. Most prescriptive literature focussing on issues such as process design and deliberation techniques, does pay abundant attention to interest representation and representativeness of participants in terms of interests and values, but tends to touch only marginally upon the cognitive, knowledge generating dimension of participation. In light of the changing relationship between science and society described by scholars such as Functowicz and Ravetz, Gibbons, Nowotny or Jasanoff, we think there is a clear need to investigate whether and how "joint knowledge production" contributes to creating a better and more advanced understanding of environmental and sustainability issues. Our planned for research aims at developing an assessment methodology in which objectives, criteria and procedures for measuring cognitive impact are discussed. This methodology will be developed inductively, based on the analysis of three cases related to human bio-monitoring, nanotechnology and nuclear waste disposal: real life experiments concerning participation in environmental and sustainability issues. By identifying bottle necks and factors fostering joint knowledge production, we hope to provide recommendations for use in real knowledge production processes. In fact, the feasibility of an assessment methodology is today still an open ended question, therefore we are looking forward to discuss these research intentions with colleagues at the ESA conference.

Attitudes towards animals' rights in Portugal: the influence of social values

Líbano Monteiro, Teresa

*Faculty of Human Sciences, Portuguese Catholic University
Lisbon, Portugal*

Policarpo, Verónica

*PhD - Sociology, Institute of Social Sciences
Lisbon, Portugal*

Keywords

materialist and post-materialist values, bullfights, circus, animals' rights, animal abuse and experiments

Attitudes towards animals' rights and protection have constantly been neglected as a legitimate scientific object by Portuguese social sciences. The first national survey on this issue was conducted in 2007, and this paper presents some of its main results. More specifically, we will address the subject in different dimensions, such as animal legal protection, the use of animals with commercial purposes, in bullfights, circus or other kind of shows, scientific experiments, as well as animal abandonment and abuse. Drawing on Ronald Inglehart's (1990) scale of human values, we hypothesise that attitudes towards animal rights may be partly explained by materialist and post-materialist values. Statistical analysis has shown that, though a huge consensus exists amongst Portuguese population regarding the need to increase animals' rights and legal protection, persistent differences may be found and partly explained by social values. With this paper we also seek to draw attention upon the interest of putting attitudes towards animals' rights into the social sciences agenda, as they may constitute an interesting observatory of the leading changes concerning human values.

Biological Transfer Agreements and environmental governance: implications for biotechnological research

Francis, Sabil

Global and European Studies Institute, University of Leipzig Leipzig, Germany

Keywords

forests, biodiversity, biotechnology, environmental democracy

The rise of a transnational knowledge society will reconfigure questions of environmental governance in the 21st century. One key aspect of this is profit oriented pharmaceutical research that addresses consumerist demands in the developed world, but draws upon the knowledge of forest/desert based indigenous people, as for example, the use of South African San tribe's knowledge of the hunger suppressing properties of the Hoodia plant by Pfizer to create appetite suppressing drugs. Current environmental governance policy for indigenous people is based on a compensatory model such as benefit sharing agreements. However, there is little empirical evidence on how benefit sharing agreements actually work out. This is what my paper will address through a case study of a benefit sharing agreement between industry, research institutions and tribal communities on the "arogyapacha" (Trichopus zeylanicus spp. travancoricus). (Trichopodaceae) a drug based on the traditional knowledge of the Kani tribe of Kerala, a southern Indian state. The paper will demonstrate how bitter disputes around this agreement - hailed as a model benefit sharing accord - raise broader questions of sustainability, the protection of bio diversity and environmental democracy.

The central issue is the gap between the Western concept of intellectual property where knowledge is a patentable commodity and the indigenous paradigm where knowledge cannot be easily propertised. These differing conceptions of the propertisation of knowledge, rooted in cultural rather than legal frameworks, pose a global environmental governance problem that has implications for European bio technological research. Based on empirical evidence from the "arogyapacha" case, this paper will demonstrate how the interaction of a transnational global knowledge society with indigenous people raises questions of sovereignty, environmental justice, and the ownership of knowledge. It will show how the structure, scope, and boundaries of existing legal and policy frameworks on environmental governance are being constantly challenged. It also shows how the legal, and mostly Western, regime of intellectual property reconfigures the very notion of community, citizenship and identity for forest based indigenous people and how this has deep implications for the preservation of biodiversity and the participation of indigenous people in a transnational knowledge society.

Birds of a feather? Food and agricultural risk governance of avian influenza in different EU Member States

de Krom, Michiel

Environmental Policy Group, Wageningen University Wageningen, The Netherlands

Keywords

Risk governance, uncertainty, avian influenza, EU, food and agriculture

From 2005 onwards, highly pathogenic avian influenza (bird flu) spread towards and eventually within Europe via different border-crossing flows, including those of wild birds and agricultural trade. Fear existed that via such movements, the virus would disseminate into and across territorially-based poultry farms, with different animal health and welfare, economic and social problems as a result. Given this duality between international virus flows and place-based animal holding practices, at what governance level could the avian influenza threat to Europe best be dealt with? At the transnational level of the EU, where managerial standardisation based on universalistic science and a strong market-orientation is more likely to be found; or at the national level, where situation-specific knowledge and practices of farmers and citizen-consumers are more likely to enter the equation? This paper examines food and agricultural risk governance of avian influenza in the EU Member States France, the UK, and the Netherlands, as well as on EU level. It does so based on policy document analyses, combined with 40 in-depth interviews with representatives of relevant international, EU and Member State institutions, food supply chain actors, NGOs and scientists. The paper discusses how in the interaction between these stakeholders, Member States have gained room for manoeuvre to adopt policy measures attuned to situation-specific circumstances, including socio-historical, economic, spatial, and natural ones. Moreover, it discerns consequences of this development for the understanding of European food and agricultural risk governance under conditions of reflexive modernity, with a special focus on the tension between Member State-based differentiation of governance measures and the functioning of the single European market, and the underlying characteristics of institutionalised distinctions between expert and citizen-consumer rationalities.

Building Alternative Agro-Food Systems in Hungary

Balázs, Bálint

Department of Environmental Economics, Szent István University, Institute of Environmental and Landscape Management Gödöllő, Hungary

Keywords

Knowledge, quality, agro-food networks, power, sustainable agriculture

Contemporary alternative agro-food networks (AAFNs) are frequently described by analysts, researchers and rural development professionals as fragile and ambiguous retail venues representing a wide variety of agro-food products and services while presenting sustainable, face-to-face, spatially proximate relations between farmers and consumers. In the alternative food movement discourse AAFNs usually gain meaning and value as a point of resistance against the universal logic of capitalism and a way out of the crisis of conventional agriculture. This paper will explore and compare agro-food initiatives from Hungary ranging from an open air market in downtown Budapest, through an urban buying group and a complex rural development hub, to organic public procurement schemes in their ambition and potential to represent meaningful alternative solution in the food system. Various strategies will be interpreted within the regulatory context of AAFNs in Hungary looking at how different policies and regulatory frameworks on the national level shape AAFNs' development. The analysis extended to different stakeholders' perspectives, representative statements on alternative production processes linked to quality, territorial origins and ecological advantages of food. While successfully retains as much funds as possible for the country, the national-level application of the CAP basically marginalises environmental concerns, alternative agriculture and regional development strategies. Rather than accommodate smallholder agriculture, hygiene regulations aim to ensure a maximum level of food safety, whereas trading laws impose a requirement to provide invoices for any sale. The underlying political, cultural processes and historical trajectories of each initiative are analysed with special regard on producers' marketing modes, consumption practices and consumer involvement, power relationships and modes of interactions between these groups. Preliminary results based on qualitative interview data analysis point to the contradictory characteristics of AAFNs in contemporary Hungary enhancing self-organisation, democratization, autonomy, and at the same time shaping new inequalities, creating spaces for commodification of agricultural knowledge.

Building sustainable local food networks in unsustainable environment as a lesson for post-transition countries. Case study from Poland

Goszczyński, Wojciech

Institute of Sociology, PhD student, Nicolaus Copernicus University Torun, Poland

Keywords

social capital, Alternative Agro-Food Networks, sustainable local food networks, post-transition societies, environment management

This paper will introduce topic of emerging alternative agro-food networks (AAFN) in post-transition countries. Recently, it can be observed growth of interest amongst rural sociologists in examination and promotion of sustainable local food networks both in social practice and amongst research community. First research results show serious differences between situation of traditional and organic farmers in post-transition countries and a more developed ones. Backwardness of post-transition societies in developing local food networks can be derived from three main sources: one is the cultural continuity disorder. Influence of modernization paradigm and a collective types of rural activities which dominate from 1945 to 1989 result in loss of traditional knowledge and skills by local farmers, processors and communities. Secondly, researchers observe strong influence of institutional frames on local activities. Public sector as a strongest actor hindering bottom up initiatives which lies in the heart of sustainable local food networks. The third cause comes from the social characteristic of post-transition societies. They can be described by the low level of social capital which makes common actions difficult to facilitate. Those challenges put in front of sociology in Eastern Europe – questions about possible importance of sustainable local food networks and a patterns which can be used to strengthening local initiatives focused on them. Questions seem to be crucial because reaching far beyond just rural issues. Future development of sustainable local food networks can determine touch also future conditions of environment and its management. Sustainable food networks which support small farming and processing in opposite to farming industry can be seemed like a one of the most effective mechanism of preserving and protecting environment at micro scale at bringing nature protection activities closer to the community. With this paper author try to stance to described challenges and question, basing on the results of ongoing research project ?Facilitating Alternative Agro-Food Networks: Stakeholder Perspectives on Research Needs

Challenges in incorporating the social dimension in a transnational sustainability project. The case of the FSC

Boström, Magnus

School of Life Sciences, Södertörn University Huddinge, Sweden

Keywords

multi-stakeholder, Social sustainability, transnational governance, FSC

This paper aims at explaining the challenges involved in incorporating social sustainability goals, principles, and criteria in transnational sustainability projects through a case study of the Forest Stewardship Council (FSC). The FSC is a multi-stakeholder organization that sets standards and policies for sustainable forestry, on the transnational, national, and regional level. This paper focuses on the organization, standard-setting, and policy-making of the FSC at the transnational level. The FSC is chosen as a crucial case. Several scholars have portrayed the FSC as exemplary in its multi-stakeholder ambitions and in developing novel transnational governance for substantiality with its far-reaching attempt to combine and balance environmental, social and economic objectives and standards. Despite these grand ambitions, critical challenges are observed and it is possible to infer that they are not unique to this particular case.

Using organizational, power, and framing perspectives, the paper makes an analysis of the FSC's formal, organizational structure, including the categorisation and representation of "social" stakeholders in relation to "economic" and "environmental" stakeholders. The extent to which FSC is able to assist the participation and influence of "social" stakeholders is also investigated. The paper concludes that three complicating factors are essential to take into account for understanding the challenges involved in such kind of organizational arrangement that the FSC represents: Time; the fact that this kind of sustainability project is a permanent, regular activity, which creates both material and ideological obstacles for participation. The transnational scale; which creates organizing and framing obstacles particularly for "social" actor categories, many of which are more entangled in a "local" or "national" outlook and context. Complexity, i.e. an over time increasingly complex organizational arrangement makes it even more difficult for "weak" stakeholders to have an overview and effective impact on the organization.

Climate change and sustainable consumption - Consumers being torn between increasing environmental awareness and decreasing economic options

Wehlau, Diana

*Research Center for Sustainability Studies (artec), University of Bremen
Bremen, Germany*

Krapf, Hanna

*Research Center for Sustainability Studies (artec), University of Bremen
Bremen, Germany*

Weller, Ines

*Research Center for Sustainability Studies (artec), University of Bremen
Bremen, Germany*

Keywords

climate change, Environmental Awareness, sustainable consumption

Recent empirical studies suggest that the intensification of scientific, political and public debates on climate change and global warming has led to an increase in environmental consciousness in general, and to an increased awareness of the environmental impact of private consumption in particular. Accordingly, large parts of the population express their willingness to adopt eco-friendly consumption behaviour. In addition to this "moralization of the markets" (Stehr et al. 2006), private households are simultaneously hit by the increase in prices of energy, mobility and food, caused by the scarcity of resources and by the indirect consequences of climate change. This in turn alters the economic scope of private households, even though the vulnerability to price increases varies significantly, e.g. with regard to the type of household or the income situation. Against this background, the question arises, whether and to what extent these coexistent developments - the increasing acceptance of eco-friendly consumption patterns and the massive increase in prices of goods and services - actually affect the consumption behaviour of private households. So far, research deficits remain with regard to the implications of these two developments on (sustainable) consumption on the one hand and the strategies of different households to adapt to changes and challenges related to climate change and decreased economic options on the other hand. Against this background, our empirical study aims at analysing the way in which different groups of consumers in Germany deal with these coexisting developments and whether those affect their daily consumption routines. Does the coexistence of the debate on climate change and rising prices open up a "window of opportunity" for sustainable consumption or - quite the contrary - do the economic constraints on households rather limit the extent of sustainable consumption? How do these developments and strategies affect the two objectives of sustainable consumption - consuming differently and consuming less? These questions will be empirically analysed by means of qualitative interviews and discussions in focus groups. First results of this work-in-progress will be put up for discussion in order to achieve a better understanding of the determinants of sustainable consumption at the household level.

Climate change: risk perceptions and mass media discourse configurations in Lithuania

Rinkevicius, Leonardas

*Department of Sociology, Kaunas University of Technology
Kaunas, Lithuania*

Balzekiene, Aiste

*Department of Sociology, Kaunas University of Technology
Kaunas, Lithuania*

Telesiene, Audrone

*Department of Sociology, Kaunas University of Technology
Kaunas, Lithuania*

Keywords

climate change, public opinion, mass media discourse

This article aims at analyzing and comparing public opinion and mass-media discourse in Lithuania regarding the global issue of climate change. The empirical evidence presented in this article is based upon the representative public opinion survey as well as mass-media monitoring and content-analysis carried out in 2008. This is a part of the major three-year research project RINOVA Risk Perceptions, Public Communication and Innovative Governance in the Knowledge Society funded by the Lithuanian National Science Foundation.

As the results identify, the public discourse on climate change in Lithuania is prevailed by reproducing the kinds of knowledge and opinions that are shaped and disseminated by sources and channels abroad, often stretching to the most remote corners of the planet - socially and geographically. Hypothetically, this might lead to a "global village" conceptualization (McLuhan, 1962 and 1964), particularly of the ways in which the issues of climate change are being received, perceived, communicated and articulated in different countries like Lithuania. The ways of where, when and in which contexts messages regarding climate change are placed in Lithuanian mass media clearly indicate the tendency that global warming is at best an exotic theme reaching "local village" of Lithuanian mass-audience from abroad, rather than becoming a socially internalized issue. Climate change remains a minor issue of concern both in public perceptions and in mass media discourse. Why the key issue climate change is penetrating so slowly the "local village" consciousness of Lithuanian society? Why the messages of global warming are channeled in Lithuanian mass media only as an addition to commixes, ads and other leisure rubrics, and thereby add to the social construction (or rather destruction) of societal environmental awareness? These and other research questions are addressed in this paper, pointing to the interpretation of the state of society as undergoing a "double-risk" (Rinkevicius, 2000) phase of its development to use the well-known risk-society theory (Beck, 1992) in the light of contemporary issues that the countries in a "global village" are facing.

Climate Policies and the Politics in the Design of Markets of Carbon Credits

Lemaire, Xavier

Centre for Management under Regulation, Warwick Business School Coventry, United Kingdom

Keywords

Cap and trade, Energy., Carbon credits, Climate policies

Market-based mechanisms for addressing environmental problems are becoming common features of environmental policies and, in particular, are at the core of the Kyoto protocol about climate change. Market-mechanisms are supposed to harness the dynamics of competition and to incentivize actors to commit themselves to long-term goals of environmental protection.

Compared to other forms of regulation, market mechanisms could theoretically reduce costs of cutting down carbon emissions, thanks to the flexibility allowed through emissions trading among heterogeneous stakeholders. They could allow states to raise considerable revenues without the need of a new tax. Market mechanisms make it also easier to reach political consensus at an international level, as degrees of freedom are left to local and national actors to elaborate their own road map for carbon reductions. Now economic actors have managed to negotiate not too restrictive measures and have learnt to play with the possibilities offered by market mechanisms: it appears that the popularity of the cap and trade schemes among decision-makers relies also on the possibility for governments and corporations to postpone painful choices.

This paper will examine the rationale behind the adoption of market-oriented policies instead of traditional environmental regulations and some of the practical difficulties encountered in the application of the Kyoto treaty linked to its inherent logic. It surveys the literature on the first stages of the European Union Trading scheme and analyses the system of preferences and the strategies of major polluters, notably from the energy sector, facing the constraint of greenhouse gas emissions reductions. Finally, it will synthesize the main critics of carbon trading schemes and draw some concluding remarks from debates about the current attempts to extend carbon trading systems to a greater number of countries and sectors of the economy.

Complexity, uncertainties and vulnerabilities in contaminated places decision-making in Portugal and Brazil

Fernandes, Lúcia

School of Economics/ Centre for Social Studies, University of Coimbra Coimbra, Portugal

Keywords

complexity, uncertainty, environmental decision-making, different knowledges, chemical risks

Science and technology involved in chemical production and use produce risks and uncertainties that can generate environmental and health problems. Population and institutional vulnerabilities in some countries and places aggravate these impacts. S&T advance produce short term economic and social benefits in this area. Risk analysis techniques and the production and consumption paradigm guide most of the public policy development, promoting a "toxic culture" and neglecting the quality of life of local communities and the uncertainties in long term predictions of health and environmental damages.

We claim that these policies should be anchored in the precautionary principle and the right to know principles. The question currently guiding most chemical policies is: 'How little damage is possible?' whilst we defend that the question should be: 'How much damage is safe?'. Normal science is a decision-making mechanism, that isn't able to address the problem, most of the times. It doesn't take into account the complexity, uncertainties and vulnerabilities of the chemical contamination case. On the other hand, local knowledge produces and expresses social, political and cultural values and claims neglected by scientists and technicians in the contaminated environment decision process, who consider theirs as the only kind of acceptable knowledge.

The contaminated environments of Estarreja (Portugal) and Cidade dos Meninos (Brazil) are the selected case studies of this research, both considered here as a "toxic culture" product, complex systems, with technical, political, social, cultural and economic interfaces and population and institutional vulnerabilities presence. The work's main objective is to understand the ways of (non) interaction between local and technical-scientific knowledge involved in the decision-making process related to contaminated places. This paper discusses the main results of the work up to now.

Corporate social responsibility as a business strategy: Stora Enso-WWF partnership project

Tysiachniouk, Maria

Environmental Sociology, Centre for Independent Social Research St. Petersburg, Russia

Keywords

corporate social responsibility, environment, forest certification, sustainable forest management

The paper analyzes the strategic partnership between transnational corporation Stora-Enso and international nongovernmental organization NGO WWF as a business strategy that helps the company to adopt its business to the turbulent environment of the economy in transition.

In this paper I draw from the theory of institutional sociology to explain complex interaction between transnational actors and actors in localities that jointly form a governance generating network in order to implement the project. In addition I use the theory of organizational isomorphism (DiMaggio and Powell, 1983). The concept of mimetic isomorphism was particularly important for this paper. The paper is based on qualitative field research during two expeditions to the area (in 2002 and 2006) and follow up updates in 2007-2009. In total 43 interviews have been conducted.

The paper examines the cooperation between the World Wildlife Fund (WWF) and the concern Stora Enso during implementation of the "Pskov Model Forest" project in North West Russia. The paper assess the effectiveness of the partnership and its outcomes for both participants. For Stora Enso, the project has become one of tools for adaptation of its business to the local context. WWF, as Stora Enso's strategic partner, assisted in resolving problems coming from state authorities, local stakeholders and the population. It also contributed to "legitimizing" Stora Enso in the eyes of international stakeholders.

Through the project Stora Enso attempted to create an optimum algorithm for successful business routine in Russia. This algorithm was intended to be applied in all Stora Enso daughter enterprises working in different regions. Thus, the mimetic isomorphism would be exploited. However, instability and turbulence of organizational fields in Russian regions has become an obstacle in carrying out this plan in its original form. For its part WWF also tried to create a model of sustainable forest management which could be further disseminated over the country. In this case, the aforementioned solution of the State Forest Agency on creation of model forests network has opened up prospects of realizing the principle of mimic isomorphism.

Critical aspects of risk theory facing environmental conflicts

Jerónimo, Helena

*Sociology, ISEG, Technical University of Lisbon & SOCIUS
Lisbon, Portugal*

Keywords

Risk, environment, technoscience

The concept of risk is a useful key for discussing the relationship between technology and the environment, where the nexus is derived from the fact that risk is the outcome of human actions. In the reworkings of the idea by writers such as Lagadec and Beck - whether confined, as in the case of the French sociologist, to those technological developments which have a potentially catastrophic impact or expanded, as in the case of the German sociologist, to a full description of contemporary societies - , the concept of risk has cleverly brought the discussion of technology's new dangers to the environment into the realm of the social sciences. There are, however, three major problems. First, the broader, macro-sociological interpretation of risk failed to make a clear analytical distinction between risk itself and closely-related concepts such as uncertainty, ignorance, danger and threat. Secondly, in late modernity we are experiencing a change from the logic of wealth distribution in a society of scarcity to the logic of risk distribution, which neglects ecological conflicts set in motion before the nuclear and biotechnological risks emerged. Thirdly, there is a problem at the heart of the idea of risk as the product of human action, which is generally interpreted as "manufactured risk". On the one hand, the term "manufactured" is not the most suitable term for highlighting the unexpected results of processes which we set in motion unintentionally. On the other hand, natural disasters cease to exist, giving way to the social amplification of risks, and even making man entirely responsible for all "evils". In discussion of these three problem areas associated with the concept of risk, I will seek to show that the sociology of technology and the sociology of the environment need to question each other on the relations between human beings and contingency, at a time when the vanished Goddess of Fortune is mutating into new forms.

Crucial social and cultural environment of ecological tourism (case study)

Ikonnikova, Nataliya

*The department of general sociology, State University - High School of Economics
Moscow, Russia*

Keywords

values, social norms, ecological tourism

The case study, which I observe, considers an example of the crucial impact of social and cultural factors on an attempt to organize ecological tourist route in Elets' surroundings. The idea was to organize family pastime by rafting from one equipped site to another. The organizers have been Russians by birth but immigrated many years ago and had "similar" experience in Sweden, Norway and Canada. My function in the project was sociocultural expertise.

First, we've met that less people are ready to rest "within" their family and many parents are not ready and don't have skills to communicate with their children so close and all days around.

Most requests were not from families but from young and middle-age teams going to drink without social and civilized pressure. It reveals a set of valued related to the spare time (ways of spending), social norms (enforced "system" norms in opposition to close informal, dependence instead of responsibility and so on), nature ("wild", external, out-social, out-cultural).

Of course, no rules of behavior and nature protection (including regulations concerning campfire, firewood, natural and sanitary needs) were complied with.

Natives have not considered the project as the way to get some income and their activity has been directed to plundering of site and ruffianism.

Local authorities on the contrary have had an idea to get much money and other benefits from the project. And they obstructed it, used all forms of formal and informal pressure and racket as if they saw "unavailability to collaborate".

Therefore, the analysis of ecological tourism as some social and cultural activity in some "particular" environment reveals attitudes not only to nature, even environment overall. It reveals on a large extent not "external", but "internal" social and cultural attitudes of the groups involved. These attitudes include value and normative background, group identity and interrelations, structural conjunctions of the members of the group within some large social system, indirect organizational relations of tourists mediated by travel agencies.

Debating a Dam is Debating Dams - Internet environmentalist discussion group on Alqueva dam, where networks «spring and spin», and local territorial relations and Europe show how entangled they are...

Bento, Sofia

*Dept. Sociology - School of Economics and Management, SOCIUS - Centro de Investigação em Sociologia Económica e das Organizações
Lisboa, Portugal*

de Sousa, Marta A. P.

*Dep. de Sociologia - Universidade do Minho, PhD Student - Centro ICS
Braga, Portugal*

Keywords

internet, environmental movements, European Lobbying, BIG Dams

The Alqueva Dam [1961-2002] was a huge project in terms of time and resources and people. It is a big dam, and has become the synonym for the environmentalist movement of all big, expensive and non-environmentally friendly projects («That is another Alqueva project!!!»). In this presentation, it will be addressed the internet group discussion of the environmentalist movement, since 1990 until the beginning of the dam. The internet list shows the circulation of the dam through the networks, and the construction of the environmentalist speech in a chain of argumentation, that tells the history of the pressure and lobbying that environmentalist Portuguese movement tried to exercise, without much success. European Union, International debates on big dams, organization of conferences, demonstrations, and lobbying the European parliament and the European commission did not stop the dam. The internet discussion, the parliament discussion and the newspapers articles show the history of a country, of social movements, parties and a new reality emerging (EEC, European Union, etc) in successive waves, against which the Alqueva seemed to exercise an almost unstoppable capacity of building inertia and conquering what opposition came to arise. And most importantly, Alqueva was a political project that embraced environmentalist opposition, offering the movement a controlled, nevertheless real, process of incorporation of environmental design in itself. The movement that was against its coming to being, was in the end discussing its water level and impacts, and every avenue seemed to come to the same conflation ? Alqueva was going to happen, against the backdrop of arguments that start in water scarcity, climate change, agriculture, etc until those stemming from environmental impacts, heritage loss, de-localization of an entire village, and golf courses... Europe was, before Alqueva, the big helper for the environmental movement to succeed in their arguments against local politics. However, with Alqueva, EU was simultaneously the provider of the conditions necessary for the dam to begin its inexorable construction, and at the same time, the tour de force of the environmental movement by lobbying and arguing in Brussels against a much wanted (it seemed) project in Portugal.

Does social morphology improve environmental sociology? Origin and future of an old European sociological theory

Boudes, Philippe

sociology, Ladyss-CNRS / University Paris X Nanterre, France

Keywords

environmental sociology, social morphology, history of sociology

History and origins of environmental sociology are widely debated. It is generally US human ecology which is presented as the school of thought which has provided the basis for contemporary environmental sociology. Classics' reflections are also studied, and finally there is a consensus to limit the history of environmental sociology at these two origins. We would like to present another possible way of presenting historical sociological legitimization of environmental sociology, which starts from a European debate: social morphology.

Indeed, works of Durkheim, Mauss, and perhaps overall Halbwachs show a very specific attention on the substratum of society, inducing that this substratum might explain aspects of sociological phenomena. However this substratum is the key-object of social morphology and embraces in great part what we actually mean by environment.

Also considered by its geographical aspect, with Ratzel and the relation between societies and their soil; or by its spatial and formal aspect by Simmel, social morphology has rapidly been an acknowledged approach. Moreover, regarding the links between social morphology and human ecology, we have to underline their similarity: neo-orthodox human ecology as developed by Duncan or Schnore is supported by this acknowledgement of this European complementarity.

Then, in order to update this dynamic of approach of socio-environmental phenomena, we will define some ways of application of social morphology, confronting its elaboration of the social substratum of society and the actual relation between nature and society. Finally, in order to illustrate our reflection, we will present an example of a recent study of social morphology linked with the thematic of environmental justice.

Energy Efficiency and Renewable Energies in the Context of Communes: Scope of Action and Local Experiences

Laborgne, Pia

European Institute for Energy Research, University of Karlsruhe Karlsruhe, Germany

Huber, Andreas

European Institute for Energy Research, University of Karlsruhe Karlsruhe, Germany

Marchand, Dorothée

*Laboratoire Mutations Urbaines, Sociales et Techniques, CSTB
Paris, France*

Roudil, Nadine

*Laboratoire Services, Procès, Innovations, CSTB
Paris, France*

Keywords

case studies, energy, local communities

Saving energy is essential for a sustainable development. Local communities are at the forefront of the striving for an efficient use of energy. Especially municipalities of small communities are close to energy end users. They also have effective instruments to enhance and promote energy efficiency and the use of renewable energies.

The paper will discuss the role and scope of action of local communities for a broader implementation of renewable energies and energy efficiency and present 3 case studies of German communities based on qualitative interviews with different local actors (administration, civil society, political actors, local economy). They analyse strategies for and experiences of local implementation measures for a sustainable use of energy. The case studies have been realized in 2008 in the context of a French-German research project on regional strategies for energy efficiency and renewable energies in buildings. Main results concern drivers and barriers, the role of the size of the community, local "philosophies", different "modes of coordination", local strategies as well as a French-German comparison.

Ensuring Environmental and Social Sustainability of Private Sector Projects: A Comparison of Existing Approaches

Novozhilov, Roman

*Environment and Social Development Department, International Finance Corporation
Washington, DC, USA*

Keywords

environmental and social sustainability, environment, community engagement, Public Participation, corporate social responsibility

Environmental and social sustainability of private sector projects has emerged as an important consideration for investment decisions of individual and institutional investors.

Growing public awareness of the world's environmental and social problems, such as climate change, persistent poverty and social inequality, water shortages, soil and water quality degradation, has increased collective consciousness of environmental and social aspects of economic development and private sector projects.

Many well-known examples of unsustainable and socially irresponsible business practices by international corporations led to increased attention to sustainability issues from investors and the general public. The spread of responsible consumerism among consumers in the developed countries and increased success of environmental campaigns by NGOs provided further impetus to sustainable business practices and increased attention to the sustainability of the supply chains of international household goods producers.

There is also a growing pool of research that finds that environmental and social sustainability of individual companies and the quality of corporate governance and stakeholder engagement is positively correlated with financial returns on investments. This resulted in increasing interest from the investors to pursue sustainable investment options. Various indexes and indicators of social and environmental practices had been developed in order to assess companies' business practices to inform and guide socially-responsible investors.

Several main approaches emerged for ensuring sustainable investments in the private sector from the financial institutions. This process had been led by International Financial Institutions (IFIs), such as the World Bank, International Finance Corporation, European Bank for Reconstruction and Development, Asian Development Bank. A number of requirements had been developed by these organizations for ensuring environmental and social sustainability of their client's business practices. Similar approaches have spread beyond IFIs to the private investment organizations and banks. The so-called Equator Principles emerged as the main framework for sustainability of private banks' investments.

This presentation will explore the various frameworks for environmental and social sustainability of private sector investments and analyze their respective merits and shortcomings. Special focus will be given to social and civic engagement and community participation and their role in minimizing and mitigating the environmental and social impacts of the private sector projects.

Environment Policy and Governing Nature - Government or Governance?

Sande, Allan

*Bodø University College, Bodø University College
BODØ, Norway*

Otterlei, Jill Beth

*Bodø University College, Bodø University College
Bodø, Norway*

Keywords

national governing, regional management, environment

Industrialisation and urbanisation in the Nordic countries create environmental problems such as declining natural biodiversity. Sweden and Norway have established in 1967 and 1972 Ministries of environment to solve the environmental problems. At the national level there are similarities in the governing structures and national policy of environmental protection. At regional level there are differences in management of nature. This paper presents an empirical qualitative casestudy of national governing and regional management of the environment in both these countries in the north. With the use of comparative methods, we have investigated the different patterns of organisation of the regional management of the environment. The empirical findings suggest that Swedish system of governing is an integrated "top down" management and the Norwegian system is more a governance system which is disintegrated and "bottom up". The Swedish management puts more emphasis on conservation of nature and has larger biodiversity than that of Norway. The discussion leads to the conclusion that the organization of institutions counts in the solution of environmental problems.

Environmental Attitudes of Urban Dwellers on the Danube River in Vojvodina: Regional aspects, Sociocultural values and Social mobilization

Ristic, Dusan

*Department of Sociology, Faculty of Philosophy
Novi Sad, Serbia*

Pajvancic, Ana

*Department of Sociology, Faculty of Philosophy
Novi Sad, Serbia*

Keywords

socio-cultural values, river Danube, social mobilization, environmental attitudes, regional ecological problems

Research findings presented in this paper are a part of the project "Ecological awareness of the urban dwellers on the Danube River in Vojvodina", conducted by Vojvodinian Sociological Association in the period from January to June 2008. It is the first sociological research on the aforementioned issue in the region of Vojvodina. This research was made on the basis of the questionnaire upon representative (random) sample of 364 examinees from five cities geographically located on the river Danube. Environmental attitudes were analyzed through the three dimensions: environmental knowledge, environmental values and ecological behavior intention. The main hypothesis of the research was that examinees of this inquiry have wider knowledge and awareness on regional aspects of ecological problems, as an effect of geographical and ecological connection between the cities of their residence. Hence the results of the inquiry shows the opposite ecological knowledge of the examinees is to a large extent "localized" and limited to aspects of their everyday experience and surrounding. They effluent from the concrete environmental conditions of their cities. Findings of the research also show a discrepancy between ecological values and ecological behavior intention of the examinees. They have extensive ecological values but their potential for social mobilization in the system of ecological protection is very low. Main results of the inquiry are situated in a broader ecological, regional, political and socio-cultural context and related to findings derived from other sociological inquiries in those fields.

Environmental citizenship and citizen-consumer: Individual actor's role in the environmental question

Haanpää, Leena

Turku Center for Child and Youth Research, University of Turku, Finland Turku, Finland

Keywords

consumer, citizenship, environmental citizenship, energy consumption

The concepts of consumer and citizen have spread in wide use in the contemporary political, societal, and public debate. This has had a straight influence on the discourse related to the environment-individual relationship. Despite the quite customary concept "citizen-consumer" the notion is problematic in many sense. What makes it problematic is that consumption and consumerism targets to a selfish maximization of utility while citizenship is connected to a promotion of collective good (e.g. sound environment) and responsible choice. This paper focuses on the notions of citizen-consumer supported by empirical results from consumption patterns in general and especially from energy consumption. The aim of the paper is thus, to ponder whether the concept of citizen-consumer is able to form a basis to another concept - that of environmental citizenship - in the contemporary consumer capitalism. This aim is approached empirically with the help of two statistical data. First, Flash Eurobarometer 123 (2002, "Perception of Sustainable Development and Environmental Concerns of European"), are based on 7533 respondents and collected in 15 EU countries. The second data, Flash Eurobarometer 65.2 (2006, e.g. energy questions) are collected from 29 EU countries and are formed of 29 220 respondents. The analysis test the explanation power of ecological foot print as a macro-level independent variable and also micro-level variables are used to explain citizen-consumer and environmental citizenship as it comes to responsible consumption choices. Knowing that there are national variations in the ecological foot print helps to understand national differences related to environmental issues and shed light to possibilities to act in a responsible way. The preliminary results point out that the nations under comparison share a common positive attitude towards environmental issues. However, when explanatory variables are brought into the analysis the situation changes and both ecological foot print and micro-level variables have influence on energy consumption.

Environmental Citizenship, Natural Resource Governance and Transforming Politics of Sustainability

Kotilainen, Juha

Faculty of Social Sciences and Regional Studies, University of Joensuu Joensuu, Finland

Keywords

natural resource governance, environmental citizenship, forests, sustainability

By focussing on the intersection of the conceptions of environmental citizenship and natural resource governance, this paper seeks to build a framework for analysing transformations in citizenship participation in the sustainability of the use of natural resources. The view that participation would take place within communities where people live is challenged by the perspectives of citizenship according to which people would participate in the politics of sustainability across localities. It has been argued that citizenship involvement should be seen to occur through connections across ecological space.

The paper specifically addresses the issue of participation in the politics of forest utilisation. Forest utilisation is taken to mean commercial use of timber resources and forest conservation for touristic purposes alike. In more detail, the paper focuses on public procurement policies and forest certification systems that both have been spreading rapidly across Europe. Distinctions are made in terms of different forms of citizen participation. The ways in which these forms are present in the politics of forest utilisation are analysed. The impacts of the transformations in the sphere of environmental politics for understanding citizenship are explored. While nation states do play important roles, partnerships between businesses and non-governmental organisation have become increasingly important regarding the politics of forest environments. Consequently, the processes of citizen participation are transformed along two main lines: while environmental politics are spreading through networks, they also result in new territorialized forms of environmental management. These developments seem to lead simultaneously, on one hand, towards more homogenised and, on the other hand, uneven environmental policies and politics.

Environmental concern: Empirical analyses on measurement approaches and attitude structure

Best, Henning

*Faculty of Social Sciences, University of Mannheim
Mannheim, Germany*

Keywords

environmental concern, NEP, environmental behaviour, values, attitudes

When reviewing research articles on environmental concern and environmental behaviour, one can be irritated by the sheer magnitude of different attitude scales and measurement approaches. Surprisingly little attention has been paid to the conceptual and statistical connections between the different scales. To facilitate the comparison of different studies' results, some influential scales for the measurement of environmental values and attitudes are compared empirically in this paper. In a German survey, four pre-existing scales were queried: Inglehart's materialism / postmaterialism scale, the NEP scale by Dunlap et al. (2000), an attitude scale in the tradition of Maloney and Ward, developed by Diekmann and Preisendörfer (2000), and an object-specific scale measuring attitudes towards waste recycling. The scales are analyzed regarding their respective correlation with environmental behavior and the interrelation of the different measures using structural equation modeling.

Environmental Issues and Social Capital. Local communities and agricultural development in economically depressed areas

Tsobanoglou, George

Sociology, University of the Aegean Athens, Greece

Keywords

environment, social capital, Rural Society

The broad focus is to incorporate academic analyses of sustainability issues with those issues expressed by locals. We need to explore the social embeddedness of institutions in those areas as they are expressed via the formation of cooperatives as well as related local politico-administrative institutions.

Cooperatives have been identified as important to the development of social capital, socio-economic inclusion, political empowerment and economic sustainability, especially in the face of globalization. In this sense, they can be seen to facilitate a relationship between social and economic capital. What is not clear however, is the extent cooperative work forms are able to develop physical capital.

In this sense physical capital is equated with ecological sustainability. If cooperatives are able to facilitate the development of social, physical, economic capital they will provide a significant mechanism for sustainable development and could provide the means by which collective action can be translated into endogenous social development.

We want to highlight the multidimensional aspects of such social forms, as the social enterprises, that can create an environment which can shape local change in marginal communities in Greece's rural regions. A proposal for the eco-development of these regions will be discussed.

Environmental policies and citizens' participation in Spain

Martinez-Iglesias, Mercedes

*Sociology and Social Anthropology, University of Valencia
Valencia, Spain*

Keywords

socio-ecological conflicts, ecological sociology, environmental policies, Citizen participation

Citizen participation is often presented as a necessary part of the process of defining and managing environmental policies. In fact, it is generally regulated in a variety of ways that affect people's rights to enquire, request and receive information. This paper examines three aspects of this issue within the context of Spain: the legal and political limits of citizen participation rights, showing their inferior position in relation to conventional political participation; specific examples of citizen involvement in environmental conflicts, which operates by means that are often outside the regulated channels; and the social functions of requests for regulated participation, which indicate a remarkably contradictory situation. In actual fact, this participation takes very different forms, sometimes going through the channels defined by governments, though often consciously ignoring or questioning them. To ensure a sufficiently comprehensive analytical approach, it should be included a conflict sociological view.

Environmental public policies and public awareness in Portugal: a scenario of contradictions

Schmidt, Luisa

*ICS-UL, Instituto de Ciências Sociais da Universidade de Lisboa
Lisboa, Portugal*

Valente, Susana

*ICS-UL, Instituto de Ciências Sociais da Universidade de Lisboa
Lisboa, Portugal*

Truninger, Mónica

*ICS-UL, Instituto de Ciências Sociais da Universidade de Lisboa
Lisboa, Portugal*

Keywords

environment, public policies, Environmental problems, Public awareness

Environmental issues in Portugal show historical traits distinctive from other post-war Western countries, which inherently belong to a society that maintained its rural status until mid-1970's within a dictatorial political context. There was a prolonged lack of environmental public policies in the country. Only with the accession of Portugal to the EU (in the mid-1980s) some changes were introduced through the creation of policies and legislation, mainly by transposing EU directives onto national regulations. However, this process of implementation was in many cases ineffective. That is, it was enshrined in national policy frameworks, but with a low rate of enforcement. The State belatedly assumed its role and responsibilities on policy enforcement. This lack of commitment in enforcing environmental policies and measures is now apparent through the poor environmental indicators that the country shows in several domains.

In addition, how has the process of 'transposing' policies and legislation onto the civil society been conducted by the government?

After more than two decades of environmental policies' implementation, the social impact achieved is still incipient: despite increasing public environmental awareness (apparent through public discourse and population concerns), there is a lack of materialization of this awareness in both everyday practices and civic participation/mobilization. Compared with other European countries, Portugal is at the crossroads between northern and eastern European countries, wherein democratic information and participation practices arrived much later.

This paper discusses the persistent unsuccessful implementation of environmental policies, looking at two related problems: the weakness of environmental movements and the absence of information and communication strategies by the State.

The paper's empirical work is based on survey material produced by Observa (Observatory for Environment, Society and Public Opinion) over the last 10 years, taking into account some environmental problems/sectors as paradigmatic cases.

Environmental representations and responsabilization in children's books

Larsson, Bengt

Dept. of Sociology, Göteborg University Göteborg, Sweden

Keywords

Youth, Governmentality, sustainable development, cosmopolitanization, environmental education

This paper discusses one particular aspect of the cosmopolitanization of childhood by analysing children's books giving advice on how to "save the world" from environmental catastrophe. Its purpose is to analyse how such books articulate and spread "eco-knowledge", encouraging children to become environmentally aware world citizens. The analysis shows that these books urge children not only to become self-disciplined and caring, ethical "ecological selves", but also to partake in producing local eco-knowledge and monitoring eco-discipline in their families, schools, and local communities. The books generally begin with a definition of the causes, consequences, and urgent character of environmental problems. Even if more complex explanations can be found, the general theme is that because "we" have caused the problems, it is "our" individual responsibility to do something. This problematization is followed by an articulation of children's responsibility and potential influence. There is a strong emphasis that children do make a difference, and that they must act now. This leads to more practical advice on what to do at home to put this responsibility into practice. The interconnection of problems, blame, possibilities, responsibilities, commitment, and tactics and techniques articulates a persuasive and potentially mobilizing eco-knowledge, of a kind that is an increasingly manifest feature of late modern societies - although it is not always as strongly articulated as in these "save the world" books. By simultaneously empowering the children, stimulating their cosmopolitical commitment, and suggesting certain techniques and tactics for improving their families' and schools' environmental performances, these books encourage children to identify with a duty of becoming cosmopolitical problem solvers. These books directly target children, although with an implicit purpose to influence family behaviour, "from the inside" and "from below". Thus, they illustrate a kind of "governing at a distance", through the dispersion of knowledge and practices that increases the "subjects'" capacities and objectives to govern themselves and exercise their citizenship reasonably.

European´s Perceptions of climate change and global warming: A micro-macro analysis

Kuckartz, Udo

Education, Philipps University Marburg Marburg, Germany

Keywords

sustainability, environmental behavior, environmental attitudes, global warming, climate change

This paper discusses the problem of perception of global climate change on two levels: on the international level by use of the data of different Eurobarometer studies and on the level of the individuals by use of two qualitative studies that our research group has conducted in Germany in 2009.

Based on the Eurobarometer studies EBS 300, EBS 295 and EB Flash 219 the first part of the paper will compare selected European countries with regard to the perception of climate change and global warming. The major effects, for instance the extremely significant effect of the people's education, will be mentioned and compared between the different European countries. The main focus will be on the gap between knowledge, attitudes and behaviour.

The second part of the paper will focus the results of qualitative studies on the micro level. What role plays the climate change issue in people's every day life? Why a gap between the perception and the attitudes on one side and the behaviour on the other side is existent. What explanations people give by themselves for this discrepancy.

It will be of special interest to contrast the results of the large international surveys with the micro studies. For instance EBS 300 tells us that the most common practices are the choice of a more environmental mode of transport (28%), reduced car use (25%) and the purchase of a less-polluting vehicle (18%) but it does not tell us why the percentage is so low compared with the high percentage (75%) of Europeans who think that climate change is a very serious problem,

Experiencing the Global Dimension of Sustainability: Intercultural Dialogue and Competence Development in International E-Learning Settings

Rieckmann, Marco

Institute for Environmental and Sustainability Communication, Leuphana University of Lüneburg Lüneburg, Germany

Barth, Matthias

Institute for Environmental and Sustainability Communication, Leuphana University of Lüneburg Lüneburg, Germany

Keywords

Intercultural Dialogue, Global Learning, Competence Development, Education for Sustainable Development, Virtual Learning

Sustainable development requires international and intercultural dialogue about possible social transitions towards sustainability. Without communication and exchanging ideas and approaches on a global level, it will not be possible to cope with problems of unsustainability in an adequate manner. Thus, sustainable development will only be realisable if as many people as possible are actively involved. Consequently, the Agenda 21 points out education and communication as key factors of sustainable development.

The fundamental transformations in terms of sustainable development require a far-reaching change of consciousness in individuals. This can only be brought about by learning (cf. Vare and Scott, 2007). In order for individuals to be in a position to engage with sustainability-related issues, a change of perspective in education is required, a reorientation towards 'Education for Sustainable Development' (ESD).

ESD aims at developing competencies that enable individuals to participate in socio-political processes and hence to contribute to shaping the society they live in towards sustainable development (e.g. Bormann and de Haan, 2008). Addressing global issues and getting involved in international and intercultural communication and cooperation processes can be seen as important elements of ESD (cf. de Haan et al., 2008; Selby, 2003). However, few learning settings can be found that offer and stimulate an immediate and equal dialogue between learners from the North and the South.

Given this background, this paper asks if learning about sustainability in international e-learning settings involving students from the North and the South supports the students' competence development. Research is done on the international virtual seminar 'Sustainable Development in Europe and Latin America', held by the Leuphana University of Lüneburg in the summer term 2009, which involved participants from Chile, Mexico, Peru, and Germany.

Results show how students experience the global dimension of sustainability and improve their competencies crucial for international communication and cooperation in terms of sustainable development. Furthermore, the main challenges they are facing during the learning process become apparent.

Farmers facing climate variabilities and changes: the case of groundwater users of coastal aquifers in France, Portugal and Morocco

Bento, Sofia

*SOCIUS, Technical University of Lisbon
Lisbon, Portugal*

Errahj, Mostafa

Ingénierie du Développement, Ecole Nationale d'Agriculture de Meknes Meknes, Morocco

Richard-Ferroudji, Audrey

*UMR G-Eau, Cemagref
Montpellier, France*

Rinaudo, Jean-Daniel

*Economie, Brgm
Montpellier, France*

Faysse, Nicolas

UMR G-Eau, Cirad Montpellier, France

Veranda, Marta

*Socius, Socius
Lisbon, Portugal*

Schmidt, Luisa

*ICS, Universidad de Lisboa
Lisbon, Portugal*

Garin, Patrice

*UMR G-Eau, Cemagref
Montpellier, France*

Rollin, Dominique

*UMR G-Eau, Cemagref
Montpellier, France*

Keywords

climate change, groundwater resources, farmer social representation, farmer adaptation, coastal aquifer

According to experts, climate change is likely to exacerbate quality and quantity water related problems and therefore conflicts between water users. Experts on climate change call for setting adaptation measures to anticipate future crisis. This challenge can be adressed through the development of methods to support water users' capacity to anticipate the future changes based on expert foresight. The invitation to anticipation faces the gap between expert modelling and farmers' experience of climate. While experts use temperatures and rain data, farmers use others criteria as local markers to adapt their practices. While experts talk about evolution of the climate, some farmers talk about weather cycles formerly identified by their ancestors.

The communication will present the results of an investigation regarding the way farmers understand and adapt to climate variability and change. Three case studies are considered: the Roussillon Aquifer in France, the Querença-Silves Aquifer in Portugal, and the Chaouia Aquifer in Morocco. In the three cases, groundwater management and uses face the degradation of groundwater resources, and climate variability has both a direct impact (groundwater recharge) and an indirect one (amount of water pumped) on groundwater dynamics.

The inquiries enable a comparative insight of the three cases around two main axes. First, the indicators used by farmers to describe the climate and its variability and possible changes, their social representations of the climate and water resource dynamics and of unusual events such as drought and floods, and their opinion vis-à-vis the impacts of climate variability on their farm and on water resources. The analysis will be complemented by the way their social representations compare to existing data of climate variability and the way expert discourses make sense for farmers. Second, the analysis assesses the way climate influences their practices and actions taken by farmers to adapt to climate variability and changes.

Food, feed or fuel - experiments on sustainable development alternatives at Finnish farms

Järvelä, Marja

*Department of Social Sciences and Philosophy, University of Jyväskylä
Jyväskylä, Finland*

Jokinen, Pekka

Regia/ Finnish Environment Institute, University of Joensuu Joensuu, Finland

Huttunen, Suvi

*Department of Social Sciences and Philosophy, University of Jyväskylä
Jyväskylä, Finland*

Keywords

sustainable development, Renewable Energy, pluriactivity, multifunctionality, local food

The issue of renewable energy has been boosted due to depletion of oil resources and risks related to climate change. There are many alternative means to produce renewable energy. Yet, most of them have considerable impact on land-use and on allocation of natural resources. Particularly in rural areas the emerging ways of producing renewable energy imply changes in use of arable land, forestry and rural landscape. Simultaneously, at the global scale there is a high pressure on food prices as a consequence of increased fuel production on arable land.

Furthermore, the question of sustainable diet has been raised as an issue of ethical consumption. Part of the problem is the increasing consumption of meat which implies extending the agricultural area for cultivating feed. The decisions on future investments are difficult at the local level: should farms specialize in production of food, feed or fuel? Or would some combinations be most preferable in order to contribute to sustainable development?

In small Northern countries such as Finland - leaning traditionally on a family farm tradition - rural sustainability appears to be increasingly polarizing between large scale industrial agriculture and more regional smaller scale specialisations. Much of the traditional rural entrepreneurship seems to have vanished because the improved technological means and skills have led to specialisation and increase of efficiency. Nevertheless, farms in Finland have remained pluriactive as most farms continue with both agriculture and forestry.

This paper discusses current alternatives of specialisation from the perspective of multifunctionality, pluriactivity and rural sustainability. The empirical case study is focused on Central Finland and it examines, in particular, the local/regional context of farm activities. The analysis is founded on qualitative research strategy inspired by critical ethnography. The main empirical data includes parallel sets of interviews with local food producers and producers of renewable energy. The data has been collected within the framework of SUSMARU- project funded by the Academy of Finland in 2007-2009.

Forested commons and «deserted» communities ? Is it environmentally wise to have an increasingly denser and wider forested area, without people to impact on it? The «tasksapes» are no longer dwelled in, but rather «enjoyed» from afar?

de Sousa, Marta A. P.

*Dept. Sociologia - Universidade do Minho, PhD Student - Centro ICS
Braga, Portugal*

Keywords

Community Management, Commons, Fires, forests, Environmental and Economic Change

Commons present researchers with a very special «laboratory», where it is possible to observe and participate in an ongoing drama of how humans inhabit and dwell in their «surroundings», since they provide possibilities of unveiling the networks build around individuals, social groups and «territory». This presentation wishes to focus on what commons may teach about the need of dwelling, and therefore of human impact, in order to maintain a certain degree of confidence and of resilience both on the human and other nature end of the network, i.e. territory. Commons management was, in the past, the individual or household dwelling of neighbours, not on planning and collective agreements. For the community, to be asked to understand and manage, while suffering human and land desertification, is to be parachuted in a different and almost alien reality. Forests never covered the hills. Forests or trees were never expected to stretch so far into the horizon, covering the landscape, and never before had the communities? collective access to the financial surplus that they have now. So conflicts arise, people are drawn into a bureaucratic management, they start learning to cope with institutions well beyond their daily lives, going as far as Brussels. Human and land desertification gave way to a forested landscape, that is both an important carbon sink, an environmental «necessity» as it is a "highly fuelled risk". It is interesting that forests are now an international panacea for the Kyoto Protocol demands?. Nevertheless, the major risk these populations express is not fire, as the urban dwellers may think, but that one already written in their landscapes, since unhurriedly and silently it seems there are only but landscapes and alien carbon markets and nothing more...

From denunciation to institutionalization. How biodiversity becomes a public issue?

Deuffic, Philippe

UR ADER, CEMAGREF

CESTAS Cedex, France

Keywords

norms, public issue, biodiversity

How do public environmental problems emerge? Who carry them on the public space? How some norms - considered as stable and almost intangible until now - are called into question? How to set new environmental standards? Based on frame analysis (Goffmann,1974), we will firstly present the analytical grid proposed by Trom and Zimmermann (2001) who identify five stages that are necessary to the institutionalization of a public problem: the denunciation of a disorder, the production of new category of thought, the mobilization of actors network, the integration of the categories of thought, the adjustment of the categories and, finally, their adjustment. Taking the incorporation of biodiversity stakes in forest management as an example, we will see that this institutionalization does not relate to all the aspects of the biodiversity nor all the actors potentially concerned. In a second time, we will see how the questioning on the new category of thoughts and knowledge as biodiversity, interrogates not only the contents of environmental norms but also, and more generally, our relation to norms. Social norms have a collective cognitive function, they are an instrument of reduction of complexity and a guide for action. But adhesion to the standard is much more reflexive than in the past. Besides one feature of our contemporary societies is the emergence of new devices of production and discussion of norms. Thus, we will see that we passed from a system where norms were fetishized to a rational and negotiated mode of production of norms, particularly into the field of the environment where many uncertainties reign.

From individual to collective change and beyond? Ecological citizenship and politicisation

Kenis, Anneleen

Department of Earth & Environmental Sciences, Catholic University of Leuven Heverlee, Belgium

Mathijs, Erik

Department of Earth & Environmental Sciences, Catholic University of Leuven Heverlee, Belgium

Keywords

environmental movement, community-building, politicisation, citizenship, Consumer behaviour

Changing individual consumer behaviour is fast becoming the 'holy grail' of transition towards a sustainable society both in academic literature and in the practice of the conventional environmental movement. However, recent, more radical environmental movements have questioned the 'post-political' consensus around the centrality of individual behaviour change. They prefer to address individuals as citizens rather than as consumers, and focus on the collective rather than the individual level. Two of the most prominent of these movements in Flanders (Belgium) are the recently launched Transition Towns and the Climate Action movement. They explicitly present themselves as a renewal and a break from the traditional practices of the environmental movement. However, both formulate a very different, even almost contradictory critique on the conventional environmental movement, and put forward very different strategies, discourses and practices about what has to happen instead. We analyzed this in terms of the different place and content they attribute to 'the political.' More precisely, they give a different content to what it means to be an ecologically committed citizen and have different approaches to how and why community and collective practices have to be built. The discourse of the Transition Towns movement stresses the importance of inclusion and locality, the psychology of change and the creation of feelings and practices of social connectedness. Through this, and in contrast to the Climate Action movement, Transition Towns presents itself explicitly as non-political, in the sense of non-conflictual, or not oriented to political power.

In this paper, we engage in a comparative study of the different conceptions of citizenship and community-building of both movements, based upon qualitative research into the self-understanding of their participants. Its focus is on how they understand the kind of social relations they create with their fellows on the one hand, and with people outside the movement (government, unengaged people, corporations etc.) on the other hand.

From structural factors to individual practices: reasoning on the main paths for action on energy efficiency

Fonseca, Susana

*Observa - Ambiente, Sociedade e Opinião Pública, Instituto Superior de Ciências do Trabalho e da Empresa
Lisboa, Portugal*

Nave, Joaquim

*Sociology, ISCTE
Lisbon, Portugal*

Keywords

Energy efficiency, structure, action

The debate on social structure constraints over individual's action vs. the ability of individuals to determine their actions is as old as social sciences. Recent theoretical efforts to bring together these broad approaches, while aiming to develop a more encompassing view of social problems, highlight the potentials of both perspectives for understanding the paths to energy efficiency in a broader context of sustainability.

With this theoretical debate as reference, this paper looks at the view of Portuguese citizens on the role and potentials of structure vs. agency in everyday practices and decision-making aiming at energy efficiency. The main question is whether they assign to themselves any responsibility for energy efficiency or do they just bear on public policies for failures and successes of, or at least for contextualizing, their energy saving performances? Have these different perspectives any influence on current performances and perception of people on energy efficiency issues?

According to several Eurobarometer studies, Portuguese citizens perceive their lack of information as the main handicap in dealing with energy efficiency issues. Moreover, their demand for proactive public policies is much lower than registered in most other European countries. Bearing upon a study survey and in-depth interviews with citizens involved in a broader research project where social perceptions and actual practices for energy saving were brought together, this paper questions what are the main drivers for a more proactive energy efficiency behavior by the citizens and their implications towards a more sustainable use of energy resources in everyday life.

Game Theory with Real Game: engaging with deer and biodiversity in the UK

Yearley, Steve

Genomics Forum, University of Edinburgh Edinburgh, Scotland, UK

Keywords

biodiversity, environmental management, game theory

This paper reports novel research on engagement and collaborative management of wild deer in Scotland and in England & Wales (it is primarily funded by the UK Research Councils' RELU programme). Deer numbers in the UK are rising, and in the UK context deer are unusual as large animals that typically roam over the property of several landowners. They impact on biodiversity conservation, but also have significant economic and job-creating value (primarily for stalking [traditional forms of hunting]) and they have important cultural standing too.

The paper starts by examining the complicated interaction between patterns of land ownership and changes in the way that deer and their biodiversity impacts are valued. These interactions give rise to competition and conflicts in much the way that classic game-theory problems do. The analysis goes on to assess how stakeholder engagement and collaborative practices can allow stakeholders to respond in new ways to the problems in their handling of wild game. For example, collaborative mapping techniques and scenario analyses can allow actors to model their own and neighbours' responses and see what the consequences of innovative policy options may be. The study thus represents an empirically rich and policy-significant example of stakeholder engagement in the politics of biodiversity.

Gardening as a consumer power in Finland and Britain

Timonen, Päivi

*technology, National Consumer Research Center
Helsinki, Finland*

Lammi, Minna

*media, National Consumer Research Center
Helsinki, Finland*

Keywords

Media, consumerism, urban living, gardening

Urban living is a growing political and ecological issue. The global consequences of ecological problems are widely recognized in both political agendas and in people's everyday life. To be able to constrain climate change societies are trying to plan urban structure more compact and effective. However, most of the Finns are dreaming of life in an own house with garden and forest nearby. In British culture gardening has also been linked to lifestyle.

The starting point of our paper is that plenty of people are looking for more influence to there neighborhood. The lack of power in political arena are frustrating citizens. The only power they have is to impress their negative attitudes: 'not to my backyard?'. In this case people tend to use there power as consumers. We analyze Finnish and British media discussion of garden practices. The empirical data we concentrate is Finnish gardening magazine Kotipuutarha and British gardening magazine The Journal of the Royal Horticultural Society / The Garden (since 1975) from 1941 until 2006 every fifth year.

The results show that the meanings of gardening changes from a material object to an experience in both gardening magazines. The ideal of kitchen garden has embraced to ideals of enjoyment and daydreaming. In addition, the changes in ideals means growth in consumer spending on garden merchandise. The changes in practices were linked with the technological and material transformations of gardening. In order to discuss climate change constraining we need to focus on individual desires and their material reality. However, consumer behavior is not easily conducted by politics. Daydreams and ideals has to taken seriously in urban planning. Otherwise citizenship turns over to consumerism in urban living.

Global warming and the case of sea-level rise in New Orleans and The Netherlands: Social reaction- and adaptation-capabilities to be explained by Cultural Theory and Varieties of Capitalism approach

Schubert, Johannes

Sociology, Munich University Starnberg, Germany

Keywords

cultural theory, social reaction- and adaptation-capabilities, Varieties of Capitalism, climate change

The question of how societies as a whole or inhabitants of geographically exposed regions like New Orleans and The Netherlands can adapt to ecological challenges like sea-level rise is centre stage. What are the social determinants that influence and produce specific types and patterns of social reaction- and adaptation-capabilities? In the dominant discourse, this question is answered by a statistical comparison of gross national products (GNP) and per capita economical wealth.

In contrast, what will be argued here is that varying cultural and institutional characteristics like predominant myths of nature or different welfare regimes could have a greater effect on the social reaction- and adaptation-capabilities than the sheer (non-)availability of monetary resources. With the background of our theoretical framework that aims at to combine the general theses of the Cultural Theory with the institutional specifications of the Varieties of Capitalism approach, the assumptions stated above will be pursued by two comparative case studies.

New Orleans will serve as a social space characterised by the properties of liberal market economies, including corresponding ideals of nature and welfare institutions. Here, the flooding caused by hurricane Katrina (2005) will be focused exemplarily. The Netherlands, in contrast, represent a social space characterised by the properties of coordinated market economies. Due to the fact that both regions are exposed to sea-level rise and possess (on a global scale) relative high GNPs but are superimposed by different social spaces, these case studies lend themselves to search for different factors to explain different types of social reaction- and adaptation-capabilities.

Is there a theoretical and empirical link to be discovered between the type of market economy and the perceived properties of nature? How does the amalgamation of predominant myths of nature and corresponding market economies interact with ecological challenges like sea-level rise and affect social reaction- and adaptation-capabilities?

Our working hypothesis implies that the principle of precaution can be seen as typical for coordinated market economies, whereas the principle of ad-hoc reactions is dominant in liberal market economies - and both can be traced to specific ideals of nature, solidarity and regulation.

Globalization of Wild Nature As a Perennially "New" Dreamland: The Ugory Project in Kostroma (Russia)

Pokrovsky, Nikita

*General sociology, State University-Higher School of Economics
Moscow, Russia*

Keywords

rural economy, protection of environment, cellular globalization

One of the manifestations of post-industrialization in Russian society has been the emergence in the countryside of new rural-urban communities ("aggregations"). Currently, a large number of inhabitants of large industrialized cities own second homes and land property in the countryside. On the surface this process has come about in forced steps on the part of those city dwellers who cannot provide themselves and their families with modern venues of organized rest and recreation (tourism, health spas, etc.), although one could argue that these newly formed "derevenshiki" (country dwellers) could find other ways to satisfy this goal. City culture allows its citizens to perceive the tremendous unrealized potential of the countryside in all aspects of life. Rural inhabitants, having experienced an extended period of social and psychological depression, recognize that they are not in a position to stave off the increasing degradation of the surrounding countryside. It is suggested that new urban-rural aggregations would come to support each other in the formation of new communities. The economic basis of these communities will include niche agriculture (such as tourism or organic agriculture), regulated hunting and fishing resorts, and local handicrafts. Beyond the purely Russian problems of "salvaging the rural economy" appears a new global perspective: removing the antagonism between city and countryside, post-industrial education of both rural and urban social communities (and, in fact, rendering the social distinctions of "rural" and "urban" as almost insignificant in the face of a new social structure), the return of urban inhabitants to nature and rural inhabitants to modernization (without the habitual destruction or unsustainable radical alterations) of the rural way of life. In this sense one may speak of a particular tendency as a tectonic macro-process of modern civilization. For example, in Russia, the Kostroma/Ugory Woods, a huge virgin nature area 500 miles northeast of Moscow in the basin of the Unzha River, is rapidly losing its originality and natural purity under the pressure of globalization. The cellular globalization process not only changes the material decor of life but it radically converts the set of basic values.

GMOs in Lithuanian Public Opinion and Mass Media Discourse

Rinkevicius, Leonardas

*Department of Sociology, Kaunas University of Technology
Kaunas, Lithuania*

Rimaite, Ausra

*Sociology, Kaunas University of Technology
Kaunas, Lithuania*

Butkeviciene, Egle

*Sociology, Kaunas University of Technology
Kaunas, Lithuania*

Keywords

Mass Media, public opinion, public discourse, GMOs, Lithuanian society

In Lithuania, as in most countries in the world, public debates concerning Genetically Modified Organisms (GMOs) continue to be controversial and constantly revolving. On the other hand, one could hardly identify GMOs among the key story lines in the public discourse of Lithuanian society at large, except of some particular farmer communities or locales within the green movement, government and academic community. This paper is aimed at exploring societal attitudes towards GMOs and the role of mass media. This paper is based on results of empirical research conducted by the authors of this paper in the framework of research project RINOVA (Public risk perceptions, social communication and innovative governance) funded by the Lithuanian National Science foundation. The research methodology is based on a representative public opinion survey, and content analysis of GMOs' coverage in mass media, particularly in the three leading daily newspapers. The research was carried out in 2008. The research findings indicate that public discourse concerning GMOs is far from being a one-dimensional pros and cons issue, it triggers different debates and arguments - from the scientific and economic to the very particular aspects, e.g. the impact of GMOs for ecological bee-keepers' farming sustenance base. Exploration of RINOVA results (survey of public opinion and factor-analysis based study) has identified several types of attitudes among Lithuanian population towards GMOs. One could identify those who are seriously concerned about the negative health and environmental impact of GMOs, those who are optimistic about the positive impact of GMOs on personal well-being, and those who are optimistic about the positive general impact of GMOs' development on the world economy and social development. The research conducted by deploying different research methods has identified different emphases, namely the public opinion survey points at the primary concern about negative environmental consequences, e.g. reduction of biodiversity, whereas content analysis of mass media points to the emphasis on human health risk issues regarding GMOs. However, the public opinion poll (nearly 70% of respondents) reveals that GMOs are very poorly reflected by the Lithuanian mass media. The paper looks into possible ways of explaining and interpreting these findings.

Governing Ignorance: Decision Making in the Restoration of Industrially Contaminated Landscapes

Gross, Matthias

*Department of Urban and Environmental Sociology, Helmholtz Centre for Environmental Research - UFZ
Leipzig, Germany*

Bleicher, Alena

*Department of Urban and Environmental Sociology, Helmholtz Centre for Environmental Research - UFZ
Leipzig, Germany*

Keywords

ignorance, Governance, contaminated areas

Dealing with uncertainties has become a normalcy in modern societies. This appears to be especially true for environmental issues where growing knowledge on environmental processes opens up ever new knowledge about what is non known. Decision making based on well grounded scientific knowledge in reality can hardly be achieved. Rather, the question rises on how actors deal with the unknown in decision making. Taking a governance perspective, we will show how ignorance can be taken into account for decision-making. Using the example of the restoration and remediation of industrially contaminated sites appears to be especially fruitful since although remediation projects are based on high-tech investigations and modern science to gain detailed knowledge on contaminations, involved actors usually have to deal with unforeseen findings. Due to the long history of many contaminated sites caused by industrial or military activities, knowledge on the location of former dumps has often been lost and natural degradation processes transformed new substances out of a mixture of the early contaminants. From the 1980s onwards, many actors claimed involved in cleaning up and remediation processes learned that the acknowledgement of the unknown in decision making can be a most successful strategy. In this presentation we will illustrate some of these strategies, structures, and governance processes that allow decision makers to successfully move on in face of ignorance. As we will contend, knowingly handling ignorance is not careless acting, but needs to be based on a very well thought through and planned organization of environmental research, implementation as well as specific structures of governance and interaction.

Greenwashing - delusive environmental publicity in times of climate change. A comparative analysis of a frequent but often neglected phenomenon in Germany, Russia and Spain

Palz, Werner

Political Science and Social Studies, University Carlos III Madrid Getafe, Spain

Lopez Pardo, Ivan

DEPT. OF POLITICS AND SOCIAL STUDIES, UNIVERSITY CARLOS III GETAFE (MADRID), Spain

Keywords

climate change, CSR, eco-lies, post-modernism, publicity

Greenwashing (or greenwash), a term that was created by the environmentalist movement in the US around 1990, describes the delusive marketing strategies of some companies that aim to improve the image of their environmental friendliness and sustainability. In recent years, greenwashing has become a frequently used term and an analytical tool for social and communication sciences, especially in the US, the UK and Germany. However, not only in these countries, the phenomenon has a great relevance. Issues like climate change and environmental protection in the media all over the world, particularly after incidents like the hurricane Kathrina in 2005, after the success of Al Gore's "An Inconvenient Truth" and the release of the 4th IPCC report in 2007, attract the media and public interest all over the world.

In many countries, including Spain and Russia, despite the presence of greenwashing campaigns in the publicity, there has been only little academic research about the phenomenon. Sociological research on greenwashing, however, promises interesting information on the relation between the consumer's value change and the corporate reaction.

The aim of this study is to offer an introduction to greenwashing from a sociological perspective, based on the information provided by recent investigations. Firstly it includes a brief history of the phenomenon, as well as an analysis of the motivation of the agents who make use of greenwashing, the different tools applied in delusive environmental media campaigns, and the reaction of the society (environmentalist groups, authorities and consumers).

Secondly, the study includes a quantitative and qualitative comparative analysis of the situation of greenwashing in three European countries: Germany, Russia and Spain. Each of these countries is characterized by a very different degree of environmental consciousness and consumer mobilization, as a consequence, the use of and the reaction on greenwashing campaigns differ considerably.

Finally, the study explains the relevance of sociological analyses of greenwashing and proposes further investigation lines on the phenomenon, oriented on the future evolution of the relation between public consciousness on climate change and the companies' reactions.

Handling Challenges of Scale in Eco-Tourism

Klintman, Mikael

Research Policy Institute, Lund University Lund, Sweden

Keywords

ecotourism, scale, space, standardisation

This paper examines scale-related challenges involved in processes intended to establish and improve international standards of ecologically sound products and processes. This paper poses the following question: What scale-related challenges are imbedded in the social dimension of transnational eco-standard setting? How are the problems, and the solutions, framed by the actors involved in the standard setting? Empirically, the paper is based on extended case-study work of eco-tourism, in particular minutes from meetings and interviews with actors involved in the development of the Sustainable Tourism Stewardship Council (STSC), through which a broad range of eco-tourism stakeholders try to integrate a large number of eco-tourism labels into one system of accreditation. The space-related challenges emphasised among eco-tourism stakeholders are both procedural/organisational and substantive, although this distinction is far from clear cut. Among the procedural/organisational challenges, differences in scale of organisations & control of the scheme are frequently mentioned, where the interests of large organisations as well as foreign organisations are said to be prioritised unfairly. Still, many actors, for instance in The International Ecotourism Society, perceive this organisational issue as less critical than the scale-related challenge of entrepreneurship & employment. The paper draws conclusions as to how the relationship between local uniqueness vs. regulatory uniformity may be handled, both through locally adapted standards, locally unadapted standards.

Has ecocentrism already won in Europe?

Bozonnet, Jean-Paul

PACTE-CNRS, Political Studies Institute of Grenoble Grenoble, France

Keywords

environmental values, ecocentrism, europe, anthropocentrism, European Values Survey

For forty years, environmental values have increasingly gained ground everywhere in the world, starting with the post-industrial countries. In 1978, R.E. Dunlap and K.E. Van Liere proposed a "new environmental paradigm" (NEP), as a measuring instrument to evaluate the importance of the shift from anthropocentrism to ecocentrism in the USA. In this country, many surveys were systematically carried out, but until 2008, nothing like this has been done in European countries. It was not until last year that the fourth European Values Survey (EVS), included for the first time the NEP in its questionnaire. In this paper, we propose to present the initial results of this EVS survey carried out in 45 European countries, at least for those that will be available. Here are some basic questions we propose to answer: what is the magnitude of ecocentrism in each European country? Is it comparable to the USA? How this environmental shift is linked to political culture? Is religion a determining factor? What is the role of economics in this change? Is the ecocentrism's expansion depending on environmental public policies conducted in each country?

How much does it cost?

Bobylev, Sergey

*Economic Department, Moscow State University
Moscow, Russia*

Bobylev, Alla

*School of Public Administration, Moscow State University
Moscow, Russia*

Keywords

sustainability, functions of natural capital, willingness to pay

For a valuation of natural landscape sustainability in agrarian regions and in conditions of a varying social and economic situation it is important to estimate three kinds of development factors (or, speaking economic language, - kinds of the capital): human, physical, natural. If first two kinds of the capital and their contribution to the general sustainability are well enough studied in the theory and in practice the system analysis of the natural capital is insufficient. In many respects it is connected with underestimation by the economic theory of the natural capital both in the world, and in the country. One function of the natural capital - resource support (the ground, water, a wood, etc.) is usually considered only. Such approach essentially underestimates an value of region natural potential. As show last researches in this area in the world, alongside with the first function, it is important to estimate at least three more functions: 2) ecosystem (ecological) services on maintenance of ecological sustainability, 3) "spiritual" services of the nature (aesthetic, cultural, historical, ethical, etc. aspects), 4) maintenance of population health.

It is obvious, that the potential of Russian northern agrarian regions on maintenance of all four functions is huge. For an economic estimation of these functions it is possible to use various economic methods. In particular, the approach "willingness to pay", closely connected with sociological researches is perspective. Here use of the techniques connected from a various sort of cost approaches, methods of "travel cost", "hedonic pricing", etc. By expert estimations a number of areas of the Kostroma area of Russia seasonal "pendulum" migration makes 30-50% from a population of district. These visitors annually spend significant money (purchase, construction and maintenance of houses, purchase of the foodstuffs and the goods, transport charges and so forth) for satisfaction of the needs for recreational and "spiritual" services of the nature, maintenance of health and so forth. That is conservation of the nature and its "not agricultural" functions have real and very high economic estimation.

Implementing the Socio-Economic Considerations Clause for Regulating Genetically Modified Organisms (GMOS) in Malaysia: Challenges and Options

Abdul Majid, Marina

DIVISION OF LAW, MACQUARIE UNIVERSITY NORTH RYDE, SYDNEY, AUSTRALIA

Keywords

sustainable development, Social Development, Socio-economic considerations of Genetically Modified Organisms(SECGMOS), Malaysia, Biosafety Act 2007

Malaysia's Biosafety Act 2007 proposes to address socio-economic considerations of Genetically Modified Organisms(SECGMOS) under Section 35 which mirrors Article 26(1) of the Cartagena Protocol on Biosafety(CPB). There exists a disagreement among parties to the CPB concerning the scope of SECGMOS under Article 26. Past negotiations of the CPB indicates that developing countries such as Malaysia and the African block had proposed for SECGMOS for fear that the introduction of GMOs would pose as a threat socially, economically and culturally to developing countries. SECGMOS complements social development, an aspect of sustainable development. Without a parameter for the scope of SECGMOS within the CPB, Malaysia will use its own discursion to implement Section 35 of its Biosafety Act 2007. This paper seeks to identify the means in enabling Malaysia to implement Section 35 of the Biosafety Act 2007. The methodology adopted in this study combines relevant references such as legislations, international documents, interviews among Malaysian agencies and secondary resources. The findings indicate that Malaysia has yet to fully define the scope for SECGMOS. Aspects of SECGMOS which have been addressed include the farmers right to save an exchange seeds as a sui generis system under Malaysia's Plant Protection Variety Act 2004 against a system of patents under the Patents Act 1983. An area of SECGMOS which has yet to be addressed by Malaysia include the threat of GMOs in the conservation of plant genetic resources among indigenous women. Another aspect which has yet to be addressed concerns the occupational safety and health of farmers who may be exposed to pesticide and herbicide with the possibility of introducing GMO pest and herbicide resistant crops in the future. Overall, there are aspects of SECGMOS which have been addressed while there exists a lacuna in some areas. It is proposed that Malaysia should explicitly determine the scope for SECGMOS under any subsequent regulations or guidelines to serve as guidance with the enforcement of the Biosafety Act 2007. Norway's Gene Technology Act 1993 would serve as guidance for SECGMOS which Malaysia could adapt to localized conditions as part of Section 35 in its Biosafety Act 2007.

Intercultural Perspectives. The missing link in the discussion about Sustainable Nature Management

Katz, Christine

Technique and Environment, Leuphana-University Lüneburg, Germany

Keywords

intercultural nature management, intercultural sustainable development research, migrant's perspectives in environmental organisations

In most European countries immigration takes place since decades. Irrespectively of the reasons, whether due to colonial heritage or because of miserable economical current and future perspectives, the composition of the national population has changed into an intercultural mixture. For instance in Germany about 20% of the population has a migration background. Evidently the idea of the existence of homogeneity inside cultural boundaries is a construction. As nature culture is a permanently changing historical result of variably intensive processes of adaption and demarcation.

What is known in Europe about the attitudes of migrants towards nature and its management? Which interests and demands regarding environmental and sustainability issues they show? Which kind of experiences and strategies exist in European countries to integrate migrants' know-how and views, i.e. how do they participate in nature management processes?

In Germany up to now neither the big environmental organisations, the environmental policy institutions, the scientific and public discourse on sustainable development nor research on sustainable development issues have integrated intercultural aspects. Due to this the percentage of immigrants engaged in environmentally relevant business as volunteers or as employees is very low. There are little activities such as environmental education projects at a local level according to committed individuals in environmental and migrant organisations respectively, intercultural garden initiatives or activities from religious groups to combine ecological necessities with Islamic rules especially in the UK. Beyond this the (research) efforts on linking the perspectives of migrants with environmental issues seem to be low Europe-wide.

The contribution introduces results of first studies on the relation of migrants towards nature (management) in Germany. How migrants in professional education percept and esteem nature, natural resources and landscapes is highlighted in addition to their every day acting in regard to nature or environment. Qualitative data on the conditions to and obstacles for an adequate consideration of intercultural aspects, e.g. the existing mental images and ideas about migrants' interests in nature (management) and sustainability issues by environmental actors are presented.

Is Environmental Justice the Main Force for Local Sustainability?

Arriaga, Alicia

Ciencia Política y Sociología, Universidad Carlos III de Madrid Getafe, Spain

Keywords

Sustainability., Justice, environment

One of the tragedies of recent times is the uneven burden of negative environmental impacts endured by the less advantaged communities in our society. The different dimensions of this tragedy have been widely acknowledged by a broad range of research on what has become to be known as 'environmental justice'. Therefore, for some authors, such as Agyeman, Bullard and Evans (2003) the issue of environmental quality has more and more turn out to be unable to be separated to that of human equality. They argue that "[W]herever in the world environmental despoliation and degradation is happening, it is almost always linked to questions of social justice, equity, rights and people's quality of life in its widest sense" (Agyeman, Bullard, and Evans, 2003: 1). These authors (2002: 78) suggest that the concept of environmental justice should become an integral feature of sustainability efforts because "[A] truly sustainable society is one where wider questions of social needs and welfare, and economic opportunity are integrally related to environmental limits imposed by supporting ecosystems".

A growing number of cities worldwide are addressing the future of urban areas in terms of the concept of sustainable development by adopting Local Agenda 21 principles. Many foremost environmental authors assert that attempts in the local level are essential for achieving sustainability (Warner, 2002). Cities represent a vital proving ground for both environmental justice and sustainability since a large percentage of the world's population live in urban areas and cities devour great quantities of resources (Agyeman and Evans, 2003). However, most existing programs for achieving urban sustainability, although they are well-intentioned, fail to address social justice and equity concerns as essential within these programs (Yanarella, 1999). This paper aims to analyze whether environmental justice is the main force for local sustainability by exhaustively discussing the relationship between environmental justice and sustainability. It also discusses how environmental justice could contribute to the adaptability of cities to the problem of climate change. In practice, the study examines the ways that environmental justice is and is not being incorporated into urban sustainability efforts in the Spanish urban context.

Litter in your park: a community based model of sustaining the quality of green areas in cities

Matczak, Piotr

Institute of Sociology, Adam Mickiewicz University Poland,

Keywords

collective action, local governance, urban environment

The quality of green areas in cities is widely acknowledged problem. Parks, green spaces etc. provide environmental services and contribute to inhabitants' quality of life. Sustaining high quality of the green areas is difficult, despite high costs involved. The role of inhabitants (local communities) taking care of the local public goods in their neighbourhoods is often emphasized, and in many countries policies are implemented in order to strengthen inhabitants abilities in this respect. The question: how far the access to high quality green areas can rely on a local community's effort, is important for local environmental governance?

The paper departs from the literature on the littering problem, and on collective action. It further explores a local community capabilities to sustain the quality of a green area in its neighbourhood. A special focus is on the dynamic aspect: what is the mechanism of the green areas deterioration, and how it is possible to move from a low quality green area to a high quality one.

For this purpose a model is proposed of an isolated community with one public good (a green area). Assuming the characteristic of the good, distribution of preferences with the community, level of cooperation, and level of monitoring of the norm about non-littering, the mechanism of the good deterioration and the possibility of the improvement of the good quality are presented.

In the conclusions the possible applications of the model are discussed, for the low and the high trust societies, as well as policy implications of the findings.

Local Sustainability and Public Participation: The Role of Municipalities in population's engagement process

Guerra, João

Institute of Social Sciences, University of Lisbon

Lisbon, Portugal

Keywords

Public Participation, Local sustainability, Portuguese municipalities

Getting greater public awareness and social significance in the late 1980's, governance, public participation and sustainable development are sharing basic purposes and characteristics and, consequently, overlapping its main potentials. That's why the 10th principle of the Declaration of Rio (1992) stresses "social participation" as a primary condition for sustainable development and underlined cooperation, mutual acceptance and trust as fundamental factors to implement it.

However, signs of participatory citizenship in the Portuguese society - as well as participation in representative democracy - can not be dissociated from the new socioeconomic conditions emerged from the 1974's revolution (institutionalization of democratic rule of law, accession to European Community/European Union, integration in an increasingly globalized international market and political arena...). Moreover, even for some authors the growing interest in more sustainable forms of development runs from and is reinforced by the country's democratic consolidation, some others often described it as a main result of the growing momentum of international governance.

Based on some preliminary results of a survey applied to Portuguese municipalities and focusing in special the central role of Portuguese local administrations and their openness or reticence to citizenry and civic engagement in local sustainability decision-making, this paper will discuss and analyse present conditions for participation in local sustainability initiatives: more central and institutionally defined and prescribed (such as the Municipal Master Plans revising processes - PDM -, or more flexible in the methods and forms (as are the initiatives of Local Agenda 21 - LA21).

Making environmental risks governable. A comparative study on transboundary risk regulation

Lidskog, Rolf

Centre for Urban and Regional Studies, Sociology Örebro, Sweden

Soneryd, Linda

*SCORE, SCORE
Stockholm, Sweden*

Uggla, Ylva

Centre for Urban and Regional Research, sociology Örebro, Sweden

Keywords

Governance, Expertise, environmental regulation, transboundary risk

This paper explores how environmental regulation is constructed in different areas. The point of departure is that regulation and rule-making consist of processes in which borders of society, science and environment intersect and are renegotiated. Three questions are in focus in our empirical investigation: what framings are put forward by actors involved in the regulatory process and how actors work to spread their framing; how actors are mobilized and how agency is shaped in the process; and what kinds of knowledge are seen as legitimate, valid and policy relevant in the regulatory process.

Drawing on regulation theory, discourse theory and science and technological studies, the regulation of four kinds of complex and transboundary environmental issues is analysed: protection against oil pollution in the Baltic Sea, mobile phones and radiation protection, climate change adaptation, and genetically modified crops. In these four areas, different actors articulations, strategies and practices and how they act trying to render an issue governable are investigated. The area studies are mainly conducted within a Swedish context, but it is done without leaving other relevant organisations and actors for rule-making aside (the European Union, United Nation and other relevant instances).

The analysis shows that through the use of different frames, actors make sense of rather complex phenomena, and that the frames shape what remedies they propose, which actors they consider as legitimate to influence the regulation and what kinds of expert knowledge they see as valid and relevant. Furthermore, the analysis shows that the nation-state still have an important role, but in order to try to render transboundary issues governable it has to re-organise itself in the changed and growing regulatory landscape of organisational actors and risk discourses.

Managing the Chemical Risks with Consumer Goods: The Dual Role and Dilemmas of Member Organisations

Stenberg, Emelie

Research Policy Institute, Research Policy Institute Lund, Sweden

Keywords

member organisation, information, representation, Chemical risk

To manage risks in western society is increasingly seen as a process of including the public in different deliberative and/or participatory projects. This is sometimes done via representative organisations that also have a second role as gatekeepers of information flows.

This paper aims to analyse the dual role of member organisations in the management of chemical risks with consumer goods. If these organisations represent user groups, how well is this done? How well is the gatekeeper role fulfilled, and are the aims of the members transmitted? The discussion is anchored in theories on representation, deliberation and social movements addressing the first question while work on risk communication address the second. Empirically, semi-structured interviews have been conducted with representative organisations in Sweden.

Certain risks are of a character that makes widespread public participation difficult. One example is the chemical contents of consumer goods where the amount of chemicals in use, the global nature of the risks, and the lack of efficient risk assessment makes it difficult to mobilise 'ordinary citizens' to participate in managing chemical risks. Instead, public participation is mainly ensured by representation via organisations, such as environmental organisations, interest organisations or labour unions.

The 'ordinary citizens', nevertheless, are the receivers of risk information concerning the chemical contents of their consumer goods from industry, authorities, NGOs and the media. However, focusing on industry (as they have the responsibility of chemical safety, surrounded by legislation), the public is rarely communicating back directly to the industry. Instead this communication is done through representative organisations. Consequently, the representative organisation act as a gatekeeper of risk related communication to and from their members.

Hence the representative organisation's role becomes very significant in the risk management process of the chemical content in consumer goods. It could be argued that members have little direct influence on the representative organisations' agenda and that the taken-for-grantedness of the representative nature of member organisations might be overestimated. Since this representation is instrumental for ensuring a deliberative political process and purposeful risk management regarding health, environment and safety it is a question of great concern.

Moral regulation of water pollution in Finland since the 1960s till 2000

Ylönen, Marja

*Dept. of Social Sciences and Philosophy, University of Jyväskylä
Jyväskylä, Finland*

Keywords

Governance, water pollution, Moral regulation, legitimation.

Governance of water is approached from the viewpoint of moral regulation of water pollution in Finland during the period of 1960 ? 2000. That time the governance of water pollution took shape, institutionalized and faced major challenges, due to urbanization and growth in industrial production followed by increase in water pollution. Despite some improvements in the field of moral regulation due to technological development, breakthrough in environmentalism and various administrative and legislative reforms, there remained some regularities concerning governance that were less favorable to regulation of pollution. This study illuminates the cultural and material characteristics of Finnish governance of water pollution, the central legitimations on which it has been based as well as paradoxes and weaknesses to which it has been exposed.

Moral regulation refers to the study of moral legitimations of some modes of regulation. Therefore attention is focused on Finnish environmental authorities? legitimations of certain modes of regulation of water pollution as well as historical changes in legitimations of regulation of water pollution during the last forty years. The data consists of interviews with the environmental authorities, articles of Water Economy journal from the four decades as well as committee reports concerning water issues.

Analysis draws on discourse analysis and substantialist and subjectivist research strategies. The subjectivist strategy highlights meanings, conceptions and legitimations related to water pollution, regulation and regulated parties, whereas the substantialist research strategy contributes to the understanding of moral regulation of water pollution by explaining some regularities and characteristics of regulation by material and historical factors.

The results of this analysis are two dominant legitimations or principles that crystallize the environmental authorities? regulation of water pollution and four ethoses which crystallize broader cultural legitimations of regulation of water pollution during the last forty years. The legitimations are explained by underlying material structures.

Mosquito control in France: a socio-technical controversy between environmental preoccupations and health protection

Claeys, Cécilia

*Dpt of Human Sciences/UMR Espace-DESMID, University of the Mediterranean
Marseille, France*

Keywords

decision making, uncertainty, environment versus health protection, mosquito control

Rich in wetland, metropolitan France was also rich in mosquitoes, and the diseases they carry. Thus, Malaria was significantly present until the beginning of the XX<sup>o</sup> century. It completely disappeared only after the Second World War. However, the public policies of mosquito control started exactly when the insect ceased to be a health problem. These public policies were raised firstly in the South of France. They were explicitly thought as a condition sine quanone to the development of mass tourism, the new economic orientation of the region. One area was an exception to this mosquito control, the Camargue, as a world famous natural park. During the 1990's the exceptional status of the Camargue raised significant controversy. More and more inhabitants and professionals of tourism demand the end of this local exception, seen as unfair in terms of quality of live and economic development. But the nature protection actors resisted: Camargue is a fragile and therefore untouchable wetland sanctuary. The force of the environmental argument was however affected by the re-emergence of health crises, here and elsewhere. The West Nile crisis, during the late 1990, killed animals and touched people in the Camargue, and, because of a mutation of the virus, even killed people in the USA. More recently, the Chikungunia crisis killed 257 persons in the French oceanic island "La Réunion" and affected 300 000 others, before arriving in Italia. If the chikungunia is not yet in metropolitan France, the mosquito which carries it (Aedes albopictus) is in the South-West, leading to the activation of a health alert procedure, involving all the doctors of the area, the health ministry and the professionals of mosquito control. Since then, the whole French Mediterranean region is concerned by a new dilemma: How to choose between health protection and environmental preoccupations? This paper will present the results of the sociological analyses of this new dilemma: its origin, its scientific and political dimensions, its appropriation by local inhabitants and its recent developments. This analysis is based on 12 years of sociological field surveys, involving qualitative and quantitative databases.

Natural resources, valorisation, and co-production in the dynamics of rural-urban relations

Tovey, Hilary

*Sociology, Trinity College Dublin
Dublin, Ireland*

Keywords

Natural resources, rural-urban relations, environmental theory

This paper examines changing rural-urban connections through a focus on natural resources. It asks whether 'natural resources' can be theorised to provide a broad comparative framework to analyse the transformation of rural areas in late and increasing ecologically constrained capitalism.

The focus of the paper is on developing a theorisation of natural resources through a discussion of the work of various different schools (e.g. historical materialism, world-systems theory, social ecology and ecological economics) who offer contrasting ways of thinking about this concept. It will also relate these approaches to recent work in rural sociology, which addresses 'natural resources' as products or materials from nature which have been given value, or 'valorised', by specific social actors for specific uses or purposes. Much of this work explores the economic, social and sustainable impacts of 'revalorisation' of rural resources on rural society and nature: identification of previously neglected or marginalised local natural resources is seen as central to the processes of 'broadening' and 'deepening' rural development, or to the construction of 'alternative worlds of food'. Over-focus on agriculture and on raw materials for food, to the exclusion of other rural natural resources, limits the possibilities for developing a broader perspective on the dynamics of contemporary change in rural-urban relations, while the preoccupation with 'alternative' forms of production gives rise to a rather one-sided account of valorisation as primarily the initiative of rural populations themselves. However, the underlying suggestion in this work that natural resources are best understood, not as 'things', but as constellations or assemblages of social relations, could be developed further as a central element for a more general theory.

Nature re-enacted: exploring the dynamics of public participation in environmental monitoring

Rodrigues, Maria Eugenia

*Dept of Sociology/CICS, Universidade do Minho
Braga, Portugal*

Keywords

environment, monitoring, lay participation, culture of monitoring, nature enacted

Monitoring has been largely excluded from the scope of sociological analysis. However, even a quick non-systematic look at today's most prominent environmental problems (such as climate change, global warming or deforestation) and the continuous cycle of data gathering - analysis - policy implications they generate, should suffice to earn monitoring a place within sociological thinking in general, and environmental sociology and science studies in particular.

Furthermore, another side of environmental monitoring appears to have become the focus for new experimental developments in recent years. In line with major societal trends, among which accountability, the politics of risk and the spread of new technologies seem to predominate, various publics have become able to participate more actively in the monitoring processes. There is, of course, a long - but rather neglected - tradition of lay and mundane environmental monitoring. Still, these recent trends and the variety of technological resources available are not only enlarging the range of lay monitoring practices but also, at the same time, changing the nature of monitoring. Environmental monitoring is acquiring new, more complex and certainly more challenging dimensions.

Using empirical data from one case-study located in the north-east of England, this paper addresses some recent developments in the field of environmental monitoring. It claims that once the formal concept of environmental monitoring is unpacked into its regulatory, technical and scientific dimensions, one can then open it up to receive the multiple contributions afforded by publics. Furthermore, the detailed analysis of the lay monitoring practices uncovered in the case study demonstrate the emergence of a "culture of monitoring". The paper concludes that this public culture of monitoring is not simply the taking on of routine monitoring roles by individual citizens. Rather it gives rise to a communal interpretation of nature which, in turn, guides how monitoring and intervention in the environment are "performed".

Networking for renewables: local resources and innovative technologies in rural development (A first case study from Finland)

Németh, Sarolta

Department of Geography, Faculty of Social Sciences and Regional Studies, University of Joensuu, Finland Joensuu, Finland

Keywords

ICTs, Renewable Energy, Finland, socio-technological networks, sustainable development of rural-peripheral regions

Many rural-peripheral regions have been caught in a vicious circle of marginalization. The diminishing prospects for financially feasible agri-/silvicultural activities and the lack of alternative jobs cause the emigration of especially the higher qualified active population and this regional brain-drain causes tax revenues to decline. This leads to diminishing infrastructural investments, which in turn, further depletes the region's attractiveness. However, some rural areas may be able to reverse this cycle by innovative restructuring and adaptation to emerging conditions: the renewable energy sector is able to open good prospects in this situation. The main question of my research is: what could be a suitable social (societal-institutional, technological, development-political) framework which can ensure that these potential prospects are actually realised?

The central-eastern part of Finland has encountered these problems. Global changes (internationalisation of the forest industry, rising energy prices, the climate change, and technological innovations) are having a profound effect on this agro-forest economy and society; also, they are stimulating innovation in different ways. This process is embedded in the context that here, forests are not only a main source of income and principal context of economic activities but also an important and lasting part of regional and cultural identity, social relations and traditions. The social, cultural, economic and environmental conditions and consequences of the recent, globally experienced transformations are interrelated. As a result, many challenges have arisen but also, several opportunities are offered to the actors engaged in regional/local development.

The paper gives a summary of these interrelated processes, a brief review of the significance and recent developments of the wood energy sector in the Finnish region, and a first account on the empirical research carried out in the autumn of 2008. Meanwhile, the focus is on different forms of networking, ranging from business and technological networks to cross-sectoral co-operation and more informal social networks ? relating them, as a key finding, to the possible emergence of ?networked peripheries?. Another pronounced objective of this paper is to propose different applicable analytical tools and methods which are suitable to triangulate research findings, and which may be employed in further comparative regional case studies.

Participation - the missing component of the Romanian environmental NGOs

Nistor, Laura

*Sociology, Babes-Bolyai University
Cluj-Napoca, Romania*

Keywords

sociological profile, Romania, participation, environmental NGOs

The study analyzes some current trends related to the phenomenon of participation in environmental NGOs in Romania. Based both on the data of the European Values Survey (1999, 2005) and the Special Eurobarometer on Social Capital, Romania appears as a laggard country in terms of membership in NGOs. Related to this observation, firstly a statistical snapshot is provided which underlines the main differences between Romania and other European countries. Then some possible macro-structural causes of the weak Romanian environmental participatory culture are discussed and the sociological profile of the Romanian participants is analyzed. Conclusions signal that Romanian participants are not only a few, in the meantime they constitute an invisible category, i.e. their sociological and axiological profiles do not differ significantly from the non-participatory citizens'. Finally, possible future sources of participation will be discussed, based on former regression data undertaken on the level of the European Values Survey 1999.

Participation in environmental decision making processes between instrumental and substantial rationality

Drago, Kos

*Faculty of Social Sciences, University of Ljubljana
Ljubljana, Slovenia*

Keywords

participation, communication, decision making process, radwaste

Open information flow and participation of citizens in environmental decision making are widely spread and common practice since Aarhus convention was adopted in many national and international (EU) legislation systems. It looks like that formal system arrangements are supporting the argumentative substantial rationality which leads to optimisation of environmental democracy. However, it is not difficult to notice, that such ideal conditions are quite often virtual wishful thinking. Instrumental PR communicative techniques are in fact supporting reduced strategic goal oriented rationality. Actors, most commonly called stakeholders, who adopt use such communicative techniques are presenting it as democratic, open, and transparent, conflicts are avoided, emerging questions are processed in partnership mood, different institutional arrangements are invented in order to alleviate tensions as a consequence of heterogeneous opinions, attitudes, prejudices, etc. In fact analysis of instrumental communication in risky technology siting process exposes numerous communication techniques which in fact somehow inhibit substantial argumentative rationality. In such sophisticated communication processes the fundamental goals are not questioned at all, substantial debate is avoided, instead, and negligible questions are gaining priorities. This is not only the strategy of main protagonists but even less influential actors are avoiding substantial discussion. They as well are adopting reduced instrumental goal oriented pragmatic rationality. As a consequence participation in decision making is producing conflicts and obstruction of interactive communication. Paper is based on case studies and comparative analysis of citizens participation and decision making process in siting radwaste material in different EU countries.

Possibilities for collaborative learning through the establishment of an informal science-policy community - Science-policy collaboration in the case of social assessment exercise in Hungary

Szi-Ferenc, Zsófia

Environmental Sciences and Policy, Central European University Budapest, Hungary

Keywords

participation, science-policy interface, social learning, social assessment, conflict management

Water management and nature protection measures may often not reach their original goals due to the attitude and behaviour of local resource users. Social assessment (SA) techniques can play a key role in exploring the background of unexpected land use conflicts by eliciting the knowledge and preferences of local resource users. Participatory research theory suggests that the involvement of policy-makers in such participatory processes can facilitate mutual learning, resulting in policy that considers local knowledge and preferences and a greater acceptance of the policy by resource users.

The paper examines the collaboration process between science and policy as represented by the involvement of policy makers in a SA exercise focusing on the elicitation of knowledge and the articulation of values local people attach to ecosystem services. The research drawing upon this exercise evaluates the extent to which policy involvement in the case of the SA process can be an essential tool for science-policy integration through the establishment of an informal science-policy community. It studies whether and under what conditions collaborative learning can appear. It also examines the way in which such science-policy collaboration (SPC) could contribute to the design and implementation land use change measures. Also, it explores the impact that the assessment exercise has on exploring and managing conflicts emerging between nature conservationists and local resource users.

The SPC research can be conceptualised as mutual learning between local, scientific and policy perspectives through SCP, where bi-directional knowledge flow, knowledge interface and sharing can be present. The SPC research follows the methodological approach of action research with the goal of reaching social change in a narrow segment of the Hungarian scientific and policy community. It uses participatory techniques to involve national, regional and local policy-makers. Both individual and group assessment techniques are applied to study the attitude of policy-makers following and commenting on SA.

The paper discusses the advantages and the disadvantages of policy involvement, the expectations and the difficulties faced, and give some reflections on the process. It presents the opportunities for SCP and their contribution to science-policy integration, social learning and conflict resolution by consensus building in detail.

Practice meets community: the role of community-based organisations in stimulating sustainable practices among participants

Middlemiss, Lucie

School of Earth and Environment, Sustainability Research Institute Leeds, United Kingdom

Keywords

sustainability, sustainable consumption, community, Practice theory, community-based organisation

In this paper I summarise the results of an extensive study into the role of community-based organisations in stimulating sustainable practices among participants. There is a burgeoning interest in community responses to sustainability problems in the UK, with grassroots movements such as 'transition towns' inspiring community-based organisations to attempt to influence participants' sustainability practices. Such interventions are at home in practice theory, as they implicitly recognise the connections between practices, people, institutions and places. Using an evaluation method sympathetic to practice theory, my research consisted of 70 qualitative interviews with participants in five varied community-based sustainability projects in the north of England.

I report here on three main findings of the study. First, results show that these projects are bounded by the context in which they take place, with the organisational, personal and infrastructural resources, and cultural rules of the community impacting on the extent to which such projects can influence sustainability practice. Second, participants in these projects have a variety of backgrounds, ranging from people who were previously unengaged in sustainability practices, to those with a long history of engagement, and from serial volunteers, to those with limited other involvement in community. Outcomes of these projects are varied, but more favourable for participants that are actively involved in cohesive community-based organisations whose projects directly address their sustainability practices. Third, many of the mechanisms which induce change among participants' sustainability practices rely on the interaction of the community-based organisation and the participant, in other words a combination of structural and agency drivers.

I finish by commenting on the implications of using practice theory as a means of explaining sustainable consumption interventions. I also suggest a direction for future research into interventions for sustainable consumption which further explores the role of community in forming practice.

Public Participation in Environmental Decision Making Processes in Israel and the Role of NGO's in Shaping the Socio-Environmental Agenda

Lubanov, Carmit

Environmental Justice, New Horizon Institute for Shared Society Ramat Hasharon, Israel

Keywords

participation, Environmental, DEMOCRACY, NGO

Public Participation in decision making process in Israel, especially on environmental issues, considered to be far behind the western European countries. The obligation in Israel of including the public in planning procedures, in theory, is based on a government resolution (May 2003) on adopting sustainable development policies and on guidelines for planning in different ministries, whereas, in practice, it is not observed.

The article will review different case studies which reflecting the dichotomous situation in Israel. On one hand, achieving real progress in recent years in representing the public environmental interest in the municipality level, while on the other hand, on national level, reveals chaos concerns public participation in environmental procedures.

Furthermore, since 2006 preparation of Strategic Plans for the peripheral regions were assigned to a private association. In other words, we are witnessing a process of 'privatized planning' that is not obligated to include public participation, and the interests it represents might be opposed to those of "the public good", or at least parts of the public.

The other case study to be presented is the work of the environmental NGO's in Israel, in this field of the participation of the public, in Committees for the Environment in local municipalities authorities, by virtue of the amendment to the Local Authorities Law compelling the establishment of such committees in every local authority in Israel (2005).

The article will indicate that while it is still early to evaluate the present situation as a revolution in the planning field, such initiative in addition to continuous progress in the work of grassroots groups and organizations active in neighborhoods and different localities, are might considered as 'turning point' in the involvement of civil society in shaping the environmental-social agenda in Israel.

The article will analyze the growing role of social and environmental NGO's in shaping the active involvement of the public in environmental decision making processes, which have crucial influence on level of the individual citizens and its quality of life, and on achieving environmental democracy and sustainability of the society on national level in long term.

Public Participation in UK Land-Use Planning: Empowerment or Social Control?

Aitken, Mhairi

Aberdeen Business School, Robert Gordon University Aberdeen, UK

Keywords

participation, Renewable Energy, Planning, power

It is increasingly common for environmental policies to contain commitments to public participation. It is widely presumed that greater public participation in decision-making processes will lead to more socially acceptable - and hence sustainable - decisions or projects. However, it is important to pay critical attention to what this participation entails, how it is facilitated and how it is experienced by both participants and facilitators.

UK land-use planning policies contain strong commitments to public participation, and as such this is one area which allows exploration of these issues. This paper will present the findings of a detailed, multi-method case study of one particular planning application (for a renewable energy development) in order to explore how commitments to public participation are translated into action. In particular, it considers the roles which different actors play, and the power that they exercise within the planning process. In order to understand the many different forms of power which are exercised the research employs Lukes' three-dimensional view of power as a framework of how the concept is to be understood. Through this framework, it considers the power of objectors and prospective developers but also the forms of power that are found within the structures of the planning system itself. Power is considered to be visible not only in the outcomes of decision-making processes but also in the processes themselves. It is shown that whilst planning processes are presented as being public and democratic, considerable power is exercised in controlling the participation that is allowed and ultimately the range of outcomes which can be achieved. Furthermore, it is shown that public participants play active roles in constructing and shaping their contributions. Thus, engaging with public views is problematic since these are not presented in straightforward ways. Participants' contributions are not simple responses to the opportunity of democratic involvement, but rather represent active attempts to present lay knowledge in "credible" and "legitimate" ways. Thus it will be shown that facilitating meaningful public participation is highly problematic, requiring openness and transparency from both facilitators and participants.

Public support for nature protection: its social and personal dynamics and its role in environmental change

van Koppen, Kris

Social Sciences, Wageningen University Wageningen, Netherlands

Keywords

children, environmental concern, nature experience, public support, nature protection

Public support for nature protection: its social and personal dynamics and its role in environmental change.

In the Netherlands, among many other countries, concern is growing about the future of public support for nature protection and environmental change. Surveys of public support often focus on scores for environmental beliefs and attitudes, as well as specific behaviours, such as visiting nature areas, membership of environmental organizations, or volunteer activities. Knowledge about the social dynamics behind empirical trends of such variables, however, is limited. An important aspect of these dynamics is development of pro-environmental beliefs and activities in a person's biography. An often-heard argument is that because of a reduction of childhood experiences in nature, future citizens will be less motivated to support environmental protection. This paper explores this argument within the broader context of social and personal foundations of concern for nature. Theories about nature concern vary in a broad range between the biophilia hypothesis of Wilson at one end and constructivist accounts of 'contested natures' at the other end. Searching a middle ground between these extremes, the paper argues that there are indeed general patterns of positive response to natural settings with an almost universal standing in history; the character of such responses, however, is clearly mediated by social and cultural contexts, and also by individual childhood experiences. Subsequently, the paper investigates the impact of nature interaction on a broader environmental concern, on base of available evidence in literature. While it is far too simple to draw a direct causal line between appreciation of nature and engagement in environmental change, I argue that there are relationships between the two in terms of personal value bases and in terms of consumption patterns. The paper ends with considering what this implies for monitoring and mobilizing public support.

Quality of Life and Socioenvironmental Degradation in the Cantareira System Environmental Protected Area, SP / Brazil

Seixas Barbosa, Sônia Regina

Nucleus for Environmental Studies and Research - NEPAM, Campinas State University - UNICAMP Brazil,

Hoeffel, João Luiz

Center for Environmental Studies - Societies and Nature, University São Francisco - USF Brazil,

Santos, Anderson

PSE-FEM, Campinas State University - UNICAMP Brasil,

Bianchi, Mariana

Nucleus for Environmental Studies and Research ? NEPAM, Campinas State University - UNICAMP Campinas - São Paulo, Brazil

Keywords

socioenvironmental degradation, Sao Paulo, quality of life, Cantareira System Environmental Protected Area, Brazil

The concept of quality of life has been observed in many manners and can contribute to a better understanding of situations where socioenvironmental transformations are evident, not only from an environmental point of view but also from a social, cultural and political aspects. These transformations, based on four analytical categories, are expressed through housing conditions, survival strategies, work opportunities, educational and health services, religiousness and forms of relationship with nature. The establishment of social relationships is also considered and is primordial to the maintenance or building of a satisfactory quality of life. With these conditions in mind, a way to analyze quality of life can be an approach bound to three basic axes of analysis: the first can occur through satisfaction and access to basic needs, such as education, transportation, food, environmentally adequate sanitation, health services, etc., and the quality of access to these benefits; satisfactory collective transportation; and food and salaries that can fulfill the necessities of the individual and his family. The second axis can be analyzed through the access to fundamental conditions complementary to the life of individuals, such as culture, leisure, full satisfaction in affectionate and sexual relations; fundamental family relations; relations with nature; fully satisfactory relations with work; and a third, which is denominated here as an ethical-political benefit because it includes access to information of interest in the life of the citizen, transmitted in a clear and objective manner, political participation and involvement in collective causes; and participation in local management of urban life and citizenship. This paper seeks to analyze the quality of life of the inhabitants of two rural neighborhoods located in Nazaré Paulista and Vargem, respectively Moinho and Lopo, which belong to the Cantareira System Environmental Protected Area, State of São Paulo, Brazil. The two cities analyzed are considered examples of degraded socioenvironmental conditions brought about by the impact of a large enterprise, built in the 1970s, that diverted the regional water resources to Metropolitan São Paulo and that altered the relations of land use in the region, with direct implications on the inhabitants' quality of life.

Rebelling against McDonaldization of Agriculture

Liebe, Ulf

Institute of Sociology, Universität Leipzig Leipzig, Germany

Keywords

organic-food consumption, organic movement, McDonaldization, social norms, environmental attitudes

So far, George Ritzer's theory of McDonaldization has been applied to a wide variety of domains of social life such as family, sex, recreation, and labor processes. With a special focus on Germany, we will first sketch how the theory of McDonaldization may fruitfully be applied to industrial agriculture with both its rationalities and irrationalities. Second, in the main part of the paper we will discuss the organic movement as part of rebellion against McDonaldization from a theoretical and empirical perspective. Third, we evaluate the usefulness of Ritzer's theory. Empirical (multivariate) analyses with respect to organic-food consumption are based on the nationwide representative surveys "Environmental Awareness in Germany 2004 and 2006". We use three dependent variables which function as proxies for organic-food consumption: (1) how often respondents purchase certified food; (2) how often respondents purchase products directly from organic farms; (3) whether respondents can imagine buying genetically modified food. In line with other studies of pro-environmental behavior it turns out that the purchase of organic food is affected by economic aspects (that is, income), by environmental attitudes, social norms, education, and gender. There are also interesting rural-urban effects with respect to places where respondents grew up compared to where they are living now. Our results suggest that people socialized in rural areas in general as well as women, higher educated people, people with a higher income, environmentally conscious people, and those rewarded by their social environment for pro-environmental behavior in particular constitute the social basis of rebellion against McDonaldization. Yet, a discussion as to whether the organic-food movement tends to become McDonaldized itself (e.g. large organic supermarket chains) seems also necessary. Regarding the usefulness of Ritzer's theory we argue that modern agriculture can be accurately characterized by the process of McDonaldization concerning both production and consumption practices. However, it should not be called a theory (e.g. there is no clear possibility to falsify it). Nevertheless, future research might profit from a direct application or operationalization of the dimensions of McDonaldization in surveys.

Restructuring Food Supply: Food, Sustainability and Supermarkets

Oosterveer, Peter

Environmental Policy, Wageningen University Wageningen, Netherlands

Keywords

food, sustainability, supermarkets

In just a few decades, supermarkets have become central locations for selling and buying food worldwide and thereby they have also become obligatory passage points for sustainable food sales. Even though still some specialised shops and dedicated distribution mechanisms exist, most "sustainable foods" are nowadays sold via supermarkets. Mainstreaming sustainable food provisioning therefore requires the inclusion of supermarkets.

This paper will discuss different supermarket strategies towards sustainable food provision with particular attention to consumer involvement. Many retailers have subscribed to the importance of sustainability but they differ in:

- if and how they share this with their consumers;
- their understanding of sustainability and food;
- the marginal or structural integration of sustainability in their overall strategy;
- their passive or pro-active stand in relation to other actors in the system of provision

Hereby, supermarkets are confronted with two key tensions:

- between uniform global standards and local specificity in response to different understandings of sustainable food mediated by producers, consumers, NGOs and governments
- between consumer and provider roles as sustainability can be achieved through consumer empowerment ("political consumerism") or organised "behind the consumers" back within the system of provision.

This paper will conclude by confirming the key position supermarkets have in transitions towards sustainable food provision. Their contribution should however not be understood in isolation but as a key node in a chain of systems connecting food production and consumption. This includes in particular the supermarket floor where provider logic and consumer logic meet each other and understandings and practices on sustainable food are (re-)created. There are different strategies to increase sustainability in food provision whereby some are provider induced and others government or consumer induced.

Scientific information and collective action in socioecological conflicts

Garcia, Ernest

*Sociology and Social Anthropology, University of Valencia
Valencia, Spain*

Martinez-Iglesias, Mercedes

*Sociology and Social Anthropology, University of Valencia
Valencia, Spain*

Keywords

social-ecological conflicts, local movements, participation

This paper presents the first outcomes of the research project Scientific-technical information, public participation and effects of sustainability in socioecological conflicts (CSO2008-00291/SOCI), included at the Spanish National R+D Programme. The project aims to produce new knowledge about social movements or collective actions that are generated from social conflicts built around environmental problems or significantly related to them. More specifically, its purpose is to clarify, through the study of a significant number of cases, different issues that the research conducted so far has raised in this regard. First, the extent to which the dissemination of scientific information is a causal factor in that kind of social conflicts and, more generally, the role played by experts' descriptions of the problems in their origin and development. Secondly, if the different discourses by the experts, frequently connected to different positions in the conflict (developers, governments, citizen groups...), are associated with different visions and developments, regarding both the content of knowledge and the social role of science. In addition, the project will try to detect changes produced through the interaction between experts and activists in the pattern of social movements (effects of collective learning, building capacity for proposal, etc.) as well as in the social role of science (expanded knowledge communities, legitimacy of information sources based on traditional or experiential knowledge, and so on.). Finally, we will try to clarify the effects of restructuring and social change resulting from the development of this type of conflict in three areas: the extent to which citizen intervention involves changes toward greater openness and reflexivity in decision-making procedures, the links between collective actions and alternative visions of social organization, and the impacts in terms of environmental sustainability in a context of limits to growth.

Social Choice and Climate Change: An international sociological assessment on climate change public perceptions and public compliance with policy objectives

Pato, João

*Sustainability Research Line, Institute for Social Sciences at the University of Lisbon
Lisbon, Portugal*

Schmidt, Luísa

*Sustainability Research Line, Institute for Social Sciences at the University of Lisbon
Lisbon, Portugal*

Valente, Susana

*Linha Sustentabilidade, Instituto de Ciências Sociais da Universidade de Lisboa
Lisboa, Portugal*

Keywords

willingness to change, policy compliance, public perceptions, climate change

Climate change emerged as a global scientific phenomenon in late 1980's, resulting from recurrent scientific assessment providing reasonable evidence on the impact of human activities on regional and global climatic conditions (IPCC, 2004). Consistency of such scientific arguments led the United Nations Development Program and the World Meteorological Organization to jointly create the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change (IPCC) in 1988, aiming to provide periodic state-of-the-art scientific evaluation.

Shortly after its creation, the IPCC would realize that traditional scientific approaches to environmental issues would not contain a problem of such dimension: scale, complexity and interconnectedness of the causes of climate change, as well as its consequences, confronted scientific and political institutions with the need to build effective policy answers. As a response, three working groups were created, providing regular assessment on climate change phenomena (WG I), its environmental and economical impacts (WG II) and the formulation of response strategies (WG III).

Among these assessment efforts, the need to measure and critically analyze public perceptions on climate change was recognized as a central issue, especially when compliance with policy objectives among stakeholders and citizens is to be achieved. In this sense, the scientific community has provided empirically grounded sociological knowledge on public awareness of climate change phenomena, its causes and consequences, as well as willingness to change behavioral patterns.

Within this paper we will present preliminary results from an ongoing research project focused on the need to innovate empirical sociological assessment on climate change public perceptions and willingness to participate on policy initiatives: available international data on climate change public perceptions will be presented (national and international surveys), compared and critically analyzed; conceptual and methodological issues will be discussed; results from the application of a national survey on climate change public perceptions in Portugal will be presented and discussed; guidelines on survey design issues and alternative methodological options for data collection will be discussed.

Social learning and sustainable water management: evidence from three watersheds in the State of São Paulo, Brazil.

Beduschi, Luiz Carlos

Environmental Sciences Program (PROCAM), São Paulo University (USP) São Paulo, Brasil

Jacobi, Pedro Roberto

Environmental Sciences Program (PROCAM), São Paulo University (USP) São Paulo, Brasil

Moretto, Evandro Mateus

Environmental Engineering Program, São Paulo University (USP) São Paulo, Brasil

Bacci, Denise De La Corte

Geology, São Paulo University (USP) São Paulo, Brasil

Fracalanza, Ana Paula

*Environmental Sciences Program (PROCAM), São Paulo University (USP)
São Paulo, Brasil*

Sinisgalli, Paulo Antonio

*Environmental Sciences Program (PROCAM), São Paulo University (USP)
sao paulo, brasil*

Keywords

sustainable water governance, social learning, participation

This article discusses, based on experiences of three watersheds located in the State of São Paulo, Brazil, the emergence and evolution of a process of social learning for sustainable management of water resources. The main hypothesis is that the creation and institutionalization of spaces for participatory planning and management of water can encourage actors to build agreements that facilitate the shared governance of hydric resources. The paper examines these participatory public spaces, explaining their structures and rules, their conflicts and the ways used to solve them. The main conclusion is that sustainable water management needs necessarily to strengthen those spaces of collective participation and social learning.

Social Perceptions of Chimpanzees in Tombali (Guinea-Bissau, West Africa): a sociological contribution to chimpanzees conservation

Costa, Susana

*Psychology Department, University of Stirling
Stirling, Scotland, UK*

Lee, Phyllis

*Psychology Department, University of Stirling
Stirling, Scotland, UK*

Casanova, Catarina

*Centro de Administração e Políticas Públicas, Instituto Superior de Ciências Sociais e Políticas (UTL)
Lisboa, Portugal*

Keywords

Guinea-Bissau, attitudes, community-based conservation, Social perceptions, flag-ship species

The status attributed to different species - "good" or "bad" - can provide clues about the underlying attitudinal factors that determine this categorization and which animals could act as flag-ship species for environmental conservation purposes. As such, these sociozoologic scales can be applied to assess people's perceptions towards biodiversity. In the last decade, sociologists have been focused on Western perceptions with a lack of knowledge regarding perceptions in other societies. This presentation considers how people from Tombali (south Guinea-Bissau) perceive primates, and specifically, chimpanzees. Three hypotheses are considered: (i) A correlation between positive attitudes and edibility is expected, except for chimpanzees which are given other attributes; (ii) In general, chimpanzees are perceived as "good animals", due to their human-like affinities and appearance; (iii) Negative perceptions are due to a lack of knowledge regarding chimpanzee behaviour, as a consequence of a low number of encounters between humans and apes. A survey was conducted between February and March 2007, in Tombali. The sample included all adult inhabitants who could be contacted. Due to a lack of census information, the sample (N=257) had to be a non-probabilistic one, while age and gender were kept as balanced as possible. Photos of the Guinean fauna (n=27) were shown to subjects who were asked to rank these on adjectives such as: "good", "bad", "edible", "inedible", "pretty", "ugly", among others. Descriptive statistical analysis (cross-tabulation) and principal component analysis were applied to these rankings. In general, apart from some religious beliefs that might protect chimpanzees from poaching and bushmeat exploitation, people do not appear to be very fond of these primates. Fortunately for chimpanzees, their human resemblance have been protecting them from heavy hunting pressure. As such, chimpanzees are potentially good ambassadors for a conservation programme only if there is an understanding of why people hold negative attitudes and how to mitigate these, as found for women and some religious contexts.

Social sustainability and rural bioenergy production in Finland

Huttunen, Suvi

*department of social sciences and philosophy, University of Jyväskylä
University of Jyväskylä, Finland*

Keywords

Social sustainability, Finland, Farms, Bioenergy

Renewable energy production is often regarded as a way for sustainable energy production. However, not much research has been done in order to analyse how exactly renewable energy can fill all the four dimensions of sustainable development: environmental, ecological, social and cultural. And especially the aspect of social sustainability seems to be neglected. This article aims at shortening this gap and thus focuses on the social sustainability of bioenergy production in Finnish farms.

The analysis is based on 30 qualitative interviews of farmers producing biogas, wood-based heat or biodiesel. A detailed description of the models of production for these three types of energy production is given and their links to social sustainability are analysed. The analysis is based on a framework of social sustainability in bioenergy production, also presented in the article.

The main finding was that all three bioenergy production models include clear traits of social sustainability. These are apparent in ameliorating quality of life of the farmer-energy entrepreneur. However, the ability of local biogas and biodiesel production to produce social sustainability appears to be significantly lower than that of heat entrepreneurship, when comparing for example social networking and employment creation.

Sociological Aspects of the Introduction of Biofuels for Transport

Jensen, Mette

*Department of Policy Analysis, National Environmental Research Institute, Aarhus University
Roskilde, Denmark*

Andersen, Anne Holst

*Department of Policy Analysis, National Environmental Research Institute, Aarhus University
Roskilde, Denmark*

Keywords

risk perception, biofuel, transport

Over the past few years, biofuels - mainly bioethanol and biodiesel produced from biomass - have received increasing attention throughout Europe and the rest of the world as renewable alternatives to fossil fuels in the steady growing transport sector. Simultaneously, however, biofuel technologies have become highly disputed in public debates, in which the introduction of biofuels is alternately presented as a solution to problems of energy supply, climate change, and regional development - or as a source in itself of further environmental and social problems.

The presentation will outline and discuss findings from a qualitative sociological study of the public's perceptions of and attitudes towards biofuels, in light of the increasing biofuel debates as well as the complexity of the concerns involved. The study asks how members of the public navigate among the various ways in which biofuels are presented, promoted, and criticized in public debates, and how they relate to the various underlying interests and concerns. Particular attention is given to popular perceptions of risks associated with biofuels and to the interplay between citizen and consumer perspectives on the dilemmas of the biofuel debate.

The study indicates that the general attitude towards the introduction of biofuels is positive, as biofuels are perceived to be beneficial for the environment. However, when respondents are introduced to some of the diverse and often opposing points of view which have been raised in debates about biofuels, their support for the technology is somewhat modified. Typically, acceptance is conditioned on whether or not solutions are found to some of the problems associated with the introduction of biofuels. A fundamental question raised in the interviews is who bears primary responsibility for solving the transport sector's environmental problems as well as the problems which may result from a large-scale introduction of biofuels: politicians and regulators on a global and/or local level or the public acting as consumers, pushing demand in a more sustainable direction and thus forcing the energy industry to adjust accordingly? These issues will be in focus in the paper.

Stakeholder Consultations in the European Governance of GMO in the Food Chain: A Democratization of Expertise?

Bengtsson, Beatrice

*Research Policy Institute, Research Policy Institute
Lund, Sweden*

Klintman, Mikael

Research Policy Institute, Research Policy Institute Lund, Sweden

Keywords

Stakeholder consultations, GMO, food safety, democratic participation, deliberation

Since the food scares during the 1990s and the following public concerns, regulatory approaches such as stakeholder consultations are a key governance tool aimed at restoring public confidence and at enhancing legitimacy for policy options. In the Regulation (EC) 178/2002 of the European Parliament and of the Council of January 28th, 2002, procedures are laid down that provide for "open and transparent public consultation, directly or through representative bodies, during the preparation, evaluation and revision of food law". This paper focuses on stakeholder consultations in one particular field: the governance of genetically modified organisms (GMO) in the European Union. GMO have been controversial since they first appeared in the late 1980s. The political turmoil surrounding the GMO case, the technical complexity, the cut across several policy domains, its economic and industrial importance, the uncertainties involved as well as the public distrust makes it a fascinating topic for scholars in numerous research fields. Although much has been written about democratic participation surrounding GMO through participatory and deliberative projects at the national or sub-national level, the main question addressed in this chapter is how democratic participatory and deliberative ideals have been translated at the EU-level in this politically sensitive and highly technical field. Two cases of stakeholder consultations will be examined: a stakeholder advisory group and a stakeholder conference. The first case refers to the Advisory Group on the Food Chain and Animal and Plant Health, formed in 2004. The second case refers to the conference on "Co-existence of genetically modified, conventional and organic crops "freedom of choice", held in 2006. Both consultative processes have brought together a wide range of stakeholders: farmers and consumers associations, NGOs, seed producers, importers, food and feed processors, etc. Based on extensive document analysis and a series of interviews with central stakeholders and policy-makers, the paper aims at providing answers to the following question: To what extent are stakeholder consultations a tool for democratizing both procedures and epistemology/expertise? Does democratization in this sense concern the mere form (procedures) or even the content (epistemology/expertise)?

Sustainable Development Strategy and Sustainability Reporting connections with Corporate Governance

Dias-Sardinha, Idalina

*SOCIUS, ISEG
lisboa, Portugal*

Verga Matos, Pedro

*ADVANCE, Dep. of Management, ISEG
Lisboa, Portugal*

Reijnders, Lucas

IBED, University of Amsterdam Amsterdam, The Netherlands

Keywords

corporate social responsibility, corporate governance, postal sector, Portuguese companies

This paper discusses the development of Corporate Social Responsibility (CSR) tools and their spill-over and interrelations with Corporate Governance (CG). More specifically the paper posits the role of sustainable development strategy and sustainability reporting on the dynamics of corporate management change and their potential relevance for the improvement of CG; first by reviewing the literature and second using the postal sector. The way how companies put sustainability on a strategic level and its interrelation with their CG are both subject of current discussion and research (e.g., Surendra, 2005; Porter and Kramer, 2006; Jamali et al., 2008). The stakeholder view of the theory of the firm (Blair, 1995), with relevance in the European model of CG (O'Sullivan, 2003) can justify a progressive overlap between the CG agenda and the CSR and sustainable development agendas (Elkington, 2006). CSR in Portugal is getting to be a talkative strategic issue and sustainability and governance's reporting got to be a systematic practice from large Portuguese companies (e.g., KPMG, 2007; Heidrick and Struggles, 2007). The empirically methodology applied in this study considered a company qualitative sustainability performance evaluation from 15 large worldwide postal companies that demonstrate CSR activities, based upon a specific CSR matrix for evaluation. A sustainability internal diagnosis, following strategic guidelines for the large Portuguese postal company is suggested. For the development of the sustainability strategic planning, the focus is on factors that are considered a risk or a benefit to business development and profit, and to environmental and social value creation. A survey to main company's managers was performed to understand the impact of CSR's tools in management changes and in CG after two years CSR tools implementation. Despite difficulties in quantifying and monitoring its impact this case identifies an association between the CSR and CG. The implementation of CSR tools, has improved the transparency of the organization, increased its reported performance to stakeholders, and not just to the shareholder, introduced greater fairness / balance in defining its strategy and implemented various procedures for control of risks and compliance, all crucial factors for good governance of a company (OECD, 2004).

System Theorizing and Environmental Governance in the EU

Rodrigues, Miguel

*Sociology PhD Student (ISCTE) / Research & Development (INA), ISCTE - Instituto Superior de Ciências do Trabalho e da Empresa / INA - Instituto Nacional de Administração
Lisboa, Portugal*

Keywords

Institutional Learning, Environmental Governance, System Theories

Although the conceptualization of society as a system has a long history in sociology, system theorizing has achieved sound scientific developments in approaches like functionalism and neo-functionalism, historical and marxian theories, and actor-oriented dynamic system theories. When addressing governance issues, this conceptual complex allows sociological research to unveil and explore the social dynamics that underlie agential strategies, structural arrangements and systemic change. Globally, the field of environmental polity has acquired considerable attention and has led to major transformations in institutional and normative configurations. In fact, sustainable development is perceived as the result of the emergence of a universal model of global governance, as a complex, multi-level, multi-interest, democratic network of rules, norms, institutions and agents.

Within the European Union polity model, environmental governance arrangements have been influenced by the shift from national to supra-national regulatory scope, the increasing participation of public interest organizations and social movements, and the complexity and multiplicity of interests and values in society. On the other hand, national corporatist and neo-corporatist social systems, with different approaches to governance arrangements and policy-making processes, both influence and are influenced by the European model, which is arguably neither a pluralist nor a corporatist one.

This paper first explores how system theories conceptualize and contribute to explain governance arrangements in the field of environmental policy-making processes. It then draws on the results of a cross-national research project on adaptation to EU multi-level governance in Greece, Ireland, Portugal, Hungary and Poland, based on a social network analysis (SNA) methodology at the institutional level, to provide insights on how different national socio-political frameworks interact with the European polity model and bring about diverse institutional learning patterns and governance arrangements in the field of environmental policy.

The blind game of decentralization in European environmental policies - Community-based institutions for managing forest commons at stake in Romania and Spain

Mantescu, Liviu

Sociologie, Max-Planck-Institut für Gesellschaftsforschung Köln, Deutschland

Keywords

Spain, Romania, participatory management, forest commons, community-based institutions

From Bali to Mongolia and Venezuela, from South-Africa to Northern Siberia and Spain, Arjun Agrawal states (Agrawal 2001) that more than 60 countries deal with a form or another of decentralization in the management of natural resources, mainly forests and pastures. In most of the cases scholars advocate for taking the state out of environmental policy and management of natural resources. Non-state actors and international donors are called in. But is the local ready to meet the new challenges?

By comparing Romania and Spain, I want to point to the importance of dictatorial political legacy for the current state of the art in the discourse of environmental decentralization. Empirical evidence is brought in favor of the hypothesis that where absolutist political regimes were in power, decentralization cannot follow the same patterns like in western unitary states. Both micro and macro dimensions are analyzed within a longitudinal perspective: Romania and Spain have similar participatory regimes for managing forest commons, but different recent history, and different trajectory in the becoming as nation states. Ethnographic data is illustrated from Navarra and Vrancea regions together with an overview of the evolution of environmental policies.

The conceptual shifts in environmental social sciences after the 1960s onwards

Massa, Ilmo

Department of Biological and Environmental Science, University of Helsinki Finland,

Keywords

social science history, paradigms, environmental social science, conceptual shifts

In this presentation I will try to determine the roots and consequences of ecological paradigm shifts in social science from the 1960s onwards. From that time on, several scholars began to call for paradigm shifts or at least a "naturalistic turn" in their social science theories, from economics to political science to sociology and social policy. The obvious starting- point of the discussion was that human societies are "ecological" to the core, and a social theory which does not take this into account is more or less out of date. The concept of the paradigm, of course, originates from Thomas Kuhn, the American philosopher of science. He used it to a hegemonic framework or model of thought dominating in a particular discipline. In his major book, The Structure of Scientific Revolutions (1962/1996), Kuhn argued that science does not progress via linear accumulation of new knowledge, but undergoes periodic revolutions, "paradigm shifts", in which the nature of scientific inquiry is abruptly transformed from "normal science" to a "revolutionary science". Does the Kuhnian structure of scientific revolutions also apply to the social sciences? Most mainstream social scientists probably deny that they share a common paradigm or framework. On the other hand, there have been common paradigms in the history of social science, which even the conflicting groups have recognized as their theoretical bases. Thus, we cannot exclude the possibility of common paradigms even in the social sciences. Paradoxically, mainstream social science has often ignored these challenges, one reason being that the diversity within social science is huge and environmental social science is only one among many approaches. Besides, environmental social science itself is divided into several subfields, which do not necessary and normally communicate with each other. However, the importance of these new concepts is growing all the time.

The Coupling of the Chronic and the Acute: Environmental Problems, Disasters, and Leadership

Murphy, Raymond

Department of Sociology and Anthropology, University of Ottawa Ottawa, Canada

Keywords

environment, leadership, disaster, Max Weber, climate change

The intensified activities of a growing human population have resulted in dangerous new linkages between the slow-onset and the sudden. Social constructions are in continual interaction with emergent and only partially understood constructions of nature. Human activities now unleash nature's constructions on a planetary scale. For example, greenhouse-gas emissions let loose the chronic environmental problem of global warming, which gives rise to acute hazards such as more intense and frequent extreme weather events. This paper first develops a theoretical framework for integrating environmental sociology and disaster sociology. It starts from some key concepts suggested by Max Weber and incorporates conceptions developed in environmental sociology and disaster sociology.

The second part uses this theoretical framework to analyse interviews with political and emergency management leaders who had to manage an extreme weather disaster. That calamity resulted from intense, persistent freezing rain, which paradoxically was produced by warming, that crushed the electrical grid and led in the winter of 1998 to the most expensive disaster in the history of Canada and of the State of Maine affecting the most people in both those places. It just missed Boston. Reliance on a centralized electrical grid for essential needs, including heat in a frigid winter climate, increased vulnerability to this extreme weather and manufactured a seemingly natural disaster. This was a hybrid techno-natural disaster resulting from the interaction of a hazard constructed by nature and vulnerability constructed inadvertently by those modern societies. How do leaders who dealt with the acute crisis of a disaster make sense of the chronic problem of managing relations between human constructions and those of nature?

How do they mitigate both environmental problems like climate change and disasters, and deal with their interrelated risks? The paper is an extension of the analysis in my new book Leadership in Disaster: Learning for a Future With Global Climate Change (Montreal: McGill-Queen's University Press, 2009) to be released in May.

The Dog that Could not Bark

Stephenson, Svetlana

Applied Social Sciences, London Metropolitan University UK,

Keywords

animal control, Speciecism, sociology of human-animal relations

The paper looks at how developed Western societies deal with the chaos of natural world. Late modernity has been associated with obsessions about order, and urban environments have seen a visible proliferation of commercially controlled spaces, protected from undesirable elements. Any unattached population represents a threat to the hyper-controlled urban settings. One example of such population (rarely addressed in sociology) are stray and abandoned animals. The paper analyses the contradiction between the self-proclaimed mission of animal control services of "saving lives" and "finding new homes" for the animal, and the brutal reality of mass killings, executed in relative secrecy. It argues that in a modern society repressive drives of control machines, their waste disposal and disciplinary functions have to be reconciled with the ideology of welfare that still requires the state and the citizens to assist the weak and the needy. Like other groups who are redundant to the late modern project, unattached cats and dogs cannot be just discarded without any care or procedure. This is where strange ambiguous concepts and propositions emerge, such as tough love (in relation to human deviants) and merciful destruction (in relation to delinquent animals).

The Ecological Consequences of Neoliberal Urban Politics and the Impact of Mega-Events in the Third World: Formula 1 Istanbul Park Racing Circuit in Omerli Watershed

Taner, Mehmet Ümit

Environmental Sciences Institute, Bogaziçi University Istanbul, Turkey

Dönmez, Funda

Faculty of Architecture, Department of Urban Planning, Mimar Sinan University of Fine Arts Istanbul, Turkey

Keywords

mega events, neoliberal urbanism, urban water resources, urban transformation, watershed management

Mega-events in the cities initiate rapid transformation processes that have negative consequences for urban life. The race of becoming "global" in the post-80's neo-liberal era triggered rapid and uncontrolled changes in the urban landscapes and resulted in a major spatial transformation especially in Third World cities. The attraction of potential urban rent fed into urban transformation processes which are unequal, unplanned and disregard ecological balances. Cities are increasingly preoccupied in improving the conditions for service sector investments, with a rising number of culture and arts organizations, tourism and advertisement of the city take the front stage, ultimately leaving the backstage to class inequalities and ecological destruction.

This study investigates the prevalence of mega-events in the Third World cities and their destructive effects on ecosystems by focusing on "Formula 1 - Istanbul Park" racing circuit located within one of the most important watersheds of Istanbul, Omerli. Often, urban and regional development politics underestimate the direct linkages between water bodies and their watersheds. The previous practices of neo-liberal urban politics in the Third World had put urbanization and land-use patterns in opposition to "watershed conservation" policies. In an era where billions in the Third World will not have access to clean-water as a result of "climate change" driven ecological crisis in the near future, an ecological critique of neo-liberal urban politics is as urgent as its social, political and economic critique.

Istanbul with its claims to being a "world city" has been hosting various mega-events. Formula 1 held in Istanbul in 2003 is one important example. Omerli Watershed which supplies half the city's water was chosen as the site of the racing circuit. Building of the racing circuit triggered an increasing number of urban development projects which caused contamination of water resources and threatened the ecological life in the region containing various endangered species. Formula 1, as a mega-event embodying the dominant values of the neo-liberal age such as speed, technology, power and money is an apt example to show how neo-liberal politics and ecological destruction are intertwined in urban environments.

The energy co-provision in Italy: an irreducible technological asymmetry?

Osti, Giorgio

Human Sciences, University of Trieste Trieste, Italy

Keywords

local, energy, technologies, inter-mediation

The chances to develop a more sustainable use of energy are limited by the great dependence on fossil sources and on industrial system of provision organised around them. A way to reduce such dependence is seen in the development of local sources of energy. "Local", in this case, indicates many things: the capacity to increase the energy self-sufficiency of territorial communities; the decentralisation of provision system management; the active involvement of each consumption unit (companies as well households) into the provision. The different forms of energy localism need a precise technological mediation.

Solar, photovoltaic, biomass, Aeolian sources are technological packages that are deeply interconnected with social and cultural factors. Since their conception (invention) up to their final application such packages go through institutional channels, socially constructed. In order to understand the chances of local energy organisations we must discover and interpret such channels. They are values, norms, habits, circuits of action which intervene in every step of energy provision.

The theoretical tools are researched in the literature on practices (Spaargaren), social construction of technology (Bijker), neo-institutional approaches (Biggart). In such views, energy technologies are a sort of instrument of communication, an art of creating social fields, where actors search and sometimes find sense. The empirical field are Italian cases where consumers and energy utilities cooperate at different level and in different forms. So-called co-provision is an emblematic example. In such case, knowledge, practices and relational capabilities of energy users and providers are reshuffled.

The German "Tafel" - a sustainable way to deal with food affluence?

Lorenz, Stephan

Institute of Sociology, Friedrich-Schiller-Universität Jena, Germany

Keywords

Consumption, sustainability, social movement, food, Affluence

The main idea of "The Affluent Society" (Galbraith 1958) was that highly industrialized societies were experiencing a fundamental shift from deficiency to affluence. If there are more people suffering from too much and "wrong" than from insufficient food, the socio-economic problem of how to deal with affluence is more important to society than that of poverty. Over the last fifty years production and consumption dynamics have expanded - with lots of socio-ecological consequences. Nowadays, accelerated by globalisation processes, both affluence (a larger variety of food) and problems of poverty and exclusion are growing. An indicator is the recent raise of a special social movement in Germany called "Tafel" (similar to Food Banks). It collects excess food and distributes this to people unable to satisfy their demand via the market. In Germany the first local "Tafel"-group was founded in 1993, and now there are about 800.

Taking these developments into consideration we need a new understanding of affluence: it is ambivalent because it refers to wealth and prosperity as well as to more or less unintended consequences like waste and exclusion from wealth; and relational because it is only to be understood in relation to deficiency, necessity, and excess. That's why from a sustainability point of view affluence is to be understood as a challenge for creative politics. I will refer to an ongoing (qualitative) research about the "Tafel" asking if it is such a creative option to deal with affluence or just a symptom of unresolved affluence problems.

A contribution to socio-ecological sustainability should achieve both less excess food and less social exclusion. Obviously the really problem of the "Tafel" concept is that it needs what it wants to overcome. There is especially the tendency to use the excess food just as a resource for charity distribution. Some empirical results show the danger of becoming part of the problem than of solution. But there are also efforts to find ways out.

The Impact of EU Sustainable Development Policies on Subsistence Households

Strugut, Alina

*Sociology, University of Leipzig
Germany,*

Keywords

EU sustainability, ecotourism, subsistence communities, social space

Using both quantitative and qualitative methods, this study explores the effects of globally-driven agenda of sustainable development on the re-configuration of social space in selected rural areas of Romania, Poland, and Eastern Germany. This agenda constitutes a core priority of the United Nations (UN) and the European Union (EU), but so far little research has been done on its consequences on rural areas, other than generating economic development. This research will contribute to the already existing literature on critical junctures of globalization by providing insights into the impact of sustainable development agendas - and in particular eco-tourism - on the traditional logic of subsistence communities. Specifically, my project will investigate how rural areas, especially those defined as basic, simple subsistence economies, become involved in a process of developing new spatial reference points. Such a process is triggered by global pressures for sustainable development, whether via EU conditionality (Directives, Regulations), or directly through eco-tourists and international corporations that search low-cost markets with "great potential".

Due to global sustainable development rural areas are spaces where innovation and traditionalism not only meet, but also transform one another. My interest lies in how contingencies between internationally-defined eco-tourism and the traditional lifestyle of subsistence households re-shape social space. More concretely, I investigate how a) rural people's views on and management of natural environment; b) their experienced and imagined space; and, finally, c) their sense of socio-economic space, change when their rural community is exposed to the global and EU pressures and incentives for eco-tourism. In re-framing social space, such contingencies, as a rule, will a) generate more exploitative approach to natural environment; b) introduce a new form of "localized cosmopolitanism", that is, opening up to outsiders and the global regimes that set them in motion; and c) alter traditional patterns of production, by bringing in profit-oriented, disciplined behavior driven by partially novel investment objects.

The Making of Finland's Programme on Sustainable Consumption and Production - Rethinking deliberative policy processes for transitions

Berg, Annukka

*Department of Social Policy, University of Helsinki
Helsinki, Finland*

Keywords

deliberative policy process analysis, Sustainable consumption and production, policy programmes, Transitions

Sustainable consumption and production (SCP) is an emerging field of environmental governance that has been on the international agenda particularly since Johannesburg World Summit on Sustainable Development (2002). Today, more than 30 countries from all over the world have developed or are developing national SCP programmes. This paper analyzes one of the pioneering processes, the making of Finland's national programme to promote sustainable consumption and production.

The programme "Getting more and better from less" (2005) was negotiated among a consensus-oriented committee with representatives both from and beyond the government. It has been analysed by interviewing 20 of its members. As a framework, I have used deliberative policy process analysis. In the approach, concepts such as access, exchange and learning play central roles.

Preliminary results show that in Finland's deliberative SCP process, access was open and inclusive. While learning seemed to be commonplace, committing to the process turned out to be rather loose. Moreover, interest conflicts watered down some of the more controversial proposals of the programme. In the end, however, a consensus was reached. Several proposals of the committee have been implemented but, so far, it has not lead to major structural adjustments.

The article discusses the bearings of the case for the design of deliberative processes to promote SCP, a field where radical transitions would be needed. It proposes that functions and target groups of programme work in this area would deserve more serious attention. As sustainable consumption and production is still a rather recent approach in mainstream environmental policy, the value of learning should not be underestimated.

Still, this article ponders whether broadly-based committee work is the most efficient way of policy learning. Would a different kind of approach have enhanced the innovation potential of the process? It notes that while concrete goals and policy proposals are certainly needed, the success of a programme may also depend on the faith, public attention and legitimacy it succeeds to establish.

The Norwegian Whaling Controversy: Claimsmaking, Framing, and Science in International Environmental Politics

Hysjulien, Liam

Sociology, University of Tennessee Knoxville, Tennessee, USA

Markham, William

Sociology, University of North Carolina at Greensboro Greensboro, NC, USA

Keywords

biodiversity, sustainability, science, whaling, Framing

Norway has long enjoyed a reputation as an environmental leader. Yet, paradoxically, it is one of a handful of nations that have defied the International Whaling Commission's ban on whaling, resulting in an ongoing international controversy. This paper draws on theories of claimsmaking and framing, as well as on literature about the uses of science in environmental controversies, to analyze this international dispute. Examination of the historical roots of the controversy and the arguments mounted by both sides in recent years shows that prestigious spokespersons, claims invoking the prestige and legitimacy of science, and graphic images - all strategies suggested by the literature on claimsmaking - have indeed been used. Nevertheless, the analysis also reveals that the dispute has been played out primarily as a framing contest, in which the contending sides have mobilized frames and counterframes to make their claims credible and persuasive and modified their frames in response to their opponents' strategies and ongoing events. Norway has defended its whaling as representing a science-based effort to responsibly manage whale stocks and protect biodiversity. This framing aligns its practices with broadly accepted principles of sustainability and ecological modernization. Whaling critics attempted to circumvent these arguments by focusing primarily on the morality of hunting an allegedly sentient species, aligning their framing with human rights frames that trump national sovereignty and enjoy wide legitimacy. The limitations of science as a tool for policy-makers faced with competing claims about environmental problems are also well illustrated by this case. Scientific research working within the paradigm of managing whale populations sustainably was plagued by familiar problems of contradictory research findings and slow progress in accumulating knowledge and reaching scientific consensus; however, as evidence that Norwegian whaling might indeed be sustainable emerged, whaling opponents began to emphasize arguments that whales were sentient, social beings. These claims were also potential topics of research, but the opponents' strong reliance on moral arguments as justifications for banning whaling tended to direct attention away from research.

The politics of facts: environmental conflicts and expertise

Pellizzoni, Luigi

Dipartimento di Scienze dell'Uomo, University of Trieste Trieste, Italy

Keywords

science-policy interface, Public Sphere, environmental conflicts, Expertise

Conflicts over the environment and technology have been characterising for many years the political arena. The role played by science and expertise has been widely recognised, as a powerful tool for developing and legitimizing in the public sphere arguments for and against land uses and technology applications. Yet this has seldom represented a specific focus of inquiry. Moreover, the picture is today more entangled than it used to be. Rather than a way to overcome it, expert knowledge and advice are increasingly becoming a site of contention. The social distribution and recognition of expertise is changing, and traditional appeals to 'sound science' are challenged by more controversial, nuanced understandings of the relationship between science and politics.

A study under completion carried out in Italy and based on in depth case studies sought to address this issue. Some results will be presented and some attempts at interpreting them will be endeavoured. I will focus especially on the interplay of technical and political legitimacy and on the different forms and roles expertise may take in the public discursive arena. To build suitable analytical tools I will draw on three main sources: studies on expertise and the science-policy interface, literature on the public sphere and the transformation of politics, and social movement scholarship.

The protestant legacy in man's relationship with nature: from romanticism to ecologism

Bardes, Julia

sociology, CEPS/INSTEAD

Differdange, Luxembourg

Keywords

European environmental attitudes, cultural cleavages, protestant legacy

The fact that ecologism appears earlier and has always been more successful in Northern European countries deserves a further reflexion on the relationship between protestantism and the protection of the environment and hence on the protestant 'feeling' towards nature. All the more so since the voices having celebrated the beauty and virtues of nature and wilderness from Rousseau to the romantics bears the mark of the protestant culture. If it would be absurd to attribute everything to the influence of religious development, the fact remains that new relationships with nature - philosophical, ethical or practical relationships, esthetical schemes or legislative rules - mainly originated from protestant areas.

This paper proposes to highlight the protestant legacy in man's relationship with nature through the confrontation of historical argumentative considerations and contemporary empirical data (based on international ISSP and Eurobarometers surveys).

Closeness to nature and patrimonial concerns will be discussed according to the innovations brought on by the Reform and the striking expression this proximity to nature will take through the German romantic idealist view on nature and its American transcendentalist counterparts.

Empirical evidence leads to the conclusion that the common denominator to protestant areas should be regarded not so much along the lines of naturalistic inclination and Arcadian or sentimental views on nature (that differ according to respectively geographical factors and national traditions) as in the sight of the particular echo of the modern slogan 'Think globally, act locally' within this area.

In this sense the religious influence on today's environmental attitudes has to be considered in the process of individualisation triggered by the Reform (the individual responsibility and the destruction of the catholic traditional hierarchy are two innovations that confront man to his fate) since ecological worldviews are deeply connected with the process of modernisation in western societies and can be identified with the dynamic of reflexivity developed by Giddens.

The Sustainability Concept in Latin-America Social Theory: a preliminary analysis

Hoeffel, João Luiz

Centro de Estudos Ambientais, Universidade São Francisco Brasil,

Fadini, Almerinda

*Centro de Estudos Ambientais, Universidade São Francisco
Brasil,*

Reis, Jussara Christina

Centro de Estudos Ambientais, Universidade São Francisco Brasil,

Rocha de Jesus, Cerise

Centro de Estudos Ambientais, Universidade São Francisco Brasil,

Keywords

Conservation Units, memory, Gender Studies, life history

Considering the amount of problems that the definition of sustainability places, even by its natural range, it is expected that different views, visions and versions have emerged and been consolidated over the past years. Thus, the concept of sustainability has been widely used within different theoretical approaches and disciplines, often contradictory. This article aims to analyze the concept of sustainability in the Latin American Social Theory, with reference to the database developed for the Project: Environmental Issues, Interdisciplinary, Social Theory and intellectual production in Latin America (FAPESP process 05/52317-1). The Database contains an extensive bibliography and detailed survey of the Brazilian production in the area of Environment and Society, which results from the analysis of books, articles and thesis developed at research and graduate centers. In relation to the Latin American countries examined were considered the following centers: FLACSO and the Instituto de Investigacion y Desarrollo Económico e Social in Argentina, the United Nations Program on the Environment (UNEP) and Universidad Autonoma in Mexico, the Centro Latinoamericano de Ecología Social (Claes) in Uruguay; Division de Desarrollo Sostenible y Asentamientos Humanos (UN-Cepal) in Chile, the UNAL-Leticia headquarters and Instituto Amazônico de Pesquisa Científica (SINCHI) - Leticia in Colombia and FLACSO in Ecuador. The different conceptions of sustainability have also been object of study of the research project FAPESP - Caminhos da Cantareira (process 06/61505-9), with special reference to the relationship between water resources management and sustainability. This work presents a preliminary analysis of the Brazilian production registered in the database with a qualitative and a quantitative approach and consultation ended on December 15, 2008. The quantitative analysis was preceded by another moment, where the interest was to analyze how the concept of sustainability has been incorporated by the Latin American Social Theory, considering the Research Centers that are being prioritized by the project and the theoretical approaches and traditions to which the material is bound. This text also aims to systematize some approaches found to sustainability without exhausting all its possibilities and developments, since this is a discussion under construction.

The water flows of island Dugi otok: Governing, managing and using water on the small Adriatic island

Strazisar, Urska

Department of Anthropology, Univeristy of Ljubljana Ljubljana, Slovenia

Keywords

Adriatic island, socioecology, tradition and modernity, water management

The paper addresses several topics regarding water management in the community of Sali on island Dugi otok. Due to prevalent geomorphologic characteristic, i.e. scarcity of natural water resources, and Mediterranean climate with dry and hot summers, the populations that inhabited the island since the early days were compelled to manage fresh water very carefully. Therefore, besides establishing what cultural technology of collecting water exists in the local 'water culture?', three more interesting points are to be answered, preferably from both perspectives 'diachronic and synchronic': Firstly, by whom local water resources are governed? Traditionally they were of communal possession and governed by local community, yet in the imperial and national past there were always tendencies to regulate natural goods of strategic importance, including fresh water 'its use and proper management' that today are fully regulated by national laws. Secondly, by whom local resources are managed? Traditionally water management (fetching and transporting water to the household, maintaining the local well or private reservoir) was firmly in the domain of women, however highly developed modern technology of collecting, transporting and distributing this liquid good put in the domain of men 'engineers, policy makers, maintenance workers ...'. And finally, by whom fresh water is actually used? Traditionally local resources were supposed to meet only the local household and agricultural needs. Nevertheless, modern and complex life on the island also introduced more complex consumers of water: fish processing and tourist industry. All three fields bare potential contradictions between "traditional" and "modern" groups; and precisely these contradictions and accompanying local discourses the paper seeks to point out.

Thinking about future challenges for Finnish natural resource policy

Sairinen, Rauno

*University of Joensuu, The Centre of Competence for "Forests, Environment and Society"
Joensuu, Finland*

Keywords

Natural resource policy, climate policy, sustainable natural resource use

The paper analyses the views of various experts and policy makers on future challenges and trends of Finnish nature resource policy. The study was made as a background study for the National Natural Resources Strategy. Study is based on 14 interviews and literature analysis during the Autumn 2008. Increasing use of natural resources and concomitant challenges to sustainable development and competitiveness broadly concern the international community, as well as Finnish society and its business community. The preparation of a National Natural Resources Strategy in Finland is examining what kind of aims and measures will ensure multi-faceted well-being based on natural resources.

The results of the background study concern various future aspects of natural resource use and public politics concerning these issues. How the definitions of natural resources are changing? What are the future perspectives, main drivers and conflict areas of natural resource policies? What is the role of sustainability, economic competitiveness, national security and technological development in the future politics of natural resource use? How natural resource politics is linked to climate politics? How the relationships between global markets, national regulation and local communities are seen? The conclusions of the paper concern the challenges for natural resource governance including the principles of adaptive and multilevel governance.

Towards a Culture of Sustainable Consumption: A Transdisciplinary Approach to Organizational and Individual Learning for Sustainability in Educational Institutions

Nemnich, Claudia

Institute for Environmental and Sustainability Communication, Leuphana University of Lüneburg Germany, <http://www.konsumkultur.de/index.php?id=46&L=1>

Fischer, Daniel

Institute for Environmental and Sustainability Communication, Leuphana University of Lüneburg Germany, <http://www.konsumkultur.de/index.php?id=48&L=1>

Dr. Barth, Matthias

Institute for Environmental and Sustainability Communication, Leuphana University of Lüneburg <http://www.konsumkultur.de/index.php?id=47&L=1>, Germany

Keywords

sustainable consumption, culture of consumption, organizational learning, consumer competence

The problems of global change and the search for sustainable solutions worldwide are central challenges of the present and future. Therefore educational institutions play a pivotal role in providing youth and young adults with the competencies needed to shape and work towards a sustainable future.

The Project BINK sets out to explore how educational institutions can become places that promote a more sustainable lifestyle among young adults, especially considering food as an exemplary field of sustainable consumption.

At the heart of the project lay three core assumptions:

- (a) Educational institutions have an effect on individual consumption in two ways. On one hand they act as a facilitator of educational offers related to sustainable consumption that make students reflect their own consumption patterns more conscious. On the other, educational institutions themselves are consumption households and as such places in which school members consume.
- (b) By way of implementing coordinated development measures that systematically align formal and informal learning settings, the project aims to collaboratively conceptualize, develop and stabilise a culture of sustainable consumption in six participating educational institutions.
- (c) To effectively respond to the challenges outlined, a transdisciplinary approach is chosen. In close collaboration, the protagonists of the participating educational institutions and researchers are developing a set of interventions.

The processes of organizational change are guided by the concept of an educational institution's culture of consumption. The analytical framework evolved in three corresponding steps:

- (1) The theoretical foundation was derived from a review of existing theories related to participatory organizational development and organizational/school culture.
- (2) In an empirical study, a number of 24 non-affiliated educational institutions with different degrees of implemented and consolidated structures and initiatives related to sustainable consumption were examined in order to validate or complement the framework.

(3) In a series of workshops and meetings with the steering committees of the affiliated educational institutions, a transdisciplinary discourse over the framework was initiated.

The findings produced, identify the relevant fields and parameters of a consumption culture for educational institutions and show implications for the change processes towards a sustainable culture to promote consumer competence among its students.

Understanding Adaptive Capacity as a Dynamic Institutional Process: A Case Study of an Arctic Gateway City

Matthews, Ralph

Sociology, The University of British Columbia Vancouver, Canada

Keywords

adaptive capacity, institutions, resilience, vulnerability

This paper analyzes the conceptual basis for studying the adaptive capacity of communities as they respond to the vulnerability produced by climate change. It argues that many of the concepts in use in the social science literature on climate change are derived from ecology and, when applied to social analysis, have a rather teleological or systems orientation that limits their usefulness. It contends that, in contrast, the concepts related to institutions are derived primarily from social science and have the potential for understanding both the cultural framework influencing community responses to climate change, as well as the dynamic social behavioral processes within and between institutions that can determine whether responses are effective. In particular, it advocates an approach based in 'New Institutional Analysis'. It concludes with a very brief overview of how this approach is being used in a case study of the sub-Arctic Canadian city of Whitehorse being carried out as part of the international CAVIAR (Climate Adaptation and Vulnerability in Arctic Regions) initiative studying the social dynamics of climate change in nine Arctic rim nations.

has and assume essentially a systems perspective that fails to fully capture the dynamic processes involved in responding to environmental challenges.

What Can We Learn From the Welfare State? An Empirical Investigation on Climate Policy

Schaffrin, Andre

Faculty of Social Science, University of Mannheim Mannheim, Germany

Keywords

climate change, Welfare State, environmental movements, climate policy

In consequence of the Convention on Climate Change in Rio de Janeiro (1992) we observe increasing political awareness and institutionalization concerning global warming. Until recently, sociological research on Climate Change (CC) only took into account either political arrangements of the Kyoto-Protocol or observed individual attitudes and environmental behaviour on the micro level. As a result these studies lack an understanding of the relationships between macro-economics, national political institutions and social arrangements in a country specific context.

Drawing on the vast literature of welfare state research, this paper corresponds to the question why social democratic welfare states have been pioneers in developing policy for the mitigation of CC. The research refers to country specific pathways of institutional development in two ways.

First, welfare state research is used as a pool of analogical theoretical explanations of national CC institutions and strategies. The paper transfers the Korpi argument of left parties as a source of extending welfare state programs to the strength of Green parties as a source of climate policies. It is demonstrated that strong environmental movements influence climate policy most in countries that rate high on Lijpharts scale of consensus democracy.

Secondly, welfare institutions themselves appear to be resources of climate policies. This paper transfers recent results from Neumayer of the link between the strength of left-wing parties on environmental policy performance to the specific context of CC. The focus is placed on differences within countries, relating them to classic socioeconomic aspects. In doing this, the study explores whether the socioeconomic groups, which support income inequality reducing policies, match the support groups of institutional action for CC.

This holistic approach gives a more detailed insight in country specific institutional strategies of CC mitigation and their individual support. The analysis combines micro data from the World Value Survey and the Eurobarometer with institutional indicators on the macro level (e.g. strength of Green parties) using a multilevel modelling approach.

Wildlife-Human Conflict in Guinea-Bissau: how social perceptions can be determinant for successful conservation strategies

Casanova, Catarina

*Centro de Investigação em Políticas Públicas, ISCSP/UTL
Lisboa, Portugal*

Costa, Susana

*Centro de Administração e Políticas Públicas, ISCSP/UTL and University of Stirling (UK)
Lisbon, Portugal*

Sousa, Cláudia

*Anthropology, FCSH/UNL
Lisboa, Portugal*

Keywords

Guinea-Bissau, Humans, sociology, environment, Animals

The main goal of the present paper is to assess the social perceptions of some African ethnic groups (e.g. Nalú, Fulani among others) of nature conservation and biodiversity. The perceptions of other animals and their functions (religious, aesthetic or functional/hunting and feeding value) and the perceptions of different landscapes (sacred-bushes, mangroves, agricultural fields such as "bolanhas"/rice fields and forests) and different ecosystems are considered.

This study was conducted in an isolated rural area (deep in the South of Guinea-Bissau) via questionnaire (n=120) and observation, and was financed by FCT.

While for most sociologists (and other social scientists), animals (and ecosystems) remain the discipline's ultimate "other", we argue that not only biologists or researchers from the environmental sciences have a key role in the biodiversity conservation but sociologist too.

In order for conservationist strategies to be effective, such strategies must be developed bearing in mind their target-populations and the "sociological framework" of such communities: the social milieu (ethno-sphere) - otherwise they are doomed to failure.

Our data suggests that the social role of other animals (and landscapes and ecosystems) is important for local communities that attributes them a functional and aesthetic value.

We argue that:

- i) although historically, Sociology's relation with "animals" (and nature) has been, at best, poor and undermined by paradoxical tensions, sociologists have a strategic role while environmental and biodiversity conservation strategies are being planned by different actors (e.g. governmental organizations, among other institutions);
- ii) in a long term, Sociology (and other social sciences) can contribute to develop effective and reliable nature and biodiversity conservation strategies.

Finally, in this presentation we will address a possible framework for overcoming human-animal and nature dichotomies in Sociology. While other social scientists (e.g. physical anthropologists) have been studying primates and primate behaviour towards a better understanding of commonalities between humans and non-humans, more often than not, sociologists refuse to account for animal sociality, culture, and/or ontological comparability. This is not surprising given that the sociological "exoticization" of non-western cultures (such as the African ones) entailed - amongst many other techniques - the evocation of unclear borders between "the human" and "the animal".

RN13

Sociology of Families and Intimate Lives

"Children, a burden or a blessing? Divorce and the mental health of ex-partners"

Symoens, Sara

*Sociology, Ghent University
Ghent, Belgium*

Bracke, Piet

*Sociology, Ghent University
Ghent, Belgium*

Keywords

divorce, mental health, adjustment, children, stress

The presence of children during and after divorce is often seen as a stressor, with negative effects on the mental health of the divorcees. This "children-as-a-burden" - hypotheses points to the notion that parenting implies high responsibility in care, upbringing, transport, help with homework, and support in problems, but also financially. Secondly, children might also restrict possibilities of building new social networks or finding a new partner. And finally, they implicitly mean a lasting connection with the ex-partner, often hampering post-divorce recovery. However, children might also be a blessing for their divorced parents, as they often provide emotional support during and after divorce.

Using the data of 'Scheiding in Nederland' (SIN - Divorce in the Netherlands), we map differences in mental health by civil class and investigate to what extent the presence of children can explain these differences. 906 men and 1253 women were selected following two criteria: they had to be married/cohabiting or divorced/separated, and aged 28-65 years. Gender specific analyses were carried out. depression was measured by the CES-D20. All analyses were done using multiple regression analyses within SPSS-15. Analyses will reveal whether the "blessing"- or the "burden" - hypotheses is supported: Do divorcees with children are found to be overall less or more depressed than childless divorcees? Are there gender differences in this? Or differences for biological versus stepchildren? Results are discussed.

"Preference models in social support networks in Spain"

Fernández, Mercedes

SOCIOLOGY, UNIVERSITY OF MALAGA MÁLAGA, SPAIN

Keywords

Family, social support, Spain, dependence

The principal goal of this research is to analyse the typology of social support networks from the perspective of a dependent individual in Spain. More specifically, this research wants to elucidate the preference models of these persons concerning formal and informal social support mechanisms for physical, economic and emotional needs. Second objective is to analyse the conditioning factors for these preferences in order to develop different typologies by gender, age, number of individuals in a household, etc.

This study is based on the "Social Networks II" that was carried out in 2001 by the ISSP. This is the only representative survey at the moment at national level that is available to the public and that offers valuable information about respondents' social networks.

The presentation will be structured in two parts, namely a descriptive analysis and an explanatory part (estimating a multinomial probit per each type of need). It is not only intended to describe the structure of these models of preference, but also to explain how they are utilised and by which factors they are depended on. The results reflect the importance of the family as the primary support network of choice. Nevertheless, a detailed analysis reveals important additional tints.

"We Are Family Too!" Same-sex relational claims in Portugal

Santos, Ana Cristina

*Univ London, Birkbeck Institute for Social Research, Univ London
London, UK*

Keywords

Family, change, LGBT, relational claims

According to the Eurobarometer (2003), 93% of Portuguese citizens say "the family" is the most important aspect of their lives. But defining what a family is or what it is not is a difficult task. The Portuguese Civil Code, under Family Law, states that there are four juridical sources of family relationships - marriage, kinship, affinity and adoption (Article 1576). Each of these sources of family relationships is influenced by the premise of heterosexuality (Butler, 2002). However, legal definitions of "the family" are object of dispute, and they have been targeted by the LGBT movement in recent years. In the Portuguese context, as this paper will highlight, this has been a central field of contestation on the part of lesbian, gay, bisexual and transgender (LGBT) activism, with impact on "law's families" (Diduck, 2003) or how LGBT relational-claims (i.e., those related to the recognition of relationships and parenthood) contribute to widening the legal understanding of "the family".

In this paper, I examine the relationship between same-sex relational claims and socio-legal obstacles and advances, highlighting the centrality of two major value-discourses (Williams and Roseneil, 2004) in Portugal: "the family" and "the child". I then discuss the heteronormative value-discourse of "the family" as particularly important in Portuguese legal texts. I suggest that LGBT rights face a situation of "normative ambiguity" (Krieger, 2003) - on the one hand, the Portuguese Constitution provides protection from (individual) discrimination; on the other hand, specific laws mirror the heteronormative value-discourses of the lawmaker, preserving the law as a site of (relational) discrimination.

This opposition is counterbalanced by a recent shift. The last section of the paper explores signs of socio-legal change and examines the underlying reasons for them, putting particular emphasis on activists' proactive engagement with political parties in recent years.

'The Question of Children': Individualization and Voluntary Childlessness

Peterson, Helen

Department of Technology and Social Change, The Tema Institute Linköping, Sweden

Keywords

individualization, voluntary childlessness, Motherhood

This paper draws on semi-structured interviews with 19 Swedish, voluntarily childless (or 'childfree' as they preferred to call themselves), heterosexual women between 29 and 54 years of age. International research has addressed the subject, but in Sweden voluntary childlessness has been overlooked, although reproductive decision-making has attracted a lot of attention recently. In the public debate, childlessness has been recognized as an increasing problem (which sometimes almost also has been depicted as 'alarming') in the contemporary Western world, being an unwelcomed consequence of postponed parenthood. This paper contributes to the debate by highlighting the voluntarily childless woman's experiences of being negatively stereotyped, ignored, accused, shamed and called into question as a 'normal' woman. The decision to renounce motherhood should thus be viewed in the light of a social context where a 'fertility norm' is prevalent and motherhood is seen as an essential part of the identity of women.

However, according to some researchers, norms concerning (particularly women's) reproductive behaviour are challenged under the condition of growing individualization. It is suggested that women today experience a tension between their wish to have children and the possibility to have a 'life of their own'. In line with this, having children ceases to be a natural part of life and becomes 'the question of children'. Hence, women are forced to reflect over children and motherhood as an occupational, financial and existential risk.

This paper takes individualization as a theoretical starting-point when addressing the question: Can women's decision to renounce motherhood be interpreted as a decision influenced by the increasing individualization and as an expression of women's extended possibilities to break free from traditional, circumscribed ways of living? The main findings of this study show that the interviewed childfree women presented their choice to remain childfree as a result of a rational, conscious and deliberate decision-making process, involving for example considerations about identity and personal freedom (although not so much professional career). These childfree women also positioned themselves in relation to mothers (and fathers) who, according to the interviewed women, omitted to reflect over what the transition to parenthood really entails before becoming parents.

'You don't get sick of your colleagues' - Workplace and work content in the strategies of work-family conciliation

Salmieri, Luca

DIES - Innovazione e società, Università di Roma "La Sapienza" Italy,

Gusmano, Beatrice

DISPO- Dipartimento di Scienza Politica e Sociologia, Università degli studi di Firenze Florence, Italy

Keywords

parenting, qualitative research, work-life balance, Workplace

The 1980s and the 1990s have been recorded in social science literature as a period of unparalleled change in the work organization and the workplace. Leaner structures with more flexible work and empowered employees have been at the centre of the new imagery. As the century closed, extra attention has been focused on the direction of change in the "negative" side of flexibility, with long work hours and the overstressing workplace environment, mainly in connection to work-life balance.

The paper aims at offering a critical reflection on the range of everyday life practices couples adopt to cope with their job requirements and parenting activities. It illustrates the findings of a qualitative research based on 120 interviews of parenting workers, selected among dual and one and half earner couples in 7 European countries (Austria, Denmark, Hungary, Italy Poland, Portugal and UK). Cross-national in scope, qualitative in perspective - with in-depth and interpretative investigation - the research adopts a life-cycle approach.

The paper considers the question: how the quality and time, the type and content and the organizational scenario of work interact with parents "daily capabilities to care for their private and children lives". The structural and institutional asset within which workplaces and work contents are developed, even if unquestionably crucial, can not account for the whole set of couples and individual strategies of combining work and family realms. Motivations and orientations, but especially capabilities and adaptations of the actors involved - such as informal arrangements, solidarity among coworkers, employers-employees relationships - are investigated as key factors. Such an emphasis is even more important given the broader aim of understanding relationships between work and family where boundaries are complexly built and re-built according to the changing needs of both sides. I further maintain that the inter-relationships between flexible work and work-life balance vary according to educational credentials and social backgrounds because of the influence these latter have on the capabilities to shape strategies and adaptations to the changing requirements of work organizations.

(Why) Do lesbian women and gay men (not) want to have children?

Krell, Claudia

Department of Sociology, Catholic University of Eichstaett-Ingolstadt Eichstaett, Germany

Keywords

parenthood, Homosexuality, desire to have children

In the face of diversifying family realities, many European countries established regulations for same sex marriages and homosexual parenthood in the last decade(s). Nonetheless, non-heterosexual parenting challenges heteronormative conceptions of the dependence between motherhood and parenthood on the one hand and the linkage between either motherhood and femininity, or fatherhood and masculinity on the other. Focusing on children's problems in homosexual family constellations, the available research neglects the (potential) parent's view. Discussions about a "Gayby Boom" (Weeks et al. 2001) do not inform about the manifestation of the desire or non-desire to have children by lesbian women and gay men. Furthermore, we know little about the reasons why homosexual persons want or do not want to have children.

In order to answer these questions, I refer to 53 qualitative interviews with self-identified German lesbian women (24) and gay men (29). The data was collected between 2004 and 2006 for my PhD-project about the interdependency between homosexuality and age/ing and re-used in a secondary analysis to investigate questions about homosexual parenthood.

The findings illustrate the heterogeneity of attitudes of lesbian women and gay men concerning the desire to have children. Most lesbian women and gay men deal with the issue of future parenthood in the context of their coming-out. Parenting is not self-evident for homosexual persons. In turn, heteronormative assumptions of a contradiction between homosexuality and parenthood work in different ways: While these assumptions are incriminatory for homosexual persons who want to have children, they are exonerative for those who do not. In addition, childlessness and its acceptance can be seen as adaptation to external conditions hostile to homosexual parenthood.

A New Love Affair Life Style? An Empirical Test of Pure Relationship from the Italian Context

Guizzardi, Luca

Department of Sociology, Political Science Faculty - Bologna University Bologna, Italy

Keywords

contigent love, practice, pure relationship

The purpose of the paper is to understand the concrete possibility of the "pure relationship", as the sociologist Anthony Giddens calls a situation where a social relation is entered into for its own sake, for what can be derived by each person from a sustained association with another and it's continued only in so far as it is thought by both parties to deliver enough satisfaction for each individual to stay within it. So, the pure relationship exists exclusively for whatever rewards that relationship can deliver. Giddens describes in this way the process of individualization that has taken in the late modernity and transformed radically the intimate relationships as well as the nature of self-identity. The pure relationship - rooted in the confluent love, a contingent love on partners opening themselves out to each other - is only pure daily practise since it hasn't any more an overarching structure that sustains the relation itself: the perceived relation is the relations structure and that consequently both the perception both the structure vary individually between the two members of the couple.

So, the core propositions of Giddens' pure relationship model that I wish to test can be restated as the following hypotheses.

- i) If the pure relationship is a great promise of freedom, autonomy, happiness and independency then the "living together form" should be more and more widespread;
- ii) Can the pure relationship be generative - even if Giddens has never pointed the role of the child within the relationship? I suppose that the pure relationship is for whom wants a baby but not the other parent.
- iii) If the pure relationship is the modern form of social bond, is the family an obsolete way of life?

Analysing the data of "Family Survey 2003" by Istat, the main findings are:

- i) the pure relationship is not the main family form but it's widespread only between young people ;
- ii) the single parenthood is not common and does not depend by the desire of the single individual;
- iii) the pure relationship does not embodies the pursuit of happiness of the people by their life arrangements.

A Theoretical Approach for Work-Family Balance

Katharina, Maul

Institute of Empirical and Applied Sociology (EMPAS), University of Bremen Bremen, Germany

Keywords

Occupation, life course, Work-Family-Balance

Balancing work and family demands is a crucial factor for life satisfaction in modern societies, even more if childcare is involved. This holds true for all industrialized countries but still depends on the specific institutional setting. In Germany like in other conservative welfare states, individuals are confronted with severe problems when combining both life domains and thus either face high work-family conflicts if they are employed and have children or take the consequence of relying only on one domain, i.e. staying childless or withdraw from the labor market.

To understand the balance of these two life domains it is necessary to know more about the precise process how life domains in general influence each other positively and negatively and secondly what job characteristics can cause this influence. The proposed presentation closes this gap and explains the influence of the interdependencies of life domains on the work-family balance through job characteristics in the German setting.

The presentation uses the Sociology of the Life Course complemented by assumptions of the Theory of Social Production Function as a theoretical background for the analysis and develops four types of interdependencies between life domains: competition (domains compete for resources), complementarity (domains provide each other resources), spill-over (welfare in one domain influences it in the other) and compensation (missing welfare in one domain is compensated by the other), which highly depend on the individuals' job characteristics

To analyze the hypotheses data of the 2007 wave of the German Socioeconomic Panel will be used. The panel collects precise information about the occupation of individuals and also asks about their satisfaction with their job and family life, which will be used as indicators for work-family-balance. The empirical data will show that the postulated interdependencies influence work-family balance but that there are important gender and regional differences due to the existing family values.

Finally the importance of the theoretical arguments of this paper for other research -for instance the decision for parenthood- will be discussed.

Acting up and acting out: encountering children in a longitudinal study of mothering

Hadfield, Lucy

Health and Social Care, The Open University Milton Keynes, UK

Kehily, Mary Jane

*Education, The Open University
Milton Keynes, UK*

Thomson, Rachel

*Health and Social Care, Open University
Milton Keynes, UK*

Sharpe, Sue

*Health and Social Care, Open University
Milton Keynes, UK*

Keywords

observation, mothering, children, longitudinal, Family

Despite a proliferation of research exploring children's lives and relationships over the past two decades, there is a notable absence of research which explores family relationships from the perspective of very young children (age 0-3). This paper will report on data emerging from a study of new mothering with a particular focus on very young children's active engagement with wider family narratives, and the means with which to explore these processes. The UK based Making of Modern Motherhoods project has composed 12 longitudinal family case histories from the period 2005-2007 starting from the first time mother and including grandmothers and significant others, subsequently following seven families over a further two years (2008-2009). In the latest phase of the study, that forms part of the ESRC funded Timescapes initiative, we have documented a "day in the life" of the family, using participant observation techniques. This approach has enabled us to capture for the first time the emergence of the child (around 2 years old). This paper will draw on data across the case studies, focusing on examples of interaction between researcher, mother and child relating to food. We explore how researcher subjectivity can be interrogated as rich source of evidence regarding the place of the child within the research and family dynamic. We observe the way in which researcher attention moves between direct and indirect engagement with the child, and between adult and child centred activities, giving rise to reactions ("acting up") from both mothers and children. Our data reveals significant differences between family practices, with children performing identities and roles for and with the researcher that are intimately bound up with wider family narratives.

Analysing Multiple Perspectives in Qualitative Longitudinal Research with Families

Harden, Jeni

School of Health and Social Sciences, Edinburgh Napier University Edinburgh, Scotland

MacLean, Alice

*Centre for Research on Families and Relationships, Edinburgh University
Edinburgh, Scotland*

Beckett-Milburn, Kathryn

*Centre for Research on Families and Relationships, Edinburgh
Edinburgh, Scotland*

Cunningham- Burley, Sarah

Centre for Research on Families and Relationships, Edinburgh University Edinburgh, Scotland

Jamieson, Lynn

School of Health and Social Sciences, Edinburgh University Edinburgh, Scotland

Keywords

, multiple perspectives, Qualitative longitudinal methodology

It is not uncommon in qualitative research with families to explore the views of more than family member; yet doing so raises many epistemological, methodological and ethical questions. This paper will draw on our experiences of interpreting qualitative accounts from children and parents as part of the Timescapes "Work and Family Lives" project; a qualitative longitudinal study designed to explore the ways families negotiate their work and family lives over time. The data have been generated through two methods of interviewing - individual interviews (waves 1 and 3) and family group interviews (wave 2). In this paper we will present reflections on the process of making sense of the contradictions, gaps, silences, and shared stories, between the multiple accounts offered by children and parents. This is a challenging analytic task and involves a fluid shifting between viewing the accounts as individual's stories and as coming from their particular standpoint (for example child/parent) while at the same time trying to make sense of the dynamics within and between accounts. For qualitative longitudinal research the challenge is even greater because we not only have multiple accounts within a family group but also across time, and in the case of this project, generated by different methods. We will illustrate the discussion of these issues through reference to data from the project and in doing so we hope to offer greater transparency around the ways that researchers deal with these challenges.

Are There Class Differentials in the Time Invested in Children and Attitudes towards Parenting?

Gracia, Pablo

Universitat Pompeu Fabra, Universitat Pompeu Fabra Barcelona, Barcelona

Keywords

class, time use, Parenting attitudes

Most research highlights the relevance of the environment lived in the family of origin during the early childhood to understand individuals' life course. Scholars agree that cognitive and non-cognitive abilities developed during the early years of life - when children are very dependent on parents - is explained by the quality of parental childcare. Cross-national research focussed on the trends of parental investment highlights two general findings. Firstly, it shows that high-educated mothers and fathers are more likely to invest in children than the low-educated ones. Secondly, this literature shows that bargaining- power dialectics in couples, as well as working day schedules in the labour market, produce a variance on the degree of total time spent with children and the degree of sharing childcare responsibilities in nuclear families. However, we know very little about whether the way parents and mothers differ in parenting attitudes can be strongly explained by significant class differentials in the way parents invest in children.

This paper consists on a comparative analysis of the use and distribution of parental childcare among parents from different social backgrounds. I want to set into comparison three countries that represent different institutional contexts. The research compares United Kingdom, France and Spain. I use the Time Use Surveys of the three countries. The three datasets offer the possibility of analysing the allocation of childcare among mothers, but also among fathers cohabiting in the same household. This feature helps us to answer questions that are open in the current literature, since we can look at gender relations within the household, as well as at possible class differentials in relation childcare investments. Two are the main questions that I try to answer in this work: a) Are there cross-national differences in the way parents from different social classes invest in children? b) Can we find a significant impact of class on the way parents allocate their time in the different types of childcare?

Attitudes toward family planning in late adolescence - Hungarian perspective

Kovács, Ma, Eszter

*Institute of Behavioral Sciences, IV. Doctoral School, Behavioral Science Program, Semmelweis University
Budapest, Hungary*

Piko, Bettina F.

*Department of Behavioral Sciences, University of Szeged
Szeged, Hungary*

Keywords

family planning, values, late adolescence, attitudes

In order to predict the future image of family life we must concentrate on youth's opinions and values in terms of family formation. Various types of family forms exist today for instance living apart together, common-law-marriage, being single. Children internalize the models at home and young people learn a lot from the peer group or the media. Current research brings the attitudes into focus. What are the considerations of youth about marriage, divorce and cohabitation; what are they going to choose in their own life. Conducting survey (N=551) among high school students we could unravel the main trends. The adolescents overwhelmingly described the traditional values as desirable principle. They feel that there are new trends, but they unambiguously evaluate the traditional forms of family life, they appreciate marriage as future relationship. Furthermore is indicated that there were respondents who do not prefer the marriage as future partnership form rather they support the cohabitation. These attitudes on partnership formation are influenced by numerous crucial factors as sociocultural background, family status of the parents or religiousness and future oriented behavior.

Balancing Job Mobility and Family Life: The effects on household division of work

Meil, Gerardo

*Sociology, Universidad Autónoma de Madrid
Madrid, Spain*

Keywords

childcare, job mobility, family dynamics, household division of work, satisfaction with family life

The presentation will focus on results from a research project on the interrelationships between job mobility and family lives performed in 6 European countries (Germany, France, Poland, Spain, Belgium and Switzerland) and financed by the EU. The empirical bases of the research project is a common survey performed in the 6 countries in 2007. In particular the presentation will focus on the effects of geographical job mobility in its different forms on two key aspects of family dynamics: first, the effects on the household division of work and childcare, and secondly on the satisfaction with the family life project. The hypothesis to be discussed is if male job mobility has traditionalizing effects on the distribution of work and under which circumstances, as well as if it translates into greater dissatisfaction with the partner. Further, the effects of female job mobility will be also discussed in this context.

Bargaining couple's fertility: men's accounts

Cunha, Vanessa

Sociology, ICS/UL

Lisboa, Portugal

Keywords

decision-making, couple's fertility, strains, negotiation, men's fertility expectations

Men's involvement in the couple's fertility achievements is a subject that we are hardly familiar with and this lack of knowledge is related to a variety of reasons: the consolidation of demographic analysis based on indicators that portray, almost exclusively, women's fertility; the long-established focus on the female perspective of family life, raising children and reproductive behaviours (due to the biological/cultural prerogatives of motherhood and the growing feminization of contraception); and the widespread assumption, at least until recent times, of reproduction as a dimension of marital life without conflicts or even negotiations and adjustments.

Does it happen in this way, or do men and women enter conjugal life with personal fertility expectations which, at a given moment, have to be reconciled in a shared family project? How do partners cope in case of conflicting expectations? And how do men perceive the negotiation of the couple's fertility and the subsequent decision-making process, within a cultural context that gives women control over the couple's contraception?

From a set of interviews with married men with small children, we will look at interviewees' fertility expectations at different moments of their biography, their involvement in the negotiation of the couple's fertility, their feeling of control over the fertility outcome and, lastly, the strains experienced as a result of partners' conflicting expectations or even lack of communication.

Being Alone Mother by Choice

Hoskova, Lucie

Sociology, University of West Bohemia Pilsen, Czech Republic

Keywords

alone mothers, lone motherhood, socioeconomic status, education

This paper focuses on lone motherhood of Czech women with high level of education and socio-economic status. The aim is to explore if their decision to be alone mothers is a result of the rational living strategy. The Czech society in general and the everyday life of individuals have been influenced by many political, economical and social changes after the year 1989. The second world transition took effect in the Czech Republic twenty years later than in other Western countries and by the same time postmaterialistic values such as self-fulfillment, independence, or career have appeared. One of the most affected fields is family and family life, which are replaced with new forms reflecting better nowadays life style. One of the consequences of these changes is lone motherhood. In the Czech Republic lone motherhood applied more to the women with low level of education and socio-economic status in the early nineties, however the number of alone mothers with high level of education and socio-economic status has increased after the year 2000. My study is based on an ethnographic research with series of interviews with the women with high level of education and socio-economic status. All of them consider themselves intentionally single. They have a high position in the society and their excellent career make them more economically independent and more discerning than other women are. They have higher demands on their partner without being forced by financial strain to get married. These women choose to be alone mothers than to have a partner who does not fulfill their expectations, and they like their life style. It means the Czech society is facing a new phenomena which can contribute to further destruction of family.

Beyond motherhood: transforming sexualities and developing intimacies while maintaining transnational families (the case of Ukrainian caregivers in Italy)

Fedyuk, Olena

Sociology and Social Anthropology, Central European University Budapest, Hungary

Keywords

gendered nationalism, transitional motherhood, intimacy, Transnational migration

My research is looking at one of the most popular survival strategies in post-Soviet Ukraine, i.e. temporary labor migration abroad. While migration to Italy constitutes only the third largest migration stream (estimated to be at 700.000 people) it is the most outstanding in terms of its gender composition; out of 195.000 officially registered migrants, 83% are women, majority of whom are in their late 40s (Caritas 2007).

In the light of this gender, age composition and prolonged absences (2-7 years), women who migrate to Italy are often stigmatized as "loose women". To protect themselves from these accusations, the women emphasize that they are mothers, who sacrifice everything in order to give their children a better life. Thus, migrating women often find themselves carrying a "triple burden" of working and earning money, managing their lives in a new country and language environment, and providing emotional support for left-behind husbands and children.

The focus of the paper that will be presented in ESA 2009 will be on the intimate sphere of the relationships that migrants establish in Italy, while still maintaining their transnational families. While most of the transnational migration literature focuses on the position of women within their families and on their roles as mothers, the media and public discourse in Italy often stigmatize these women as a threat to Italian families and men - hunters. What falls in between these discourses is the widest array of intimate / romantic / sexual relationships, in which these women engage while their stay in Italy. Based on the year of field work in Naples and Bologna, the paper will use collected ethnographic material in order to explore the transformation of sexuality, shift in the social age, new subjectivities and an intricate pattern of pragmatic, emotional, personal and "for-the-better-good" decisions that shape migrant women's choices.

Carework as a shared social task and as a key to more egalitarian gender contracts

Trifiletti, Rossana

DISPO Department of Political Science and Sociology, University of Florence FIRENZE, Italy

Gusmano, Beatrice

DISPO, University of Florence FIRENZE, Italy

Keywords

Work-Life-Balance, Gender, carework

Several scholars recently underlined that the term Work/family balance, which substituted the former Work/Life balance in public discourse, has sensibly shifted its meaning, especially as concerns its policy implications (Lewis 2006; Lewis and Campbell 2008), involving in particular an important meaning shift in the EU policy recommendations (Stratigaki 2004; Blejenberg and Roggeband 2007; Jenson 2008; Schmidt and Redaelle 2004). Focusing on work-life balance, in the new concept extension, requires a more equal consideration of the care realm besides the work realm and opens to a more and more necessary social recognition of the care work inside and outside families, involving a more egalitarian gender order. The paper aims at describing the field of variation in aspiration levels which families and parenting couples or single parents deem acceptable in defining what a proper system of care of their dependants could be. The ways of using childcare services and organizing complex or one-dimension networks of help in granting steady and well-functioning care arrangements in substitution/support of parents, opens a wide sphere of combinations in which respondents tell very different stories illustrating the same conceptual topics: the usually define subjective boundaries and legitimize a compromise between "the possible and the preferred" (Lewis Campbell Huerta 2008, 25) concerning educational worries and boundaries of children wellbeing. But also of parents' wellbeing and sense of self-fulfilment. Adopting a truly constructionist approach means often asking which kind of care of children or other dependants (at which level of quality considered necessary) mothers and fathers defining themselves adult workers-and-parents consider compatible with which kind of work commitment. The question, then, is what is taken for granted in both directions and how different may be mothers and fathers' trade-offs.

The paper is based on the rich database of the Workcare project, collecting daily life narratives of 120 respondents from 7 different European countries (Austria, UK, Portugal, Poland, Italy Hungary and Danemark), analysed by N.vivo7. In our research the cross-national perspective is applied to in-depth narrative interviews adopting a life-cycle approach.

Changes in identity and social networks during the transition to parenthood. An empirical assessment in Switzerland

Sapin, Marlène

FORS - Pavie, University of Lausanne Lausanne, Switzerland

Widmer, Eric D.

Dept of Sociology, University of Geneva Geneva, Switzerland

Keywords

identity, transition to parenthood, Personal Networks, Significant others

Throughout their life course, individuals encounter a number of major transitions involving changes in social participation and lifestyles. The study of such transitions has been of interest in part because they are often times of upheaval in identity and in relationship with significant others (Ruble et al, 1990). Becoming a parent is usually described as one of the most significant developmental tasks in adulthood, marked by large changes in identity. Several longitudinal studies have started to identify the factors that may influence individual adjustment during the transition to parenthood. Few researches however have convincingly addressed the issue of stability and change of relationships with significant others throughout this transition. Neither is the impact of significant others on identity change occurring during this transition well understood. Based on a longitudinal survey of 230 couples living in the French part of Switzerland, in which both partners were interviewed in each case, we empirically assess the connections between the composition and relationships characterizing personal networks and various measures of identity for both men and women.

Changing family formation patterns in young generation in Russia: State and Legislation Responses

Ivanova, Elena

*Sociology, Russian State University for the Humanities
Moscow, Russia*

Keywords

family formation, young generation, demographic policy

Teenage motherhood as a consequence of early marriage was widespread in Russia during the 20th century. The interest in the phenomenon of low-age motherhood appeared in the early 1990s, at a time of considerable increase in teenage birth rates. However, by the early 2000s young people's fertility rates dropped to the level observed in the 1970s. How can we interpret these changes? Do they represent a reaction to reforms in the welfare system? Are they the result of the erosion of traditional marriage and family values and rising individualism among the young generation? Indeed, changing family formation patterns reflect new lifestyles and aspirations of young generations. The paper first, analyses statistical trends in young people's reproductive behavior over the past thirty years since 1965. Second, the reasons for these changes are identified. Third, the paper discusses current directions in pronatalist demographic policy in Russia. Forth, it provides an assessment of the various initiatives relating to young people's reproductive rights. And finally, the role of various political actors in the emergence of competing policy discourses in relation to teenage reproductive behavior is analyzed.

Children's School Enrolment: How Do Opportunities Within and Outside the Family Affect First Graders' School Adjustment?

Kriesi, Irene

*Jacobs Center for Productive Youth Development, University of Zurich
Zurich, Switzerland*

Scherrer, Regina

*Jacobs Center for Productive Youth Development, University of Zurich
Zurich, Switzerland*

Buchmann, Marlis

*Department of Sociology, University of Zurich
Zurich, Switzerland*

Keywords

Family, Early school adjustment, competences, peers

The paper investigates the conditions facilitating first graders' school adjustment. We examine the extent to which opportunity structures within and outside the family (e.g., social background, parenting style, leisure activities, peer relations) affect children's school adjustment directly and explore the extent to which their effects are mediated by school-relevant individual competencies and personality traits (e.g. conscientiousness, knowledge). Answers to these questions are still scarce in sociological research. Previous studies have mainly focused on the antecedents and consequences of children's cognitive skills. They also provide evidence that long-term school success strongly depends on early school adjustment processes (e.g. Entwisle et al. 1993). Given the importance of early school adjustment, a better understanding of this early transition in childhood is pivotal. From the perspective of socialization theories, we claim that early school adjustment is shaped by the interplay of familial opportunities, leisure, and peer relations and by individual dispositions and competencies.

Data are taken from the first two waves of the Swiss Longitudinal Survey of Children and Youth (COCON). This is a representative longitudinal study investigating transitions in the early life course and the development of social competences of three birth cohorts. The analyses are based on the youngest cohort (N=1273) who were 6 and 7 years old at the time of the surveys in 2006 and 2007. The data also includes information from the primary caregivers and teachers as well as from the children themselves.

Results based on path models show that familial opportunities facilitate children's school adjustment directly. They also play an indirect role by affecting opportunity structures outside the family as well as school-relevant individual competencies, such as conscientiousness and previous knowledge, which in turn affect how well children adjust to the new school environment.

Configurations of the most intimate relationships and their personal significance

Ketokivi, Kaisa

Department of Sociology, University of Helsinki, Finland University of Helsinki, Finland

Keywords

Family, intimacy, configurational perspective, relationality, intimate relationships

Who are the significant others to whom we are most intimately related? How are selves bound to these intimate others and how are intimate others bound to each other? How do other relationships, past life events and situations enable and constrain these bonds?

The paper analyses intimate relationships in relation to the configurations of significant others of 37 Finnish women and men and their personal narratives. The data is multidimensional and includes respondents' own graphic illustrations, numeric evaluation of closeness, detailed information of all significant relationships and people in them, as well as, personal narratives. First, the paper examines relational patterns of the most intimate relationship following Elias' notion of configurations. Second, it draws from narrative analysis and sociological understanding in analyzing intimate bonds as personally significant, but to a varying degree also as socially structured. Research contributes to debates on relationality of personal lives, but also provides further understanding on the varying logics of intimacy including those of nuclear and extended families, as well as, those of love and friendship. Preliminary results show that members of (nuclear) families tend to be more exclusive in intimacy although other close family members, such as non-resident parents and siblings may be included as intimate others. Selves living in less structured settings, such as with children but without a spouse, or alone tend to be more inclusive incorporating intimates outside the closest family members into the circle of intimates. The configurational logic organizes the patterns of intimacy to enable the maintenance or enrichment of the most significant relationships, such as the one to the spouse, children or both.

Conflicting or unified? Couples' response to policy measures related to fertility and family in the Czech Republic

Fucik, Petr

*IVRIS, Faculty of Social Studies MU Brno
Czech Republic,*

Chromkova Manea, Beatrice

*IVRIS, Faculty of Social Studies MU Brno
Brno, Czech Republic*

Keywords

Family, family-related policies, fertility

The welfare regime and policy measures related to family life are mostly designed to address the family as a whole without taking in consideration the differences that might exist within the family (between partners) with regard fertility decisions and family planning. Voas theory of conflicting preferences assumes that there are differences between men and women with regard to the preferred number of children a couple has. Our previous analysis based on Czech data shows that there are small differences in preferences between partners. We argued that if differences in preferences between partners exist with regard to the number of children a couple has or wants, variation between partners response to the state family-related policies will also emerge.

This contribution addresses the differences or similarities in couples response to different policy measures by comparing the responses given by partners with respect to a subset of public "family policies" that facilitate fertility, parental leave, child care, child allowances and other family-related measures. The present paper makes use of data offered by the "Marriage, Family and Work" study carried out in November 2005 in the Czech Republic. National sample includes people aged 20-40, both men and women with some age variations between men and women. Both partners were interviewed in households where the interviewers found a couple living in cohabitation or marriage. The sample is national representative for the population aged 20-40. Paired data on sixteen measures of public policy are presented and used to construct composite measure of policy packages design to support family planning and fertility in the Czech Republic.

Conformity and innovation in the relationship to family norms in the gay and lesbian "co-parenthoods"

Herbrand, Cathy

*Social sciences, Université Libre de Bruxelles
Brussels, Belgium*

Keywords

diversity, norms, parenthood, homosexual

Some gays and lesbians, sometimes also single women, use "co-parenthood" to have children in order to maintain certain values, such as the biological link or the joint presence of the mother and the father. The "co-parenthood" project is a parental agreement between a man and a woman, who are not in couple. They decide to have a child together but they want to bring him up separately, possibly with their own partner. This new design of parenthood creates very diverse and innovative forms of multi-parental families. Those "co-parents" reinforce some parental norms but also diversify the set of familial structures and "family life experiments". With this presentation, my aim is first to consider the ambiguous relationship existing between the co-parents and traditional family norms, for example with respect to gender representations and biological parenthood. Then I will show how this new form of access to parenthood, which could seem marginal at first by some of its characteristics, fit particularly well to the current constraints of society. This presentation is based on the analyses of more than twenty crossed and extensive interviews (biographical approach) with co-parents living in Belgium.

Continuity and Change in 20th Century Irish Family Lives: Individualization or Adaptation?

Gray, Jane

Sociology and National Institute for Regional and Spatial Analysis (NIRSA), National University of Ireland, Maynooth County Kildare, Ireland

O'Carroll, Aileen

National Institute for Regional and Spatial Analysis (NIRSA), National University of Ireland, Maynooth County Kildare, Ireland

O'Riain, Sean

Sociology and National Institute for Regional and Spatial Analysis (NIRSA), National University of Ireland, Maynooth County Kildare, Ireland

Keywords

life course, Ireland, individualization, 20th century

During the heyday of modernization theory, sociologists emphasized the exceptional character of "the Irish family". However, more recent scholarship has concluded that Irish family patterns converged rapidly towards those of other western societies from the 1960s through the 1980s, followed by a period of relative stability during the "Celtic Tiger" period of the 1990s. Scholars no longer subscribe to the notion of Irish "exceptionalism", but the distinctive timing and sequencing of family change in Ireland make it an interesting case with which to evaluate contemporary scholarly debates surrounding individualization and the de-standardization of the life course.

This paper draws on a unique database of life history interviews in order to investigate the dynamic relationships amongst changing social structural contexts, new values and attitudes, and innovative family life behaviour in Ireland. The "Life Histories and Social Change" project collected in-depth life story interviews and formal life history calendars from members of three birth cohorts of Irish people who had participated in the European Community Household Panel (between 1994 and 2001). In all, 117 respondents were interviewed for our project (which was funded by the Irish Research Council for the Humanities and Social Sciences). We argue that, while there have been marked shifts both in the timing and sequencing of family life transitions, and in values and orientations, leading to greater diversity in family household composition in Ireland, these changes are better understood as adaptations within an enduring commitment to stable family ties than as a secular trend towards individualization and transience. The paper also aims to highlight the usefulness of combining quantitative and qualitative longitudinal data for explaining long-term patterns of family change.

Coreidence between generations among migrant families in France: The role of cultural norms and economic constraints

ATTIAS-DONFUT, Claudine

RESEARCH ON AGEING DEPARTMENT, CNAV
PARIS, FRANCE

Keywords

Generations, migrants, coresidence, cultural norms

The higher rate of coresidence between generations among migrant families is common place. However little is known about the variation of this phenomenon among the different groups of migrants and in relation to the migratory trajectories of first and second generation migrants. We address this issue with the use of a representative survey on middle-aged and elderly immigrants in France, including complete data on their adult children. The forms of the coresidency, either between young adults and their parents, or between middle aged adults and their elderly parents, either with a daughter or with a son, are examined within different ethnic groups. The determinants of the coresidency are analysed in two main dimensions, the cultural norms on one hand and economic necessity on the other. The results show the intertwining of these two major factors and also the cultural changes that are at work in most migrant families.

Critical analysis of the indexes and items on gendered violence in heterosexual couples in Spain

Casado-Aparicio, Elena

*Sociología V (Teoría Sociológica), Universidad Complutense de Madrid
Madrid, Spain*

García-Selgas, Fernando J.

*Sociología V (Teoría Sociológica), Universidad Complutense de Madrid
Madrid, Spain*

García-García, Antonio A.

*Sociología V (Teoría Sociológica), Universidad Complutense de Madrid
Madrid, Spain*

Gómez-Esteban, Concepción

*Sociología V (Teoría Sociológica), Universidad Complutense de Madrid
Madrid, Spain*

Keywords

Statistical indexes, Heterosexual couples, Gendered violence

This paper explores the results of a 3-year quantitative and qualitative research on the items and indexes implemented in Spain to detect gendered violence in heterosexual couples. Gendered violence in intimate relationships has become a central problem, both socially and sociologically. For the last years different quantitative approaches has been implemented in Spain (as well as in other European countries) in order to detect this kind of violence and its spreading, as well as to distinguish its different expressions (physical, psychological, symbolic, etc.). Our research has shown different problems in the main tools implemented in our country (Macroencuesta La violencia contra las mujeres, Instituto de la Mujer, 1999, 2002, 2006), affecting specifically in the theoretical framework, to the distinction between violence and conflict. This distinction is even more important nowadays as far as there have been important transformations in gender and family and intimate relationships which are being rearticulated and more disputed. It means that is important to analyse this conflictivity in intimate relationships and to distinguish it analytically from gendered violence, which also has to be properly detected and measured in order to deepen our knowledge of its features, dynamics, and scope. The paper also refers to some methodological problems affecting the gendered interpretation of the items as well as the importance of the symbolic context in which the data are produced. This kind of critical considerations can be useful in order to improve our diagnoses and deepen our situated analyses about what is going on in our affective lives and in gender relations in heterosexual affective bonds.

Definitional processes and negotiations in family elderly care

Ekbrand, Hans

*Sociology, University of Gothenburg
Gothenburg, Sweden*

Engström, Sofia

*Sociology, University of Gothenburg
Gothenburg, Sweden*

Keywords

negotiations, Gender, elderly care

This paper examines how men and women, working atypical hours and caring for elderly relatives, negotiate responsibilities and commitments for their elderly relatives, in relation to family members. Negotiations are here understood as how people, through explicit decision making and through practises, shape the cognition of commitments and responsibilities.

The analysis is based on semi-structured interviews with 20 persons on their working conditions and caring responsibilities.

We find that cognitions of commitments and responsibilities are shaped in interaction in families and at work places not mainly through explicit negotiations but through practises shaping work and care discourses and definitions of identity, family culture, work commitment etc., thereby also (re-)shaping the practices. The division of care work in the family is negotiated in a context where public elderly care is available but not generally accepted as a viable alternative, making the definition of public elderly care as "good enough" one possible strategy. In the negotiation of commitments, gender is shaping and is shaped by other factors or arguments, e.g. family history, emotional closeness and family culture, used in accounting for the division of responsibility for care among siblings.

These negotiations, and the conceptions and care practises they shape, are significant because they influence gender equality through defining the limits of commitments in the family and at work.

Development and dynamics of the family in Europe

Rossi, Giovanna

SOCIOLOGY, CATHOLIC UNIVERSITY - MILAN
MILAN, ITALY

Mazzucchelli, Sara

SOCIOLOGY, CATHOLIC UNIVERSITY - MILAN
MILAN, ITALY

Keywords

development and dynamics of the family, convergence and divergence, morphogenetic process

In this paper, we will discuss the development and dynamics of the family in the European countries, focusing in particular on its morphogenetic process (Archer). This approach, in fact, helps us to understand what family diversity is and what family diversification means in a global perspective.

Certainly, the family is one of the social forms which is and will be even more subjected to the processes of rapid and profound change. In order to understand this change, we have to consider it as a social morphogenesis (i.e., a genesis of new forms), or, to be more precise, as a process with an accurate dynamic, describable and observable as a mutual conditioning (in the sense of interdependency) between identifiable, non-randomised factors that, in turn, range within a constraint and resource logic. This process could also develop new forms that are stable over time and settle down into morphogenetic processes for long periods.

Therefore, the aim of this paper is to understand the outcome of this morphogenetic process, by focusing particular attention on the transformations in making the family (cohabitation and/or marriage), in the dissolution of the marital bond and in becoming parents. Dealing with this theme, we'll make use of comparative European data (Eurostat, OECD, ESS; Eurisko), looking, in particular at the convergence and divergence between regions in the European area.

Development and dynamics of the gender relationship in Europe

Rossi, Giovanna

SOCIOLOGY, CATHOLIC UNIVERSITY - MILAN
MILAN, ITALY

Mazzucchelli, Sara

SOCIOLOGY, CATHOLIC UNIVERSITY - MILAN
MILAN, ITALY

Bosoni, Marialetizia

SOCIOLOGY, CATHOLIC UNIVERSITY - MILAN
MILAN, ITALY

Keywords

care, housework, paid work, transformation of gender identity, morphogenetic approach

Today we are witnessing on several fronts (paid work, housework and care) a transformation of identity and a consequent rethinking of the relationship between the sexes.

At a general level, structural elements emerge - which relate to gender, class, economic systems and national welfare - as inevitable and crucial points of reference in shaping the course of the individual's life and family choices. These, however, although influential, are not exclusive and do not completely explain the phenomena under consideration.

On the other hand individual characteristics, choices and orientations appear fundamental in understanding how under the same contextual conditions the social players put in practice different strategies or prefer different courses of action. Individual choices, however, cannot be over-emphasised.

Only if we manage to go beyond a mechanistic vision of influence between the two elements (structure and agency) which never relate to one another, is it possible to understand the importance of the "actors" who through their self-consciousness, intentionality and emotionality which characterises them, their ability to identify their own ultimate concerns, to dedicate themselves to these and to try to achieve them within the social order, bring out aspects which are not attributable to the social imprinting upon each one of them (Archer).

If one assumes the morphogenetic approach it is possible to observe how what generates and regenerates a family cannot be reduced neither to the pressure exerted by the social structures nor to the internal logic of individuals, but to a relationship, or rather to a reciprocal action of structure and agency which through freedom of action allows the modification of the initial structure through an act of mediation able to give rise a new family structure in the course of time. In this perspective, using comparative European data (Eurostat, OECD, ESS; Eurisko), we'll focus on the convergence or divergence between European regions, in the area of paid work, housework and care, looking in particular at the difference between women and men.

Divorce in urban and rural areas: Are there regional differences?

Zartler, Ulrike

*Institute of Sociology, University of Vienna
Vienna, Austria*

Keywords

qualitative methods, divorce, regional differences, multi-perspectivity

Family life is, among a variety of other factors, shaped and influenced by the living conditions, social surroundings, and infrastructural realities that family members face. All these factors might differ considerably in urban and rural areas. Nevertheless, family research often does not take sufficiently into account that living conditions in cities and on the countryside might vary substantially. Regarding the issue of divorce, we might assume that divorce means something different for people living in a big city and those in the countryside, as there are differences regarding attitudes, expectations, social relationships, social control, etc.

This presentation is based on two Austrian studies using a multi-perspective, qualitative approach. The first study deals with the causes and consequences of divorce and takes into account the viewpoints of children, their mothers and their fathers. Our data indicate that there are regional differences concerning the causes and preliminaries leading up to the divorce as well as its consequences. Our interview partners who lived in small rural communities had considerably worse chances to overcome difficulties related to divorce than those living in an urban area. This was the case for children, women, and men. Possible reasons for these circumstances are: differences in the basic social conditions (fewer workplaces, child care facilities and possibilities for professional support, lower wages, specific housing situation); more traditional attitudes towards family, gender roles and divorce, a higher extent of social control, a bigger loss of social prestige after divorce, and less possibilities (and willingness) to require support. In addition, first results of a currently ongoing study, exploring children's and their parents' perceptions of different family forms in urban and rural Austrian areas, are presented.

Does the way family is experienced relate to the lifecourse or a social background?

Nathalie, Ortar

LET, ENTPE

Vaulx-en-Velin, France

Keywords

Family, class, job mobility, lifecourse

This paper is going to use as empirical material the results of a research conducted on families in which one of the partner does not live part of the week with the rest of the family for job reasons. The research, led in France in 2007-2008 among French and British citizen, interviewed about fifty couples parents of children still living at home. The professions of the members of the families met ranged within the entire social scale. The key questions of the research were:

- How the families dealt with the situation,
- How did they refer to the family and built the family life
- How this way of living as a family arrived within the life-course: did they have previous experience of family life "on the move" or did their parents or themselves happen to live separately for job reasons.

One of the results of the research was that this way of life was experienced within the couple in a completely differently way within the social scale. Social status interfere in the way the family is built and lived, and in the way the society meaning friends, colleagues, kinship interpret the relationship of the couple. The paper will explore those differences. The author will analyze the way family life and intimate relations are experienced through the life course of the people met and their social background.

Don't put all your eggs in one basket! Strategies to cope with unstable work-life balance

Gusmano, Beatrice

DISPO, università degli studi di firenze
Firenze, Italy

Trifiletti, Rossana

DISPO, università degli studi di firenze
firenze, italy

Keywords

narrative interviews, public/private, work-life balance, Gender

Today, work-life balance refers to the harmonization of work and life, even though literature often talks about balance between work and family: if it were so, it should have been called "work-family balance", but this label has been abandoned during the last years. What is work-life balance about? It seems that private life has to do with what has left out as residual category after people have devoted their time to work and family.

The topic of work-life balance is always associated with the classical dichotomy between public and private life, even though these two spheres are not as separated as some literature suggests: public domains don't refer only to work, nor private space embraces just family. Time-based conflict is just one of the related conflicts that can be activated by these overlapped domains that can never be clearly separated. Work-life conflict depends on social expectations, arrangements of the distribution of domestic tasks, orientation, actions, capabilities, satisfaction and on many other factors that can be lead to cultural and institutional reasons. For example, it's very hard for parents to arrange daily life in a way that can free time for themselves as individuals independent from their family roles: they usually cope with precariousness by giving up time for themselves or for the couple, and offering an explanation that has to do with their "orientation" towards parenthood. At the same time, parents are constrained by gender organization of daily life that sometimes forces women and men in different and rigid categories, reducing their identities to those of mothers and fathers. This paper will show some insights about how parents manage their professional and their private life, trying to reconcile time and space for family, for work and for private issues that can be beyond the scope of caring.

The empirical background of the research is based on 120 interviews focused on everyday life practices, conducted in seven different European countries (Austria, Denmark, Hungary, Italy, Portugal, Sweden, United Kingdom) and analysed by N-Vivo7.

Downward transfers: Financial support for children and grandchildren

Igel, Corinne Igel

*Institute of Sociology, University of Zurich
Zurich, Switzerland*

Deindl, Christian Deindl

*Sociological Institut of Zurich, University of Zurich
Zurich, Switzerland*

Keywords

intergenerational solidarity, financial transfers, europe

A continuously ageing society and concerns about the future of the welfare state sociological research on family solidarity becomes an important and largely discussed topic. Consequently, studies concerning intergenerational relations often deal with transfers from the younger to the elderly. However, a closer look at the net transfer flows shows that the elderly give more than they receive, which mainly can be ascribed to livelong financial support which parents provide to their children and grandchildren. These transfers are thereby enormously heterogeneous: They are made because of different reasons as well as at different points in time of the life course of the giver and receiver.

In our research we compare financial transfers to children and grandchildren in Europe in order to capture important differences concerning the opportunity and need structures of financial flows, as well as diverse objectives for financial gifts. Additionally, empirical work has shown that in Europe substantial country differences in terms of economic transfers exist, which can be linked to the multitude of European welfare state arrangements and family policies. Concerning financial transfers the question arises, how social security systems enable the older generation to give economic support to their children and grandchildren and strengthen family solidarity. Additionally, public support to young people and families might reshape the need situations of the potential receivers of financial downward transfers and influence intergenerational solidarity. In our research we consequently analyse which country specific differences exist and estimate multilevel regression models to test the effect of cultural-contextual structure on downward financial transfers.

The analyses are based on the Survey of Health, Aging and Retirement in Europe (Austria, Belgium, Denmark, France, Germany, Greece, Italy, the Netherlands, Spain, Sweden, and Switzerland). They show that the influence of opportunity, need and family structures on financial transfers to children and grandchildren differ from each other and that different institutional contexts lead to various levels of downward financial flows.

Economic transfers in cash and kind in Andalusian families

Bruquetas Callejo, Carlos

*Faculty of Social Sciences and Law, University of Jaén, University of Jaén
Jaén, Spain*

Olid González, Evangelina

*Faculty of Social Sciences and Law, University of Jaén, University of Jaén
Jaén, Spain*

Keywords

housing, intergenerational transfers, family transfers, economic transfer, position labor market

This paper deals with some aspects of the linkages between family solidarity and regarding the activity in Spain. Specifically, our interest is to check whether the provision of economic transfers from relatives and the position on the labor market of those who give and receive are related.

Data from this study are from the Survey of Family Networks in Andalusia, conducted in 2006 by the Statistical Institute of Andalusia. It examines, from a stratified random sample of 9985 cases, the configuration of family networks, the characteristics of individuals and a wide range of what could be driving on these channels: mainly affects, services and goods. We have limited aid from relatives who are not living in the same household.

The assets considered consist on heirlooms, gifts, monetary overtime, regular aid and monetary support to pay the regular purchases of a home, payment housing, etc.

So, we have focused the analysis to the regular transfers in kind and cash. Do not forget that the aid to housing is one of the forms of intergenerational assistance more widely.

Educational heterogamy: What are the consequences for the rearing of and relation with children in the family?

Eeckhaut, Mieke

*Sociology, UGent
Ghent, Belgium*

Van de Putte, Bart

*Sociology, UGent
Ghent, Belgium*

Gerris, Jan

Social Sciences, Radboud Univerity Nijmegen Nijmegen, Netherlands

Keywords

education, heterogamy, cultural differences, child-rearing

Heterogamous marriages have been found to be characterized by a higher risk of low marital satisfaction and divorce. This has been attributed to the possible presence of social disapproval, and cultural differences between the partners. Implicit in this explanation is the idea that heterogamous couples can be discerned from the beginning of their relationship. If this is of importance for marital quality and divorce, it should also affect other aspects of the family to an important extent.

In the article, we aim to draw attention to the possible specificity of heterogamous couples in domains other than divorce and marital satisfaction. We examine the following question: What is the role of heterogamy for the rearing of and relation with children in the family? Given the relatively increased importance of education in contemporary partner choice, we focus on couples that are heterogamous in terms of educational level. For these couples, we examine the association between educational differences and different aspects of child rearing such as behavioural problems of the child, parent-child relations, parental depression, social support for the parents and child-rearing satisfaction. We also examine the possible explanatory value of the degree of cultural differences and marital conflict. We hypothesise that there is a positive association between educational heterogamy and child-rearing problems, that can in large part be explained by the elevated risk of cultural differences and marital conflict in heterogamous couples.

After analyzing multi-actor data from 632 families in the dataset 'Child-rearing and family in the Netherlands' we find that educational heterogamy leads to reports of lower child-rearing satisfaction by both parents, more perceived behavioural problems among children, an increase in parental depression among fathers, and less perceived support by fathers. These findings are especially strong among couples in which the woman is of high and the man of low educational status. The inclusion of the intermediate variables - especially the degree of marital conflict - explains a large part of this association. This shows that the basic differences between homogamous and heterogamous couples permeate the family in a way that has affects beyond just marital satisfaction and divorce risk.

Facing ambivalence: women's narratives about physical and emotional violence in family relations

Notko, Marianne

*Family Research Centre, University of Jyväskylä
Jyväskylä, Finland*

Keywords

ambivalence, family relations, relationality, violence, women

My ongoing qualitative doctoral research in sociology deals with Finnish women's narratives of harmful family relationships. The data consist of 40 women's writings which were collected through a request published in newspapers and magazines. My main questions dealt with how violence is experienced and defined, and what can be told about violence and family relations in current social and cultural climate. The perspective on family relations is broad and informants described harmful or violent relations with their husbands, mother-in-laws, sisters, fathers, mothers, grandfathers and brothers.

I looked through the narratives with the concepts of relationality and ambivalence: an individual, who is living in a close but hurting family relation often faces cultural expectations of maintaining the relationship but also demands for autonomous, active choices. It is important to understand individual feelings of ambivalence as connected to ambivalences on the social structural level. One of my analytical tasks was identifying types of narratives. I constructed three types of stories: 1) stories of stopping and staying still; 2) stories of redefining the borders; 3) stories of breaking away. On the basis of these narratives I was able to take a closer look at the various emotional and/or concrete processes that women undergo in their harmful family relations. Narratives of stopping and staying still can help in perceiving the strong effects of violence, whereas stories of breaking away and abandoning the relationship may help to create models for counselling and other violence-related family work. Especially stories of redefining the borders show the ambivalence and complexity of family relations and could function as a basis for a broader understanding of domestic violence. Awareness of these different types of narratives can further both academic and professional knowledge about physical and emotional violence in various family relations.

Families at stake: childbirth's effects on families' income and parents' participation in labour market within different countries

Crespi, Isabella

*Dept. Education, University of Macerata
Italy,*

Bould, Sally

Gerontology Institute, University of Mass, Boston Brookline, MA, Usa

Schmaus, Gunther

ERDI, Ceps-Instead, Luxembourg Differdange, Luxembourg

Keywords

welfare policies, longitudinal study, Family, GENDER EQUALITY, work-family balance

The past two decades in Western European societies have been marked by a decline in birthrates together with an increase in women's work force participation. This has given rise to a massive transformation in traditional patterns of relationships especially in gender roles and family size. The work-family balance in the different national frameworks are the result of the different social and family policies designed on the basis of the aspects related to work, gender roles, family forms and different welfare strategies. Although there are guiding principles in the EU masterplan each country has its own social and family policies. This paper will examine the outcome of the birth of a child and link this outcome to specific family policies in UK, Germany, Italy, France, Luxembourg, Denmark, Spain, Portugal, Greece.

The outcome of the birth of a child will be measured in the data by comparing the pre-childbirth income and its sources to the post childbirth income and its sources. How does the financial impact of having a child differ in different countries? What is the impact of the compensation provided by the state in terms of transfer benefits for families? What is the impact on women's labour force activity? What are the changes in the wage income of the family members?

This research uses the Consortium of Household panels for European socio-economic Research (CHER) longitudinal panel from 1990 to 2002 in the eight European countries (www.ceps.lu/cher/accueil.cfm). Households are included when a birth appears in year 1. These households are examined for total income as well as sources of income in Year 0, before the birth and in Year 2, after the birth. If the income variables are incomplete, the case is dropped. Data provide for a detailed cross national comparison before and after the birth of a child for market work, wage income and public transfer income, including family benefits. The results indicate that there are important differences among the European countries studied.

Family and gender in Europe: trends of convergence and divergence comparing countries

Torres, Anália

Sociology, ISCTE, CIES-ISCTE

Lisbon, Portugal

Brites, Rui

Sociology, ISCTE, CIES-ISCTE

Lisbon, Portugal

Coelho, Bernardo

CIES-ISCTE, CIES-ISCTE

Lisbon, Portugal

Cardoso, Inês

CIES-ISCTE, CIES-ISCTE

Lisbon, Portugal

Keywords

europe, Family, equality, dynamics of change, Gender Regimes

Several research results comparing family patterns and values in European contemporary societies lead us easily to two findings. First, gender equality values within family division of labour are clearly sustained by the majority of the Europeans while practices in the same domain point out to gender differences and inequalities.

Second, while changes in all countries have assumed the same kind of trend, from more traditional gender values towards gender equality, opening room for change in gender relations in family life, there are, more in some European countries than in others, persistent models of practice reproducing more traditional gender regimes. So, the transformations of the family in Europe follow the same patterns but in different rhythms and cultural variants.

Exploring the European Social Survey Round 2 (2004) and Round 3 (2006) data we analyse and discuss the meaning of the answers to different types of questions accessing at the same time for the differences among countries and among sexes regarding gender and family values. We argue that to understand those differences between countries we need to account for structural, institutional, cultural contexts but also to the dynamics of change in specific countries.

Family Diversity and Individualisation after Socialism - Two Generations of Bulgarian Women Negotiate Their Intimate Lives

Stoilova, Mariya

*Birkbeck Institute for Social Research, Birkbeck, University of London
London, UK*

Keywords

individualisation, family transformations, Gender, Bulgaria

Individualisation has become an influential, although contested (Jamieson, 1998), theory describing recent transformations in personal and social lives. A number of sociologists (Giddens, 1991; Beck, 1991; Beck and Beck-Gernsheim, 2001; Bauman, 1994, 2005) have argued that recent years have seen significant loosening of traditional life boundaries through disintegration of previously existing social norms and categories like class, gender, family, occupation. As a result, there has been liberalisation of gender norms, creation of more flexible ideas of femininity and masculinity, and diversification of ways of "doing family" (Morgan, 1996) where the emphasis is put on choice, rather than marriage or blood ties.

This paper critically evaluates the extent to which individualisation theory can be applied to the transformation of family values and practices in post-socialist Bulgaria, which has performed a "plunge into modernity" (Beck and Beck-Gernsheim, 2001: 2) after 1989. Drawing on recent qualitative semi-structured interviews with two generations of Bulgarian women the paper suggests that there are significant changes and continuities in family practices and values. Firstly, the paper focuses on the moral negotiation of existing norms and "new" unconventional practices within and between individuals and demonstrates how these processes have been different for the two generations. Secondly, the paper explores women's experiences of unconventional family arrangements and suggests that these arrangements can be seen as based on individual choice, and not only on socio-economic context. Lastly, the discussion focuses on some cross-generational changes in gender power relations within the family and argues that women have to balance their independent sense of self with existing male expectations for dominance within the intimate sphere.

In conclusion, the author suggests that there is a growing acknowledgement of the importance of choice and individual circumstances in shaping intimate life journeys, but decisions are embedded in pre-existing gender unequal social contexts. Therefore, choices and practices related to family and other intimate relationships have to be seen as results from moral negotiation and non-negotiation occurring in the context of individualisation and continued importance of social structures.

Family instability in the immigration context. The life course of immigrant single-mothers after a conjugal separation

Gherghel, Ana

CES-UA, University of Azores

Ponta Delgada, Azores, Portugal

Saint-Jacques, Marie-Christine

Ecole de service social, Université Laval

Quebec, Canada

Keywords

conjugal separation, single-parent family, Immigration, life transition, serial transitions

